And I told you that I loved you, and you shook your head and Cried,
But then we made love: Let me say that we made love under the Soft plates of lime in the orchards that the angels love:
Your sisters looking away to themselves,
Sleeping in their own room in the house that your father promised
To you,
Sleeping next to you but not by so many words;
While I caracole around you, flying like a boy who cannot die:
Families of cathedrals going up in smoke; I delayed you and you came,
But not in time to buy the flowers for the anniversary of your Grandmothers' death: Alma: and all of my art is weak,
And I am just trying to deceive for whatever reason that I cannot Believe;
But I see you at the movies, and then I see you at my house-
And we walked hand in hand through the galleries today; and I
Tasted your mouth-
I am sure tomorrow I will bring you breakfast: a blueberry bagel with Strawberry cream cheese; but whether or not you will like it
I don't know:
All I can do is believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Is It Beautiful To Say I Love You

Is it beautiful to say I love you
Even though I haven't seen you for ten years?
But you once kissed my neck and you are not my aunt.
I still feel you there, and you are behind my eyes.
I look upon you though I haven't seen you for All this time.

You said two years ago that I don't Really know you, but that was on the telephone.
How come? I want to know
You, and in the language my hands create, I pretend
To know you. I know you! Or I am just foolish
And have never loved.

Stand in front of me and tell me you
Do not love me, and then I will leave you alone,
Though you might follow me if you wish,
With the trail my heart bleeds.

My favorite high school teacher says these Poems are good, even though they are all about you.
He says get over you, but he also didn't know
That I could graduate—I say, I don't need to Get over you. You are all that I have.
In fact, I need you.... not so much the poems....

And is that all there is when I touch myself
Involuntarily in the night, because I need you there?
Or will you finally come to me, and allow us to Create for real all that I have hoped
And written.

Robert Rorabeck

Issues Of My Absolute Affections

If you come to me tomorrow- Alma,
And we make love hidden by the ixora, in a house
That is as old as my grandfather,
But which can still get up and dance, then I will be as happy
As anyone:
And I can look forever into the auger darkness of your Brownest of eyes and never see how big your corneas can grow:
And even while the graveyards grow like wild berries on the drooling Sunlight and crying rain straight up against the kindergartens and Playgrounds of the most innocent of children,
Not a single person can deny my love for you:
Or the repeated infatuation of my art for you, or my broken promises
Of sobriety:
And I don't want to have to make love to any other body, though
I find making love a great necessity:
And I can douse my head underneath the soft skin of your atmospheres
And find so much untroubled gold, and this I can Take up and save for you like beautiful newborn kittens drooling
The milk of venomous rattlesnakes who had the will never to strike Anyone, especially star-crossed sailors- right there in the Bright palm of my hand:
And we can make love forever, growing old together and trust each other
With our suitcases and locker combinations;
And maybe you don't understand all of this, Alma, but you understand
Enough to know that I love you more sincerely and more incandescently
That the sexiest of stewardesses can love her handsomest of Passengers,
So when I tell you that I have never laid eyes on a woman as beautiful
As you, how can you argue with the unrequited issues of my Absolute affections.

Robert Rorabeck

It Is Not Easy

It is not easy to find
New words to justify myself
These days,
To keep the knife balanced
On the fruit of my throat
Without slipping in,
To sever the secret
Things I'll never say;
It is not easy to look
At things in the mirror
And say that they are not So different from their Reflections; in the homeless
Summer, failed men make Love in the park and Little blonde boys with Red lunch boxes return
Home from school—
When no one else is Home, it is not easy to See the world from Where you live— The Roof is too low to watch
The ocean rolling infinite,
To see the planes flying
Like choreographed
Angels of superstructure as the alligators
Swim lazy like prehistoric
And ugly mermaids through her Man-made waterways—
To see the homeless come
Toward your childhood,
To lead it away from school
And down to the sea
To feel forever through the Waves as stoned professionals,
The adulterers make love
In the sad nearby;
It is not easy to look her

In the eye,
To take his hand and let Him lead you beneath the rolling calms—
And the sky is hollow
And filled with echoes
Where she takes you;
It is not easy to keep Writing these things,
The woodcarvers and Morticians lay down in their Architectures
In the land of graveyards
The dead go on forever,
But it is not easy—

Robert Rorabeck

It Just So Happens

The world feels like the static mariposas in strange auction;
And the night sleeps: perhaps it will enjoy the broken chrysalis of Daylight,
When the love making happens and the song birds become so
Pestilent,
And all the happenstance of lovers have to get up again to also start
Making joy into the world;
And now all the books are filled and the numbers written down,
Everyone accounted for, like they taught you for in school:
Why you had to get up early and count on your fingers and blue toes:
How alma's eyes can almost come through the very opulence of Nothing in particular: How she drives a gray Dodge Charger, but Can hardly afford to pay for her dinner:
And now Alma is very beautiful: She is an open extension cord,
She is a candle lit for mass: She is someone who laid down once for A conquistador in a garden of Spikenard I know not what for, except That they were very early disturbed by the macho animals who Came two by two, beating their chests and singing Haiku;
And I am really uncertain what they did that for, but now I should have A house that is just a jaunt away from the see; and I see Alma every day,
And it just so happens that she sees me.

Robert Rorabeck

It Never Seems To Get Cold

Thoughts of fickle roses and Credit card machines-
A police dog's bite mark in my Left forearm,
New scars along my left cheek
That might finally heal underground;
And this very instant iguanas
Released by ten year old hurricanes
Are sunning themselves on the Banks of canals all across
South Florida;
They must be good to eat,
And I sing the blues
And practice dirges in the dark;
The palmettos down here first cut up
And then decorate with your light,
But you never look up,
And yet even with the sun further away
It never seems to get cold.

Robert Rorabeck

It Rains

Rains sure are wet:

They get that way when they are cast outside,
Down sleeping in the hedgerow,
Dampening the smoking pipes of old English Professors;
And the woods seem to cry with rain,
Yet to be defeated lovers underneath the aeroplanes:
And the woods seem dampened and that is when
You go out to meet your other man,
Feet pressing the switch backed crèches over the Cemetery,
Going with all the muted pitter-patter,
My great uncle huffing paint out on the lake
And all the mortgages whispering, the greater poets tucked
In and well-hung, lucky hands molesting
All the things they gathered from class;
And bees are hung over in the still-life of their vases,
And all those flowers sit there drinking quietly uncertain
About death,
Rains flooding the eaves and making crepuscule early and Confused, yet none the less beautiful, as I said
As it rains.

Robert Rorabeck

It Would Be Almost Worth Living

My eyes fog like San Francisco:
I have never been to San Francisco,
But I hear that long red bridge,
Like a woman is great for suicide;
And, I don't know who I am- On my second
Beer,
And I'm already not looking half bad,
Keeping one eye out for cops,
Or pretty unwed mothers with one leg:
I just don't want to starve-
I need someone to clean and change my bandages:
If I could just find a very, very tired eyed
Woman to stay with me forever in one or two rooms
In a very, very simple home,
That we could live in and sweep at midnight,
And practice child-making through the short,
Unsteady halls- it would be beautiful,
It would be almost worth living.

Robert Rorabeck

Its Fallen Princess

At home again, called out from seashells,
From the illusions of our workaday world, the doll I
Paint in my poems,
And position in my two bedrooms: the both of us
Alone on Holidays of Tuesdays,
Your brown skin makes love to a baseball ghost
In the twilight of voiceless lions,
So I am the crippled king of beasts, and you like it
When I pull your hair,
Your eyes as dark as the confections of torture,
Your sweet body tumbling and ecstatic, at times
A Ferris Wheel,
At times a Roller Coaster, sweating in the singularity of My tourism,
But always the park gets over itself; the trees, disrobing,
Weep like newborns,
And I like a forest in a thunderstorm, as you remember
Your daughter, and where you left your keys
And your car outside, the means to escape a midway
Who has given you all of its prizes,
And declared you its fallen princess.

Robert Rorabeck

Its Promises

Cars drive by- laughing, the light fades as the bow shoots
Its quiver full of hopes up into the sky-
Through the panes of windows, the last of another day's Bright visage can yet be seen mottling, friendly:
And there is sure to be cares left in the world, even after the Fair has migrated,
As she works in her little clay court to pay for her joys,
And her young family dances around her, clapping, Dousing the fire with wreaths of flowers and Gasoline
Until everything in the night descends, roaring, tumultuous
Puppets getting off on their own numbers,
Cutting paper dolls from the paper trees of their woods:
And all of the woodsmen gets out their axes,
And old fashioned, go to town, saving the kittens as they Timber her will,
Collecting her apples- calling to each other like braggarts,
Removing her from the tallow halls of her high school-
Like a candle removed from church,
Apples from the orchard, a light house from the sea:
And having their fill, even as that very same day the sun goes Down into the world,
Sinking with the last of its promises and couples of Elephants, going into another places where, even with all of Its promises, she should never see.

Robert Rorabeck

It's Still Early

Anywhere can be beautiful,
If I hadn't planned to be there and Found you quietly breathing in a
Glade of second grade tulips;
And it made me believe in the pastel
Resurrecting of a god who wasn't
Even mine;
You that cute sort of breasted deity,
Never minding how the ants crawled and Perspired on your unscarred parts,
Like an entire zoological collection,
A leggy car- Oh, how so easily you forgot
Me, perhaps even now forgetting your Erstwhile pills, doing phallacio,
Trying to get a jumpstart on teenage pregnancy;
But I'm just kidding,
Because aren't you even now eclipsing thirty,
And pretty soon I'm sure you'll have a
Hyphened last name,
A two car garage, and a dog scratching on
All your doors and four-post beds-
I'm sorry if this poem is dirty, because I'm Drunk and that is just how it is;
You see, the teacher thought that I'd brought this
For her,
And the entire colony followed me in and started Dripping honey while you practiced beautifying your Cursive; and this makes me laugh,
That I should have to pay a toll to draw on your Bridge, to take off your panties,
But didn't I already apologize for this poem being Dirty- You see, I'm getting drunk
But its still early.

Robert Rorabeck

Its Sweet Surprises

So the cavalry arrives and thanks their luck stars
In their lucky skies:
And the instruments of make-believe and regret wind down
Through the world,
Taking with them the last of the pretty bets into the Casinos of the sea
Whom never take any pleasure in this, but go on swinging
Like the simulacrum of an indescribable religion,
While the last lines delineate steadily across the fables of
The yards,
Until the schools finally lay closed like flea markets underneath
The overpasses of the rookery of airplanes,
The gorgeous stewardesses dreaming of their men as tall as Giants who bathe in the sea,
And sell used cars in a forest far enough away to be a fable
Told to children on the cusp of sleep
Whose mothers have them smell their favorite shampoos
So that their eyeless visions can be as sweet as the commercials of Hummingbirds who, amidst the apiaries of an old grandmothers'
Wishes pollinate the world all through the night until
It finally breaks open its sweet surprises into another world.

Robert Rorabeck

I've Put You In The Fairly Benevolent Surrender Of The Sky

I've put you into the corner where it doesn't hurt
So much to look at you—
The coral snakes come up and kiss your feet just Like the corners of my cheeks,
And the sun comes out after the rain—other words
I don't know about you,
But I will take shelter in my classes and oh my gosh—
Why, you've already gone home,
Discreetly in your corvette—too busily to give me
Any of your numbers—as the boys watch you
And then step inside to watch something else they Would like to forget.

Robert Rorabeck

Ivory Billed Woodpecker

I was drunk when I called you down from the sky.

Now I don't know what to do with you.

Goodbye.

Robert Rorabeck

Jack And His Stewardesses

In my new house I am
Leapt over by
Stewardesses hourly,
Which is really amazing,
And just now I have nothing
Else to sell,
And I am happy, so happy
For all these just scars
That some untrue god has given me;
I know that I will still Go to sleep forever under
The séances of Ceiling fans,
But now these too will be
Leapt over by
The opal stems of the Erudite stewardesses, who Go away
Not unlike birthday wishes
Serving overpriced
Drinks to
Their breathless if Lucky businessmen.

Robert Rorabeck

Jack Johnson

Women like us
Because we eat cold eels
And think distant thoughts
Stolen from the opal waves.
When there is no rain for sometime,
And the sea doesn't swell,
Then we grow hungry and roam.
Our eyes, half dreaming,
Stumble to the amusements beneath
The grinning moon,
Where her thighs are bared from
The slip and she revolves on a
Carrousel, laughing distantly
On a wooden horse;
The same one which destroyed Troy.
She is so young she is like a youth
We could hold with little exertion,
And so naive we could steal famous words
And hang them to her lips like sardines,
And she would take them out of our Fingers and swear to marry us.
We go to her,
The darkest pugilists who
Do not raise a hand,
And let her fall into us like a silk ribbon,
Like a single vein inside us, but most precious.
Faithful and faithless alike, their eyes shine like
Polished dimes from the cold gutters;
And we eek out which rooms we will give
Her to sleep and sing and to groom.
Thus clutched in the embers of our troubled
Dawn,
We take her to the couch of the woods,
Where, looking back, she is like a pillar of salt
Building our thirst,
And our night is the truest thief,
But our smile is just compensation.

Janice Headed Reckoning

I love you,
Susan;
You are my god-
I want nothing more
Than to bask
In the verdant esplanades
Beneath your tremulous bosom;
But I am a pantheist
And the other gods,
They are insouciantly jealous
Just waking up like flies from The daub;
It will be for us the same kind
Of hell, I reckon.

Robert Rorabeck

Japanese Beer

I can see the tresses of some bridge
Where I sit
Manipulating myself with a
Can of beer
Angels in a smoky changing room
Calibrated by the blueprints of Man's divinating modernity-
My mother's birthday was earlier
This year
And now no one shows up at
The shop at all
But it is an easy life
With airconditioning and fish
As big as pennies
In glass bowls
We had to pay for
We should have won,
But the fair and the circus have Both fled away
Looking for stars that are nowhere at
All in the heavens
While the girl behind me is taking Inventory-
They tried to charge me 58 RMB for
A airport bottle of generic
Cognac,
So I bought Japanese beer instead.

Robert Rorabeck

Japanese Werewolves

Japanese werewolves in sandboxes-
Muddled beneath the overpasses of cars going to Worship Godzilla up in his Strange, nose-bleed of a land:
As we sell fireworks between his big toes:
Set up our tents to challenge the model Tornados—and sell fire-engine cones with our
One grandmother who is still alive,
As the horses eat the cabbages across the valley—
And strange smoke rises up to the artisan gods,
Painting their amusement—
They languish in Topaz above the fire-engine
Chiefs of Taos, New Mexico—
North of Billy the Kid's grave—North of The Navajo peoples, many who are lying drunk,
Downhill from the Circle K—
Not far from Eagles Nest, the wet séances of Her bosoms—and almost to Colorado.

Robert Rorabeck

Jarrett, Or The Stewardess's Son

I'll never christen the sun where he can be
More successful:
I don't like men like him that much,
Outdoors or in the post-office,
Always whiskered and driving
A chariot,
Parlaying to girls with guns,
Who are good shots and scientists,
And they lay down in the good numbers of Their city fields and listen to easy listening or Pops,
And I can't go to sleep when they are doing this
To me: with all of his lights out on her bare-bosom,
Unifying her colors, taking her bouquets further
Away from the grave, smiling because he knows
Who is going to get to drive her home,
Up and down her elevators, publishing young,
Overseeing her clean wrists,
Kissing them with all that he's done,
Hanging his blazing mobile over all of her suckling
Young.

Robert Rorabeck

Jasmine In A Church

And then they call us, so here we are, open chested like Banners licking the eager wounds of a flood,
And I don't know if you have exactly seen them:
But I have seen them: I have seen them almost touching down:
Almost blindly, as if blind men could play a football game:
They play, blinded pilots filled with gold on streets you and Your neighbors have been selling:
They are already here for early ransom, ad the beanstalk has been Growing;
If you get up early enough you can even see the horse growing,
Growing, and changing color, and then while any muse that you Once had, while you once had her makes love to Any man: to any man while you are thinking over her bones
As soft as roses down the shell rock road,
And just as delightful as dolphins, while wasn't it as it was
That you'd already mentioned her, playing into her salty and galloping Fields:
Why there she was, as delightful as any angel:
Why there she was, and everything that you'd ever created
Came happening all at once all around her:
It came happening, as if jasmine in a church underneath all of those Airplanes far away: the perfumes of monuments of countries that Never existed, and you could smell her for sure: for sure,
Even if she was not even there.

Robert Rorabeck

Jean

It's almost 3 am, but no one
Cares;
Tomorrow, I want to ask you your middle
Name,
Kelly- and then I want to set out with you
To the swings of a joyful place:
While all the canooks break ice in the quarterbacks
Of Spanish glaciers;
I want to read the brails of your face,
And swirl the wine of your comely features;
If you want to go back to college,
I want to help you- I want to resemble you in all
Of your features;
I want to help you remember what your first word
Was;
And by what roots you came down to Florida:
You were born in Texas, and you can remember the first
Name of all of your teachers:
You love Jesus and all of his lives; and I am just As celibate as he was; and we both knew some Prostitutes and some Jewish teachers:
Misplaced into the golden dromedaries of your defeated
Armies,
I would like to sun and dry my clothes;
I would like to place on the bat winged shelves of your Shoulders and your
Blades all of my family's heirlooms,
Or anything else that was yours by right, or that I could Rightly steal for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Jesus

Jesus tells me he hasn't had any beers
Since he got back from Mexico- that being
Some four months, because he got into too
Much trouble in Mexico, muchas putas,
Mucho mota. Now he's sober and working for Mark, grande patron, and we're setting up stakes
Here in South Florida, getting ready to make a Buck celebrating Christmas; if there's a buck to Be made this year, we'll be the ones who make it.
Now the sun is down, slipping over this flatbread Peninsula, slipping, in fact all the way to Japan where Strange little men are eating raw fish and doing
The well-paid secretaries doggy-style, And the exhuming
Night has squelched the humidity, and all the Mexicans
I worked with today are back in their apartments,
And the imperfect trailer parks where infants squeal and Chase motherless kittens;
Even the new guy, Jorge; and I have more scars than Any of them, except when looking into the blushing
East, and I might easily join the ironic train of homeless
Drunks who stink of fermentation and oral sex:
They come by, and they are almost all white, so white
And bearded I could call them cousins; and today at McDonalds where I spend a two dollar bill on lunch,
A black couple sits across my line of sight, and looks at me
As if in challenge, waiting to see what my look in return
Will tell them about themselves. I want to tell them not
To look at me, but it is some sort of fun, because I look Beautiful at their distance, so they could hardly know,
And we give furtive glances while the Mexicans chirp,
Not knowing what to say to each other; except that I know I Love them from an impossible planet, and even now back
In their casas, the Mexicans are having sex with faithful
Mujers, who cooked tortillas and pollo all day long, sweating
And praying under the turquoise statue of the Virgin Mary,
Who kneels there weeping over such labors these housewives
Perform, just like the snowy angels and cherubs we take out
Of boxes to adorn our living rooms on Christmas.

Jesus Is Risen

The dead already walk the
Earth
And strangely breathe the Tricks of the segmented Atmosphere.
They reach out in the basic
Need to taste her lips,
The way sometimes 2 rosy
Insects come together and Mate,
But she has already Called her brother over to Move her out- A 4 hr drive
To Scottsdale AZ one way-
An 18 hr day
To watch her fake boobs swell
Against a t-shirt with Nothing written on it,
Just time.
Eons and eons
He dies while he looks for
Her. He forgets to drive away.
He loses himself like Misplaced keys and just Stands there
A zombie in 110 degrees.

Robert Rorabeck

Jesus's Bicycle

I wish I
Wasn't here:
I wish I
Was upon
Jesus's bicycle
Riding atop
The fathomless sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Jet Planes

I saw my little cousin today:

I see them almost everywhere, at the movies,

Waiting at home in front of the television,

But I cannot hardly recognize them

They've grown like weeds is the aphorism,

And they've removed their pea green houses,

And their unicorns aren't for real,

But lonely in their front yards with the tenebrous

Blue weeds:

You know, I see them on the swing-set and I want

To join them, but I am too old

For the sports of Christmas trees and young

Jet planes.

Robert Rorabeck

Jewelry Of Ants

Jewelry of ants having a picnic on A paper airplane—
In the definition of a valley of purple tint
In tents of cerulean
With the moon as large as a saucer
Tossing up the waves,
Trying to see their brothers off to school—
And the land lays like a century
In gardens of wilderness
Through the seesaws of epochs—
But most afternoons, puckering to meet
The salt and molasses lips of a truant who Stands a top of his parents' roof in the afternoon—
He is holding a molatov cocktail
And his d$ck; knowing
That none of this started out
Right—the prettiest of girls lounging off
In busses,
Followed by the coaches and their wives—
They are just pretty enough to pretend
That he should burn it all down
To the end.

Robert Rorabeck

Ji Kwon Kong: A Poem For My Father

Ashes of yellow umbrellas hung from the skylight of a maze-
Where are you now? My children grow blind without your gaze

Memories of you once unappreciated in life's fast moving stand-
Now I remember you, realized, the mortality of a fine man-

Immobile, turned into a cenotaph of lingering flesh-
Our hearth is emptied, hollowed by the wounding of your death-

Unequaled, I would give any prize to win your reprieve-
Yet knowing, emptied of vessel, the soul has a right to leave-

Where you go now, is the unquenchable question of living men-
Remembering your teachings as a way to raise my children-

As the lights glaze the malfunctioning eyes of heaven
Underneath of gravity's dementia into the wounds we are pressed-

I reach for you, silhouetted, magnified, straddling the horizons of a god-
Yet the mornings of life beckon, habitually forgetful, a flawed land of nod.

Awakening tomorrow, I will press the reasons why you have gone;
But the fruits turned to wine will only lead me down a path of forgotten time:

Only in the awful moments of calamity is your memory appreciated;
And by those moments I stand by you, a moment that is then abated:

Life is pressed-
Your day is soon awaited.

Robert Rorabeck

Jig Of Bones (Censored)

Reclusive death,
How will you find me if you continue
Reappearing amidst the pale and bleeding;
Keeping your dinner appointments with Banqueters gorged of salmonella-
The runny eggs you tap and $uck
With your morbidity turned up with a sallow smug:
All the laughing moneyed do not know they let you in;
But your extinguishing soul is blowing
The candles gently from the bared window;
Little souls themselves, you test.
Snidely, they are snorting,
Never imagining your grim shroud
Does not meet their dress code;
Though soon you will be leading them away from Their earthly accounts, in the procession
Of silhouettes, like marionettes the moon pulls-
The fickle saints who go down beneath the fens,
The little haunts where you jaunt with your best of friends;
But for certain, death,
How will you find me if we have no mutual friends,
For I am yet young and healthy without tumor or scourge,
Without enemy or sentence of execution;
How will you find me then, if you can not smell me
Or hear me laughing like a contaminated dinner party;
I will keep the door open, reclusive death,
And then the day will come when you will find me,
Sooner than is thoughtful, I suppose,
Like a hungry wolf who smells an open rose;
Then lead me down to the funneling river,
As we do the jig of bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Jill

I want to die: I want to die by the useless cause,
The ceaseless cause;
I want to be Mark Twain and set sail,
But I'll say anything to take over this planet,
To swim in your innocuous pools,
To look beautiful to you in one ways or another's.
I want to be more to you's than you's brothers,
While the poets sleep like the erections of Dissatisfied mountaineers forced down in the despot
Weathers of discordant storms:
I want to wreath myself in your arms, and wake
Up as something professional,
And charmed:
I want to swat your backside funny, make it rosy
And run it's honey,
And then alert with you to our Chanticleer alarms,
The fact that I love you,
But I have no arms:
I am a Blackman in his sack, the bushman who got Whacked,
And Jack who jumped too low,
And who got so burned by that candle stick, oh,
He never came back,
But forever when you thought of him, he imprinted
On your brain's chin,
So that he became the most chivalrous zoetrope,
The dun honey of your crepuscule with weird tattoos
On his back:
I want to be that Jack.
So what do you think of that?

Robert Rorabeck

Jobs Of Wonderful Sky

Fields of books in love that the traffic jewels:
Pigeons sent out to find promises over an endless sea,
While I wait at home with my dog-
Getting drunker, listening to him chew the bones up of An ex lover I had though to have buried
Sufficiently deep:
The tortoises removed from the sea, fawn during lunch
Time underneath the broken down bus:
Eating purple orchids, and making eyes at me:
When there are cyclones and gold fish in the canal,
And footpaths of vagrant truancy underneath the Slash pines: the sky is burning a crop of honey:
Stewardesses bare their breasts- girls I don't even know
Playing hopscotch in the sky:
Looking down, I must be a scar of diamonds to them-
Or like a shell they learned to leave behind- Now they perfume
The sky, and the sun burnishes them- metamorphosed
Out of the school yard into jobs of wonderful sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Joe & Jolene

Percussion lines and scars, the little heated throbs,
The ants bite in lines of stream-line conquistadors-
The humid park is sweating out the bugs,
And the vendors come turning little things,
And everything has a piece and the sunlight is eaten up,
And school is out, and the fences are painted,
Where I hold still and look at her face.

My entire body is humming like a tuning fork pricked
By a gangster, and the clouds are banking in high towers
Over the shivering pines; and I am only sure that I want her,
Even as the police surround me cradling bell-jars of Collected change:

That she was a child on the verge of metamorphosis,
Her feet webbed by the arachnidan spume, the drool of the Crocodiles who aren't even supposed to live here,
Lost crocodile tears and of the sad old men whose first Born sons have drowned: The power-cables hum and the wind
Skips them like rope- There is a rhyme in the air, trying to Cajole her, but the bullhorn is also speaking; I don't want To give up, but everything is shutting down. They are turning Out the lights and the red clay of the baseball diamond is dimming.
The masters and their dogs are evacuating, and everything is sauntering Off to homes of careless mothers, the wives and girlfriends of
The well situated lost; but still she hesitates, and if I stay long enough
I believe I will see who she is:

After all in this park, it is really only her and me,
Even after they've taken down the sides of the thing and moved on to The next town, I will still believe I see her sometimes rippling like a Sheet torn in the higher canopies, like a lost kite,
Or something that is once again almost free-
And I await her return into me after the rest of the show has given Up and walked through the diminishing spaces, happening to be No more alive than the well-populated cemetery,
Leaving only this to wait upon the precipice of belief.

Robert Rorabeck

Joel Chandler Harris

Manic, and psalms now-
I've wanted to live forever in the somber
Utopias that housewives covet,
The neat kitchens and prim sheets,
The secret lines sniffed beside the Supermarket bouquets beside the crenulated
Swimming pools in the early afternoons
And soap operas, topless, and or whenever as needed;
But I find myself moving to the other side,
To the rainy borders gnawed at by thorns
The barbed-wire grown into weary jaw-bones,
Wired shut to the whisperings of deceased mothers
And all their lot, the fairy-tales of n*ggers
Escaped in the briars to mend the bloody fingers
The spiders up the spigot of Mary's cotton gin,
The mouse is turning the wheels of the abandon Amusements, the convalesced parades along the old
Sea-shell highways of the motionless fossil sea-
All that priceless pain, cabinets of miss assessed worth, the bottomless envy:

the
Blue button eyes that stare out at windows to Watch her practice cheers, the stuffed hands that Must not ever wonder what it would feel like to Come alive and caress the perfect innocence
Of each tawny river of those expressive legs,
Roman candles, batons- silver tasseled,
All the exclamations of her excessive spring
Which must fade before the self conscious stutters,
Lips sewn shut must wait passively velveteen,
Soft forgotten, a teenage childhood that can not thwart
The more adult sting, the deadly scorpions of the wider
Desert whose poison barbs bare children,
Entire households hallucination that afternoon,
Jobs, and stations, and cars which give mature purpose
To her earlier explanations now have to shave
Though before they leapt around all afternoon with
The ice-cream trucks and special patriotisms after school;

But it is the dinner hour and the wolf is already in-
In fact she's taken his name, his root, but really, Robert,
What was a stuffed toy ever to say to such muse's perfection?

Robert Rorabeck

Jogging Down That Busy Way

Traffic speaks some kind of wishy-washy language,
As if its not sure it wants to go to work,
Maybe it just wants to hang on the bell all day,
Or sniff flowers; and what are you doing?
Powdered, taking gifts from a long line of gentlemen,
Like the queen of England; And I am writing poems
To you, but I haven't made a name for myself, so
What are they worth; and you parents are south,
Beneath you in the middle-class playground:
Will you ever return to it, and let its humidity lick you
As you jog,
Swirl like tongues around your ankles and knobs:
Will you ever think of me, no longer perfect,
No longer privileged to be near you, or just down the Road pullulating near the wildlife habitats, showing my Christ sized heart to all the tourists going to feed the Lions;
And why do I do this, when outside they are cleaning
The streets: They are making places, destinations to go
To, extract and fulfill a lively hood of blue-collared Saints, bric-a-brac- Angels and chopsticks on a shelf over Couch and cushions. Who worships the sun anymore?
Who dares to look at the sun and go blind? If I ever look
At you again, I will drink you like prohibition moonshine,
Like good old fashioned high school truancy;
And you will have to stand there and take it, posing as you Interpret my eyes, blushing and dewed in your Short skirted grottoes: Like a flower to me softly swayed,
Pulled back by the deep snouted lips of a bear and sniffed:
And whether you like it or not, I will drink my fill should Ever I see you again jogging down that busy way.

Robert Rorabeck

John Crow

John Crow, John Crow
Hair as white as winter's snow
Your love was lost in a mist of salty seawater
That broke your heart to pieces long, long ago
And now you are but a disgrace
To the Holy Father.

Inside a darken wood
Is where one can find you,
Down a deep, dank path
Made from rotting wet earth
Far into an unearthly sticky goo
Where you skitter, skitter and skirt.

Evil does lurk inside your rotting head,
And the earth shivers with your dark thoughts.
Worms and rodents are the only companions with you
In bed,
A bed of death, decay, and a thing that rots.

You came for me an hour past midnight
And brought me to your home down deep in the earth
And told me stories of ghastly frights,
Of how you lost your love and after that the dark birth.

You brought me close and breathed into my throat.
I drank you blood and became your kin,
And then to the sea we went
Search for your love on death's boat.

Deep we dived in the sea's waters,
A dark blue, and found your love
All alone in a cave of crystal
All silver and hue.

She sat all alone upon a tall and sparkling throne.
She beckoned us nearer and nearer we went,
John Crow all a smile like a man gone insane,
And then she demanded respect,

So to our knees we went,
And she told me to leave
But for John Crow to remain.

With a flash I was home.
What happened to John Crow and his love
I do not know,
But I don't wish to stay here all alone,
So come with me
And together
We'll go looking for
John Crow.

Robert Rorabeck

John Wayne

Shanghai is the biggest city in the worldâ€”
It is where I found my wife:
And we road busses together and went to the Zoo:
Like Romeo and Juliet, we were married
The second night of our daydreamâ€”
But this doesnâ€™t have to be a tragedy:
Our families are not ancient enemies:
They mean nothing to one another, but are stock
Full of good will:
I told you, we will name our first son John Wayne,
Because I always wanted to be a cowboy,
And that is alright with you.

Robert Rorabeck

Johnny Gets Done For

Unquiet, lasting quiet,
Even under the tallest buildings the world
Is moving and trying to get it done,
And I try to stay away from there,
Even though I was pulled from there;
And that is where she lives, and, and
For an uncountable number of days it was Only a fata morgana of the school grounds
So many years ago- I like to pretend it was Only ten, but it was maybe more-
I know it was more, and I loved a girl that Looked just like her, but this girl didn't Exist- I don't like to know which one,
And I don't like to mess around with the Alternative- that she was evil, and carried
A gun, and went out with other boys,
Out where the leaves wreathed like molested
Crinoline that some careless mother had wrapped all Around the fences and Australian pines and palm
Trees; and it was uneasy looking for her, for my heart
And my teeth were coming out, and it wasn't a good
Fairy-tale, because I was like the rabbit or hart following
The wolf, and I don't think exactly that she wanted
Me to find her, calling now his name beneath the broken
Down motor of his showing automobile,
Arching now the dirty cruxes of their disheveling truancy;
It was that she didn't care,
And didn't know my name- and when the next wind came,
They drove off to long summer parks, where they would Kiss and foreplay all afternoon and into the next day,
And I just stood there for a very long time,
Blown away because nobody could tell me who I was
Or what had happened to affect me this way.

Robert Rorabeck

Jolly Rouge

Let me raise the Jolly Rouge to you lips,
As if to say I mean business
Like Captain Kid in the Adventure Prize,
Ready to seize you about the hips
And dance with you to feel the warmth
Of your soul peering through your eyes' portholes—
Let the sky grumble in a thunderous deluge,
So that we can drink rum in the rain
And swim, bodies pressed like wet paper,
Like drunken fishermen waltzing in the waves,
Your eyelashes drenched like moist petals
And your eyes the nocturnal flowers
Opening to kiss blanketed moonlight—
Let then the world become around us
A zoetrope of motion and darkness,
And the shore to be our bedroom
Expanding through the sea our shadowed engagement.
Through the electricity of the storm,
Let our lips give off static charges
Into each others' bodies,
Like Tesla, harnessing heaven's arsenals,
Jumpstarting our cresting motions, allowing us
To feel the excitement of this single moment,
Carried by our memories' current along through
Our fingers, our bodies' channels pumping
With fervent belief and expectation our Cargo of mutual needs sailing stored in our feeling,
Your lips the Jolly Rouge perched beneath the sky,
Christening my name, conquering,
Laying us down in the surf, the salty waters
Eddying around us both, interlocked sea and sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Jordan's Room

Hours echo from the breakfast nook from the Kitchen,
And rabbits take over the front yard in colonies of Earthy holes which break the horses' legs servicing
The army:
From where I stand, I am in Jordan's room,
And there are bits of sun falling on our youth,
And I haven't run away yet to Michigan,
Or gone to summer school, and we look across
The street to where the cheerleader is flexing her legs
For all of this suburbia,
And we eat hot dogs, and play video games,
And masturbate in between the glints in the pool:
I haven't yet known you, or graduated or slipped away,
Nor have I known to think that I cannot change with
The other tadpoles flagellating in the concrete brines;
After the migrations, the torrential rains, and the clay
Left unevolved in art class needing her hands,
I lay under the broken bus and try to keep my eyes closed,
While the fat and ancient tortoise eats her orchids,
And the rains patter on the corrugations of weddings,
Women with new names who used to ride their Bicycles back and forth before my eyes,
Their legs waxy axioms now receive the brush of His pistil, powdered chartreuse they nod like violins,
And the neighborhood grows evening, like the end of The play with a whole new cast, encoring, taking bows:
People I cannot recognize mow the yards I used to play,
And the school is filled with younger versions,
And the old friends carry off laughing and mumbling with
The silhouettes of tide, leaving only the alligator basking
With the last of the sun, acknowledging my Petrifactions and patiently waiting.

Robert Rorabeck

Journalism

He has a gun to his head,
And he is smiling.
They hold the barrel to his temple,
As they join together in a Persian bed.
He says, f! ck you to them,
As they swap spit/
Soon they will give up
And have the gardener cut off his head/
There are so many sad children
Unattended to in the garden
Buried up to their necks in the roses
Needing watering,
But their parents are careless if faithful,
And busily copulating
While her old suitor lays tied up
And hungry watching from the edge,
Like an early wanderer lost on an Incriminating shore as the Sun moans and it rises.
In her eyes are the last memories of
All the things they had done,
But with laughter and his name calling,
She is the first destroyer
Coming down for the morning:
Counting the stairs,
Each one a nursery rhyme's Anticipation.
And breakfast? And breakfast?
The gardener is too busy honing
The blade of excommunicative reaping,
While even outside the birds are singing
And down beneath the rose's red blushing,
The children buried unto their necks
Are whispering,
While in the Victorian yard
A young foal lays eaten away
At the ass and neck/
While the wolves lay fat in the forest sleeping.
Are you getting all this?

As the gardener cuts off his head
On his birthday,
Hitting the notes of the stairs
And he goes away while
The immaculate house singsonging
The perfectly recorded hours.

Robert Rorabeck

Journey Of Another Night's Dreams

The same as the waves who are in My soul—
They are still burning, while my wife sleeps,
While the house sinks,
And the Earth turns underneath the Diademed atmospheres of
The heavens—
Wherever we are,
The cars pull out of driveways,
To conjoin with avenues,
And there are births
And deaths—
The greatest of mountains have already Formed for now—
The angels still have to hold their breaths
While the wishes are blown out
Over the birthday cakes—
And when it rains the cats come inside.
Tired from kissing the lips of coral
Snakes,
The day ends, and the intruders upon
The steps disappear—
A faithful companion sleeps upon the lap
Of otherwise solitude—
And on the other side of the world,
The oil burns—
The dreams of things are sold and Then returned—
And, right now, as if my dear benefactor,
My wife waits for me in bed,
Hoping I will join beside her in her journey
Of another night's dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Journey Onto Home

Who knew I could be so quiet in my Dark aerodrome in the fork of a tree
Outside of the park,
Lisped by the trepidations of the wayward
Sea:
All of my paper airplanes are parked-
The mermaids are taking baths in the waves-
A few of my favorite things are moving away
Like the red stars do-
Very few of them are blue stars:
Very few of them are getting anywhere at all,
And we are all out of blueberries,
But the people just keep coming into the store-
They are shopping and the sun is at play-
They seem to be doing this out of some necessity
For love or thanksgiving,
Or it could just be that they are out and about
And breathing,
While the rivers fall straight off the mountains,
Like ribbons unsecured from her gown,
And she becomes for him on her honeymoon,
In Crepuscule on the alluvial planes where all the Mailboxes are panting opened tongues
In paradoxically wild straight packs until the Morning,
The morning lights up the place and shows her
How she might quietly leave
And thus continue her journey onto home.

Robert Rorabeck

Journeys Of A Little Sadness

It's sometimes necessary to salt the earth,
But you can't get back your tears,
Like jewels you thought were real as
You threw them out feed the birds;
That is why you must be careful,
And you cannot cry over spilt milk,
Or hermaphrodites, no matter what angles
They pull down from the clouds hugging the Stormy sea;
If I moved next to her again, at night I could Hear her breathing, like a sailboat extended and Leaping the leaves of waves,
And when she touched the other man,
You could almost feel as if she was touching you,
In your new house so near the sea,
That you could cry over the shore's edge
Like a young child leaning down to where they Keep the languid lions, and say,
Now the sea is my tear, and she will forever roll,
Crush and embrace the earth, as the continents beat her,
As if she were a recipe;
Distilled she takes the Gulf Stream to sleep under the Bellies of other men, and she is inhaled by whales,
And cupped in the oyster's mouth, used to sculpt a pearl;
Evaporated, curious over the land again,
Perhaps while you are waiting for her in a thunderstorm.
Looking up, your tear returns to you and tells you
Secretly of the journeys of a little sadness.

Robert Rorabeck

Jubilant As The Sky

Now into this song the birds sing
In the middle of transit—evaporating the frogs
The ethereal swords have picked clean into the sky
Until they become another task—
And you again are the memory I cannot have—
And you are as beautiful again as the rainstorm over
The mountain
As the wild horses come home, stampeding for want of Liquor—and unearthing all of the forgotten arrowheads—
And you say, in your admonishments—that now
Wouldn't be a bad time to call you—
But when you look up, there is another man in your Vision—
A pilot that I cannot believe in—a pretender of faerie -
And as jubilant as the sky at high noon
And then we are the same thing echoing—
And at this moment I am sure that I cannot do enough
To deserve you.

Robert Rorabeck

Juggernaut

Sleeping in an RV that isn't
Mine,
The traffic dead, crepuscule dead
For now I still feel like
Some Viking king buried in his Ship,
With a horde of sweet horse bones for
His accoutrements,
Cracking farts off the body like the Perfumes the dead must give
To kindle each golden worm,
The bouquets of weepy Pharaohs
While the air-condition hums for Burnaby,
And the greater whales sleep in their Greater seas,
Crypts of stars and mothers too far away
To milk or weep.

Robert Rorabeck

Juliet

Come to me naked in
A hotel room in France,
And I will make love to your Bruised body, Juliet:
I will show you what all
You relatives together couldn't show
You:
I will make a feud with the
Two of us,
The reverberations of your will say
That there are no others,
But that is just for tonight:
As down beneath us,
People are getting drunk in the streets.
Their music is fondling upwards,
Plucking notes until they reach the stars.
I will lay you down and bruise
Your lips, Juliet-
And the way your eyes look at me.
What could it mean, that they stay
So open,
The way little girls look at the world
When the women go to washing in the river,
And the wind has the trees in
A subtle trance.
The rocks are so smooth under your Feet, Juliet- It is like a dream
You can feel the world in,
And perchance you will survive
On my lips, Juliet-
As the night is your mother with open Arms-
What does she say, Juliet,
When I am in the other room?
How does she hold you, Juliet,
When I am no longer near....

Robert Rorabeck

June And Then July

Tomorrow or the next day will be
Your birthday,
But I am not good at math,
And I am not even immortal, though
I read them as I drive around New Mexico,
Doing the work of so many Conquistadors.....
Finally, I lay down and think about you
And get drunk and ready,
Though I have more scars than yesterday
I still sometimes get carded for the quaff
That blooms these words.... Oh so,
I call for you, a barroom rose, the reason for America and those legs! Because you know who You are because you are crazy and wind tossed
And never settled,
The same as me when I am driving though cautious
Of authority, salivating to the renaissance of your shaven
Legs: You know they could go on forever if I Didn't have to turn away, but this is just another
Line burnt to a cinder, a sacrifice to your holiday,
And even though you remember me,
You have never seen me though here I am even now Lying down my hand: Though when I rise again in the Morning it will be blaring just the same,
And this poem will have been passed to the hands of the Dead, as I will have thought of better lines I cannot remember,
But this is your America,
And this is your poem in place of my body,
The failure of the truth of my language, your blistered lavios
The doorways to the pollinations of high school,
Your eyes the hidden planets who have turned away,
As I would have thought to turn you towards me with A motioning finger, as if it were a humming verb,
And I am only slightly drunk,
So tomorrow there will be more work and standard bred horses,
And old Mexicans name Antonio who insists on being paid,
And then it will be your birthday,
By Saturday at least, and you won't even know
The little things I give to you all day

Until there is nothing left but a single candle
Like the tear of a burning angel leaping like a hungry
Bumblebee over the lips of a passive if elegant rose....

Robert Rorabeck

Junkyard

Every mad bit of courage has a name.
I can stay here and love you, but who am I?
I won't drink liquor unless I find a job,
So I may never drink liquor again- the way this Is going-
For how can I find a job without a tomb, that fine
Piece of marble to lay my head,
The way a hummingbird denotes its invisible young,
Like a pebble spit on by a bit of spume- Wouldn't It be better to skip out of town?
To ride the rails, I suppose. To get romantic out in The open with no roof, just both of my dogs,
Jogging in my hobo shoes- Go down the side of Florida and recognize all those haunts,
Where its warm enough to live outside your room,
To stop by and see all those girls I really want,
To smoke out beneath the same old aqueducts
Passed out in the shade the same as some decades before,
The other kids waiting for the bus, the lions roar;
And we just caress ourselves out into the land of nod,
And float on our backs the same way as the otters showed,
And crack macadamias and soft shells terrapins
With no use for canoes,
Go uninvited along the backsides of the easements where
The housewives are busily sunning topless with their sisters in law,
Reading south Florida crime novels;
Looking up they bight their lips, wondering what good Use they'll find for us; approaching, as I figure I should.

Robert Rorabeck

Just

The day burns its yards: oh to the day,
Of magic books and the sixty degrees of vision
Given over to my brothers of this Mirage,
This great blue desert harassed by grizzly bears;
And you don't know all of the things I've Missed,
The insurmountable figures of antiquity's greatness
I have been too unmindful to pronounce:
I just took the tracks one time to get to your grandmother's
House;
And she was so beautiful, opening the door:
She could have been your twin, and you were placed there
At her feet like the resolution to a needful fable;
Somehow a trinity in your bisections, a perfect symbol:
One woman embodying all three,
While the night leapt long and occidental filled with the Esoteric gardens where I still know you exist,
Like a virgin weeping down blue eyes across the bosoms
Of two estranged lovers,
Bringing them together like the deli meat in a sandwich,
Your neck and body like the vase of a pear,
Which makes the fox to jubilate and leap with grins;
And I am the fox,
Sly enough to know what I am leaping for will always be Just another nip beyond the lessons of my reach.

Robert Rorabeck

Just A Boy

Its so easy to think of you
In the decadent art where all of the butterflies
Have closed upon the flowers-
It seems as if they are in metamorphosis with Their cousins
Along the eaves of the carport in the crepuscule
Where your mother still does the laundry
Like a saint, like a martyr-
And a Christmas tree is stood up somewhere in the House,
Dying beautifully for its pagan joy
And the lamps still light with kerosene
And you are just a boy.

Robert Rorabeck

Just A Butterfly Of A Tomb

Spume in the twilight of my senses
While the blind women have been touching the Apple tree,
And I have been curling my toes—
And then I seem almost a race horse-
And into a forgetful season, a canal to nowhere:
We set up a tent
And sell pumpkins and Christmas trees and Fireworks.
We drink too much and get heartburn—
We worship a Haitian hoodlum—
While my little sister swears she is going to smell
The bouquet of the armpit of Africa:
And I cannot blame her—I cannot blame her—
I can only swear to her that I am still right here,
Getting drunk and calling over the satellites to her:
Yes, and that I am yet more beautiful for her-
And the gangsters of her headlights have no say so—
And the broken angels of her all to sudden Hollywood have No say-so—
They are the same thing as being agnostic—
And then the family finally sets in—and her uncles
Are high-diving—and the last of all is her memory,
But who cares about her—
The bicycles are already home—and then there is no
Memory—
There is just a butterfly of a tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

Just A Little Boy

Imposes on an empty room-
A bouquet of parked cars, echoes from
A parking lot-
Other promises the moon steals- pretty
Ladders leading up
To second story bedrooms: but she Has already gone to the nuptial-
She is a school girl at a Banquet, and
She is not alone:
In a forest fire of uneasy businesses
Waiting to come home from School,
As I fixate vulpine on the pornography of
Her saturated woods:
But I am just a little boy, and the canal
Lingers torpidly:
All of my words flood out to her,
Saturnine,
And she brushes her hair- the alligator
Smiles,
And looking up to her, asks her for all of
The time in the world.

Robert Rorabeck

Just A Little Further Down That River Without My Song

I wait for you to ring out your song;
And hang it above the tree,
And look further up where you cannot look,
To see I have been making paper airplanes
And crashing them into ceiling fans,
Even while you were in your red dress in Your Catholic play. They didn't make me up
To take outside this evening,
But left me back at home without air-conditioning,
Without a diving rod:
Now the tourists are here and giving good shouts,
The bravest of them performing with the lions down the Street; and their sad daughters hang out on our block.
They write one or two good poems a day,
And pretty soon they have a collection of subtle immortality.
They will last as long as the human race cooks good dinners,
So now they sigh and go, they leap like slender rods,
Into the algae: their dresses areole their heads,
They float a little ways downstream, but it is too torpid;
They know what they are doing. The soft-shelled turtles
Know, the moccasins and the alligators know;
The fat otters crack muggy clams and dropp the empty shells
On their heads, or mistletoe:
They wait there for seven years, or, in fact, doing but this One disappearance; I lay over them on the bridge, just Broken glass, until there are only residence, and the moon
Is full and dripping milk; In fact, she is all pregnant,
Or isn't that what she said,
Now that they sleep beneath me in one piece. There is Nothing to put back together,
For I have failed to kiss her and take the bicycle from underneath
Her thighs, her inner thighs which go unkissed, and drip:
The lion's cage is empty, but she doesn't move at all
From where she has gone just a little further down that River without my song.

Just About Any Man

I never have to sing about the future
Anymore:
Retreating underneath the parapets of the carport as it
Rains down indistinguishable roads
That they have all paid,
That the kidnappers have washed away from- and they have Swept up
The pornography too- and my Aunt Mierna
Hoping that I buy a warm blanket to keep me happy underneath
A witch's well:
But I never get so far as to have to pickup a hitchhiking
Navajo anymore:
I just buy more gold for Alma, as she needs an operation that Will not heal;
As the fire hydrants wait like lapping dogs for another catastrophe,
While the fireworks and airplanes burn up on the hill
And then I lose myself:
I lose myself anyways, looking across the supernatural
Estuaries and back to her,
Giving her all of my wishes that will never sell;
And lusting after her as I stand next to the water fountain
And her eyes return up at a safe distance, frolicking and as jubilation
As if I was for her just about any man.

Robert Rorabeck

Just About Anybody's Pool

I drink alone to the usual sounds:
The night in somnolent rush through the softly exploded
Palms,
Picking dun cones,
Yeah, and the racehorses far away, the men hanging themselves,
The ever tremulous palms,
Like feather blades,
Cutting the shadows like generous birthday cake
Without any candles and without any love,
Giving off the perfume of tomorrow's wishes,
And the slender fact that I might
Live forever,
Or that this is just Disney World, and I've never ridden
A roller coaster with a girl I truly loved,
And the fare is only in town for a week,
But I don't really need to make love to you,
Just to hold your balmy hand through the reckless Midway,
And win for you all the prizes that I can
That you can put in the trash after tomorrow,
When the teddy bears with sad button eyes have wilted,
After the milk and the goldfish and all the moon has Gone sour,
And you've found better men to love,
Because this is your thing, and all I am doing is my best
To pleasure you remotely from far away
Atop this esplanade of insatiable alligators and the homeless
Conquistadors
Always hung-over and willing to do any job just to get one
Look at you sunbathing topless juxtaposed against just About anybody's pool.

Robert Rorabeck

Just About Everything It Ever Saw

Early morning days reeled in by cold
Flute-boned birds
That know what they are doing,
And down in the peat moss trailer parks
Almost to Michigan,
You can resurrect me from the giant once-pink
Tombstones of narcissism's valentines
Even if all of the earth was sucked dry
By mounted vampires
And the stars lost their appeal and didn't jounce
Anymore for drunkards,
With your female hands like wands of teak
And the usual cypress bows,
Hanging upside down from your usual trees
Doing all the tricks they taught you in high school
Before you melted away like tawny lavender,
Like plush rabbits in the field of blind carpenters
For those boys:
You could include me too, and put on me a spell
With your casually eager senses that would Make me as stiff as a red mailbox flag that would take
Some time to go down again,
Even miles after you'd found your disinterest,
And sunken again like a rumor into the grotto of your Ghostly virgin's bed,
Becoming once more the afterthought of a tuning fork
For boys as quick as proverbial lightning Striking out of the extemporaneous cerulean escargot and Conquering just about everything it ever saw.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Catastrophe

Westernly and bold, as if fireworks being shot
Down from the stars that are skirt
In the pinpricks that freckle the highway in a Heavenly zoetrope of lush but
Bashful girls who live there: right up there:
Over your shoulder, and over the mailboxes too:
They live in the heavens because they do not know
What else just to do:
And the airplanes drive in their neighborhoods
Bringing them a sorority of stewardesses, for them
Like dolls to play with, and their houses
Are always moving along with the continents:
If they had horses up there they would ride them:
And when the comets come once ever few years,
They do ride them:
And they think much of nothing, and they stir
The shadows of the clouds to look at visions
Though they do not even think to try and conjure
The faces of the men staring up at them and wondering
Who is really there. Each man is a teardropp that Has already fallen from them, and grown into A life of sorrow that they will not permit-
Sorrow is just another catastrophe to say to nothing,
But the swans get close enough to imagine their Beauty, before they have to dive down again
Into a world that is envious of them- while they Are envious of another world.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Lackluster Part Of The Hoodlum's Tapestry

I'll bend down to clean my car
And when I'll look up there'll be:

Glittering tombs
Alone, in the little eternal rooms,
She'll look up say she'll love me,
Lie appeasing,
Because we're sure to always be in
Her,
Rippling echoes: the lips of the dead,
Unmigrated sparrows,
Chalk lines unskipped,
Promises, yada yada yada,
Bouquets on a tomb,
Petals wet, sleepy lips,
Bent subtle by an arachnid's
Migrations who is out of spume
But hungry,
Vanishing jet planes who speak loudly
And then disappear,
And not a person looks up around here;
And the library is as empty and Unvisited as
Her gaze,
Silhouettes of distinguished gentlemen,
Long extinguished into the closing time
That never closes shop,
Tourists who amble about unsure of What they are supposed to see and buy,
Just another lackluster part of the hoodlum's
Tapestry dissected by her
Wanton gaze,
Like stars above a crooked smile,
Magnified by a nocturnal glass by a truant wild,
Starts the first blisters on the cheeks of dry leaves,
Hazes in the outskirts of a dead-end city escalate
Then into a childish blaze.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Rainbow

I still haven't had enough wine and this is happening
In your shadow:
I am still kissing in any cave that isn't yours, but soon I will Be flying home underneath another airplane,
While all of the shadows glisten and
Are filled with the cages of escaped
Animals:
Why then doesn't it feel alright to play in the snow
Of your tears,
Echoing perpetually, enraptured like any other Escaped animal drooling unto its jaw in
The full thralls of the moon, or just another rainbow.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Star

Oh your city, f%ck it all: in its streets my mother is moving;
Oh, Oh, Oh, live a wet titted Godzilla I haven't yet waited
To suck her songs:
And she gets up and bemuses me, while in another year
I wont even have use for these songs which are just Another reason to bemuse myself,
And maybe all of this is just another age old space opera
With opulent tits, maybe that is just another reason for Me to have her mistaken by you:
But, otherwise, I have had the world turned out in the World of calculating gloom; and otherwise, otherwise,
Her words are just another way to step out carelessly in the gloom
Just like the star she could never afford the name of:
That is just what you are, Sharon: just another cheap alphabet
The just another star we couldn't afford the name of...

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Unlucky Song

Oh now all of these scars, believing that I was wrong,
Trying to find their own way back from Mexico
After you had fled with your legs:
Here are the words spent in the silent interludes of the Mute and fixated circus: this is how we do our Change,
As the washing machines wash- the metamorphosis
Of windmills and princely kings:
The joys that we have known for awhile in our reddened bricks:
The city flies, reciting its metronomes:
Her fingers caressing, filleting the bone:
Words that find rhymes far away from school,
Scuppernogs on the vine, pulling down her clothes in a dressing
Room of Michigan,
And then to her all of these estranged hopes fly,
Like unlucky eyes in a dressing room:
That I was here: I spent the most of my life in Florida, getting an Education, going home again at night to an old woman
Who never whispered to me- Getting up again,
Filing for the battles: as a child, remembering the rattlesnakes
Coiled in their rehearsings of gold: the wilderness so wild,
The dolphins on her tears of shoulders, the battles
Boiling like memories, practicing the things I never told her:
And then it was here again, bodies of flesh and bone,
Smelling up the bedrooms- the baseball fields- the playgrounds-
The witchcraft I never loves: just the joy of love they stole
Away from me, and basically imprisoned; while through it
All, Alma is my searing fire,
And this is just another unlucky song for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Another Wave In The Untimely Sea

That sad place in the bones can't help itself,
It makes fun of all of the little boys,
Those things like butterflies going in and out of The schoolyard,
Performing some sort of metamorphosis
No one in the world understand
Underneath the grandness of the sun
While girls they once thought they loved
Happily escape them—
And the escarpments that are too far Away for their eyes to see
At first blister and then catch a blaze—
On new years eve I travelled down with my Wife and her friends to the keys—
And where were you—the funny thing is
I never even thought of you—
You were just another wave in the untimely sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Arriving

No fields can disguise the flaxen natures of My own fears:
What gods I have spent- what sorrowful tantalizing
Memories have grafted themselves,
Tattooed into my un hollowed skin,
And even while the housewives bask in the young abutments
Into which they know they can belong,
The tide pulling away beneath them, like the surprise of A wedding dress sashaying in a ballroom that knows
The hour is growing late,
And soon the metamorphosis it bought at such a high price
Is sure to come undone
Into mice, as the marionette practices one more prayer,
The cars driving themselves home have no time to Wonder at the vanishing forests-
Or the deeper mysteries who once suckled on the teat
Of a greater kingdom that happened away just as our unborn children
Were waving goodbye,
As we were just arriving there.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Beautiful As You

Someone told me today that she was already mine,
As the waves bit the comb, and their sea did shine;
And yesterday there was Alma,
In my house and in my shirt, while the animals made love
In the zoo,
And flirts did flirt: it all felt alright for the first time
In a long while,
As the airplanes carried around their sweetly legged cargo:
They went this way, and they went that:
The clouds were their love bed, their bellies fat:
And yesterday I crawled on my knees and kissed the virginsita
Before your eyes:
Kissed her and only asked all that was good for you,
While this evening I am all alone, but the sea is still just as Beautiful as you:
She will always be just as beautiful as you, Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Beautiful As You Are

Distending avenues of the glutinous eels in the shallows
That we all knew:
There all day and black as forever with their surceases,
Like the cessations of every sex and every love:
The last flights of airplanes
And their stewardesses who are approaching their mid thirties;
And all of it repeating with so much affordable luxury
In the beautiful primary colors of the foxes and
The rabbits in the fables
That the preadolescents know while they are in the cars
And going to preschools out from underneath the ceiling fans
And underneath the power lines,
Going past the cemeteries of the ancestors who no longer
Look out for their best interests;
And the days that they know shall accord to themselves like
The evaporations of vibrant colors into the shake out of past
Tenses,
Knowing both sun and showers, mailboxes filled and emptied,
And even after they have long since been kissed and tucked into Their limelight's bed by the mothers just as beautiful as they once Were,
The mountain still will seem to look out forever across
The vast cerulean sea that we both drove near to one day Alma,
And I told you it was just as beautiful as you; and I hoped that you
Would remember for just as long as it took for those mountains
To sink back underneath the sheets of our vast and ancient love,
That I promised would even last forever, though we had metamorphosed
Like our grandparents back once more into the effervescing
Borderlines of the torn mountains into the cascades of the very sea
Who is just as beautiful as you are.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Good As Heaven

Showing up as I am building to you these news songs—
Cannot you see the Ferris wheels standing
And waiting outside of your window
Crouching as a pet of inexhaustible lights
And flooding the bays of your eyes
With the brilliant methodologies
That galvanized Don Quixote into action—
Making you want to abandon the tiny-hearted gold
Fish you found there
To leave her on one of those thirty second rides
With only a paper ribbon and
A rubber bow—
And go off somewhere, metamorphosed into the Heavens—
To find another love that waits for you,
Crouched in a brilliant pillar of smoke undulating
In a yellow amphitheater
That looks just as good as heaven.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As I Do For Her

After all of the liquors are gone,
And after making love and eventually children.
The bodies of once lovers arise and go their own ways,
While their cars sit languidly palavering to the Absence of fireworks in their own parking lots:
And the sun shines or if not it rains real hard,
And my termites seem to have miraculously vanished after I have Signed a contract to tent my house;
But every morning and every evening I still kiss the lips of my Statue of the Virgin of Guadalupe,
And I god blessed her imagine shining like an inexperienced planet
Over all of Mexico,
That you came to our house one last time Friday morning and held me
And let me kiss your lips
While you looked at the dying roses I bought for you on the threshold
Of this world:
Flowers you could not take home, because you were Afraid of what it might mean,
But with ever passing sun is the opportunity for me to sell more
Fireworks and buy you new roses,
While you go home to your children, Alma, and the virgin watches over
You,
Kissing and blessing you as you drive in your car,
Just as I do for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As It Seems

Holding out for hours of playgrounds
While the new wives come home
Leaving finger and toe prints across the leaves
In the sunshine-
Spiders and unborn children whispering in
The swings,
Talking it up to no one- the holidays play
Tricks-
And just as it seems, it seems.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Long As He Possibly Could

Dead girls have no good rhythm, they just go
Knocking on doors;
And you can never really tell how good and dead they Are unless you really love her,
Or she is your little sister who you dream about,
Or she is something like that:
And it is a sad daytime movie,
As she moves in the snow, as she continues to filigree
The time that passes swift and slow,
As her baby suckles, as her life needs,
And airplanes go slipping like smoothed stones
Through the woodwind reeds:
And I love her,
And the day is long and smooth like a balmy park until
It is time for supper:
And I love her, but she never has time to wake up and Remember
The beautiful possibility I once was,
As a strange bird standing posed on his abutments waiting
For her to give him the cue to come on over and continue,
And to look forever into her awful,
Awful eyes;
Or just as long as he possibly could.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As The First Man Dreamed

I am the joy that you don't have to feel,
Back alone with your thirsty family, don't move a muscle:
Hear the train calling to no one;
It knows where to move;
But you always say that you will marry me tomorrow,
And you wear the gold that I bought you:
You don't seem thirsty:
Perhaps your body is a brown river, hallucinating and going Back and forth,
Harping in the school bus that is miles away, taking away
Your son to imaginary places:
Maybe he will fall in love with a princess and her sisters in A crystal house,
While I wait alone in my home, the lions curling about me,
As we all dream about you, Alma,
Just as the first man dreamed about his fire.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Well

There it is: On a plate of baseball,
Or its richness of paganisms the witches fly
On their brooms
On their anyways- looked up upon by little Boys off their masturbating in their Untidied rooms,
Like sinners at the beach, and the sky another god
To believe with the sun running through it
Up and up in its own halations,
Doing its damnedest just as well to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Just As Wishes Of Little Boys

As numb as the heavens that Do not sleep,
I go down on you weeping,
Filled with exuberant joy,
And the clouds make a Christmas
Out of the sky,
Even as the day and its heroes
Are leaving,
As stewardesses skip across the earth,
Just as wishes of little boys.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Because

Oh now all of these flags:
Snapping sticks and burning bridges:
You have two daughters, and you have two sons:
And I am not moving any nearer to you:
And maybe I am not moving away, but they are all still rippling,
Banishing like luckless stones who so finally wonder
Into the depths of the bay:
Where the Indians baptize, and where they all get along their Way: and they have been at wondering- they wonder for So long,
For a little while; and they have cleft lips, but they are so beautiful,
Gradually turning so slowly around,
Like a Christmas tree on display, under the water, or whistling
Like a car on the show room:
And then they douse, and in penumbras for whatever
They make love: and they have been ululating, or praying, and maybe
And just because that I go this way, I wont have to know her anymore-
While all the rests of the stations puzzle- until they figure out
And hand over themselves to the authorities- while the jet planes
Whistle and make the noisy business to whatever clouds that tried
To cover up whatever there was- just because.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Before That

Down at the powers of guilt,
I drink my fill with my reindeer and the jack a lopes;
And the really retches wanders come it,
Thumbs stiff from fornications with scuppernongs,
And all of the jewelry of the dear
Dead grandmothers hung around so nonchalantly gaudy
Like Christmas trees who don't even know who
They are:
But we all keep inside, because not so very far from here
You cannot breathe,
And we clap our hands together, and count and Smell:
For from the windows you can see cathedrals and ballrooms,
And the grottos of the metamorphosed king:
And anyways, in make-believe spindles of forest fires that Just keeping getting up and up:
And they go past your bedrooms or ballrooms anyways,
And how is it that I cannot keep from talking to myself,
And the families lie here just as puzzles as rulers who can no longer
Count;
And the fun of it begins with the first animal who learned how
To clean itself:
As the otter laid across the mermaid's bosom for awhile,
Before moving on a pace; and maybe it even went to school and Learned something, but before that: and just before that it
Learned: it just learned how to enjoy itself.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Dancing

I have trained my lions
And slept in cop cars, Erin:
Tonight I was caracoled by no less
Than six cop cars, Erin,
Because I was robbed at gunpoint,
And some poor boy has stolen my poem
Book,
The greatest evil of the world
Set free like spilled milk somewhere in
The mothering loins
Of the grotto
When all I wanted was
To come inside just once,
Like a birthday wish,
Just the way he is Dancing
Just.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Enough

I can hear the arcades down the street,
And even the crickets are purring:
Wherever I am jumping cars, wherever there comes Rainstorms,
The crickets are purring- Crickets you have never heard;
And birds on power lines you've Never seen, because you've never lived where I have been,
And I have only lived at night,
And seen so many things you've never seen,
But you get the gist and you can tell some fortunes by my scars,
Though you haven't seen me since the fairgrounds in Florida,
I imagine that you might believe in at least some of my scars:
And the patrons move in and mill about,
And the pregnant mothers lean far over and it seems as if They might shoplift,
And you have little plastic cowboys and Indians where you Live,
And maybe some cats- and a husband who always looks nice,
And a child at his hip;
And it really doesn't seem awfully fair,
Though the dreams spin around alike, and people bicycle and Bobsled wherever they are, even if you or I haven't seen them,
We can ask the very same moon who reigns over all of these Chain restaurants and colleges,
And make-believe romances, and she will kiss us just the same
With her equal glows, and we can get the gist,
And be pulled by her like two waves trying to fight it out
And that is really all we can ask for,
And it might just be enough.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Enough English

When the world closes
Every afternoon-
Closes its stories of shops,
Then all of the Chinese women
Come down off of Those high rises
Where they've been migrating,
Taking busses
Receding for home- with Stockings filled with rice
And watermelons-
Then they walk by me-
Their high heels upon
A dam-
Their soft brown loins that Get as yellow as tigers
And lightening-
They know just enough
English to Say hello and to walk
Away.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Exactly What You Are

If I see you sweep in like the traffic,
I am speechless,
And these words are motherf$ckers;
And when you get up and make nude your blue eyes;
Then I wish I knew how to read your music;
And only your blue music exists-
Like I only have plaid to wear; and I don't care that You have to smoke,
Or look into the eyes of your beautiful men;
I am just a chimney sweep anyways, with my own scars
And the mountains I have climbed that you don't Know;
And the city pearls and makes love to the hemispheres
Of its vibrating sky;
That is just what it is doing; and then your eyes open up-
They are just like flowers blooming; and that is Just what they are;
And I wish I was more beautiful for you-
And I want to worship at your church every day;
And give you oral pleasure, and make you moan like the continents
Touching themselves amidst the clay birthday cakes,
Because that is just exactly what you are.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Faces

It is alright to have to sing by yourself
Into the shadows,
To have to swing over the make-believe
That you have to pay for—
So when you get there,
To your relatives or two heaven,
You behave and look like
A monster—
Well, it is New Year's again—
The world didn't end, or it didn't Come down to what you'd hoped for—
And the beauty in the eyes of a egret
Was just looking up into
A primordial cloud—
The shadows pantomiming their obnoxious
Memories—and she, your
One or two muses just faces
Lost in the crowd.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Fine

The night is warm, humorous,
And you give me new reasons to believe.
I have my grandmother's old car now;
She is in the cemetery and asked
Me in her quiet ways to bring her flowers.
The aspens are getting ready to change,
Like chorus lines of juvenile girls giggling
As they blush ahead of the ballet;
And I want my words to be the colors of a revolutionary
Pallet, to help you remember your own art-
Do not recognize me, but cast me in your pool.
Grab your man hard around the lapels,
Kiss him in the ways which fabricate the houses
Of the past;
Put your hands on the clay again, remember the Briar patches of my visage, where your trembling forensic Shot and fumbled like waterspiders for awhile
Over the effluvious canal of terrapin and crocodile;
And if I fail you, it doesn't matter,
All my words are fireworks shot into the dark for my Lips alone- You are far away, hung over his chest like
A family crest- He provides, and soon I will be selling
Christmas trees in a dripping world,
And other girls will work and sweat, and maybe even read
My lines; further away then, breast feed your daughter,
Sell your wines- I know who you really are,
And it was good to have our bones caracole around one Another, scribbling on desks in high school some many Years ago; and if that is to be all, the elks bugle that it
Is just fine.

Robert Rorabeck

Just For You

I want your children inside me, Alma;
I want all of this flesh to wilt, and all of the motor boats
And speed boats to go their own way
And I want nothing else for you, Alma.
I want you out in the soft and wanting penultimate summer
Of South Florida,
For your jaw to be coming through another cenotaph for me bones,
Or another softly dying firework,
While I like a feather from the tail end of a peacock cry out for you,
While all of the other mastiff have their two point children all
Out for you,
While all of those astronauts have their primary colors heading
Home for you,
While I am just as hooded and as peninsular as a jasmine headed Home into the sweet or semisweet bodies of your work out that I have kept just for you, while you are no more sweet
Than all of the others that I keep just so sweetly just for you;
And all in a garden kept so sweetly and just for you:
Just in a garden kept so sweetly just for you, Alma:
Just for you- just for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Good For Lying

I've wanted to sacrifice for you,
Let fingers see-saw across your neck
Where the tiny silver cross in dangling,
A curse for vampires,
Or a virgin taunt:
It has its own pink cave that reverberates
To your band's excitement;
And I've wanted to swing in the highest arcs
For you,
To pluck little muggy birds from their nests
As far as my fingers can reach;
To pluck legumes for the landscape's
Palms, that sway and bend with late
Afternoon traffic;
To defame the crèche moldering out
In the crumbling tar of the Church's hip:
To become a truant,
Far a field from the turn-about,
A high holy thief for you who makes entire Long days into weekends;
Who has seen the womb of silk worms,
And each hex in a bleeding comb;

But don't you listen to me,
Because I am not really good at sports;
And my shoes don't fit,
And its been so long since I've seen any real
Lions, those better seafaring men who spit
Their plugs and grin like sharp metal
On the grind for your joints:
Oh well,
The sea is going, and its time to get up or Go to bed- In fact, everything must be going.
We are going to climb mount Vesuvius today,
To light our cigars off fuses from her bosom,
To fry some eggs,
To tweak our mustaches and fix our
Kid cloves for these photographs; but look at me now, dear,
As I must be lying- I'd dig up entire graveyards for

You, and say that airplanes were shiny love birds
Going so far that they are just as passionately migratory-
Wouldn't I- Just wouldn't I dear,
Or am I just good for lying?

Robert Rorabeck

Just Graffiti

All of the contenders were still laughing whilst the sun
Was just graffiti—
And the mother of my wife told me to look up,
As her father smoked all of the cigarettes
I was forced to buy for our wedding banquet:
Sad stars—
Bright over the fairgrounds—
Turning around, menstruating over the individual Conundrums of the highways and the high schools:
It was all we had to do—
With the singing trucks selling icecream—
And another day was spilling its orgasms over the overpasses
Of her shoulders,
But she was just concerned with her children—
Like goldfish collected all together from all of the winners
Bedrooms—
Until there was gunfights and another architecture with
The paper airplanes and kites all up in the air:
And then we were moving into another impossibility
Of shadow—
And the schoolroom kept to itself—
As the fires burned like poisonous butterflies dancing all
Across the busses:
And contributing to nothing else—but the houses that they Kept in their minds—
Until their mothers found them and collected them,
Carrying all of them to their breasts
And reminding all of them that it was time.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Like I Would Have Had Judy Garland

If I begin this way for you, and you see me,
And you are on your bicycle,
Petit infant, well contoured- as last I saw you color-
Blind, and working the fondue fountain at
The old Spanish café,
You would turn your bike around and ride away,
And I would smell your dreams for other men
On the sidewalk the other students enjoyed holding Hands and arguing if the moon was waxing or Waning:
And I really do not care, but to be put into other ideals
Of you, not transitory bouquets, but ifs that if are not Realized at least never die;
And say to explore your courtrooms while you are for A little while adjourned, smoking with the judge, or Talking on your sweetheart in the phone of the big City;
And it shouldn't matter now if you've gone away, if You've went ahead and gone and done the big deal with Your swell friend- I'll see you anyways in a dream,
And there are a thousand miles of graveyards in this city,
And with my eyes closed can recline beside anyone
And pretend that it is our lover's grave; and the world
Can sound just as good asleep and blind,
Enough to be as if you were there and this somber place
The university that forgotten day, and you rode your Bicycle to me, didn't you, pretty sparrow,
And stayed just as I would have had you stay.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Like Something Written By Chaucer

Put the spear in me,
As I would put in the tongue;
And watch as whole cities pour out
Of men who wear antlers to bed,
Who were cuckolded and made to run around
Feathered and spitted upon
Twelve days before Halloween;

How bucolic her ass looked, sticking out of
The kitchen's window; it could not be denied
As it bobbed up and down, like a steamy plum
For Thom to plumb with his thumb;
Just like something written by Chaucer.

A day before the hurricane, the chickens ran around
Until hypnotized,
And we went to the super-store and bought a forty-eight
Inch t.v., and a fichus, because they were out of water;
The cashier said we could enter a raffle,
But I asked her why bother, and when we got home
We plugged in the tomb and waited for the house
To fill with laughter.

After class was over, she cycled home,
Her forehead peppered, sweaty with loam,
Her hair curled by the wind's daughter; but she didn't See me, as I watched from the top of the palm tree,
Making love to the very same daughter,

And then at night, she ate quite a bite,
While I watched the bike-thieves unsolder the wheels
From the spokes, they stole from us folks,
As she cooked the eggs like I taught her;

But even as I swum, she let in her chum, and they made
Love like a hooked bobber; half in and half out,
They see-sawed about, while I bit my thumb as I aught'r;
After he left, she fixed up her dress, and laid-out the table
That I bought her; but I was not ready for bed

With that over-used head, so I just laid back and Kissed the wind's daughter;
Who unbuttoned her blouse and opened her house,
Just like something written by Chaucer.

Robert Rorabeck

Just No One At All

You give me reasons to pull rabbits and roses
Out of my wounds while I tramp,
While I keep doing this, evading cops who aren't Even paying attention, going into the park after midnight
Under the slash pine trees and cursing the various Neighborhoods you undress in,
So ducky and appreciative of the crocodilian flatulence;
I shouldn't blame you for all the bullet holes I've misquoted,
The friends who are always tossing the sweeter grapes to
You from the higher rungs: you have a hyphenated last name,
After all, and a brother who does nothing but does it in NY, NY- While all I have are my sloppy visions of Trailer park sommeliers who sell all their wines from boxes
And fish bowls, who ladle out to their smoking fathers the Incest of their dragon sown fields- Girls without any teeth
Who used to be like angels crossed with wolves,
And who swam like stellar jays and lacquered otters through Home room and economics, who could crack any sort of Legume or oyster between their breasts,
Who made me so nervous I never went to school- and they kissed me
Through the shade of palm trees and student parking lots,
So long ago that it might as well have been their younger sisters,
Those things who change into lakes and slender aspens
They have so well forgotten, or according to the nature of The game, just no one at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Just One More

They just go on and one,
Don't they- and they can start up in Anyway,
Like pulling the choke string on a kite
Or lawnmower:
And once they get going then it's like a poor
Catholic renaissance,
Unprotected, unbroken, parroting with crackers
And cheese,
But they really are so much love:
Love like the top layer of a cake which is Symbolic for the sea, for the bolero-
For Ave Maria- for nectarines:
There are no three strike rules, no prison sentences,
When no lips spell out, no eyes perceive:
This is the tree in the forest no one hears,
This is just the last one falling before the lonely night
At bed:
I loved a few girls from high school- I loved a few Girls,
And now I sleep in an old green Chevy beside a canal
In North Riviera Beach-
I trick for you- Erin- I trick for you: Erin:
I am yours and if you really want to love just one man upon
This Earth,
You don't have to read the Palm Beach Post to know that Man can be yours with just one word:
Erin Elizabeth Adamson- if you are tired of bullrings and Batting cages,
This is just one more to tell you- I have healthy lungs
And a clean cadaver, and time is short- but with you it would Live forever;
And you don't care: Who are you with goblet stolen from
The pervasive dragon stuck in your nose:
Who are you but a paramedic trucking for other men,
Fine you men who like to play ball:
You are beautiful now, but you are beautiful forever-
And you don't care or hear me fall,
Because I am on my knees

And this is just one more.

Robert Rorabeck

Just One More Last And Perfected Viewing

I drink to the bereavement of windows and Airports
Because this is just where I am going as I am about to Fall asleep:
Even my very mother wasn't beautiful enough to Presuppose me,
And this is my drug:
And this is my plan, to swing out sweet footed straight above
The sure promised land.
To make love to myself as a presupposition,
To give all the banished playgrounds back to the sweating
Womb of my underground grandmother;
As Kelly sweats away her days next to the underground sea,
Just a creature in the first level of
The dungeon that was promised to me: Just a lady bug on A petal weeping in spring,
While the trucks twirl their new engines entwined with the Gases of their long lost loves,
So too do I keep to myself, and keep weeping for her as the rivers
Awaken in spring and peel down the mountainside and Do their thing;
As they are waking up, so too dose my dove,
For she is busy weeping as she cannot fly high enough
Up the skirts of my another mountain to see what I have perceived: Kelly, you are very fine, and you are waking up,
And this is my world naked and divine and pure
As the opalescent pornography as unmarketable as the Time you closed your eyes and dreamed up me,
What silly backwards thing, like climbing up against the paths
That you have already breathed; but they were already so Beautiful that your naked patriotism allowed them
Once again into the showrooms of your unadulterated mind
For just one more last and perfected viewing.

Robert Rorabeck

Just One Of Many

Numbed in the chilly amphitheatre.
Baboons are beating the chests,
Ruining tulip corsages- my aunt's wedding
Is all a mess, so I drove home early,
But the highway undressed and danced for me,
Cheeky, bosomed: I slipped a dollar in her
Curve and fell asleep.
Knocking, the black man woke me up and said
It was high time to move over-
I thought I wanted to be famous, but I was out
Of money,
But it didn't matter because the air-plants were
Out and blushing in the crooks and armpits
Of each and every cypress.
The snails were white as apples, but with
Not so many words,
And I shouldn't even mention the birds, the Birds, the birds,
Over Jupiter's dump, the humping of young and lordly
Lawyers
Who commissioned to have their picket fence painted
White by Tom Sawyer and oh so many confederate
Toy soldiers:
She makes love there, going down somewhere on that Weepy and pester some peninsula,
And I'd thought of going back to her, drying my jaw
Out under the same sun; but school is over,
I'd loved a waitress over her through the slipping shadows
Of unkempt banyans; but isn't that how it should be.
Stop. I'll go to sleep now and have her sing to me
A song that doesn't matter how it comes, because I've Had my shots- I've buried my bones of which
She is just one of many.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Out Of Reach

Entrain the beautiful adjectives,
That's what you do, like tools of a scientists
Out naked on the steps,
A bottle of beer, a can of pep,
And the day rally's on: it's a speedy centipede
Who has forgotten or cursed all of its Old gods and boyfriends,
And this is what it does,
But combs the crew cuts of dungeons,
And gives beautiful tans to monsters who look
Up through the crackerjack fjords
And yawn like a thousand sharp saines,
Each tooth pretending to be a water fountain
For the little birds
And girls of makebelieve,
And thus they swoop down all attracted
And are caught up by the misplacement of shady classrooms,
In cages forever underneath the sink of tulips
Where they tend to sway and bask
Just out of reach of the great poets,
Stumbled upon by the minor poets who do not know the
Not to their inconsequential salvation,
But they are too eager to way, and thus they stare through
All the afternoon of talk shows and lost airplanes,
Looking at the beautiful harems of sweet
Girls and their songbirds
Who are even more beautiful and sweet because They are lost forever
Down in the shallow cracks where the sunlight reaches,
Just out of reach.

Robert Rorabeck

Just So Busy

Going down the road are cars:
Cars full of family inherited to their declinations:
Fathers drive, and mothers watch out,
And Spot is sticking out his tongue enjoying the
Shampoo of uneven light;
And I know I have seen this time and again while
Coming out of sleep:
I think it was that I ran away from some school, and there
Was a lot of woods,
And then this highway which entrenched me:
I cannot pass because of this busy river,
All of these laughing families spindled from the loins
Of two pilots ever leaping in and out of bed and also breakfast:
So I must wait here while I can hear the bugle fading in
The distance: whoever it was has given up hunting
For me,
But I wish they would come: maybe it was my mother in
A purple dress: maybe my father carried a devil's lamp two shades
Above his head,
But if it is them they are growing more distant, while this
Traffic is always building:
Soon I think they will flow over the cliffs and over my shoulders
If I lie down beneath their hard choruses of chassis,
But I do not think that it is they mean any harm:
They are just so busy at dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

Just So Busy At Dancing

Going down the road are cars:
Cars full of family inherited to their declinations:
Fathers drive, and mothers watch out,
And Spot is sticking out his tongue enjoying the
Shampoo of uneven light;
And I know I have seen this time and again while
Coming out of sleep:
I think it was that I ran away from some school, and there
Was a lot of woods,
And then this highway which entrenched me:
I cannot pass because of this busy river,
All of these laughing families spindled from the loins
Of two pilots ever leaping in and out of bed and also breakfast:
So I must wait here while I can hear the bugle fading in
The distance: whoever it was has given up hunting
For me,
But I wish they would come: maybe it was my mother in
A purple dress: maybe my father carried a devil's lamp two shades
Above his head,
But if it is them they are growing more distant, while this
Traffic is always building:
Soon I think they will flow over the cliffs and over my shoulders
If I lie down beneath their hard choruses of chassis,
But I do not think that it is they mean any harm:
They are just so busy at dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

Just So Buy

Going down the road are cars:
Cars full of family inherited to their declinations:
Fathers drive, and mothers watch out,
And Spot is sticking out his tongue enjoying the
Shampoo of uneven light;
And I know I have seen this time and again while
Coming out of sleep:
I think it was that I ran away from some school, and there
Was a lot of woods,
And then this highway which entrenched me:
I cannot pass because of this busy river,
All of these laughing families spindled from the loins
Of two pilots ever leaping in and out of bed and also breakfast:
So I must wait here while I can hear the bugle fading in
The distance: whoever it was has given up hunting
For me,
But I wish they would come: maybe it was my mother in
A purple dress: maybe my father carried a devil's lamp two shades
Above his head,
But if it is them they are growing more distant, while this
Traffic is always building:
Soon I think they will flow over the cliffs and over my shoulders
If I lie down beneath their hard choruses of chassis,
But I do not think that it is they mean any harm:
They are just so busy at dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Some More Thoughts

It hurts to bum, and to disappoint them saints:
I'm out of better words, out in the graveyard of disenfranchised
Sports;
And this is early morning: my parents are gone,
Maybe I am singing as I touch myself to your spectral form:
The sky is full of horses runaway from their Brush-fired barns:
These words are just the simple afterthoughts of more trustworthy
Yarns:
And the day opens in a colorful flood of girls touching themselves,
And touching themselves again:
Later on, if I appreciate, there will be rain clouds and wet paint,
And song birds, and a-mens;
But for now I don't even want to touch myself, to clown around;
I know that there are prettier houses and your sisters
Are undressing in them- Looking at themselves in mirrors and Contemplating marriage and aquariums;
But for now I'm really bummed, and the neighborhood of houses
Seem uncharmed,
And the fireworks bag is empty, and I'm really going down:
The cats are burrowing like rabbits underground,
Like homeless men drinking under the overpasses that you step or Leap over so easily like the object of a fable,
Like a birthstone on display over a long-tongued earth:
And these are just some more thoughts to which you have always Given birth.

Robert Rorabeck

Just The Average Dream

Oh discombobulated house behind the citrus
Tree, Can't I enter you
And hang up my scars, and drink sour whiskey:
Oh what a night when all the street lamps
Glow,
The cars return, late night talk shows.
Beauty queens jog, patinas and tits-
We pay our mortgage and polish salty clits;
Through the house a gondola, a wet avenue,
Rose bushes in back of the city zoo.
Juxtaposed between the confections of sky
And the briny sea, words composed between scoliosis
Back and scabby knee; My little sister has eyes that Weep at the bottom of the hill where they Water the dreamy sheep- Where up go Jack
And down come Jill- Just the average dream, please-
Is what I deserve at the end of the cul-de-sac
And the lip of the curb.

Robert Rorabeck

Just The Last Bit Of February

Again- its snowing in May,
And all the flowers are down below
Way beneath the darkening keen of the Mountain's knees.
She hasn't dressed up for so very long,
Not even when he made his first movie at Twenty-something
In a little town in Greece-
She didn't take herself out of the pittance of Unpublishable plays- So anyway,
They are waiting like shrinking violets to See if they'll be going back to school,
Plucked so gently for a lover's bouquet,
To take on a bicycle ride on their last sunny day
To swoon before her eyes like comely sailors
Out on leave, petals spreading with the same
Concentricity of anything homemade, more
Delicate than anything you could buy at the supermarket:
But that is how it is
And I wish I could take them all up on a fieldtrip
To her eyes- But I don't go out anymore to lounge
Upon the honey-suckle gravity of her stony bosom
With the same hopeful molasses of summer flies,
To masturbate up inside of naked trees:
I hardly even write anymore, because for all the flowers
- There's really only elk down there
Right now, in a bugling colony that can see its own
Breath; and its now even yet May,
Just the last bit of February- Though not really,
And still the snow is falling,
And all the flowers are but sleeping.

Robert Rorabeck

Just The Type Of Creature

My scars are a pretty mix of roads and intercourse.
Where they are going there are the new creations of lights
On the boulevard,
Coming like an almost blind horizon of lighthouses;
And then you are almost there, like the first thing in the Anti-crepuscule of the university, waking up before books
In the mists of coed fields always paradoxically mowed,
The sweet green beds I hope you remember,
The art classes, the rent of venal lovers, the left over casserole
Your mother sent you that you would never eat,
Your father the last casualty of that war, and you just a busty
Half-breed in a place you never belonged; and now you are Still trying to do the thing of another princess, and I can't Blame you: That you killed me and left me for dead on the bus
Of our last fieldtrip. Resurrected by the unbelievable spikenard
Of the truant alligators, and suckled back to health in the theme-parks
Of poltergeist orchards, I can still see by the light of the moon,
And I'd hate to find you, but isn't that the way I am just going,
Over the ice-cold planets who aren't even real, even over yards of Pets and empty parking lots. Soon I will be crenellating the airy sisters
Over your room, but you will never look up, because even though you
Are so beautiful you are just the type of creature who is never Allowed to do that.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Thus

Seasawing the epitaphs to my shoulder bones,
I somehow still manage to hang on:
The world turns around on its belly, and stares me in the eye:
The horses hang from the trees, braying, looking out
At the sea too-
That great heart that is beating its last dancing in the foaming
Strength of the jaws
That certainly know- in the meals of the hours of the work
Day this is just thus;
The doorknobs that await like Siamese twins the busied hands
That come home to rest,
Curling their lashes toward and away from the dusk-
The bones of leafy shadows sweeping across
The window sill,
Like a zoetrope of rabbits and foxes:
And then the eyes close the window fronts of the soul:
And the sea settles dismissively- and this is just thus.

Robert Rorabeck

Just To Indian Give

They have poems that famish and then lie with the Gods that they want in
The shallows, where flames cantankering over monuments flatted
By the unconstructions of the forever nubile sea:
Black when it wants to be,
And as deep as a muse's eyes: Oh, Alma- your daughter is having A birthday in four days,
And you made love to me today and then spent a hundred dollars
On your hair:
It is probably more than my mother has spent in her entire Life time:
And you belong in the vestibules of Mount Olympus with her,
Or somewhere,
Spilling your time, while I spill my cups every night, and they Headily sing to me of all of my wishes,
In crippled operas of hobos that wait up for you all night and then
Try and panhandle a couple of quarters,
Just to Indian Give wishes from my wishing well.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Too Kind To Say Goodbye

I wished that your schoolyards would have opened up
Their eyes to know me,
Like an apiary where a friendly fire burns;
Its cathedrals of orange lips smacking the bushwhacking leaves
From the spare forests
Around the houses near the sea- like a fieldtrip that your Son and your daughter went on, and both on their birthday:
While I stood and I watched them
And I caught the biggest kingfish of the day; but it was still Not enough to save your heart from the families of Its grave:
And I took to riding alongside cars, and to climbing up the Roofs of your neighbors just to get a look into your Backyard to see whatever it was that you and the devil
Were cooking;
And it was that you looked good from my point of view
That I was already coming down: but I got there too late:
The bank was already empty: the lions had already eaten
Their witches:
And you had left for Mexico for your operation, or to see
Your sister- in a place where there are never teardrops in the sky:
You wore your miniskirt that I had once or twice lifted
Like your flag of surrender; and you wore the gold
I had bought for you every time to say I loved you;
Alma- but you were just too kind to say goodbye.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Trying To Survive

It is cold to be without blankets,
Or tumbled with the paradoxical attributes of the Female's sex:
She has so many friends and she smoked and lives
In a double-wide:
Why can't I train myself if her hair is so blonde, though
She's been giving it high lights:
And the stock cars moves in righteous herds;
And it is not fair those boys who drive:
I remember her laying back in high school like a one of a
Kind firework while I was still alive:
And now the houses of my better ancestors are real and have Eyes,
And they can follow their housewives straight over the Parallel roots of the canal: they can become fairytales too:
That is what they do, and all the children perambulate,
And they remember the men who once were presidents;
But all I care about is how her legs divide:
She is my classroom, while more than one child has birthed
Outdoors from her truancies:
Butterflies are dying like paper cenotaphs in Mexico;
And what am I doing, but quieting down and falling down
Like a drunken hiker into Mount Saint Helens:
That I am just trying to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Two Ingénues

In your great urban heart there are so many boys,
More than are in Peter Pan's;
And you let them fly around your mouth before you
Wake up,
And they land there and then give a soliloquy,
Don't they; and you pretend to be asleep,
And even when you're up and eating breakfast with Your sister, just two ingénues,
You let in enough light for them to see you in Your lingerie;
And you've just bought new tires for your car outside,
Which make you want to stay inside;
You don't want to have to leave for anywhere,
And ruin their perfect tread-
They yet smell like where you bought them,
And the perfect man, tattooed and smudged;
And you've cut your hair down at the barbers the Same place the politicians do it,
Down by where the mermaids work in the lake,
And the officers keep them there sequestered, trying to Put them bodily into jars: That's where I've brought my Lunch so many times, trying to fill myself near where I've Remembered you,
Wanting to read to you out in those public gardens,
So you might be amused and bare a breast,
But its been so long since I've painted a picture;
Though I still write, and go by your yard several times a day:
I see flashes of you like consecutive pictures moving around
In a zoetrope: You are smiling, and you are smiling and Showing tongue, and holding hands with your sister,
And didn't I say I only know so many words,
And very soon I should be leaving- I am going to get lost
From you,
Even though you couldn't say who I am,
Because its so long since we've been to school,
Though in your playgrounds I can still hear the boys laughing.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Underneath Something That Seemed So Beautiful

Even though as silent as a fox watching whatever
Housewives are on display behind the bright
Bright windows in the upset zoetrope of
The apoplectic weather, I sing to you like a mute
In a feral cathedral- sing of the lonesome seabed
Of my youth, and the otters who floated
Above me while I skipped school, and the stolen
Bicycles floated down across the mermaids
That I could not really see- and the world was Torn up, and made to settle down, like something
Marvelous for a day attracting tourists-
The paper wounds like a eucrists for my body,
And the green yard an entire play, with the red,
Red ants always crawling just underneath something
That seemed so beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Just What I Do

Hard to think of something to consider.
I am getting drunker and drunker,
And the stain glass I frame you in grows into a Church,
And the airplanes come down and pray
Where cartoons grave on cereal Saturday mornings
And this is just what I do
To get outside and mow my fair portion of the lawn:
This is what I do for the girl with Watercolored eyes when there is nothing
Better on television,
And I am left with nothing better to do than to Type these mud daubed love letters,
And to wait alone in my zoo:
To swing for a little while, to pass the habit,
To pretend to have the potency to stave off killer bees
And death,
And too look you straight in your eyes and to caracole
The death with life rings of your initials:
I jump through hoops for you,
While the traffic sings,
And burns like fearless dogs,
Like candles in my own beard:
This is just what I do.

Robert Rorabeck

Just What They Deserve

Popgun séances who hear me dancing:
I am dancing, and I am right here,
Underneath the Christmases where the planes pretend
To be touching down,
And maybe they are doing just that in their Wedding gowns,
As the little girls plummet, as the school girls look far away;
And the busses turn around and around,
Dropping us off fairly underneath the sun, like sailors
Into their warm and striking grottos
That the virgins serve and who anyone, why just anyone:
Alma,
Can get just- just what they deserve.

Robert Rorabeck

Just What They Do

Oh, whatever wound, you are here,
And I am singing,
Because I do not know what else to do:
And I look up through all of
The pages while I am sing,
And even while I walk my dog you Seem so beautiful, but it is only because I don't even Know what else there is to do:
And you come up into the morning like a mystified orchard
While the sugar cane is burning:
And all of it is yellowed, and a banshee, and the new litters
Are being propositioned even by the diminutive coral snakes:
And that is just what they do:
In the rainstorms, and underneath the rainstorms:
Openmouthed and mewling, underneath the airplanes,
And the paper airplanes,
Because that is just what they do.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Whom It Is

They have their friends in the stables
Of Christmas- in the sweet nativities of a suburbia
Where it never has to snow,
And the housewives go out shopping, and then
Rejoin home again:
Look at all of the prettiest things they are taking home
With them, and I think of you-
As the power lines sway, as the alligators cross the Canal:
I think of you as the homeless men think of the moon
Underneath the overpasses:
She has dipped down again, she is kissing them
And bakes them a thanksgiving in a stolen cauldron of Her shadows- and lingers in their peasant
Heads,
As the three legged witches fly as high as commercial
Airliners- and I am left wondering, beleaguered once Again, just whom it is I am going to marry.

Robert Rorabeck

Just Your Man

Quizzically, as if from the blue fjords I
Look at you: maybe it appears that you are beginning
This suicide for your man:
And you look great, and your daughter is neither sad
Nor weeping:
And it doesn't hurt to look at you now that I have Become numbed to beauty,
And my mother is home and flipping through papers and Being otherwise distracting:
Soon maybe she will go out and ponder underneath those Swings just where I picture you
As your penumbra swings and the algebra teachers bite all of Their lips:
And I hated all of them but not half as much as when they made
Your swings safe and closer to the ground,
Even if you came sooner like an elite wind turning windmills
From the long hot stretches of yellow mountains;
And that was just your element that I had nothing to do with,
Because he was just your man.

Robert Rorabeck

Kaleidoscope Perched All Alone

If there was a kaleidoscope perched all
Alone above the sea,
And beneath it the otters were swimming
In the grottos of the disenchanted mermaids,
And some school girls,
Who were all alone except from their selves
Who were playing hooky
Just to practice falling down and catching
The shadows of the boys they loved in Pieta—
Well, then this was the new delusion nobody
Would see, except for the wooden Puppets and the rainstorms above the Talking cats—
As the airplanes sped both ways—
And the stewardesses serving drinks inside of Them were always in love with this or
With that.

Robert Rorabeck

Kaliedescope Of Semiprecious Shade

Now you can cry for me
One or two stories up
From the road-
While the son you once were Dissapears-
After the dogs whose sharp senses
Are pinpointing rattlesnakes-
What foothills are those
In that cool path
At the bottom of the Kaliedescope of Semiprecious shade-

Robert Rorabeck

Kazoo

Her husband has the Hebrew alphabet on his Knuckles;
At least some of it.
She sat next to me on the shoe polished table
Underneath the tent which was Rejected by the ginger inspector today:
She sat next to my problem side
Holding her twenty ton six month old underneath
Her awesome breasts,
And told me she was completely over him
Was this bleach blonde trailer mom-
She was completely over him,
And here was my chance to turn her pumpkin into Magic dust;
That I could lay her low and plant her in my mobile
Truck,
While the waves crisped like an orchestra of Watery cutlery for the both of us; yeah, but I just smiled
Politely and never once looked into her Yard chair eyes- I couldn't even tell you the color of
Her eyes,
Her desperate Catholic day school eyes,
But if she came back again this other cheap tomorrow
Who knows what I might do-
But can't you imagine such a daytime talk show
Zoo I'd sure to get a fist full of kosher knuckle sandwich
If I played that buxom, bleached and infected kazoo.

Robert Rorabeck

Keep Busy

I eat ice-cream-
I eat ice-cream- I drink rum:
In that order,
Or that's what I'm going to do.
Maybe I will read William Carlos Williams.
Maybe I will write a modern rendition of Little Red Riding Hood- Looking down
The misty but un-shy valley I might see a streak
Of red, like poisoned holly, and it will be her-
And I will write about it,
That she should love me for a little while,
Or just keep me around because I feel comfortable,
Until she gets the steady drip of her silver-fanged
Lycanthrope: Oh, what a handsome thing,
Or shouldn't I say that is how I must write him;
And I am thinking of soliciting Fantasy & Science Fiction Magazine,
Except that it might be that they are out of print,
So I might just put that away-
I might think longingly of Arthur Rimbaud and how At only seventeen he was still a might better than Walt Whitman, and if they ever met or held hands,
Or shared lemonade through the epileptic parks
In sunny fits. Because it seems that it was the right time;
But I will not call her- That's what I should never Do, even though soon I should move three states closer
Or so and be able to lay my head upon Sara Teasdale's Grave in Bellefontaine, though I would never take A photograph even in the middle of the night,
Because to be that kind of tourist is not a mere amusement;
But once I've had my nip of rum I might be Brave enough to write her name; it is Memorial Day weekend after all, and shouldn't there be at least
Some kind of fireworks? Ah heck- Erin, I said it....
Oh well: It is still such a pretty thing,
But now I must keep busy by something else.

Robert Rorabeck

Keeping The Faith

In the rain,
In the end,
In the metropolitan museum,

I've tried to write words for us
That will not sleep,
That will stand on guard duty,
That will keep perfect account of Useful sheep,

But I've come upon myself misspelled,
Laden down by fairytales,
Hoping to demystify the real,
Ending up on a dead end street,
Thumping my firsts alongside the beats,
Precursors to the counter-culture,
Flaccid meat, and groceries stores
That still close on Sundays

Jack Micheline is Harvey Silver,
Is hardly memorized.
I saw you once in the video store,
And briefly looked into your eyes,
Before I stole the prime rib from next door,
And went home with lifted blood on my lips,
Sat down behind the door and typed a little this,

For you,
For you, my darling pronoun,
And all the liquors which you excrete
While the rain goes bitter patter like little feet,
And the waves come up and give and take,
All the cliches we're aloud to make,

I loved you because you didn't even know what You've stolen,
And I love you even more when you turn away
From my heart you've broken,
Like a grandfather clock outside skirted by a picnic,

The arms still soldiering on its face,
Even though the sun can clearly tell us
Its time to eat.

Robert Rorabeck

Keeping Time With A Stranger

Light as smooth as rainstorms
And then of purple cars- I can feel my pulse
In the highway
Underneath the sky- as you move with
Your echoes to the delight of Clocks
In the ballroom of your thoughts where
The tenements never decay- I can feel your Thoughts streak across me-
They are keeping time with a stranger they Can never know,
And the heart beats its metronome's
Song, and I suppose you've heard it before
If you were ever listening.

Robert Rorabeck

Keeping To The Jungles

The chances were golden and made to fly and
They stuck to the roofs of all of our loneliness like Little children of nocturnal mothers
And I saw you hanging out at your favorite store with Another man,
And then you were on the seesaw, but you didn't look
Like you were having fun:
Now all of the waves crawl with the undulations of Unending centipedes,
The way sick dogs crawl on their bellies and worms devour
Themselves in unhealthy wood,
And I have been keeping to the jungles where the canopy
Is so thick that I don't have to read the stars,
Or look up and tell the time, though I am already certain
You are not coming.

Robert Rorabeck

Keiper Belt

School children coming home for Christmas—
A fox's tongue in a crackerjack box—
The things you said in Whispers
Too soft for lies—
Rope tricks on Ganyemede, a sea of silent
Thoughts obscured
By astroids
Surrounded by the Keiper Belt
With smoky swings and censers
Inside a church too far away to reach.

Robert Rorabeck

Kelly #9

They make their lives up in rows
Of tumbling houses
Glitter transformingly under the sun,
And even so far away you might Reach your hand out to try and touch
This skin, like the way a sexy fish
Swims in a brightly lit television.
All the houses rise up in silver spirals,
Collecting the light off the sea, turning windmills
On the ancient coasts of Spain,
The forgotten ancestry spread over her hills,
And in dimly lit bars where she reached out to You and spread her fingers on your cheek,
Like spiders walk on water
Before breathing, the way her bee-stung
Lips parted trying to parse that she loved you
Between sips of beer.

All the way to her
Shores, where dead knights glitter
In the bosom of her bays and Billboards read you can buy a home on her
For $139,000 and I know this =s a very Good price for South Florida,
And by the end of the year my bank account
Will have enough that I won't even need a
Mortgage, and can just lie out and love her,
And spread everything I own out to her
And the silver flash of her breath which moves
Like a speedboat against the break of the sea.

I drive with some kid across the Intercoastal, and begin to search for her
Here in bed before I wake up I just Saw her cross the street right next to my Old high school before you turn into the Housing development where my ex-lover's
Parents used to live, but I cannot be sure,
Because they all hurried and packed up to Begin the post-modern Diaspora. But I am

Sure it was her, Kelly #9, because I started
Loving her blonde locks in 4th grade, and hid in the bathroom
While her friends handed over my poorly thought-out
Gifts of love; but soon she was a bad
Girl, already taking advantage of that wicked beauty,
Forsaken the bobbles I spread out to her for a map
Towards me,
She took many lovers on back-country roads,
Bumping against her young men in the languid beds
Of American pick-up trucks. Beer in left hand
Cock in right, she moved far away from Me. Finding her purpose in dead ends, she never returned
To school, yet my eyes still lingered down the alphabetized
Dirt roads of Loxahatchee; she lived down E Street,
Never minding all the sacrifices I left for her—

She lives here now, on this forgotten island off
The south coast of Florida, where she lays forever
Naked upon her small green front lawn, her tanned thighs
Sweaty on the tongues of her pink lawn chair,
Still dreaming of men she has yet to meet—

Me and the kid drive across the intercoastal
And the certain part of the day when the island
Materializes—I've looked her up on the internet,
Found her phone number and checked the maps.
She lives on Albatross Lane, so I go to her;
But soon I find that all these roads flow into Each other like rivers or lovers, they drink each
Other, so the ways leading to her are devoured
By watery legs that sex in flashy ways under the sun,
So that this woman of my heart still defies me,
And I give up, buying a house somewhere close by,
Using up my bank account, I never forget her, and Walk the flashing streets, a bachelor struggling up the steep hills,
My eyes squinting in the spears of sunlight she Calls down to blind me between sips of her
Salty liquors; Always, I can smell her near,
And always hunger for her, and she escapes me,
Playing with the lost sailors she calls up from the sea,

So even after I awake, I still search for her,
Waking from the bed, I smell her, and lick her Salt off my palm, and I shower and prepare to Walk outside to feed 100 horses.

Robert Rorabeck

Kelly's Child

As soon as Alice died
She transmitted to her daughter
Her last recipe:
Barefooted,
Fertilized
Kelly lay sweating in bed.
She'd been a good Catholic,
Now look what it had done.
In the rented house,
With more mice than men,
The young lady had gotten pregnant,
But there was no air conditioning,
Just a screen door
Overlooking a rock garden
Where the dog had killed a rabbit.
Standing on the Cinderblocks that made
The front steps,
Kelly looked into the dirt road
And waited for her
Husband to return from work.
She bit her lip,
And a fat toad farted
In the earth beside her slipper.
Inside the little house,
The kitchen lay in feverish shadow,
But floating in the east
The clouds were the Nakedness of seashells,
And Kelly saw those and prayed.

Robert Rorabeck

Kicking Up Her Gowns

Boiling either way,
Taking left turns- incredibly reckless bicycles
That shot out of school like cannons,
Or other inept fanfare:
If this is the way you are going down to the joy
World,
Take me there on you handlebars:
Be a good sport if you're going to find out
Where the girls don't even know where they are sleeping
Without ceiling fans tapering their illusions
Like the Oxnard of windmills:
The man made lake is to trap a beautiful woman an Make her into the wish of the evening,
The lady of the evening, tattooed in crepuscule and
A sorority of mailboxes,
With the niggardly seeds pushing her in the censer,
The fat bacon of the swing folded beneath her whistling
As$; and this is as far as we've gotten with her,
Some decades out of high school,
But fist fights will abound in the jubilee weeds once we Unfurl our foreheads and figure out how to spell,
Then to understand that she's just a mannequin
Of spurious the ill effected hope,
Her body gone higher up to the mountains after turning
Her tassel counter clockwise and kicking up her gowns.

Robert Rorabeck

Kidnapped Children And Your Love For Me

The bad cliffs where they keep their arrowheads
Where nothing is sacred anymore—
Where the stream comes up from where the Dragon grins from his footprints,
Where it doesn't rain anymore,
But the everlasting boys come in and pretend
To be Peter Pan or
They play baseball—
In the boreal theatres where the moonlight is Lost without a lover,
And the passengers look out from
The unending trains—
Where is it that they are going—
Why is it that no one can see their destination—
But the jungle is voluptuous,
Hiding all of the secrets of the fairy tales as It happens on and on without ending—
And it seems as if everything can grow there—
In an orgy of confused feelings
Where kidnapped children and your love
For me once existed.

Robert Rorabeck

Kill Joy

Men drink hard liquor to Kill joy,
To see you sitting on a park
Bench
In some kind of necrotic penumbra,
Feeding the crows
With just your eyes-
We stagger there remembering high
School,
The way you touched yourself
By the lockers
And went away, leaving room for Us to cry in the bathroom,
Or under the school bus-
Then only to see you from a distance,
Switchblading with all your friends-
We lit off fireworks to draw your Attentions,
But they were only duds,
And the great penumbric lizards continued
To sit and glow,
But even they didn't know how years later
Along the canals and Resting airplanes,
Just how big their family would grow.

Robert Rorabeck

Kind Enough To Wait For You

These fish too dream of their affluence
They too deserve to be so beautiful as to have
No fear of going to get their hair cut;
And the rain has passed us on the highway-
Maybe it is another forty miles to another rest stop
Where you can recline in your car and sleep;
Or you can just go outside and shiver and
Look at the clouds but never anymore wonder to Pretend to conceive the belly dancers in their shapes:
There is a woman on this very same road, you know;
But she has given up on you; she doesn't even remember
Your echoes down the very same halls of the interchangeable
Sexes of your shared adolescents;
Oh, how you often dreamed of touching her,
And the evidence of your infallible desire remains
Like spots of dew on the green rug in the Shade of the weary ceiling fans. I know, but the
The eyes of the alligators are just as dangerous as they are Beautiful,
But the only difference is that they haven't moved on:
They also don't remember who you are, or were, but they are
Kind enough to wait for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Kind Enough To Wait For Yoy

These fish too dream of their affluence
They too deserve to be so beautiful as to have
No fear of going to get their hair cut;
And the rain has passed us on the highway-
Maybe it is another forty miles to another rest stop
Where you can recline in your car and sleep;
Or you can just go outside and shiver and
Look at the clouds but never anymore wonder to
Pretend to conceive the belly dancers in their shapes:
There is a woman on this very same road, you know;
But she has given up on you; she doesn't even remember
Your echoes down the very same halls of the interchangeable
Sexes of your shared adolescents;
Oh, how you often dreamed of touching her,
And the evidence of your infallible desire remains
Like spots of dew on the green rug in the Shade of the weary ceiling fans. I know, but the
The eyes of the alligators are just as dangerous as they are Beautiful,
But the only difference is that they haven't moved on:
They also don't remember who you are, or were, but they are
Kind enough to wait for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Kindergarten Tears

Easily I die into the poem of her lips,
The stains on her cheeks from her addiction to flowers-
Let us say the light opens, hosannas,
They molest for hours on the cinderblocks leading Up to the chin of the moon,
I sit and watch them and peal like a cat, but I only
Have a nickel to buy what mother insisted,
I only have an hour for the show,
And then I must walk you home down the dirty
Road lined on either side by football players,
And alligators, and the girls who move naked through
The sprigs of aloe. There is a girl I once knew
Carnally driving up in a fine automobile,
Finished with her day, she walks upstairs to her husband.
I wonder what they'll say,
And later on in a bar an angel with clipped wings,
A song bird who doesn't care, laughs away the hours
And nocks out farts, and plays darts,
But onward we must go, and cross the busy intersections
Until our feet float over the pavement scarred with Chalky games, and kindergarten tears,
But do no fear, do not fear, for the gates are swinging
Open to this yard, and it has been so long since you
Or I stepped home,
So easily I die from the poem of her lips,
But you are holding my hand, and the door is open and
The house rises before the lake like palms in prayer,
And then the dark's affluence ripples and ripples without a shore.

Robert Rorabeck

King Author

If you said all my poems were very fine,
I would find your plot of ground where all the little Children bored by their Sunday best tear about you,
Offer little unlined palms and finger-paint your stone;
If they had read you, at least, they would know
And the weekday pilgrimages to and from their classrooms
Would be less painful,
For they would have your words spread warmly on the Marmalade page upon their laps like purring kittens of Fine story, like butterflies resting like naked lovers on Their corduroys, and the places you would reveal to them....
If you were not dead, and the lie of your author's Immortality beginning to slip off like an earlier coat of skin:
Overgrown, this world finds new if lesser refined sugars,
And the saccharine pleasures of the eyes no longer curtsy
Yet evolving to your fancy: I suppose, your words might live Forever in the narcolepsy of sleeping beauties and Social isolation each day as the grass whispers atop what
You really are- I keep in my mind, like awakening to a dream
Of better humanity, and I wait for other children to put Down the delinquencies of saltwater taffy and come about
You like a mute prophet of verbose page, and lay about your Stories as peacefully as lambs licked by fiery lions in the Gardens of your fine and yet budding imagination.

Robert Rorabeck

Kings Falling Down A Hill

Kings falling down a hill into a playground,
Beside the traffics,
Or in California made up with
The make believe unicorns—
I remembered her—
How she remembered to pretend to Love me,
Outside of the rain or the dog tracks—
Faces scarred in a carnival or trucks
And other illusions that have to Fend for themselves—
Until the moon rises over the evaporated seas
As it rises over the Disney Worlds—
And you don't have to pretend anymore—
You are having a child—
The world has lost a leg, but it looks like it
Will survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Kirikou And The Sorceress

Another orphaned day in whirlings
Around the sun:
The sad day of lashes, and her eyes
In distant faints,
Before the motes of slothful angels,
The curling fire's comatose tongues,
Epochs of sad daughters swimming
In numberless seas:
The haze of burning empires
Mingles with her cigarette:
The real world beckons impatiently,
Smashing the car's horn,
Wanting to get dinner over with,
So it can get paid
And then laid in the sticky and Dangerous sap of hemlocks- She is with Him, though she cannot get at
The deadly thorn in the small of her back,
Giving her all those incredible powers:
If I could get it out,
If I could dig it out with my teeth
And lay her down beneath the laureli,
She would stop becoming my sorceress,
And I could proclaim in my full body,
The wish to marry her,
And to reclaim the forgotten village
From her sick fetishes:
If she would look my way,
Like a beacon carving a lucid mote across the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Kiss The Sun

Isn't it enough to love
Someone like you,
You and you alone,
And let the rest of the World be
The helpless dream
Running through the epileptic
Forest at sunset;
Then you must concede
The light is brilliant
As it is failing
And yet still playing
The last of its childhood games.
When the soft shadows
Mature into a starlit honeymoon,
Enclosed,
The leaping vision of that
Day becomes entombed
In the night's chirping bossom;
Yet, awakening,
The heavenly fires
Breathe upon the slopes
Reveal evidence of our Entercourse,
Our children the golden
Aspen, yawning,
As the populated meadows disrobe
And kiss the dawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Kiss Your

What I haven't said grows around the house,
Fills up the children's games,
Engorges the canal until the otters know Christmas
And the housewives leave with divorces:
It fills up with all the oilskins of firsts love that you'd
Thought burned out quilled in the armpits
Kissing through the hinges of the exoskeletons of Conquistadors; and doesn't do anything right:
Ads more names to the fire: and it builds, and the gold
Melts down her honey breasts and ankles which
Are light as birds and take off my themselves- Into churches
That have no names but the beautiful stained glass,
And their banquets and baseball games of Sundays
While it has all been coming around, shedding off the failures
Of the years- Cicadas rhyming and then leaving their Old cousins onto her pinafores: and she, your muse:
Your absolute muse of this year or any other, as advertised,
Beds down again with another man: why look at you:
All of your snowflakes are paper, and as busy as sunflowers while
Housewives remarked that you've burned yourself:
And you surely have: by fireworks outside of high school,
By dying avenues chalked and embalmed in their crippled
Horses: and, but if Alma could see you, she would Light out upon the indescribable streets, pin wheeling like another
Indescribable festival out of her Mexico: and get wet and uneasy:
And kiss your bones: and kiss your bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Kiss Your Bones

What I haven't said grows around the house,
Fills up the children's games,
Engorges the canal until the otters know Christmas
And the housewives leave with divorces:
It fills up with all the oilskins of firsts love that you'd
Thought burned out quilled in the armpits
Kissing through the hinges of the exoskeletons of Conquistadors; and doesn't do anything right:
Ads more names to the fire: and it builds, and the gold
Melts down her honey breasts and ankles which
Are light as birds and take off my themselves- Into churches
That have no names but the beautiful stained glass,
And their banquets and baseball games of Sundays
While it has all been coming around, shedding off the failures
Of the years- Cicadas rhyming and then leaving their
Old cousins onto her pinafores: and she, your muse:
Your absolute muse of this year or any other, as advertised,
Beds down again with another man: why look at you:
All of your snowflakes are paper, and as busy as sunflowers while
Housewives remarked that you've burned yourself:
And you surely have: by fireworks outside of high school,
By dying avenues chalked and embalmed in their crippled
Horses: and, but if Alma could see you, she would
Light out upon the indescribable streets, pin wheeling like another
Indescribable festival out of her Mexico: and get wet and uneasy:
And kiss your bones: and kiss your bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Kisses Of Very, Very Different Kinds

Cuddling at the far corner of the fair grounds
With the wind swept pornography,
While maybe Alma is in her warm corner of her
Warm house, doing her nails,
Turning her soft brown head up to the heavens,
And swearing,
Swearing: but when the day really gets out,
It sweats salt like pretzels,
And my belly rotunds underneath the swing sets,
And the greater bodies move back and forth,
At first running away,
And then being kidnapped-
And the days in their labors hold such a great stink of Marbles- and the fawns lay in their fields,
Kissing their cloven feet,
While all around them is so softly mowed that all of
The ants are of one kind,
And to think of mountains- mountains in a cake
Of rainstorms, and of light night-
Is to purse ones lips to kiss and make wishes of very,
Very different kinds.

Robert Rorabeck

Kisses Upon The Mouth

If it wasn't a rose, then tell my why the stars don't shine—
Pictures of beautiful men in a blind classroom-
And heavens that don't let out until the catastrophes of A classroom are done—
The night bloomed jasmine while you held my hand
For a moment,
But I am almost done speaking while the Tourists climb the mountain—
Even if it is a pitiful joy, you have come so far—
After all of the catastrophes have fallen down into The pit, there will be the beautiful answers above the Stars—and in the monuments of the heavens we don't Even have to believe any more- with the contraptions Falling down—kisses upon the mouth of the Albino crocodile and no one left alive who has to Believe in me anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing Her Man

Stars have shadows don't they, dear:
I saw them casting on the tail end of a zoetrope for Half a year:
A tail of foxes and cantaloupe:
If I love you now, later I won't:
But I'll stand up high in the middle of the road,
Blessing your children
And promising them food: as the peacock follows
Her chicken across the railroad tracks underneath
The airplanes,
As the snail reminds itself of the grotto it once saw
Her in, kissing her man, and suckling her children.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing In A Hearse

Your yard instep with the voting booths;
And I just pulled out my favorite tooth-
And I have sold quite some many fireworks,
But I've never been a soda jerk-
But go around moping mighty tired, like a winsome
Bird on a wire barbed:
I am still looking for you, smelling your sea salts
Like Epson salts on a wound,
Going around and around on a dizzy halo:
Sometimes in the hallways I never knew, you come
So hard and fast, like a hall monitor demanding to see
My bathroom pass- And I don't really smoke
Or drink, but I'll do both anyways in in cumulous
Clink- and think of your dark beauty drawn back
Like maple syrups poured off a steaming short stack Underneath the mountains so blue and weepy with Forgotten time,
Like the snappy sisters crenulated and waiting compulsively
For the next rhyme: In high altitude grottos I'll wait for You, because I paid Jove in his tawny cathedral a Bushel full of money for him to release you;
And then you come down, dressed in a stylish curse,
And kiss you all over your womanly flesh, less metamorphosed,
If you don't grab me by my despotic lapels and kiss me first.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing The Earth

Calling out and giving away the hidden places,
With the fingers that can stop the games
And tell the truth of witchcrafts, that the bodies
Aren't really here:
The sky is nude as her open wrist: her eyes swim in
The long divisions of the things she tries
To forget the anatomies of,
And the good stuff just keeps bubbling over,
And curling its toes,
While the rhythms move and the blond girls are Blond,
But Natalie was freckled, and she skipped across the Earth like a doe tattooed in the spring
By her grandmother's final wishes, until her feet
Finally touched down like a playground in Kindergarten
At last kissing the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing Your Dirty Mouth

I give more words, like an overdose:
We use shovels to raise the dead, cheap
Eucharist. Mother is looking at me again,
With those eyes like robin's eggs,
The little fragile promises who get sick
In the rain. I am doing it again, using Pronouns to try and make love to you,
But it is so vague, and I have too many Scars to be in a reality show, but enjoy
The insides of cars, well air-conditioned,
The conduits flow, the bourgeoisie make
Dinner dates, read stock markets quotes,
Like rhyme schemes: I knew where you
Would be, even when I stared across the Room at you in high school: you would Be this and that, and make a career from Kissing the necks of tawny men, when all
I wanted was to swing with you in the park
For sometime after midnight, underneath
The roof of an elementary school, the colors
Darken, and we have vaguely importance
Things to disrupt the silence sporadically;
But you turned into a novel by my fingerprints.
Today I said your bosom was like the twin Mounds of Rome, but who will read this
And pay money. I just heard my dog fart,
And now it's time to tuck in, because my Bank is tanking, and I have to get up early Tomorrow to raise the dead, and take from Them the secrets of reawakened heirlooms;
One of them has a hole in his ear from where
The nail missed its mark, but I will put all
Of them to good use, because grave robbing
Is the one industry on the rise, and we do
It by midnight, the time I think most upon
Kissing your dirty mouth.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing Your Tadpoles In Their Yet Awakened Amusements

I drink rum- I drink rum so
I won't die tonight;
And do you read me- do you read me
As I drink rum:
There are psalms in those mountains.
And incredible storms like
Entire clutches of rattlesnakes,
Even when it's too high for poison:
\Take your dress off,
So I can smell your perfume:
You are the best aphrodisiac-
You are a real lady, wearing nothing, just
Your conviction,
And the psalms of some dusty angels
Diadem your ear-lobes,
World-renowned,
I know you- I've heard you screaming in
Your bedroom,
Because I want to live across the street from
You,
Sometimes with your husband,
And sometimes alone:
My girl betrayed me: She was no good,
Well, she was good,
But for another man:
And I need to a warm place to keep from being Alone,
Because I am not beautiful enough to do it alone-
Drunk now, who the f-*! is PJ Harvey:
I know who Carl Sagan is; Say, do you know who Carl Sagan is? Oops, I almost made a mess,
Almost tipped over my soul:
Say, do you know what I do for you- I mean,
I sleep with my dogs, our four legged souls sniff and leap
Together; and I am not Shakespeare,
But I still don't want to die;
I would like to cool like cooling glass on your window

Sill:

I would like to sit and lie there for you: Do you understand,
Me and my four legged friends would Like to join your menagerie underneath the mountain:
We would like to rest there underneath your Husband and child,
Purple tongued, hobo-shoed wresting for a while,
Like truants, like druids,
If you would let us, to kiss your lips softly for awhile
While he was away,
And then, imbibing what we could,
Loping on down through the forest, one eared,
Without any paths any longer,
With you long in our minds, because our tails or wagging
This way:
And you are famous and with child,
And we will never forget you no matter where we go
Snuffling along our pine-coned ways.

Robert Rorabeck

Kissing, Crimson Shore

Cream corn of foxes underneath the busy airplanes:
This wasn't supposed to be how it would Develop—
Unicorns and mermaids left to their own devices:
I was supposed to sing to her in the middle of
The busy avenues of the pretty wedding—
But now it is too late—
And I am still right here—
Maybe it was because she had entered a fever from Our love making—our very busied love making—
Like the sound a frog makes as he sings:
Calling to her in the rain to come home—
To come back again one last time to sit on her shoulders
As the car drowns with all of the pretty windows
Shut to the last door—
Then won't she kiss me—kiss me, like a Ferris Wheel
Bowing to the shore—while tomorrow—tomorrow—
Won't there be more and more—
Kissing, crimson avenues bowing to the kissing,
Crimson shore.

Robert Rorabeck

Kneeling At The Waterfountains

Can you not tell me which way the rain decided
To go, after it had fallen:
Which side of the slope it decided to take, and which of My muses did it decide to follow—
Even while all of the lamplight has become shaded,
And they wont be selling Christmas trees or Easter Eggs until tomorrow:
But I love you in the morning of this casket:
I kiss your legs and your eight year old breasts:
And we both hold our breasts waiting for the sun to swim up
Tomorrow—both of us knowing that it never will:
There is it's cemetery: there is it's hill:
And it will linger—and it will vanish: poems will have no
Tongue for it—and it will disappear with the animals who have No care for the school yards—and the angels will fall
Away from the paths of its memory—
And then we will both hold hands together, waiting for
The sports cars to emit their own pin wheeling holidays:
Because surely they will, because up from them springs all of Our heavens—and here is the garden of what it means to us:
Kneeling at the water fountains where we care to Say our Amens.

Robert Rorabeck

Knighted By Her Cool Everything

Marriage of twins,
Procession of venal stars:
I tell you what- It can go on forever,
The leaping vegetation of Cold freezers-
The housewives always in stages of undress,
Smelling like the day glow perfumes of Completely annual department stores;
I don't know exactly where and when,
But their life is the light jazz that they Don't even mind,
And they always seem open to suggestions,
And in need of a little help and encouragement,
And a smiling look into their serene but Timid eyes;
And I don't think a single one of them could be Named like -: She is too dark and wonderful
Than any one of them I've seen,
While they sleep and dream all together in houses
Streaming and softly attributing to the
The atmospheres swishing underpower-lines,
You could strike out across unnamed hills
And start such wonderful countries
By -: That's a promise, not a lie:
Why would I be lie when I am a good man,
And all I need is for her to give me a good son,
And we'd strike out right away
And be the first father son team to leave this solar System anyway,
With a girl of a wonderful country on our mind,
We'd sleep all day in the indigo shadow of the broken Down school bus outside of art class
While she breathed her dreams out of life into clay,
And we wouldn't have to sweat the little things
Anymore, the petty wives, the day glow thugs in Sun dresses,
We wouldn't even hear them trying to decide anymore,
Shadowed coolly as we were,
Knighted by her cool everything.

Robert Rorabeck

Knock On My Door This Morning

Alma,

I wanted to see your car parked down my one way street:

When you left this morning after tickling, I whistled

After you,

But then I felt so bad when you followed me out onto the road

In your car,

Because I have been followed by other girls like you not so long ago,

But not as beautiful as you are, Alma.

Back and forth from the sea, like the way I have been sleepwalking:

The waves park and kiss,

The astrologers reminisce, while this evening I watched the Mexican Kids go off and play hide and seek:

Their world is as perfect as cats are pure: Stars hang from the sky of

Chicken wire

Like the tender hopes of Mariposas, and I never want to spend

Another day without you,

Alma:

You are so beautiful and so delightfully sincere:

Your eyes are even bigger than my sister's: I want you to cashier for me

In New Mexico,

So after midnight we can watch the celebrations smoking up through

The clouds,

Tarnishing the soft bellies and wing tips of the airplanes going their Own way,

And I can put my arm over your shoulder and look into you eyes

So deep and untamed and brown as the desert you came across,

Pregnant and embarrassed with Michael to get on a bus

And get here,

And knock on my door this morning.

Robert Rorabeck

Knocking At Their Door

Getting better—all lit up in the Cathedrals triaged against
The high schools
In a tragic garden of paper snowflakes:
Truancies dripping off the cheeks of canals—
Alligators sounding like the recordings of goodbyes and Good lucks of Jewish spinsters:
And there they go, bending knees in their own habitats—
What beautifully inoculated gardens where Sometimes airplanes roar—mouths filled with stewardesses,
With nyloned legs crossing and crossing,
So anxious with entire oceans to explore:
And this their entire wonder lit up like an advertisement
Upon a billboard—something they've tried so hard to Get to—mirrored and mirroring—
Another night to get to the graveyards and canals of France:
There they can last forever—as their children cook
Their microwave dinner—simulacrum—
Hyperboles—obvious and intention exaggeration—
Their orifices wetted for fried chicken—
The unintentional foxes with bags of roman candles
Knocking at their door.

Robert Rorabeck

Know About Love

In the daylight with the school around us—
All of the exciting promises of the fair having left us:
And the fair she kept in my heart
Like a divine illusion is gone in following-
But replacing her a truer muse from parts unseen,
And even further unguessed:
So that old muse, called up by the serpent's fangs
Asking for friendship amidst the corn fields
Will live her life over the canal from
Me:
We will never have to see each other again,
And I will no longer have to cry over her for my Breakfast: I am married—I took a silver airplane over
The avoided earth to find my wife—
And we finally know about love, so what business do
I have anymore with that muse.

Robert Rorabeck

Know For Now

A day behind the curve of now:
A rainbow waiting through the snow: words that slips
Like sleeping minnows beside the prow:
All the kings buried on the pyres that somehow sail
Between the waves,
Like the leaping apathy of a church full of show:
Women silently undressing before a mutating crowd,
Sparrows in orbit tempting the bow:
I wish I was beautiful, but this is all of beautiful that I know for now.

Robert Rorabeck

Know Thyself

New scars jig to the front of the line
Like flamenco dancing:
On good days I'm Sylvia Plath, hardcore,
Yet to be distinguished by the mother-brain of Housewives pulsing in New York City....
I sit and imagine her decked out in red and White plaid like a slender picnic table.
Sometimes I eat watermelons I steal from peoples'
Yards and abutments (I am not proud) . And then
On bad-days storms, shadowy prominence.
I wear a mask and suck in kiln-blown glass
Like stars, and the cockleburs off dogs and dunes
- I am Anne Sexton,
Or Maggie Piecrust- My poetry works thirty percent
Of the time, but I am not genius enough to sashay
Into madness- The worst I can do is buy a house in Suburbia, a pool, two kids and a swing-set;
To see Mickey Mouse from the jewel-green yard
And wave to him over the road kill and Heavy trucks, but I might be entering a doctoral program
Instead to read more Russian authors than Mark Twain:
Then secretly at night I can put on for them,
Plays with paper snowflakes, the gentleness of pantomimes:
All the little girls and their ladies,
Through the divine narcissism I worship while lesbians
Belly-flop in the pool like golden fish,
And I get to know myself.

Robert Rorabeck

Knowing How To Swim

Higher up in the shadows that can hold no tears,
Swimming with the animals
Who have fled likeminded fires;
And ended up in this birth of sanctuary,
Now coyly fawning with different
Species,
And zephyrs- like a hidden spring people go to After they die,
Or after their wife leaves them- to be kindled while Standing in one place,
Or waving like the slenderest grass in the shallowest
Sea, so that the sun
Can touch them and paint down their sides,
Like reasonless teardrops from angels who enjoy
Knowing how to swim.

Robert Rorabeck

Knowing That The Sun Finally Did

All day long the motherf$ckers said
The sun would shine,
And I watched them swish their slick behinds;
But the moon was an apple,
The moon was a lime,
And the city clunked and kept its sweet time:
And the knights rode in,
That's what they did,
While she milked her babies, and she bled her
Kids.
And maybe, just maybe she loved me,
Or that's what she said, or seem to say with
The gist of her forlorn eyes
And all the glory that they hid,
While in my cap and gown I left with the Train tracks, and I hit the skids,
Never ever quite knowing that the sun finally did.

Robert Rorabeck

Knowing They Could Not Escape

Cathedral in a sea of lights—search beams for something
Already there—
It seems they have found this in their hands—
Mad in love, headed home in their car,
Touching brown to copper skin
Underneath the wires hanging of the same color
In the arboretum,
A castanet over the shells of the neighborhood—
They stretched and laid
And sweated—spilling into one another's estuaries
Like trout pearling into the higher dimness—
Until they were forgotten by the entire world
And, resting,
Were gladdened, knowing they could not escape.

Robert Rorabeck

Known To Man

Sick and overdosed from the new day light:
I think I've seen this day before,
Or I'm sure I've heard its traffics,
And its mother on the phone,
But it is not Mexico, it is not home.
The Christmas trees are very hot,
According to Pedro,
But Disney World is just up the road,
The bitter sweet tolls of old girlfriends,
And their enemies,
While all the ancient, oh so ancient Wild life now sits intelligently disregarding
The ochre streaks of dark fairytales,
And they pray for lightning in the cloudless
Day,
And yes it comes right down from the patios
Of ageless giants who have no weaknesses
Known to man.

Robert Rorabeck

Kuiper Belt Blues

High kicking pantomime-
Haven't you yet married your used car salesmen-
They dysfunctional pain in the gut
OF the comely Bible Belt-
I'll never sell a novel, I'll just melt
Down in the center of crowds of screaming girls-
I'll dissolve right into the escaping center of their Expansive world:
And Pluto isn't even a planet, because it revolved with Other things of ice- but Charon is his slender friend
And isn't.... isn't that nice:
My brother already has a job- My sister polished off
His knob,
Because she's a good girl, and puts the holy spell
On four legged animals: Oh hell;
It feels good to feel just a little hung over,
After strange things happen on the autumn equinox
And I'm doing pretty good for a boy who can't Even spell,
Even as all the pretty birds are disappearing-
I think I'll follow them and pick up the jewels they leave.
I doubt they even think to feel how steeped they've Made my pockets;
The mermaid is wading sideways through the sloughs;
I think she's done bathing and beating oysters on her chest-
I think she's finally watching me, hypnotized through the post-
Modern midday rush,
And I seem to recall, half-heartedly- that is a beautiful thing.

Robert Rorabeck

La De Da

How many times should I start new lines,
While thinking of your eyes, or that your gaze is all
I see looking at my words. I smirk to think that I can spell
Well enough to make your breasts hard, to apply
Posthumous valentines day kisses to your lips from these Buzz bombing airplanes, these tap-dancing digit-fritters:
Oh Lord, I don't know what I do, except that I do it often
From my neon sarcophagus I take requests. I don't say anything
But I line them up and shoot them down, and then all night
With the ghosts of my friends we play video-games in the Lulls of the tide. We don't know why George Washington crossed
The Delaware except to get to the other side, and I guess he did-
He was probably trying to get to you- These words are a highway
Of the same thing. They are meaningless without you, but they Have no script, anyways- The stay open twenty for hours
Waiting for you to step in and undress and lay down beside them
And carry on like passionate monsoons of smooches even though
High school is over, but it lingers: It lingers like the oil-slicks
Of a latchkey daycare, and I don't know the words to the song
On your lips, so I'll hum it:
La de da.

Robert Rorabeck

Laces To String

I wouldn't have painted my room—
I wouldn't have gone to China without you—
Now,
Some bird is singing against the bell—
Can't you hear,
It is time to go to school—
Time in its metamorphosis of truancy,
And you are still hear—
Lasting,
Echoes of your steps—like the places where Raindrops fell and kisses touched—
Dimples in a shell—
Wall-less windows where the sunlight tugs—
And airplanes carry stewardesses
Like marionettes without any strings—
But places to go—
And laces to string.

Robert Rorabeck

Lack

All the quiet people move
In ways like weathered trees,
Or stricken, ant-conquered birds-
Like sleeping cats they move,
Just glinting from the hollows and basins
Which have long since been pummeled by Unorganized comets and cooled,
And the world folds over them like Finished greening pages

And the hands finally lay off of them
And resign to other work.

I stood watching my lover cast out
Over the perfect lake,
But I turned and awoke before
She might see.

Robert Rorabeck

Ladies$ In Waiting

Beginning to grow beautiful-
Metamorphosed by my letters and drinking
Habits,
Getting to be frenetic and daubed,
Masked by the penumbras of a stranger:
My face uniformly mottled like an ancient,
Though subversive book of forgotten fiction,
Or the next pseudoscientific hike of impossible mountains-
My real scars now are hidden by my jean jacket:
The hollow between my ribs hurts like sore
Teeth, pulled out from where they took her,
Like a restless, stolen flower;
And now here on the mountain it is raining,
And upstairs the simulacrum is drawing and singing
The few things its French inventor gave it unique copper gears
To draw and sing;
And I have hidden on my person the lichen and pyrotechnics
For the capital of a new bride; and so I sing to her
From my body's convertible wounds- I fill it with my vociferous
Ululations, and the truanities stolen and hidden from School buses;
And from my backyard, though it be endless, I encourage
The hooped zebras to bend down in the mowed grasses and
Kiss the hyenas even though they are breathless from taunting;
And behind this the virgins are getting naked across the Canal, and now they are dousing and laying amidst the holy's
Crinoline,
Just as similar to the eclipsing blindness of a scene;
and they are shivering in their rainy, crippled
Bedrooms, uncrossed with letters awaiting, to be broken
Beneath the waxen seals, like the lips of a queen or one
Of her hyperventilating ladies in waiting.

Robert Rorabeck

Ladies In Waiting

Beginning to grow beautiful-
Metamorphosed by my letters and drinking
Habits,
Getting to be frenetic and daubed,
Masked by the penumbras of a stranger:
My face uniformly mottled like an ancient,
Though subversive book of forgotten fiction,
Or the next pseudoscientific hike of impossible mountains-
My real scars now are hidden by my jean jacket:
The hollow between my ribs hurts like sore
Teeth, pulled out from where they took her,
Like a restless, stolen flower;
And now here on the mountain it is raining,
And upstairs the simulacrum is drawing and singing
The few things its French inventor gave it unique copper gears
To draw and sing;
And I have hidden on my person the lichen and pyrotechnics
For the capital of a new bride; and so I sing to her
From my body's convertible wounds- I fill it with my vociferous
Ululations, and the trauancies stolen and hidden from School buses;
And from my backyard, though it be endless, I encourage
The hooped zebras to bend down in the mowed grasses and
Kiss the hyenas even though they are breathless from taunting;
And behind this the virgins are getting naked across the Canal, and now they are dousing and laying amidst the holy's
Crinoline,
Just as similar to the eclipsing blindness of a scene;
and they are shivering in their rainy, crippled
Bedrooms, uncrossed with letters awaiting, to be broken
Beneath the waxen seals, like the lips of a queen or one
Of her hyperventilating ladies in waiting.

Robert Rorabeck

Lake Tahoe

Sorrow is the next word in the bouquet-
Heart wounded without Reason in the streets of the mortal ling
Grey:
Then you saw us as the exhibit
On the granite of the stone,
Like the dog starving through the weathercock
To fetch
Himself the bone:
And abounding, thunderheads perpetuating the Thirst of windmills all across
The unmentionable crop:
It is how we happen here, faceless looking Down into the indescribability of
Lake Tahoe,
Hoping that our clock will stop- but it doesn't
And the crow sings
(how can she do that) - how can she Describe the unmentionable to the already mentioned
Kings?

Robert Rorabeck

Lakes The Size Of Minnows

Growing where we fall
Beside the glacier, beside the waterfall:
Beautiful foundlings outside of
The ballrooms-
Near the summit, where I guess we have to look
Up at the stars, disgusted:
Above tree-line- our dumb luck:
We can never grow here-
The witches and angels will browbeat us they Come around in their games:
We will turn to midgets, stunted beside the Glacial lakes the size of minnows:
And the girls we want to love we will not Even see- and they will have Children without us:
And you will never think of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Lamenting Over Their Fireworks

There will be a sorrow against the house
As you go back to the shells of Your road,
Barefooted like pornography for the rattlesnakes
Down the lonesome road of Your childhood,
Just as your marriage did: and I remember my Mother almost drowning here—
But she was saved—
Just as last Christmas I was married and saved—
It didn't hurt that I still had arrows in My throat and no other way out—
And my bicycle waits for me down at the edge
Of the verdant canal that some anonymous man
Has mowed again for all of the housewives—
And the otter I have seen before is outdoors
Again, never tasting the lips of the sea—
And the doors of the school are open again,
But they are not kissing me,
As I am vanishing—
And all of the nameless waves, like cathedrals of Nameless tears,
Lamenting over their fireworks—
Collecting over the imaginary orchards that do
Not have to pretend to grow anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Lampshade

It is not worth anything anymore:
What I barter for your patience,
To maybe get a whiff of your skirts before
You go home and begin to prepare a fine dinner-

When I used to drive you to the hospital for Your inherited schizophrenias- How I used to leave
You in the middle of your casual emergencies,
Knowing that you were on birth control, and made
Out of the dead parts of the strongest of your species:

Yes, I used to jog around the neighborhood for her;
I used to speak my poems nearer the Catholic censers of Her swing sets: yes, I used to perform by that moonlit crush
For her,
But you'd just remove the thermometer and laugh,
Uproariously, knowing I was destined for the boyish
Gutter, because I couldn't even spell-

That college is over and scribbled in the chapters of My broadsides,
The scars of my apoplexy and liver diseases-
Never really published, not anymore, but casually stolen
By the bicycle thieves whooping at some rich midnight;

And I can't even spell (I'll admit that) :
This is what I do instead: I lick cheap rum from my drowsing
Fingertips as if they were her nipples,
While I imagine her giving hickies to some blue-anchored biceps of Some ball-playing bouncer:
I check the encyclopedia, I check the thesaurus,
And I burn bouquets for most romantic holidays:
I don't know any other words for it,

But that same university is still made all out of red bricks
And yesterdays- and you are not even there anymore,
Not even in echoes; and you don't even know that I
Still write these poems anymore:
You've got something else on your lips,

While she is still serving the boys coming in through Her doors, kissing them softly after midnight,
But I don't go there anymore, but still
I have no other words for it:

It was I who had the greater fever,
And you were no medicine for it.

Robert Rorabeck

Lancelot's Vertebrae

See the place and time of Lancelot's vertebrae Stand out like a neon sign for
The eyes of women:
Cenotaph in the shape of a phallus, stone angel
Without wings,
Serpentine gallant, a pagan creche amidst the Ferns of his anonymous burial plot-
Fallen aphrodisiac blessed by
The insincerity of its wizards-
There it lies for the elves in its Paleolithic Forest: see it sunken underground in the Immortal caves,
Spumed from its mother of coitus-
An esoteric talisman far greater than Arthur's
Excalibur- waiting for the awakening shadows
Of a falling society to awaken it-
To grow anew its anarchic body
Writhing with the pagan lovers crowned
In the underworld's stalactite monoliths,
Lactating with lurid translucence around its Dieses of photo luminescent bone.

Robert Rorabeck

Landing In The Sea

I am the one teaching these kids through
The afternoons as the airplanes fly away—
It is not an easy song they are singing,
As they go around anywhere because
There is no place to land in the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Languishing In The Sun

Traffic passing over my head- rushing angels,
And I am homeless:
In my cathedral, tomorrow, there will be a flea market:
Can you not remember my name-
Crazy distillations as she takes off her brazier-
Maybe she is your mother-
Maybe she will take you a long way from here-
Even through the tadpoles' metamorphosis-
Even through the echoes of the banshee's high school-
Long and silently haunted tenements
Looking down-
And down- a cradle down there in the river so far Away- a child without a mother- languishing in
The sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Last Days Of A Great Muse

I can hear the highway—the engines of airplanes,
But not the arc:
I cannot hear the sea, nor hear the beating of Your heart:
Fallen away from me, back into your grotto:
You are not a house wife, but what Tragedy:
I would have you bare me like a fruit,
But you have not the basket for me—your husband
Is more equal to you—
Your young children run around you,
Hearts beating like Indians in a game—
My ancestors defeated you and took all of your Lands—and made this country,
But I've given you fireworks, and you've Defeated me anyways

Robert Rorabeck

Last Forever But Not As Long

I have been so long at play
Maybe that makes me a thing of gray:
While your lips are so vibrant
As they sing to your child;
As the ships roll in and the houses gambol:
The fairy tales have flesh:
They are very real, and they last forever,
Just as crocodiles last forever,
And they don't cry,
Just as crocodiles don't cry;
And it makes me weep that I had to move to Miami today,
And you called your man into the fruit market
To open up your Car- Alma;
And it makes me weep that I am not your only song, or that
When I am gone,
Maybe it will be that my bones will be so far displaced from your bones,
The blue prints of the body of your carriage;
And it makes me weep that we have to be so frightened
While the sun flips through the pages of Our days,
Laughing and crying
While the crocodiles, you know, last forever but not as long
And not even smiling.

Robert Rorabeck

Last Night

Water whispers like going to the bath:
It makes its runs through the old steady pipes,
Laid out through the fair skin of the Earth,
Reticulated from porcelain wash basins for Muses, going down to the sea of never mind,
Or I don't care wherever it goes;
And it's early morning and I can still remember going
To college,
Making my rounds through the mists while my Girlfriend was sleeping,
Delivering, delivering while keys jingled sleepily inside
Of doors,
And mother's weeping for their newly turned whores.
The rest of the world was upside down,
Hanging from the rafters of blatherskites; and I just Woke up to the frozen morning decades later,
But I didn't think of you last night.

Robert Rorabeck

Last Of The Conquistadors

A coyote yips somewhere close.
I pause the movie to listen,
And step outside and masturbate.
The new stallion is penned next
To my glass door. Unsettled,
The beast screams and tries to escape
Nearer the females' scent.
Startled for a moment, my eyes focus on
The small points of light above me,
A beautiful map I cannot read.
Before I finish one of them falls.
I feel alive, but soon
I will die as distant obsessions surfs
The beaches of Saint Augustine, trapped
In beauty, gated by men, and the empty
Echoing of high school where her mind
Roams forgotten. She is an addict
With metallic bouquets in her forearms.
I think of her, that warm continuation
Like floral wallpaper at the right Moment feels alive and saintly next to
The porcelain basins. She still serves drinks
And I pretend to be a Catholic walking drunkenly
Through the emptiness of the University
I once attended, trying to find her, yet
Only seeing her twice far down the halls
Many years ago
As my mind becomes disinfected from
The weight of bones and takes off Through the dropping palm fronds which shade the stone benches of resting students somewhere in the center of Florida, where a hart
Stumbles blindly upon four legs before
Kneeling in an unknown space before
The last of the conquistadors.

Robert Rorabeck

Last Thoughts Of A Dream

I wake up breathing the last
Thoughts of a dream,
Like leaving an aspen forest in
The nape of a mountain,
Where I saw glimpses of your Gypsy eyes through the bowers
Of golden branches, as if you were
The strange and eager sunlight in My head, turning about beneath my eyes,
Not knowing how you were attracted
Only that you came with the natural desire,
One of the laws of nature;
You came like the tide orchestrated
By the sterling satellite.
In your opaque gown of evening,
You shifted like the nervous continents
Of earth,
Your eyes fell on me like nectared fruit
From the limbs of an apple tree
Awakening the scientist—
And you did not know you had come.
Awakening, it was as if you had never dreamed,
And you had never been the light in my woods,
But I saw you there, undressing in sleep,
Swimming naked in whispering pools,
Daydreaming naked in yellow motes
In green beds lied out between the trees;
So, even if you forget and tonight you
Fold yourself up like a classified letter,
I know that you will come to my subconscious,
As waves die into the shore,
As moths burn like paper in the kerosene's flames,
I will see your eyes through the golden leaves
Of aspen trees tonight,
As we shall dream....

Robert Rorabeck

Late Bloomers

Late bloomers are on the window treatments;
They are all about the sad long
Movements;
And they are nonsense:
And I don't know which intonation you would Like best,
And I am trapped in the boy's bathroom to weary
To come to class;
And wouldn't it be nice if it started to rain,
The grass was freshly mowed, and they canceled
Physical education,
And made room for us to French Kiss out in the Empty courts without a racket,
Like concrete theatres
Waiting to be filled up at the edge of abyss:
Down to home-grown easements
Irrigated by canals and imported reptiles, with purple
Eyes and purple smiles,
And housewives so careful about their legs all steaming
Upward trapped in their kitchens:
The crenulated pools bleached of childhood echoes;
And later on the great processions of school buses,
Moving into the tardy afternoons,
And us latchkeyed onto a green rug where we fold
Paper airplanes, and
Arrange cowboys and Indians; and pretend my sisters
Aren't really there watching us sleepy-eyed making love.

Robert Rorabeck

Late-Night Tv

Color me green and we will Play
On the back of a match-stick
Pony.

I'll hold your hand
As you read Ayn Rand
In a lightning storm
Lounging in the ash of Pompeii.

Kneeling low,
I'll receive the Bright-hoofed blow,
But will remain conscious
Long enough
To ask you to marry.

You'll answer yes
Because it is best when
You can agree.

Then we'll recline in the Sea;
You'll answer to me
As we watch the Roman
Navy invading Bali
Like a show on late-night TV.

Robert Rorabeck

Latest Season Of Your Paramour

The clock is ticking on the wall no one can hear the single words that are falling outside your open window
snow covers up for murder, the transgressions of door to door lovers who can not know the name of this conscious golden manacles around your wrists,
you lay in the downy bed and wait for him
the latest season of your paramour
the armored peacock of several colors
the precisions of nature fawning in the bedroom's albino cage;
outside the sun will be blinding himself in the snow's basin, though inside you continue unblinking,
your otherwise rosy lips chapped and licked
by the blizzard leaping in the open window
the latest season of
your paramour.

Robert Rorabeck

Laughing And Playing Games

He will come home to you—oh glorious bodies
Absent minded into a church—
But tomorrow he will not buy you ice-cream—
You will have to awaken next to him in the morning and Make that kind of joy that passes for love.
While in two weeks, my very own wife, will fly home
To me tomorrow—Now I want to promise you I
That I have not bought her a new bed;
It is a lude thing, but I will make love to her again and Again until in the bed we once shifted our tongues,
And you once sucked my phallus
And he is coming, and you can say to him:
&quot;Oh we have children, and we will live upon this Forgotten peninsula for what amounts to the Next half a decade while the scientists have to give Up wonder if there is live on Europa or Ganymede or Mars—until the silent unicorns come Home or anywhere—until it is their joy we have to Impregnate and their wishing wells become the songs I
Do not know about,
Laughing and playing games forever because they
Are absolutely sure that they never have to end.

Robert Rorabeck

Laughing At Home

Laughing at the monuments—what does it mean to be Here—in the afternoon,
Sweating as my wife lactates over another child
With nothing ever sold:
Muse up in Ocala with the horses—where she deserts herself,
Thinking of her children and prom queens
And race horses—
And ways to get off the low swings:
I know I will give up all that I have for the girl that I love:
Forgetting about the places that are between us:
Giving up everything for nothing,
Except she cannot unhinge from her spouse: her fate:
She will have other children—
As the hallways will fill up tomorrow—and she will go Home laughing,
And echo over the monuments
With nothing else to live for.

Robert Rorabeck

Lavender Apairy Of Your Honey Eyes

Are you in love with him,
The man you sleep with, with your flag around:
There in the pools of what joy your family has given
To you, Alma- You called him down
From Orlando, doing your good around you,
Brown body driving cars-
Gas of your toys, well I am here too,
Underneath the cattle call of airplanes and all of Their slick venues: I have been selling fireworks Trying to impress you- Well, take me out to
The firing squad so I can bask one last time Underneath the saturated ecstasy- the brown and Lavender apiary of your honey eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Leading Nowhere

Lights as if in a naked carnival:
Taken down from the sky, rivers laughing or falling in love:
Or dying-
The racing of unending beasts that know the hearts and Bosoms of
Airplanes, and creatures that never really did exist:
Maybe as they get down low,
Beneath the ululations of the cars:
Down beneath the happy grooms, and the fourth turns of Winning numbers:
At the level of the snake's parade, the cenotaph's belly:
They find the meaning of the lucky rabbit killed outside
By the nighttime in the rock garden,
When they were not there- and my mother was casting
A spell of loneliness in the carport- and it rained
Across the world,
As there was no light sliding down the soft ribs of the road
That she had stolen away from me,
The angels laughing across the canal, but their happiness
Leading nowhere.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Aero Planes

Headdress of reindeer up in the pullulating
Lambs,
As we've been born in the morning from Another hospital
While the parks spring like
The wetted wounds of unwedded kisses-
As the rattlesnakes sleep:
As the sharks sleep,
Underneath the curtains and blinds of adultery,
As another séance goes through the class,
Until the children spill out like roe
From the uvulas-
And the zoetrope spins: a Ferris wheel if the Mirage of my heart in the desert,
While the poisonous snakes kiss another
Thing,
And the classes continue forever underneath
The mirages of the forever leaping aero planes.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Blurs

I'll be dead
Before I'm handsome

Before my parents know,
The sea will believe me,

Some girl in Oregon
Used to have a crush on me,

Now shore makes love
To wings and wind,

In the classrooms of summer school,
I waited for the teacher to call on me,

And when the jokes went outside
To smoke, I sat where I was and wondered

If she might turn to me and
We could laugh over Romeo and Juliet,

The girl who is married with a polished
Named, a child,

Who I do not know, perhaps she Lives in Loxahatchee, on an alphabetical road,

And works at the cake factories,
And makes love while drinking the nameless absence

The people and places who come and go,
Lining the highways like leaping blurs.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Bon Fires And Ferris Wheels

Steady action in the racehorses- in the broken
Jaws of teenagers,
Or in the words I don't know, as the airplanes fly
Passing by the zoetrope
Of foxes leaping underneath her kitchens:
The alligators seem to be lying all of the time,
Underneath the moon who is Winnowing the waves like an orchard of zygotes
And the windmills are Dazzling
Across the slopes of the aurora borealis-
Like kaleidoscopes straining their necks like chickens
To see her from the window
Where I've been presupposing that she's Been dancing:
This fetish- this allegory lost in the working class
Wilderness across the train tracks:
There she is, and I love her, and my heart is her playground
Of leaping bonfires and Ferris Wheels,
And she laughs in the weighted midway, enjoying all of Those things she's so easily stolen from me.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Through Rings Of Fire

I feel as if the temples lead to nowhere,
Even if the despondent kings are looking up those Stone tits over the hills and estuaries of another bloodthirsty
Forest,
And I have cut my toes bloody across all of the cleft palates of
The rusting though once over eager cars,
Now all up on cinder blocks and cypress knees,
Being smelled upon by the blooming armpits
Of air plants,
While their pornographies steep and mold and never find away
To dissolve themselves,
And down into the headgear of thoroughly evaporated conquistadors,
Quilled by the extinct Indians that their luckier cousins
Did in:
And there in the long stretch of sand dunes where the Australian
Pines go liling like uneasy strangers,
The exegesis of sand lions finally finds them out, and they Clean their homes quite exaggerated,
But without the need for housewives or the tamed urges
For to go leaping through rings of fire.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Through The Snow

Words are liars and they steal from the moon:
Words are worms trying to escape from
Her succulent womb
In the pink willow tree like a bat in a lee,
Like blood in a bloom:
They are the habitual liars of my false immortality;
And now that I am so very far away,
And spilled my green beer all over the floor
Of the RV,
And Pedro is laughing at me:
And I am scarred and lost and can't watch TV-
I just want my dogs, my loving kind dogs:
Oh, how I've betrayed them when all I really Want to do is give up everything and Trip with them to Colorado:
But the words are no good: they are always failing me-
I try to find words to describe my love,
But she just turns away, and doesn't grieve- Too
Beautiful to be described by these pitiful syllables,
But how I remember her,
How I made her from my words, the slick shadows of her
Siamese sister I suppose she never guessed I had Fashioned of her,
As if from an assembly line of careless fears,
While my dogs never spoke a thing; and I think it would Be much better to just run and run
With them, purple tongues lulling, and try to fetch her
In that feral way,
Heartbroken but pure
And leaping through the snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaping Through Their Usual Skies

Airplanes take off like
Medians of rain slicked light,
And you don't have to deny it anymore,
Because it has already become,
This usual labyrinth of cheap inebriation
And days off, and children.
Looking so good next to the swimming pool
Of crenulated seems,
You could be anyone- you could be your Sister,
As the alligators fawn into insouciant dreams,
And good Catholics go to church,
Continuing the axes of latitude and longitude
Of the first conquistadors who Brought them here;
And I should be in school,
Learning better words, scribbling on the makeup
That is supposed to make me beautiful,
But instead I am underneath some shade somewhere,
Down by the encrusted mall of cemeteries,
Having my licks of boos:
I don't even know if you are real anymore,
But you are real enough, I suppose, and I hang your Dun limbs out on my tongue to dry,
As the usual airplanes go leaping through their Usual skies.

Robert Rorabeck

Learning How To Fly

Down at the high planes of nothing-
Well, at least we are starting somewhere, as the river
Sings and claps
And wets the hungry mouths of blue birds,
Meaning something special down in the fairyland canyons
Where my father gets lost
And becomes a new man- learns of dreams of wild horses,
And loses all of his money but not his lovely
Rose colored wife:
My mother, who entertained me with blue whales,
And ran with me to see the edge of the canals
Where the tadpoles and minnows
Were fishing for themselves, and the cats played and taught
Their purring, fire-like young to dance
In the shallows that they were too young to fear:
The sky an untouchable brilliance where the women who Were yet to become my loves were still learning how to fly.

Robert Rorabeck

Leave Me Behind

Mailboxes are resting like pegs in
A game,
Their tongues undone or bundled up,
Stolen copper painted red,
And I cant wait to get back home again,
Into your streets, down your rows
Where old friends are jubilantly popping
Up like cherished spikenard in the Armpits of air-plants;
And there is the little swingset where we Used to suppose,
While even then I thought of my better muses,
Women who could run on all fours
And never stopped to take a breath or hand out
For lunch,
Who could suckle two to four young against Their chest all the time keeping at a steady gallop,
Girls who grew taller on rainy days,
And disappeared with the blanketing patina
Of light bulbs of Drunken carnivals:
I don't know where exactly those ones have gone,
But they're the real reason why I've come back
To our old stomping grounds-
Not to look you up or to take you out to eat,
But to smell them out again,
Their perfumes like sinful filigree, strung out and Dragged through the clouds,
Their scents spilling demurely leaving such an Exotic trail from where they didn't even think
To leave me behind.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaving Behind

Emptied by my occupations, as by your thoughts:
This is how I dream out wounded on the perfect field,
Like the yellowest of birds with a broken wing,
Fallen from the roof of your house, fallen past the gold fish:
The little silken cadavers of your purses, and your cat;
And maybe I have dreamed of girls in Colorado,
Or girls just taking off, but I have always thought of them alone
In a tincan house upon which it is always raining-
And last night the thunder hit so hard that it made the world rattle;
And I couldn't breathe because I knew you were taking refuge with Your man;
And my place is a sunken place, like a bowl underneath a rock
Where the rains come gently, muffling, suffocating too the modern Wonders that you are always leaving behind.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaving His Country

Scars and you are there- gods of apple trees
And dulled spears:
I call for you, and you call for me,
And come home to watch your youngest sister's Communion
Down the cataracts of the fort:
Down where there used to be conquistadors
And grizzly bears
Getting scarred and getting dizzy- where there
Used to be bags of fireworks-
Pilfering, and now the airplanes fly, jump,
And leap-
In that order so they can brag- their bellies filled
With silver,
Cheating death- leaving his country,
Only to land in the conventions dying in other Similar worlds.

Robert Rorabeck

Leaving The Sky

Up in the wounds of tall trees, sent up like embers
From her kicking feet: she is dancing atop the Spines of Rattlesnakes and pinecones- making love to something
Bigger in the woods:
Mexicans are laughing in the next room to
Their dead brothers;
And all of the forest burns with whistling tongues stretching
Out across a green fairgrounds where the bears
Lay sleeping with butterflies upon the like jewelry,
And airplanes like angels leaving the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Left Foot Blue

Pals in opposing sexes
When in agreement
Slap lips
Tongue twist
I've seen mommy and Daddy doing this

If I fed it a quarter,
Would you come alive
And give me
Your tongue
Through the bars
At the zoo?

Robert Rorabeck

Legion

There are serpents in these trees
Who wear laceless shoes and legless appetites;
And swear that they know the question to
The answer of popular game shows;
How they rustle and slither so, and coil like
Reckless fathers around the trunks of our Christmas Trees, even while the naked bodies of soup kitchens
Press together once they close: One is busty,
And the other well-hung, and they cling together
Tongue-ily, and well endowed, and I swear I wish
To know nothing more about them,
But leap the way the mule-train goes carrying off the Gold in gunny-sacks, and the spices and the meat;
They are taking us all up to the vermilion clouds
Herded together like rumbling swine on the verge of Some damned precipice: I will join them in my time,
Because I have been cast from in between them;
And I will pound the tent-stakes surely into the ground,
Even though I have no body or worth, nor do I notice
Yet how the cops patrol me, caroling in two colors,
Asking for 25% off- They will get their due, or I will not Sing, up here in the sky, with the nimbus, and the Furies Whistling.

Robert Rorabeck

Less Than A Memory Of A Shineless Beacon

All of the stellar hubbub passes above us
At work,
Ephemeral necklace,
Heavenly spokes over our grinding shoulders,
Eyes chalice to the ground,
Expecting the motions
Pre-ordained—
We have stopped waiting for the miracle
Of recreation.
Placed into a fit of numbers,
Our days given to a society of succubi
And we linger,
Souls of the prune
While the heavens go floating- jobless-ether—
The tits of the mountains blacken
And shrink into speculation,
School children like ants through the passing
Days—
Latchkeys into the vulpine caves
Of the woebegone canyons-
And the blind goddess in the shrinking stars
Is less than the memory of a shineless beacon.

Robert Rorabeck

Less Than These Things

Days in long shadows rejoice,
You have dressed yourself anew in long shadows;
Every morning the same trees grow like colorful bones,
Like bad children,
But by the same measure of eye-sight the shadows grow too,
And then shrivel:
Each day a new dress of coldness under the bodies,
Elongating our sad truancies and yours:
And there they are the shapes without bodies, the dresses
Of churchyards and graveyards,
Who have nothing of their own, and are gone before morning,
But new ones will grow alarmingly quick by the time your Old nose sniffs this world again:
They will pop up like disembodied orchards and kindergarten
Satellites under the orbs of justice;
They will have whatever they can manage to steal, though
They want for nothing;
And the bodies pass over them just as plum as can be,
Never once pondering that soon even they too will be less than These things.

Robert Rorabeck

Let Forever Begin Tonight

The finishing lines rely on ejaculation;
And I was hoping not to have to rely on your name,
-,
But now I am pregnant, and looking at property near
You-
Maybe I will come by you in five years after you
Have cut your teeth on the emerging pulp fiction of
The men guarding your tomb with fast weapons,
But otherwise, I hope you don't mind if I move nearby
You singing my rummy tunes, maybe even spending Afternoons with you while my ears are burning
From rumors, but otherwise your wines might be too Expensive,
And how many daughters might you have by then,
I don't even know, but I love by you, - -,
As even now I'm half asleep in my basement meadows,
And I don't even mind that I use your name,
That I could be challenged by more propitious knights-
I am done with school, but not the darker knights-
If I had followed you more closely for so many more years,
I might be closer to you, but now I must apologize for the Fumes of my classes, that I might move nearer to you by so many Years, but it would just be to stick my nose in the bouquet of Your wines, to give you the moneys that you so well deserve,
To help support your industrious husband and all your Children by him I can't even suppose: this is my late- night
Graveyard by you- I haven't yet hiked in the elf horn range
And my cheap liquor helps me repose and say that I love
You by the spells of inexpensive liquor,
Correcting my changes to where you live now-
And I love my darling, misspelling in my plagiarisms
In the playground of this dark listen: I love you forever,
And let forever begin tonight.

Robert Rorabeck

Let Her Know

The city dissolves; the planes are played out; and I want to develop
A potbelly for Thanksgiving:
There are so many questions which I still need to ask Alma;
And I already love her children: Her children who are so carefree that They can still smell the ghosts in their bedrooms,
And the rain comes like far away mothers, both soothing and frightening
Them;
And I hope to god that I never have to be with a white woman again,
Those petty whores try to claw their fingernails up the detritus of A professional world:
I hope to a god I'll never believe in to have Alma; and after all of this Liquor wears off I'll have to stare at my face alone again;
And I know that I will be selling fireworks and sleeping in celibate hotels
Save for Alma;
Alma in a week, or Alma right now, but certainly all my dogs will love
Me, even though I have done them tremendous harm;
And it is a good thing that I am not driving a car right now, and that there Isn't a mirror present:
I have a house waiting for me point two miles from the intercostals and
At the end of my month it will be mine and filled with my liquor as with my Dreams;
As my mother comes in through the fiberglass door and says that it is Really windy out there, but I am about to set out anyways; Because Alma is very beautiful, and I am very eager to go ahead and let Her know.

Robert Rorabeck

Let Me Have Stars

I write fairly often about the stars,
And other places I will never go, because it
Sounds beautiful to my ear,
The way a mountain lion mews like a newborn
Child, its distempering drool,
The naked mastication out in the early morning
Glade, the conclusion to a crisp novel-
And the panacea for my lonely scars, the evidence
Of cardinal sins drawing me away in a high mountain
Bedroom to read my books,
To say my little things to an open room-
That I should have never gone to college and so become An uneasy murderer who, fumbling cuts off first his Foot and then his toe; or to say now, the decapitations of Soldiers line the pages sent back from the protozoan
Attempts of publication in France, like the spurious flumes of sex:
They sing this will not do, young man, this will Not do, but you are looking more beautiful than you've Ever been, which is still rather complicated. I could be Thirteen or thirty, and there would still be too many ex-girlfriends
And grandmothers- This I know, and I could volunteer
All day for it, going around and around in a red fire-engine hosing Things off, saving cats; but what would they have to say for Me by the end of it, but a little plot, and a little stone:
Instead, let me sell flowers, to put baby's breath to her bosom-
Instead, let me have stars, the distant bodies who have already Died- Who seem to look down upon me, but have already turned Away and gone into their lover's bedroom- So far away,
I could never know them, but to attempt to kiss their burry lips
Is an attempt to prove the art; Childless, I will climb up on the Roof and count them and fold dollars bills along the horizon,
And slip them between their garters of dusk and twilight, and Say here is another thing I can never touch
But is real.

Robert Rorabeck

Let Me Hold You Dear To Me

If I had a better vocabulary,
I could call you in by a special whistle,
By a single word undress you with the meaning
Only you would know:
But there is only this, half hazard lines like
A crumbly paper-airline shot from the diabetic fingertips
Over a roaring forest-fire where Everything dies;
But in the spring, flowers: more and more flowers
At your doorstep,
And bottles espoused from the sea; if you want to Pretend to be a mermaid.
Anything you want, I swear-
I could learn to write better things for you,
Learn the names of whole gardens worth of flowers,
And grow old in our secret diseases.
We could pick up Victorian afflictions. I could run
My fingers down your chalky bodice. Heck, I can think of a million
Things to do to you more brilliant than any page ever written
From a man to his lover,
If you only give me a second to suck this paper cut,
Which reminds me of breastfeeding,
And to visit the grave of a dead poet in Bellefontaine;
I am digging her up, because she has whispered something to Me I promised never to tell,
But I will give it to you if you close your eyes and let Me hold you dear to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Let Me Show You

Do you make love in familiar rooms,
On the backs of tug boats, cusped in smoky flume?

Your beauty is so easy to love, you are like a ride.
Selective in your romances, you still turn around hard as You approach your zenith, give resolution to gravity-

I couldn't say how it is done. I have never been with A woman like you, a sunny sky in a child's pastel.
I've had one real girlfriend and nine others, indiscriminately
In places of cheap mortgage along the major avenue
Where I and so many filthy others grew up under the pines?

But, I suppose, it must take a gallant man to swing you,
Or a fool, as long as he is appealing and you are tight-
I wish I had a bit of liquor to float down the highway tonight,

As you are in your room dolling up for your engagements,
I am on my sightless bed with my dogs, dreaming of walking
Away lost in some cheap Floridian suburbia,

Where I can go around in circles until I lose my mind,
Turn down the avenues of twilight, and approach death who will Take me in kind, and he will ask me of you and how you were,
And I can only shrug and say, "I never knew. I never knew."

Perhaps, then, he would be so kind as to respond, "Let me show you."

Robert Rorabeck

Letters From The Mailboxes

Clouds the color of young gods
Leaping or breathed from the lips of a plum eating Dragon
Like mist rising from a petit lake from a land where
The castle is missing
And the lovers are left in peace: here they are,
Foxes tangled with tomato vines dripping with Destructive sport.
They look as if they could be cousins of truants
Eagerly lost on a road this is hard to fool,
Kidnappers of tortoises who cry into the wombs of Limestone where the stolen bicycles live,
And the august pines remain swaying, swaying
Coated in the unbelievable memories of Katydid
The nurse maids of paper dolls and rusting cars,
As tadpoles wait in the ovens of canals
And the monarchs return from the south to The north making graveyards out of Estuaries along the way
Their children like their own paper tears unfolded
Out of chrysalis and made to Walk the zoetrope of dusk, their magnetisms just
The whispers of lost girls vanished like missing
Letters from the mailboxes of their yards,
Who manage to find the wet throats of the lovers
Who knew perpetually where they belonged.

Robert Rorabeck

Letting The Enemy In

All of the families such as these vultures,
Picking and eating the apples of over ripe flesh:
Fallen down from the three fold tree
Of kidnappers;
And it is raining, removing the road there and
Rediscovering the seashells:
Maybe three children in the miniscule yard making
A pact of some kind,
And then running away: running away or being
Kidnapped, but either way
Never coming back again:
Taken like metamorphosis back into the sky,
Like raindrops that I could have sworn were never shed,
Until all of the moats just evaporate
And the tearless mothers open the floodless gates
With open breasts and opened arms
Letting the enemy in.

Robert Rorabeck

Letting The Enemy In'

All of the families such as these vultures,
Picking and eating the apples of over ripe flesh:
Fallen down from the three fold tree
Of kidnappers;
And it is raining, removing the road there and
Rediscovering the seashells:
Maybe three children in the miniscule yard making
A pact of some kind,
And then running away: running away or being
Kidnapped, but either way
Never coming back again:
Taken like metamorphosis back into the sky,
Like raindrops that I could have sworn were never shed,
Until all of the moats just evaporate
And the tearless mothers open the floodless gates
With open breasts and opened arms
Letting the enemy in.

Robert Rorabeck

Liberty

The future we will create
Is up in arms,
Because you are not writing:
Kissing the masculine lips,
Like pressing inescapable bars in the zoo-
You don't have anything to say at all?
I suppose you are too busy in
Your making-love room;
You go singing into a cavalry of Muscular dreams unafraid....
But I don't know you,
I don't know you- that's for sure,
But our family album is in the sky.
Look, and our little children will go skipping by-
I say- On the reservation,
The natives are restless, drunk,
And flee bitten, but they know you:
The one cloud in the sky is Where you hide behind,
But with their lances they call down rain,
They make you cry;
The oldest fathers are holding a revival
In the white-lung tent in the desert of New Mexico:
The ladies there are the only pure oasis,
And you inhabit them, and make them speak
With peach fleshed tongues, rich with
The oils preserved in the canning earth-
I sell fireworks off Route 66:
The semis honks as they go by,
But they flight the red, white, and blue country
With you on their mind,
The long distance inebriation we all can Celebrate at any time: I light the fuse,
And then step away with a beer in my hand,
And looking up, I watch you take off into the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Libraries

When it is easy, I wake up and there is a Fog on the hills, and the stones lay sweating in The grass,
And north there are great holes above the earth,
And she has cut her leg while washing
The baby,
Perhaps, if coupling, the animals could escape
And row into the breathless reservoir
Where those of us who are yet fully grown
Are swimming,
But before that needs to be peace made with
The other tribes, and the old houses need new glass
And families,
Where the angels coo, then for birds it is time
For dinner, and then to scavenge the brightly discarded,
To gather together and form the nest where
Their eggs will speckle,
And, incubated, the librarian wakes up from where He has stamped his forearm in drool,
And listens to a cavalcade of raindrops, as a single Dreary car turns about;
Finding himself alone in a mouthful of weeping voices.

Robert Rorabeck

Licking Your Wounds From The Sky

Liquor is the loneliness in the sun,
After you've forgotten your name or
How many times you've been here-
Hearing the classroom echoing, who reads you
Anymore- Who cares to gather you up before
The tide comes in, hurrying with all its lines to Erase and take away,
And you are doing it again, pretending to be so proud,
Trying out the words of joy which seem to bloom
Spontaneously only to be revealed as things who aren't
No longer there- The bad grammars of her Womb, the young men you fought for and stole their Cars and sucker punched when they weren't looking-
When the scars taste so good, like fortified liquor,
And you're pretty certain now to be one of their Tribe, imbibing the migrating spirits like stewardesses
Metamorphosed in the tresses of debutant kites, Really now falling over yourself to catch up with those Shadows of those who are no longer there, or were Never there to begin with until the forts and stores are Closing, your dreams are rude and patronizing,
And you don't know who you are where to go,
Out of ice cream and liquor, the sun a persistent thing
Licking your wounds from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Lies From A Busied Restaurant

Doorbell to these classes:
Rusted hinges over the silent creaks of Salt:
Whose eyes to you cry from:
And from what heavens do you fall
Down from.
Saying you loved me- lies from a busied
Restaurant,
And the daylight fell upon your brown
Shoulders,
As you thought to forget about
My broken body of Broken kisses: the busses faltered
Through the mottled pornography
Beside the eaves-
Until it became just as still as Christmas-
And, just as lucky for you,
The angels forgot to take you to school.

Robert Rorabeck

Light In A Cup

Quiet, quiet
Slow to seep
Weeping oil
Go to sleep
Early morning
Is waking up a
Slice of orange and Scrambled eggs
Words are tokens
Nests of mouth
Crèche of tongues
You can't see
A hummingbird's
Moving wings,
A spirit across the Table perfectly laid
Drinks the flowers
Ripples shade;
Your eyes a napkin
Sop it up,
Azure outfits
Light in a cup.

Robert Rorabeck

Light That Has Already Dissapeared

Rainy monuments without summer time,
Even after the busses have unloaded their cloud-like
Children
With their open ended daydreams and scabbed
Knees like naked terrapin
Back into trailer parks- and now they're home,
But so what:
They're home, and in that easy shade, like
Sardines,
Wishing for pornography or fireworks: there they Linger,
Hoping for fried chicken, and the earth of their Parents to somehow find them-
To bathe them underneath the plastic flowers
And crèches,
Until they are somehow renewed in that soft
Though inflexible light that has already disappeared.

Robert Rorabeck

Lighting Off Firecrackers

Wound of a Ferris Wheel-
OF another low dive to kiss the earth of Scattered candy,
Where her eyes are all made up by tears:
And my neck is tattooed with Gung-ho-
Drinking the rum of the British Navy, and Trying to persevere beneath the Flight paths of the constellations,
But very soon I will be sleeping
Next to that ever living nothing who grounds
Us all like the tiniest of dreams slipped
Out of the atmospheres of plastic
Bags-
And loves us in her little ways: the ways in which She loves a brontosaurus after we've
All been kicked out of the garden-
And now there is a riot of our love,
As down the street it is very empty but I can hear all of them lighting off firecrackers....

Robert Rorabeck

Lightning Woman

This lightning woman works on gasoline.
See here,
This is where you fill her up, right
In these lips; they are adjustable,
And come in any color;
Her tank is good for twenty gallons,
And her breasts for two gallons more,
To get you that extra mile;
But don't overload her or she'll spill!

The lightning woman can kill two chickens
A second,
And she is mad transportation-
If you start out on her,
You can start out in snow and wind up in sun,
Or visa versa, as is you wish,
But keep her out of the graveyard weeds,
Or she'll bog
Happy man....
Happy man, now, I can tell-

This woman here, my man,
She sells herself, and you can do other things too,
But she don't cook;
She don't do that, my son-

Careful now;
If you break her, she's yours,
But I can see you want to buy her anyway-
There isn't a model I haven't sold;
Used to sell Bibles, and edible tattoos,
Now just her,
And I always will....
This one here, with the vermilion stems and Peacock eyes,

(We can put bolts on her ribs,
And tickle them when you are alone,
After we are done)

She's good for the road at a gallop-
Heehaw, boy can she leap traffic too,
But it will take everything you got to own her,
And more, son, and more,

But she's unafraid, I can guarantee that-
She'll peel a rattlesnake or track a bear,
But after she's done with that scene,
You'll have to deal with the mess....

And did I mention she can kill two chickens a second?

Just remember to keep her out of
The graveyard weeds, or she'll bog.
Good, now I see that we've come to an agreement:
Which of these lips shall we put
On her kiss?

Robert Rorabeck

Lightspeed Champion

Make love before the coffin
Or a waterfall,
For here are the cleats of low oxygen,
Where the gods have been competing;
Her green breasts lose color,
Peeling back her gardens, only the Petulant clouds can look into her eyes.
They are the latest in the evening,
When the deadly thunderstorms unfurl
Their insouciant venom.
Look at how we are climbing, way past
Our mother and father,
So far out swimming, they have no
Hope of saving us, the enfant terrible,
Loving our strongest professors,
In docile elegance from the back of the classroom.
See how our eyes portray our feelings,
Like spears piercing the side of the mightiest,
Then something more unremarkable,
A colloquial exercise, painting her eyes-
If she looked back, but she shoots straight as an Arrow; past the garden, and the harrow,
Becoming a particle of the light, she slides
Off the banal, and into a wavelength, a sonar's
Echo; we try to place her amidst the constellation,
The lucky bedfellow,
A nymph in Saturn's garden, her lip's mollusk,
A seashell's dusky echo; the footprints lead into the Waves, and the day is ending its path,
For into the quieted element we cannot follow,
Though we must pine from our bones, our blood must Bellow,
Though there is no promise she will return upon the morrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Barrett

Little tenements filled
With boxes of wine
And, having contended,
Lets have another
Revolution they say
Right after the next-
And they bundle up to stay
Warm in-
They won't waste electricity-
The dragon people
Reconstructing the avenues of My structure-

As an airplane flies
Down to carress her hair
Like a barrett-

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Beautiful Wish On A Beautiful Birthday

Words underneath the palate of a grave,
Crawling like worms, even while there is nothing left
Upon the bones to save;
And quietly the river dreams even through its most Uproarious streams:
And fish go that way: they can only go this, and the night gets Older until it gets younger,
And then it perhaps gives births to births and deaths:
And the children come out through the open mouths of yards,
Who are all of one color, Alma's favorite color;
And when I am near her my heart feels that it can stop vagabonding
And enjoy the delightfully brown midways of the fair;
And it is enraptured, and holding her hand I am without a care:
And the lonely night is just a trifle as long as I can awaken
And find Alma like a candle, like a beautiful wish on a beautiful
Birthday awaiting me there.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Beautiful Disease Of Butterflies

Alone into the echoes you could not enjoy
Giving yourself the pushup completion for the empty fans
Who have no recollection of the ghosts evaporating from
The baseball diamonds,
While you were too busy calling up the numbers from
The graveyards of the plastic flowers:
But somehow all of the seahorses seemed to be able to Resolve the problem—
And so she filled herself up in the memories of the sunlight
Of the movie theatres,
And into the beautiful gestures in the sidelines and the pews
After the penultimate numbers matriculated into
All of their mazes and all of their labyrinths—
And she came home alone—vested in the fantasies of Her stagecraft:
Her children as brown as embers—while other emotions gave Up on the spotlight of fireworks on the other side
Of the world—
And all of it turned, and turned—until there was no single Memory—and it became ultimately a sideshow
The divested itself of all of its corsages—until it was inevitably Responsible for nothing—and still it believes
In the constructions of the hemispheres that held no believes
In daylight—and turned itself into a priceless sculpture held for The briefest of nothing without the moon glowing beside Or next to the river of nothing—
And all of the astronauts sat next to the Mississippi and kept
Their breakfasts to nothing—
Like a beautiful disease of butterflies—even though there
Was not enough shows to cover the same theatres that they kept
To hold over—like playgrounds lit by candlelight upon the other side
Of the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Bleeding Painting

The cubby holes lay open-mouthed until they Are filled with the shed skins of children,
Like in a chrome world suddenly decorated for Christmas;
And it is quite beautiful, to pay the meter, and spend one's Life open throated, watching a world bedecked by the sea
That seems to be burning off its whimsies into the sky:
How the palmettos and all of their cousins speak in the winds
Behind me,
All the unchosen avenues branching away: That life is a vineyard
Of pulsing needs and shooting pulsars,
While the engines rev, and the kittens purr; and there might Have been a time that she would have laid down beside me,
Like the ocean burning into the sky, like a bleeding painting strung
Out before where I had parked my car.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Blue Marble

Professors in their day dream of gloomy weather,
And these are excuses for them to read books in the library's Rookery:
And even I like sliding off my bicycle once in awhile
To go into the cool of a movie;
But my mind has a tendency to dally over you, to slip even Further away:
And I put the dolls of you into the playrooms of wherever
I am, and I have fun over you:
Maybe I haven't seen you in a decade, but what undying sport
You are:
Maybe it is that you only kissed my neck, or no part of my body
At all:
Maybe I just sat next to you during a pep rally before you got Bored of watching me shoot pop rockets
Over the student parking lot; but being that I have no pride
At all,
I still am like a dying humming bird trying his best to imitate
The chesty pullulating of a song bird,
Going down into a mine where I picture you immortally perfected:
And I am up on a brightly lit stage with a harpoon stuck
Into my side, but do not chide me:
Haven't you heard, scientists have found life miles beneath the artic
Ice, shrimp and palominos,
And the greatest bluest operas that I have been defining congratulated
By Frankenstein's monster on his sojourns of ice-fishing:
And I have finally come to the surface like a marble cannon booming,
Like Ganymede or one of her lovely sisters,
I orbit you like a tiny moon,
Like a blue marble who is somehow impossibly winning whose imagine ripples unobtrusively
In your eyes, and thus I minisculely bellow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Bosomy Obstacle

Softly embittering bruises on my flesh,
Each as unique as a snowflake,
As a rattlesnake's kiss- living underneath the diesel
Paths of airplanes,
Permitting to the horticulture of this un heavenly
Place:
With and without daylight and sunlight and moon beams,
As the waves rise and breathe softly in crèches and Wreathes in which the mermaids cultivate
Like a bosomy obstacle course, but no one believes
Of them anyways- which only
Increases their worth.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Butcher's Flower

Somewhere beautiful overflows with airplanes:

Her hair is made up for date night,

And cottage cheese is pressed to her lips like wet baby's breath:

And the hours of her youth are vibrant, loving not a soul,

But as clear as a water fountain reserved for privileged

Men:

And she can step out into a world and make it her high school:

The song birds and mariposas will nest in her hair and try to Gather pollen off of her, as the avenues continue by her feet

Where the grass is perfect and almost blue and rather crocodilian:

Her wrist that sways before the parked buses seems to swim

Against the savage tongues of echinopsis and she can remain

There all day long, her worshippers resonating off of her

Like waitresses in restaurants all a wreck running up and down

With all those legs, making dollars to pay the bills is easy:

Like a butcher's flower she kissed my neck.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Careless Bumblebee With Its Honey

It rains before autumn- This is what I've Been thinking of, walking with my dogs,
Handling curious sticks over the terraces of stones:
I can hike any mountain before her man gets off
Work,
And I would buy her some flowers as a reflex,
She knows, but she is not my consumptive muse;
And I am busy on this lonely pitcher's mound Again, swirling the liquor of pirates around my Mouth,
Checking for cold sores, seeing her lighthearted over
The horizon relaxing in a weekend of bathtubs;
And I ought to fly right over her and begin my foreplay
With Baudelaire, or take her to a dinner show
And eat her out, making her feel each rose thorn,
The mammalian virtues of a slender reflective night;
And even alone, I am trying to do better, to get the right Mixture of liquor and wherewithal to spring inside her Something eternal- That will turn into noir, with the Rain falling over the abandoned swing sets, over each
Of the town's dimmed churches and lit graveyards,
To see where we are going into a sort of private amusement,
The extensions of space into exclusive clubs where
The greasers and tomboys have given up and are dancing,
And each yacht out in the water has a secret knife,
Just an esoteric talisman of my doing to open her hinges
Like an envelope to read inside, dripping every word onto
Her body like a careless bumblebee with its honey.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Cenotaph To A High School

All of the pleasantries
Of a studio in a drunken garden-
Having a honeymoon before
A marriage
And a woman in love with me
Who cannot see my scars
As the words roll through
The inebriated feeling of a skeleton-
Like a cenotaph to a high school
Where he could never seem to fit in-
And another evening lays down her cards
And goes to kiss the sailors in the Movie theatre
That moves beside her like a pitted ark
And gives back to her all of the animals
She cannot see in the darkness,
Begging for things that last forever,
But in the morning will mean nothing to her.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Child Delighting

I seem to be partaking in a sea that has no memory—
And this is my last day in Shanghai,
And I have been finishing up a bottle of white wine
Held over from our wedding:
I am not trying to appease you—
My wife is already married and is going to have my child.
The world I will go back into tomorrow is a world
Of ghosts and phantasms—
A desert of Disney World, and maybe I will think about
The things I once almost had with you,
Touching down upon the cold facts of that concrete
Tarmac,
But truthfully my heaven is already with me,
And she has forgive everything that I am,
And everything I have already done—
And you are just a well the unicorns drink from Hypothetically,
Though I will come back to you like the times of
A merry-go-round, stealing little glances like a child
Delighting in things that will soon become mundane.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A City With So Many Stars

A field fills up like a city with so many stars
Lost from the bedrooms of spaceships,
But these words just become latchkeys for foxes
And homophones—
Words that sound the same to the conventional franchises
That don't have to heal until they take a dive:
I am the product of the fast food mountains—
I am so deformed, when I pee it is from all of My joints and my eyes:
I am a Frankenstein burried up from roses:
I used to teach at your local high school,
I used to dig up both of my eyes to use
To bore into you who have beautiful daughters,
But not alone:
There are still racecars,
And beautiful water falls in Tennessee:
Let is pretend that they are falling from the water fountains
Of the rural high schools
And I do not have to proofread this poem before Going to sleep
Or drinking anymore of this white liquor:
Tomorrow, the cars will move back and forth across
Shanghai like ants,
And we will have very little else to prove Except that I am not beautiful and you will most Certainly not love forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Compass's Signal

Even catastrophes go to sleep, they go:
This way they go like an exhausted sister from a deflated
Sorority:
She go, and the night becomes a womb as if the space
Inside the pillow beneath your head: She dreams of one slick
Sword golden,
Floating like an investigator, like a party favor:
Like this sharp explorer bursting cannons overhead:
She dreams, she dreams of all the vanished swing sets,
Of all the sweet thrilling sweetish things she wished I'd Said,
But I've never said: and pinball games and cabarets and all of Our children putting softly to bed up in their bedrooms
In their upstairs canopies,
While her golden sword floats through that fog of space and she Tries to remember and not to remember
All of those lonesome days of lumberjacks and hunting boys
Of footballs games and smoke signals
Like thrilling ghosts over the mowed lawns and estuaries of all of That immobilized space;
And of the flowers I'd bought her she can't remember or she Won't: Now there are orchards and orchards of heavenly flowers speaking
Like opening presents on Sundays underneath that vessel
Like a compass' signal pointing to her throat.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Conquistador Atop The Roofs Of Cars

The midway isn't even here: perhaps it is going overboard:
The very fair has disappeared,
And the only pilots are cursing the addictions of weathervanes:
The landing strip burns in blue gas,
All of its brides corpses, alluring- their supersternal notches
Diademed with the very vapors that they tear;
And I end up spent like a conquistador atop the roofs of Cars: a shell,
A cenotaph- a vague monument about to disappear, while
The school children rhyme in chalk, and eventually their lions
Jump through so many rings that they return home,
And lie on the kitchen table and on the floor,
In their mouths carrying the carcasses of saltwater tears
And watermelons- and the delicate fingers of latchkeys dab there,
And saturate their hungers from the milking tear ducks
Of the feral natures who briefly became trained to do all that they Could for them.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Crocodile's Reputation Down The Military Trail

Against the borderline,
I try for her pulse, warmth to my jaundiced cheek;
She is still alive,
But it is so dark from where they are fleeing,
Maybe she isn't even there;

Maybe she already went away,
And joined the others' chorus....
Living in his house at the edge.

Probably not,
Already strung out like a kite in power lines;
The material electrocuted,
She hasn't yet removed herself from the unsuccessful dream,
Lost by the hands which are now weeping
In the mobile home as the rain pellets,
Rusty and corrugated,
And the rabbits scurry;

How can I say that she even is,
Just the open wasteland where her eyes once met
Beneath the foundation of abused toys and sick dogs,
My eyes in the classroom at dusk;
The trigonometry of awful lies,
It meant nothing, not that it ever was....

But property lines of retired patriots,
Rented sex of dusty infestations,
A flag of grout and color blindness,
The fences of rusting locomotion,
Blindness and scurry... In a straight line
All the way out....

Her bus fled through the turnaround before mine,
And went home; Chasing her like a rube,
I never saw her again, for she left this land,
Partook in the cannibalism of the dark mob of Silenced across the wall.

I wanted fame and her body like a door knob turning,
Everything read for eternity, like a crocodile's reputation....
Down in the cool tanks of the disabled tourism
Of humid refuge, where the egrets sh$t marking white

Sheer silence, but at the core the shrieking of the end,
The cadaverous breathing and then the escape,
The silhouettes inside the holes,
The coffin floating over the power poles;
The sexy levitation of the cheapest mirrors,
The ending shrieks of princesses and nails being pounded in the wooden palms;

This poor who live over there,
In the removed chapters of weedy beauty,
The language which tastes foreign in my mouth;
Her sad but hungry eyes the blindness,
The outline of the darkness that no one can ever see again....

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Dawn Cluttered With Song Birds

Snowing over the bodies of the forest
That are a nest for
The wolves and the white hares- and my memories
Of this- before you are born-
When you are not even a pearl in a clam,
Or a tortoise in her shell
Underneath a lonely school bus down hill from
The graveyard:
But this remains your place, in the high basins
Aspiring to be stewardesses-
Or angels in their skating rinks- Someone has stolen
The moon,
And put it in a bouquet, but you haven't arrived
Yet- My parents are coming,
But they do not bring you gifts- They will sleep
In my house, and I will dream of you,
Though the fire-pit is empty,
And your eyes, like a dawn cluttered with song birds-
Have yet to even open.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Delicious Plague Of Roses

Aloneness with the stageless skies,
Where are you going alone from this house:
I have painted a chalk road for you to leave
By,
And the weather is crippling the apple orchard,
Ruining my pastels-
Your maker has put a heart into your chest you
Will not sell until it is condemned by
A prettier love, and you have to:
And your children sleep like the presents of Hypnotized chickens: where are they going all done
Up and trained to suppose,
Making their attempts at pie on their bunny slopes;
And they go down and afterwards the smoke
Signals rise,
Like tears steaming from the jungles of your thighs;
And I suppose I haven't spoken things
I didn't have to: And still you are all rosy cheeked
And good enough to star in your first movie;
The lobes of your ears are very Christian, listening
To conches snoozing in their libraries:
And I imagine you in the school you were kicked out of,
And all your beauty blooms like a delicious plague
Of roses,
Savagely red and too deep for our friendship to take Advantage of.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Dinner Of Atrocities

You'll have to go with me
Again underneath the Mountain roaring fuselages
Of airplanes
To drink from the hidden springs
Halfway up the mountain;
And after we make love
You'll have to do your Hair again,
Only so you can go home again to Make love to him;
While I sleep like a ghost less wishing well
Across your house-
You give him your empirical fires,
Like a dinner of atrocities
Before all the fanfare of windmills,
While saving all of your soul for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Dove Returned To My Hand

I ran away and got into a bike accident:
And then I went to the arcade where this beautiful woman
Was there,
The lady and the tiger: She was at the very same time
Behind two doors;
And it was like a dream, because she liked the same things
I liked,
And we both spoke the queen's English: and we sat together
And held hands and listened to the whippoorwills
Distinguish the killers who would come and kill in the park;
And the churches wept and the palates were dark and Dark;
And the real woman I loved was very poor, but her tattoos
Curled up from the grass and placed their tattooed fingers
Between the cheeks of her very fine ass:
And she sang to me, or she just looked across the terra-plain,
Which is a place I have seen before which is impossible
To explain;
And very soon the earth will be shaking with dinosaurs, because My parents will be coming home; and I want to share with them
My liquor bottle and tell them of this wonderful girl,
A woman I am not supposed to love,
Praying that once she reaches dry land she will return to find me,
Proving her love, like a dove returned to my hand.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A False Arrow

Tired by words- just these ink scars
Moths and masks all over me,
Nocturnal jewels-
The color of evil on a beautiful lake,
The egrets horn-rimmed up in the swaying
Slashes,
I want to sing a siren's lullaby call you
From you household, your two-car garage,
Transform you in the breeding grounds of Dun amphibians, ask you what you see over
My shoulder, the planes and god,
And the crooked tatters making merry:
I want a voice to make indelible to you,
To feed you my marble games, the roe from my Fingertips, the svelte shadows from my shoulder
Blades;
But every word is a failure, a burned face,
Romance to a blind woman that doesn't intrude-
I can see you down in your neighborhood of pure
Somnambulance, seeming to dance, but you
Are distracted- There is so much needing to do
To keep you up, and not one of my brown eyed Syllables is handsome enough that they might Transgress the even boundaries,
To steal of a sudden to your lips, or through the taming
Dusks, to wake you from the dream of the well you
Willingly fell into where a prince called singing
Words I'd hate to think have you situated in a fond place and callous to my wounded page,
Which I send like a false arrow burning to ignite
A cooling heart.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Family Of Hungry Bears

Kissing the termite's bottlenecked prize
On the highest shelf perceived by her eyes:
The planes go up and up until they get
Nose bleeds:
As if the sun was saltlick and they the speckled deer,
They kiss the sun:
Their throats taste like fire, and then they go down
Again at night:
Their bodies fold and cool like paper grasshoppers:
I suppose that is how it is:
How it begins and ends, and the fates we have in our own
Mailboxes,
And the turbulence of dreams that fall asleep and compose the Shadows,
That seem to tent your house- Alma- like a family of Hungry bears.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Famished Stage

If you want tomorrow off, I will work your day,
So I don't have to spend mine staring at myself in insane
Places,
My eyes as deep and uneven as cesspools,
Checking the pseudepigrapha of Oregon to find out how Girls have the power to change into midnight doves
Of swings and dark and fetishistic lances
To trick their casual knights into honey moons of caldrons
Of orgasms that can never be returned;
Or walk out into the pile driving clouds, turning quick silver
Airplanes into mobiles for drowned gods,
Or gods in their segregated graveyards; and snakes fat off
Of so many, many men that the trees of wisdom are empty;
And yet here is Eve's hand still curling for the fruit,
Whispering harshly through the narcissistic
Bows of empty honey jars: This is the law she gave us,
And black generals are under her feet like congratulatory
Cenotaphs, and they try to bow,
And the wind breaks loose and is disinterested and mouths off
Some place else;
When, then will she finally have to figure out that we are emptied
By her- And there is no place here now that her inglorious wisdom
Has not found out, or peeled away with titted teeth:
Made us her husk of Ganymede and put that infernal sword
Flaming before our house beneath the graveyard beneath the creek
Where we painted her and held out for her;
And watch her now horrified by our animosity as she leads her
Well-suited family by the hand through the doors of heaven,
The glow closing like a famished stage behind her,
Leaving nothing left for us that we would care or wish for to understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Feathering Rainbow

Tell me what you want for Christmas and I will single you out and worship you- and set you a sail like Little children across a game of
Make believe in my bed- in a room that is a night led by your singular
Candle:
And I will be transmogrified in a the red fox who leaps high enough
To destroy your fables, Alma,
And to command your acrobatic ships: to make you moan and deluge:
This is what I am good for underneath the atmospheres
Of the honey moons of roller rinks, and the long days good byes and All of the failing sunsets in which I never knew you:
But I place you here now in my stuff, like a love outside the tenements
Of an elementary school while all of the skies are Falling and all of the chickens are hypnotized, and your daughter is Calling to you with the reasons for your life:
But here I am, homeless, wise, and baring your gifts, as you open up
A nebula of light across my friendly skies- like a feathering rainbow
That reaches across your elbows, kissing and squeezing your Shiest breasts.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Ferris Wheel Sneaking Away

Where am I going—another day gone into the World—
Where is the bed where the sun rests,
A bachelor,
Tawny and crackling with his books: I think I
Saw him underneath the overpass,
Like a Ferris wheel sneaking away—
Elbows and necks filled
With gawdy flashbulbs—the tourists following
Him like sour-milked puppies:
And he rested there, cramped—his light turning Everyone not Mexican Mexican—
And when he arose again, the first thing he Did was rushed to the sea,
Merely a step away—and calmed himself naked
Dousing her feral adolescents into a mother
He could not call his.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Fish In A Pool

I drink, I drink- My eyes burn like a fish in a pool:
My house says nothing:
Alma, you at last are at home with your husband and your children:
I think I want to die as beautifully as a bouquet thrust into the open wrists
Of a grave,
While I think of you: Alma,
I yet still live:
I turn, I pinwheel, and I give, over the sweet and youngish throats
Of all of those graves that all of the stars have turned their lights out for,
Forgetting how to save,
While all the racetracks turn in cursive, tucked in far beneath the snows,
While all the bodies tuck in perfectly beneath the perfect rows
And ghosts of the orange groves;
But Alma, don't you know that I have a fireplace built from the same Coquina stone as the Castillo de San Marcos in Saint Augustine;
And, Alma, my sweet young Alma, with two everlasting butterflies
Birthed from your womb,
I ask you if you still don't know anything: anything.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Fitful Prayer Given Before Sleep

A rhyme, a dime, a talking fool:

I step outside and in the insouciant yard my

Pen*s jewels:

By my lead, my dogs go out and scent the Earth, which is you, my foolish muse:

I peruse you like the easy mediums on their

Shelves: Can't you see now, how even the Easy trees are shaken. This is not their season,

And yet in their locker rooms they are getting

Naked,

As by the open doors the November breath

Shivers, my little dog growls at its unwelcome

Brother: I call the German Shepherd's name

And he hurries back in,

But what does it matter, when you spread your

Cheap legs for other men, and I should have

To wake up to the early morning, and perform

Before my parents as if I was never drunk,

Or had saved enough money to have my own house

In some unsettling plane:

But what does it matter, when nothing I have written

Has been unnecessarily true:

More beautiful men from other planets are already

Married and given off their names to strange little

Gentlemen who will follow us in their more civilized

Manners out the doors:

The laziness my scars is written like nail polish

Along the seats of the bus in junior high school:

There in the jubilation of yet unshed puberty, I had a knife

Fight which was staged, before I even knew you,

And I loved a black woman so feverishly they couldn't

Even know; but now I am called up to the office from

My little crimes of toys, but looking toward you in the

Backwater mirrors, I believe I have said enough,

And if it should come to war, even with the belly of the ship

Lilting towards the bottom, you should love me,

Because it is in the way I have given you to follow me,

And you have come to me unasked for, and thus our lips

Should embrace like a watermark, the way the final seal is Given to a defeated army, thus I conclude things

Until you, and this inevitable poem, written the way
No one should read, thankfully, like a fitful full prayer,
Given before sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Fool

Going down again and making an easiness out
Of the incense of the gypsy camps I've seen grazing in Alma's eyes:
And I want to propose to her atop the hill we both surmounted
While jogging in Dreher Park:
Alma, I don't want to leave you again, because I am fearful that My words are not strong enough to truly capture you:
I love you here in the hours that slip away over your brown shoulders:
Even when you are mean to me, Alma, I love you;
And it is as painful as the unrequited love I once felt in the daycares of My earliest of thieveries,
Because I could never quite make my own way like my father,
Alma:
And you know that he is a beautiful man, but he doesn't know that I Love you,
But maybe he wonders why I am still working at the fruiteria he was Banished from.
So I now feel like a deposed prince who without any power gets to Look at your beautiful country sides;
For there you are in a gentle slope of your gloriously eyed thieveries
Slanting throughout my day:
I stayed here because I love you, Alma: I became a cenotaph who moves
And breathes,
And my body is an engraving on a tomb that thumbs its chest
And behaves like a fool for you, Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Girl Named Kelly

Like a river sings despondent blue grass
For the baby Moses,
I uncurl this cap:
I hate to say that I still dream of barmaids of The letter E,
And now sommeliers:
Propellers turn like mobiles, but there is no
Easy geometry:
Suicide in the foreplay of wet grass, while new Men are being christened from the clay,
Liquor like uncountable tribes of reptiles and Venomous snakes in my veins;
And I made love today, to someone new-
A stranger underneath the fields of the new years
Sky,
And I pretend that it is something wonderful,
But it is no more wonderful than marriage; and there
Is nothing new under the sky:
It is all the way that the ancient lovers died-Venal, star-struck and sick; and the old men then like the New men now invented science to impress the girls,
Just like the spotty youth two decades ago
Wrapped their hands diligently around their joysticks
And tried to level up past the last gorilla,
The blonde hair flowing at the top of the ladder
Like a girl name Kelly near the sea of names that have Been repeated to me through my youth- Through
All the time I may never know, nor experience again.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Goat In The Zoo

If there must be princes singing like
Cicadas getting naked,
Dancing
Like rivers, then let death come too in
Her horny shoes:
So high up and against my back repeating on
The swings,
Like a poet, like a carnival these things I
Seem to me,
Underneath the moon,
Underneath the lost airplanes looking away
Way up into the sky of your carnal bed
Where the footprints of untamed animals leave
Tracks all around your place,
And you are bathing like a heavy cloud that never Keeps its shape,
And you are so rich from the suicides of high
Society,
That you might never come down,
Ringed in copper, bellied in ink: You float there
Like a séance, like a dream,
And down on the earth and grottos I can taste you
Like blood on my lip,
Or, reaching out, I can almost run up against
You like my first word, like a goat in the zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Graveyard Of Butterflies

Losing your feelings in the yard- mowed by a Mexican who slept
Beside the junks of your house
And while he was asleep you scattered like Johnny Apple Seed
Jugular boats and dye cast cars and paper airplanes of both Sexes
Far across his work: and you swam in the sunlight as if you were
The delusions of a piggy bank,
And that was all your gold siphoned by the lips of your tank;
And it felt so good:
Why even then the pilots were taking off and landing in the Sky, going to see their forgotten relatives of Giants, like nosebleeds at the end of the vines;
And you supposed it was all possible, while the cicadas disrobed
In the gallant spectacles of jewels wept into the changing rooms
Of cypress:
And your sister was somewhere around, but not invited,
And your mother was upstairs sleeping with your father in a house
The same size as a modest university, and ever inch of it covered
In a carpet so green that it was where you'd hidden all of The birthday cake you'd stolen those sometimes- so that it could Spill right out,
While Alma was growing up in a little place in Guerrero Mexico
In a wilderness as brown and deep as the feelings you would come to Know for her as they made their own way back again, finally resting
Like a graveyard of butterflies.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Heaven That Vanishes Indoors

Bones lain in a house—
Reclining next to the Virgins of Guadalupe
And the plastic roses:
The first rose I gave to her in April or May of 2009 still stuck in the trellis
Next to the stucco painted yellow,
But now just a stem:
She called me a week ago but hasn't Called me again:
She lives north of Disney World now,
Waiting for her husband to come Back from Jacksonville
And maybe that will make everything all right—
Going out and buying meat for Dinner,
Keeping her children close—close to
Her,
And driving back home underneath the power-lines,
Clouds performing away to a sea she never Goes to—
Like thoughts of me and the fruit-market
We once made love in—Waiting for the man she was destined for
To drive home through the saw-grass,
Returning from forts she has never seen with
Her eyes—
No longer concerning herself with me laying my Drunken bones across the roof of His house—
And then he is home, like a heaven that vanishes
Indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Knight Himself

Oh, the black knuckles fought with orchids
Of the dwarves of semiprecious high school:
While I only thought of myself, and I curled that way:
And I got up late and I missed the bus:
And I floated down the avenues, and I touched myself while Trusting the innuendos in the ransacked pornographies
Of the hallways where I was supposed to be Learning algebra of calculus:
But while I was a lone, all terrapin and accordingly self-
Motivated,
The mariposas got really fat, and I learned to love the Amphitheatres in graveyards of after hours:
When the night was all shot off and cenotaphs, and the baseball Games were just what they really were,
And all of the runners had stopped running and all had become
So spent and so marvelous,
And the words themselves resounding in the cauldron of A caracole: perhaps they killed some make-believe fathers in a
Bloodbath of holidays:
But what it was I won't rightly ever know: all I know is I Saw you jogging outside my cherry red car some day: some day
Erin, and I fell in love like fairy tale, like a knight himself:
And long ago: and far, far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Lamp Underneath The Sun

The moon looks like a lamp underneath the sun
And now I remember that you are not speaking with me—
And my jaw is swollen—
And this night, Hurricane Ivan is making his run up the West coast of Florida—
And I am on my ninth poem—the passengers are already asleep:
They are done with looking out of their windows—
And the world beneath them is a joy to the eyes of The foxes—who have clouded over in their Vineyards—and we are a happily done with all of that specific Stuff—I don't even know why you had to follow
You husband up to the backyards of Ocala—
But there you are still with him—
As the fireworks lie smoldering beneath the orange trees,
And the mermaids have come up from God-blessing the petals of the lotus—which is the favorite
Flower of my wife—but she is still in China—
And with child, incase you didn't understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Letter In A Bottle Propped Amongst The Seashells

The colors are cold,
The flowers melt,
And my legs are too long for my torso,
My fingers sore from typing;
But if I look directly into the sun,
Then I look all right,
And I begin to fashion dreams again
About her;
She is almost there, spinning like a German
Temptress lost under immense power lines
Deep in the heart of Texas;
And I've told her my story lost beside
The traffic, so many times,
The insides of my cheeks wrecked from Nervous chewing over her through the halls of
A far abandoned high school,
But sometimes I have good lines,
And little thoughts appropriated from places
Which aren't fully understood,
But are dangerously delightful-
So here I stand once again, chest flushed like
A starling, sick from hepatitis, calling out such A revelry that it should find its way
Through the caesuras of dunes, to her
Wayward doorstep, like a letter in a bottle
Propped amongst the seashells.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Liar From Kindergarten

Christmas trees, Christmas trees abounding in the Lurching woods, talking of the pinpricks of light
To the reintroduced wolves:
Talking of Satan to my dogs, while all of the day snows,
And the town grows rich with iron pyrite and make believe Vampires;
And the busty sorority of milkmaids all lactating their Virgin Springs:
Why, any one of them could be the mother of our lord,
And cast into high towers while I pine for them:
They get nosebleeds with the ethereal flowers,
While the airplanes send smoking séances for them; and then
I really do believe that I want to picture them down in the Carports of the grottos of my mother next to the washing
Machine and the high voltage electricity:
I want to picture them like this while the ditches bleed over
With the lactates of creamy frogs and mash potatoes;
As just across the way, hunchbacked on the cenotaphs of Conquistadors, reading the junkyard of the cars' pornography,
Some kidnapper awaits toothily for me:
Grandiose and verbatim, his strides like plates of mica through
The grass: I have the feeling he wants to take me to a flea market underneath
The leaping overpass; and I wonder like a thief, like a liar from Kindergarten: should I let him: should I let him....

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Maelstrom Of Bicycles

Isn't it beauty, getting drunk and remembering
The lies she whispered so beautifully
Underneath the overpasses above the scars
Before it got time to be Christmas and then any of This—
The places where beauty remains, hidden in
The estuaries of a childhood vanished from the schoolyards:
It becomes so difficult to behave, distracted like
The moths under her—
Until all of the traffics arrives, turning brighter and Brighter,
And making all together a maelstrom underneath
The overpasses of burry mountains—like a maelstrom
Of fireflies with nowhere else to go.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Makebelieve Theatre

Without looking up the gold of sheriffs,
This is the way that sometimes the goldfish have to survive
On Tuesdays,
Open mouthed, while the housewives' Mexican cleaning ladies
Are cleaning all of the edges of the house,
While I have had at you and your mouth in all for corners;
It is a game,
As an orange is orange, I love you the same:
Without any stanzas, my broken words trample in, breathing on the Neck of your body like the delta of a river:
So brown and wild and pure,
As above us the sun is so pure; and beneath us all the depths of the Seas and the buried men;
While on Tuesdays I can compare your beauty to the sea,
Alma: On Tuesdays, driving in a car,
Just as so many mammals now do:
Pressing my foot past Palm Beach, I can show you the shimmering
Azure, and say that is exactly you;
And then to the heavens, the aspens prey: they line up like sisters
In a queue to see Elvis, to sing of the joy of sisterly things,
Just as I know that you have your own private joys in the boudoirs
Of your heart;
And of such private joys I should never sing: but to you, out in the open,
Your pretty organs out to breathe, like something I somehow Won at the workplace of a fair: I open my heart up like
A makebelieve theatre; and sing.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Minnow Blushing In The Nylon Mask Of Your Tawny Calf

What I am doing is putting on for you
These shy speckles,
And swimming on through your windshield,
Flashing my broadside;
Pretending to smile, if fish could smile,
If that is what I truly am, or just a story getting Bigger with each reincarnation of its telling
From grandfather to father to son,
After wars are over and the weather has retreated,
And the horses have come back out stiffed hooped from
The dripping forests
To begin amassing once more out into the open;
This is where I go, down slipping imperfectly fleshed
In the swift threads that are melting off the seasons,
Like another sort of metamorphosis,
The way a butterfly must disrobe from chrysalis,
Or any form of poetry disembarked from its birthing woods.
I come unspeaking dripping down the muddy slopes,
Past the micas of collecting estuaries,
Past the old tire swing, and the secret haunts of twin Lovers,
Past where the lightning scarred the trunk,
And where the miners rest, or any other sort of allusions,
Either in the Adirondacks or the red clay and maize of Countries I have never truly been:
I come slipping down to you dry mouthed with all these words
Hoping that I will be caught up inside of you,
And feed you, and thus come to nourish you, to know
The requirements of your body,
And thus come into the fulfillment of my task cease in my being,
But a remembrance you sometimes recall,
Walking to and from your classes, causing light to be more Beautiful through the contrast of the body of your presence-
What I was always meant to be,
Clapping your echoes, I hope to carry on in each of your steps,
Like a minnow blushing in the nylon mask of your Tawny calf.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Mute Spokesman

I'm showing you so the sun burns
Over the yellow ribbons:
It burns the songs right out of the throats
Of birds
You have never thought of to love:
It burns the fingerprints
Right out of my victims,
And you continue down the mountain again,
Rowing,
Rowing in your cantankerous light,
Waiting for your father to find you and laugh at
You,
While the rest of your classmates somehow
Make it down the bend in the river
And continue over the cataracts:
Falling, laughing and tumbling just like newborns
At Christmas- until I have something to Say to them,
And then the journey is over- completed,
Sublime- and there isn't a mouth laying hungry on
The road- for all of the families have made
It home for super time,
And their kitchens lay golden beside their pools
Like diamonds: and haven't you been listening,
Listening to the woebegone angels beside
The canals while the alligators, like mute spokesman,
Didn't say a thing all of this time.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Paper Cut Of Beauty

I have turned out again:
I am here on my early morning stage, waiting up for Crepuscle's backwards sister,
Looking for Nubian eyes over a despotic river of Mailboxes and the housecats
Who curl up in every yard underneath the stunted cypress:
I wish there were bicycles I could take to you:
Take straight up past the chicken wire guts of Disney
World,
Blowing all other Popsicle stands and Space Mountain
Just the same,
Forgetting my adulthood and the times that you have spent
With just your other men,
Just as you probably did tonight, while you blew off what
A really good graveyard could mean to you:
While you never swing nor go down into the Devil's sink hole
To hear the happening echoes of the flappers that Once drank and spoke easily flirting with the fisted heavies
Of your town;
And if I turned up, you would have so many favorite colors
To put me down,
But still I wish there was a sure fire way straight into the glorious Gizzards of your happening little town,
And candles to light the manholes of your transoms behind where You swim so slowly with the laces of curtain draping over
You until you surface come morning,
And eat your breakfast in the pool of your own grotto,
Maybe your eyes never shifting from their eggs and salty venison,
Because you never have to believe again in the superfluous
Beauties of who have been making tracks toward you
In the days and nights of your drunken coolies,
The tourists who spy you out of doors and the students who study
You superfluously like a paper cut of beauty who goes
Unnoticing through her chores.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Pearl In The Throat Of A Rattlesnake

Meretricious beauty, even properly astray—
Leading the artist's soul
Into the bad houses of the forests—
With the wolves and talking cats talking and Crying over the silver dollars slanted like
Cenotaphs in the sand dunes:
But there, dying with the spurious pornographies,
The weeds spitting through the open
Throats a junked garden of cars:
Where he sings alone, after her legs have Metamorphosed into a kite—
Scissoring with the hollow wishes of rainy birthdays:
Up to kiss the lips of some auburn pilot in his Airplane—
Lonely, malnourished—aesthetic truth is discovered,
Like a pearl in the throat of a rattlesnake.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Pledge To Their Senses

Looking up at the green wall:
The feature of her fairy void: that she should have
Two men attending to her,
But only one stricken enough to bare along her children:
Along the glass rows,
And the store shelves, where the blown things grew
Like chickadees;
The lances that could be seen and felt forever advancing,
Pilling heatedly over their shoulders,
Giving off warming medicine like smelling salts;
But having no certain words about their nature:
What a conundrum, to be of so many sorts, but all too soon
To be evaporating back into their apartments,
With the only memory of her palm like a pledge to Their senses:
They hung on her then, and bounced off the walls,
And their light turned unholy and cursed the day.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Primate Weapon

Lights in the places around me,
Places across the street
I have never been to,
Like a dog or a cricket in its yard,
A thing you can never be too sure of:
If it knows the language of your Generous hand,
Or if it still goes around looking for something
To feed off of:
And I will finally have my peace,
And lay out into the canal,
So angelically for want of a better word
As to captivate all of the water moccasins to Send them sprouting like an army of Dark Mohammedans
To the pallid green shore of my exegesis,
My silent and lonely event,
To let their black bodies come and caracole all
Over my baptism,
And cover me with the pecks of fresh poison,
Better than the love you never thought to Spend from Lips or eyes,
Or that hairy arrow you keep well drawn between
You shopping basket legs
As you tremulate down the street like a primitive weapon
Taught and drawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Promise

Dogs of light and dogs of fire,
Dogs holding their breath, digging under chicken wire:
Dogs in Christmas,
Dogs in the sea, dogs panting under the clotheslines of Panties,
Dogs waiting for me: dogs whose full mouths are filled with Bones,
Dogs waiting on the knolls of other dogs' tombs:
Dogs who worked for kings,
Dogs who worked for bums: dogs underneath the airplanes;
Dogs sticking red to revolutions;
As the poems are hurt on liquor, trying to find their blind ways
Home to Alma,
As the air fills unceremoniously with the cadences
Of the perfumes of other men who Are not any of their masters,
The dogs who fill the streets and curbs, who through Happenstance speak French and feed the alligators, lifting their Legs to the red hydrants
Without the proper rhymes for the Ferris wheels of cheerleaders:
Another trick, for another bone:
Eating their dinner alone: dogs and dogs who knew me and who I've never know,
Leaping and wining faithfully, and then by midnight sniffing their Way through the most acerbic of vineyards,
Underneath the silver overpasses of the naked airplanes who Never saw the same tears in their eyes,
Coming home to the doorways and the transoms that speak the same,
Giving off the same light as the lighthouses who pretended to Know a world without wars:
Dogs licking their wounds, like lovesick men calling your name,
Alma,
And wishing only to sleep with the rabbit stated rattlesnakes in the Unending shade swinging in the antebellum of your old world
Home,
Like a serpent in a playground of a tree, like a promise, like a bone,
You never intend to share with me.

Like A Promise Burning

Amber perfumes of a forest with bees,
Up in the joints where the butterflies go to Die going blind in the moping
Draperies of angels, and languishing there
For young boys with weapons who still Hold delusions for her in their eyes:
Coming out of the air-conditioning of a museum,
They weep and masturbate on the marble,
But don't know how to learn Latin:
They remove their clothes and slip into boats
Of shadows for her, while she flies above them
Like a promise burning.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Reddish Song

Defeated by what scars mar truly,
Each paragraphs lies like sated kindergarteners in the Tall grasses,
Windswept from a honeymoon of fieldtrips,
Already like cut letters opened and scattered to the Enjambments of their society:
What are they going to be now, who are they Going to know, with the sky that is the batter raining down
Then the things they breath, the snakes of knowledge
Coiling around the clutches of sunny stones in the grass,
Using their ripple-bellies to kneed closer,
Curling around the wrists of the prettiest girls,
Forked tongues stealing away the hopes of the follow
Youth who shall never find a wife
Or home- The boy sleeping there in the field without a Car or a way to mow the yard; but following through the weeping
Strands, the poisonous kinds of flowers with the equanimity
Of a scientist of dying children- like suburban gossip;
And he will leave you there in his house alone, perceiving
Indistinguishable women floating long-legged from the lips
Of his folded airplanes; and you might see him there stretched
Out exhausted on the green carpet, but his loosed thoughts Are skipping like amused seashells far across the abutments of so many Unheard of canals, finally to unrefined rest where so many black men
Are cutting sugarcane, teaching him their ancestral folklore,
And pressing cheap rum to his lips like a reddish song.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Ship That Needs Mending

Pleasantly, your fingers run down the street
Like a barrette in your hair 'laying it down
Over the shoulders of
Your brown midway, doing away with the classroom'
Perfectly contented that your children
Will never graduate high school'
Or the sad roses waiting at your doorstep have Disappeared along with my drunken footsteps
Upon your rooftop 'or that I've made the Rooster hold its tongue until it has forgotten
How its instinctual crow'so the daylight breaks silently'
Milky, smoldering, waterfall
Cascades like tumbles of fire over grim amusements'
And you lean into him, like a ship that needs mending
Caressing the dragon that destroyed it.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Silence In Your Life

Now I see like a silence in your life,
Laughing, gismatic—and full of so many other misspelling;
I stab you in the eye while I wait for myself
In the elevator
Until it finally comes down to the silence of angels—
They are there hiding in the spotlights of the foliage of Your front yard—
And then it seems that the abyss is echoing for business—
What joy in the plotlines that are too busy to be described—
Beautiful, silent places outside of the spotlights—
Where deer have to forage and eat for themselves without Cartoons—
And even though I know that the planets really do exist—
Just like Phobos and Demos will seem to Reciprocate around those heavens forever—
I cannot survive for so very long without you being amidst my love.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Similacrum On The Hunt

Like a draft of words, calling up the armies
Into the arms of loneliness, knowing this all at the start,
And folding paper snowflakes into my wounds,
Trying to forget about the ways that the dying cowboys
Had a hard time breathing
Like the salting mermaids who came up through the orchards
Calling for the boy they loved
Who himself had gone away on a bicycle through mindless
Carnivals of suburbia
Like a simulacrum on the hunt for the one or two things
That it could ever know.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Sky Full Of Airplanes Coming Down

With the stillness back in the shadows,
I struck out;
And something is ululation, and it is not
Looking good:
And things, big horrid domineering things
Are growing,
But they are not corsages or bouquets;
And this is the way it must look to anyone alone
In the middle of the sea,
Without the shadows, and only sun: then beauty
Becomes its own shadow,
And, circling, she comes:
And you can't breathe once you discovered the Treasures,
And the body is broken down, and the soul is Just a salty mobile,
Going around and around an empty cradle,
Like a sky full of airplanes coming down.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Slick Goddess Over The Last Pages Of The Earth

In webs of disregard
She paints me the color blue:
You should see me.
I don't even belong this way,
Because it is the purest thing
Just like the virgin butterfly,
And I am all choked up,
And the sororities are drinking their Lemonade and beer,
And practicing their solicitous weeps
And giggles,
While polishing off entire bottles
Swiped from the pregnant sommelier.
But she has already gone away into His arms,
Like a tattooed Polynesian
Thoroughly domesticated-
That is where she is going with those Great breasts,
And even greater calves,
Walking like a slick goddess over the Last pages of the Earth.
I hold my breath, my heart ululating
In the immense sunshine,
Hoping that she will turn my way one last
Time,
With the smile of auburn liquor,
And her eyes like hungry sea creatures swaying in
The brightest reaches;
But that is not what she does.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Smothered Wish

Pea sized versions of the truths who lie scattered
Like uncaged pearls in a bathtub,
In the grottos of cleansing spirits who are just polishing off
The knees of little girls who are getting ready
To fly away to college,
Like fires getting up the nerve to metamorphosis into Wishes,
While the dragons all remain as red as fire trucks and all of Them according to their unions:
Hallucinations who stare out at the wind blown tents of Revivals all throughout the corners of a desolate
New Mexico
Around whose corner some copper trumpet has been blowing, Becoming drowned out through the repopulations of
The twin markets of stores
Unto who so many mothers are beckoned like wet tears
Across the rounded stones,
Until they are either sharpened or dulled,
But in their spaces and high heels become rather pleasing
But keeping on moving as the chatters of echoes,
Until the finally unreels and envelops the green, and they Are all rounded up until the shapes of a zoetrope are finally Recognized and misplaced by a single finger,
Like a smothered wish, and they are brought back to their Trailer parks
And without another word stop making love.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Soul For Its Home

I won't say anything more about what you shouldn't
Do,
What you do:
Your children are in the backyards of preschool,
The mariposas are back again in Mexico following their Never mindful flight paths,
Forgetting that they were once creatures as almost
As beautiful as you,
They sift down like crackerjack leaves through the forest
And bask on the cool lips of Rattlesnakes,
While down beneath their arboreal leaves, the state
Of Guerrero Mexico is in a great cacophony, but it also Does not remember that it is where you were Born,
Alma- but my song remembers everything- lingering like
An enamored nimbus above a herd of unicorns,
Like a child waiting forever for his mother,
Like a dog for his master,
Like a soul for its home.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Star In The Sky

Hearts of lucky entrepreneurs dispersed into homes,
Like waves into carports,
Sea horses into foam;
And airplanes with their stewardesses into their vast bays of sky:
And it was all that you could do to hope,
As over the turkey the relatives said goodbye;
Or when it was raining and you hadn't a home, you saw through
The windows, the relatives who could've been yours;
And the English wasn't very proper;
And it was out of luck, out of doors; but it was underneath the haloes of
The largest cross in all of North America;
And the mountains rolled and aid their own names to themselves;
And it was really going somewhere:
And it was making love, maybe all the way underneath the rattlesnakes,
To when you were a child
And your beliefs roamed the playgrounds like real men
With swords,
Feral, heroic, wild;
And your soul, your Alma, was a vagrancy- but you could watch it
Satchel the goldness over the corridors of your preschool
And you knew for awhile that your pets couldn't die;
And even the goldfish was immortal, like a coin in your pocket,
Like a star in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Story Book Of Gasoline

Hushed from the toppled gates of apples:
Or the farewells of the firemen's applause, where the coliseums
Of cluttered universities
Become rain stormed: where we remember the footsteps
That no longer echo for anyone
Of our situations- surrounded by the night, all of the copper axes
Tormented into woods,
With scuppernongs everywhere, but evil: and the brown flesh
That is hers pullulating.
As we let her in and make love; but then she disappears for days:
She doesn't read of us, how we skip school and Make applauses with her with liquors and bachelorhoods;
But she doesn't exactly leave:
Like a butterfly who comes back for more:
To rob the store of the naked flower on the lonely mountain:
To start a fire there no bigger than a match which burns
As if the only soul in the woods:
Worshipped by every animal fortunate enough to live there,
Gathering to tell stories in congregations of svelte and horns-
They love her without knowing a word,
Even as she steals from them all that her little body could:
Like a story book of gasoline: this is how her love burns.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Thrown Away Honeymoon

Now this feels right:
That the bulleys and dragons are sleeping:
And the princesses too,
In the negligees of their mutual incests and desires:
Their bodies at play just as migratory as a state fair,
But now it comes down to the period of
Rest
And then there will be feasting, and gift giving,
And more battles:
Maybe Alma will make love to her old man again
Like a going away present, a ship of love bound for insurmountable
Hurricanes,
While the sweet penumbras of her favorite colors of orchards
Come over us,
And I can pull my rabbit out of its hat, like a birthday present
Of a metamorphosis,
And she can just kiss me in the first and the second darkness,
While all of the heroes, famishing, put down their swords
And stop make inopportune love to their forgetful sisters
Who always afterwards have to cast themselves
Like a thrown away honeymoon topsy-turvy down the maudlin
Falls of their aborted bliss.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Torpid Afternoon

If you decided to skip school where would you
Go,
Overpowered in your ideas to be alone—
Coming along into her parks and comingling with
The sunshine in the palmettos:
While everything else takes awhile to finish
Around her and so to become real:
Like the ants beneath her, these are your playgrounds
Too—and while you masturbate,
With your lips busied upon her—what is your Thought—
What a strangeness lies between you—she will Marry another man,
And your teachers will not pay a cent to see the dimes
Of your teenage tragedy: it will just become another
Fault beneath the mountains—luminescent—
Vulgarized by the commercials trying to sell her spirit:
Then the heavens will melt off of her,
And she will slip away like a torpid afternoon—
And you will scald your hand in her dimension,
Until it is time to come alive again.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Vermillion Errol Flynn

Can't clean where you've already started
The cut,
The hari-kari, the great amount of sea-shells;
Or when the little girls step in from the beach,
Smelling like salty confections,
What could you even say to them,
Imaging how you do the brush strokes of storm clouds
Put in over the beach they only left minutes ago
When the full day was out;
But to settle down now into the misfit's yard
Would be a sort of tragedy at the dusk of youth.
Imagine rather, that there is still time to be a student
With all the fine elements of this country being Shot down the tank. I can't think of a better thing;
Or, being that you can't write or spell or Fix your hair like a vermillion Errol Flynn, then
There is still time to learn those trades, or at least to try
If it is impossible. She might be swimming naked in the Cerulean yards, any one of them, but lets not make much of That. Pick up what you know, and touch your face Lightly like an infant, like picking out a cantaloupe;
And say now, is this the one? Surely it must be, for how Could we have any other with one so fine as this?

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Watercolor Left Out In A Sun Shower

Poems for grown up boys who still like the look
Of their mothers:
Hot rooms too without air conditioning- usually unusual thoughts
Can grow,
Looking up into the way she turns out, reasoning the air
Like a deck of cards:
And you can lie there and say that I am the prettiest boy alive:
Like a wolf who's seen the dentist,
Look at all my unknicked knives: I can pull Colorado anywhere,
I can sunder her, and make her speak like a rabbit does
Of endives,
I can roll my words like a lover's fingers through her hair:
I can make the azure in her eyes follow what I have to say to her,
To cause continents and storm fronts that make her stare more
Imperfect,
Like a watercolor left out in a sun shower;
And thus more beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Weapon Stealing From Its Kill

Night of twenty-four hours in twelve months of Holidays,
Crooning in séances, sharpened on the wet stone of Spikenard's epiphany;
And I can hardly even feel how the campus must have Felt like in your amber night,
So late as to be early when the sky is so wet with
The perpetuity of the milkmen of dew that Kites drown and kittens get stuck to their mother's Teats and they are too flabbergasted to mew;
And you were just coming home through the rippling fog
Dreaming of your boys like the first smoldering of
A really grand procession that heated up through the red
Bricks of your liberal minded canon;
And I searched for you, and called your name through the Long standing drainage,
And smelled your hair like a flag strung on a caravan on the Move;
And I got all bothered and danced for you in a great wide
Circle, like a glutinous spell, and remembered you name,
And gave it to the darkness that would not dispel,
Like curtains on a stage that refused to reveal, though I heard
You everywhere, the play of your heart
Rattling the thunder of my cannonballs, and making me
Stomp my guts through the parks and playgrounds that dripped
From your nooned shadows,
Even while your laughing body eluded me like a weapon stealing from Its kill.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Windmill

How they turn golden, sometimes little boys,
Others old men,
Stretch from their graves into eternity, their theories etched into Papyrus read forever,
Echoed into the classrooms of other planets,
Spread out in lecture halls, scrutinized, worshipped,
And mimicked,
Decathletes for their seasons of breathing go on running
After the sun is down, after the housewives have returned,
After even their children have passed on in infinite Cessation,
Those blessed men, the silky authors of their fate the stars
Caressed and queens knighted, to whom mortality
Is a pet always cherub and perfumed, led around when
The thought requires,
But to these honored few, exhumed every morning, stone is Not immortal, and the sky is lowered to a ceiling
Their fingertips brush, and in each county they come
Welcomed and fed,
Perpetuating a rosy garden where women casually romance
Them, preferred to their husbands,
Or if not read, put away into hibernation only to bloom forthright
When rediscovered,
Or never discovered again,
And left to the earthen echoes of us all,
but for their time elegant gentlemen,
Showing their anatomy to scientists and dreamers,
Cheering for Olympians and taking prodigious notations,
And when the book is closed, lying down,
Praying selfishly for truer forms to extend themselves,
To sneak up to the roof of this house and cry seeming to be alone,
But the elements pricking them, awakening the hidden thoughts,
The epitaphs which conclude their bright séances,
As they ladle from the great unseen gyre supporting us all,
Turning like a clock, like a hurricane, like a windmill.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Wish Of Saltlick

Night burns for a time its pornography:

A troop of snails endeavor to drink the sea above which

You are riding on winged seahorses that have just

Leapt from the waves who are themselves the teal lips parting

For your glistening ship of worship:

Then you are the thing to be worshipped: shirtless, even still

They let you into the store of thoughtful clouds who have been

Building up like evaporated carpenters a grotto

For your racetrack:

Your areolas have just as many years as you've had boyfriends,

And I count them,

For they make the ripples of two wishes I once had

Both for the same woman who for the moment seems to be

Leaping like a wish of saltlick of a promise straight over me.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Wolf Over Her Stone

Evangelically short,
She sat where she started:
It was enough to rough me up,
To see her ruffled:

And my bad side was as good as Silken lace,
But my good side had been erased,
Caracoled into the hungry sea;

And she scissored for awhile,
Doing short hand,
But had already made up her mind
To jump the bones more mother of pearl than
Me,

But the lady in the graveyard in the dressing
Room of worms then dust,
Wanted what good was left in me,
Asked, already engorged,
Why hadn't I come so she could put the words
Of her gravestone in me;

And I lounged all alone like a wolf over her
Stone in the great burned out center of the dead city.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Zoetrope

Vanishing in its place a pretty lie:

A tear shed by the angel whom had said she could

Never cry-

As a horse is held my father, as the airplanes

Fly into night

And night again- a page folded over into the spine

Of cannibalism:

And into the joys of flesh of busy mouths and

Busy organs:

Into the joys of ourselves perfuming the highways

In a night of parks and moonlight,

As the blue gills swam hoping to live forever

In the canals that moved so slowly

They were like a zoetrope

From the petrified forests of your forever heart.

Robert Rorabeck

Like A Zoetrope Turning For Lovers

Day of everlasting just needs rest
From prose and football games; those sad fingers
That act delectably upon the shoulder blades
Of opal treasures;
And I said this all before that it was a trick,
But I might just have been lying-
I am no super sleuth anyhow, the days are dying;
Or they are not:
Housewives think so; they are in their kitchens
Practicing,
Just as their pies are baking in their ovens,
And what of their husbands' doing? Who cares,
Their daughters bright unawares fully showing in
The last crenulations of the backyard pools;
It seems as if something is burning gloriously,
As if a present is being opened up;
As if to us our first words were returning,
Like airplanes that disappear into the crepuscule returning
From a mailbox with its flag up;
And the cities lay down and beg beneath us, and the houses
Fold up, old lovers move away like origami drifting into Snow;
And the seasons change, but this is the very same day,
The very first day that I've known: a resilient cheerleader
Changing gowns and looking pretty or sullen,
Depending on who's in town.
Either way, that gal is still putting on quite a show,
The world revolve and changing the complexions of its hemispheres
Like a zoetrope turning for lovers in her childhood's room.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Airplanes Across The Sky

I have such fear of all of these nothings
Out in the open of another busied truancy of an actual High school—as the plagiarisms make their rounds—
As the rainbows sing across the unicorns:
As I know nothing about what is underneath her things:
But I am thinking and drinking—
As there are voices outside of my house—as my unwholesome muse
Doesn't call anymore,
As all of her kites get stuck up in the trees:
Soon there will either be a fire or a hurricane, and there will Be nothing left to save us—
But the same minnows will transmogrify—why do they have To do that tomorrow or the day after tomorrow:
I will be drunk, and the flea markets will open underneath the overpass—
And the same amusements that I don't know will swing like Airplanes across the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Airplanes Up In The Sky

Come to me through the angles of lost
Science,
Of how the pleasant men used to have to Look at the earth:
Now there are no unicorns,
And all of the counties are taking down the Highest swings—it has something to do with Human relations
And the ways toward which the children
Have disappeared—
But somewhere in my house right now
Lies an echo of your memory that looks
Very much like you—
I almost didn't have the time to Graduate high school,
But the skulls are becoming further and Further unburied—
And the angels are beginning to look again
Like airplanes up in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Abandoned Infant

Ships sail on my glass,
And I drink to them, and bring all of that Weather to my lips;
The colors flush,
And I put fictional autobiographies into their still Warm graves,
Right next door to where I'd like to run my finger-prints
Over your yet burgeoning crow's feet,
Just as light polishes shadows upon fine silver wear:
I keep forgetting to buy a Frisbee and test it out
With my dog in the wide open bedrooms, the Angelic stadiums we sometimes call pastures:
Where I dream of floating over your androgynous zones,
Like a wandering spore, gusting myself over your Blushing shoulder blades, kicking my legs under your Puffed up dress:
All of this just to blow out the candles on a birthday cake,
Three centuries of flickering sunlight and the bulb is dimming,
But not yet visibly. Very soon I will progress to the next Stage, like Janus' other face, return to the state where You live and try to interest you without all my faculties,
As you embrace some other man's light,
And bathe in it like a creature who enjoys the teeming life
In the highest surfaces of water without knowing any name
For it, dancing in your flagella and stringy threads, Coming undone but Making love for awhile filling in the footsteps of tourists
After the tide washes in:
All the while I will do this for you,
And place myself like the bluest crèche, like an abandoned
Infant, some holy b-stard
Red and weepy at your door.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Engine In The Rays

Another day goes by doing what we're suppose to do:
A house a car
Out front of so many waves that you can't see:
Maybe that is what is affecting me,
Giving me tears as real as music boxes
With their delicate gears. I am not old
Enough to be falling apart, but I am not living,
Just turning around in one spot with my arms raised
As if I'm being held up,
As if this isn't my house I am naked in before the Rusting dawn, with only my pets looking at me,
My wife and daughter content and fully fed into dreams,
Open electricity:
I undress myself to you like the orchid-flower,
An engagement ring not knowing
What it does, not even having to be trained, and I imagine Your breasts too: nipped, Grecian sand dollars, vases from arms raised, like you are trying to Be a superhero doing good deeds along the gardens;
Thinking that you are floating like a pillow thrown up by A willful child,
And Ferris wheels and so many haunts we can only stay so
Long in, because they are so expensive and unreal;
But none of the tourists can see you like I perceive.
Even fully in a desert you are my own mirage, and you turn Yourself around to me and the traffic hasn't even started. Soon
Busses of school children slip in and out of the sea,
Trying it on, and you seem to smile.
Soon they will all be up, and the sun will be washing the waves
Just out the front door. The mail will come, and the dead will Raise; but before that happens, I will drink of you what I can,
I will overspill on your expensive energies. Maybe you will Smile- I don't know what you will do,
But I will believe in you, running, even after your shadow
Is gone from the breakfasting living,
I see you turning like an engine in the rays.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Erogenous Handshake

Could I kiss you for a better kind,
Force words into you like the press of tongue;
It has been literally years since I French-kissed
An orchid counter-clock wise,
Because she let me know, because she liked his Car and the way he was hung;
Is the sting more of a tickle, now because
The park is closed, there are drunken men moaning
On the swings, pulling teeth,
There are alligators unclenching in the torpid
Green changing rooms, I suppose.
When he lays on top of you, how does it make
You feel, to not have to be force-fed,
To take it in strides like a professional baseball
Player- I've been writing plays with your legs
In the center lines for so long. When I was younger
I let Indians kill me for my grandmother in between Papier-mâché snowflakes hung beneath the Australian pines, before I knew that I did not Know you, or that I've never seen the shaded Complexion of the areolas under your nocturnal
Shirt, or that I won't measure their circumference
With the bone of my index finger to the knuckle;
I've written over five-hundred poems this year and Published only one, but I am an author, and I signify
You and put in my habitat with glass walls and shampoo:
I hang you on my wall for a jack-off symphony,
Echoing the high-heeled affair along the piss-stained hall,
But I'd have a little bit of pride, if you'd let me
Put my right hand firmly to the base of your neck,
And hold you there like an erogenous handshake, sometimes
The way red buds in a garden, what the bees get at I'd get with you, because I've published one poem
This year, which amounts to first base,
A little bit of foreplay, ring around the rosy, to Taste your taste buds while looking you in the eye
With endearing honesty- When you see the novel,
To lie you down and travel back and forth without Much reason besides the tourism of your few landmark

Destinations.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Eternal Yesterday

I haven't seen you in three days, so how
Will you find me tomorrow,
But the blanchness of your old man, who buys lunches
For you whenever he can:
Some kind of kind old farmer, making love to your eyes:
Grey headed again now that the illusions that you so
Wanted have washed out,
But I still have both of my hands that have so well run over
You,
Like water over a kindergartener's lips, or from a fresh young
Water fountain in preschool;
And I know that you did all of your family's laundry today,
And pinned it all up in your back yard,
While you called me four times today. And I have to admit
That I pleased myself as many times think of your heartbeat
In my bedroom,
Like a butterfly pressed up against a copper horn, knowing in Some small intelligence that it was going to die and Change,
Like rain like clouds, or the airplanes passing through The promises of a rainbow; as I think upon you like an Eternal yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Immaterial Promise

Waves that weep in lagoons like homeless children
Kiss the feet of stingrays,
And look at me with broken glass eyes:
I go through them spreading my wings and hoping for Impossibly sunnier days:
I remember high school, reading Romeo & Juliet as a freshman:
I look up through the wild scuppernongs and wonder why I cannot
Be the fox that forever wants to crack her cheerleading
Joints, and suck the marrows;
And now the Mexicans are flooding back into the old country
Of extinct Indians: They are celebrating Easter right in the neck
Of palm beach,
The lavish houses surrounding the lagoon like a cathedral,
And I walk out alone and look up at what the sky is advertising:
I think of her, all the girls who can represent just one goddess
Folding clothes and baking pies for different gentlemen across
The waves;
Looking through the banners held in the teeth of clothespins,
Maybe they can see all the way across the traffic to the park, and
The little wilderness surviving there in the minutiae of their surcease:
That is where I am crossing the shallows, fingers out like whiskers
To feel the ripples she sends Like something that has suddenly gone away into a glowing bed under
The knees of cypress; and I wonder if looking up from her bedrooms
If she doesn't see me there, long jawed and hungry like a gaunt
Zoetrope that stretches through the darkness of her window
And lands like an immaterial promise across the foot of her bed.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Infant Of Terrible Daydreams

Narcoleptic, waving in their kelp skirts
Who fall fat onto the highway,
Bruised, unshelled terrapin:
The traffic doesn't mind them, all their Breathing body parts bisected by the Yellow lines
Painted by their overweight highwaymen-
And the sun is doing its pushups,
And I really want to cross the street
Pick her up halfway and figure out
The positions of her pinked engine and cranks-
I imagine though, that her eyes are
Oil tanks in full swoon,
That busty cadaver- she makes me a loon,
And the cypress thrashed with the red
Tongues of air-plants, waiting impatiently
For their pollinated lunch- For us to come,
And she's still sleeping like a white godiva fish
Tank- I would put her to my scarred
Flesh and flex and wax unbelievably to her, like an infant
OF terrible daydreams- while the school buses
Rushed,
And the housewives thumped in a fever dream of Jolly cabaret- and new cenotaphs of houses
Went up straight on stilts all around us-
And our old lovers melted away into their children
Who shot straight up like thunder brush to college,
While we remained in a time capsule of holidays,
Watching the bird of time crescent straight above us
Never losing its innocent color,
Until there were wild ba$tdard cities cradled on the crescent moon,
And all the beloved dead in soft crypt-orchid
Beds beneath our longwinded arcing swoon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like An Otter On A Calm And Salty Sea

Your house is proof that you live here,
But I still prefer to eat with the feral boys in their woods:
The night in its bed chamber making love to Invisibility,
The saints in your blue sheets as if your blue sheets were the sea:
Walls of different color looking over the sea:
Alma's soft brown legs curling in the caesuras, rising like
Cenotaphs or mailboxes:
Alma's beating heart a casino, a lucky streak down a ululating
Row;
Alma's children the nectar in a Hollywood garden
Above whose innocent caps Alma's fingers winnow as she takes Michael back and forth to school
Down Cherry row, where the crystalline animals play in the tiny Little gardens choking with Spikenard and scuppernongs, with the dogs barking;
But Alma has a new haircut: Like a vast-hearted sailor Alma conquers
The day,
The cars and airplanes riding out before Alma,
Until she closes the treasure chests of her eyes and floats to sleep
Like an otter on a calm and salty sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Angels Over The Stolen Bicycles

I get up into the affections where
The airplanes get so nettled,
Like the city fallen into the forest
Or my heart in the wires of the gutter—
Then the stewardesses don't know
What to do in the broken glass of
The orchard:
They seem to be turning around in mirages,
Reverberating to the cartography
Of the last days of her grief:
She stands before me, like a housewife after doing
The wash:
The stars are done crying,
And she flings herself across the canal—
Like the angel over the stolen bicycles and anon,
Anon, anon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Angels Purring In The Sky

Isn't every bachelor just as wounded
With their dogs,
And the cats making love outside:
But I just keep singing my song, and the waves come lushly,
Stupefied,
Proud that another aunt is getting married, and I am going too:
So that the rest of the family can have a look at my Scars,
While I am going down the canyon's heart,
And all of the world is falling away: candlelight dripping like
The tears of lighthouse,
An the airplanes are like angels purring in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Angels Rounding First Base

Mainstreams of white pages—the Mexicans play
Outside, all of them remembering
The frontera they needed to endure to get into Oz—
The airplanes jump across their brown shoulderblades
Like angels rounding first base—
They can stare up at them even though they do
Not know what to believe—
And their wives can threaten to run away,
But they all know that they will never leave:
Those things that were made to weep inside of houses.
The faithful dog sleeps at the foot of the bed,
But she keeps her heart somewhere else,
And I am left wondering if
It is anywhere close to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Angels That Didn'T Really Care

Scarred into the apologies of my landscaping-
While I was sitting at home and masturbating,
And you were making love
To anyone- like a stewardess doused in a ghetto
The night that the college was all lit up,
And the fields were crenulated with alligators
Learning of the inventions of walking
Upright with fire:
Then I wanted to tell your husband how many times
I made love to you
While the witches were still turning
Their soups of lost children in the soft pits of their Bread houses,
The airplanes flying back and forth across the Heavens like angels that didn't really care.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Angels That Evaporated From Sun Showers

Every night is an echo and it
Goes like this:
Who have you been making love to:
Who have you been making love to:
Now slumber,
And hush- and dream next to the black stove
While the fire is just an infant
The rains will smother,
While the bees and the butterflies make love
To the adulterous flowers,
And under the first brisk match the baseball games
Will pick up,
And summer will start with its lawnmowers
And jeweled dragonflies-
And we will remember together kissing her lips
At the zoo,
Like feeding a lonely animal reaching through
The narrowness
That keeps it there, like beautiful women in their Bedrooms,
Like angels that evaporate from sun showers.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Anna

Oh, what trouble I've begun
Tonight; it says its 7: 07, a palindrome,
Like Anna, like Anna, like Anna.
I am fishing at the lip of the canal,
And the land is so very flat, and dictionaries
Are floating with torn spines from the Last hurricane; and the city is no longer Recognizable. I sleep under her still,
And try and comfort her by telling her
That he will come again and make things
Right; but I know that he is gone,
As I am going too, graduated to the west
Carrying nothing but a thimble of crocodile
Tears towards the spell. His classes are over,
And there are new students, and the University
Has bought more land, and there are so many Students not a single one knows anybody,
But they are paying good money to learn something.
Then at night, she has wondered into the bar,
And all the men are drinking, and looking at her legs.
Just a couple blocks over, where the land is very,
Very flat, the dog walks under the swings in the Park connected to the elementary school,
Where there should be lovers, where I swung with Her and then away, for now there is nobody.
She has new dreams, and starts out upon them by Kissing him, and taking his name; perhaps,
A palindrome, like Anna, like Anna, like Anna,
Or any other.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Another Animal

If the day yellows, it sings to her as it curls up,
Winnowing its airplanes who are coming down
Like whippoorwills of dreams
To fasten to her hair, and sing to her of secret springs
With epiphanies of animals lapping there:
They are all there, like a zoetrope of astrological signs,
All the possible loves of her life,
A rest stop up in the woods my mother took me to,
And never once while I was there was I thinking of her:
This new girl, this thing or muse that I have made Love to for these last eight months, who sings to Me from so far away and then, like another animal
Migrating with the sun, and happily distracted from her
Way home, goes out of her way to put away my fears,
Coming over after it is almost done, and makes love
To me.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Any God

Whatever joy that there is walks the streets
Down to the rose garden
For a single tear- or an uncoupled word beside the Church, as blue as she is-
She cannot fly- There she is, waiting in the flesh of Her birthday,
Because that was all that I could write for her,
As the days held over as if in a traffic jam-
Waiting for her with the cloisters of honey in
The apiary made out of a dry rotting home,
While the cross
That they held up to her muse vanished in the waves
With the rest of the Indians,
As the wet sea horses came upon the land-
The trucks and the iguanas watching them, inside the little Places in which they were left- and I was there,
Armless, captured by her blue eyes upon a carpet
Or upon a canvas invented for her,
The pain I was feeling for her like any god that wasn't even Real.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Apple Orchards Sunken Into The Sea

How are our soul jettisoned by this gravity—
And the classrooms of our behests swarm with infections of Insects—
I remember slipping beside you on a swing underneath
The helicopters as the day moved like
A Ferris Wheel, and then carrying you on my shoulders
Into the sea—but I am like words on a tongue
That cannot speak—That is why I failed you,
And why I come out only at night from underneath
Overpass my father flung me under—
And wounded, cry to you of these pains, though you
Are like a fire galloping up hill and away from me—
Or like an arrowhead shot and stuck into the imperturbable
Flesh of a giant doing pinwheels in the sky—
Maybe he is the one who has stolen you, giving you
As a heart to a coliseum—where I imagine you,
Beating away—languishing and cooking for your children,
Your reflection like apple orchards sunken into the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Beautiful Serpents

Now I have a blond and you have a blond,
And my house is clean and it has two bicycles outside
Laying in the zoetrope of dancing moonlight
And something else that cannot possible be seen:
While my father if figuring out horses in another world
Of ghost sheets,
And the salient plans of the uncountable bodies that no longer
Move,
While the momentum just keeps pushing us on the swings,
And the eyes widen engorging like beautiful serpents
Something insatiable and hungry for us to learn.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Beautiful Siamese Twins

The children who didn't live for real
Are hidden in September,
Or in the graveyards with all of the defeated generals,
Or with unicorns too- I know:
The housewives who don't bat an eyelash but who take Their sexy stance out from my toy chest,
Swinging their hips beside the diamond pools
And beneath the gaunt and sexy cenotaphs of airplanes:
And I have had dreams in which I was beautiful,
And in which I was with Alma too:
That I was Alma's only boy, and only ride:
And we laughed long and naked along the lonely country
Side,
And we both had the guts to summit and see the righteous uprising
Of god's glorious epiphany
That shot like an arrow on fire over the enemy's wall,
And tore down the steeples
And felt all of her flesh: she who could not be avoided:
She who was all that we were fighting for:
It was our manifest destiny,
And we were selling fireworks while our hearts still beat,
And the sea drooled on each side of us
Like beautiful Siamese twins who had no one to answer to.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Bicycles Sleeping

Acrobatics in the crypts,
Cribs of tomorrow—
I sing to you as song birds over their Cannibalisms,
Joyful that no academics or housewives
Will have to awaken tomorrow
To hear these things:
Like the waves—there will only be
The backwards rush of traffics,
Of school children who are having trouble
Breathing off again—
And pet cemeteries underneath the newly Mowed and verdant sky:
And people making money,
Or coming across from Mexico to make money:
Like children going to Sabbath school, like bicycles sleeping in
The shallow estuaries of the canal—
Not knowing where they have gone—
But singing softly to no one in particular—
As the airplanes and the angels fly so high that They cannot possibly hear a thing.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Birds

Sometimes when it rains in my dreams
You come to me through damp oak trees,
When the day is but a suggestion of Grandfather's light smoking between the leaves.
When the sound is soft and pattering,
You sashay towards me in your mother's cotton dress.
We dance together in a falling world as
The showers rattle down through the Scribbles of sleeping limbs, we too come together
After daylight has gone out and moonlight comes in,
And the weather abates and watches you in my arms.
You grin like a woman who knows who she is,
And I kiss you and taste the dampness of your lips,
Like tiny wet oak leaves beginning to burn.
Holding you, the world just turns and turns,
And on the swings we hold hands and Fly for a little while just like birds....

Robert Rorabeck

Like Blind Men Imagining A Diamond

Secret fountain listening to the hummingbirds
In the garden:
Build at right angles to her trinkets-
Thick with the amoebas of tadpoles
Bathing in green membranes
The traffic could never think of intruding,
So when the orange fell it stayed there
And rotted,
As the waves danced over her shoulders,
And she lay in peace,
As the roses whispered, sucreasing from
Her grasp,
And the mollusks opened up to her
Like blind men imagining a diamond.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Bright Sunlight Underneath The Moon

Muse- I want to see you wearing barrettes
In Paris-
Alma- rings of golden satellites between brown
Knuckles-
Warm sweet kisses underneath broken school
Busses- Alma-
Warm sweet places, like hot clay in
Art class- and easels waiting in the broken
Monuments of honeysuckle daylight
With saw horses underneath open hearts:
The way the wilderness waits across the canal
For you- Alma,
To step into the crepuscule of the burning sugar canes
At the dead ends of suburbia,
To leave the senses to go to sleep behind you,
And to start our barefooted, your feet
The size of toy boats, as you exhilarate the heavens
And pull them down to examine your own heavens-
And they see the truth to your passivity,
As the canoe lays tinkered up to the bank, underneath
The holly you left behind
Being given little kisses to its throat by tadpoles
Whose only hope is for metamorphosis
To join with your heavens- to bask across the Fields who grow rich in the antediluvian things that
Evolve in your longing classrooms-
They follow you- muse, as you go leaping,
Caramel- muse of honey and applesauce-
Like bright sunlight underneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Brighter Things

Diamonds in the daydreams and rain clouds
Of your pugilistic heart-
While I'm just trying to survive for you by Swimming,
And the long journey is told to the desire of
The opened throats of reptiles
Who are carnivores, and waiting for your stores
To open-
And what lights when they do! Why, I don't Suppose you could ever be More surprised- all of this talented stuff they Keep heaped about the mailboxes
Of trailer parks- and then you have your Old love,
As now you have your new love,
And now this- and won't it be a beautiful wound
When you have something else-
When we have to try for just a little while Underneath the national monuments who Are headed into the sea- like
Sea monsters:
And this is Halloween, and you are not here, Alma,
But you are out on the streets with your children
And with your sisters,
And I wonder how long you can make me believe
In falling continuously for you-
As the lights know their own cathedrals and Stadiums, and go to them like schools of Minnows, wishing that they could grow up
To survive like brighter things in another world.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Butterflies

I cannot remember how I have not slept beside you,
Bottle rocket across the canal,
Leopard without any spots—
Above me, just the tan elbows of airplanes—
The soft joy taken across the lazy, one-eyed river
And made love to
While the girls and the boys are at a completely
Platonic picnic,
And grandmother has been preparing for Christmas—
Well, school is out and the prospects the baseball
Game are not half bad—
We can only move upwards from here:
Seeing there is so much joy in airplanes leaping,
Like puppets being thrown up to the sweet armpits
Of god—
And me languishing on the cinderblock steps,
The soft pattering of the bullfrogs—
And the snake curled up underneath the hollow,
Belly filled by kittens,
The housewife in her negligee doesn't know—
The aloe tingles like wind-chimes expectantly—
The world of yellow nimbus,
The fruit of wind-chimes,
And the long bus rides home to think of these Things while the children whisper and grasp
Like butterflies.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Butterflies Wilting Onto A Flower

Every valley has its song,
Its fruit indented in the balms of beautiful girls who Have gone to sleep to early:
Like every child has his world, and if he is lucky
Bicycles and worms to sacrifice for fishing
While you are in your house tonight,
And it makes me laugh to imagine you naked
Save for roller-skates because where you live that is very Difficult,
But even more beautiful: That your every night is a church,
And you have already killed me like a sacrifice for breakfast
Like butterflies wilting onto a flower even while they Are mating.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Candles Are Held Up To Wishes

It feels rich, these foibles of camouflage,
Making love at the races, grasping for one another's hands
While the butterflies are torn like empty tickets,
As the fabulous tenements burn up to the skies,
As the dogs run free and naked over the yards where the Cars don't even park,
So who's to say, Alma, if soon we once again won't be Making love,
And holding each others eyes up to our lips like candles
Are held up to wishes.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Cats Who Have To Put Things Down

I pay for anyways: and I die, or I go
To lunch:
Skipping stones over the haunches of bicycles, while
No one from my school can remember me:
I cannot remember myself:
I am selling Christmas trees: Now look at this pretty crowd
Lost in the chalky bleachers before the hurricane:
What do they have to say for themselves:
They are just as numerous as the stars, even as they divide,
And the sharpened tips of every wave,
Colliding, returning to the shoulder blades of their sorority:
And perhaps some lines are good, but it
Is too made up,
Like frantic legions along the white walls of some moon attired
Graveyard,
Panting like cats who have to put things down-
And black people skipping rope and making promises of Banishment all across the wispy tenements and gunny smoke of Some woebegone and waylaying ghost of a town.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Chariots For Little Girls

New scars tarrying where they will- always, always tarrying;
And I have had my fill, and would have found my unrequited
Love returned and returned
Bright and spendingly in bathtubs and pools, in the open day
And in the open Bible of housewives,
Except for these excuses I have somehow unwontedly given to Myself,
So that I could sing alone, casting the last sweet breath of Mine out into the darkest contamination of the most Poisonous of mines; and so I sing
Like a homeless man watching after puppies in the shallowest
Of gutters beside the traffic:
I sing like a rattlesnake to the kittens in their bag given over
To the weeds and the pu%sy-willows
Where the murderers lay relaxing just some feet from the pretty Lilies,
Where the frogs sing they too coming up from their metamorphosis
Amidst the sticks in the mud;
And the airplanes sing high above them like bottle rockets with Feathers,
Like chariots for little girls and their beautiful mothers.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Children In The Sky

Looking up now—children in the sky—guts of butterflies
Over flying saucers: kissing cousins,
As high schools reopen and spend their afternoons
Weeping in the fabricated existence of adolescent wisdom:
And all around the blooming tombstones,
The housewives circulate: shopping and coming to Check the pools, but there are no stanzas in their eyes
And unrecognizable words hurt their souls—and that is why
I wait right here—masturbating in a park in just the right
Corner underneath a cypress where they cannot see me,
Where the light pools, skipped off the underbellies of airplanes
Cutting so sharply that they make the earth squint like a Diamond—and before it is over, she is already gone—
Gone into the earth like a womb that gives her bouquets
And addresses her with the epitaphs whose only wish is to Remember her name.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Christmas Trees

This is often the summer, or the way the housewife Feltâ€leaving herself beside the Long necklaces of the poolsâ€while the diamonds
Sparkled off of her and her armpits,
And the alligators waited downwind from her:
Yes, they were lesser godsâ€;
As her youngest son skipped school and lit off fireworks
Atop of the roof just a few doors down from herâ€;
As they carried up furniture to all of the heavensâ€;
And the canals sang torpidly to their own amusements,
And to the space rockets farting off retarded into The skyâ€;
Here are the spume of her cathedralsâ€;her areolas
Lapsing sensuously into the caesurasâ€;
As her canals become overcome with the raptures
Of the churches she can no longer feel right to Attendâ€;they illuminate her and make her a cathedral,
As, however, her swiftest hero is surely coming
To meet herâ€;fighting off all of the monstersâ€;skeletons
And werewolves regenerating on the other side
Of the bends of the catacombsâ€;until she crosses the Canal to meet me, and we kiss full mouthedâ€;
The tortoises languishing there, like Christmas trees
Underneath the tents of things we still have to sellâ€;
But for a while we are safeâ€;in the sidelines of the Amusementsâ€;as the airplanes swell
Into the skies until
There is no more room to moveâ€;and we have to meet
Her eyes even though the lamplight is turned to Meet the gardens of another man.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Clockwork Skipping

Pillbox of hammers upon hammers—multitudinous,
Exponential—missing items of the missing heroes—
And in the morning, as bright as yellow,
The busses overflow with school children,
Wayward and yet knowing their destinations;
All at a loss as they travel out upon the field—
What weapons will emboss their shoulders, what shields
Both big and round—
They do not know how defeat their enemies,
But for the next four years they will have to learn
To confront them, as their hearts work like
Clockwork—skipping over their fears like chess pieces
Making for the safe angles hidden in the invisible wings
Of angels that seem to sleep forever and forever
All over that town.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Cloud Buried Under The Stone

Going to bed through the brightness of clouds
Blearing like kindergarteners wearing orange at the pool:
Bodies unscarred, just plucked from their mothers
Who think that the air-conditioning is a natural occurrence:
I stole so many trinkets in kindergarten:
I stole the entirely jubilant rug: I stole it for Chelsea
Because I was a kindergarten thug:
My mug was crooked but golden: my grandmother took me to
The palm beach zoo and science museum:
Now my grandmother sleeps like stones under the clouds:
Her body ruptures, and her hair grows like clouds:
Beautiful women from India wearing their chemise- Wash naked
Next to the jaguars and the cheetahs, walk barefoot and naked
Across the wide open cemeteries:
So brown and cool, like perfect mud slipped through the fingers
Of a sculptor,
While the airplanes burn and gyre so far up above;
And looking up, I wonder if they can even remember her:
Who she was,
While the earth turns like cooling marble- not as pretty as it was,
Or prettier-
While girls from India look up with eyes from all of their lives,
And my grandmother still grows like cloud buried
Under the stone.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Comely Hallucinations

Despondent mayhem, all of your super heroes
Are losers;
And now I hate you, and take back all of my bouquets,
And I wont sell red roses:
I take them back, and keep drawing rivers on my desk
That go outside of class,
And icebergs that sink beneath your skirts:
You sit inside me still, burned like all that is forbidden into My eyes. I stare straight forward while my friends
Go off and roller-skate and make love in pet cemeteries,
And still you come up
Like a bad rumor; and I want to starve myself until I find Myself alone at night by the light that has been declassified,
And now is darkness;
And I want to return beside you to the classes that are no Longer real, and I want to touch our disbelieving and put my fingers
Around one of your ornamental joints,
And laugh in the shallow basins of a bird bath.
Just to do that thing, thinking of you in the reasonable somnambulence
Of what we all supposed to be real, or hoped along as cripples
When we were still young and unconcerned about seeing what Hemispheres lay like comely hallucinations spread out like
The blankets of lovers from the summit of unobtainable mountains.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Cormerants In Luxuriant Hell

Black men sleek and creaking through the woods-
Twelve percent white men because their old masters
Were up to no good-
Maybe a little native American according to their Taboo, but that is lucky toothed rubbish-
And today we sell gardens on the carport of fifes,
Older young men and young older wives:
And the sky, why wasn't it just the witch's sacrificial
Knife: and yards and yards of cystic clouds,
And young born strangers richly accorded: We sold
Them an entire garden we wish we could have afforded:
And I jogged alone at night beside the canal;
And in Arizona my puppies howl- but our harpoons Found the angels and dragged them purple hearted into Our balmy garden sale; yeah, like cormorants in luxuriant hell.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Corpulent And Boisterous Tourists

My mother didn't realize that this was A satire,
Growing up and worshiping Satan in the white
Flowers,
The moon like smut over her pale shoulders:
Maybe she was a fish,
Or maybe I should not be singing anymore, seeing
All the wrong I have done,
All the cars I have crashed- They said after the Evils and the journeys to the secret skating rinks Down deep in the basements in the Middle of high school, they had to put my face back
On like a kaleidoscope,
And all the meanings of affluence escaped my lips,
And the pretty girls no longer loved me;
But I still want to be the chief of some beautiful little House,
Like a little country between Spain and France,
And I wish to grow grapes; and more than anything I hope
To see her riding out through the day, this beautiful reason
In no need of any other occupation,
But to enjoy the songs I sing to her, to watch me swordfight
Amazingly with the mailman,
And then to touch her in the copious darkness of our lover's
Box,
Mobiles and ceiling fans spinning,
Her womb like a roadside garden of tulips my lips attend
Like corpulent and boisterous tourists.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Cremations Into That Air

They made their persuasions at his elbows—
Like mongooses in a used car sale,
And I remembered her as I worked alone
Before the sun's blindness:
Attributing thought to her, trying to call her to my Bareknuckled shoulders in her absence:
She used her other senses—followed a dog underneath
A Christmas tree tent and fell asleep in A forest that couldn't drink—
Beside a canal where the iguanas and turtles teamed
And the black men and Mexicans lingered
Their hair and fingers intermingled with the ants
Who slipped down to see the blue gills
Drinking their fill on either bank—as the airplanes
Rose like cremations into that air.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Ephemeral Roses

As if the very wildflowers were your family:
Alma, but I am still right
Here, like a rattlesnake with a sweet tooth for your Woebegone ankles,
And it feels alright to lie that I wont bite you:
You only weigh one hundred and ten pounds and you
Are really a sight, especially when I can lie down
Across you like a buzzard on its eviscerated
Highway and make love for eons,
As the moon showers us with the preposterous and light
Hearted gifts,
As the lines end and begin again, underneath the Indian
Monuments of the earth,
The stone rainbows, or the ways to remember you own kind;
And to just kiss your lips again in the semi-permeable
Atmospheres underneath the overpasses of any kind of flea
Market would feel like it would be enough,
As quarters are enough for the homeless regiments surrounded
By the eager cannibals,
Lying down after dinner to sleep with the man of your young;
And it all seems to bleed away into other immortal promises
That you swear you will no longer read:
But the Virgin of Guadalupe remains your goddess,
Remains my goddess,
And the fires in her hearth of promises are like ephemeral roses
Whose burns are very real.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Ethreal Chorus Lines

She is buried in Bellfontaine:
The cars stroll like rain washed gentlemen,
Or above her the oaks whisper,
They don't say a thing, and this is not
Ariel, Sylvia Plathe's immortality,
This is not even her kitchen, or a customer
Who might have entered into that endless foray
Upon spick-and-span linoleum; but it wonders
Did they keep that oven of a guillotine in someplace
Sacred and higher up, as in on an alter, and why wasn't
She anointed as a saint? I can see her from where I stand
In the shade of the broken pines; but she goes forever upward,
Her neck dissolved by the hand of god compressing her like
A brutal lover, holding her like the trunk of a Christmas tree:
She should stay with him forever, signifying the thoughtlessness
Of the pre-suburbia now passed through. Everything has gotten Bigger, but only in the common sense, for she has dissolved
Altogether like a tablet of a pill, or given birth to a thousand
Doves hatched from a crèche at her breasts: I would have made
Love to her, if given the time, and compared scars, if she'd Lifted me up those fretful cliffs, and laid me there like a child
Her head happens upon, stuck there sideways above the ether
And the multitudes of cars, watching the convection waver
Like ethereal chorus lines of baking apple pies.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Fattened Lizards In Your Body's Song

Windmills disposed to know they are necking,
Like flowers breaking themselves,
Looking up with glorious beauty but no wonder
In a hillside of towns which is desirously
Helpless;
And you are there, plutonic, with eyes like the minerals
Of blue jays,
Your children with popguns and candies too beautiful
To eat:
The traffic swims and your lips move, and I try to Match them
In the hemisphere of smoking cannons,
Heavily breathing; I have never touched
You unwontedly, but I should like too:
Upon the swings that always move predestinedly;
The song I put off to you, like a lucky curse silly kissing
In the palmettos;
Like the still life or pieta of an unsunken grotto,
All the proof I need in the absolute absence of shadows in This courtyard;
And I am underneath you, like a cat purring while the Stones are basking like fattened lizards in your body's song.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Fireworks For A Blind Man

So hard is the disillusion of the body—
The miscegenation of time and gravity,
The wilting of Disney Word like wet,
Old wood into the peat bod—
Eventually nobody gets up,
And the robbers lose their gold—
What is left of the world gets beautiful by Itself—and heaven happens like a fireworks
Show for a blind man who disappeared
Many years ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Fireworks Upon Their Knees

Burn my soul in a hole—in a hole as deep as a bucket—
As a bucket waking up on Sundays—
And teach me—teach me to rhyme and sing like a king—
Like a king come Tuesday—
Come Tuesday, with all of his busied alphabet
Spilled upon the shore:
And it just doesn't have to happen until—until she is Beautiful—
With the pallid fish in their buckets—like knights hanging in
The trees—
Until all of the story is beautiful—beautiful—
The most beautiful parts running alongside of the highway
And kissing—kissing her up her knees—
Knees-

(In an uneven stretch
In Miami—
In the shoulder blades of the evangelical tr—
The coral Castle in Mondays—
Like fireworks upon their knees.)

Robert Rorabeck

Like Fish In A Young Aquarium

Washing away the salt from your lips,
Bending over the drinking fountain in the hallway
In the middle of the day,
Lost in a daydream—you don't wish to be taken
Back to class—
Blessings swimming around your perfumed joints
Like fish in a young aquarium—
This is all the beauty that I've learned to have,
And it disappeared into some classroom abandoned
Half a lifetime ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Flowers Beneath The Sea

Somnambulant and shut out of doors and I am still hungry,
Waiting for her truth to return home against
The current—
The cat is waiting for her too, but for different
Reasons,
And the students pretend to read books
I haven't assigned to them—
And all of my scars collect into as kaleidoscope
That they think is best kept indoors:
These are the same spirits that I show to you,
As I read about zombies by the Light of a living room that has been sold so
Many times—
As I remember his hands building through
The dead homes of the seas corals,
Trying to make something beautiful for you out
Of corpses—but soon you will be home
Anyways—if you learned your way passed
The wolves in the apple orchards—
As I pressed the swings into the empty cathedrals,
Like the fish stamping their lives into the heavens,
Their gills like flowers beneath the sea,
Wondering as they did so if there wasn't any other Way that they knew to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Folded Paper

In the sunlight in the morning
The cars shine without riders in the chicken coop
On Sunday they dropped off behind us
A ways back into Church the schoolyards emptied
Trying an ambush underneath the swing sets
Down hill from the graveyards
As the fires burned all of Arizona,
And the rattlesnakes took shelter in your yard:
In your yard, there wasn't any grass,
But there was a pleasantness- the school busses Lingered after the butterflies and Indians were Gone-
Liked sundials emptying their throats
Out onto the lawn,
Doubling back in chartreuse holidays,
Their wives as yellow as their summers-
And they made love to her- or they pretended to make Love to her even after she was gone,
Like paper folded paper and thrown across the lawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Footsteps In The Snow

Oh, longevity of a cathedral,
And paper snowflakes wishing you were Here, just as stewardesses, yawning,
Step out onto tarmacs,
Like flowers in their high basins:
There is nothing evil or Supernatural about them, and yet they Exist outside of books:
You can scramble up the long side of heaven
To reach them,
And call them the verbs of epiphany:
They will kiss you- They will even make Love to you for just as long as
The lions roar:
But then they recognize you as but a tourist
Once again, and they take you
Down from their suckling bosom
And set you like a fox at the door
Far from their orchards where their brown
Stems grow,
As the clouds cover up their summits,
Like footsteps in the snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Glass Blowers

Words in the bottom of a brook,
Counting stones and looking backwards at the fish
Swimming up stream
Changing classes in this part of America:
Up in the sun: nosebleeds, airplanes,
And stranded visitors who will die victorious
While mothers sip wine in their yards
And look across a street of roller skates,
Entirely ignoring the heads of the serpents batched
Into the landscaping and boiling their young
Through the cedar chips:
Moving in a particular void that burns with ruby light,
In an entire city hypnotized
And enjoying the somnambulating of a bed that weeps
As the moths crowd the windows
Slapping their lips to her like glass blowers who Will never reveal the secret ingredients of what They do not know how to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Golden Cornfields Wreathing

Antelope in the rose bushes
Tangled around the slopes of tomfoolery:
There they are, prizes lost
For lovers,
Underneath the infernal jet liners
Who are going all the time
To the orient,
And leaving over the moon and the Pacific Ocean
As the butterflies get lost in Mexico:
And the stewardesses upon them become, somehow,
Cheap angels of another
Dream- and their pilots, like their demigods,
Are underpaid but well nourished
With their bottles
The geniis have succeeded from:
And the highways lie tangled beneath them,
The wolves running freely-
The mountains yellow and crooning
With Chanticleer somewhere in the armpits
And their antlered cuckoldry growing down their Slopes like golden cornfields,
Wreathing, that the heavens shine upon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Goldenrods Towards The Moon

Travelling boys put to rivers—
As cemeteries overflow the northeastern part
Of the city—
Where Sara Teasdale is buried—
And buildings of red bricks tumble like donkeys:
These age old canyons of the Saint Louis
Slums I've driven by once upon a time
On my way to sell fireworks for some bum—
Where the moon cavorted over the golden arches
In the fast food temple filled with black people,
Where there is no Fountain of Youth
For a thousand miles—
And where the airplanes never touch down
The stewardesses in their diamonds fearing the lack of Water, the way their eyes turn like goldenrods towards
The moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Hapless Kites

I don't want to play around with you
Again, around the parks of the dead railroads
Or the willows of the murdered
Girls: I have felt your brown skin in my ghostly
Hand,
And put it inside you like clay in a lost school
Yard the children are abandoning
Like hapless kites, as the weather floods
Whatever existence that is there's to have,
And they go away:
Softly. Butterflies laugh at them, and the housewives Never look up to see how it is that their Children all but disappear.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Harmless Fireworks

Boss in the shellfish of my tears:
You are playing the last minuets over our gravestones
In the highest mines,
And this is real, the smoking mannerisms of light into
This work hyperventilating through the evergreens;
And girlfriends in the blue tents shaving to look good
For the cavalier gods
Blowing their trumpets over their mountains,
And stampeding in a fraternity through the shallow surfaces
Of the heavens, like seahorses multiplying in the brines
In the manifold cradles that smear like jelly
Around the lips of the smiles of Crocodiles; as tomorrow there will surely be another sun coming
Around,
And the heroes underneath her embarrassment, cheering in the Golden camps that the bears intrude,
Hunting like saber tooth for the lottery tickets and pomegranates
Made up or wished up
Like harmless fireworks sleeping in the atmospheres
Of fabulously volatile propane.

Robert Rorabeck

Like High Priced Traffic

Eye sockets tell the lies of high priced liars,
S-,
And the night is forever warm like high
Priced traffic and piss,
And I just want to live forever, S-,
At the summit of your unobtainable kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Honeysuckle Far Underneath A World That Any Man Can See

Overeager, through the per severances of Rainy theft- looking out
Through the windows of the first house
My parents ever had-
Long winded, distended to the elements-
As the night whispers of conquistadors
Basking
Underneath the Easter Baskets we dressed up
For:
Now I own my own house in a little world
That doesn't belong to me-
Eager to seize that telltale raiment that Lays scattered in the yard
Like a marriage for the red ants- who see their Cousins in the holly berries,
Or look up to the sky and say that is the thing:
Will they ever reach the sky at the end of The yard, they wonder- they plunder through the Grass, and bare their heads to a queen
Who kisses them like honeysuckle
Far underneath a world that any man can see.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Houses And Their Tiny Swimming Pools

I think that you should come upstairs
And drink with me,
Because there is nothing else the doctor can do:
You've already showed every young man in the regiment
Your tits:
The sun washed you amidst the clay-figured wild flowers
Along the battlefield,
While planes flew and plummeted:
And the peacocks grew in the shady symmetry of what Seemed to be rainbows,
Along the cut in the valley from which the mountains grew,
And there the cliff dwellings and the ceremonies
Of the perfected virgins who could become Stewardesses underneath the ornaments of birds of prey;
And someone said there was just a little house off in the Forest of your hair,
Back in the elegance of this unseemly painting;
And from it a bride rode over the creek and went to school.
The buses turned and returned and the sugar cane
Flumed. The green copper cannons rolled in, and the wind
Blew;
And the beautiful girls went and then returned to their Little houses and their tiny swimming pools all of which was Hidden from view.

Robert Rorabeck

Like It Always Does

Sun glints on the insouciant promenade,
Yes it does- Like it always does,
Like a queenly octopus who isn't ever afraid,
Or just like javelins of burning lemonade;
And the boys and girls does what they always Does,
Get up and shave their peachy fuzz:
Get up and get paid while the sun, their ever burning
Mother keeps them warm in her oblique nest,
And the oceans brush like tears
Of a giant unlucky in love, the oldest and most Unremembered giant;
Yet it does- Like it always does.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Jasmine In The Seances

Sleeping in the carport of the high school where I now
Teach,
All of the heavens out of reach- and my body filibustering
For angels who will never learn-
As the sky is a cathedral that will always burn,
And looking up into her
As the airplanes cross her skirts, and are in her hair
As if barrettes- like girls famished in a
Busied Eucharist,
Waiting for the swing-sets to set- while all of the housewives
Are getting wet- wet-
And the jewelries around their necks, a Ferris Wheel-
A midway above the notches of her clothes,
Recoiling softly- dismissive as a single night into which
The frog princes sing- sing of metamorphosis-
Sing, sing-
To the mirages in the desert- of words that have never found,
Of possibilities never reaching the flesh of tongues
Into a strange chorus where there are no gods exactly
But there is a certain metamorphosis
Of the daily thought: of how I can change into a prince for you:
How I can lay out my raiment across the fields for you,
In your legs of whatever colors you are:
Over the mowed grassed and the trimmed hedges of ixora-
Celebration how this has become a game without any Touchable rewards, just as if these were knights
Adventuring naked, into the wilderness without swords:
Or across the rivers who come grandly, cutting us out
Of our middles,
As we sleep as soundly as minnows drooled outwards onto
Our pillows- into a popular world of our dreams,
With paper snowflakes for our weathers- and paper airplanes of
Our dreams:
We come down softly as winnowed hoof prints into our Meadows, in the daydreams of our twilight
Like jasmine in the séances of our artistic sleeping walking:
I reach out to touch you, the wind marking my fingertips,
The windows staring into the open yards-
As the goldfish always see the truancies rising just as wildflowers

In the trauancies of our escapes.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Jewels Being Put To Sleep

Standing out in the beautiful Pygmalion
Wearing our purple
Baseball caps- and the atmosphere as blue
As an egg shell over
Where she does: across the student parking
Lot, the kaleidoscope of a truant's
Memory dances,
And the children skip on home, laughing
With tongues cerulean:
And I swear amongst them: that I have seen
An airplane, like an angel,
But I am left with only so many words to Describe her- and very soon even those few Things will evaporate
And the yard will quiet like jewels being put
To sleep- but I have no memory of What she does after that.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Katydid on Her Summits

They made love so many times underneath the silent Passes.
The roses kept on growing right over the silently laying
Prostitutes just where they had planted them
That the tourists past everyday like headlights in
The night, and fled to Disney World damming up
The yuk yuks where the cartoons were always Kissing themselves and then falling down the jubilees
Of the cataracts and taking pictures and eating
Cotton Candy, like the Titans do with the clouds:
And she is up there holding my last grave like a pill
Box filled with the jumping beans possessed by Her ancestors- the train tracks of the impassable heavens
Hollow resonating with her fever like the amber
Tears of a forest passing down and dancing for the most Intrepid of tourists: the young boys with the longest legs
Struggling up the mountains alone and well after midnight
Daring to see what they will be turned into,
Like rabbits leaping to kiss the lips of a rattlesnake:
As she calls down to them her ever changing gifts:
And they sit like kins for salt lick in the monuments of Her dinner table- breathless, and they lose
Themselves up there above the forests and the butterflies:
Their girlfriends calling up to them from so far below,
They will never answer, because soon they will lose
Their bodies like katydids on her summits, and then
They will be dancing ever after in a zoetrope of the spirits
Of the intrepid men, which is her business to be at Busily collecting.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Kindergarteners Holding Hands

Up- and upping the arrow-
Gutteral throats in
The Adam's Apple:
I think of Vachel Lindsay and I want to Get hard ons and play video games
Once again for Zelda-
The arms of heaven in the orchard:
Your sweet lips cast out to sea:
And how many bottles has it taken to find you-
So many action sequences in the deep Pornographies of the forest
Trying to rub
Out geniis-
While Huck and Jim take on so many aliases
Floating down the Mississippi
Past so many fast
Food joints- and the churches of Rattlesnakes-
Until, back again in your blue eyes,
The cascades of sinks and faucets-
And, inevitably,
The breathless orchards of the royal nonesuch-
Like kindergarteners holding hands
On another fieldtrip that they cannot possibly remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Kissing Cousins

So there is a home down from the Mountain
Where there are lemon trees highly acidic
In the moonlight
Where wolves never tend to linger,
And old, wizened teachers who sit out on
The cinderblocks,
Puckering their lips at the foxes and whittling
Little dolls,
As there is a broom in this sky above them,
Sweeping all of their old wives to
The horizons,
But the airplanes are lingering- lingering
Like kissing cousins to the weather
Balloons of a sentimental birthday.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Kissing Your Mouth

Parks of windows looking out
Into truancy and fireworks where all
Of the blue birds are decorating
Their nests in the necks of Cypress- or other beautiful words,
I don't know- like kissing your mouth
In the sunlight
In the snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Knights On A Quest From Far Away

If you'll smile I'll believe there are Angels in Puerto Rico
And not only cheap rum,
And we'll find some way to evacuate the Airplane together,
As our plans become dissolved
Like virgins in acid—
Even if the rainbow disappears and
The better poets disappear into
The civil wars of Spain,
And you have no more time for me
Right now—
All what isn't eaten becomes pretty decoration
For you on Christmas,
While my wife sings in the shower,
And our child who is a little boy we'll name after My father grows and grows
In the oriental orchards of her belly—
And somewhere the sun will rise along the Contours of the highway, and the little Runaways will feel like knights,
Will feel like knights on a quest from far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Knives Through Birthday Cake

Jumping for joy, the waves jump above the fire hydrants
And the sailfish jump
As if pooled by the looming moonlight, or something about
That night anyways,
While a muse as old as kindergarten or at least as old
As fifth grade
Leaves her husband for a cheap captain of any other ship:
While I remember her there on the shell rock road
Counting astrological
Mythologies of toads and washing machines- while I was Still working with my parents,
And living in the trailer parks of abandoned nurseries;
And all of my thoughts drifted towards her
Like a cloud of pollen escaping to the petting zoo of A rattlesnake,
And rolling over her shoulders for her to kiss me:
And she kisses me one time,
And swings with me: away, away, away:
One kiss- Now she is with a new man and thinks that she's Been baptized, but it is too early to know,
And her four children awaken beside her, shedding themselves
Like katydids at least twice a week,
With the palmettos cutting up the sunlight like knives through Birthday cake.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Lost Airplanes In A Week Of Clouds

Words like lost airplanes in a week of clouds—
The sun upon the summit of another birthday,
My grandmother with a soul of sea shells,
And other words that seem to defeat themselves—
Like lovers crisscrossed on their birthdays—
Where the righteous men have to linger over
The precipice while
My wife thinks she is drunk and speaking
With her aunt on the phone,
The baby and other planets kicking inside of Her belly—
And the espionage of another muse is kicked
To the sea while the birds
Like old people
Turn into another hotel for the night
Warmed by the armpit of Disney World—attended to and paying tips
To the fiberglass angels
Just to hear
And to pretend
That everything is alright.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Marmalade In The Shade

Going home and crashing cherry red cars
Just like the verbs of puberty; while earlier that day there
Was math and Lincoln Douglas debate and really great Girls who couldn't care a lick for me:
And the bus came home like a faithful dog, but there
Was no telling who was in charge:
The cypress swayed like coy mistresses freckling their Shade:
And my younger sister and I walked past the perverted doctor's House, and then we were chased by the dogs:
I thought of bare-a$$ mermaids underneath the shallow bridge
In the slows of the canal where the otters play:
They have done nipping up the drops of coal-black persimmons
Stolen from the house-wife's hard while she and her sister
Were sunbathing quite nudely:
And I told this all to Jordan or someone on the weekend, never Even thinking of going to church, just squirting with rum
And the ululations of video games;
When I really wanted to be with his sister, that daughter who is
All grown up now;
But she has forgotten all about me; but I don't know how when these Bridges to those houses are all the same,
And you can take the walk out underneath the ceiling fan of pink
Cadavers really any old day- and there will be the same old
Otters in the green fires at play:
And somewhere down the street the housewife and her sister have Stripped off from tennis are somewhere in the backyard;
And yes they are spread like marmalade in the shade.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Melting Snow

There was the Alamo somewhere underneath
The sun
And forgotten boys underneath the sun
And horses they would ride
And rivers and flowers beside the river:
Or just the daylight from long ago, while I was Trying to breathe somehow outside of
The shopping malls
Where I collected these things, or stole them
From the busied, harrowed shelves,
While all of the daylight was a go:
And the houses that we all live in burned down
In their rows; but after midnight,
After the catastrophes had all come to an end,
The wild jasmine grew
And perfumed her nocturnal dresses that diademed
Her hidden show: for years she was my secret
Muse- even she didn't know- but she remains
My muse and my lover,
And I long for the sudden nights where our bodies
Caress like melting snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Milkmaids Migrating

Don't even try, because she could never love you:
Your words are for little boys; Kelly will never Write again,
So its best you go back to manicuring for your little toys:
Touch yourself in the window panes of your pain,
Become naked for your cats and dogs,
And let it rain alone in the rain;
And she will kiss the boys of her various Halloweens,
And she will be apologetic and understand how you have Collected the various figurines of her through your own Pains;
And you will never be published again, but ride mutely through
The interstates of such premature death;
You will never be able to come up again for another sweet and Tender breath;
And the orange groves will tremulate, but thankfully the Mexicans will come again to weed and hoe quite greedily;
And she will fall in love again quite steadily
And so will never have to recall again how you fell away from her
Reminiscing, how she touches all the fully grown sperm again.
Laughing in the creeks of her permanent university,
Letting the rivers flow into rhymes again, never suggesting that She even pretended how to remember how your crooked logics flowed Over her like harems of heroes on their way to pull over the Dreamy sheets of cotton gins and hang overs;
To kiss her mouths and swear again to be the heroes of her Soul for her; to wake her up and call her again to the birthday parties
Of her childhood, in the concrete grottos she swam down from Wisconsin, like milkmaids migrating from the cliffs of Dover.

Robert Rorabeck

Like My Dogs

We vend into crepuscule,
And I think of nothing all that time-
And my parents, white headed, dance;
And my aunt, she dances-
And then they leave me to myself, stealing my home,
My shell- and they go out to eat,
And I am left outside, while my dogs are in Arizona;
But I have something that is fifty proof
Stolen from a house today- but my belief is that Liquor is communal, and it is fifty proof,
Like a coin, it can go down on either side;
And there is a canal to the back of this property where
The more than half empty failures of life proceed:
There are two horses in this yard and they eat our old
Tomatoes,
And I am pressed up against this house to which I have A key but no permission,
And the sky is wide and full of illusions, all those airplanes
The old people sing there memories to,
Or moan like my dogs for want of my:
Like my dogs, I moan for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Nocturnal Daydreams

Words respond to lovers
As the trucks move and move by themselves;
And I went to California for a week and then two while I was very young
Where there'd been forest fires; and I rolled down the parks,
Just as long as you thought you could love me,
But I didn't hold out:
I couldn't be sure if I was really talking to ghosts.
That is why I have never succeeded or stopped touching myself;
It is the very sad reason why I am sleeping alone again
Tonight once again
In my daylong work clothes:
I never take off my clothes now, slip into the comfortable nudity
Of your better game:
While, aren't you sleeping now with your back up against the green
Man smoking forever your sweet young children
Out from the crepuscule of the sweet young glades:
It is what I know you have been doing for so very long-
You break like the waves,
And you kiss the glass chalice your wine without having any real Faith:
That is why your sweetness perpetuates the wave machine breathing
Like starfish forever in the shallows and the tidelands
That are always sending out the chivalrous knights on their Unconditional quests to reach you and bring you back to me,
Like grains of sand carried like freckles upon the foaming shoulders
Of its unabashed tide
As it moves between the countries of your bedspreads,
And slips like the ethereal tendrils across the fluttering hemispheres
Of your doors steps where you move back and Forth like the shadows of animals in a zoetrope pushed by Your motherly fingers to reinvigoration each of your children's Interests until they fall asleep
Drooling the minerals you lactate like pearlescent syrups,
Like nocturnal daydreams from their open and pleasant mouths.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Nothing That Was Even Ever Supposed To Be Real

Grey headed and nothing more like a
Teddy bear,
I have never fought fires;
I just don't care to look out for cinders that Haven't yet changed their substance to the cooler
As of dead relations,
But I'll slide down the pole just the same
For Christmas;
I am never a sincere greeting card- I am the Ruined stained glass you might use to feed a curious
Ball of coral snakes,
If there was ever such a ball;
I hide in my polyester blanket good for starting fires
And swig my glass;
I half perceive novels under this kind of ingendered
Overpass-
My mother pays the bills and watches movies as I jack off verbally,
Orally: I want to kiss the lips of a butterfly
And experience with it the changing rooms of humid forests;
I want to be fine for a little while,
Within reason,
And then I want to die, become the paper falling from the Rooms of a beautiful girl's boredom,
From Sharon's room, I think;
I want to float all the way past her beating continents,
While her little daughter suckles and gurgles like
A tourist,
Finishing off all of it, this muse that spumes like a natural Monument;
And I fall across and into her shadow without reason,
Like nothing that was ever even supposed to be real.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Opulent Mobiles

Teeth are hungry, and golden, smile:

Teeth fall down and cover with lips for awhile

Then teeth in rows like bodies sleeping, glaciers, pearls:

When I ache at night for you, it is through these tools;

And upon that I would stake my life even before

The dogs run in the gambling ellipses, and I know

I can never make it home:

These words are waiting in their air-conditioned chariots

For the drawbridges to come back down,

For the song birds to roost in our backyards when they

Have already changed color to match the sky so that they

Can fly above our rooms all day, and smile and sing

Those very same things we should like them to perform,

But can never be sure; and we smile with the pains of the goddess

Herself broken like dragon's fangs, like serpent's scythes

And made to muster her armies of friends across the furrowed

Ground:

They will soon be getting up and yawning, bodies of dolls in

Soft woolen surplices, whisking up the candles from the dunes;

And that is what the heavens are reflecting: all of this

Sweetened sorority of liberated moons, as they swish before us

In the satellited chorus, as they swim above us like opulent

Mobiles reciprocating for us in our waiting rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Our Dogs

Clinging to the broken memories upon cowardly buses
And broken airplanes,
Like toys of shrapnel in the green yards fallen from the Astralplanes,
And what am I doing but recreating my mother:
What am I doing but picking up shells from the creatures
I have massacred to show to your eyes
In this butcher shop of daydreams we make use of all
The materials:
We make candles for one time virgins; and it is as if we Make contact with their eyes at great distances:
And we sing to them the mute man's lullabies:
We always sing to them;
And we feed the dogs, and they lick our hands and We remember the places where we skipped school and Lived;
And like our dogs we are satisfied.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Paper Cenotaphs

You are here- in the palm of my hand,
Like a snowflake melting, like a butterfly I have captured
And there is no words to say how I have killed
You- and you cannot pay for your bills
And you don't even know how to swim in your backyard pool,
But there is still something from the moon you have Stolen and your nipples are still as raw and beautiful as Raspberries from your preschooler's suckling-
As angels start to warm up to take a bath and Practice in the sky,
And then you are over me like a park weeping over a butterfly,
And my fireworks are in your pocket like paper cenotaphs,
And the foxes and the bears are dancing around
You dreaming that they have discovered fire.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Pebbles

Liquorless words there melting in the
Sky,
Down the same old avenue of childhood:
Words that evaporated
From angels- like the sweat of ice-cream,
While the school buses turned around, and around
As the days grew fat
And in disbelief: and I had to look up into your Eyes again,
Puzzled, affixed: there was joy in the freckles of
The trees;
And cops, and robbers, and fire engines that got up
And swam
Or went to school- my muse was there in the clouds,
Abstinent
The dry county of her shoulder blades spreading
Across the sky,
The airplanes kissing her like pebbles thrown in a laky
Heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Pinwheels Over The Engravings

A path to a graveyard can seem beautiful while walking Down upon it—
And there is a lake against your left shoulder
And speed boats dancing and interrupting the respites of Swans—
And you move through the swells of houses and Periodic apple orchards—
Abodes of professors or musicians, and certainly
People who have made enough to afford them—
And the sunlight gets rich in the daytime
Over the gravestones—spins like pinwheels over
The engravings—
And the dead who no longer have eyes can at least enjoy
The feeling of the playgrounds of sunlight
Where beams of it get lost in the loose foliage
And seem to dance for a while like those mirages of Girls that never even pretended to be in love with a boy.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Postcards Of Our Romances

If I haven't seen snow falling over empty parking lots
How can I become a habitual prairie for your séances
After I have given all of my father money
And all of my mother good wishes-
The lions are roaming free in the Colorado, and the cars
Will not start- In fact they have no need to
And there is no better time than now to sit with me
Before an empty forest where the insects are trying To breathe still nakedly, repeating their own
Skins down her savage and bluish dresses:
That they too have come up from the fires the houses of Tourists have stolen- and they wait for you like crystals
In the naked armpits of empty parks
As the moonlight sparkles down from the mountains
Like postcards of our romances
Or something you can buy without taking any time to Think about it.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Present Underneath The Christmas Trees

Stalwart Ferris wheel—now another
Song for you: you are a mirage of a fairytale
While I am selling
Christmas trees—the patrons come in Underneath the palm trees and Buy Frasier firs from North Carolina and
Michigan—at night we sleep in the trailer
Whilst the rattlesnake coils up next
To the rebar—
And the horses run without a thought of Holding their liquor—
Like the abeyance of the homeless men
Up against the torpid cathedral of the canal—
And this is just another song for them—
While my muse has disappeared into the Hoof prints of her usual echo—
Not a beautiful thing by any means—but
She is with her children underneath the bowers
Of orange trees,
And that is all that matters, like tourists
Underneath the billboards, like presents underneath
The Christmas trees.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Quavering Hummingbird

Shellfish in the sea equating the ways in which we
Came around the bases,
Or all of the unspoken estuaries which carried or
Received the vanities of our sea horses:
While the grass grew over the
Graveyards,
And I waited to see what the sea would do:
I waited all of this time of paper snowflakes,
Stoking my make-believe altruisms to the windmills,
Waiting to count out the hours
Into the ways I wished to feel her underneath the common
Flight paths of airplanes:
While all of it was waiting again to start to strike out
Even after the game had ended in a rainstorm:
And we waited,
Waited watching the bases of mud, as the school days ended,
And the sun light out, and regressed in its own carriage:
And we stood alone,
Waiting for a miracle, while the evening living rooms
Turned on their televisions- as from their unmoved yards,
You could see what they were doing:
You could see exactly what they were doing, and it all appeared
To be alright- and even the angels appeared to be commuters,
And they stood for a long while like quavering hummingbirds
Upright against their monuments while the presidents
Prayed and the rest of us wonder what it
Was all about.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Quavering Hummingbirds

Shellfish in the sea equating the ways in which we
Came around the bases,
Or all of the unspoken estuaries which carried or
Received the vanities of our sea horses:
While the grass grew over the
Graveyards,
And I waited to see what the sea would do:
I waited all of this time of paper snowflakes,
Stoking my make-believe altruisms to the windmills,
Waiting to count out the hours
Into the ways I wished to feel her underneath the common
Flight paths of airplanes:
While all of it was waiting again to start to strike out
Even after the game had ended in a rainstorm:
And we waited,
Waited watching the bases of mud, as the school days ended,
And the sun light out, and regressed in its own carriage:
And we stood alone,
Waiting for a miracle, while the evening living rooms
Turned on their televisions- as from their unmoved yards,
You could see what they were doing:
You could see exactly what they were doing, and it all appeared
To be alright- and even the angels appeared to be commuters,
And they stood for a long while like quavering hummingbirds
Upright against their monuments while the presidents
Prayed and the rest of us wonder what it
Was all about.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Rainwater

While I was thinking of another girl's atoms
and how even though distant from her
I had touched her
once or twice on the cheek
and how bits of her skin
must have come off
like invisible apples
and mingled around with my bits
and all those bits dancing and have posotronic s-x before my eyes
unseen ballerinas you
were playing Little Red Riding Hood
in a dark forest of books thinking of your high-school crush-
you'd f- anyone
and not even think about their atoms,
just to get rid of me
when I some dysfunctional Plato
was content to feel
the unfelt flesh
of my dear love-dryad-
from a distance
let her envelop me
with subatomic particles
and let her eyes and organs
revolve like hurricanes
inside my head, a flashing
galaxy of her parts,
but I wasn't cheating
you had to go get f-ed by some booky, hook-nosed nobody
and I bet you
didn't even think of the tiny bits of him floating around your head

in our bedroom
you destroyed
with his c^m
overspilling your v-gina like rainwater in a barrel.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Rockets Exploding For The Fourth Of July

Fruit slipped from a Spanish vine-
Looking up, I am here:
A hold over, a fleck of gold and a snag from a river:
Look into the horse's widening eye,
And see the strange, petrifying visions
That he sees:
Rider less, worshipping a cathedral of billowing clouds:

Rattlesnakes coiling and coital at the edge of a
River on payday.
Wayward families and buses of school children going home
From church, burgeoning at the edge
Of the abyssal mountains:

Each time a rock slips off a cliff,
Comes down to a grave of someone once breathing upon the World:
The carcass of an octopus enveloped and husked into a cenotaph
After eight weeks:
It may have well have been a miracle, a famous scientist,
A love letter:
But dying, a tryst:

Here, in the burn downed garden of crypts and melted crayons,
Satan takes off his pants and dances around,
Kissing a plastic horse made to stand there according to The rules of man:

Like a teacher administering tests the school children
Like a politician getting elected for a second term:
Like a sperm whale eaten alive by crows at the knife edge of The city:

Lit by your eyes,
The billboards of mascara,
The little treats and carrion that chum the roadsides
For the latchkeys and the school boys
Who turn into werewolves at the smell of you-

Like rockets exploding for the fourth of July.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Roller Rinks Of Enamored Lighthouses

Think of true love
And try a few lines.
I know you are only in Kindergarten,
But you are still old enough
To live:
While outside the cops'
Lights go flashing like blue pigs,
But even they are quited and
Out in the sticks:
Male and female cops making love,
Passing limb through limb
While the homeless people and
The bad people easily get away
On bicycles;
And even now the sea is calling over
To you; it is her who send the clouds
As fare marksmen over the playground
Where you swing,
And she is building up.
When she finally inhales it will be a long
Draft,
And she will want you in her,
And the tide will go out, and even though
You are very young you should go,
Taking your time barefooted to get there
With the homeless men and thieves
On bicycles
Or barefoot and alone
While the cops are making love,
Their lights flashing like blue pigs that seem
To beckon deeper to the trees,
Like roller rinks of enamored lighthouses.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Rose Bushes

I've cried upon the rusting shoulder-blades
Of the airplanes that
Are not here—
Going back and forth—
All a glow in the statutory hallucinations
Of a bivouacked—soldiered all together
Of a dream
Of a murder—
Words whom are rolling off an inebriated tongue—
A million miles and
On top of mountains—
Going, or trying to go,
Like rose bushes where they should have Belonged-

Robert Rorabeck

Like Ruby Stars

Upon a crisp shore of grass
As blue as a cerulean egg stolen from
Some bird too far away to mention,
I will watch my mother lie down—
Putting away her works,
She will bathe in the tranquility of
The valley—
Hers is the beauty I work to perpetuate
Even since she sat me in a library
And read all of the wonderful things
From her motherly lips—
Oedipus' muse, I swear.
I have made love to other girls not
As good as her—
And they have only given me so many Words to express my feelings—
One lies waiting for me in bed right now.
Maybe she understands I am drunk.
But I will swing the bottle around again,
As my mother lies there weeping
On the other side of the state
In a field of strawberries
That have fallen into her grasp like
Ruby stars of the horizon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Salt Stolen From The Hypothesis Of Waves

Turns out the world is crisp and golden on the Other-side,
Rich like the rind-like geodes:
All velveteen and thunderously yellow purred
Down in the throat of the waves
Ushering jubilee:
And you can invite her family over to dinner
Down in the pussywillows of suburbia;
And all the things that will never be published,
Nor will ever strike out can sit down to dinner
And demure,
Enjoy puissant fireworks and chilled watermelon
For desert;
But if you strike out that very night on the claptrap
Bicycles of your very will,
Maybe you'll find the darker things collected
From your woods of mailboxes;
Maybe you'll find out where the farther lives,
Old boyfriends from high school you'd thought to Displace, drinking from the chartreuse chalices of Stewardesses they'd called down from the sky,
Or were recreating little invested trips with on the Kitty cornered swings where you'd once kissed:
Now that you are well settled in the holidays
Of denouements,
You keep your little Shakespearian silhouettes;
But boys who live forever can rise up the mountains
Straight from your backyard without enunciation:
They can come at will and recite the night backwards.
Your predawn will become crepuscule,
And you'll have to s$ck tit to save face, another sad
Exodus from there, those sad boys chirping with the Amphibians and the stewardesses procured from High school, like salt stolen from the hypothesis of waves.

Robert Rorabeck

Like School Kids Skipping Away To Nothing In Particular

Cannibals slum as rain streaks the windows
Before el arco iris,
And I have seen her turning to me like a beautiful
Ship made out of the lumber of trees
That don't grow anymore
Except for in the rhapsodies of her eyes:
There they grow and captivate little school hood boys,
As the airplanes dye cast from precious metals allotted
From the school boxes of our young trancies
Build a tiara for her sainthood;
And she yawns as foreplay and shows her teeth,
Her incisors imbedded before her smile like the sharp
Moon kindling for the wolf;
And the firemen come out to greet her and lay down
With the dragons after the busy work day is over
And the wind is picking up around our little house
The same way it does for school buses;
And the mariposas dance and sing in her throat as if they
Were teenagers somehow enjoying a ballet,
And she lets them there, and purrs like a mountain lion
As their pulpy tender wings tickle her all the way
Down the avenue where her heart pounds again and again
Like school kids skipping away to nothing in particular.

Robert Rorabeck

Like School Kids Skipping Away To Nothing In Particolare

Cannibals slum as rain streaks the windows
Before el arco iris,
And I have seen her turning to me like a beautiful
Ship made out of the lumber of trees
That don't grow anymore
Except for in the rhapsodies of her eyes:
There they grow and captivate little school hood boys,
As the airplanes dye cast from precious metals allotted
From the school boxes of our young trancies
Build a tiara for her sainthood;
And she yawns as foreplay and shows her teeth,
Her incisors imbedded before her smile like the sharp
Moon kindling for the wolf;
And the firemen come out to greet her and lay down
With the dragons after the busy work day is over
And the wind is picking up around our little house
The same way it does for school buses;
And the mariposas dance and sing in her throat as if they
Were teenagers somehow enjoying a ballet,
And she lets them there, and purrs like a mountain lion
As their pulpy tender wings tickle her all the way
Down the avenue where her heart pounds again and again
Like school kids skipping away to nothing in particular.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Schoolgirls Around The Wishingwells

Life is a hell of a crippled youth:
Drinking liquor, shooting guns, hitting nothing:
Finding arrowheads,
Kissing his mother, getting lost on the mountain going
Down,
Cursing under the blue entrails evaporated from
The half-blooded Indians
Who now live in trailer-parks cursing their ancestors'
Tombs,
Daydreaming of canals surrounding beautiful suburbias
And amusement rides:
Seeing how they go down like the sun,
To die beneath the rubber chickens, hypnotized
Like school girls around the wishing wells that cannot Carry a tune.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Sharing A Movie Theatre

They will dream for us in airplanes
As it happens down hill,
And I will sing alone forever, trying to Act as if I was beautiful
While walking down an unmentionable
Midway alone,
Like sharing a movie theatre with myself-
And you say you love me,
But why do you have to say so from
So g^d-d$mned far away-

Robert Rorabeck

Like Skipping Hopes

There are places where we have been,
And to which the holiday horses have strayed, but it seems
Like a long time ago,
In a forgotten Christmas, in a forested glade:
It seems like eons ago, as in our sky we see the mausoleums of Stars,
All the happy go lucky children dispersed into a peony of Hibernating wombs;
And it seems as if we were all here, lucky and going to College;
And even when the rain was falling, and maybe when the leaves
Were falling over her freckled
Shoulders,
Maybe you caught her for an instant with her bicycle propped like
A statuary,
Like a clairvoyant wanderer, like a hart at the edge of
The diabolic wood;
And she turned your way and shared your eyes;
And then the sun burst over the crypts that cast the stony hearts
Like skipping hopes across the sea
That would soon have a mouthful of her tears anyway;
And that was all that there was to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Skipping Hoprd

There are places where we have been,
And to which the holiday horses have strayed, but it seems
Like a long time ago,
In a forgotten Christmas, in a forested glade:
It seems like eons ago, as in our sky we see the mausoleums of Stars,
All the happy go lucky children dispersed into a peony of Hibernating wombs;
And it seems as if we were all here, lucky and going to College;
And even when the rain was falling, and maybe when the leaves
Were falling over her freckled
Shoulders,
Maybe you caught her for an instant with her bicycle propped like
A statuary,
Like a clairvoyant wanderer, like a hart at the edge of
The diabolic wood;
And she turned your way and shared your eyes;
And then the sun burst over the crypts that cast the stony hearts
Like skipping hopes across the sea
That would soon have a mouthful of her tears anyway;
And that was all that there was to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Sleeping Jewelry

Rhinoceros coming into his own,
Rising like the lilacs in the carport—
Does he have a favorite color,
As the little boy climbs the orange tree
In the backyard to see the sunrise:
He can see: cats sleeping,
And little girls stolen like young birds
From the nest: metamorphosing,
Strangling like peacocks as they learn of Marriage—
They have gone over the canals—leaping over
Many of them, where stolen bicycles rest
Like sleeping jewelry—
Where they are now: they are across the Stories of many deserts—
And the little boy peers and peers:
He wants to go to the fair with them—he
Can barely see them,
But from this distance, they seem to be happy:
So he goes back indoors just as
The school bus comes,
Because he prefers to sleep forever—
And so he will.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Some Adolescent Giant Reaching Through The Clouds

Groaning like some adolescent giant reaching through
The clouds—
Spilling above the tankards that transit to the pylons—
There is a stranger in my house
Who comes to the eyes of my windows and Disappears
Back into the gardens of the beautiful neighbors on the Other side of the road,
As the girl who once was in my bedroom keeps
Saying that it is all right to be here—
And the giant steps over the fox trying to make love to
The grapes—
And this very night you put your head into his loins
And he brushes your hair
Not able to remember that you are so far away—
Even though it you he has stolen away.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Some Birthstone Whose Month Is Green

Awaken, deserted- the entire beach emptied,
The castles drawn,
Her lips tucked away in the car;
And aren't the thunderstorms so jealous-
I can't leave from beneath them they captivate me Entirely like some birthstone whose month is Green-
Yes, the birds are harrowed- it's their own mistake.
They only come here when their first lover turns
Them away,
Stops baking sunflower pies for them, and then
Her mountains are all ice, and they aren't Even real-
They are the things I think of saying to you if I
Ever come into your new habitat without feeding money:
That I care for you like an enormous rat
Smiling with the boy tremulous from his lack of Sugar,
While young goddesses in their bilious esplanades
Bend down and their bosoms are filled with the rich grumbling
Thoughts of gray kings- wolf daddies
Who whip the tenebrous popets up in a soup full of chariots,
But nonplused, return to the empty gains
Thrashed across the sea;
And these consumptious darlings take photographs to prove me to the darker Things in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Somniferous Tan Lines

He turned the ducklings blue
And licked the rum from casks of my wrists:
The monkey's paw opened,
And we all got our dreadful wish:
I wear blue angora when I am alone, I slip
Into the fashions of the housewives under the Ceiling fans of mid afternoon feeding time;
And the sailors come and pirouette with their Young dolls outside on my yard,
They lay out like survivors, and I genuinely have Fine memories of them,
Even after the ants have covered them up like
Pagan slaves being led by mercurial conquistadors
To put a stopper in their king sipping with the Heads of his queens under the parasol;
And then all the coast is golden and full of houses
And making us squint,
And the rest of the surviving housewives don't Care about the waves, if only because they Are so much more splendiferous,
And they feature all together one curious coincidence,
And they are singing a song that will carry on until
The end of America, and it signifies each and every day
Of getting up and sending the kids off to school,
Of stroking themselves simultaneously in the backyards
Like little kids molesting Christmas presents before
Their propitious day;
And I don't know all of them, but it is enough to know
Only one or two of them, and taking advantage of
That special feeling, loving them all and the same,
Like a colony or bouquets of inbred wildflowers
Kept in the petting patinas of their deep bay windows,
Bars striping them too like somniferous tan lines.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Spanish Fields

My sad youth can almost smell your Bolero,
When there is nothing left to spell and Just lightning stores;
And I have been in and out
And in and out of Arizona and New Mexico;
And that is where my dogs are now in a lightning
Storm:
Tonight I looked at her youthful body in a room
Almost full of crepuscule,
Like a guitar in Spain, what the artists
Accumulate for;
Youthful séance of the time we have yet to live,
Truck dealers who have yet to deal with
The hours of pain- Never a truck filled up with Cement or citrus:
And the day starts out like this glorious, and it
Was well worth it;
So the pain mummifies, prostitutes in their Perfumed mausoleums waiting out the storm willfully then Come out into the yard and smell the Opening sky,
Like Spanish fields of Purple butterflies.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Speartips Into Your Bosom

There are reasons that I keep writing it down,
But I am not sure that I remember;
Maybe it is because the lines have made a tragedy of my Features;
Maybe it is because she has gone away and I know there
Is no more collecting her:
And so I remember things from a life while it was still Breathing:
I remember my mother stepping over an exposed extension
Cord toward the washing machines in her grotto;
And the Australian pines hiding the chassis of junked but Beautiful cars,
And in them moldering great heaps of 1970s pornography:
And the days would weep, and shedding their clothes through Daycare, would get naked: and I would piss in a little Plastic chair, too afraid for some reason unknown to me;
And my sister would weep for me in turn, and the dogs would Chase the cats chasing the rabbits through mother's rock garden
That bloomed especially for Easter;
But all of them would be eaten in the end; my sister would become A married professional: the road would widen,
And I would be left with nothing else but the sky above smoking
In a cathedral of cerulean fire;
And I would remember other things in the half truths that would Make me a liar;
So I put them down, realizing that if I can no longer look into your Eyes, you might still see into my own by these little Things inching like spear tips into your bosom by soft degrees.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Steaming Snails

Yellowing house of cowardice, I will move into you
The Thursday after next:
And I will masturbate and call beautiful whores from Spain into
You:
Melody or Candice, or I can't remember her name;
And I will surely call a wife into you to cook for me, to fill the Frightened house with your senses;
Like buses filled with row, and it will happen that it will rain over my House,
And my mother will continue sighing wearily but thankfully I
Will not have to hear her any longer,
Even though undoubtedly my father will continue blaming me;
As you will live high up through the deltas of snowmelt of your Valleys,
And I will go on crying out for you, mortified by my scars, while you
Bare more children that would not make any sense
To listen to me
Until the evening of another wedding begins to glow, and you can Look into my eyes and see past ship wrecks and graveyards,
And weep apologies that will run like steaming snails down my lapels,
That you shouldn't sooner have remembered.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Stones On A Lake

Beautiful girls who are like
Disney World
While the sirens sing like angels—
Visions of the quickest of the silver rains—
My wife is taking a bath as
I am thinking of you—
A pauper is made out of my heart—
But somehow Pinocchio's nose shrinks,
And the heroes are laughing
Between a rock and a hard place—
Where the mermaids gather
Like a sorority
Come to some quick decision after school—
The airplanes skip across the earth
Like stones on a lake,
And someone else thinks of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Summer Tomorrow

Now if I am feeling beautiful and purple in my innuendo-
Then we will wind up here, singing together beneath the sad
Beauty marks around her eyes:
She is leaving, but soon there will be another forest
To skip school and swing into,
And it will be just like summer tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Sun Dogs Around Her Spotless Eyes

I get too drunk to be anything but pitiful:
To eat anything but macaroni casserole,
To think of any place but Colorado,
And the girl there, or the married woman in her
Heightening degree of espionage
Who I can love for so long through the winter's
Snow:
I can just sit out in her front yard like a marble
Bust,
And lose bits of myself until I am entirely hole
And made the wisp of a quill who flutters
Perpetually around the tin flag of her corrugated
Mailbox:
And I could be anywhere, but I prefer this Strange weather to the desert.
The professors, they don't give a darn,
They just eat their wordy dessert: you know:
All the frosting on the cake, and how Sharon, that Girl,
That hyperbole must have tasted the cake with her Husband,
And if she still thinks of the sweetness of that day,
And where it was,
Or the many boys who came before her one man,
And me off to the side,
Weeping in the cafeteria before going to repose in the Heliotrope under the school bus.
Maybe she only loves the feel of her hands caressing
Through wet clay.
I don't know- this is only my poem while the snow
Flakes fall heavy on her borderline,
And where she goes right now I am hard to care,
Only that she might remember my hand
And lead me there, like a strange friend,
A homeless acquaintance that she might take in
And molest if only with the somber disturbances,
Like the shadows of dogged satellites put off under the Beautiful mascara which makes its penumbra like Sun dogs around her spotless eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Sunlight Slipping Over A Splendiferous Windowsill

Knighted amongst the periwinkles of conquistadors
While Sharon was getting nose bleeds up in her mountains,
We all pretended to be any sort of privateers
Up in the nosebleeds of our truancy;
And I must have had her imperfections in my eyes since
Kindergarten:
I must have cut my teeth on her cerulean rock gardens,
While the rockets exploded in the sky,
And patriotism collapsed into the pornographies of its shell,
Because in the real world all grandmothers are wolves,
And it always takes a long time to drive to
Disney World,
But Alma I just want to kiss your throat like a wildflower
Living on the sunny folds of a moat;
And I want to become the witchcraft which you don't suppose to Know:
I want to wander the streets with you for all time,
While the candles lick the lucky air, while the dogs run around
Making money,
And your children become infatuated with the new rides at the Fair:
We can let the wind bare us where it will, while I kiss your lips
Like sunlight slipping over a splendiferous windowsill.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Tadpoles

Perhaps unicorns will have to come this Way again,
Said a cloud to a cop- and better words that the Aspens stole,
And the juvenile fireworks underneath their opal
Shoulders,
Slightly burning and round, as the entirety of
The beauty slid down from the mountain,
Like a purple veil crushed and eaten
By elk and grizzly bears-
A primordial Zion, with sugarsnaps and clover-
At the summit, a water tower spying
On my mother- before she was even married,
Or had to think of me;
So, before my muses had ever awakened- or even After they had to have awakened,
In the soft rain cloudy the carports, or the uneasy
Forests of Australian pines,
Filled with the loafing conquistadors and decades
Old pornography-
They were just there, yet transformed, like Tadpoles in the slow green- but even after they were So beautiful, they hardly ever had to think of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Tears

Wounded by my feather light sport,
Perfumed by arrows of bouquets, and skipping school
Across the canals:
Little otters there diademing the canoes' prows-
And the long yawns of lions turning deeper golden in
The cage with the butterflies-
Wounded angels taking airplanes to look at the sun,
Basking like nude carrion in the upper echelons:
Why their father is there bowing the ties-
As down from his heaven, like tears, the fire dies.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Airplane In

Entwined into the mausoleums of a soul,
We have no yellow yesterday,
There is just a movie theatre where the skeletons
Stand,
Clapping chalk for the substitute of the teacher,
And time runs backwards from the shell fish:
I remember so many amusements
Once the mouths of mailboxes were closed—
Sticking elbows to the starfish
Into the estuaries of the busied moon:
This is just how it had to be finished—
Words on the edge of a hotel
Falling into the streams of a musical cartoon:
Mickey Mouse wanting to wear the
Antlers of the house—
Calling from stage left: his handlers wanting him
To daydream through so many busied hoops of Fire—
While they were loving one another—
Elbow to elbow,
And after a few seconds the bottle rockets
Died—it just so happened that they disappeared forever
On the other side of the canal
Like children kidnapped into a bouquet of happenstance
While the alligators watched them,
Farting roses—just like the airplane in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Airplane In The Sky

Entwined into the mausoleums of a soul,
We have no yellow yesterday,
There is just a movie theatre where the skeletons
Stand,
Clapping chalk for the substitute of the teacher,
And time runs backwards from the shell fish:
I remember so many amusements
Once the mouths of mailboxes were closed—
Sticking elbows to the starfish
Into the estuaries of the busied moon:
This is just how it had to be finished—
Words on the edge of a hotel
Falling into the streams of a musical cartoon:
Mickey Mouse wanting to wear the
Antlers of the house—
Calling from stage left: his handlers wanting him
To daydream through so many busied hoops of
Fire—
While they were loving one another—
Elbow to elbow,
And after a few seconds the bottle rockets
Died—it just so happened that they disappeared forever
On the other side of the canal
Like children kidnapped into a bouquet of happenstance
While the alligators watched them,
Farting roses—just like the airplane in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Bismarck

At the bottom of the stairs,
An estuary where you can look up and see
The billboards of your souls:
Things that can be sold to survive—
Until the daylight wavers and then goes
Down, down—
Like the Bismarck—and the ninth layer of Dante's Hell—
Into a frozen liquid place where you can Only escape through the mouths of
The devils—
As the lonely girls ride upon their Ferris Wheels—
Here is the endless matriculation—
The places that have learned to show off—
Where sunlight and moonlight play
Across the miscegenation's of the graveyards—
And I know I can find you here,
All tied up in your skeleton-
This is no place for a sonnet—but this is Where the vultures keep the folklores of the yellow
Mule, and the traffics mill like ants—
Like burrows of salted dreams trying to come up Again into the awful pornographies of An unholy world.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Bones Of Angels

Down in their beds again brown angels across
The street in the house with her brown mother and father
And her brown children,
Like sticks in a silver river the helicopters make eyes After, and the owls know, for they resemble their Sanctuary, floating in their magnetisms trances:
And she enfolds into him, and says things to his Ear while he is not listening,
But she enjoys the silence of his soul as she spreads over Him like gasoline, as she spreads over the house
In the strange flagella of wicks ignited for the Virgin of Guadalupe. Outside the cats are burning
In the ignited trees,
But the world is very silent as she dances in her sleep.
The moon is tattooed between his shoulder blades
Which are like the bones of angels,
But it has already stolen all that it knows can be his.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Bough Of A Christmas Tree

This is an answer to a prayer huffed from a freshly painted Magazine:

This is the part in which you don't care,

This is the amateur thespian who euthenizes his audience

With a craft of wet glue:

This is the water moccasin waiting in the sunken bicycles with

A cottony kiss for you:

This is your sister smelling like jasmine through the night of

Thugs:

This is how your body bugs at the crematorium:

This is a little ticket with a price for you on your toe like the bough

Of a Christmas tree;

This is me stringing lights for you and caroling;

And your body moves- ever organ a street performer pushing the Breath of life for you- and the stories that parlay through

Your trances;

This is what I have to give for you- and this is how it dances.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Butterfly

I evolved,
but,
like you,
the butterfly was created by God.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Candles Over The Wishes

I will go with my mother where it will be safe
To later on become a lawful king;
And I will think from the statuaries of my benches
Who are the new presidents
While the airplanes leave trails behind them, like Footpaths for hikers who have learned to evaporate,
The cello unaccompanied sounds the sweetest through
The drowning blue ness,
And maybe she does love me while I am all alone and she is Rearing horses and kissing cousins down at the rattlesnake
Quarries of dead end roads,
While my paper airplanes gather like snowdrifts in my sunnier
Than though incarceration;
And my quill bleeds its imaginations of justice, while my mother
Bathes in her wet surplice;
And the choruses rejoice from the chapels for Easter: what is It they are singing, but the sounds of the victors in a wonderful
Baseball game,
I can almost imagine stepping onto before hand at the break of smoky Day before high school, the woods all around blanketing the Slumbering homes of children so young that they believed they should Never have to go away; or that eventually they would blow out
Like the candles over the wishes I had made.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Cartoon Leaving The Eyes Of A Kindergartener

Your gloves in the room of tilt a whirls, so what
About this arcade inhabiting the things that you've made:
It is just as easy for my muses to be breathing in Colorado,
Catching the first golden affixes of the sun, and all of the Possibilities of our children riding in his chariot and laughing:
I was never surer that I should be the father of your children,
And that we should name him after the both of Our fathers,
After Mexico and America, and the newest unions of the greatest Possibilities that no one likes to admit;
The recreations of my lips upon your flesh never felt so good,
Until you had to go, like a cartoon leaving the eyes of A kindergartener,
Or something more unsuspecting I could never even remember
To forget.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Clouds Leave The Sky

This kind of unobtainable heart
Can only be given by a father for his son to Eat
Considering the transformations of his lions:
Well, the red ants are busy anyways
Underneath the airplanes
And going so far in their yards as my words
Are the cicadas on the cypress or the
Christmas trees
And the iguanas have learned to dance across
The canal over the swelter and
The pestilence while the homeless men somehow
Find other tricks to buy so much beer
That the slender forest is over flowing with that Evidence
And the traffic sings carols back and forth
Through their yards
As everyone they love is going away into other
Holidays, until the sands leave the fort
Like a cathedral
Like the sea leaves a lighthouse- like the clouds
Leave the sky

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Echoes Of A Baboon

Oh, opulent pains in opulent grottos:

Oh, opulent pains, living with forest rangers, or living without

You:

Seeing Kit Carson Peak, but not suckling from that bastion, nor

Suckling from that summit,

Just believing, believing in something like it: and starting up and

Realizing all of the ups that are up about it:

The proud nursery rhymes, the cleverness of tourisms ringing

Just above the nursery of a newborn's eyes:

Ringing just there like the gentlest of satellites and churches of

Braziers and camp fires:

And it goes up and up and up into pyres, and nothing I have said

Has been just right

While Diana lies down straight for the night; and all of the open

Jungle, and all of the unwashed space,

Each wave a grandmother to the entire human race: each wave

A type of species in the meaning of it all,

While I recline out into nothing to the echo of your two legs going

Down the hall:

To the echo of all of your stuff going to fix yourself in the ladies room,

While the principal's music plays like the echoes of a baboon.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Fairytale Of A Very True World

So I am going up as I am going down,
And the bodies recall their positions and I remember that Erin once went into my bedroom in high school and
We watched a movie with the door closed:
And now there comes all of this music through the forest:
The unicorns carefully picking their immortal routes,
And Red Riding hood getting away with murder:
And the storms that are in each of our souls have their own
Private classrooms and estuaries,
And the milky grottos of virgins, as even now there
Is a cheap bicycle in my little foyer,
As my opulence comes at a somnolent price,
And I only talked with Alma once today after she had jogged with
Her:
She said she wasn't close to her sister, and then I had to look
Away as I thought of the sea that I rode next to today:
It was going back and forth again,
Having already devoured all the gifts underneath the Christmas
Trees:
And now I don't know about any of this, but I keep going on,
Mowing the extinct grounds, defying the bankers
And waiting for the first truly immaculate storm of the season:
And awaiting for Alma to finally come to me
And dissolve into my arms like the fairytale of a very true world.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The First Letters Of A Place

She does not call me: she hasn't gone out shopping,
And I imagine the panties she must wear in bed: and I am Foulyly envious even though I know that eventually she Will be well shaven when she comes out
Of her shell to see me again;
To make love and moan like preschoolers enjoying the saccharine
Tastes of fieldtrips,
And the soft memories that they almost cannot even spell:
Like the first letters of a place that once enjoyed they can never Go to again.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Flesh Of A Woman

Come with me into the Opulent grotto, and I
Will breathe my genius
Between your petals;
We will both be robbed at Gunpoint, and Forced to make love,
Which will give you a good
Excuse for what you
Wanted anyways: afterwards,
It will snow extemporaneously,
And I will have to Write on paper again,
Like the flesh of a
Woman;
And you will be a
Little girl again;
It will be Christmas,
And your parents will Remain married
Forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Folklores Of Dragons

This is very exciting- this is another night swallowed
Without wondering where all of the conquistadors
Have gone,
But back to their shallow estuaries and nurseries where
The wounds of the brown children
Are lessening- and if you listen with dedication, Pressing your ear like a wino against the kitchenettes of
The palmettos, you can here them
Like the fireworks the truants take out of their pockets
Atop of the roofs of suburbia in the middle of the afternoon,
While their mothers are all tossed around inside,
Or making out with other boys beside the illusions of Diamond mines that glisten across the fallacies of their pools,
Like the folklore of dragons that the alligators down the Easements of the manmade canals are too wise to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Japanese

Make for me inside an insouciance with your wonder,
And I will build for you with my muscles,
And these things I say which are steam engines,
And organic turbines; Do not let your eyes become instead
The blunders of the richly accessorized middle-classes,
Do not say those things which are readily understood and Manageable, but instead ride with me to Mars,
This sort of amusement park made out of fire-axes and Other pigments given to indigenous holidays. That is what I Said: Make this life into an aqueduct, a prevalence of my Scars hung with tinsel, your lips blowing the sawdust of such Carpentry, your nails newly painted black and draped against My cheek like the human brand of peacock; Or come with Me to my grandmother's grave and let us worship there like
The Japanese, let us spread origami like our bodies, into new Shapes for Christmas, and let us not mind the way the snowflakes
Drift indefinably unique like little Chalets floating through a Francophone space, or let us ride away from this back through
The vanished sea the mountains attend, as carefully as explorers
Approaching the epileptic fissures through the persimmon trees.
They grow wild here where there are just words blown like
Ashes out amidst the bicycles of each of their careworn students,
And the ladies who exercise readily dreaming of their inevitable
Motherhood and what fine kitchens, like bosomy Popes
In a suburban Rome, they should first graduate and then soon attend.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Latchkeys Raised By The Cartoons

Soon the moon will see us or the sun—
Kissing in the carport of a vanished honeymoon—
And the bluegills will have to sing to themselves anyways—
The tomorrows will get up as an entire band of Awakening elbows who go polishing their silver—
Because this is their world that we cannot remember—
It is a joyful place with the sunlight of the daylight
Floods us out of school—
And I give to your bedrooms, awakening in the morning as
The rooster crows—gallivanted into the pastures
Of the arrowheads crossed before the
Nosecones of the airplanes on their honeymoons—
Perfumed by the strangely obnoxious steps of the Infatuated conquistadors—as they stepped out of their crypts□
In the early mornings just after the wetted séances of Star crossed lovers—
Realizing at that very moment that all of the rivers led
Up to colleges and this was just another given to us to believe
In—like an afternoon abandoned indoors,
And like latchkeys raised by the cartoons of their children.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Mixing Teardrops

Most tender eyes upon the womb
Of a child of a night'
The vampire sits forlornly at her window in Tallahassee, Florida'watching the switchbacks of The hills,
And the apartments that roll through them
Like a labyrinth'the blue children going
To school'getting up
Kitty-cornered to the graveyards: all the lost
Heroes forsaken to their epitaphs'
The heavens having sunken up to her
Elbows'the airplanes her berets'
Her parents lost somewhere in the sea like
The mixing teardrops of one too many gods.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Nocturnal Flowers

You make the sunlight and
I make the moon—
Yes, we both have ghosts who haunt us,
But our daylight holds its gun—
And we can make fun in the moonbeams
Beneath the light house
And the forts—
In the daylights, we can even pretend
To be the shows of tourisms—
While, in the evenings,
We bury ourselves together—
And your children embark together in A wonderful estuary—
You can be the mermaid if I watch you—
I can be your sunbeam on its lance of Joy—
And we can enjoy our amusement
Rides together
Only if you were my wife—learning to Step carefully across the soft shelled tortoises—
Learning to trespass from your gardens
Of trailer parks in my the wealth of my heavens—
Learning to express your lips like the nocturnal
Flower—
Who together, in the changing rooms of
Their shadows—showed off the songs of their joys.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Penumbra Of A Candle's Flame

They will bloom by themselves, though the window is Empty—
The supermarket and the parking lot is empty:
They are ghosts, they do this anyways—someone is playing
A violin over the pornography across the street—
There is not a single girl that is yet dead—
The goldfish and the cat—
The fair is still in the town—the bottlerocket is only halfway lit:
And you are leaping into my arms like the penumbra of A candle's flame—
Maybe today is your birthday—maybe tomorrow will be the same.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Plagiarists Leaping For Shakespeare

Insomniac of banshees, or like a
Child addicted to the backyard's séances,
While someone sleeps up a hill that
Has evaporated;
Like after the dog is done doing good tricks
It becomes emolliated
And no longer eligible to attend a good
College—
And the housewives whose hands are always Filled finds it a hard time to buy trinkets
Halfway up the taoist's temple,
Looking as forlorn as a hummingbird without Any midgets—
As I remember you, back pressed against My great-uncle's raspberries—
All a flummox in your cultivations, and not
A space for you left in the junior parking-lot,
And not a star left for you in all of the heavens:
Then didn't you become the brightness of An amnesiac,
While there was a typhoon in your carport,
And a lovely song skipping through the echoes of Your cellular phone,
As the foxes were jumping for Eucharist,
Like the plagiarists leaping for Shakespeare at Picking time.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Reconciliation Of Doomed Lovers

Well sated in the casual bereavement
Of my particular socio-economic class,
My scars are fading fast, but the storm cloud
Memories refuse to yield; and even if I
Was chosen by finer men persuaded in their College's uniforms out in the green fields like
A moving canvas before where their ladies swoon,
I think I'll pass, because the expectations are too
Much for me: The way the lights dim on a softly Wooden stage, the imperfections perfect in the Lisping homological couplets of Elizabethan England:
The gallant knife fights, the black plague, the rue
Of words chopped inside newly masoned castles:
All of that rising up and sending out the privateers with Roomy bellies, greedy desires for Catherine's gold:
Even then, down in the horse-shoed valley, the little Girl is twelve years old, and she's lost her porcelain Doll, rolled over in the tracks not very well above the Arrow heads, and the smoldering inside turquoise pottery:
Now it rains in a present tense, and I sift through the muddied Witchcrafts of the Zuni's disappearance: the grandfathers of My white men settle like ghosts of sheets out drying in a Caravanning line, like a virgin's yet bloodied ribbons in the Buffalo's tallow: Now all of that is gone and we've gotten
So casual that I'm wearing shorts in the snow, and the easterners
Are reintroducing wolves in the places they've never been,
So they don't know the savage hypocrisies of the ideologies
Their minds are caved in, but after so much rain things are Revealed and come up from the earth like the reconciliation
Of doomed lovers, come upon my fingertips like a butterfly
Turning saturnine, wishing that it should always have been the Caterpillar, for now it is beautiful, but poisonous, and should have
To leave by the windows of the stoic homestead, past the plums
Of sequoias and dehydrated ornithologists, all the way to the Great chili forests of Mexico, there to join the bright graveyards
Of the rigamortis of chartreuse wings, fallen and scattered like Leaves upon an empty playground, or like those ceremonial
Petals which leap from an innocent girl's fingertips before a bride on her wedding day.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Spirits She Enjoys

Wherever I am these rainbows make me
Loopy,
The contraptions through the sea the mermaids
Are working,
Churning caesuras like cotton candy:
And I will die, I will die,
But I have looked into the sad blue eyes
Of a woman of another man,
And my words have failed her, because I Am no good at baseball, and the flowers I meant to Give to her were stolen from her sister's grave;
She has gotten most everything I could not steal for Her, and she is doing fine,
And in some indescribable rhythms through a night
Enjoyed with my dogs' similarly dreaming,
I search for her in the only ways better left undescribed,
Just another swimmer in the tourney of boys who
I know are looking for her even now:
Jousting, pillow-fighting,
Because no one forgets how she threw to them in High school without even looking,
How she could make me fill up an entire page alone
In my room while all of South Florida was raining;
And I could go out and look for her,
But I'd have to buy new clothes-
I could begin to tramp my souls, and kill whatever dragons
Are leftover, though I'm sure the braver fools are Already halfway there; and her eyes are beautiful,
And lonely,
Like blue candles under the weeping shadows of Her mountains, pooling like the spirits she enjoys.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Spokes Of A Bicycle

Oh- I want you, parables of the Lavender tit- oasis of shimmering gasoline:
I have searched for you through
The numb cataracts of my classrooms
And my neighborhoods,
And I have seen you changing clothes
In the changing room of Palmettos,
Baring areolas of sand-dollars; and then
This is just what was:
Words biting my lip over the feminine
Beauty of the day- yawning, reawakening-
Lathered with yoke and spikenard
And then turning in the geometry of perfected
Sorority, like the spokes of a bicycle
Leaping the neighborhoods like a candle's flame.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Sun

How will it look if we get lost for a while
And areole the mountain,
And look for the shadows of our footsteps,
The disturbed berries that fall
To the mouths of archaeology,
Of the arrow heads that stick up like phalluses
Of a midnight of a Valentine's Day,
While I just worry about how I will return
To school on Monday—
As my wife sleeps two months away from Giving birth to our first son—
The words leave my imagination like a disease
I cannot remember, like all of the highways
I've been across, or the women whom I have Fancied that I have loved—
The places that seem to be inseparable from
The things we have done which we cannot Mention—
Just as the truth revolves around the earth
Like the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Sun Burning Down Into The Sea

I will write something else, but it will do no good,
With the sun going down, with the final jet stream
Following it over the personifications of nature:
Today, I've walked around one hundred acres and fed
The standard bred horses, and I haven't seen a soul,
But my perplexing face in the mirror, and the dogs
As they got trotting after the indefinite senses,
So now I lie here much like a fetus trying to hear its Mother's heart, with a precognition of what her breast
Shall taste like once I wake up in the morning; Mostly,
I am just lazy: I watch the flies wilt in the chilling weather,
When before there were raucous thousands, and there
Will be again; and I play around with a pseudo-pen like
A second-string Shakespeare, waiting to be called out
From the dugouts to taste the red clay. I bother agents
All the way overseas, sending them misquoted manuscripts;
And I pretend that in some states further east, she will still Dress up for me, and going around as carelessly as I Go around, tips the glass in my direction, and skinny-dipping
In the sea, alone save for the disorganization of waves,
Feels my thoughts burn into her the way they often do,
Every day, like the sun burning down into the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Times Of A Merry-Go-Round

I seem to be partaking in a sea that has no memory—
And this is my last day in Shanghai,
And I have been finishing up a bottle of white wine
Held over from our wedding:
I am not trying to appease you—
My wife is already married and is going to have my child.
The world I will go back into tomorrow is a world
Of ghosts and phantasms—
A desert of Disney World, and maybe I will think about
The things I once almost had with you,
Touching down upon the cold facts of that concrete
Tarmac,
But truthfully my heaven is already with me,
And she has forgive everything that I am,
And everything I have already done—
And you are just a well the unicorns drink from Hypothetically,
Though I will come back to you like the times of
A merry-go-round, stealing little glances like a child
Delighting in things that will soon become mundane.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Transoms Of Two Airplanes

Hollowed like a cove by these immortal things
That have come to die,
To give their spirit over the pure intentions of this Pieta,
Something as immaculate as this liquor approaches;
And I have not known a good world,
Or a satisfying Christmas:
But I have known Alma a handful of times, and her Eyes have wrecked upon me,
And I have flooded my graveyard with her vineyards,
Until her perfumes rose my antebellum Lazarus,
Who looked into her eyes with so many souls,
Like the transoms of two airplanes who were once
Passing unlawfully close together.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Waves Into The Easy Sunsets

I am always caracoled by the quietest yards of landscaping
Through which the always migrating butterflies and Serpents move;
And they are ever so wise, or they are not so wise as to Be frightened by me:
As then the sun comes shining, over new games of baseball,
And the world lights up again across a birthday that is Never failing,
And we don't have to wait so long again for another move:
And it feels alright while the oceans are basking,
While they are holding themselves in the deepest courts of
The world,
While the pilots check all of their gauges of all of their Airplanes over the astrologies of all of those mountains,
Until the purples tend to move again across the tips
Of the planes again,
As your love whispers its perfumes to all the pretty fairytales
As diminutive as my hopes, as they tend to have to move again,
Gathering up the words like a newspaper into another yard,
And kissing other lips upon which they fall again
Like the waves into the easy sunsets, hoping to prove again
To these beautiful things something that I could never hope to prove.

Robert Rorabeck

Like The Wish Of A Firework

Pains of practices of death- flaunts of metamorphosis:

And now this:

Overeager, green- debased tenements, spending their fires away until

She is covered with goose bumps:

Shivering, flaxen- a sacrifice to the elements,

Because she is sober, and she needs an operation:

She waits three hours and gets free medical

Care,

And then I take her to dinner- dessert (tiramisu) , a kiss or two and curses:

Maybe she's decided who she's going to love.

And who she's going to flirt with:

My muse, my Alma- she likes roller coasters too,

But on one with her I've never been with: and I don't know how Much longer I can hang around,

Vanishing like a tumbled apple through the pains of its bruises,

While the uneasy fires are in her house, but they are Taken care off- and then she will have birthdays with her families,

And more careful wounds:

But she will never change- the paralysis of metamorphosis;

But look at how I have opened up for you, mi linda- mi vida:

See how I have already become a river, flowing beside you on a painful

Holiday, until all used up like a wish of a firework that you never thought to make use.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Thunder

Money on the vine of crows-
The dogs are laughing at the tricks of the coyote,
And you have grown further away from me,
My muse:
I've been drinking seven times: I just made a girl
Come four times who I never hope to see again:
In the morning on Monday,
I will return to my classes and teach and teach
And teach underneath the moon
And underneath the sun while it all keeps
Praying to Christmas,
As the sanctuaries are remembered and they
Are forgotten across the sea of the ribbons
Of mermaids-
As the gallant nights straddles the vocabularies
Of their charges,
Until they hung from trees, toes dribbling in
The defeated brooks- what color were
They then, only trinkets for the witches,
As the first thoughts of all the monsters bubbles,
And the planes roared like thunder amidst the Cliffs of the heavens, so mindless- an apiary
That could never figure out whatever it was meant
To become.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Unsettling Lovers Above The Banks Of Bloody-Nosed Clouds

Castles have strange identities:

They share of themselves under the snow white

Bosoms:

Maybe they believe these mountains are swans;

And I am done explaining for castles

With their heads in the clouds, always up for breakfast,

Roosting with rookeries of sweet princesses:

The hallways of candles flickering like wildflowers

With so many shadows:

All different sorts of flowers burning, each an inkling of

A prayer;

And the pilgrimages leading up to castles:

Through the orchards of peach trees and apple,

Past the pearly salmons' row in the bow-strings of Ribbon streams leading down past the buttresses of

Castles;

The ancient things: but I don't have to explain myself:

There they are purchasing,

And the sweet young girls flee them as if the suitors for

Notaries:

The candles flaming like fields in those narrow halls:

The young girls like animals lighting out on the frothing tide

Of a forest fire burning their ancestry;

And they fall down the hills until it turns green, and there

Are cars leading home to symmetry of drive ways;

And cul-de-sacs: swimming pools like diamonds, and places

To take oneself further away from the castles who

Are now like the gaunt young suitors turned away:

Watching like unsettling lovers above the banks of bloody-nosed

Clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Us So Many Dreams

What moves without more reflection than this,
And I am standing in a terminal watching the hallucinations Fleet:
They go like soft sailors tickling the skyways, and beautiful
Women who ride in the bellies of pure daydreams,
Serving their sharp suited men:
Maybe they even divide like rivers once they get high enough,
And my words on my tongue have to lay off and float down
Weeping,
Still crooning for their soft underbellies, their various gems
And birthstones:
So like a feather with a heavy grain we return to the greenness
Beside the canal, beside the busy road;
And we take catnaps while beautiful girls have their birthdays
In amidst great fanfare; and we would like to just hold their Hand but once,
To say their name and smile at their daughters, and forget how Even then the fires should grow over the paper earth,
Each tremendous tendril engulfing entire sororities of paper dolls
Who had so much ambition and like us so many dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Venemous Daggers Parting A Shroud Of Sky

Woe to the angels breaking in
The bay;
Woe to their song and dance,
And the boys I remember hanging out
With,
Who remain out together,
Out through college and now
Domesticated
Crepuscule;
Woe to the strange sadness of my face
Not beautiful enough to be believed in;
And to the space underneath these trees,
The esplanades of parking lots
Which cant be understood
I would ransom all of this to understand the Desperation of my heart,
To have it soothed by a color she wears
On her body,
Something about her higher than those angels
Themselves,
Something never even touched by any of those Boys,
The fever of her temples conceded to the sheets,
If they are mine for but minutes
As the virulent years divide, as the airplanes shoot
Like venomous daggers parting
A shroud of sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Washing Machines Inside Carports

There will be fireworks and sad joys and more bird cages:
Maybe my aunt will come to New Mexico and reciprocate-
Maybe she had something left that she wanted to tell me,
But now I am on my own floor as warm and bloated as any zeppelin of
A boy who has come down to the peeps shows of quinceanera;
And when I work with you, Alma- I sing,
I sing and swell like beautiful pythons let loose amongst the banyan
Trees,
And dangling there like the distended pipe dreams of preschoolers;
And when I don't work with you, Alma- I drink rum alone:
I am not much of a drinker, but you skin is beautiful, and you told me
That I was very smart:
And you tried to explain to me one of two things: that we should just be Friends,
Or that you wanted to sleep with me and keep secrets from your Abusive husband;
Either way, I will be fine as long as I get to see your jubilant contours out
Amongst the daylights;
And when I think of you Alma, why then I think of Christmas,
And I think of the absolute joy that every man must have for the things
That he love,
Fishing or going on the road- you are this for me, Alma:
You are my reason for my next breath, and for my next line, which may as Well be my final line for you, Alma, for me tonight,
While you go to sleep with your husband hushed into the whispers of
The outer space on Cherry Road:
I will climb up on my own roofs next to yours and fall asleep, while the spaces
Of all of these chests and Spanish tombs whisper your name,
Like washing machines inside carports, like housewives shushing brooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Wildfires

I've seen a wreck outside my door—
In the highway, confused by green smoke,
Old friends
And past muses—
What did it look like but a broken kaleidoscope
Amidst the skree—
The sailors of other planets were coming
Down upon,
Either like vultures or Like doves—
Beauties of their avoided delusions—
And things that learned how to Travel without minds—
Bodies moving into their preordained
Beds, into their preordained loves—
As above them,
The airplanes roared like wildfires,
Like waterfalls of angels,
Like ecstatic words that never found
Their way into those minds.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Windmills Kissing The Sea

Numbness of her beauty in her shell- how I've Tried crying out to her:
A piccolo underneath the bleachers at the end of School:
And now she comes, dividing from kindergarten,
Losing herself every time she graduates-
Growing husky and calloused
And abused by the heavens- but there she is,
Burning the decrepit chrysalis of her
Religion across the baseball field
When it is still too early for there to be many Spectators- but come the afternoon, they will be Selling things across her,
And crossing their hearts even in the sun showers.
There, in the middle of the sport,
Alligators will swear by her middle name,
And the airplanes will lookdown, folding their Wings- who said they cannot metamorphosis into Swans as the sun is going down like
A train going into a tunnel: and there she remains,
Falling down and kissing the insects' feet:
Wishes bouncing off of her like windmills kissing the Sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Wishes That Disappear

Warm song in the throat of a frog
Daydream of metamorphosis—why then—
Why then why
What will you turn into next to the carport in
The open storm—
What will you have to say for your self
While the cops are robbers—
And nothing is left
That doesn't have to mend—
Minnows in the crick
And lizards on the sidewalk—
And nothing else besides the rest of it—
But airplanes taking off
Above the forever exploding blue palms—
Like wishes that disappear with daylight
Which once thought of themselves as Never having to end.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Wishful Scientists

Alma, I love you, and when we sleep together I will love
You even more,
And I love your children, and the light that plays upon them out
Of doors:
Tus ojos son muy lindo, Alma, and you are just as intelligent as any White woman I have ever met,
And your skin is so beautiful, Alma: your skin is the gold sheathes
Of the sun- While the other patrons just want to love you,
I want to squeeze all of the honey from your bosom:
Every part of you is a liquid treasure- all of your sweat is alcohol,
And I am living in a house that is yours,
But until you get here it is my tomb, and I want to push our belly buttons
Together and make extraordinary wishes
Like wishful scientists who push electricity through the snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Yesterdays In Games Of Baseball

Manner less bandits japing at my tents,
Paging through their thesauruses—
While I am left mumbling, numberless fingers
In my mouth wanting to ride the Merry-go-Round of Pegasus's—
Like Phoebe in a weeping dream—ready to Become that thing that can no longer be reclaimed:
Ready to become another adult playing
The adult game—
And there to be lost—gifts of the magi given to the Coffins, like beautiful girls wandering off
Into another well-lit church—
Like ghostly cousins whispering as if of the echoes
Of holidays amidst the bowers of predestined
Christmas trees—
Partaking in silent parks—scarred of cheek and soul—
The rainstorms come and freckle the swings—
Like yesterdays in games of baseball where the emptied
Batters swing.

Robert Rorabeck

Like Zeppelins

There she is like a seahorse attending bar-
Underneath the halogens of the football stadium like a Lighthouse:
She trawls through the night laughing with her brown Eyes, serving drinks to freshmen and Poltergeists- while my wounds get out like zeppelins from
The rose bushes, and they pull themselves like
A red wagon across campus- the wind chimes of my Girlfriend mutely perverse, and I sing to her
To the library and to the other places that I think do not Want to let her in.

Robert Rorabeck

Lilly-Livered And Poisoned-Arrowed

But what beauty apart from the body:
That mythology dancing to the ground—Parades
Piggybacked on parades
Like roses in the graveyards—
They touch without a sound—lilly-livered,
And poisoned arrowed:
They will be made to do what they can do best:
They will go back to school tomorrow:
They will settle into the west.
And they will do what they can to forget about her:
She was left in pieta in the wagon;
And they will be hung over tomorrow, but they will Remember where they buried the gold:
It was either next to the ice-cream shop or Arcadian alley—they will try to remember how she Touched them, and how much they paid her:
Maybe, they hope, they will be able to get their Driver's license to go out to find her,
But after all—and anyways—they were just doing
What they were told.

Robert Rorabeck

Linear Flights Of Airplanes

Now the day has a word and I
Feel hard pressed to travel to you,
Even though after I was done selling fireworks you
Said that we could only be friends,
Even while my cousin who is taller than me was pursuing you
But making little progress:
And then I broke into my own home and laid down with
The feral cats who were not frightened of me
As they ate the grasshoppers and garden snakes:
And there was a glass slipper there underneath the bromeliads
That could not be explained:
And looking up there was a ladder too- taller than a roof,
Hopelessly in a loverless math over the roof of Antique row
That someone of your lovers had misplaced with his ever
Giving chalice and his surreal antlers:
While in the back seat of my Mercury Tracer still lay the two Tennis rackets that we'd used to play tennis poorly on Some Tuesday not long before I took your tiny brown Body into the waves, Alma- and kissing your Mouth promised myself to you underneath the linear flights
Of airplanes: trusting me even though everything else was chaos,
And you couldn't even swim.

Robert Rorabeck

Linear Reckonings

Soon we'll all be married,
And fighting up the stream,
Those cold Alaskan eyes weeping with oil
And prehistoric moose which step so high
They forage on the cherry moon;
Where we scrape our speckled bellies
Under the caves of insane snow,
We give our children to the slough,
The greedy lips of claret lobsters and their claws;
The politicians' leather boots,
The slick mustache, the shoe store in Charleston, SC;
Then the honeymoons we'll have,
The sad events, the overweight aunts attend,
The junkyard of used tires under her skirts
In the places we can afford, Hawaii
And the paper church soon to burn from
The cloy foreplay of hermaphrodites,
Dressing up in Falls City and the bends-
Her eyes are a hungry light- turned off, that is all-
Down by the river where she woke up
She learned to write her name,
And his name on her palm, but that is all-
They live in a trailer in Michigan, and that's what They called their son, and their second son, Jesus-
He performed miracles with cigarettes
On the swings in the park next to the river
Of flotsam and used tampons where the Professors water ski- the minor smirks of Small publications, the ransoming of life from
The green reaper for a season, maybe more,
Where the trees are ancient and shadowing,
Where the vast oaks are the real immortality,
Where the roses weep at the end of the swift
Season, with the ruddy apples in the farmer's market,
The stalks of nettled corn, the grandmothers in their Shawls walking to the daughter's boyfriend's
House to retrieve their grandson who has run away,
And will be held back a year;
The blushing leaves fall like kittens down the steep hills,

Where the wild scuppernongs grow bitter on the waxy vines
Upon loose spools of chain-link fences forced to the ground,
Where the old blue lake weeps in its basin of carp and willows,
Down to the graveyard we all attend;
Riding our Christmas bicycles, our glittered roller skates,
Our tassels streaming out behind us,
The noise of wind and revolutions down the breakneck hill:
The beautiful and the famous, the poor and the kind,
In the dirt of the cold peninsulas of the final depression,
On the seventh day when god rested his David lost
His arms as the wind whipped his clothes off him too,
But the graveyard is beautiful in white marble,
And budded with plastic bloom torched in tin,
In epitaphs grander than the bodies they denote
Restive in autumn's red oak blanket upon the luxuriant hill,
Just another season here we are again
Floating through the thoughts of a young god's finite will.

Robert Rorabeck

Lines For Little Boy's Games

Pen some lines for little boy's games,
Or grow a beard and sleep in the back seats of Passing cars,
Scribbling love notes on the floorboards, cheeks
The briar scratches of barbs and burs;
And the world turns again, because it has nothing
Else to do,
Young mothers exercising in the park now say
How do you do,
While the alligators burp and fart,
The horses in the race track of flatulent emperors.
Curious air-planes go to bed in the dirt,
And the swings swing their easy chains-
Everything is beautiful if it arcs, the nest of her
Back and calves, the little nooks of science,
The blue and red shifts, the kisses she serves to the Black and blue pugilists;
I can turn on the light before I go out to sleep under
The yard, dear, pull up the grass in a cape of sod,
Listen to the hummingbirds whispering to god,
While your and your newborn sleep in the blue crèche
I bought,
Or maybe not.

Robert Rorabeck

Lines In The Dark

Words are scars,
I put them here to lace some kind of virgin,
To smell her like a flower,
And pick her up and take her across the canal
Where the airplanes lay sleeping half
Devoured by the cricketing earth;
I want to show her the dead,
The eternally kneeling men serving beneath the Censer of swing-sets outside of the church
Where the clouds go climbing up the Celestial spheres to the footsteps of stormy philosophers
To lose her in the green palatial spaces of the park,
Skipping school with her,
Blowing out the candles of the dark-
These words are scars, imperfect and wounded,
Sometimes dying men, swelling around the heart,
Primordial ululations I can't even understand,
But feel like venom secreted on the radioactive battlefield
Of apocalyptic anonymity; they are beautiful weeds
I have pulled up screaming,
Jogging around her, crippled, unseen:
These words are all I have, but I have tended for her
Mercilessly-
I have left the bus and gone home with her
Throbbing in my chest, remaining there after
I have turned up the television, and thrown away
My school books-
After the impulsivity of my convictions,
I offer her the only thing which I have Stolen from the very fields of the tongue, wishing to Lie her down in the orange groves of Spain, under the Shadow of Mars;
These words are scars whisper to a blind maiden,
So that she might see beyond the selfishness of my tears,
The wounds I have uprooted from the lapping furrows, for Her, and crafted into singing friends who decorate
The highest evergreens:
Scars I would have her feel, to lay beside her every night,
These few trembling lines,

The damaged crèches of lippy pugilists,
Shyly grinning, like a knife gifted in the dark meant to Romance and prod something beautiful that once enjoyed
Only daylight, to now come awake nocturnally like
A thick tulip outback amid the dunes, legs gently trained off
Her bicycle now open to me such a theatre,
Revealing a good meaning for my existence,
Proving that sometimes what is meant to be said does not Have to be perfect to be beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Lines Of Magnificent Surrender

Prettily the light is winnowed by the green
Fingers of the pine,

As if sorting out the empirical yarns from the Hypothetical ether, stealing her teases,

When whipped about by the tizzied wind,
Frantically lost in warm forests of May,

Thus, the earth is separated from the sky
By a blue line clear as a seam following the Hem of Spartan alders,

Their roots the tuberous axes of persistent time,
Wheedling into the enjambment of quartz,
Showing the silver mouthed tussle,

And the effluvious drool from the earth's womb,
All of those words we meant to say,
Never heard but in the spurious roofs of swaying confusion,

A chorus of pretty soldiers queuing into the green country,
For reasons to grow their belief,
As the dyed rivers dwindle in scribbling lines of magnificent surrender.

Robert Rorabeck

Lines Of Thirsty Mourners

Dimes at the party:
Her cheeks pinched with gold-
They are holding her breasts like heirlooms in The photos,
I am so drunk I am getting cold....

I've only had three bottles of rum
This entire year,
And three dogs leaping and licking
In the salt of four legs and paws:
Is this February a leap year?

They surrender the wealth to her hands,
And she laughs as she passes them on;
To her, my words are just little pawns,
She casts out in the brighter glories of her Yard, where her expensive car is Parked in the prestigious concrete
Smooth as the premises....

There is something broken inside me,
As I cannot make a buck,
And I keep infatuated by her tawny lakes
Leaping like unspeckled trout in their Stormy brooks,

Because she has better lovers,
And finer prospects than me, for I am
Just an old man fishing with empty hooks
Too far out in the endless sea...

For her throat to remember which way I Might have burned, to catch her head and swivel her Neck, across the red bricks of the ancient sorority,
To get her to turn towards me,
Entwined in a better life assured....

She is the fulcrum of erring poetries,
The lines cast out as if trying to be suited

For a profession,
Ending up homeless, soliciting on the hazarding corners,
Soon they will be awakened, bleary eyed
And exhausted, in lines of thirsty mourners.

Robert Rorabeck

Lingerie Of Spider Webs

Capturing the Golgotha in parks too
Pretty to sleep in,
I went out to become an actor I never became:
I rolled down from the high swings
In the cooing parks, and slept inside the empty trains,
And thought of you burning in your Dresses:
Now you are in Colorado so high up as to be a prayer flag,
And I am holding myself to become two cheap kites who Disembark symmetrically to scout for you
Riding Pegasus-like bicycles high above the petting zoos,
And singing to you that we would like to steal you away from Your bird's nest,
And build new nests with you, to resurrect our never figured
Out children in the hidden adulteries in the healthy green
Church yards,
To buy you refrigerators and unicorns and to listen to the whippoorwills
As I blow on the pinwheels and mandelas
In a brightening eucatastrophe resurrected in a bedroom of Graves,
Like grandfather clocks stolen to feed fat and hungry sparrows,
And you wearing the lipsticks of all the mariposas in Mexico
And wearing a lingerie of spider webs.

Robert Rorabeck

Lions Who I Never Knew

There are lions there- further inland, underneath airplanes
That go everyday leaping over them:
Lions yawning, overfed: the tourists gaping with even Bigger eyes-
Lions surrounded by a constant stream of cars down the road
From where I used to live:
I used to hear them every day before I had to go to school;
And when I lingered in my truancy,
I would hear them snoring all day like fire snoring up a Forest-
The canals around them making them save, and the yellow of Their kingly coats reflected in the sky:
The lions of the offspring that were once overfed, still are Overfed-
Lions who I never knew but once lived so close to me:
Lions who I never knew, who will never see a single wave in the Sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of A Misanthropic Storm

Making love to line her pockets—
The lasting wish she uses to feed her children, as the Mexicans encourage themselves
In the southern florida landscaping—
The conquistadors gone
To pay our taxes—the granite crosses they left
Eaten up the apiary of waves,
And the songs they kept of silver palaces shoveled
Over by the lycanthropic moonlight—
Then there is a place for us, stacked up together
Like vipers in the common place moonlight—
They have been singing a busy accord—and making love,
The fairs come and leave us—with their Exhibits of lycanthropes and mantacores—
I suppose the housewives will never climb the Vines to find us, even though we are just across
Their roof tops—shooting off roman candles
Into the green lips of a misanthropic storm.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of An Empty Sea-Shell

Open lips of empty sea-shells are beautiful—
And I think of you
While I am walking alone at the flea-market
On an usual weekend,
Trying to remember the way we caressed
Like two otters in their joy—
Who use simple words to knock on doors
That the crocodiles see—
Long passions spinning as ferris wheels next
To the highway—
As pregnant mothers lose sight of their first
Loves as they look away,
And the amusements spin up beneath them—
Graveyards blooming like televisions
From the anonymous crypts where the Unambitious promises of kindergarteners used
To sing.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of Busy Ants

Acrobats of Spanish glasses,
Of peat most that feed the sod and grasses:
I broke my jaw,
I broke my glasses; and the winters came and Beat our asses:
And you sang; and you awakened; and you jangled,
And with the stories of your comely bangs
Entangled
The world in an angelical séance of archangels;
And I pushed you on the swings of very same angles;
And you swam through the void azure of your world,
That really is just another womb;
And your cherry toenails kicked up like runaways putting Their noses into the armpits of pine trees;
Your hair was a yellow weathervane;
And my knuckles cracked along your shoulder blades:
And in my mind I entered the wind tunnels of Spain with You on Christmas day,
And we chased Olga's guitar into the south of France
Both of us couldn't play;
And we sang dirges to the lips of busy ants;
Which was our punishment, anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of Chaos

Understand the Fury's noise
And you will drink from
The lips of Chaos.
The murdering science
Bled the universe
And she is still giving birth.
And lovers slowly separate
Like continents
That once clutched each other.
The painful tectonics
Of gravity's invisible shroud
Weigh upon us our Ancestral sins
Like forensic evidence
Stratified in the clouds.
The wolves would blow
The house down
But we let them in.
Flip the switch,
The electricity of a
Good blow job
On her knees like the pietà.
Then her eyes are Concave rubies
Geometry swimming in Fiery motes,
150 watt angelicism
Filigreed by opal stems
With a blue bird behind them,
Like a wizard humming
Behind a curtain- a stage
By which the traffic is a
Galloping herd
Of thoughtless silver kins
That we use to steer
Ourselves further
Away from our kind
Outlined by the tumorous
Rays

That flop and lay like
Beached porpoises upon our Clammy foreheads
And slide like greasy
Fingerprints along our Gulping throats,
The pain that we cannot say
But taste the suffocating
Poison like the gallow's noose,
When at the edge of the
World
An old man and a little Girl hold hands
And turning away up
A glass staircase through
The sky leading to
The white white room
Of early childhood
On the 2nd floor
Inside which innocence remains
Wisely agoraphobic
To the truancies of his Professional siblings
Committing the crimes
Of time and gravity
Decomposing on the street.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of The Gardenias

The fan I bought you blows your auburn hair:
The ibex leap across the savannah and the children are lost:
We stand in lines and stare with our materials under the crooks of Our dreams,
While the cats are out under the giant blue umbrellas,
And the statues carry their own hammers,
And we have been away, while the turtles were making love,
Brandishing their children like coal spilled across the corrugations of
The beaches,
And the little girls moved just a little,
And your eyes burned for another birthday across the horizons
Where the schoolyards were leaping;
And Alma's sister passed through the arms of Jesus for her confirmation,
And the white flowers budded underneath the fountains
Across the perfumed lips of the gardenias.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of The Native Prom Queens

And now they are sleeping in their pigeons of Ecstasy while I had to wait another year to see if
This was even real,
Working for the church and giving away food every Saturday,
Underneath the airplanes and underneath the Mountains while both of My grandparents were left alive—
Now my Chinese wife is with child,
And I made love to her tonight while it rained—
I seemed to have skipped out of class
And second base with her—
As the day after we met we were married
And I consummated what we are now to be:
Our first child is born,
Our second is waiting in the bull pen—
I am drinking a beer
After one in the morning and still have not Experienced metamorphosis—
There is yet someone better than me able to Teach and make a profession
Out of the finest conundrums that were never Really there—
But for now they plot and seem to be happy
With themselves
As the glaciers melt like the tears of a goddess
Looking down
At the foxes who were too clever for themselves
To ever have gone after any of the grapes
From the movie theatres or anywhere—
And they just waited for a time like this,
For fireworks and no commitments,
As the criminals fled the industrious scene,
Under the sweltering tits of the bilious mountains—
The misfits who one pretended to kiss the Indian giving
Lips of the native prom queens.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips Of The Rattlesnake

I will publish my art through the new diamonds
And then I will survive by holding on:
What candle that wept beneath the burning bush—
What silent lip set afire by gasoline while the Airplanes are pushing out:
Oh, mute child in Colorado underneath the mountains;
Wait for the rainstorms to come—
For then we will all be mute, and the you can Sell yourself to the lips of the rattlesnake without any Grief.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips That Can Describe Nothing

Sea is there- cold sea, and the many Legged serpent is swimming in
Her,
Tangled up in nectar and gills- its Chorus crowding the waves,
As it swims with so many heads
That break as if monuments
Into the cloisters of sunlight spat down
From the adulterous heavens-
The serpent continues with the swimmers
In a hapless cornucopia
Of sinking Ferris wheels with too many Axis's- broken apart, a kaleidoscope
Of beasts no hero can conquer-
The very ends of the beautiful meaning eating
Themselves- going away to come
Again- the many avenues of a funhouse
Of missing and abandoned lovers-
This great thing is the centripetal force
Of stormy windmills- an assured madness
With too many sweet eyes, and lips that Can describe nothing.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips That Cannot Sing

Everyday peels unforgiving to the new threats:
Doggies die,
And pets die-
Goldfish are bought at the fair-
Little girls turn upside down and shout to the fibrillating
Shadows of the carnivalesque moon;
And I have no one to love,
And this is not a theatre- and this is not art:
This is the casual tortoise choking on the oleander,
Or on the rubrum;
These things are not even meatloaf- they will not Sustain- they will not sell:
These words are broken amber toys who wished they Had more little boys to play with:
These are the sad things from high school,
The only thing new about them is the scars, the imbibing
Of their father's cheap alcohol:
And the earth is on a tilt and imperfect-
So around its table floats the icy centaurs, the jilted pin-palls
Who sing all woken up in Colorado,
But her dress is up and receptive to the javelin of her
Middle aged sun: If there was a younger, more vibrant
Conquistador of light, she would have him,
But then she can't even open the garage door:
And all of it is tricks tied up in a nap sack and slung over
The shoulder to truck:
And tannebaums in a spring never thought of, never celebrated-
Ladies crying from the peeled vestiges of flesh, or from Heavy duty kitchen work- the chemical pools sting their eyes,
And they press some wine to their powder-doomed lips that cannot sing.

Robert Rorabeck

Lips To My Cool Shade

My father gives me direction and a couple dollars
For lunch:
We sell salted coelacanth and Indian corn by the dozen
Bunch:
And I think of you and hold my hand over my heart
And chant to you;
When the roach coach comes for lunch, I spend five Dollars,
And sit and relax and drink Mountain Dew,
And I can almost hear my dogs and who you must be Making love with-
I am celibate and horded- I am very much Nicola
Tesla in Colorado Springs or somewhere else:
I am making invention by stealing your blue prints,
By lifting your skirts and peeking inside,
While you just go about you f%cking hay ride:
What will you be for Halloween:
Won't you be my orange tree? Won't you be my shade,
Won't you be my Spanish harlot and with your Cadavers escalating through the bases of marmalade, Climb up my swinging husk and put your
Lips to my cool shade.

Robert Rorabeck

Listen To The Mausoleums Grow

I am beautiful but tight knotted:
I will never sell,
But I am good for suffocating boats;
And the rest of your day is full of liars,
But you read me and it is good enough
For making love with Acrobats;
And I can't drive trucks, and the funny thing is
I cant even spell,
But I am getting out of the bird bath before the Mass migrations;
And even before the song ends, the bird bath is quite Empty and perfectly teal:
And Erin doesn't return my calls:
She thinks she has the upper hand, but she doesn't Even remember who I am,
And I lie my head underneath the clouds and seem to give
The same smile that they always give at the end of the show;
And happily I listen to the mausoleums grow.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Bit Of Perfume

A little bit of perfume after the sun goes down—
That is when the jasmine spring their wares onto empty Trees—white hearts that cats look up to,
Buds of corsages for boys no bigger than toy trucks—
The garden laying anonymously beside the road—
As the clock stops ticking and begins to purr.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Evidence Left Behind

Fingerprinting a theft—little evidence left behind after
A sun shower on a broken heart—
Broken words told the empty street that is iridescent—
Like an oil slick trying to impersonate a rainbow:
This month there will be Halloween
And next month elections: I will try to wriggle my way through School—I will bend my neck and drink from
The water fountain at my discretion—
The neighborhood of our avenue will continue tumbling
Through the pine trees of an unspeakable truant's joy—
And awakening in the morning,
Mouth filled with the information of sleep walkers—
Only to pull over—our kids collected from the rodeos of their Daycare, making sand castles to the individuated gods—
Surprised by the words they know—
Awakening in the afternoons of their weekends, clever,
Well-fed—and playing down their one way streets
As airplanes shoot like bottle rockets through the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Goldfish

Pleased as the pleasant bees taking over
A small corner of the house'
Little wildflowers outside sipping of the sunbeams'
In just a slant of a garden,
The forest otherwise over grown 'making a poetry of
The inner space'
Little windows looking through keyholes'
A little goldfish swims back to his garden'a little girl
Holds hands
And examines the ribbon of a canal 'maybe she lives
In a fish bowl, or at least a trailer park 'underneath the Talking lines 'only if she ever looked so
Beautiful as to ever be my muse'
The parks lay barrenly across from her 'the mountains
Gather up their news '
Wild horses on the forefront of a graveyard of missing
Parents 'Airplanes making an apiary in the Sky over a forest fire lactating a breakfast
Of honey and eggs'
As stewardesses get together begging to be remembered
As they keep continuing far above another world.

Robert Rorabeck

Little More Than A Happy Candle

How rude the cross to lay dreaming in golden
Filigree on Monday
While in less than an hour Alma will be cleaning things in the Fruiteria:
Alma who must weigh less than one hundred pounds;
And I am up near two hundred:
She was born in Guerro Mexico, and I have never seen how the Monarch butterflies must have migrated across the shoulders
In the cantinas of her childhood,
But her eyes are as ochre as their sadness:
How rich and stimulating, like the soul penned by big brown
Buttons into the stare of a paper doll:
Strong weather could pick her up and carry her into the makebelieve
Of unicorns:
She loves the Virgin of Guadalupe: she wears her around her neck,
And she cleans the counter while the day leaps over her
Like a boy enamored with her body, like a brown tree wayward
Of its orchard, but happy,
The sun little more than a happy candle basking over her soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Little More Time

You put a church into my body
You didn't even believe—
And a fairground, like a well-lit spear into My heart—
And for a while it made you laugh with
The springtime toads
Chuckling on the rebar—And when you drove Past my window when I was not
Home,
You could see the Virgin of Guadalupe well
Lit upon her church—and it made
You smile until your amber mind drifted
Back to the orange groves,
And thoughts of another love your Ferris Wheels could not leave behind—
Drivers of your sorrowful sunshine—
And you went in with him and left your cathedrals
Emptied in my mind—
Until the rains inevitably put out the candles of That love, and I put new saints inside my windows
That were neither yours or mine—
And you drove away into a new playground across
The graveyards- and sang songs
Of how you used to believe in my affections—
And would have returned their love to me, you swore,
Listening to the childhood's evaporations—
If only I had given you a little more time.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Office In The Gloom

I've never battled with the ancients,
And she kisses you and spins on you:
I don't know what to do with this spear:
The angles of battleships are very sweet going down
Amidst the gawking icebergs.
Venal muses ringing bells in the sky don't care-
They lift a leg and fart and then savage more
Sugar cane for their rum:
They bight the tails of puss willows; they keep their Boys on ice in the little streams in the ribbons up in their Hair:
And my day is long and untrustworthy, but I keep assuring Myself that it will one day lead to paradise;
And Kelly comes in on Tuesdays and we count dolphins
In the sea, or at least she does with her better eyes,
And isn't that nice:
I keep wanting to hold her hand- she kissed my neck today.
I drink liquor and I want to die:
The panda bears inside the zoo are very sad-
I just wish they could talk to me like astronauts stranded on
The moon;
And she is in her night garments, and her mailmen are all home
Almost sleeping from their hours spent walking and humming
On her;
And she has a little office in the gloom,
And a beautiful husband waiting at home for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Porcelain Doll

It's time for people to start paying me, really,
For to hide in the glorious spread of fondled light
Winnowed from the spiked palms,
Where the diminutive refugee of the circus lives;
Her tits the tart apples they pay quarters for ten second Beholding; I've tried to pick her up and carry her Into the white washed rime and pumpernickel where
The dentists and clairvoyants, and romance novelists live
Out as in estuaries of chlorine, where the pools vibrate
Like belly-dancers, and little sorts of harems,
And underage spoiled-brats get virtual reality games,
And acne-scarred hookers to bight their teeth on without a Glint of shame; I've tried to pick her up from her dugout in the Heart of the palm at the left edge of the frame of the football Field, where she floated to disheveled and feral from her
Flight from the screw-tape ringmaster and the pinching hell,
Her topless mermaid suit and the tank of teal,
She came crying on the knobby back of a crocodile she charmed
With her sequined skirt and a funnel of the king's liquor;
But she will not go, though I tease and tug her, for she says she Likes it here, in the buggies of spikenard, especially after
The Mexican has cut the grass and gone away, and the crickets
And grasshoppers are hopping headless and madly, and the midgets
Are garlanding the cypress, and the housewives are driving home
Like sepiaed and dulled floats in a parade of winsome hearses;
Then she can stare at them all like a little porcelain doll, and Coo in her creel, and if she were still a child, I would love her,
She says, but not now with all her tattooing and banishments;
But, quietly, I love her still, and creep to her out from the middle Of school, and bring her sacks of hamburgers and things I
Weave for her from different colors of worry; and she promises me
One day soon when sleep becomes the professionals, we will Creep out together on the drooling green, and swing in a pattern
Of circles, likened to two planets making love in a dizzy universe.

Robert Rorabeck

Little Sparrow

Where are you, little sparrow,
Because you don't sing anymore
From your lonely cage by the yellow window:
Truth be told,
You hardly sung to me at all,
But I am sad now, little sparrow,
And your grandmother wants to see you
Once again before she leaves this world.
Because you sing so beautifully,
Little sparrow,
When you let yourself go,
And reminisced on the things which Never happened to us....
Even though that was quite so long ago,
And I have never become the great artist
You told me I could be:
Further from the sun,
The world is sadder now, little sparrow,
As you must know where ever you might be:
We need you to sing to us to keep us warm;
You are such a small thing,
But you are the one who can lighten the earth.
The trees are shivering now on the edge,
And the lawn is full of blue frost
Which doesn't know where else to go,
And the last light is keeping like a
Candle on an ancient desk,
But soon too it will be gone-
Old friends are returning to the far away
Places I once knew them,
And you might see them again
Without even noticing, little sparrow,
But it is doubtful I will hear at all,
Little sparrow,
Unless you can resurrect me with
Your needful song....

Robert Rorabeck

Little Wildflowers

Pleased as the pleasant bees taking over
A small corner of the house—
Little wildflowers outside sipping of the sunbeams—
In just a slant of a garden,
The forest otherwise over grown—making a poetry of
The inner space—
Little windows looking through keyholes—
A little goldfish swims back to his garden—a little girl
Holds hands
And examines the ribbon of a canal—maybe she lives
In a fish bowl, or at least a trailer park—underneath the
Talking lines—only if she ever looked so
Beautiful as to ever be my muse—
The parks lay barrenly across from her—the mountains
Gather up their news—
Wild horses on the forefront of a graveyard of missing
Parents—Airplanes making an apiary in the
Sky over a forest fire lactating a breakfast
Of honey and eggs—
As stewardesses get together begging to be remembered
As they keep continuing far above another world.

Robert Rorabeck

Littlest Heaviest Thing

You complicate the sky
Every time I run toward you,
You flick on the brights
And become the neon angel
Spreading its wings,
Hiding the barreling train
Only to step aside at the Last moment to watch
Me devoured by the Prehistoric processions,
A stampede of cheerleaders
With heavy singularities
Flecking their eyes,
Which start unraveling
My guts, strings of spaghetti
Sucked through the lips
Of the succubus who cheers
Rosy cheeks and pompoms—
There, between eerie white teeth
To become compacted, all
Of it in a single point—
Arms and legs drawn in Like a turtle playing defense,
Breath drawn in from the Heavy blow, fist balled with painted nails,
To my chest, all sensibility knocked
Out of me—all that remains is
The point of the heaviest gravity,
Which nothing can escape, the thought
Of you like epileptic nebular
Clouds stampeding through the Riverbeds of coal black sky,
Driven by the whips of her storm,
Pressing down with all the weight of your anti-matter, the mirror of the Universe—
You swoop down like the Angel of death making an encore,
And pick me up where I

Lie on the sidewalk,
The littlest heaviest thing—
For some reason, you
Drop me in your pocket
And strut on down the street,
The points of your high heels
Sizzling the concrete.

Robert Rorabeck

Littlest Of The Talented Children

Hat tricks burn the air over the erstwhile celebration;
Where the little boys are sleeping with blotchy coats,
The bouquets of fluidic clitorises of red hibiscus,
Reveal the deep quieted organs beneath the ripped denim;

This is all that was had to say, said the king touching down,
And surveying the destroyed hymen of the disentangled relationship:
His children were tangled like topaz nettles,
The emotionless lovers of a mutilated culture;
Twins who once shared a constellation,
Where the hares nuzzled in a warm clutch,
Now this the spilled inducement of overeager wasps,
Who have swollen the garden's neck with their forthrightness....

Beneath the few remaining trees, a pitiful swath of anemic glade,
The poets are giving up and going indoors;
Like premenstrual geniuses, they are too soon perturbed
By her absence of the gesture of her eyes upon them;
They are contemplating imports and the amputations of Their right leg, as they hang the impotently soaked broadsides on the Pontificating coat rack;

Soon they will be sitting on cushions and out of it,
And cannot be blamed if she cuts her wrist at the end of the rhyme,
Their eyes sharing this empirical wall which we can all see:
The certainty of callous hands on indifferent wood,
The craftsman's sons returned home from the battle which Killed all hope of the littlest of the talented children.

Robert Rorabeck

Living God As Blind As Midnight

The milk of satin estuaries and of the milk men—
Who may or may not have been your father,
While we were abandoning your households on Holidays—and the greater tenements seemed to sing
Of long forgotten holidays—but there remain places
That as of yet provide the kindling for Other monsters and their housewives—whose kitchens
Sing, and whose pools glisten—
Words written down to win the lottery—
Stories told to abandoned men—horses who've leapt
Over their grottos and estuaries,
As the busses return just as the butterflies—
And the moon rises like a pregnant kite-
Stumbling across all of the hopelessness to find their Living god as blind as midnight.

Robert Rorabeck

Living In The Coliseum Of The Creeps

Plato invented the first Barbie for example
And said, "This is what I mean, "
And set her on a model horse
And watched her leap the scene.

And all the beardless students gathered there
Clapped and roared,
Not knowing that they too exemplified
The imperfection of the horde.

She spent her days grazing knee high in the Sultry wheat,
But getting to the higher fruit proved a tougher
Feat;

But when she got up to the sweetest bough
And such rare fruit she did perceive,
She thought now I have the means to prove that I shouldn't grieve;

Yet, when she leaned outwards to get the rarest thing,
Her ample bosom stymied her: her breasts got in the way,
And she had not the wings to save herself from
The most innocent of graves:

She fell so far for she had not the means to fly
And by this I mean she went into a languorous dive:
Drinking from the evening eyes of men, she stopped along
The highway and entered into a place of ill-refute:
She lingers there while the world had a changing of the Guard:

She never made it up to college, she didn't keep her guard;
And thus bringing her into the fruition of a newer lord;
And there was many a evening he sat her on his blue-jeaned knee,
And said, "Now, Barbie, it's time to play with me."

Thus the moral of the story, folks, is that nothing

Can be real with any perfect certainty; and thus Plato was deceived,
Later on Newton ate the apple that defined our certain gravity;
But that's little more than hearsay, mentioned in more loquacious stories.

One thing remains for certain, though;
We all live in the coliseum of the creeps,
And what doesn't kill us, though,
Will surely make us weep.

Robert Rorabeck

Lloyd Alexander's Unapologetically Forgotten Relative

I am touching on you
The places you cannot feel.
When you look up,
It is only coincidence,
Because I do not know who you are.
Instead,
You turn to the liars you believe in,
The men in your life
In coincidences of flesh
They pollinate you steadily,
When I am lost in the park down the Way, my voice gone
From crying your name,
Though the old great author is dead,
I write to him about you in real life,
When you are far away
You remember nothing of our
Casual lives apart together,
Departing the way secret relatives
Say goodbye at the airport.
Your eyes reveal someone I have Never seen,
Though soon all the world is waking
Up and donning their body's work.
This is when you close your eyes and
I cannot wake up without you,
So here I am,
Hoping to make friends by
Humming a fragmented song,
Because the greatest men have already past,
And I cannot go after them until,
Because the rules say they
Will not let me in,
Though if you put on your robe
And step out onto the sunlit balcony,
Yawn and drink a glass of milk,
I will climb up to you and sing,
For as long as I can hold on.
If they see I have tried hard enough

To appeal to the unfamiliar muse,
My adopted fathers will seize up
And patiently wait upon the fading paths
For me to follow into the After hour's dusky writing room.

Robert Rorabeck

Lo And Behold

A lilac sprig pressed in a playground of an otherwise emptied
Middle-class estuary:
See how the metals of children rust when they are made to go to school
And the housewives are in town
And their daddies are in town too:
Children make-believe in a séance until they are all grown up,
The lions yawn-
And the houses they grew up in turn green and the trees fall all around
Them-
The schools continue with their processes.
Blindness is a fever along the road. Beautiful women come and go.
The traffic of their eulogies carries a wind that uplifts the flags
And makes them seem safe.
Toothless and plasticine dinosaurs unlocked with katydids
Amused with broken promises the women,
Metamorphosed from the smiles of crocodiles,
And come up upon the banks of the amusement parks of frozen childhoods:

In the glass and ether, they commit to relationships,
Taking pictures amidst the Paleolithic,
Warm hands holding in the blindness- the stars crawl about and buzz-
The traffic of eyes moves down a bucolic armpit-
They are married inside the bastions of amusement parks the armies of Cypress all around them-
Abortive dreams losing their slumbers, a forest of embers creeps through Their picnics.

Robert Rorabeck

Loneliness Is A Refuge

Loneliness is a refuge
For the frightened soul
Already half devoured
By the burdens and the tolls
Of the emperical
World,
Bought and sold,
Butchered and looking good
In the name-brand clothes
On display
In the middle-class windows.
Further afield
Through the hypnotic shoals,
Like a feral child
Unafiliated and unafraid
As the thunder snarls,
The light unfurls,
And the waves explode
Like fearless soldiers,
Inebriated and uneducated
Revolting in the shallows;
Looking on,
Loneliness is a refuge
For the frightened soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Loneliness Of

Honeycombed in the loneliness of a swell diatribe,
My heart is half empty and a long
Ways from home-
And, if you've slept in all three of my beds,
How come you still have
A hard time kissing my mouth or holding
My hand-
And you still won't be here with me, as the ghosts
Float across the earth of tattered waves-
And it all seems like a golden coil of a serpent
Echoing- echoing over the wishes of
A sacrifice:
As the gravitational pull of a lonely satellite coaxes
The waves again over
Her exhausted body between the mangroves-
There seems to be a twist in the plot of her roots,
And a Barrett in her hair- snowshoe crabs
In her eyes-
As she remembers that her wishes are gone,
And this is how she spent her honeymoon-
Loneliness of a Ferris Wheel without any friends
And with nothing to believe in:
The no longer distant curl of death sneers her lip- as another
Woman has been making room in her house-
As her wishing wells are cleaned with bleach- and all of
Her penny candy stolen by kids on bicycles-
So her zoetrope doesn't have to turn anymore-
The extinction of a species never thought about by Television,
Like seahorses underneath the caesuras- or latchkey
Children underneath the monuments of
Another thing I don't have time to forget anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Loneliness Of A Swell Diatribe

Honeycombed in the loneliness of a swell diatribe,
My heart is half empty and a long
Ways from home-
And, if you've slept in all three of my beds,
How come you still have
A hard time kissing my mouth or holding
My hand-
And you still won't be here with me, as the ghosts
Float across the earth of tattered waves-
And it all seems like a golden coil of a serpent
Echoing- echoing over the wishes of
A sacrifice:
As the gravitational pull of a lonely satellite coaxes
The waves again over
Her exhausted body between the mangroves-
There seems to be a twist in the plot of her roots,
And a Barrett in her hair- snowshoe crabs
In her eyes-
As she remembers that her wishes are gone,
And this is how she spent her honeymoon-
Loneliness of a Ferris Wheel without any friends
And with nothing to believe in:
The no longer distant curl of death sneers her lip- as another
Woman has been making room in her house-
As her wishing wells are cleaned with bleach- and all of
Her penny candy stolen by kids on bicycles-
So her zoetrope doesn't have to turn anymore-
The extinction of a species never thought about by Television,
Like seahorses underneath the caesuras- or latchkey
Children underneath the monuments of
Another thing I don't have time to forget anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Lonely God Behind My Eyes

There is a lonely God behind my eyes
Who still cries for you who are so far Away, like a lost child forgotten who she is,
Her identity soothed away by time
So she becomes someone else's child,
Though my God remembers how she played
Before him once or twice in the early days
Before the world was fully formed—
There is a lonely God behind my eyes
Who screams at things because you can not Hear him, who hates everything he sees
And wanders far up into the glacial lakes
Of my cranium where he sits on a nameless
Stone and cries your name, the word
That would set him free if he saw you dressed
In the fine syllables your parents christened
You with. There is a lonely God behind
My eyes who has tried to commit suicide
Just because he no longer believed he existed,
Because he knows not a thing to be true
Except that you have walked away, like a
Ghost shed of identity, so now you float down
The roads and caress nameless men thoughtlessly,
Forever and ever forgetting how your love
Was the fulcrum for this creation, how Everything began to bloom as you opened
Your eyes. There is a lonely God behind my Eyes who still cries for you who holds the Key, who has forgotten.

Robert Rorabeck

Lonely Satin Dog

Lonely satin dog
Gets out and howls,
Pretends the sky his by Marking a fire hydrant- pretends that you
Really care to die by his words,
That the sea is his by pissing in the indigo soot
Of a fashionable puddle,
That his words are this by pissing out the ink;
And the icy centaurs shoot
And laugh above him and coat him with unbounded
Star stuff- things they don't even have words
For,
And he never looks up to recount,
But howls and howls and finally goes to sleep,
Wishes he could stand up and get on swings to find you,
And to evolve into your bed that way:
But you are so far above him couched in a garden of Otherworldly play,
And he finally gets the notion to fall asleep,
Or he just does after marking everything he can think of Which might possibly give you to his lonely Belonging.

Robert Rorabeck

Lonely Singer

Leaving the center- what do the heroes hope to find,
Leaving their women behind,
And all the pretty things that they bought for them,
Their lime stone carports and their two and one half children:
All of their hearts of palm,
And their beautifully beautiful landscaping:
Now I just wish I was not at home so that I would have to be Forced to watch them,
Going into the smoldering crags where they will forget themselves:
They will find their sisters, and not recognizing them,
Make love to them,
Until the dragons help them to remember, and then they will Need to help to force themselves down into the unending spray of the Glutinous cataracts;
And I am sure that I wish that I have no relationship to them-
Even though some women think them beautiful,
And their shields are golden: they are all doomed into the spiraling
Caesuras, leaving their wives at home to become the fetishes
Bedded by either greater or lesser magicians;
So now I am sure that I must be glad that I am a tramp, a lonely singer,
Who has neither known a center, nor has a center deep inside of him.

Robert Rorabeck

Long Abandoned Muse

Fish stuck in a kiss who are now singing forever,
Like over used words at the lip
Of the mountain in Deep snow, knowing nothing about the moon, who Is just there-
Just over the rise, where the angelic stags are rutting
In anamorphous movements-
There, like gold near the saddle, rising high
And swayed back like gods over
My childhood,
Like the golden sweat won upon a long hike,
And nudes upon nudes kiss,
Like kindergarten and goldfish all over my Missbehaved childhood, but now- oh now, my Long abandoned muse- what- and oh what,
Can they possibly be doing.

Robert Rorabeck

Long As She Gets Paid

Harem of chimps, this is what I do
With my extra chromosomes- I ignore trees,
I get envious of pretty girls,
I try to avoid my face: Most of all, I finish near
The bottom of my class,
So clichéd, I drool into the lower octaves of canals,
I vomit rum to feed minnows,
And diminutive mermaids, homeopathic romances
To which I don't have to shave;
In the back of my mind, doing exactly what I want to do- I climb mountains, I sniff the glue
Of wildflowers- I burn my fingers over the Lightning stoked river through the pussywillows-
Of her pubis, through the grand engorge of her certain
Fits- the bucks, the rhymes of saddled hips,
The cries I remember like little children coming out into Their mowed yards for the ice-cream truck;
After school, I like to swing, I like to f*ck-
Then I get lazy and watch Donald Duck, and the sky-
The sky is our neighbor and we hang tennis shoes by Her power, and she watches a while, concerned,
Turns rosy from drink, is shared by hurricanes, but I don't Know what really else to say- After she is over with Herself, goes down beneath the constellations I hate to Describe- Powerless, I hide love poems underneath the Shingles in the roof of a professional golf player-
I actually did this- and I've masturbated in a garage,
I've stolen a good thousand dollars worth of quarters to feed
To feel the plastic ululations between my childish thighs,
Sometimes she is blonde, and sometime she is colored-
Up and down her trails, she'll be anything, but she doesn't Care so much for expensive bouquets, or romantic thundershowers
Lisping down across the corrugations of wildcat or Thunderbird trailer parks- Near or far from the sea where
I pretend to catch her, as long as she gets paid.

Robert Rorabeck

Long Forgotten Men

Silent cars like fat women walking
Torpidly,
Not even animalistic through the despotic
Night;
And it is so bad,
This masturbation,
This recessive alcoholism in the din,
Wind-f^cked hills trying to be
Beautiful
To whistle to her legs:
She's selling lunch,
She has so many children,
And I call myself a genius,
But I cant even spell the word,
And I get nothing done,
Forgetting how beautifully death hung over
Me as I summited all those dour mountains
In my spring,
While my sick muse was getting married and Postulating the names of Children to her various pantheisms all awash
In the spotless glow of
Her household beauty;
And these decade of years feels like a week of Shakespeare,
Being read to the dogs in the dark:
And I swear that I am doing a tour in Vietnam,
And the caskets come like a wedding party
Being rolled out by our gray uncles,
And I still love you,
While the machetes synch paper cuts into the Voluptuous jungle,
The steam boats singing their operas to the natives,
And mad men going leaping with arrows
Through their throats,
Their tin crowns lost and being gathered about
By curiously metamorphosing minnows,
Spider monkeys now populating the raft once crafted
By strange,

Long forgotten men.

Robert Rorabeck

Long Version Of The Truth

If you know what you are, collect in my wishing Wells, and hold up for dinner,
Run underneath the bellies of the cars and their Starlets,
And come over for dinner with the ghosts in the band
Of death,
Because I have felt you here all in the empty parks,
And in between the stones of cemeteries,
And I have been in your back yard through the infinitely
Inclining caesuras that run up the spines of Angels
Whose liquor I have tasted,
Whose flowers I have smelled: and now it all seems like
A long version of the truth,
When all I wanted was to lay my thoughts in your bed
And be watered by your lips.

Robert Rorabeck

Look

Look.

And how happily innocence plays
On the underside of the opal coffin
Like light-giving minerals in a cavity no
One will see:
Clinging to someone she doesn't know,
Who doesn't breath:
Her lips are twined like barbed wire in
A kiss grown tight in a struggling tree,
Her shoulders a high wall hiding the wildlife
From the smoking highway;
There is a forest fire in her touch,
And an ancient lake; her leg has been broken
By a crush, and mended by a snake bite;
This is where she dreams, her curtaining lights
Cast from the underside of the little bridge
Upon the dark waters of a skip;
She is coiled up next to a cell of bees
Feeding their larvae the pewter essence of a gift-
In the earliest morning she cries dew on a Single blade of grass in a patch of sun on
A mound of sand, where the ants wake up
In a red kingdom and eat her cherished sorrows,
Though she remains the embrace of a thorax,
And the tracks of insects on the desolate yards.

Robert Rorabeck

Looking At The Stars

Night in its cradle just looking at the stars:
Girls in the ballrooms, like coming up for air from
The fairytales of goldfish trapped in their Little life sized glass rooms
Pushing brooms alongside the road, while the rabbits sniff out
The excess of wild, hyperbolic kale;
And the rattlesnakes them:
Beautiful diamonds on their backs, the rustic cousins to Satan,
Underneath the slash pines, and wreathing for Christmas:
All of the world breathing at the edge of sleep,
Calm, but discontentedly: fires in the barrels of off perfumes,
While I dream of a multi legged midnight galloping away
In her bedrooms: very fetching, and still in high school,
Calling through her necropsies to the sailors
Horse-headed in the bay: they seem to be able to float there
All day, underneath the light towers of the moon
Who are too far away to save them anyway; and they will never Grow up knowing her love, but they will have tasted her
Leggy through the waves- and they will go back to their Mothers preaching, preaching narcissistically of how,
Eventually, they had been saved.

Robert Rorabeck

Looking Away As They Do

Peeled into the joys of an excellent body destroyed
By rum:
I weigh as much as my muse of today or yesterday:
And while I am a bachelor,
I sit out and have lunch over the ants unapologetically:
They cannot turn their heads up to see.
Of course, the cars are entirely blue around me-
They seem to be burning sugar cane in the sky:
Yes, that is exactly what they are doing,
And the juvenile swans are abandoning our parking lots
And malls,
Before they are truly beautiful- looking away as they do,
Before we can truly figure out where they belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Looking Good

Now I am looking good-
Now, I am your man, and I want to f-
And I'm in Spain, just a boy
Drinking sangria with my aunt in Catalonia,
Looking at the lady in the stones of the Bay across the rippled silver of Port Boa:
Cross me, be my rood, be my stewardess,
Be my goody-good:
Love me, lick me, stamp me, stick me:
Whatever I am doing now, I doing good,
And the entire early autumn hemisphere over
My burry head is its own kind of Mobile,
Turning, turning without a hitch-
Looking at the brilliant serpents handicapped bodied
Down in the ditch:
They are evil, and they hell, and they will take us
By the hand straight to the principal;
And I love you, and I'm warm,
And in my head there's an entire swarm;
And the courtyard is red bricked and palmed,
And there is so many ways down with vodka and dynamite-
The extra chromosomes of extra midnight;
And thank you for having me, out in the balmy lunchtime
Theatre: I've sharpened my butter knife and I'll fight
To be your wife,
Fight to tie tight your spells trackside just west of the Parking lot's dinner bells: Someone keyed my car,
Someone didn't like me;
I don't car who they are; let the strike straight out
In the bullsh&t carnival, and the kitchens sail brightly:
I am a wheel running under you, steer where you'd like to Go somewhere sandy, hyperbolean- show me where
You take you other men, silver-bowled;
Let me metamorphosis again into a sheet metal knight
To press your lips again, reddish smears,
Stamped in monarchal wax of a newly family tree, secretive,
Give your soul and body straight and pure to me; throbbing,
Strumming, with newly strung filament humming,
Turn around and without blinking give it all to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Looking Into Your Eyes

I'd rather eat dirt,

And f- excommunicated

Angels

Than ever again look

Into your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Loose Change In The Sky

Pretty song of the nubile wave
Going home again over
The oil rigs:
What passion is in the empty moon-
It goes so far across the Heavens
And nothing has to sink, in the life
That is so long,
Hallucination over the trailer parks:
As it takes all of the Ferris
Wheels away,
And a long apple field of emotion
That disappears in the
Topiary of empty birdbaths-
And I have to sing like this,
Wino underneath the overpasses-
Because it is my art:
And I sing as I die, as the stars
Scatter like loose change into the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Lorca's Olive Tree

Oh gilded earth,
How come you hide the bones
Of dead poets under amusement parks?
Even the masses have more anonymous names,
Though written in the calligraphies of paid for stone....
Is it because they have predicted their Own deaths,
Like wounded birds too weak to migrate,
And so to dally in the wormless North;
Or is it because they have know that you too
Will fail one day beneath the asphalt
And the escaping sun?
They have meant you no harm,
Gentle womb of the virgin prostitute,
As far as I know them, they have dressed
Warmly in the sad blues of their alien depressions,
And written love poems for their professors and bartenders:
Neither the buyers or the sellers,
These egotistical arguments are beyond them,
Though the laymen continue singing like cocks crowing
The first murdered color,
Yet you allowed men from their own nation with riffles to find
Them, and destroy them with high velocity punctuations
Buried out somewhere in the Spanish hills
Near the olive tree where we still call their names....

Robert Rorabeck

Loretta?

It is not proper to call her,
The woman you never knew but Once walked besides and shared the air
And street, when the light fell upon the
Both of you and you glanced her way.
There, on the moment, you were together
With the world, when the spirits and her
Legs brought you so close to her, see
Her lips open as if they would call your name,
Or take off and fly, like something gentle
To land softly on your cheek and whisper.
When you were so close to her, the Brief eternity of your life, and her skin so Near that you can smell her bath she had
That morning, then and only then you
Are sure that there is a God, and maybe
He has finally taken notice of the world
And he is ready now to begin anew the Tangible creations of beast and man, by Bringing her nearer to you and having her
Tell you her name, to pollinate your ear,
Like a great conductor
Waltzing the crackling light down from the sun
To lance off her open bosom, to share with Your eyes the ornaments of natural selection,
And then to embrace and spend the night with,
Curled together in the soft moonlight washing
This young city to the beat of the sea still Sucks off the pill of swallowed conquistadors
From so long ago, where wolves live so far away from,
But then she has passed, she is gone from here,
Where clouds now cover up the sun, and the strange Ugly people reemerge along with the honking and
The flashing lights, and the world has lost its color,
And the word red no longer exists, and the empty
Crowded street has returned once
Again to it's natural chaos where the sun is so distant,
As if in winter on the wrong side of the earth,
but all you can do now

Is to live desperately in the moment passed, the moment
When she came so near to you and you were so
Sure of divinity, and so you live with her still, destroyed
By the permanence of the fleeting vision, still sure that You speak her name in kisses upon her neck when She comes to you in dreams, but waking, you are Torn apart by the lonely paradox of having her in Your heart, and not knowing where she is.

Robert Rorabeck

Lost Cargos Of His Immeasurable Wealth

I am lying aboard an unpromised ship
Needing to get passed you,
But you will not see me out.
Where will I go to live without you?

I am lying in a swath of your Burned-out memory, the dead-life
Shed of your reptilian shroud
Hearing your breath against me
As I sleep in the knelling of bells.

I have swam for five years deeper
Into the singular sea.
Now I am too far exhausted of salt
To turn back,
As your echoes have stopped
Like a music box that
Has wound down—the trap you set.

Down beneath me in the swimming cliffs
Bathing Moorish in
The breathless currents of deep azure,
Spider-webbed widows are selling
The pieces of my capsized future,
Bartering through a somber Mercado.

In greenish kiosks amidst the sway,
Young students still helpful in love
Put those thoughts of me in you
Into breathless bags where what remaining swims.
They display me in the dark corners
Of their dorm rooms in the highest
Layers of the sea, exhumed from waves
Where the bravest light is refracted
And jumps to live again
Through the sky.

After they make love and smell
Of mingled bodies, smoke and wine,

Echoing the panting aftertaste of temporary divinity,
He tells her, his first love,
I once knew him to live here with us,
Through our doorways where life is cheeriest,
But now he sleeps forever
Where we bought him: through
The roots of unimagined mountains
Drowned beneath the surface,

Sunken miles beneath the place
Where he gave up in her memory
And now lies forgotten,
As she has entombed the lost
Cargos of his immeasurable wealth.

Robert Rorabeck

Lost Loves

Fasions of playboys in their cemeteraries
And we all tried to start out from here in the plumping hills:
I seemed to call your wife to my neck,
But then it turned out what I was feeling wasn't real,
But the cemeteraries enveloped what it was
That we couldn't stand—
And they seemed to envelop all of the beautiful loves
Lost and spilling from another land—
Until found out on the patio of a television theatre—
While the open throated frogs tried and seemed to weather—
Voices without joy and boys who seemed to know how to steal penny
Candy to envelop their many- jubilant souls amidst the pentagrams
Of the highways of frozen and childish carracols
And misspellings—
But I loved you wrapped or inveloped in Christmas or Easter
And the playgrounds of the cenotaphs of the apple orchards
That couldn't begin to bathe and pretend that it was all there
Was—
New worlds spoken for old amusements in the amphitheatres
That remain an incredible adventure—
Lost words lost and misspoken for lost—
Lost loves.

Robert Rorabeck

Love

Warm burn in the throat,
Horses out in the darkness with the wolves,
Innocence demystified:

Her eyes lay upon him,
As her mother told her each step,
Soon this will be October,
And their fingers will have reason to harvest,

They are watching at the bus stop,
But his eyes are unfixed, hingeless and sad,
And the boys in their siesta sleep through
The resonance the professors give for state wages,

Plausible excuses why you are so far away:
There is another man inside of you, arrhythmic harmony;
You don't know me, and that is a forlorn caesura,
But I steal flowers for you, destroy entire lawns,

And the moribund housewives come out in diminutive
Bankruptcy, see how I have changed them to fit you,
A verb tore up from the roots of my heart,
Four letters and bee stung....

--, can you guess what it is?

Robert Rorabeck

Love Craft

Lord over me in the funny spaces only you
Perceive,
Peeking in between and moting the wings of airplanes;
And I will just be down caracoling in the zoo,
Because I don't want your species of wife anymore:
Strange and exotic circumstances have led Me to find refuge in the pieta of a banyan tree:
Here all the limbs are emoting: here where the salmon
Flamingos nest like an unexpected lottery,
Where the graves of conquistadors fester; and the Mexican Boys play futbol in the long and chartreuse playground
Just one yard over;
And I can look up to you and play my ukulele in my yellow
House built long before you could even be the muse
That I finally turned away: she that has gone to her
Expectedly casual boudoir like a green canon ball resting
Dead center in the alpha fraternity;
And I will sing of you no more; and I will turn away and Open my windows and my door for one
Just as beautiful that happened suddenly and was not expected;
But one I will be forever practicing my love craft for.

Robert Rorabeck

Love Dolls

I would like to plagiarize if it meant being Perceived to worship a stronger god:
If it meant crawling between your legs,
And hyperventilating the oxygen of your planets;
If it meant watering the plants in the new room,
And being come on to by little girls all sweaty back
From their fieldtrips: I've tried so long to be Original- I've waited outside your stoop and crooned
Until the morning broke open, bled and died,
And the trinity wilted before it could get to Sunday-
So I would steal to be your bride,
To make love, murder you through the threshold with An audience, a laugh track, and a roller coaster.
I am not a good Catholic, and I've never taken communion,
But you are so beautiful; and I want you spinning inside
My bedroom, so I'll pick the flowers the neighbors
Procreated; I'll pinch from the mailman when my dogs
Are on his leg; and all my cars will be hot for you
Passing the presidents who aren't real, speeding into the Hemispheres where I can't really survive, but it doesn't Matter: the flowers are plastic anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Love In The Woods

Whatever pretty architecture starting out□
Yawning and seesawing her legs and trying to find her
Way to grandmother's house:
Getting lost into the busiest prisms that hang beside
The rented houses of our shared childhoods
Remembered at the end of dead end streets
Amputated into canals:
Streets now paved where Mexicans and Mexicans now
Live—reminisces of you come up to surface
In the beautiful rainstorms of a summer that is Made up of just so many pretty words:
As I try to teach the children their manners,
As their idols are incarcerated,
And their parents or whoever make love in the woods.

Robert Rorabeck

Love Is A Silence Whispered In The Dark

Love is a silence whispered in the dark,
Curled up like sleeping flowers,
Curled up like a newborn's fingers,
Given to her from your thoughts.
Love is a chalice offered to her lips,
Filled from the unspoken lake,
Filled from the blind lake flooding your heart.
Love is saying nothing
Watching her flying away into
The sky's blue influence, until she is Hidden in distance's forgetfulness.
After you have fed her,
After you have healed her,
Never speaking a word,
Love is watching her leave
And keeping her with you
When you could have forsaken her,
When you could have just driven away.
Love is a silence whispered in the dark,
Soft like baby's breath,
Or the unspoken grass underfoot,
Love is the unbroken truth
The holy language laying unpronounced in the heart.
Love is a silence whispered in the dark.

Robert Rorabeck

Love Letter To The Wonderful Absence Of Everyone

I am one of a species on this block,
Have been so for three decades now,
And the sun is the watermark on the fold
Of a blue envelope, or even more profound
An unending escarpment thatched by blue
Herons; their wings perpetuate the serenity
Except when there is a storm, and from where They matriculate across the two hemispheres
For so long that they have seen both conquistadors
And SUVs, the men beneath them scuttle for Gold, in and out of doorways of constructions
Which give them definitions of borders, and rooms to Unclothe and make-love openmouthed, or eat
Eggs sandwiches with tomatoes and mayonnaise,
The females of their species reposing in silk, lie
Like fauns beside ribbons of suburban chalk, some like Lawn ornaments, paint themselves and augmentations;
Everything works out under that cerulean canvas
Which is forever floating like a misappropriated
Verb, running on the fumes of restless oxygen, and
This is just something else to put down beneath it
While I am alone, a pantomime of beauty, a love letter
To the wonderful absence of everyone, though Understanding that starting out from this point if I continue walking and swimming I will revisit the places
I have been; I would walk through the tumultuous floods
Of humanity, and their honking courtships, their Decisive exchanges, and the botched murders under
The tresses of amusement; but would I ever see her eyes Again, or, if not, would it be right to assume that they Never opened upon me, but lancing off the waves refracting,
And somehow escaped the tealish canopy, or hung around
In twilight and nourished upon
The body movements of a man with dun colored eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Love Letters

And I love you;
I and loved you, and Mickey Mouse came up and Farted in my scarred face
And showed off to his pretty princes and his unicorns;
And to you of course,
While you pretended to demure, while you didn't want to hurt
Me.
Erin- you pretended you didn't want to hurt me, but I am
So scarred;
And yet I am a braggart, don't you think that it is okay
That I can't even spell:
I still think up these things while the fish tank,
And the housewives glow in their rows of escrow and endives,
Starving like the goldilocks prizes transomed at the fairs;
And the days leap and the days proceed like
Giggling sisters through the surgical procedures of papa bears
And mama bears;
And the pet cemeteries guzzle the stars; and then they lay down at Large and wait for the tourists to come in their tourists
Barge, to dredge the lake and to figure out who is in charge
Of the Alamo and of all of these things;
And don't you think, Erin- Erin, that I do not care that I am
Forever scarred and you that you are getting married, married, Erin;
While your lover penetrates you like a song of different lovers:
Don't you think that I do not care that I can no longer peer Inside- Inside the folded dreams of your lover's Love- Love letters.

Robert Rorabeck

Love Story Of Nothing

Red shifts of good fortune dragons
Celebrating the Chinese new year of so many Things,
Eat little birds and pelicans who themselves
Have sweet fish on the brain:
And aren't we always going outwards, outwards,
Into vagabond parks and Estuaries teeming with little girls choking on Wild huckleberries:
At the center of our great majesty is the most Marble of blind things:
The great mother goddess whose furnace has long
Since encaved,
Who we shall in time refund our souls into,
Make her sparkle like the most gaudy of wounds:
We will all re-enter her like pulsars of Head wounds;
Out amidst the red souls of so many souls,
With such sweet paladins on polo horses or playing Football- Or as the weather crinkles like cute Noses,
And the alligators tinkle like garden hoses,
Let me hope to find your hand again, thoughtless,
Unabashed, grinned:
That I might reenter your molecules and swing
Back into the Yule-tide theory recreating the big Bang,
Which is just a love story of nothing.

Robert Rorabeck

Love To A Lovely Day

For awhile the dragon didn't have to Drink:
Even for the lives of some men, the intelligent
Beast
Could sustain itself with thoughts of your love,
A graveyard,
A carport all a-hush:
And the moons were pillows of Siamese twins or
Ex-lovers;
And the pretty birds sighed over where the cat
Smiled,
And the dragon wept for a great long while,
Remembering the arrow-head of love you
Planted in him
While just a girl: How you brought him down,
And he built a house and
Practiced being a man while you got married and
Fell in love,
Bared hillsides of children; and thus were gone,
And the Dragon
Drank nothing
Because he could see the windmills over the cross of
Your grave
Like a smoking transom:
A cracker-jack shot, you had killed him and returned
Your gold to your lips where it belonged,
And he lingered
Like a sack of bones in a suburban playground filled
With the happy thoughts of your
Successors' blonds, the echo of your lipstick
War cry multiplying,
And he cursed every angel he knew with the pestilent
Rancor of his
Overripe immortality
Tasted from the fruit of your tree and fallen so swiftly,
Just like a man fallen restlessly into an open grave
Cursed to always look up and see your chariot
Making love to a lovely day.

Love You

I love you:

Airplane of angels or butterflies,

But Isn't this just

About your last song:

Because soon we will have to cross the river

And learn to fight for ourselves,

Just to learn that this just

Wasn't just another

Television commercial underneath the Summits of whatever there wasn't

Until now:

And I have been dying, while trying to survive

Forever underneath the playgrounds

Of the unreal sentiments:

And it is just a beautiful joy,

While you've been in bed with your husband,

And maybe the fire has altogether but

Burned out,

While they've been making love while

I bed:

Just another sanctuary, as you've been cuddling

You young- while just another number

Accounting to its heliotropes of

Scars- as then you are here,

And amidst the baseball diamonds- as it seems

For awhile,

As it just seems a place- and I've just

Been friendly out to any number, while the throats

Of any of my wrists have been wetted and busied

All throughout the number while they've

Been skipping school-

And then the song sang through the school-

Just as the busses turned around,

And then it became just as familiar as all of the unfamiliar

Turnarounds of any school-

As they've been according to the school books,

With any of their fires out- and I cannot

Breathe, while underneath the high school they've

Just been laying out- and you never Know from day to day that this could be another Thing of another beauty-

As this could just be the thing- as I could just Know that she'd been smelling my echo of my one True immotion through my emotional
Amusement parks of anywhere-
As your children just head home over the baseball games
Of just their anyways as just through
Their because- as I've been starving,
Trying to starve for myself- and this is just the song,
And I am not alive- but another amusement,
While not able to give up to whatever household
Or whatever beauty- just another line for the tenements-
And a beautiful number that cannot ever excuse
My amusements- but I come for you-
Unromantic, but filled with all of the presupposed
Catastrophes, as I suppose the very Nature of it was through the natures of the rotations
Of the racehorses of all of its perpetual numbers-
Filling out amidst the graveyard-
Pillaging throughout the bedrooms as it was just as sensible
To believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Loxahatchee Lassie

I could be perfect for you still,
After work,
Drinking warm beer folded alongside the Highway where they are yet holding Dusty constructions-
The alphabet soup of these roads
Linger with your perfume,
The lascivious orchids which float around
The drainage off the golf course
Where the richer people go to take time off-
Those people who chip and Shout out scores, whose children have long gone off
To college, to forget who we were,
And to take time doing better things.

I could skip right out of my life and find you,
Swing you up in an old tire the tree holds,
Its mossy crook a castanet for fables
And those sorts of mouthy lies-
We could watch the rusting bellies of Antique airplanes leaving the earth,
As now all the busy and Hispanic fires to balmy life,
Celebrating and shooting off guns where there
Once was only us in that little day gone school,
Or kissing under the chicken wire ornaments,
New brides decorated with alligator skins,
The stained ceiling fans making do for better
Constellations;

You were beautiful even then,
Mostly then- the teacher's pet, and that was
The only time my spelling was near perfect,
But it was still all for you,
The wishes in the grass, even the weedy
Crèches suddenly flooded with water moccasins
And their aphrodisiac vision;
But even now I am a bigger boy and lonely
Except for my dogs, trying to do reasonable
Long division, trying to ripple my stones across

The sunken rooms where I have long
Misplaced you,
But if you are there it is only your lascivious
Sister, the Naiad of your Christian name,
Entrenched with deadly songs not bothering
If it is for me or some other sailors,
And I should know better,

Allowing you to carry on down your particular
Life with eyes for the boys and their Budweiser-Chevys, Knowing what only you could,
Remembering you half-perfectly maybe in fifth Grade while you sang so blondely in the chorus
And I sat and watch and dribbled like an expectant
Confection in the day gone humidity;
The soft shelled turtles poking extemporaneously,
Retarded interest nearsighted from the corrugated Drainage, and

I suspected you even then for a wife, but look how
The time has come and flooded us apart,
Taking you quite eagerly to better men with their Trucks and flags,
And sending me back to the ghettos of some Midwestern Catholic school,
No longer interested in wresting or Daniel Boone;
Perhaps with the expectations of some kindly sister,
That I should learn my better spellings,
And honor you by such distances,
And the better utilities of my childish art that Should bring me back around you in so many ways
Too small to notice, or bother you,
Hoping you kick up your heels for another dance,
All locked up and fallen into a husband's arms.

Robert Rorabeck

Lucifer

Imperfect stairway up to God,
And there are many distractions,
Changing
Their dresses:
They disrobe in Aristotelian layers,
But there are not many,
Riding the stillborn foals
With championship legs
Led by Virgil
Through the motes of the Pre-Socratics
Who never knew Jesus,
But tried to figure him out
Before the train arrived at the station.
They are feeding on the spores
And the dandelions
Blown this high-up,
Nose bleeds,
Beautiful without danger
Is innocence,
Her eyes gleaming looking out the class:
Can she see me there
Mounting the spindle's thread,
Far above the silver swing-set?
If not,
If not then there is still time,
Though I am growing gray
I will forget my name before hers,
And fall like Lucifer,
The handsome betrayer,
The spikenard of uncommon haste.

Robert Rorabeck

Lucky Thirteen

The agreeable bodies must have said dive like stars;
And she was very nervous, and I cleaned my Telescopic spaces with alcohol;
And she asked me if I hadn't come from the bars,
But I had been seeing outlaw movies with that old teacher:
Where once there must have been an apple orchard,
We made fabulous love over the armpits of the cenotaph
Of alligators;
And I could almost hear them meeting as she exhaled,
As there was no television; and the right parts fitted good:
She was only twenty, and my lucky thirteen;
And she was just new at this, and now there are no
Places on her body that I have never seen:
I will go to sleep at some odd number over thirty, and wake
Up like a mailman whistling on his rounds,
Retreating from no dogs, remembering her body like the Positions of a lost precious thing up in the wavering tree:
The bodies move in unison like the ripples of a pool;
As my old muses must lock jaws with their old and new men,
Synchronized to the bodies that they too must enjoy;
As I enjoyed this wonderful young thing this feverish eve,
Awfully, nowhere near New Mexico, not even a sound anywhere
Near her grave, like an angel on the plate,
Entering a child who has no fear of death, the body thwarts
Itself and flies.

Robert Rorabeck

Lucy

Hold her mouth so she doesn't scream-
I'm in love,
And she's moving away,
First she was a pagoda of sad light spinning
Under the sunken beams,
Then an extinct horse found with the Shrapnel of the first war;
She learned how to stand on her back legs,
When we were young we moved up north
And killed off an entire species of our second cousins;
That was before history could see
The deep mote over our eyes,
And she laughed,
And she laughed once more,
Learned about fire,
Took a fancy for the dark turns,
The horrible truth her body bloomed for:
Found open bloused in the shadows with the landlord,
Men with many grinning teeth;
She learned how to swim naked in the plastic algae
Of failing amusement parks,
Held her breath until I was deceived,
Came up for air and climbed naked atop
The unexploded bomb,
Farted a wet nuisance with the sun's earlier brilliances,
Dripped without fear, her nipples the fetish
For tyrants and cowboys,
Her womb a hostile atmosphere we are Drawn to kiss- the moist trap;
This eventual death too,
I have seen her using a tool to fix her ride,
But I was not invited,
To the cheap hotel room of new destinies, echoing
The two headed leap of nocturnal shadows
Against the acid light of the dead tv,
My youth but a missing link abandoned in the grayed earth,
A fossil glistening after the rain but left unexcavated
In her pursuit of modern man.

Lunar Eclipse

There should be wolves tonight:
Whole footballs teams of animals
With grinning opal teeth:
And so there is,
And there should be a devil in the woods
Tonight,
A little infant with mal intent
Scratching on the trees,
And so there is,
Tonight,
There should be a wind,
Like a gallows' hungering noose,
Snapping the necks of pines,
Bending aspens suppliantly,
And so there is,
Tonight
There should be a maiden singing
In the shadowed moonlight,
Upon a certain stone in the Sleepy dimpled glade
Words that draw the feral herds
About her,
A four hoofed audience
Bowing in the darkness,
And so there is tonight,
High up in the sunken hills,
Tonight,
Through the whispering
Gardens,
Tonight,
Down the end of the Overgrown path
Tonight,
Atop the lip of stones
Standing with the cerulean lion
Tonight,
As our world steps between
The sun and his silver maiden,
Asking for her hand at the dance

Tonight,
Imposing himself on something
He doesn't own,
And she follows with him
Far away in her celestial Sphere,
Crying in her clever veil,
Tonight,
The words which darken ours,
As the shadows align with us,
Kissing us like lovers,
As the hungry red fox crawls out
The den,
And howls.

Robert Rorabeck

Lunchtime

All of the glade spoken to of houses:
Expensive, expensive, expensive spouses: all of this space
Of animals sure, so sure that they were marsupials:
And up river, and up stream a river full of a specific dream
Of all those mammals in all of those houses,
Cooing softly into cooling blouses:
I wished, I wished to unlace those houses and see exactly who These spouses;
And trailer parks and dart boards, and weedy ways to grouses:
I wish is my wish is that I knew who my spouse was:
And under the mountain lays a town where get me up and get me
Down;
And Alice lives without a frown, both a big one and a little one
And another one who took me to prom, and pinned a corsage on My vest and made me yawn:
And in the earliest early of morning the seven satellites or somewhere
Around them,
And then later in the morning some water fountains where's I wish
I could drown them:
My lips on her thighs: it's all I wish, I wish and then I could die
Like a gold fish lying straight out in the open: the open Underneath the student carports cooling all coolly and waiting to Open:
Waiting, waiting, waiting for lunchtime.

Robert Rorabeck

Lying Down And Forgiving

The day elbowed boyfriend loves you like
A frog in the amber patinas of airplanes who are enamored
With the continents who they can see down to earth,
Divided up there in unequal proportions,
Who snakes through their utmosts, and other bereavements
That the fairytale princesses have agreed not to enjoy,
But lined up in touring wonderment anyways:
Mystified by what they have paid for- lying down and forgiving
When instead they should have made a meal out of their game.

Robert Rorabeck

Lying Still

We'll get married and we'll move to the city
And we'll die in the presence of one another's laughter—
All of the clocks and things behaving in the ways that They should,
And the girls who are pretty getting prettier still,
Approaching the final hours we'll let the seances speak
For themselves—
And employ the others just to make them behave—
As the satellites go around and around
Knowing that nothing moves that doesn't first have to Lie still.

Robert Rorabeck

Mabinogion

Another long thing
To make the ladies squeal, I suppose,
Dark and sleepy trolled up
From the Welsh bog:
A faceless eel born under the pregnant moon,
Something which has held its nest
Under the consistent cogs of the waterwheel,
While lives under the honest sun
Turning out like pretty peonies stuffed
Into the bicycle's basket,
And wound around the block a little rickety
From the cobblestones, but content,
Because her legs were like pistons of spring,
Cycling the petals and fluttering her skirts,
Bobbing her knees,
As she disappeared between the mossy cairns,
Took up the language of blind shepherds
And their loyal sheep dogs;
They say in the oldest mountains, now hills of Weathered time, they blistered there lips on forgotten rhymes,
And began to make love atop toppled stones,
Made love like open psalms,
And the windows open, and the hills laid bare
Like praying palms,
The sacraments, the Book of John,
Her eyes the truest reason that brought the storm,
Flooded the lake, and shadowed the orchard,
Rolled across the valleys and thought up the gale,
Replaced her last name with a new verse,
Which lifted the waters up from their banks,
And awakened the shadows from their briny beds,
Thus they came to her where she lay weeping and discovered,
The wreathing multitudes, the slick intrusions,
Slithering like scars upon the water's placidity,
Disembodied phalluses of drowned horses,
Riling in the blundering darkness and madness of indigoes,
The apoplexy of the cold blooded swarm,
The ancient intrusions in a complexion of grievances;
And she let them upon her in great balls of Cold pain,

And they tightened around her and told her
Her name,
In the language they still keep over the wall
Where those who are living don't visit at all,
So afterwards, pale as a midnight scar, she laid
There on the bones which now gave reasons to darkness,
Thus her lips were shut, and her eyes were shut,
And her mouth spoke no more,
As the rains swelled and swallowed her whole,
And they took her down into the clutch of rounded stones,
And there decorated the dark house
With her young bones,
Leaving her blind shepherd to wander alone,
Around the dark lake now her dark home.

Robert Rorabeck

Machines Of Primary Colors

When another day passes like Helicopters in tandem
In the breeze—
Going the way old loves shouldn't
Have gone,
Over swing sets enjoyed with my Mother—enjoyed with
My muse—
Machines of primary colors
Next to the heartbeat of the beating
Waters—
All of the motion that the beating throws—
And she is gone
And my mother is nowhere around:
I wasn't supposed to make
Love to her,
My lasting muse—I wasn't supposed to Do any of this,
Just as airplanes made for the angels
Are never supposed to touch the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Made Of Their Contentment

They say in their slumber many things- great things
The size of nothing,
As the parks lay empty save for the preternatural
Light somehow discovered
By the geniuses of men- the swing sets of naked
Saddles waiting underneath
The cerulean gaze of churches, as you never Come around,
Though you remain somewhere in the shoulders
Of hear, serving your drinks to Boys and wolves-
Happy to be made of their contentment:
Well, I am sure that you will never be made of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Made To Assume

Another one of these nights,
These things that repeat with the palpitating hearts
Of the polar sexes,
Who are in so many ways alike,
Wanting the salted conjunctures of each other's Conversations,
And their torpedos, so that when all the lights
Are out and crepuscule is crawling around
Like a cat who is unafraid of the waves
In every sweet trailer park and less serene
Suburbia,
Don't I throw these papers up for you
Under the elbows and wings of pines,
Spilling theatrical weathers straight over the Graves of used car salesmen and Conquistadors,
While the housewives sigh, but for other
Reasons,
And the lady sleeps in the lake the Mexicans
Ploughed and then went away for lunch
And a siesta their lips puckered with Chili and lemon while you were
In your kitchen somewhere
The airplanes leaping over you,
And all of us doing just what we were Made to assume.

Robert Rorabeck

Made Up Rhymes Of Love

In arcades of sweat and bad math, we do this
Again,
While the night just makes the sound of cats making love:
It is a naturalistic way to go:
But the elephants are very quiet:

And there is no pausing in our art: Alma, I just want to taste
You and feel your gentle brown rasping on my door:
And you've done this for Six months now;
I've known you, and we've made love, from time to
Time

Going back and forth like sailors, while you reconcile
With your abusive misanthrope,
While I pound harder and harder liquor,
And then your children get sick, or they get well:

So the dragons take to the sky with the airplanes
And the stewardesses, but they are not necessary all bad:
There is still some hope left to them,
As beneath their interrupted slumbers, some girl's hands still Pushes clay:

And his lips still blow glass into fantastic machinations:
But if it was soon, it was not today,
But I saw you, and held your perfect brown body in my gaze,
And made up rhymes of love,
Before I was made to walk away.

Robert Rorabeck

Made You Feel

The city burns sideways like
Poisoned nightingales,
Like passenger liners going down,
Gardens nodding off into
Crepuscle:
There they go, misspelled with
Mailboxes,
The truant boys asleep en creched in Sofas on the roof,
Their paper bag of fireworks mouthless;
And what does the sun do,
But give up into the other side of another
Lover,
And I am so proud that this is how
I must have made you feel.

Robert Rorabeck

Maggie Pie Crust

So you've written poetry,
And have beautiful scars, like
Burns in the pie-crust of American:
And I'll write your introduction,
Even though we've sold all the trees
And I don't know you.
I've seen one picture of you,
But I will not stare when you come awake
Again under my tents, swooning like
The damp laundry, or the birds
Picked from the dunes by the sky;
And I would lay my arms down beneath
You, to be christened or knighted,
Though you might not think to speak of this Until the depressions of the next millennia;
And though I should be the dirtiest man
In the bookstore, I will smile even as I buy
Those things they forgot and have fallen into
The vague quarries of such professions:
Though I cannot see it anymore, I am
Published in mutations of sky, and I love you.

Robert Rorabeck

Magnet To Its Metal

These days turn around the way young girls
Win their medals,
Or, children, squealing, go around the playground
In may-poled meadows,
And if you said I was lucky, I would slap you,
But if you refused to speak to me, I would kiss you,

So when young men are not being poets,
They are picking flowers,
And when I am not thinking of you,
I am a quieted liar fondling seashells made scattered
On the gravel road's nostalgia,
And counting the swell avenues young mothers live
Down letting their infants tug and suckle,
Their fathers far away with tight and twisted knuckles,

Some days I have walked adjacent to you,
Like lines on adjoining pages, neither understanding nor Reading the other, but when the book is closed
They fall together, the silken honeymoons the silkworm
Weaves in woolly tents hung from the lips of trees,

And if I could show you where the swing-set huddles,
Cuddled in the foreheads of northern states where Shakespeare's Specter mutters, I would paint my fingers against your back,
And push your upward in subtle ellipses to where you could Hear the great trees whisper,
And watch the hoary storm clouds muddle;

If you were to be my darling, I would be your doodle,
And feed you penny canny like a humming bird, and tuna
Noodle strudel; And we could lounge long evenings in The graveyards conversing with the lovely shadows,
And faintly, I would touch you, and then look away across
The lakes of common trouble, but readily return to you,
Hypnotized in a waning daydream, a magnet to its metal.

Robert Rorabeck

Magnifying Boxes

The cars come so tragically far away from their hallucinations:
I salivate over the candy apples of a fair that moved Away in January:
And a girl named Diana comes to my supermarket every morning,
But I hide from her in my trailer park until she has lit away,
And I am as free as a terrapin to come out again,
And dream of her incandescently all day,
While the sky makes my thought brigade for her; and her daughter
Coos in little rooms of air-conditioning;
And I mop up the soft floor under pine trees, and pet the sour bellies
Of purring water moccasins; and I think little upon girls in Oregon, or sick muses in Colorado, because they have already had Their fill,
While the cat kisses the firemen in the overgrowth of life-saving
Aloe,
And I think upon what beauty the sea has washed against my doorstep;
And when she comes again, I will hide from her as well as I may,
Until she has gone again, and I can bask in the burning residues
That such a heavenly body leaves as she makes her Avenues too close against the bacheloring neighborhoods of the Indescribable day, like the very ancestors playing with a tool chest of Matches and magnifying boxes in the buxom and comely hay.

Robert Rorabeck

Maidenhood Of Patriotism

The sun is going down,
And there is no place to hide,
But the horrors are so familiar
They are good enough for friends:
We drink alone with the dogs,
Each one of us an angle in the divinity
Trying our best not to look our Reflections in the eye- And we've been Shopping and had the chance to see how Wrecked and sweet America is,
So that we would like to move into her
Repeatedly in the same old fashion as all
Those conquistadors and car salesmen,
And she doesn't condescend- She is quite demure
With her chest bare and mowed, and homeless
Kittens purring between the gravestones she Wears as a somber necklace;
And the insects are making noise, softly irritating,
As is their ritual,
And the lake is a fare mural over her pale blue Shoulders, and all the fish are breathing quietly just Beneath the surface:
How strange we must look becoming dimmed by the Eloping dusk, the three of us drinking on the ridge
Addressing problems of our dogs' flea-bitten theology;
And down beneath in the park, I am taking her
As she is personified, maidenhood of patriotism, marble and busty-
She keeps her lips pursed, and her eyes directed,
Open and trusting while the traffic divides the two churches
Of our souls, militant and divine,
And there is nothing to say as I am looking down
Into her immortalities: that I do not know her name
As she whispers, thrusting, monumental.

Robert Rorabeck

Maidens Of A Perilous Castle

I seem to rely on airplanes too much
Like daydreams I fly over your shoulderblades
Whose aqualine bodies
Become perfect
Beauty marks touching
Down on the
Tarmacs of your nudity-
As you get out of the shower and Comb your hair-
And your thoughts are other things
You cannot pinpoint yourself with-
Or if they fall into the bromeliads,
They become dye cast toys
That lay perfectly still Like knights who have gone to sleep
Without the caresses of witches-
They dream of crossing moats
To see ferris wheels the maidens of
A perilous castle have stolen away.

Robert Rorabeck

Maidens Of Various Color

There are unreal lands where
Maidens love me
Blue maidens and
Yellow maidens and
Even green maidens,
And I can smell the pollens on the prairies,
And the light skips the names of the higher words,
And hawks circle me and know my name,
And I can see reasons in their eyes,

But sometimes I can't go to sleep.
Just in case, I hide a gun,
And I can drop the red into the river
If I have to wake up,
The ancient tongues of children,
The clay of crippled pots, each shard a rib denoting the Secret eddies in her long vivacious dress,
The stemmed spores she drinks
And places them under smooth stones,

And yet, there are unreal lands where Maidens love me
Blue maidens and
Yellow maidens and
Even green maidens,

Where death steps gently in the diminutive
Shade of purple thistles,
Leaving the tracks which crawl on fallow bellies,
Fearing what the sun might do....

Robert Rorabeck

Mailmen Who Come In The Afternoon

Peaceful deluge does not know where I am going,
Going in a peacefully hidden way—enjoying the Stars as close as flowers
Like the sex organs of the fjord—
The word of your eyes is a bathtub—
Oh, Thing in your eyes, winged—transitory—
Taking new loves,
Developing new hearts, the emotions you
Forget to trust-
Thoughts as indecisive as the colors on the yard,
Stretch sails mewing to the evidences of a
Mailmen who comes in the afternoon
While all of the housewives are away.

Robert Rorabeck

Make A Green World

Pecks of short bred
Eaten by famished serpents come from the emotions of
The shredded sea,
No bigger than shoe laces themselves:
Out before some yellowed kingdom from which all
Of the citizens have fled:
The dragon rich and flattered and courting the queen and Her daughter in the king's old bed:
Wise beyond his years, he struts like a better Icarus,
And he sees all around him for what it is:
These things that no longer belong to any other man,
And the children discarded to the dark bosoms
Of the hills:
To the wolves, to be raised or eaten- and if raised
Into knights who can never speak or don silver, who can
They save anyways, the dragon thinks:
And over his shoulder, and down so many moons,
The witch recipes in her cauldron
Make a green world there to drink.

Robert Rorabeck

Make My Hapless Stance

And it could go on forever like this:
This long dilapidated greeting hall dressed in red:
Ripe but dying,
Like the womb of the lady you'd expect:
Watermelons, cantaloupes left for too long inland
Too far away from the sea:
Overly sweet, not enough salt: The spumes racehorses
Give as they crush ovoid luck:
The metamorphosis of weekend flies,
The quick job: The beer was supposed to cost two Dollars, ended up costing one:
The chaos next to the baseball stadium- The family
Of Walruses getting rich: pull the pedals off a flower
To see who she loves,
But the springtime isn't necessary: She doesn't love me:
Even if she thinks she love me for the greeting cards
Of far away; If she saw me, she wouldn't love me:
I am not her sailor, consumptive up on dry docks:
I am not her artists serving the self mutilation of their Sunflower senses:
I loved this, I loved this, and that's so easy to write,
And as the traffic dies like grandmothers,
I'll pullulate myself tonight; hands hummingbirds in A warming desert where I no longer live with My parents: I dehydrating cash, I'm losing my senses:
Soon the railroad tracks will denote my way like straight
Edge river banks, unto the séance of palm trees,
Outside your whitewashed foyer, the chandelier hanging
I can remember that will calm me, and I'll
Make my hapless stance.

Robert Rorabeck

Makebelieve Dance

Broken toys in the heat on the side of A road
Watched by a rattlesnake—
They remind her of pornography
As her soft eggs hatch in the tresses of
The aloe
The young housewife passed not Too long ago—
And, over the fields of amusement parks,
The sun feels like lemon drops
Upon the chassis of remote control boats,
And no one has to go to school tomorrow:
None of these things will wake up,
Or even have to,
As the absentee wind asks for another
Makebelieve dance with the trees.

Robert Rorabeck

Make-Believe Women

The make-believe women, bare shouldered
Were shouldering the boats of air
It was very unexpected how they could do
This,
But I couldn't care—
Women of ether,
Women of air—
All evaporated above the baseball games
But otherwise going nowhere—
Coming up
And falling down
Or falling in love
Without looking around—
Work for the mammals who make love
Above ground—
Night for the soldiers who sleep naked
With their mistresses in beds of Jasmine just out of town—
When I saw them, I had a wife;
But now I am armless and drunk,
But at least I have a wife—
Child of soldiers,
Children of strife born to the women
Of air,
Coming up and going down
But going nowhere.

Robert Rorabeck

Making A Lustrous Graveyard

Now you have a new charge through the Theatre,
As the animals try to become surreal-
As I've just been painting house,
As the daylight fades- and this is just another
Forgotten carnival that doesn't even make Enough money to pay for itself:
Abandoned in its tenements to no one in Particular,
As the fire eats the world and then
Slowly fades,
As the Indians have been drinking themselves into Ditches,
As the witches circulate and clean the presupposed
Earth from their brooms,
And the fireworks hiccup from the prefabrications
Of their short lived rooms-
Just as, struggling up the mountain- and through
The prefabricated hallucinations in the patriotisms
Of whatever country I suppose in which we
Are-
I try calling to you once again, as if kissing the pages
Of forlorn pornography, flying their inglorious
Adultery over the hood ornaments
Making a lustrous graveyard out of my car.

Robert Rorabeck

Making Belief

Dogs as yellow as my house, swallowing for goldfish:
Timber on the brine of mountains:
Opal around her neck- words carrying the hope of sailors,
A witch in the sky trying to kidnap a little girl,
And the sweet love that becomes as round as a baseball after Midnight:
Lesbians in the sweet canal, making love to alligators who Refuse to cry:
It seems as if we've been called up from here, metamorphosing
With the rest of our class, off put by Their joyful opalescence, their sound orchestra, the birth
And the Christian names of all of their children
Who go home together from the bus,
To their soft grips, happy with the way the waves remember them,
Singing nursery rhymes to the front steps of their grottos,
And making belief in all of this.

Robert Rorabeck

Making Faces With The Loyal Doves

The world speaks in buildings of piles and seagulls;
And this is how it strikes out to sell:
I have been right smack dab in the middle of a baseball diamond
In the randy mists before school:
And I glorify myself with the names for my queens which they Will never even think to have;
And it floods, I can take all of the shortcuts back to the arc
And count on all of the animals I have been looking for
To be there,
And her naked hand and both of her children cooing and making
Faces with the loyal doves.

Robert Rorabeck

Making It From Here

In the fluctuating highlights of a vagrant park,
Falling in with ghosts- I am so ashamed-
I have runaway and I have nothing else to do.
The sky is upside down, according to the way its Fingers run through the trees, as if through a Tall woman's hair;
And I am very close to where my mothered berthed
Me, but she has gone and I grow weak:
I don't have anything to sell, having spent my last Fireworks just for glee. I want to plagiarize-
I'll be accused of it anyways, listening to the little Children's echoes who swept little-footed through here
All day; it is very hard to perceive how the world is Slanting, or to choose from which angle for to grieve.
Her tires are crackling on their way home, and soon
She'll slip into the restive suits of her work- those Families like dun hives beside the rivers and the creaks;
And I have no business being here for the world is Perpetually on the move, being encouraged through the Shadows like birds through the seasons. Swinging,
I can see my toes almost approach the sky, but the night
Is becoming cold, and it is warm delusion to think that I can ever make it from here.

Robert Rorabeck

Making Love

Possibilities in a sorrow that is drunken,
Finished- it goes slipping by the lushly ribboned
Stream,
A wish perfected by goblins or never perfected:
A little princess stolen away
And bereft of all of her dreams: corniced under the Purplish verandas of willows,
Caulked in the apertures- in the gills of playboys,
In the fibrillating hollows to be Filled with life, with lovers- as the cars stop
By wonderfully: they too are filled up
Under the lights of a world that is never sleeping;
And you can stop for awhile, and take in the atmosphere,
The salient haunts,
And the great shadows of the stadium in the distance
To be assured that this is real, and even lonely
She is somewhere nearby, like a tigress and making Love- filled up by the fires of Another man such as you- secretly but repeatedly:
Keys in the ignition,
And the tourists in their chicken wire, believing all that They see- like a wedding procession moving beside
You, agape and leaping for the apples
Of their laughable haunts- and you, according there
Beside then, passably in orbit-
A zoetrope wanting a hand of another leaping shadow
To hold on to in the infinite midway
Of loneliness. As you wait in line, hearing her in the Mad-fun house making love.

Robert Rorabeck

Making Love To A Lovely Day

For awhile the dragon didn't have to Drink:
Even for the lives of some men, the intelligent
Beast
Could sustain itself with thoughts of your love,
A graveyard,
A carport all a-hush:
And the moons were pillows of Siamese twins or
Ex-lovers;
And the pretty birds sighed over where the cat
Smiled,
And the dragon wept for a great long while,
Remembering the arrow-head of love you
Planted in him
While just a girl: How you brought him down,
And he built a house and
Practiced being a man while you got married and
Fell in love,
Bared hillsides of children; and thus were gone,
And the Dragon
Drank nothing
Because he could see the windmills over the cross of
Your grave
Like a smoking transom:
A cracker-jack shot, you had killed him and returned
Your gold to your lips where it belonged,
And he lingered
Like a sack of bones in a suburban playground filled
With the happy thoughts of your
Successors' blonds, the echo of your lipstick
War cry multiplying,
And he cursed every angel he knew with the pestilent
Rancor of his
Overripe immortality
Tasted from the fruit of your tree and fallen so swiftly,
Just like a man fallen restlessly into an open grave
Cursed to always look up and see your chariot
Making love to a lovely day.

Making The Audience Fall In Love

I'll drink to you by the rivers
Where the soldiers' boots have crossed,
And the deer are all yet sleeping:

Oh, but you are beautiful.
I want to do jumping jacks for you
And hold your hand and promenade
Around twenty-four hour fountains,
Which seem to laugh in the Moonlight;

Or die with you in a movie theatre
After you have forsaken my love:
Bleeding out, watch your ingénue on the Screen,
Telling me things I'd always liked to hear,
Making the audience fall in love.

Robert Rorabeck

Manifest Destiny

In Indian towns,
In crooked and barren canyons
On this side of Arizona,
The broken youth walk
Their negro dogs;
They dress in dirty black suites,
Black ball caps, onyx t-shirts,
Charcoal latex and evening gowns.
On a black road
Approaching midnight
Obscured in the clouded Reservoir of drunken ancestors,
They petition Coyote,
Smearing chunks of coal
Into their eyes
To disappear into the next
Brilliant appearance
Of manifest destiny.

Robert Rorabeck

Man's Room

Now is the time to admit defeat.
At the airport people look prettier
Because they are more frightened.
Without possession,
They may soon become lost,
As very soon they will fly
And their legs will become
All but useless.
They are leaving behind
A beloved family,
Or going to see estranged relations.
Seated by strangers,
They might unwontedly
Fall in love.
Passengers, they must adhere
To the will of their conductors.
Often drunk,
To be set down in Unfamiliar surroundings,
Into lives that are already Taking place,
To move around
People who are settled
And aware—
Who are comfortable
Contributing to dinner
Conversations;
Who hold hands when they Pray and make love peacefully
And faithfully
Before they sleep.
In the quiet of that night
You can only lie there
And listen to your Frightened breathing.
All your life,
The duration of your trip
Here in Man's Room
Where the distance between

You and your home is Expanding exponentially.

Robert Rorabeck

Many A Dripping Kiss

I haven't been in to town,
I haven't read a thing, though distant
From the inter-lapping hurricanes, it was Where I was born, and still live cerebral,
Cut my teeth on anonymous women,
Busty saints conquering the surf;
I put them there to start the thing,
Giving me reasons for the new cessations
Of my time: to lie here and watch the isolation,
My dogs who lull in the grass with drunken
Tongues: they canines, my faithful all,
The all that is enough;
The spider in the pump house has moved away,
But there are his legs in another arachnid's sack;
She doesn't call, I shouldn't say:
I should laugh and play a game of ball.
Here are pictures of smiling students,
Here is only one in cap and gown; the old neighborhood
Is purple like a bruised fighter who has fallen
To pay the bills; no one I know lives here anymore,
Jack and Jill are over the hills on
A honeymoon of sorts; they are not taking phone-calls,
They're in each others pants, and in the pool,
Cutting like an insouciance of sun, drinking bodies twisting
Play without referees,
Draping in the inebriation of white washed walls,
They get other boys to paint the fence for them,
They don't do anything, anything but this,
For they paint the distant bodies I now recall,
Those who live so close to the other with
Many a dripping kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

Many Bouquets Of Amen's

Once again I am here and on a perch:
I am not even in Colorado,
My mother's birthplace- but I am here again-
Trying to figure out what her armpits
Smell like once again
While I am alone
And this is just another came beneath the summit
After all of high school has let out;
And I've been trying to hold my head up like some Kind of pride-
Like a heavily budded rose before its numbers
Busily multiplying-
Just as like the ambrosia of the bull pens across the Armpits of all of Mexico:
Why, then, this just seems as if the heavier
Steps of another's dreams:
Why, just- the fireworks don't even seem to survive
Anymore, but it all becomes
As sort of anonymous happenstance:
Really soon it will be Christmas, and I am not Really sure entirely what I've been exactly talking about:
But there she swings again- my muse, underneath the Amber hallucinations of all of the clouds:
She seems to be making her special way here again,
Just as I seem to be opening up to her,
Folding my hands together like a dinnertime of crèches
And kissing and blessing her and ]Giving to her my many, many bouquets of amen's.

Robert Rorabeck

Many Countries More

If I cannot eat lunch, at least I want to come,
As I listen to the after midnight trains,
And I have eaten all of it that was that the roses were
To perfume,
And now you are curled up in your little and most indefectible
Of rooms,
Like a rattle snake in between the roses, like a mirages
Of full lips,
Hoping that I will distend to fund its wedding,
But other than that I am not here, and neither am I real:
I have just driven for some ways,
And now I am both famished and hungry, while Just looking into your eyes makes me believe
That I can travel across many countries more.

Robert Rorabeck

Many Fish

She is outside.

Enjoying the world, her pupils
Extend, like lions at the feast,
Red, red lipped in the tall, tall grasses;
What is she doing?

I cannot say, but enjoying the Well thought out words of patrons and bribes,
Words I could hardly encapsulate in my $.25 cent dreams:
Words that scrawl luxuriously through backyards
And bar rooms,
And return her to her childhood when she Didn't have to shave her legs,
Nor paint her lips,
Or let him hold her in his hands just so,
To get it right, and taste her as I wish to Taste her, the streams of drool, the way eyes
Might lap like waves on the legs of a dock,
On the features of the face.

Though I have written better poems,
And poems which don't mean a thing,
She has found a man who can drink with her
And not fall down, nor begin the catechisms
Which give her headaches:

Such as, you are lovely, oh so lovely,
Amen!

And, your legs go all the way up to heaven,
All the way up to Saint Michael and your Satin purse,
Amen!

Things which only mean I would like to feel
Her up as I lay her down,
Things that any man would propose to her out
On the street where the university blurs,
And the highways flow like ghosts away and Through the blood worked systems:
Soon and very soon, she will forget me
All and all,
And would not remember me at all if I

Hadn't hooked her like a fish and brought her up
To my eye and told her my name,
But she struggled and got free and swam again
Back to his mighty lips,
But sometimes I think I see her furtive shadow following
Me in my sleep as I row the lonely doldrums
Depressed in the shadows,
But there are many fish in the sea,
But not a one with a vase and legs like hers.

Robert Rorabeck

Many Longs Ago

The flesh of placebo angels luxuriates
On plastic hooks in penny candy and dime
Stores no fish in the world was ever afraid of;
And now I am all excited because I
Wear my father's pants,
And I get to drive his truck:
And I will go look at houses nearer the beach,
Where airplanes touch and leap and the flashing
Lives of canines catch Frisbee:
I have already been out to see that the parks are Absolutely full today,
Packed to the teeth with barking families,
Girls always turning away in parade, twirling for the Fanfares of marmalade;
And I leave, lamenting that I don't have a bicycle
Nor a true love; and the seed pods whisper in the cold
Front even here,
While the angels hang like dried out homunculus,
Their glow just the jaundice of an absently true pet missing in the pumpkin
Fields,
Like golden story books proven meaningless many longs
Ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Many Miles

No need for storms now,
Nor for wants: they are all right here now,
Beneath the scars, the fragile bones.
Look at how exquisitely they are put together.
Look at how they hold up her lips so that she Doesn't have to put down her drink
To kiss the gentleman.
I don't have anything to say now, except that
The grass is green beyond the curtains,
And it is a shame that there are no children
Playing upon it,
Making fun with the ants,
And the shadows are already yawning,
As the entire neighborhood tips into space
Just like a glass perched upon her lips beneath
Her eyes which
Are so steady upon him,
That there is no room for him to maneuver his Scars away from her vision, her hopes:
Soon he must turn and she should see him whole,
Fragile like a flightless bird,
So isn't it any wonder that there is no reason to Love him,
And now the yard is hopelessly empty.
A car drives by but doesn't stop for many miles.

Robert Rorabeck

Margot

Nights fanned around the higher enclaves of Pitch fork pines: you can see them rising, transplanted out of Merry Old England into South Florida
With all of its bustling news: old gods and new gods spanning
The archipelagos petered off from where I live:
The trailer parks humming with corrugated symphony,
And every once in a while lighting up
And cursing the telltale dreams of airplanes skipping over their Impoverished alphabets- stewardesses in negligee and wigwams:
Their captains chiseling in infinite transoms,
Throttling up the boudoirs of hard working angels;
And there it receives, landing across the bridges as cars wreck Down beneath them, flipping over into the cenotaphs and Castanets of dead Indians:
Turning like terrapin bellied up, sniffed and lunched on by dogs:
Landscaped by the silly ribaldry of these pines curling with
The scoliosis of the last two hundred years
And choking the mouths of canons- shading crosses and lactating
Over the cannibalisms of blue jays: I already have three in my Front yard growing like salivating mongooses over
Bird eggs: seeming to give the next tropical storm their braided
Birds- sticking it to Margot or what's her name.

Robert Rorabeck

Maria

Maria asks me where I came from that my Face is so chapped-
I tell her it is stress, and she laughs and asks
If I really have tress:
Maria is just as beautiful as when I saw her
A decade ago before I moved on
From community college,
Before I even got that girl I lost,
And always jogged alone in the park:
She was too fat to jog,
But I stroked her cunt until it become like a corpulent
Flower in the rain.
Which is really like the best kind, because it can hold
An entire dinner party of bumble bees-
Jewish bumble bees- and I guess that's what it did;
But I never thought of her-
I am awfully afraid of lightning- anytime there is rain
And the plants are about getting wet,
And maybe it is because of the girl in Colorado,
Or maybe it's because you still read my poems and ask
Me why I don't call,
When you told me not to call- When you hung up on me
And made your self suppliant like a battle ship for Your sailors;
But still jog alone, and it's always been about your neighborhood
And Bukowski always gives a few good throws,
But I think I've got him outmatched now-
And who cares if no one sees:
This is a game of midnight devilry, best kept secret from
The major leagues:
And I'll sell Christmas trees and order pizza
And drink cheap liquor and read cheap poetry wherever
I can find it:
There are always thrift shops and liquor stores,
And the forest is alive and rich with the oil fires of such Winos; and jogging at night shoeless through the Australian
Pines and tattooed sand dunes is otherworldly,
And I always think of you when I am vacillating on my Amusing rocket ship:

Going up and down and nowhere pretty fast,
Like a wave who thinks he might leap away from its Vast mother,
To kiss you briefly in the smoky atmosphere of other
Planets that aren't even real,
Not knowing that it was you making that need-some Noise on the cinderblocks of the back step,
Waiting to get in all this time.

Robert Rorabeck

Marionettes Of Similacrum

The satellites have their digs all around the faces
Of stolen light,
Pirouetting mouthlessly, without any fear of rattlesnakes,
As beneath them the traffic
Pushes through the crepuscule of zoetropes:
And it goes this way for housewives,
Who have finally taken off their glass slippers:
Cant you see they are done shopping, and they are as good as Naked having culled the throats of mailboxes and into The kitchens of their grottos again:
What do you suppose it is that they will be doing,
With the pool like a cooling diamond behind them, and further Down like a chess piece on the mowed easement of
The torpid canal, but an alligator as true as turpentine:
About which the mariposas are dancing,
Looming nothing but the briars in the penumbras of airplanes;
And maybe even in this painting, the soul doesn't
Exist anymore:
Maybe even all of the pretty women are just marionettes of Similacrum,
Except that I saw you today, Alma: and you kissed my lips so Many times, proving with each furtive nativity of your being,
That all of my previous supposing have always been wrong.

Robert Rorabeck

Mariposa In The Bosque

Ah the pain of epiphany, the realize that realization has run its Course:
To punch the saltlick of professors in their eye, and realize that Realization itself wasn't just enough:
To read John Keats manhandling, and then sell fireworks,
To remember the little shaggy beasts who love you, and whose love
Is little enough;
To awaken, and to time and time again awaken in the bathrooms of Forget-me-nots to never hardly never have the courage to look at Myself in reflections of all of these hot mornings:
To never having been able to do that: to having been a morning in Michigan,
To having sung so many times for my muse, that my muse has confused
Herself again:
Again, waking up, vacillating like stagecraft, like a wishy-washy thing
Of god, for surely I've gotten drunk and vacillated up and down
The drainage of Wellington or any old imported town on inflatable
Canoes:
Up and down, and up and down and up, Erin! Up! Because everything else
Is just old, just old news, Erin- Just old news:
And now he is inflated like a super tough bicycle, Erin:
Like a super macho bicycle, Erin, making his early morning rounds and Spreading all of your news;
So what have you to lose, Erin:
What, exactly what is there for you to lose,
While all of New Mexico spreads her garments just realizing she was A mariposa in the Bosque, Erin: and what, really what is there for you
To lose?

Robert Rorabeck

Mariposa, Mariposa

In the possibilities of depthless air,
I would like to take you, if you were not already
An intrepid swan,
And my words weren't already dying into the Moribund amusements whose sweet corrugations
Only last for a month or two,
Mariposa, mariposa.

Robert Rorabeck

Maritime Engagements

If I have cars, and I have numbers,
And windows situated so that they may never Look out at the rain,
The bowled, smoothed teeth of cemeteries,
Like herbivores grazing,
Gumming the lintel-space between the shade trees
And earth, but I do not use them,
Because I haven't yet figured out where I am Going to live,
Then this object is complete without direction or purpose;
But the sea, oh she is a forever beautiful thing,
Going as she does all places and not a single one
All the same,
a single encompassing engagement
- The best thing is I can throw all of My bottled desires into the collar of her crenulated neck, and She'll take it but never speak a difference.
She just keeps coming back to me, and then away-
In séance, an entranced dancer going about through
The conductions of an organic science
Full of Satan's knowledge, kleptonic but without hands,
Boastful but with no smile- If I seed her,
But I will, and nothing shall grow in her other than those Things which belong,
And do not notice me, for even with all my gifts wanting,
How should I breathe with them?

Robert Rorabeck

Mark Alexander

No more flowers for the beautiful words:
We can work it all out right here,
While I remember imperfectly slipping books back into the library
Before going back to work at five a.m.
As of now, I do not have to believe in angels anymore-
I have a wife and child, after all—
My wife just as imperfect but so much better than I am—
And my child, child:
My child is a stolen bicycle going up the hidden side of a rainy mountain,
Some place unspeakably beautiful that you cannot know anymore:
Until, I know we will grow distant and remote
In the desolations of this life:
My child, my child—
Won't he hate and resent me,
And curse me and love me
And, hopefully, never read a word written by me—
As I have so few words anymore that are not spun imperfectly by Midnight's liquor—
Soon we will be returning together to our home in the states—
And our time spent in China will be just a daydream he is yet too young
To remember,
But he is perfect, my son: Mark Alexander,
And this poem has become for him,
As he is made from both hemispheres,
And now has taken airplanes twice back and forth across the earth—
Both inside and outside the womb—
A beautiful man, my sun,
A muse for the stewardesses,
A handsome man who shall never be alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Mark Twain

In streams of shared unison
You sink your first and yell
Mark Twain.
My lips touch down on your Visage
Like migrating robins
Taking a break on your Floating pastures—
They hum and twitter
And take small siphons
From your lips,
Stealing your honey like gasoline
And light off again
As you pirouette like
A cowgirl orchid
Down the fine young stream
As alligators line up
Dark mystery
Like tall toothy gentlemen
Saddling up at the bar,
Their hungry eyes begging
The question of your throat's Availability.

Robert Rorabeck

Mark Twain's New American Novel

When dead, I will become
As defined as a homeopathic cenotaph;
First, curled by kneeds of waves;
I will be rolled by the dark janitors,
Uncle Remus and Uncle Tom, to your
Suburban balcony; I will lay there for many days,
Just a knuckle under the dry pine needles;
Watching the milk of sunlight spill around
The landscaping, as you lean outwards all bosomy Eating a slice of drippy watermelon; I would Hope there that you would recall my name;
But that is impossible, for there is a flaw in Your eye even I can see under the lavender thistles:
I would pull it out of you, if I were a whole man,
And inclined to the deeds of Paladins;
But I am no more, and yet shall remain here as Less than the dauby insect, until you are finished
To the rind, until the weather takes you too,
Makes a May-pole of yours stems, the lesser animals
Jump-yip around; but they will forget who you
Are, while I will worship you in a séance of Bereaved whispers until your house comes down,
Smothered by the cajoling thieveries of an almighty sea,
And then I must carry on somberly handsome,
Upon other adventures I have yet the mind to speak of.

Robert Rorabeck

Marlboro Halo

We're going to go ahead with our Dastardly deeds, believing there still
May be an opportunity;
We're going to walk as steady as we
Please, trying not to go all wobbly kneed,
As we hook out of high school and Straight into Juvy:
These are some things she said to me
As easy as you please, as she swung from
The naked limbs of the stalwart trees;
And I studied her arc, trying to figure out
How much lower she might play:
She was already at a five year low, but
She was still so beautiful to behold, and Her pearlescent brow was ringed by A Marlboro halo.

Robert Rorabeck

Marriage

Better walls at night seal the pigeons in the stars.
They walk into the sunset, into the waves, and the deep sea.
They prick their heels on the clefts of sunken war ships,
The dead dreams of dreary emperors,
The blind stalks of starfish wavering, wanting to understand,
The evolution of those who have moved on, and up, and up;
Where they cannot be found by who they were,
Those still wishing to understand the declivities of human warmth;
Those fellowships of comfortable eyes fawning like specks
Of amusement light on their partners' recognized silhouettes,
The houses of warm bones, the grinning doors,
And the tongues, the kitchens, waiting to feed and be fed by Those tongues, the bedrooms, the heady pillows, the musk of Ferris-Wheels.
Down unto the toes, and up again; Next to each other,
Door to door, they circle above the earth where the air is warm
And the sea is whispering like an allied country skipping airplanes
Like stones across the atolls of her knees, messages of wedded union
Glowing like happy relatives in the rosy wharf;

In the morning they rise as one household and the light,
Strong in its morality, plays through the open doorways like
The promises of well-behaved children and angels of smooth,
Skipping stone.

Robert Rorabeck

Martian Pornographies

It doesn't have to forfeit for long—look out,
And the dogs will have to play—
Stretching,
And strobe-ing in lures of pretending virginity:
Three weeks left of school
And then the social daydreams will most likely Evaporate,
Going back again to the rusty grottos where Girls once mixed with their neighbors
And the stewardesses touched down to pick at Scabs—
Longish séances, if you know the place—
While a little ways outside, music across the Canal,
And the alligator with the ruby eyes
Stares up from its Martian pornographies.

Robert Rorabeck

Marvelous Ruin

Flowers pattering in the Melting snow-
Short obituaries drift like wood
In sugar palm cities. Everything
Is sweltering- Remote control boats
Drip and sweat.
Paper candy rots.
Black men and white men are indistinguishable.
I want to be with you,
But I wear the mask of a beat up
Thief-
Who was caught in the rose garden
Again.
Everything is indifferent- my uncle is Whistling from the canal
Where the living are no longer swapping seats;
I think I'll play this music on your birthday-
If you saw me, I think you'd run away;
And the clouds are stampeding in
An obnoxious torpid haze-
The sun doesn't know where he is Across this fat peninsula-
Some parking lots are more crowded
Than others-
I am utterly alone- my boyhood has Slipped away-
Even I don't know what I am anymore,
But it is such
Marvelous ruin.

Robert Rorabeck

Mary Did You Know? The Purely Scientific Version

Mary, did you know, that we evolved from monkeys?
Mary, did you know, that religion is a tool of ideological capitulation?
Did you know that our next president won
On an openly racist ticket?
That America's brand of Christianity is in service to the almighty dollar?

Mary did you know that human rights should take precedence over
The pigmentation of a person's color?
Mary did you know that before 1848, half of America belonged to Mexico?
Did you know that your baby boy has been taken out of context?
Did you know that the Golden Rule is not in service in our country?

Mary did you know? Mary did you know? Mary did you know?

The sighted cannot see, the eared cannot hear, and The Walking Dead is on at 10?
That the only salvation is through science and the progressive attitudes of common kindness between common men.

Mary, did you know that your son was Jewish?
Mary, did you know that on January 20th Donald Trump will rule our nation?
Mary, did you know that your baby boy has been perverted by the racists?
This sleeping child that you are holding is a prop for a million sleep-walking man-children?

Mary did you know? Mary did you know? Mary did you know?

Robert Rorabeck

Mary Full Of Grace

I caught myself dancing in the Front seat of my pickup
Truck with aunt mary in
The passenger seat replacing
All the old ghosts, now
She's one too, because She's been there at that Lonely place beside me
On the bed she was talking
About making money and
All the various ways to Pay off your debt; she does it
By selling produce in south florida;
She went on like an economist
My eyes journalists
Fell to their side to Watch her tongue roll
Little bits of her children
Are on her cheeks, blond babies
They are her hope
Planted into this world
To take first tiny firm roots
Into the pots she's planted
Them- they are her karate
Kicking security when she Tells me how her husband john
Broke his finger today
Moving for her; she sounds
Excited about the break, and I
Don't tell her about how
This Mexican loius who Once worked at their fruit stand
Saw john frequently at the pool hall
With other women he frequents
I hear the truth in mary's
Voice- she's not dumb she Knows about john but there Are her kids and house payments she still

Needs help on and
Most of all there's that
Hungry maw of loneliness
That blows in the off
Season from the east
The hurricanes of her
Humid thoughts when she Sits alone in the front
Of my truck's rusting bed
She's trying to catch me
To tell me something she's trying
To whisper a kiss from 2
Feet into my ear or to Reach over and touch her hungry
Painted nails to my knee to show me she remembers
How we use to play
Doctors after seventh day
Adventist Saturday Sabbath
Behind the wooden pallets
Not far away from my defunct
Grandparents' mobile home,
And that she passionately
Recalls the forts we put together
With Indian blankets over
Chairs arranged to let only
The light play into our secrecy-
How we'd then stomp the Blankets between chairs tipping
Our houses over to make
A felty boat to sail
Out of the maudlin living
Rooms and into her Atari set;
But she knows that all those Memories are sunk- she's Grown up to that responsibility
And I a lonely sailor am left
Adrift waiting for sharks to end it
When she asks me- so,
You figured out what to do yet? And
I try to assert my Throat like some

Great capitalist investment
Thinker when I give My excuses and on top
Of them that I've saved
Money and maybe next Tuesday I'll go fishing
To catch me a trout,
Mary pretends to Understand all my Wanderer ways;
Like her brother, she Tells herself I just Don't want responsibility,
But deep down, like the Rest of the family, she Knows I have the love of Jesus, which will one
Day bring me
To the bank- she's Still trying to touch me
In her mind, she'd touch
Anyone to keep from Drowning- I wonder how Long before she divorces
Herself into her children
And finds the long
Legs of a new love
Warming her in a strange sailing
Bed; she should know
I cannot help her,
All I am is secret
Mischief, a fallen Peter Pan
Thinking that all this light
Is the lure from carnival, and
When we reach our destination
At the dojo where her Children are Learning to combat
She thanks me
I thank her
She goes around the Back of my truck to Check the taillights

And gives me the Go ahead to leave
There as I dropp her
Off back into her life
Without any kind of lifejacket.

Robert Rorabeck

Mass Produced Souls

Making sex with her will be Like Disney World,
But she is only a parcel of it all:
The juxtaposition life gives for a 1
Up, getting it done, getting it done,
Getting it done:
The math is solved:
I can have sex with anyone,
As long as her name is her,
Then the life will spread out of her
Legs like a painful garden,
A rock garden full of cactus and ruminids:
The dusk under the canal is swirling,
But I am not allowed to play with him anymore,
Maybe because they think I am a homosexual:
I am not, though I have seen his dong rise
Like an early cock, only because we Were playing make-believe games of her,
Catching up with her in the waterslide,
And having fun with her virginity until they Realize I am an under-aged genius,
Destined to be alone in my salinity,
But there are quite a few better men than me,
Shucking it in the army of the blonde-banged
General, getting killed by primitive arrows,
And scat on by Indians who will soon be preserved
In the still-life of narcoleptic parks:
The day goes easy, even though it seems hard,
Because in democracy, anyone can be a pirate,
And all the faces are equal, no matter how Ugly or domestically situated;
And, undoubtedly, this is not the poem which Will make me famous, or I will be remembered for,
For that thought is even now scrambling up the high altitude
Cliffs, afraid of darkness and storm clouds,
But I just realized it doesn't matter now,
For the time will come before my name is indentured in
The drying cement: Given all eternity,
A poet will arise with my first and Christian name,

Robert Rorabeck,
Either here or in Canada, where my name seems to proliferate,
As the ice continents melt, as the democrats reciprocate,
As the republicans refuse:
Who cares about either of them,
This is my name, as she is the muse of my preservation:
Come to me now in my easy basement,
And recognize my salient genius, and take me
As I am, procreate my genius, so that there Might be little feet pattering about our rooms:
Not mice, or ghosts, but the harbingers of our Mass produced souls.

Robert Rorabeck

Massacre Underneath The Sun

They made a massacre underneath the sun—maybe they Were just playing with themselves—
While, in the tomorrow, the sun would jump up yelping and Asking for help
Even though there was nothing left that was owed to Him—
And then the moon would rise, hoping to steal the gossip
From the ropes of your business,
As the tears dried off the hurricane,
And the silver foxes settled down underneath whatever mountains
Where they were, until the most Beautiful of the nighttime wildlife cried out from under neath
The parapets of its cathedrals that was Then all that there was—
And whenever the moon came out it dried the eyes of the foxes,
And then settled down in the amphitheaters
That pretended to gossip over whatever it was that wasn't even There.

Robert Rorabeck

Matadors And Steve Mcqueen

A macho thing, to want to drive-
I drove to Omaha for one day;
They were selling the truth at a yard sale
In a yard of red clay, like a baseball diamond,
Like a diamond mine; it was in the carving
Of an asymmetrical cross, and more so in her eyes,
The apathetic religions she lets pass in her gaze,
But I did not follow her into the church as she Crossed herself, but remained out in the frozen
Shadows like torpid beasts and faceless pillars
Beneath the haunted overpass,
And tomorrow and the next day I'll be driving again
With four macho men, as we go to set up the white
Lungs of elephants, this summer's lucrative patriotism,
And the sky will be filled with ephemeral pacaderms,
As along the highways the semis will roar like overloaded predators,
And for awhile we will sit and have lunch and tell lies,
And then we will send our patriotism to plume verdantly
In the effluvious sky, and whisper enraptures that war
Is kind, for a holiday from her religion,
In the scars of an enlightening night, we did away with Our superheroes in the fire when we were five, but Her eyes, her eyes are cities of sleepless ghosts, because I love you and I live under your stormy overpass, Though I could wish to drive away, but all around me is
The sea of your eyes; I would wish to drive away,
For it is macho to drive away in the eerie green broadside sky of A disaster movie, but I am a little more than fay,
And from the sideways I am grim, a silhouette nice and Tan and gray- A macho thing to want to drive,
But you have me hypnotized in your righteous eyes,
And I would rather sit with you and have lunch and tell lies.

Robert Rorabeck

Material Girls

More cars arrive
And it's a safe bet with loud vane
Women-
That they will buy things and go home
And make love,
Never suspecting the curious toy shed
Of their innocuous plane,
Just happy that the sweat
Comes out perfect,
And they reach orgasm on
Their birthday.
Their only regret is that they might have
All become stewardesses.

Robert Rorabeck

Materials That Cannot Burn

Good luck runs of four legs:
It has all the colors of gold your tongue would Like to taste,
On rum and spikenard weaponries over the Gulf of Mexico:
I will see where the whorish light leads tomorrow,
Drawing me light a catch on a filament's line
Towards my new endearing sorrows:
I open up my fist and it seems to be housing a lighthouse,
All whitish and lined,
The dying men there are leaving the spittoon earth,
They are making love with their sister's best friends,
They are coming out of the movie they just saw
And walking all-together with the others of their Species,
Out of the darkness of the cave and into the wide-open
Night,
A feral wilderness where not a single airplane has yet
Been thought of by man or the mailmen
Who diligently post the letters sent to the half-hazard
Muse baking cakes in a blizzard
Far into the over-stretched daylights where the tourists
Break wind and ski-like ants,
Yet far beneath the eternal crèches I have summated to Ask pity from these stars,
And to sacrifice to this muse materials that cannot burn.

Robert Rorabeck

Maybe On The Seventh Story

Buxom: a word to begin with for the dentist
Who is a fox,
And I am lying here in the land of silver mountains.
And I am no preacher,
But all of this seems elusive:
The five thousand years of Chinese history I
Have to contend with—the new pocks on my face,
As I am finally leaving Shanghai,
Drinking the last of the white wine my ten thousand
US dollars was good for,
And I am still hidden,
And I am yet to be found out, maybe on the seventh
Story—why aren't there any foxes home,
Leaping, leaping for all of the ski-lifts
Until someone else finally figures out how to Unbutton her home: and she is a skydiving illusion,
And I am a plagiarist of uncountable numbers,
But it feels all right to be signified in the lightest
Of tombs—
And if this is how it has to be going to meet her,
After she has already been found out by me so many numerous Times—why then, of course, it is all right—
As I have talked to her, and calmed her down,
And now all that lies before her is so many feet of darkness,
And she, of course, is already almost home.

Robert Rorabeck

Maybe She Is Blond

She's got blond hair,
Mother; and I want to bury my lips alone with Her in the crepuscule beside the canal,
Hidden by the overgrowth where the traffic is flowing,
While the mailboxes have turned their backs,
But she is always falling into the flames of another fire;
And my truths are just the truths of a liar,
But I still come to her with enough alcohol; and I have No friends,
And I don't know how to play pool: Her children weep and Drool and the pretty nightmares and alligators crawl and Curl in the saunas underneath her house:
She is entirely naked: She is a church stripped bare of Stained glass, and maybe the legionnaires are returning home,
Maybe the pilots are touching down;
And maybe my parents will bring me dinner, but for right now
I am thinking about her- Kind of how I always thought of Her while better men slew her dragons and cut her hair;
And maybe she is blond,
And turning towards him in the epiphany of her blue night:
Maybe she is blond-
Maybe tomorrow I will be alright.

Robert Rorabeck

Maybe Whatever

I cannot sing at funerals, even when its you
I'm looking for, even when it is down hill,
And the cars are parked on ledges above us, facing us;
And there is sweet graffiti and talking brail by the Lip, the wrought iron teeth are bighting pensively,
The cats are walking like tight-rope acrobats,
Like French criminals, or whatever.

The dog is stuck.

I don't know why I continue with it, my performances
For all the deaf: The schoolyard is empty, the sky is closed;
And I lay down the empty book beside this tombstone;
Soon to be my grandmother, or whoever;
They say the same thing, and the children are strung out like Stolen jewelry lined out through a worn pocket,
Like flowers thrown after her tresses, but not really any of That at all;
They have gotten away.

I say this because I am scarred, and want to be beautiful,
Anonymously kicking all the waves;
And I want to remember that I have been to Spain,
But have not done anything for absolute years:
I do this so I can occupy her bed on another airplane, though
She doesn't say to me at all, now you can swim like a sturgeon,
Now you are quite immaculate and in time for Christmas;
And I am your river
Or whatever,
Next year, maybe, next year....

Robert Rorabeck

Maybe You Drink Alone On Sundays

Lonesomeness is like another dimension,
Like a carnival forgotten in the woods, while not Far off all the fairytales are smoking on their break:
And you are there,
And you are goldilocks or red riding hood, or some Other, but you have your skirts pulled up,
And some wolf is lightning your cigarette:
I have to be going soon- the lawnmower is already in
The woods, mowing paths for you,
The Mexicans come singing cantos and staring at you
Illegally out of the dimmed corner of either eye;
And you let them, though they are not your favorite
Minstrels; and I think that if I could write better,
You would think of me. You would even think of driving
Up long crowded avenues to see the places where I used
To live, but I wouldn't respect you then: That would Be the expected tourism of a plague, and you would Have to bake pies, and wash the dishes, and your little Children behind their ears, but some people still live in Africa, unprotected, far apart still believing a lost cause,
And saluting the flags of that heron-like confederacy:
Now I have no plausible excuse for this,
Better men are running wild in the city, shirtless beside
All the pools, tops down in all the traffic, having their Way with this. Maybe you follow them for a little ways
Curious of such harems, and maybe you drift off. Maybe you Drink alone on Sundays. Maybe you have pets I don't Know about, but it doesn't matter- This is concluding;
As it should have concluded long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Meaningless Fairytales

Cadavers on the boisterous road
Hurrying to grandmother's house, writhing
Across the sound of roses,
And other forms that they are not allowed to have:
Souls stormed from their bodies
Like footless serpents staring up into plum
Trees,
As the heavens pull down waiting to fill some Mouths with hooks-
Across yards of chartreuse equanimity the Metamorphosis of the butterflies
Disappear into- the camouflage of the boulder Removed,
And her shoulders bared but having nowhere
To go-
Trumpets played by blisters, and the nimbus
Hanging down like cobwebs of torn flesh
Over the sea where there is no
Action-
And the cars carry the dead home and into
Meaningless fairytales.

Robert Rorabeck

Meaningless Radiance

The mother is sleeping in western California
Just inches from the sea,
Sleeping like a virginal epitaph to her
Adolescent roller rink,

And the stars are like a rock garden,
And the constellations a petrified zoo,
And the earth revolves like a tourist trying
To breastfeed a spiteful past,

The eons are laughing as they drive across Borders,
Evolving the brows of rubber tramps nodding
At intersections of busted Pharisees,

In the New Mexico desert the casinos sprawl
Like aboriginal shortcuts lit up for executions,
Looked upon by rough iron dinosaurs,
And neon petroglyphs,

A giant azure steed raises like unearthed lightning,
Brushing the bellies of the commercial airlines,
The leapfrogging stewardesses with chardonnay eyelashes,
And eyes of vesper obedience,

Condescending the traffic of anthills,
The visiting feathers blown by a puckering Fury,
Out across the Grand Canyon's sun downing polygamies,
And the apoplectic rattle of the diamond tour buses,

Like a thought of a tongue yawning from
The window of a strange but vivid highway,
The canine foreknowledge of an arisen storm,
Through which the dust devils dance in meaningless radiance.

Robert Rorabeck

Meaninglessness

By the savage dreams,
Cannibalistic airplanes spread their
Over eager wings:
And sing to snakes and ants:
Red and blue fallen onto the white floor:
Off the tables with no more space
For elbows:
The heroes weeping in the soups of witches,
The masterless dog scratching at the door-
And the moon sick in the sky,
Like a lost child out of the doors of a
Supernatural school,
Ashamed of the glow of its own thievery,
It swims through the meaninglessness carrying
With it nothing of its own.

Robert Rorabeck

Meant For You

Something is truly being
Beautiful,
Seen from the cliffs with the Lights out,
All the virgins doused in
The tallow of whales or Song birds;
And I strike out like a
Leap of flint, Kelly;
I am creating the bonfire
From the trucks of your Boys' pirouette;
I am just the yellow magnesium
To fill your horn;
But whatever else I was meant to Say I have surely forgotten,
Even though I am sure it
Was beautiful, as it was Meant for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Measurelessly Deep

Flesh of sows spread over the transoms of Ghosts,
And the poor men cannot vacation, but look where I have been,
Up all the mountains and their skirts,
And atop of Alma's roof; and I've had that goddess in My bed,
While it is almost time to close- The men with great Big smiles laughing make-believe in the Exterior sun;
Why they don't know where it is they go when they Sleep,
But the places are yet here to remember, echoing,
Echoing and
Measurelessly deep.

Robert Rorabeck

Mediterranean Foreplay

Getting drunk—and maybe its not the weekend,
And maybe I am not Pablo Neruda,
Not having known the different faces of the moon:
Or hung the asexual clocks in the bosoms of naked trees,
And maybe today I deposited too much money
All at once,
And most likely I am in love with the wrong girl—
If I am in love,
And shouldn't I send her flowers, at least to her
Head stone all crowded and alone in the inner-city,
Burned out and made love to only by infrequent tourists
Walking their dogs for exercise instead of romance;
And I would like to lie her down between my lips,
And taste her like a cheap oyster at the buffet;
And call out the names of new colors spotted for
The first time in the sky,
And drink to her on her birthday, and live in the vicinity of Misspelled angels all spilled out in their bedrooms
Behind the red bricks and cornices;
But they already have made love, and it is some three Decades, and I can't write music,
And her parents wouldn't approve, and why should it
Continue like this when I've only been to Spain but once,
And there with my aunt I made love to no one,
And did not ride a stolen bicycle but once through the verdant
Orange groves to the Mediterranean foreplay—
Did not once allow her to touch the scars on my cheek,
Or remain long enough to say our apocryphal vows,
Did not howl her name through wind tunnels on Christian holidays, did not fight a hillside of windmills;
But did this, and ran away, slept through class
Or did not go to class at all, and thus was not able to fall
In love with Shakespeare's sonnets or the female athletes
Who knew them by heart,
And bit their inside cheek towards the better-situated contenders
Who knew all the answers and were not afraid to Look her in the eye,
And feel the budding soul never fearing that she should Turn away.

Robert Rorabeck

Melancholy Wind Chime

I climb the highest mountains
In Colorado
To get closer to her

But she is still
Too far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Melanie Laurent

Comparing scars with a French starlet is Fun but misleading;
But it helps to pass the time while the dogs
Are sleeping,
And there isn't much else going on in Northern Michigan:
Girls are playing pinball or curling their Hair,
Chimneys are smoking, the evergreens are Mostly naked and proselytizing like violin bows
In such wind-
And the sky is an aphrodisiac above a narcoleptic
Park; and if I had her now,
This is what we'd do; we'd play conquistadors,
And dress up and spread our religion.
Mostly it would be about her baring teeth;
It would be nice and unwholesomely empirical,
And the umpire would squat and squint his eye as We went slowly into the hotel room,
Not turning back as we closed the door;
And we'd play through the ninth inning and overtime,
And I'd imagine her lips in the darkness of her eyes.
We'd sit on each others' laps and watch home movies
Of mermaids and seashells
Until the dog came scratching at the door
And made me remove the covers and get out of Melanie's make-believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Men Men And Gods Gods

Chalices hid on Easter in my backyard:
Riding bareback and never found- and now firemen
Are climbing up mountains,
And turning around with matches- in each fist
A pinwheel, or a glass container of milk-
As I burn across the Navajo Reservations north of Gallup New Mexico,
As we all just try to figure out how to get on A little further home:
The windmills galloping- the pilots away in the Hayloft- the octogenarian knights eating honey bells
In the green fields who never have to offer up
Their echoes to anyone;
And yet here they come: both to churches and honeymoons-
Dripping from their bosoms, and drooling from their Chalices that very same nectar which keeps men men,
And gods gods.

Robert Rorabeck

Mentionless Sea

The deer make their own paths up their nipples—
And the elk over her spine,
Down her back nuzzling airplanes high above the pasture
Where my father has ploughed a racing track—
Here—angels mate with unicorns,
Casting their spore over the mentionless sea,
Where arrowheads lay across the beds of entire nations of Hibernating tribes who once made sun dials and worshipped
Things to the rattlesnakes that spoke to them:
Until there was the spokes of bicycles coming in some Siamese Wonder down the road—heading to the cerulean lights of Some baptizing church—pedaled by road scholars
And envied by hobos:
Scorpions living here and getting rides upon the backs of Green foxes—
If there ever was an octopus or a giant squid, the truth of
It lies in other estuaries so far away that they still believe
In things like swordfish and mermaids.

Robert Rorabeck

Mermaid

Feral mermaids, you are real-
Because I saw you leaping and doing tricks
For dozens of tourists,
And your tail was teal,
And you know your ways through hollowed
Coquina,
And you know that ancient blood rood corridors
Of the silver encrusted
Spaniards-
Mermaids, you are migratory, are you
Gypsies,
And how does your roe taste, mermaids sleeping
In the alabaster sea,
Sleeping not so deep down under the whirring
Ceiling fans of helicopters,
With the element of light forever waving down
In cryptic tanning-
Areolas warped by the strumming currents,
Who know the soft meats of water terrapin,
Who breed alone and have never known the corruption
Of centaurs or the classroom-
Won't you inherit our species once the earth tears,
Once we go down being Indian given by rainbows
Past crepuscule, and feeding time,
Won't you come up and undo your gills and swim
In my moats with my plastic tugs and junks:
Mermaids, I have watercolors for you and names
I haven't yet come up with,
And meatball submarines outside your salty euphemisms:
Mermaids clap and squeak farts for me
And we will celebrate Christmas together while the Mexicans are sleeping in the back corner of the house
Coated in a sheath of pungently mowed grass:
Mermaids,
Who are you, and what do you think of that penumbra
Which seems forever set in the stone of perfect reflections,
And does not ripple in the bay of your unreal satellites.

Mermaids In The Pretty Sea

Lutes played by satyrs from a graveyard of Bonfires—
Across the streets, where all of the old pornographic
Magazines are stored:
Across the canal in a world my mother never Opened her eyes to see:
Words on the wings of chameleon insects
That sleep in the nuptials of the wild
Arboretums:
Beautiful girls who have metamorphosed
Beneath the sand boxes in the land of the gossiping
Cats:
Places I have gone to while sleeping alone
Half of my life away,
Looking down from the second floor of a yellow
Studio apartment,
Watching the lesbians swim like fresh water otters
In a chlorinated exhibit—
The rest of the university spreading its patina
Behind them:
They row against one another as I am going with A girl I do not love—
They sing songs to one another that do not Exist anywhere else—
The diurnal dreams of their exhibits lasting
Half a lifetime between my ears—
As a succession of muses cross their airplanes before
My eyes:
Stewardesses who once molted fall to earth
And immediately join the marching band that is Taking all of the prettiest boys I do not wish to Remember to see their own reflections
Sleeping with the narcoleptic mermaids in the pretty sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Mermaid's Kiss

Unequipped for the night,
He rode upon the lightning horse,
But its breaks were worn,
And like I said,
He fell right off the Cliffs, of course,
All the way into the Mermaid's kiss
And his steed earned
The prefixed sea.
They had their honeymoon
In the caesuras
Where her areolas bloom
Like cherry Sundays from The foam.

Robert Rorabeck

Mermaids Who Don'T Belong

A poem is in the river- going downstream
To kiss some girls runaway from school. Looking up,
You can almost see the sky-
Epilepsy of shadows and foxes in the foliage-
New make-believe mulberry tongued-
Your mother in the sleeves of a house preparing lettuce:
Diamond sized dreams in her eyes-
She watches the goldfish- the cat watches the television;
And in all of them, cells divide:
A red apple- a wheelbarrow in a weather of make-believe:
Metamorphosis in the afternoon taking off her clothes:
My muse closes her eyes and goes to sleep across the street,
And who knows where she will land when she Dreams- Across the forests and the borders, into her old
Mexico, free of white devils and all of these sad lines
Which melt like sweet ice-cream and salty tears-
A poem a river of liquor in my blood carrying away my pains
Over her into a delta to fondle and sexually harass
Mermaids who don't even belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Metamorphosing Birthday Cake

And we sell ribbons
And we sell heather,
And you look so beautiful that
I just want to look at you again
And I want to finish myself off the way
I just finished this bottle
Into a housewife, into her venal sister:
And what I really mean to say is that
I really love you;
I really love you- -, housewife,
Mother:
I want you to become my landlord,
And I want to sleep like a ba$tard Mexican Drunken into your shadow,
Tired of the razor blade
Just like the shadow;
And that I really love you and want to paint
My epitaph
Just like your wino fingernails,
While you go crimping your orchards
All day, dusting for apple snails,
And I really love you;
And if I don't, why f%ck airplanes,
Because I love no other,
As the traffic quiets into the unreal batter
Of a beautiful, and the finishing destination of an otherwise
Metamorphosing birthday cake....

Robert Rorabeck

Metamorphosing For Her Soda Jerk

I dream about toy boats:

Oh yes, I dream,

And comely lions open mouthed, letting

Their claret gullets team in the sun:

And caravans of tourists

(They ain't so bad) Dysfunctional

Mother and fathers and three sibling in

Plaid:

I love the smooth borders there near the petting

Zoo, where the lake peals like the open

Eyes of a goddess,

And I have done nothing so good

As when I raided the refrigerator for- Well,

It goes along like coming of age shoots off like

Peppermint rockets up to state college,

And I am left sweltering alone with my colloquial

Knowledge,

With nothing but a harp and some expensive jam-

All night jaunts from the swings to the pram:

I watched this other girl once singing in Catholic

Chorus,

And I thought of this other girl once whose sweet soul

Was so porous that old men in the cataracts of Colorado

Used her to pan for turquoise which they smoothed

By rolling her back and forth in the palms of her hand;

And it's about time that I set off and rubber-tramped,

And stopped collecting these butterflies and silly-stamps:

I figured it should be what I was always meant to do,

To skip along up the continental divine,

To get frost bite hickeys on my ankles: To let my unrequited

Time divide the franchises of my soul,

For Death who comes full suited carrying the horrendous

Bouquets I so wished not to smell;

But let him follow me up to her, and at least make him do

Some work,

And I will happily die beneath her, while she foams

Triumphantly something classical- even though sadly,

yes, metamorphosing for

Her soda jerk....

Robert Rorabeck

Metamorphosis's Rodeo

A skeleton gets Nervous
Reading pamphlets in
Disney World-
A make believe
Made of chicken wire
In hoops
Of the day-
Tourists drive down the road-
The most beautiful
Housewives
Who don't need any Minds;
They enjoy the backyards
Where
Dolphins swim in the canals-
Obsessed with their swimming Pools
Like diamonds drowning in cognac
And pilots who dance
Above their shoulders
In jubilees of
A metamorphosis's Rodeo

Robert Rorabeck

Metropolis Of Henchmen

Envious news marches green
Down the western cliffs:
This is where the prince was blown
When the wizard found him
Up in the attic
Molesting his abducted mistress:
And the sky goes ever up,
The floating chalice of Thirsty brides,
If the young boy falls
He cannot die:
For here there are eagles who
Can speak,
And bright faeries who clean
Bedrooms for a living:
Marvelous third world countries
Buried in Jungles,
Just her alabaster hip exposed,
And butter flying-lips
Who need French kisses to survive:
You can break them open
With your tongue
And eat them,
They might cry your name
As the cars drive by:
The spindling herds of snuffing beasts
In evangelically straight rivers
Of white and red, the shifting
Suburbs of Midwestern towns,
The skyscrapers of missing brides:
Lilting his voice
To accommodate the sunny weather,
The prince starts down
Towards a metropolis of henchmen,
The buffalos kitty-cornered next
To the forgotten riverbed,
Where her alabaster hip lies exposed
In the fretful wind.

Mexican Field-Trip

In this Mexican field trip of my beating heart:
Words and feelings recycled
Like an infant abandoned into the dusky aphorisms of His shrinking front yard:
His parents sure to be bringing home
Fried chicken, calling the cats from the barnyard and
From the moonlight,
Leaving little sign of witches—but the Narcolepsy around them immense and getting busier
At its job:
A new year filled with pets and Christmas trees,
The still wet hearts of valentines,
And the lonely paths home through the vineyards where
The foxes sleep amidst the hibernating apiaries:
Because, here, the incentives grow
All over the place, and especially low enough to reach.

Robert Rorabeck

Mexican Paint Job

Falling from Ganymede you are forever
Laughing,
You are passing the bus and you are not my friend—
Shadow on the wall,
Friend to a tear—
And I am looking up, suddenly awakened
Beneath the Christmas tree—
Are you still with him,
I wonder in monuments,
As the daylight sheds its own curses,
The molting of rattlesnakes and watermoccassins:
My father in law cooks dinner and Speaks in mandarin:
My wife from Shanghai holds the baby,
And I am not thinking of Anyone—
I am not thinking of you—
I lost my job as a public school teacher—
Tomorrow I will sell rip off Mikey Mouse watches
At the flea market,
But it will be raining: I will not sell a thing.
I will have to move back to China—
My wife will get a job; it will be as if I am on the Other side of the moon:
I will never have to think of the things I did with you
Again.

Robert Rorabeck

Mexican Umbrella

Mexican umbrella- few words keep out
Such as you:
Smugness at the edge of the canal the airplane's wing
Dips into-
And angels promise to make love to tadpoles
As soon as they change,
But change takes forever while we walked
Hand in hand-
And you said you could smell the night blooming
Jasmine,
And we walked my dog and I held you like
A Mexican umbrella, but there wasn't any rain,
So I didn't need you
Which wasn't so bad.

Robert Rorabeck

Mexico

Imperfect joy: by you I am wilting: the body of My phallus,
So sad after Christmas- all of my bicycles are stolen,
And by this sad measure I sing
As the sun goes down so thriftily: while I was walking
Throughout the concrete elbows of the day
The entire world a shanty town too glad to see its own
Four legged reflection in
The chrome of the wheels that someone bought for Himself instead of her;
And if it was a wish, it was never received, but sang in
The antechamber behind its vision,
As the patrols circulated in the heavens, until she finally Receded like a dying star back across the bosque,
Back across the frontera,
And again into Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

Mia Bienamada

Welcoming her brown skin into my room:
She lingers here even though she doesn't call all weekend:
Mia bienamada cannot see my scars,
And I remember how she almost slipped away after fireworks:
How I wept and grasped at straws in her car,
While the insouciant traffics flourished back and forth,
The sea sashaying without a care:
But to her, my comeliest muse, I have laid myself bare:
And she has come back to me, like a heartbeat finding a graveyard:
She has lit me up like an umbrella of a firework
In the emptiest part of New Mexico- and she has found the Coyotes in my eyes- and she has shown me all of the hardest stones
Of her childhood that she could- and this is how she happens
To remember herself as she wakes up all alone on Monday,
Late for work- her body already fibrillose as a bee in its last season,
The honey drowned into a pool or spent at the flea market
Underneath the overpasses that leave when the better parts of her Family leave or are all donated- until she finally has to alight awake-
And see me preposterous, and beyond dreams:
A conquistador for her new children, a storybook awaiting the nudity of Her fingertips and open eyes:
As I lay for her there in a coliseum of my drunken loneliness,
A catastrophic illusion who refuses to leave the paint of her senses;
Until she recognizes it and smothers it with the breasts of her
Acceptance as something else more deserving the deepest auburns
And most feral séances of her love.

Robert Rorabeck

Michael And Heidi

At the warmed center of my being, I have a luscious pit
And it is singing through the dark and storminess; and it feels as if I were not alone:
The words rejoin and they make eyes at one another just like blond-haired
And blue eyed toddlers in kindergarten;
And I can strut out very fine on Easter and look at the weather accumulating
Over the library or the post office,
And there can be things said to me if they get to me on time,
While the grownups sequester me and make me hear them out until it
Is dinner time;
And clothes pins can be used as pop guns in games of make-believe,
All beneath the Australian pines; and if I had better words, I wouldn't Have to use pornography: I could make you mine;
And the cars pile up and they bundle together and talk make-believe,
Far after everyone of the conquistadors has eaten themselves,
And yet the city survives; and the city has Erin's eyes,
While I think of Alma for the first time, but for a very long time;
And her two children go out to sea, and never once do they Have to think of me;
And I wonder what they will have to think about today or tomorrow
Through the choirs of their school yards and their churchyards
And under the protection of the Virgin of Guadalupe
In their forts of make-believe
Since they are both very beautiful: Michael and Heidi,
And they both don't have to think of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Mickey Mouse

I do not read for you my alphabet of tigers:
It is not publishable,
As the teacher lays sweating outside with his students,
Thinking that some of them are terribly beautiful,
But terribly frightened to admit it:
And there are so many levels to explore beneath him:
Of trapped dwarves,
And hoarding dragons and armies of animated
Skeleton
To finally get out of the trap door and into the other Side of illusion:
But for now there are only these things in the twilight
Before Christmas as the lions sleep and
The alligators sleep
Like the football teams in their anthills of bedrooms-
And you lay pushed to him,
Opened mouthed in one deep part of the river,
But staying with him you will never have to see Mickey Mouse-
And your world remains different and far away,
Filled with the stain glass of churches switching places
With a vermilion and ever-changing sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Middle Of The Day Boyfriends

Warm is the merry-go-round in
The yoke of daylight, cheering itself,
An omelet of the midway
Where Spanish girls who are so fare
Have new boyfriends but
Just for the day—When it cools,
And their hearts freeze, they won't
Be asking us to spend any more money
On any more games—
Their traps will close—
And their love will metamorphosis
Again to the faithfulness at mass underneath
The Virgin of Guadalupe—
So when the werewolves bathe in the moonlight
Atop of their house,
They will bend their stems, and kiss their Husbands, to whom they swear they don't Know whom it is that makes such terrible howls—
But we know who it really is—
The lycanthropic howls of their middle of the day
Boyfriends.

Robert Rorabeck

Middle Town

Distant relationships keep ringing
From the coffin's phone booth,
In the backyard the wolves are howling
To attract the moon closer,
To eat her when her penumbra smiles:
This is the way the world is moving,
Like a ride at the fair you pay to get on:
Now you are about to throw up
All your loose thoughts onto her sodden lips:
Looking down, she smiles up
Somewhere between Hildebrand
And East Bumblef*ck, the people
In their cars driving around the blue suburbs:
The tract housing, the quiet way the Middle of America feels when it
Goes sleeping through the long sashaying prairies:
The ins and outs between the gilded city
And the wounded wilderness:
In the blink of her eye: cargo trains,
Native American Museums,
Ice-cream parlors, abandoned warehouses,
Homes of the criminally insane:
All the materials laid in the warrens
For the bodies to move amidst life's shadows.
Seeming to be friends, they step on this,
The broken glass cracks a little more
And changes the appeal of its light:
From the saloon, I can see you crying
In the window:
They are playing our song.

Robert Rorabeck

Midnight Day

Are you the one with the blank eyes in the dark?
I saw you when I was very young,
And you used to call to me from the black corner
Of the living room when I tried to sleep....
Then, I could not close my eyes as your despair
Occupied the entire house, crawling predatorily
Over me, a victim caught in your sightless stare—
Claws dancing pinpricks on my tiny spine,
You breathed inside my mind the foul poison
Of fear, and paralyzed me like a thought
Trapped in stone— Like a mollusk searching
For a way back to his shell,
You entered me some midnight day when I
Was too young to fight back. After I had burned
My sister's legs with a curling iron, and my father
Whipped me with his leather belt, you said,
Let me in, my little sinner, Let me in....
You came in through the eyes, the vulnerable windows—
And you curled around inside, a long slimy tail,
And eyes that blanked the day like a butcher of light,
Wringing deep inside my dearest thoughts
And you settled there, like a parasitical emperor,
Your soot and slime smearing like adulterous fingerprints
On adulterous flesh,
Serving a fetid meal from my skull,
You taught me how to live without the hordes of love.
Inside me still, you find a way to whisper your craven
Words upon this midnight day....

Robert Rorabeck

Mile To Mile

Ladders that defeat their roofs
Raise up splendidly to Cut their throats for
So many unrequited promises
Of promissory notes;
While jets fly off over the sea,
Or to Mexico;
While the juvenile hurricanes
Hypnotize and then flit
Away without doing
A great amount of Damage;
It is why you are flirting
With him, Alma;
Because you like to smile,
While the lions
Are baptized;
And then they lick the Hummingbirds from your Hollow wrists,
Never losing eye contact,
While the truants
Sneak away from
Their buses of midgets,
And the circus packs up to travel
From mile to mile.

Robert Rorabeck

Million Miles

The airplanes are as ungrateful as the muses I
Line-up my prisoners for,
And fire like letting go the vermilion swans of roman
Candles,
Like touching myself in the carport of exegesis,
The lightning fountains of DH Lawrence, happening outside
Of these venal professions.
Aren't all the planets going away then, turning on themselves,
But divorcing from their sororities,
Like moving into empty houses down streets of verdant rivers;
And all of this I am saying is just a plague of alcohol,
The piss stains tremulous like ripe plums before
The coming weathers;
And Sharon has a child and lives in the early speed of the Racetracks of those mountains.
They rise up and collect the weathers around her, and all that she Has been doing, the tourists pressing up and queuing like
Green flames around windmills,
And soon nothing will be able to stop her, and all I have been saying
Will be but the remnants of a sound that never heard an answer,
The last of my gray hairs carried up the chimney and into the Night so blinded by the senses and the thunders of the more
Genius instruments, touching her all over like tight jockeys cropping
Their sure-fire racehorses,
That I will have lost the last of my voice, making impotent
My once virile magic tricks, turning the school buses into the illusions
Of a comely desert, turning around and around before themselves
Even though their children are sleeping a million miles away.

Robert Rorabeck

Misplaced In My Heart

She lives here:
Growing in the orchard of all of the world-
A prison,
Like the words on the lips for her
Left to dry and Evaporate- her brown skin ripples
Like the blue gills:
She thinks nothing of it- and the dirt
Roads corrugate:
She thinks nothing of the remaining shells,
Or her beauty in the motifs
OF clouds:
Soon her father will be home into
The subconscious of her Mexico
Putting a gun to her MOTHER'S head:
But she will not Thinking of, nor the ferris wheel she
Misplaced in my heart.

Robert Rorabeck

Miss Chinese Water Torture

What can I do for you,
Miss Chinese Water Torture?
You say it's your birthday, well
It's my birthday to, yeah, but
The last time I saw you, you
Were packed into a 10 second dream,
Before my return to consciousness at 8 am
April 23rd, 2007; T minus 13 days.
I dreamed we were sitting close in My family's church, which is something
You'd never do, because Judaism always Trumps the protestant splinter cells,
Those who grew up barefoot in the weeds
Of America's last century, versus
Those armored in Tefillin who continue
Defying God, sheckling in their Babylonian
Temples, crying for another paternity test;
But, somehow, you didn't seem to mind,
And they had set up carnival rides in the aisle
Between the pews. Me and 3 young, but not Very nice kids, got on the Zipper and waited for The lady on the organs to start us up
While I tried to make eyes
With the farmer's daughter, and after that ride
Was done I played my Sega Dreamcast while
The old bald preacher did his job—Near the end we All went out, but you weren't there at my side,
The uncertain short thing that used to anchor
Against me, you who gave me balanced purpose.
They said there was a gas leak in the church
And reporters came—One wanted to interview me Because I look good from a certain distance, but
As he got closer he kind of just gave up and walked away—
I went back into the church to find you,
Miss Chinese Water Torture
But the important religious people, well dressed but not Altogether bright, pushed me out, saying it was Going to blow, but then I saw you coming
Toward me in the darkness of the walk— I asked you

Where you'd been and, breathlessly,
You said it'd been great—
You'd just traveled 5 states in Twenty minutes to inform the authorities,
And look, for just then did not the firemen arrive
In great red screaming trucks, leaping forth with much pomp
And impressive hoses, their heroic instruments—
You saved our church, Miss Chinese Water Torture,
With Justin who drove you; you said
He was a nice guy and asked me what I Wanted to do now as we began to walk under
The soft streetlights down the sidewalk towards my old truck.
I wanted to go home and sleep a little
With you before I woke up, but there on A gentle hill covered by grass, part of the church's landscaping, you'd stooped to smile and talk with a pale faced kid with long dark hair and thick glasses—
And you staid with him there, Miss Chinese
Water Torture— You didn't come with me
As I awoke to work, but your ghost rides near Me still, leaving me thinking I must Have done to you something awful.

Robert Rorabeck

Miss Meadows

If I can knock the dust of that flint rock,
I'll be the man who gets the pick of The girls:
Hey-ho surely, surely now,
So says Miss Meadows;
And if I can kick my legs up behind my ears;
And lick the same spot,
While I'll be the man who gets his Flirtation's will, surely Down at Miss Meadow's:
Hey-ho surely, surely now,
So says Miss Meadows:
And If I can carry my house atop my back
In and out of the cerulean pools; and it ain't
No shack, nor no simple rickshaw,
While I'll be the man who dandles in her
Auburn curls:
Hey-ho surely, surely now,
So says Miss Meadows;
And speaking of cars, why if mine's a real beauty
So red and so sleek to steal the eyes of
Some beauty,
While I'll be the man, won't I, surely
So says Miss Meadows:
Hey-ho surely, sure now: who steals what he Feels and houses with pearls,
Or at least with a girl whose beauty he desires,
And so hangs her with the stars in the sky
With fine chicken-wire:
Hey-ho surely, surely now,
So sings Miss Meadows

Robert Rorabeck

Missed The Matinee

The satellites are not out yet,
And I can't hardly spell: My mothers
In phoenix,
And she is in another world-
If I photographed her, you might be Surprised, but it would just be another
Tourism- It would hardly do- The Letters in stone,
The stones on the grass, the grass is Mowed; the wind shifts lightly through
The cut blue grass, the ants kneel
And pray in extended expedition, and through the upraised boughs
An airplane leaps yet through the failing sky:
So many legs and hearts on that trip,
Two for each,
Some touching,
Some sharpening one another;
the sky is a newly eaten shell,
Like the world converted on the other side
Of the canal,
Cultivated and fertilized and romanced:
Still frighteningly beautiful when it is emptied:
As if I were yet a boy folding airplanes,
The ceiling fans chained in operatics,
Speaking domesticated Latin and the Stray car driving every so often through the well choreographed
Ululations of that nostalgic suburbia,
Not knowing that every other thing out there was Tipped in poison;
And that is why the chameleons steadily change,
The girl kisses the boy in matching uniform,
The toys rest with fleas;
They close their chapter books and handily walk
In doors: My sisters fight on the green rug
In front of the filibustering television. Mom and dad arrive
Home with a bucket of fried chicken,
Exhausted and apologizing that they should

Have missed the matinee.

Robert Rorabeck

Missinformed Waterfalls

Luminescent moons braid
The slope of her neck
Where deer lay trapped in man-eating
Thickets
Where she keeps the slaves of her love
As the day awakens upon her
Glory
And new pilots fly toward the Missinformed waterfalls of her insincere
Felicitations.

Robert Rorabeck

Missouri

Encourage me again to keep drinking,
To take the interstating highway up past cloud
Cover,
Where the wind is cutting pure dreams,
And all of this unhealthy resin I'm still squeezing
Out of high school:
Now, without having to say anything, my lips are Exhausted, and cars are learning how to fly into Other states,
And nobody understands me but the sad flowers
Bundled together like tinselled f%gs
So high up even the skyscrapers feel like children:
And where is Diana now,
Keeping what harem in this kind of night:
Can she feel me bedecking her, the first great poet of This next depression:
Can she feel me doing my thing in bed next door
To my parents, carrying her flag of obnoxious colors:
Imaging her perfumes matriculating out of that Lunch wagon, that she had been married once
In Columbia,
That she has a young daughter with the same Cherokee
Hair
Who knows nothing but the leaking faucets of laughter
In a world cartoons;
And I want to give the little darling a rose to give to Her mother, while the wind blows the sky blue,
And I am so glad I didn't have to stay in Missouri.

Robert Rorabeck

Misspelled Quinceanera

I polished my floors while I thought of you
Tonight,
Alma:
And I did my very best: I drove by your house, but your Car was gone:
Maybe you went like the tail end of a rainbow back to Mexico,
But I have no fear that I cannot save you,
Alma: you are all of my art now, darling butterfly, mariposa;
And I only know so many Spanish words for Savior,
But you can save me, and we can both fish on the night warden's
Boat together,
We can laugh with fat Anibal: I can brush your hair and Ask your to trust me while your sister has her
Quinceanera that I can't even spell;
And then the night floods and I have a hard time remembering
The meaning of my pledges to you,
While I wonder if you smell the same for him as you do to Me,
But I will never accuse you of being a witch:
I will always mistake you as being a flower, and I can save
You and your children and I can take you away:
Far, far away- the very same as the airplanes who are always leaping
So far above and away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

Misspelling Vacuum, Hypnotising Chickens

Marshaled into a resemblance of a plan,
Writing novels too thick and bulbous to understand-
Help me do twelve hours of manual labor;
Help me break my lease and misspell vacuum.
Stare at me across the spitfire ballroom,
Ignoring my flaws, casting them into the dust with Rattlesnakes and empty hotdog rappers in the Baseball bleachers- drink slow gin fizz with me
In Oregon, let me feed and hold and hypnotize
Your favorite chicken,
Or leave me now cavalier and roller-skate to your Dinner dates with better friends, tip glasses in the Bright, flower bound garden where nothing is evil,
And there is no enmity or even garden snakes-
Go off to your careers and get rich,
And I will linger in the place where you've forgotten
Smelling your perfumes, committing them to memory
So that I could follow you anywhere I so wished,
But you shall never see me again.

Robert Rorabeck

Mistaken

Oh, this liquor dies until the horses are only
Skeletons
In the desert; and you know they are; and they are no
More heroes than Cowboys,
The rest stops are haunted with all the old loves
Who are bearing their children
Up to the porcelain wash basins before
The mirrors,
The mirrors; and I get erections in the mowed grass
Green on holidays of Truancy,
Combed back to the ruby birthstones of the open
Throats of lions;
And nothing about this home owner's association is Very fair;
And even going to the hospital, I have very little time
To perceive that I cannot live forever,
And so I would like to enter her unprotected and make Love to her just like
My grandfather delivering love letters
While the clouds could be anyone, and that is their special Agreement;
And maybe that is how the house found her laying out or Even fawning in the day gone hours,
Candles dripping tallow perpetually on her aching breasts,
On her aching breasts who rose a slight way under
The shadows of the settling sun,
But if I ever thought that was for me, then I must have been Mistaken.

Robert Rorabeck

Mistaken For Beautiful Children

Marionettes mistaken for beautiful children—
Or vice versa—you know what I mean—
I am getting drunk as my mother is coming home:
I cannot remember when she first took Me to the library
But no one else cares, so it is okay—
My father's horses do not care,
And my last and best muse does not read my poems,
So she will never find out,
How the airplanes came down and fought over
Brushing her hair—
But I continuing buying books she refuses to read—
And her children keep on getting taller and less Educated—
And the moon is so far away it seems to have Vanished—
Like the plans of the peeping tom in the bushes—
And yet the busses still do turn around,
Yellow and subtle and made to Dance repeatedly—
The yellow, slender bodies of each cadaverous
Butterfly breathing and breathing,
As they hijack
And masturbate all of the flowers,
As I wonder if the store is still open,
And if my wife will ever go to sleep:
Will she ever go to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Mistaken For Her

What you can't understand of this they will Teach you in the science fair;
And there is a Nubian whose I am particularly interested in Named Melody with a star on her hip the Same color as Alma's hair;
And I go to sleep in those dreams where I don't care,
Cradled by an octopus, all I've ever worshipped is Your legs pressed like a mariposa between the pages
Of my book,
Captured and dried on a fire that drinks the pores of coral:
And now I can almost taste her, as she is coming back into the Neighborhood; and she has everything glossed
From a long day at school; and now all she wants is to bath
Naked in the opulence of my grotto,
The eclipses of my eyes engorging, as she drifts away beneath all
Of those airplanes served by leggy stewardesses who I am Sure could easily be mistaken for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Mistakes

In the morning I make mistakes,
As the liquor rums off, forget to deliver for her,
Whoever she is: Safa tells me his dreams,
And I start fantasizing about tomboy scientists.
I pay Nancy and drink her coffee,
And the light, as it always does, is in a mote pooling
On Pedro. He's sleeping in later, afraid to speak the Tongue of the country which employs him, his little Macho hands, the beating heart which has traveled so Far it seems to have gone into another world entirely:
His mother cancerous and distant, his father scarred
On cheek and chin, like my own father, can no longer
Speak to, like his own father, but love indefinitely,
As I wait, asking for forgiveness, and the ululations
Of a sycophantic phone call, which must tell me what
To do.

Robert Rorabeck

Misty Fingerprints

So, you said, everyday goes around like this,
Like a rink of rented skates and cusped hands
And floating lights,
Heaven on Earth, and keys and rock candy,
And across congress airplanes where my mother is Taking lessons,
Turning around in figures of infinity, going on by herself:
Just a tiny picture in an infinite mirror
Where all the animals see themselves;
And palmettos spray- and sweat inching like apple-snails
Down the coppery calves of working girls,
And overpasses where their kind of rich belong,
Shading flea-markets irritating the dilapidated earth;
And you can go north or south from here,
But there will forever be so many cars telling this way
Or that, and the distant sounds of frightened horses
Confusing seismologists with their soft manes and love-
Letters, a lullaby for the earth and all of its fossils,
The gray meats which sometimes contain the silhouettes
Of hummingbirds,
Just a blur in the rocky strata, the absence of polished
Birthstones, un-mined by shoppers on blissful holidays,
Paintings on a cave,
Misty fingerprints on a phone that never stops ringing.

Robert Rorabeck

Mobile Of Rum

Mobile of rum—this is how sleep comes on A Monday night
Listening to the trucks and the disappearing shadows:
The children will get up from Their beds in Mexico and dream of marionettes and Ride the trains to find her—
Her parents who have fled to pick from the orchards
Of America—
And they following them like the wet afterbirth,
And the ashes of fireworks
Leading up the hills where the foxes sleep in either
The sunlight or the snowdrifts—
Into the churches where there are wounds in the blue windows Looking out onto the campus I disappeared from Fifteen years ago
As my father enjoys riding bicycles in Michigan—and my Mother follows him:
And my mother follows him.

Robert Rorabeck

Mobiles Of Legs And Breasts

Even the rain clouds have shoulder blades.
They flex and sweat over the city of simulacrum
Who draw the pictures on the streets of
The latchkey children who also live there
Who smoke cigarettes at communal pools hunted
By the ghosts of housewives and electronic Reindeer that only know one of two dances,
Like the haunted echoes of the creators hand
And mobiles of legs and breasts
That dance and fawn across the avenue, and like venison
Cast their shadows in the water without return.

Robert Rorabeck

Mockery Of Kissing Salt

So much poetry in the battalion
Until we had to go inside
And play cards,
And make a mockery of kissing salt
While it rained
And the beanstalks grew: and I closed
My eyes and imagined
The prettier girls in my classroom,
Like caged birds singing to
The hooded cobras, singing at the lips
Of the mine that would eventually birth
Their wedding rings-
As I slumbered outside for many of the morning
Hours,
But eventually collected myself of this
And went, again, indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

Mom, I Am A Good Guy

Mom,
I'm a little bit tipsy,
But I'm a good guy,
Mom.

I'm a good guy, mother.

Do you finally understand what I am telling you
Or do you still not understand?

Robert Rorabeck

Moment Of Daylight

With dragons almost the same color as
Your eyes—I cannot languish here:
Those suckers want war and death,
They come from bright houses
But without any chimneys—
Getting up, the sun reminds them of Their gold that was stolen
Almost seemingly from the sky—
This is why they are done laughing, smoking
From their nostrils—with eyes the Nuptial coals the same property as Alligators—
I think they will team up to the stars—
Evaporations of great rivers -
Evolving, they will come to think the heavens
Made of thieves—every moment of daylight
A golden baton passed across the world
Through the breath that must belong to them.

Robert Rorabeck

Moment's Breath

My wife doesn't Know how to Write a poem-
But we lie together
On the beach-
the sky like the Womb of An angel-
The favorite color of A stewardessand our child-
somewhere in the Grotto
Like a dolphine sleeping beneath
Her ribs-
metamorphosis underneath her heart-airplanes sleepwalkers
in the sky
each wave a moment's breath.

Robert Rorabeck

Momma

I couldn't give another thing to this or you,
Without rum, I wouldn't read poems out loud, or Drive skipping into the poesies of the just:
I might just sit and drool in the chintzy corrugations
Of some trailer park: In two weeks, I've made
$100,000 off these fools, and admired the tawny
Busts of mothers and daughters in matching sets,
High-heeled China dolls newly made and getting paid for;
Such is the thing, the swing they give; they don't Even know how they sing, or what they give to me, in little Ways, farting so tightly like the highest notes from the chin of
A piccolo, walking to and from the whitish tent of the Christmas tree salesman: they are here, and so am I,
Because they made it after school, and I am my father's son:
I get the good spot under the sun, spinning pinwheels off my blistered
Lips until my time is through: I can hardly look them in the eye;
I don't tell them how big I am, or how many mountains I
Have climbed: I either look good or like a fool, but everything
Else is leaping away, and all of it is escaping. Once there was Only high school, as white as porcelain or an unhatched egg;
I talked to her in the echoes heated from the courtyard, until
It was time for class, and the far-away sway of mind into more
Hypnotic gardens- Afterward, the yards were green and well-mowed
Like constabed boards of absent professionals, and I took their Daughters by the neck and said into them like empty vases, until
They were filled up and valuable and soon well placed. Then
I laid across them, sprawling with my checkered knapsack and
Pinafores, and pretended to know about sports, and the manipulations
Of weather; and it was so humid, it was like French-kissing her or Serving her the way they do it in places just underground, by those Ancient things just hidden by the sheerest fabric, easily unhooded and Set to rhyme schemes by rhythmic tongues, or so the rum had told Me, making me speak thus, momma.

Robert Rorabeck

Monarch

I am a Monarch.
Try to eat me and I will poison you.
You see, my love, I was once without
Wings,
And I crawled on your shoulder
As you tanned and kissed his mouth,
Good boy- When at home,
In between the cypress and the jars
Of marmalade you made out of Your tears and spit, didn't you
Lift me past the tiles of the shower,
And in the mothy corner I cocooned,
And you sang to me in perfect acoustics,
Lathered and stretched,
And your flowers oh so budded.
Foul mouthed, you used a dictionary
To describe the things you wanted done
To you, and I waited, and you waited.
When I came out, your were dating,
And I flew over your books and hydrangeas,
And wept insouciant vapors, and made
Spontaneous love to a wind-chime.
You saw me there relaxing, but I fluttered
Out of reach as you opened your blouse
And showed me where to place myself,
But I could not, for I was yellow, and Made like my sisters and brothers into October, leaving for Mexico and the orgy
Of the forests and cacti; When I come back to You, I will slip into your mouth and make
You moan my name,
And that will be the end of us,
Two souls buried in a beautiful grave,
And news of heirlooms metamorphosing underground,
The whispers of a promise I give to you,
My caustic anonymity folded in-between yours.

Robert Rorabeck

Monsoon's Blue Operators

Rain lays jubilation upon these hills,
Lays down like sated fauns in indescribable clefts,
And the bellies of Amazons who have sunken single breasted
Into the panting grottos;
In what ways they make pattering love, I cannot Describe, except for out my windows, and from my Doors, the rain is wetting the high-heeled pines as Women in open showers, great sororities dimly cleaned,
And each one immobile from their relationship with
The downpouring storm, raise their green arms upwards,
Hands in great palming display, as the fettered clouds
Blockade the last of a feverish light, and let the skies
Play down against their statuesque spines,
Say now that they shall not move from his slathering spits,
Say that they should live beyond this cloudy centennial,
Where the rumors of spiteful fire are shushed,
And even rattlesnakes are tapped into a kind of poisonous Slumber, as the rains gather and ruin the cheeks of the Swaybacked hills, the inky mascaras dying the micas
And the uncleaned jewels which hide in petrified clutches,
As the rains try furtively to hatch what doesn't call from The forest's webby and saturnine nest.

Robert Rorabeck

Monuments As The Overpasses

Or the day is gone for dreaming of its labyrinth
Again—spelled out in the recluses of its Fabled
Estuaries and drinking fountains—
And it looks so beautiful turning tail and Burning away:
Over the sandy monuments as over the overpasses—
Or don't you know—
That this is my song—open throated,
Giving fast balls over the trailer parks and the Swingsets—
Dirty things—believing that the world can believe
Without sound:
Echoes here,
Beside the tangling vines that never had to find Themselves anywhere else with child—
My cousin pregnant on an abandoned couch and
All of the heroes gone off to fight dragons that do not Exist—
She is lactating up in the rafters of spacecraft:
And this is supposed to be beautiful—beautiful- but how Will you ever know up inside a geode that Will never crack.....

Robert Rorabeck

Moonbeams Over Her Sleeping Children

There were moonbeams over her sleeping children
Yes it does,
While they slept and the less angelical angels
Played baseball,
And the other answers didn't move from Where they were sleeping—
These words that accord to their own
Negligents and the other answers of Their otherwise high schools—
While I then I saw you there—who you really were,
Marionette on the tight rope of a bildungsroman—
And other words that took off over the cypress
Swamps like bottle rockets—
And places where we touched ourselves and
Our faces—in the boudoir, in the white morning—
Angels and cheerleaders coming to town—
As white as satin and as unsullied—
If this place happened to exist, while you were Turned away, and too afraid to turn back to town.

Robert Rorabeck

Moondust

Tourists on the moon
Go to take pictures of a sky always cloudless—
They notice there are no houses on the moon
And no pools to swim in.
Rather, instead, everyone goes slowly on
The moon, like lazy Ferris wheels,
The earliest hopes that would easily die in thicker atmospheres;
Their hearts
Are so light for a little while,
But even stepping as they do, like butterflies
Try to learn to walk, they soon grow morose
Looking with powerful binoculars down to Their far away counterparts down
On the blue earth;
They feel like they have become ghosts—
And they are quickly bored,
Because there on the moon there is Nothing yet to do, but to stare into space
Which really is nothing, anyway—
The moon might be beautiful to look at,
They say, but like a wild horse, it is dangerous
And boring....
There are no shopping malls on the moon,
And there is always something to do
In shopping malls....
So they eagerly wait in fat queues for the shuttle
To come back over and return them to earth—
Already they are thinking about what's on TV,
And they are hungry for fast food drive-throughs
And pizza deliveries,
And they don't even mind so much that there
Are bills waiting for them, and taxes to be paid—
That's all part of life, they say, and wonder
Why they ever spent money to take this trip
In the first place—
There are always good things to do back on earth,
The tourist think: there are always
Horses to be bet on and ladies to get laid....
So they go away from the moon in one mighty

Burst of petrol, floating flames...
Leaving only the smell of their farts—

Then we come out, me and you and all
The phosphorescent things which only live here
And deep under the sea, the two places where They can be left alone, swimmingly—
We are so glad they left,
Me and you and our moon,
And we take long waltzes in low gravity
With the earth like a shimmering pearl
In shallow water, winking just Over our shoulder—Down there,
Where all the professionals busy about
And in their downtime they are called tourists,
But we will never be tourists,
So how can we ever be professions,
Being what we are being all the time....
We take long walks on our moon which is
A treeless park, and swim in the waterless pools,
With the airy fish only we can see,
And when we are finished we walk into a
Home made of wisp and hope, that you
Told me was there and I believed you,
So we walked in together and lived....
Living in this lonely space with the light
Of the stars, we kiss each other breathlessly
As we dance like ghosts in love
Through the bits of moon-dust
Shivering like torpid curtains that close
At the end of a tragic play
No one sticks around to see....

Robert Rorabeck

Moonglows The River King

moonglows the river king
Swathing the salamander's
Saturated ululating.

I have brought the copper ring
To hook for fishing;
The mermaid is such a pretty thing
Swimming with her ducky quislings.

Leaving autumn strands whisper,
To my heart that all has gone migrating,
While the bruised thistles crowd the Stalwart bridge,
Leaping like a horned kidd butting his sister;

So green exits, leaves jamb the starless surface,
And there isn't but a nibble,
For those women who sleep like trees,
Or nod like silken roots in the bathing tub
Have joined a pomaded caravan of troubadours
Now taking an exhausting route to the city,

Their tailpipes the careless smoke signals
Of their hurried exegesis across the dry and ruddy hills,
No longer to bring such whispers,
Or sing thus sweetly, quobblings from their pale-ish gills.

Robert Rorabeck

Moon's Shivers On Upset Water

The moon's shivers on upset
Water as boats speed by Remind me of you getting Out of the shower
In your aquarium
Of my zoo—

East on Summit Blvd.
Down past the public library
Under the interstate's
Dry and weedy overpass
Near my childhood
Is where I keep you—

I watch you through clear
Glass at water level,
As you layout like an Otter sunning on the concrete embankment
Your perfection the only Thing which hides you—

I transgress work whenever I
Can to swim with you,
Though you keep your Distance and hardly speak
With me except sometimes
You say hello, then quickly
Swim away—

I feed you chocolate
And chicken sandwiches
Three meals a day
With the little pickle
Slices you relish and eat
Out of my fingers, though
I still haven't tamed you—

When after the day's lights
Dim, I turn on the black lights

Lining your pool, and
We make love
When I can catch you—

The midnight's audience looks
Through the windows and Cries chemical tears on our Silhouettes,
Because I cannot let you go—

So our contained lovemaking continues
Though you would leave at anytime
If I would let you swim away
With the boats through the intercostals

You who remind of the moon's shivers
On upset water.

Robert Rorabeck

More And More

The cheek of each house side by side-
Alluding to grandeurs of my neighborhood that the Stewardesses are so keen to skip over-
Around the corners,
The busy cats making love, nesting their litters in the Carpets of leaves backed up to the same fences
They used to conceive;
As across the street, one of the very same stewardesses
Rests her golden head, as firemen and baseball players
Come in the lunchtimes of the day
For with her to bed: and I hear them over there,
Roaring like a creature of two or more headed fire-
Even once there was a fox, who turned his head against His paint brush tail,
And we listened to her making more- and the airplanes
Stopped, and more- and more.

Robert Rorabeck

More Infatuation Than A Prize

Midway after everything else has gone:
Taking you through an empty lot where enjeweled elephants
Once trumpeted up to the sky,
Foreboding of hurricanes—the Ferris Wheels turning,
Long necked, seeing the herons flying into
The long kneed nests of the everglades
And every sort of traffic passing both up and down of Here:
And your soft brown fingers and palms encrusted in my Ghostly wishes:
Your children soft asleep, and even airplanes asleep
In beds of tarmac—pilots and stewardesses asleep
Inside of them
Will metamorphose inside of morning into Things of business and of sex:
And you are gone—leisure that was almost reel—
Following your husband even though you do not love him,
Abandoning thoughts of my—and the flower
I have found—somehow still with roots—with more
Infatuation than a prize.

Robert Rorabeck

More Resplendent Than A Diamond Sky

Callisthenic monuments of another

Day's preening:

My mother comes home through fiberglass porticos

The way mermaids come home from

Finger painting:

The grottos of skyways the stewardesses ballrooms,

And I dream of her underneath the ceiling fan spinning in

My room;

And the cats sigh tirelessly, and the dogs curl up to

Their repossessed masters,

And the virgins are the size of ants on each blade of

Vermillion grass, as the hurricanes fill up their tankards:

Underneath where there are lords in the sky,

And even lordlier lords above them;

And I hang my head and sigh, as you go into your boarding

House with him,

And the apathetic-est of wind whispers its raucous lullaby,

And his fingers slide your loose skin off you

As you become even more resplendent than a diamond

Sky with your lordliest lord above you.

Robert Rorabeck

More Than A Little Jealous

Asleep in the crypts of amber trauancies- perhaps Slipping as far as to be across the blue gills in the canals,
And the uneven steps to so far away from her:
And even closer:
Eager limbering attempt a greater imperfection, unveiling
Itself
As a dependency of the state: Not even able to allude to Unicorns, while the airplanes are always right over their Pressing their Wings like amphibians on the job- the burning sugar cane
Raising up its skirts,
And saying something special and sincere into the cornfields
Lollygagging far enough away to make me more than a Little jealous.

Robert Rorabeck

More Than Enough

I now have so many pearls as to feel the rind of
The table,
And you know all about me: That I have a tattoo I got in Spain,
And the bed is sprung like a trap laid for better men;
But by April 29th I will have a house all paid. 2 miles from The lagoon I drenched in on Easter,
And then called her name like a drenched coyote all the way
Up to the hallucinatory heavens of airplanes
And helicopters;
And I have then jogged and been ridden back and forth again
To the store;
And I have howled out my pains like a fox in a story book,
Wanting its muzzle to suckle on the tits of those grapes,
As it were an ape and all of this was a cartoon;
But, really all it wanted was more liquor, and today or yesterday
Was Easter, or someday soon I will find the woman who loves
Me, and she will fit perfectly, or I will buy her and make her fit:
And this is just it,
And she is my muse, all bruised and pugilistic; and the night continued
On, airconditioned and twenty thousand feet across the sweltering lawn:
And the women in their high heels had nothing to prove,
Because they also had their captains who were fast and fleet,
And they continued on over the veneer of so many mountains,
Who sprung like the pointy tips of fountains,
Until we were all famished, like a box of pearlescent fables,
Waiting with our mouths hungry until she sure enough
Gave us more than enough of something to eat.

Robert Rorabeck

Mortal Lines

Filled up with longing but unprepared,
The preschooler weaves a scribbled web of Tongueless alphabet anew-
The day swims like a heady swan around
A lake of sherbet carpet,
And on fieldtrips to the swings there is A thermos of chick noodle soup which Makes him sick,
But at the art museum there are murals of Unfamiliar mothers with thrilling bosoms
Undressed for various courses,
And unexplainably he delays until scolded,
For one should not tarry too long especially
On lines which cannot be reasoned with,
Those shouted out to confront loneliness,
To remember the sea, and to call her to him.
Though she doesn't come,
And these few words are still young and unwounded,
And should be put to sleep or at least to bed,
Before they get too tiresome,
And ahead of themselves on a darkest freeway
Realizing at the second of impact they are not immortal.

Robert Rorabeck

Most Beautiful Of Things

Cracks in the unobserving face of a geode
Who knows what lies beneath:
The special indulgences of Christmas and on her
Birthdays,
With the satellites milking down, more or Less;
And then the pittance of age old relatives commuting
Across the highways and the lawns,
While my own body burns with yours,
While kittens get stuck with the insects high up in
The trees,
And there is no hope for them because all of the Firemen are all off;
And the forests sit forever, leafless, and still yet
Like bouquets of silver,
In the comely saddles of the mountains where Some politicians I don't know re-released the bobcats
And the wolves,
Or the mountains themselves just as you were Crossing over from Mexico yourself, Alma: an endangered Species yet spaciouly populous
Come to clean our houses and tidy our lawns,
While the meteorites made room for birthdays,
Sweeping clean a bedroom for a place to lie you beside my Soul that I now find was always waiting
For just this rightly illegal and most beautiful of things.

Robert Rorabeck

Most Sincere Coats Of Early Morning Graveyards

I still rise up from the wildflowers in their
Make believe graveyards, and I am still burning:
My legs may be still be warm on the trunks
Of the graveyard of your fairytales,
And the daylight looms like the bright trunks of Pixie tales,
And all of the bright fairies still come out of the eyes
Of jack o' lanterns which bloom in the
Crepuscule,
The crepuscule of junkyards and I want to touch myself
To the blooming Bellefontaine's of the Blackman's Junkyards-
And I am all stretched and young like the placebo of Indian corn,
And the police are circling themselves, circling themselves
In junkyards, And what is Kelly doing but Touching herself, touching herself to the yardarms of Mismanaged accoutrements;
And the day is still young and still special and I am yet
Done touching myself,
And my house still yet sit alone, and I imagine my dogs,
And I want to pet their coats again before they have to Go down again ventriling once more into their
Most sincere coats of early morning graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

Most Unnecessary Of Things

The mountains have no names that they have Given to themselves,
But at least I have never made love to any of my cousins;
And that is exactly what Alma told me the last time
We were in bed,
Last Friday morning, turning into me and moaning with Her brown summers,
While I was sure that somewhere above us some airplanes
We turning around, or at least
Advertising:
And there were windmills and cartoons,
But there she was, summering my bed with the warmth
That even the angels don't have;
And I am sorry that I haven't provided her with any individual
Stanzas,
But this again is for her, even after she has gone home,
And is sleeping with someone else, even if they aren't
Making love,
The horse is still cantering doggedly towards the summit,
Mad beyond words because some reintroduced wolves have Eaten her foals again without her consent;
And some man's hands turns up the volume again on the news,
As the hot air balloons are rising:
They are trying to stretch their luck to the moon,
Who is laughing gibbously at them, waiting for the world to turn Away again, to leave their dreams stranded somewhere mid summit
In the beautiful harems of aspens
Whose pale skin blushes at the reintroduction of all of these Otherwise most unnecessary of things.

Robert Rorabeck

Most Wonderfulness Of Because

And now it is at its summit,
And you are here; while I will finally be casting away,
And sleeping;
While my thoughts of you will become ribbons and they Will flow through your sisters' hair and maybe it will be
That maybe as of yet they will never make it
Home,
But given enough breath and wishes, they will always have pretty
Yards to come up to and be petted;
And their heads will bask in the unions of daylight while Their forefathers turn tricks in the lush amphitheatres
Of their fountains;
And thus, turning down like beds, they will become
The ripe old exegesis which I am sure that you always thought you Knew; and this is the way that it always happened in which You thought you was;
And so the long night yawned, cracked opened its geode,
And showed unto you especially the special ness of its Most wonderfulness of because.

Robert Rorabeck

Mostly Better Paradise

Girls come in and out of the world
And their cars. Rain is forecasted for this evening:
The tent breathes like an angelic lung spread across
This field of green the cops and robbers leap across.
I cannot escape from my scars, or the dreams I
Have of my dog far away: but I have no more cares,
And little hopes like a toy parade a little boy proceeds
With his fingers across the car port: some book is Open at his side, like a gun,
Or a tomahawk of an Indian war chief in brightly
Feathered dress; a water drum of pennies
Is overturned and Lincoln is busted and zink:
For Christmas three saints will count all their money and Their cures and then stand as still and still as plastic Yard ornaments while the sprinklers French kiss their Bodies in very clean mastication, the bucolic reservoirs
Which spread like the five and dime women once they Leave their places of rest, and fan out over this fair city,
Like a chain-smoking chorus line,
Led by their bee-stung busts and their puckered lips into a mostly better paradise.

Robert Rorabeck

Mother Of Bones

Even in February
Young things are dying
Alone, as the snow increases
And the pine trees snap
From her unforgiving kiss:
I am here
Though no longer I am:
This is the shadow which Swallowed the world,
Her dangerous dress
Inlaid with stars
And all the animals of the sea.
I am trapped in its movement,
Though there is not Enough time to escape,
A kind of dancing tomb
The impermanency of flowers
Beneath the increasing forest,
And not a soul around
To come to me,
And toss a tear for my extinction
Cradled in the lap of
The mother of bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Mother....

I am nothing, nothing,
And the bloom is broken.....
She has forgotten to check the locks,
And the monster is loose....

I am no more,
As he takes her with his will....
I am no more,
As my mother told me
The publisher was a lie,
An easy meal for the tiger,
The fanged stranger jumping on the shore....

Maybe it would be easier as a homosexual,
And more translucent as a nun;
The trouble-free men take her in the space
Of commercials,
Taste her like an effortless meal....

But I love her, mother,
And I am the only one,
Though don't tell father,
Or he'll eat me, the flatulent bear....
He'll eat me, and then eat another....

There are strange men doing her as
They are able,
The dime-store strangers with perfect teeth.....,
But they will soon decay, mother,
Their tomb-stones facing east....

Even after death has eaten me, mother,
Even after it has cleaned my face,
I will still love upon her, mother,
The hiccupping possibilities
In her womb....

I will still love her mother,

Even as you come out of the still Young door, mother,
And harp up to the blooming storm...

Can you taste the hyathines,
Blooming in red on the front corner of the rented lawn;
They are a part of the unremembered, mother;
And already gone before the rented dawn,

But I love her still, mother,
Even though I no longer recall who I am,
The airliner is taking off, mother,
And I have to go now
Unto her....

Erin, in that translucent storm:
My face is a hideous mask of Greek tragedy, mother:
But I love her this day,

And the next....
Though that is all I am.....
That is all there is,
The supposition of the beautiful clairvoyant,
The breaking of the luxurious waves
Over to the exorbitant real-estate....

I cannot afford her, mother,
Where I am,
But I will write her again in these few words,
Before the finish line mother,
Where I have lost,

The triumphant men took her,
Mother,
And I don't have time to recoil, mother,
Though, do you suppose,
She is looking at us strangely, mother?

As if she might love us,
Together, for a little while....
Before un-relaxing Pentecost, mother....
She put us in the zoo,

For all the children to see,

And I cannot recall her name, mother,
Though, unfortunately, mother....
She is standing beside the door, mother,
And I must let her in....

Before she knocks....

Robert Rorabeck

Mother's Milk

Mother's milk on the shelf of the Convenient convenient store- lilac and Lilac and goat tit,
And homeopath- and but oh, these cars don't Care- the heady chariots in the vast jungle
Metropolis,
Disney World mice I hope to return the respect of,
And use the conundrum of sunburned aphorisms;
It's all some kind of backyard science,
The way her eyes look when she is unshelled and Collapsed like a weary flag on her couch,
On her divan;
And the ceiling fan just does its job,
Wacking and chopping at the pesky angels and Dust bunnies,
While the general of the little boy's fingertips sends Fighter jets into the gyring mother,
Because he loves her, and he hates her,
And he wishes to explore, while she is really passed
Out on the floor, like a two time areola ed puddle
Under the regularly harsh light of the television's muddle,
And the traffic goes back and forth,
Back and forth like chicken-minded angels
With very little reason or convenience to explore.

Robert Rorabeck

Mount Escuidilla

Words on the cherry trees bring out the eyes of the mountain lions who strut prehistorically through the fire sewn aspen groves on the back of the Buffalo Mountain, Escuidilla, a high lady of rocks rises nakedly from the white Arizona plane of blistering sun and sadistic desert cactus where once the conquistadors passed her in a trail of glinting armor ants to the city of gold the city of their bloody bone meal watched by the lady Escuidilla laying naked on her couch of the world the mother of earth waiting centuries surpassing wars and evolution coming alive in different fires being riddled by grizzly bears and their nastier ancestors and ridden by mountain lions, lumberjack beavers and madmen who talked to the stones of her skin through this time she waited
for me
I am hers and in seasons I move on her every week up to the ranger tower, the tiara bejeweling her 11,000 ft. head so she may pollinate me and I can go home impregnated with mountain wisdom

my legs burning as I think about her pretty skin and the august in heat coyote that followed after me howling like Picasso after my hiking legs wishing to have sex with me or my dogs, until I threw bits of her flesh at it, I would not be unfaithful to her, though she may take on many other seasonal lovers none, not even the reoccurring forest rangers and firewatchers, are as forever constant and faithful to her as I am
I'm her #1 love with my lungs and all my bits are a sauce for her, and my smell drives her trees and meadows wild
I know every bit of her trails and I can break down our love making into parts from the aspen forest around her snow white legs to the hill side up her powerful flanks to the open meadow around her stomach to the dark and ample wood of her breasts and finally to her majestic head I listen to every part of her panting and moving as we have sex over the course of an at least 2 hour session on average, as I go back down her she rises and heaves and her winds moan the words of her pleasure as her woods tingle with my footsteps

and when its over like a true lover
she silently releases me and I drive my truck off her knowing that I will return again in spring, summer fall and winter
I've been with her on Christmas morning with a 65 lb pack and her soft snows licking up past my knees, she's given me her frostbite mark
I've scrambled on her, become lost in her woods, laid and read books on her ejaculated in hidden wooded groves into her naked, I've scrambled up the hidden rock slopes on her north face, I've searched like an Indian for her mythical ice caves, I came to her when my bad woman left me
she is my good woman
she is my only woman
I've written novels about her, I've drunken the beads of her dewy sweat and listened to her breathing with my ear pressed to her heart and plucked her lashes of wildflowers I know her better than I've ever known any woman of the earth, better than the 14,000 ft
Amazonian whores in Colorado I've given conjugal visits to when they were not blistering season, when they were in heat in season, and she's expecting me now she may take on many other lovers while I'm gone, but this is just her way,

she accepts everyone on to her,
she's not a murdering mountainess like some of the Himalayan women are,
and she hungers above all for me and the feel of my bones on her earth as the wind takes her clothes off and I am enveloped in her atmosphere her breath the pollinated gravity she pulls me to her as she lies bare naked and hauntingly beautiful under the star bejeweled plane of celestial spheres
the Arizona sky where the moon hangs down engorged a full stomach ready close to have a look at her flawless pretty face she is the one I travel to she is the one perfected by time
where she looks she can see far off Mexico ancient human sacrifice towering over Aztecan death pyramids
the death of all dinosaurs the ice age and she will stand still when one day the humans recede into caves like a vampire she will always remember my love and feel my rotting coffin with her mineral veins when I am buried in the earth near her feet
this, my constant love my rockslide of passion
my Arizona Mountain Queen

Mount Esquidilla

Robert Rorabeck

Mountaineers

Those of us who survived,
Who were not tied together,
And so did not fall when the others fell,
Passed through the keyhole of Little Bear Mountain,
And upon the nape of her neck
We scrambled until we had summited
And looking down into the American Basin
Filled with the indigenous pop stars
And playboy suicides,
We felt not unlike unsolicited Gods,
Defying our literary agents,
And in allegorical Marxism we Shared our peanut butter and jelly sandwiches
And smelled the nectarined farts of angels,
And drank the high oxygen air like wine,
Before we crawled back down again,
Like accountants not missing a single figure,
And then to sleep in our individual cars,
Celibate and clean the way patients
Come to a hospital before an operation,
But what the others thought I could not say,
For we had already shared our dream
And in the morning we soon dispersed,
Going our separate ways like a Victorious football team.

Robert Rorabeck

Mountains

Mountains are as sure of themselves as I am of
You,
And now I am hitting the bottle hard Alma,
The serpents sleep in the folds of a rainbow left
Like foundlings by the short-
Tempered clouds;
And it all seems like a miracle, and the angels snow:
My throat burns,
And I've been hanging my toes and watching as
The fires burn down from the stars:
It seems as if they are always having so many Birthdays up there,
And they don't even know who they are.

Robert Rorabeck

Mountains Of My Adolescent Playgrounds

I cannot believe that you are here—but my Arms and my legs are here,
And my wife is sleeping beside me—
And all of this must have been something of Your ethereal amusement,
Or other words I cannot describe—
While my parents are guests sleeping in
My house,
And I have been chosen to be haunted once
Again by these liquors
Just so I could write to you tonight and Go to school tomorrow cheerfully—Not a thing
In this—not poetry—
Only a fieldtrip of the soul—and not to a beautiful Place—just some halfhearted amusement so
Clumsily put together so to be somewhat
Dangerous—but enough of this vainglorious
Business—my one good grandmother is dead,
But you already know that—
As the fire burned down our mountain some years Ago—I will awaken again tomorrow—
And strut out beneath the graveyards and Swing-sets wherever I am—
To speak to the lost spirits panhandling the roads—
For there remains a song in my heart,
Or a spear in my side—
And there is a yet a movie theatre to venture into
With your name on it—smelling of the perfumes
Of abducted cheerleaders underneath the snowcapped
Mountains of my adolescent playgrounds.

Robert Rorabeck

Mountains Of Other, Sadder Days

Every day the earthquakes and girls ride
Horses,
And look great:
And they go leaping over vermilion hedges,
And it feels so good to them
While Sharon puts her hands in the wet clay
And the world spins:
The gators win, and Erin drinks from the combed
Vespers,
The spirits who don't need oxygen to smile,
And I would like to sit for awhile underneath her
Insouciant bust,
And curse her brown beauty which should have Been beautiful enough for the both of Us:
Our cars and our children, our house and the dogs,
The blue carport with the ululating frogs,
The electric immortality shockingly accorded
To the washing machine:
I wanted to love her and gather grand teddy bears
From the trash bins to duct tape to Give to our homeless children,
But she couldn't understand how to feel the same,
And she left me alone on the roadside which Lead far the other way across the mountains
And mountains of other, sadder days.

Robert Rorabeck

Movie

You work in a beautiful office underneath the stars:
Only so many generations have gone before you,
And before them the dinosaurs:
And even though the days of the earth are young,
I have kissed your lips and Tasted your tongue—and not even roses can describe you—
The parks are vanishing,
The earth rises in metamorphosis,
And I have to pay to Go see a movie—even though you are not here:
Very soon, even those will vanish—
And all that we love disappear.

Robert Rorabeck

Movie Theatre For Those Wounds Of The Heart

Fibrous tremulations amongst the cowslips;
Yellow and gold, hair of girls fanning summer banners
As the foreground for scavenging birds:
The lactant eye of lapis lazuli,
Tremorous hallucination of a daytime queen:
Out in the summer cove,
Hidden besides where the traffic rushes beckoning-
Naked, jubilant and impercievable-
The pronunciation of a wild sex on a feral tongue,
Ringed by boys and girls who know nothing of preschool,
Areolaed, wimpled- caesuras cerulean,
Banners of the naiads of water and sky:
Where are you,
But beside us: beautiful joy. We are blinded by our Work as we toil for diamonds:
Blind men look into your house- escargot of a nubile affliction,
A movie theatre for those wounds of the heart-
The traffic doesn't remember you-
But the wildlife goes leaping around you at all corners:
A wildfire, a victorious flag strung and whipping upon
Naked elbows,
The opal vestibules- struck down in a garden of honey bees:
A statuary of nude museums, a winsome apiary:
There you are, I see you:
Pullulating cenotaph amidst the cowslips,
Wildflowers overflowed and bending at your napes
And your body the crenulations that continue down the stream.

Robert Rorabeck

Moving Closer To Dunsinane

Longing, seemingly meaningful compunctions
Out in the middle of the working class lawn,
Under old glory- Just little trinkets of brass the Ants sprinkle, no longer any use for revelry;
And I am getting up, and I am drinking,
And trying to get about, boned tendrils tremulous
Before lunch, believing this isn't even my house,
But a song I might be keeping for just a little while Before I go out and begin to lose my mind,
As it floats up above the traffic of the salutary holiday,
And up the hill of my footsteps compunctions,
Past the topless bathers on the green, the horned readers,
The superheroes and the ne'er-do-wells so darned busy
With their studies or their lunching,
The girls twin-flecked with just the choicest currencies,
Like man-o-war, rich and stung- I will go up to
The cemetery where a few of my relatives or therein buried,
Under the cross and the plastic statue of the Virgin Mary;
Here, even in the careless daylight it seems like a film noir,
The careless daughters gunned down by their gangster fathers,
And it is the perfect place to build a swing set and begin the Motions of a last minute lesson, though studied well,
The censers of arch bishops, the incense of alligator pine:
The legs kick out fretfully as if they might swim or fly,
But neither am I fish or fowl, and soon in this weather I'll Be out of work, and the University wont even allow me to clean
The caracoles and gum from the desks, but this is fine-
A little wine, and a little bit of illegal pleasure, and the day
Does swim, as each tree in the stunted forest knows, rooted,
Swinging such Olympic arms- We are all moving closer
To Dunsinane pleurably in our crypts,
Gravity taking its luscious and impenetrable time,
As the clouds make fables on the blue endless wall to Entertain.

Robert Rorabeck

Moving The Wrong Way

Everyone's the prisoner of a mad king,
I suppose:
Picking their noses,
Some more homely, hopscotching shadows-
I'll steal out in the roses,
Lay down in some narcoleptic poses,
Neverminding the day gone traffic: It is gone,
As your legs and curly limbs are gone-
Wish they had followed the daubed hatchlings
Down to the sea, and scattered away though
Most were eaten by bilious lips
Dining in clouds and sunshine-
Now most of us gone asleep under the rusting
Eaves, the air-condition droning:
No sweet young dreams now, just schemes of Money - but oh how I would have liked to Have learned how to unfasten you bra,
And then go out into streams of sunlight,
Both of us running.

Robert Rorabeck

Much More Beautiful Type Of Sin

If you can see through the window
That I have been touching myself
How can I go on after all my liquor and childhood
Are gone;
How can you not feel the hurricane of rum on My lips,
How can you not love my pirate ships;
And the Satans waxing poetic on my swings,
All these little brilliant unbelieving things:
Why couldn't you sit out with my in the backyard
And watch the candles burn in their Reptilian skulls-
Why did you have to love the more beautiful men,
To become the echoes of your halls;
And they really liked you, and you let them in,
And thus become magnanimous to my
Much more beautiful type of sin.

Robert Rorabeck

Muffled By The Rain

Beautiful virgins tend to call up the dead
From the mausoleums as foreplay for Halloween-
So I come- What else am I to do,
Happening with my scars and lightning bolt tattoos-
Grey headed,
Hoping to make love to a halfblooded Cherokee-
I come and the virgin straddles me in her surplice- eyes of numb
Hibiscus freshly picked from her sorority,
And the tumbleweeds crawl across the lazing cowboys
Like cart-wheeling brainwashed spiders, like dry and brittle fingers
Fresh from the arid dryer;
And they crawl as slow as synchronized mollusks, and the cowboys,
Shaded by their dusty brims, eat poisoned apples to Atone for all their sins;
And they laugh at us mewling there like stillborn kittens
In the mausoleum beside the half-remembered carport
Where the clothes are drying noisily;
Where the suspicious machines are thumping,
And she has called me out, the dead, to play around in the Gardens of blue stone and pain,
And the puppies try to howl but they are muffled by the rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Mulatto Children

How loudly the quietus barks,
Diana: Liquored up, lighting up the woods,
Our four legged body decorated by Penumbra-
So far away the holocaust lamps of another sea,
These words I use,
Young goddess, one breasted, leaping at the Form,
Airplanes bowing beneath her:
I see her sometimes as I am coming out of the gym,
Or when I am vacationing onto the West part of Florida.
Archaeologists are gathering around her like kids
In daycare,
Undressing her splendiferous hip,
Speculating,
Speculating: Luscious bride of all the colors and Elements,
Sometimes water and sometimes greening wood;
And now the cars are passing, streams of little girls:
What will you have for me today;
I will barter with balloons or bouquet; Or I would Give it all for free,
If you stepped out of your silly forms, the way the aspens
Gather together in childish sorority;
And your hair is as dark as a lumberjack on his day of Rest;
Diana: I am a good man, and I am coming into my full form,
And I just need your bosom for a crèche,
Your South-American womb for our beautiful, mulatto children.

Robert Rorabeck

Murderous Muse

I spoil my nights by sleep,
When I should be out walking or standing
Up straight,
Tossing my head back,
Philosophically perambulating or Drinking your low-cut flower which vibrates like Vintage science-fiction when you laugh;
But why do I keep doing this to myself,
Returning to those same red-bricked halls,
Nearly sylvan from the well-groomed landscaping,
The good hygiene of the gurgling fountains-
I saw you once or twice in just fleeting,
Like a hummingbird on an impossibly light
Bicycle-
The same as I saw you down the sanitized
Halls of high school,
But more developed and alluring because
You were no longer pure;
You'd slightly bled and it wasn't from Going to and from classes,
But it was the sun above you
And could not be confused with false light;
And I cannot say it like Baudelaire, but I still Suck you through my imperfect teeth; though yellowed,
When the idea of you lights upon me, even though
My new university will be on the other side of The Mississippi, Jesuit and blue,
I'll imagine still stepping through your echoes,
Like the perfumes you leave to pollinate the studious
Empiricisms,
Tending to my senses in your casually evil
Flirtations, like kisses from a knife's blade,
Mortally greeted in passing, my false art inspired by the Heartless bloodstains of my
Murderous muse.

Robert Rorabeck

Muse Named Erin

Days of canals and sweet scars attracting Honey-bees and mosquitoes;
I have been accused of plagiarism by a teacher who Couldn't do;
I am in-love with a fresh man child,
I finger-paint like apple snails down his vermilion
Nape;
Holidays of fieldtrips, venal forgemenots,
Words overused like stragglers in a lustrous park:
All the day is as sharp as cutlery, as if we've been staring
Down a housewife's blouse as she does her cookerries
In the kitchens,
Swinging the wine racks, promenading low cut
In a sweet and sour zoetrope before her children,
Her oldest daughter out near the pool,
Crenulated, made of stainless steel:
There is a house I always remember when I am thinking of
This,
And fireworks that are still in a brown bag somewhere,
Still good to use;
But these words are tremulous, asking for more liquor,
Making eyes at the quixotic alligators in the shallow erogenous
Regions of the park across from the whores;
But Sharon is still in love with her husband,
Pretending that ever yother man is broken- The day shoots off
Like monuments of arson,
And somewhere above this crown of thorns
A muse named Erin rides another man's horse.

Robert Rorabeck

Muse Named Kelly

Dance with a Chinese woman like a firecracker
Over the old trailer parks and
The dollar stores- dance the dance that costs
A dollar:
She says she wants to marry you for romance;
Her children are heavily overgrown:
They keep to above ground pools,
And they sun themselves perpetually like other Things expecting metamorphosis-
Their scars are the wounds of past marriages
Graded badly- Maybe they can go to Disney World,
Or buy a Christmas tree,
As they lean into the outskirts of the dirt roads
Where the blue girls swim and the housewives
Have their own tattoos named after a muse
Named Kelly.

Robert Rorabeck

Muse Never Of My Tomorrows

Mammoth places of for-get-me-knots:
This is where the men metamorphose into cenotaphs,
And the conquistadors tried to call upon
The mermaids before stewardesses were Even invented:
In an ancient bed of love that invented the mestizo
In fornications beneath the unutterable happenstance of
The jungled pyramids:
The history of my best muse—cannibalistic—
The human sacrifice that at its best uses the get away car—
A happy leopard,
With a tongue of amber making love to men on the Outskirts, across the train tracks, only to Go home to husband and take a knee—
This soiled pieta is the one I return to:
I once slept atop her next door neighbor's roof
Underneath the primary colored helicopters—
Sacrificing so many artificial words and expensive
Bouquets—
A muse never of my tomorrows,
Always of my yesterdays

Robert Rorabeck

Muse Of Both Hemispheres

Look at the way the verdant winnows the light,
And there in the sheaths of stems, in the throbbing photosynthesis,
I suppose, is the essence of the dreamer's home:

There out in any yard for daylight's piece, one may rest
His fatty rump in so many kingdoms of ants in long wars,
See very little of such places, and pretend enlightenment.

I do this for my ethereal palaver, for what strangeness to Speak to a woman I have never seen, what harrowing dysfunction
To kiss her this way, the tiny epitaphs I give to her leaping over states.

She must not suppose she is real, for self reflection does not occur
To the fleeting happenings of her armada, her body of oils and salts,
Perms and periods, and the junctions of her architectures

Are very swift things stationed in their cupboards, unrealized
Utensils for defense and claret murder, but really just little things
Like the stems of light outside, the roots the shadows I have to discover,

But in doing so would kill the beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

Muse Of Honey And Applesauce

Muse- I want to see you wearing barrettes
In Paris-
Alma- rings of golden satellites between brown
Knuckles-
Warm sweet kisses underneath broken school
Busses- Alma-
Warm sweet places, like hot clay in
Art class- and easels waiting in the broken
Monuments of honeysuckle daylight
With saw horses underneath open hearts:
The way the wilderness waits across the canal
For you- Alma,
To step into the crepuscule of the burning sugar canes
At the dead ends of suburbia,
To leave the senses to go to sleep behind you,
And to start our barefooted, your feet
The size of toy boats, as you exhilarate the heavens
And pull them down to examine your own heavens-
And they see the truth to your passivity,
As the canoe lays tinkered up to the bank, underneath
The holly you left behind
Being given little kisses to its throat my tadpoles
Whose only hope is for metamorphosis
To join with your heavens- to bask across the Fields who grow rich in the antediluvian things that
Evolve in your longing classrooms-
They follow you- muse, as you go leaping,
Caramel- muse of honey and applesauce-
Like bright sunlight underneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Muse On The Moon

A muse on the moon—
What cadaver is beautiful,
Breathless as it is placed above us,
Like a banshee on
A high cliff over-looking a
Tennis court
We were both dismissed from,
And I was like escargot crawled
Above your house,
To listen to the heart beats inside
Like rabbits sheltering the in
The shell of a giant tortoise—
Now these things I don't Know, living just east of the airport,
Like a pearl in between the heavens
And the oceans,
And you lay your head down there
Where he is right next to you,
Like a grave of a hero and her dragon.

Robert Rorabeck

My Abandoned Children

Love in the elbows of Christmas trees:
Getting up and trying to look
Good
While the Mexicans are picking watermelons
And cantaloupes,
And you are with your husband again,
And all of your brown family: maybe your eyes
Have been saying that you have been busy
In love,
But they are lying- as my words fall to the suburban
Field mowed softly underneath the airplanes:
Like paper wetted too far by your abandoning lips,
And all of that sweet moisture carried underground
To feed their queen:
As I awaken one last time without the carnivals
Of your eyes to save
The souls of my abandoned children.

Robert Rorabeck

My America

Enough liquor in me and I am ready
To put down Whitman and go back to school-
Even though I am not ready to spell,
Or look her in the eyes again from across the room
Atop the bleached linoleum plane,
Beneath the flickering halogen sky-
To show her again the love I cannot explain,
Which she has scalped and forgotten like a savage Indian:
Oh well,
I will bore into my studies, my hermitted dreams,
And kiss my professors fully on the lips,
And pick them flowers and buy them perfumes,
And require them to bathe me in my daydreams through Their lectures....
Though now I am fully gone, and watching Clint Eastwood
Rob banks, and believe I am a true American fully formed,
And even now beginning to bloom in my patriotism
Even though the economy has become homely and shrunken,
Where even pornography is dulled and the eighteen wheelers
Lay parked and quieted along the magestic byways,
Like out of work women, or great out of print toms,
And they smell like naked French women on soiled satiny sheets
With gun powder and spent cartridges and organs wilted for All immediacy-
Because she doesn't read my poems anymore, for she has Begun to devolve into another amnesiac year full of grinning
Boys, rum, and toy boats which circle her breasts in a convoy
Through her sudsy bathtub;
As the rain speaks, as the clouds tumult and build up like dirty laundry
In the greeny bin of this valley, I can say to her I have not forgotten
The constellation of her shaven legs,
And the dreams like a mother she reproduces in me,
The children I would have if I were a better man, the distinctions
If I were a better poet: but only this now,
A further personification of the proof of this being,
As my careworn dogs runs up to be let in to the better lit warmth,
I down another glass and run off another line,
The protuberance of my unchecked fantasy- I give to her
In the queuing of my tireless youth: For now she is famous,

Full-breasted and marvelous like an expensive dinner,
And the boys about her the jelly of her flavor-
Though she wouldn't turn her eyes towards me once again
In the sparkling and inebriate light of her graduated ballroom;
This is enough, that I should lay her down this way,
Though in imperfect jest, there is nothing more truthful,
And her areolas display to me the moon in its quarter,
For even though far away, she is still my America,
And eventually she is coming back to me,
Or I to her....

Robert Rorabeck

My Angel Baby

So I asked her
If she Wanted to Go out,
And she did;
And we went out
And played
Baseball
And ate all the
Guava pastries
And bottles of cold
Milk from
Her lunch wagon;
We knew in the Morning she would Lose her job,
But it didn't matter;
I was well hung
And had practiced
So much delayed
Gratification
To be wealthy enough
For the both of Us;
And on our second
Date went Rollerskating
And felt the slight
Caresses of
The tide,
Like the secrets of Gravity.
And she became my Angel baby.

Robert Rorabeck

My Art That Is So Imperfect

Now I feel like dancing, of opening up
Forever underneath the heirlooms
Of my sideshows,
Underneath all of these vanishing places
Where we have to be found out-
That we made love, and broke
Ourselves underneath the hapless sunlight:
Don't you understand that I decided to find you here, and so I
Found you here-
And it feels for awhile to become a bridal Temptation:
But what are your children doing,
Even when sometime you are not home,
But leaving your body to think of me as I buy
Your dresses underneath the rose gardens
Of the overpasses:
As I prey and make love to you while
I am alone on my weekend:
And I know nothing of moving making,
And this is just a scene that I am thinking back
Upon you,
As you lay there, opened mouthed- but Very soon you will have to sunbathe for your Family,
And then you will have to get up dancing,
Like a marionette- and this is a true love
Story- and your name is, Alma-
But my art is so imperfect, that the world
Will never know.

Robert Rorabeck

My Auburn Queen

I want to buy you flowers and buy you vowels:
While the feral thoughts in my pastures howls- And I want to Resurrect my verses by holding your Little brown foot, or your little brown hand:
You seem as innocent as a child who has survived all of her fairytales:
I put my fingers on you like an instrument:
Listen to how you sing, like cars, like rain:
Like the wind tunnels on Christmas in Spain,
While before everything that I ever was had given up, like a goldfish
Belly up, like the words conjoined in a library that has never awakened:
But you given the suicide of my airplanes balloons,
And none of this is even real, Alma- it is all just the sort of thing I Would have never had to sung, if I was truly your prince:
If I was more beautiful, but all of my flaws your flawless eyes never seem
To see:
You are my brown princess, you are my auburn queen, and now all of My animals are waking up to pet you, and to be petted.

Robert Rorabeck

My Awakened Graveyards Of Uncertainties

The flowers on your car are gone:
He is still there,
And you will not leave him: you said to me,
You buy your own flowers-
And he is your family, and it rained today
And I rode my bicycle across the bridge
And nearer the sea-
Where I listened outwards for your echo-
Things I've never pretended to see bloomed
In the sky,
As my parents returned from Arizona nearer
And farther away from me:
And I will not see you tomorrow-
But if the head upon your body weeps,
It is a simple head, and beautiful- and I wonder
If I must conclude that the soul you seem to Be named after will also weep-
But I am uncertain,
And the day goes forever to sleep across
My awakened graveyards of uncertainties.

Robert Rorabeck

My Awful Tomorrow

All the wonderful scars, they make my awful tomorrow:
Where I have been alone for so long except for my dogs,
Underneath where the world is twirling like an innocent girl.
Why can't I be so innocent- Why can't I be the star in a
Horror movie, instead of the horror: Now the cars are moving
Past the cornfield. Now there is hoarfrost covering up the furrows
Of earth. Now the crop is gone, and we have a new president.
Now Jim is president and Huck is fully formed and has his place
In the cabinet; and nothing I have said is perfect, like the tombstones,
Like polished granite for its time is perfect. The graveyard lasts
Almost as long as a good book, and no one wants to put it down,
Especially the author where his name is carved he lies down.
And I would get drunk tonight, but all the relatives are bound to show
Up either tonight or eventually: This is the place where they all come, Eventually. And I am bearded and my nails are long, and there
Is a bag of cocaine at my hip, and some gold.
My eyes are as black as a villain's mask. My horse he grins alongside Me: he grins and grins all through his bones.
For he is in my novel grave, and the mad man
Has escaped with my good woman, and turned her bad; and the world
Just turns and turns over all over this, twirling like an innocent girl discovering Gravity;

Who has long since grown up and turned away and covered up by snow.
She doesn't come to town anymore. She turns tricks on midnight street-
No one comes but the wind, whistling carefully as he hustles us-
For we all lie out here beneath the perfect stars, changing too into the hills,
Without names on books and stones, and our riches buried on our hips.
The cars flood our names with their lights, and then move on down the Perfect rows.

Robert Rorabeck

My Battle

I do not have to wake up—
This isn't my life any longer—my heart fills with Oceans as the baseball diamonds
Empty:
Once again I am drunk at the wishing well,
Hoping that I will win the lottery and
That the unicorn will surrender—
Magical creature as deep as my muse—
I get off the subways of Asia and have to attend Classes in the deep, deep daylight—
And you are never coming home—
Auspicious shadow in a trailer park—here is
My death, handed into the hardy lips of a
Forest fire—it is not mystery:
I am done breathing—my first child is due in April, and I am stumbling home to you again;
The astronauts fall, and so do the heavens—
I don't care—I awaken again tomorrow—
And eat everything that fails to metamorphosis—
I am the monster and this is my battle.

Robert Rorabeck

My Beautiful Sea

I lie down in my beautiful sea,
A pain in my side, my eyes far away:
Already, the continents are beginning to move,
Like mother and father screaming from the carport;
The palms sway insouciantly, and the white and the Pink Cadillacs move beneath their throats with old men
In ice-cream suites, pockets full of dollar bills,
Minds filled with little women in little bathing suites:

I wish I could understand the way she moved, first
To me, and then away, as if drawn by another body in The sky, as if drawn by some mineral though relaxing in the Dim living room with a glass filled with liquor and ice,
Where there is no air-conditioning, but a dizzy sort of dance
Under the foundations and out in the blizzing suns,
Where the boys play with Tonkas, and the girls with Barbies,

And the old bridges over the intercostals of cleft palettes
Have yet to fall like other sorts of games, chipping on the Abutments, and the rhymes of sunken soldiers, who stepped Too far out into her eyes: This is all I see now, all I see,
As I lie down in my beautiful sea, a pain in my side,
My grave going down as I close my eyes,
I reach out to her in another serve; Again, I fear, she is Pulling back, breathing all that she feels close to her chest,

And making me so I can no longer catch my breath,
As I try my futile dream to pull myself towards her in the Undertow of a song, I lie down in my beautiful sea,

I lie down in my beautiful sea.

Robert Rorabeck

My Beautiful Song

All of the bodies bivouacked- in fact they are a family
So many reasons above the street:
Right under the stars, a husband and a wife who do not
Love anymore,
Who spend each day together in a cloudless hope,
Losing limbs- never once speaking of love,
Their children spread out beneath them:
Roped to them in this disaster of mud and sticks:
Hanging down the cold face,
Learning how to go to school and read, and to become estranged
At recess through the fickle apertures
Of where they are placed to belong; I, loving their mother,
But so far beneath them- too far beneath them to do
Any good- too mortal, too imperfect, the wind howling
To her from the countries of her birth,
Calling her home down through the calderas of other paths:
Through new green ways where other bears and galaxies live,
Luxuriating her brownest of shoulders,
Persuading her back into her pueblos just as surely
As mountain lions eating my throat, and stealing my beautiful song.

Robert Rorabeck

My Bed Is As Empty As A Glass

My air-condition really works and make me feel as if I am on sabbatical;
And I am glad that Trulio told you that I was once a teacher,
Which is so,
But I have always been a singer of these words,
Under the eves of high school, whistling with all of the drunken birds:
And my scars seem to never mind you, Alma,
While my body seems so quick and so large:
I held your little wrist spindling your little fingers today,
But you were the one who was in charge:
And I wish I knew every last dropp of Spanish for you, Alma,
For I am sure that I am in love:
Even if you say that I need a new car, I am better left unproved,
The way the green fields look un hoofed by the athletes and their silly
Bags:
Tonight is my night for you, Alma, and all of the world is stilled:
Even the sea doesn't move, and the sky is just something fantastical;
It cannot be proven; and you are the keynote of this symphony;
It oscillates back and forth against your being-
And you do not need a breast job, and everything I speak is a reason on
For you,
And my bed is as empty as a glass begging you, Alma, to be filled.

Robert Rorabeck

My Best Friend

I swing more than the hour I am with you,
But tonight my lips don't smell of rum while you Meet with your husband and a friend in A bar-
Egrets perch over you, but what are the shapes of Egrets;
And when can I run away again, softly repeating
The mistakes of your empty branches,
While mother washes her face, and the old dogs
Cry because they have never seen your Face as I have seen your face, or at least that is My make-believe for why they should cry
When there is a storm of tinsel and the spit of kissing-
Balls over the Faberge castles, where lawyers are Kissing their cohorts on senior fieldtrips all spread out Through the unreal esplanades, the slender walks of Their professional amusements;
If I should see you there in a chariot of your legs,
I would hold this breath for you, and wait long enough for
The oceans to change places with the clouds,
If to show you that I was not your prince; in fact meaning
More than the stations of the otherwise or any man,
As if this were a game of musical chairs held over from Kindergarten, and we were the two seated last together,
Like a prince and his queen, or any other meaningless thing,
Except that I would like you to be my best friend.

Robert Rorabeck

My Better Looking Sister

I feed the raccoon snake eyes and Cat food,
Because its eyes are so patchy I can relate and Call it beautiful,
Because I have a redneck cousin who always Calls me Robbie the raccoon,
Because of the corpuscles of blood around
The eyes,
The scars of a sick valentine masks,
Those same old things which make me relate to the Harem of shadows which Grow each and every night,
Which make me pop out these pregnant things
Like fat salmon streaming their Row upstream:
And I could be a gunfighter,
And I could rob banks;
In fact, I am almost dead tonight:
In fact, I am so drunk off another man's gin
That I am just about to go one block south and swing
On the black man's swings,
To make myself a champion,
To make the entire Milky Way swing with my darkly
Sunken arcs,
Like a Russian submarine escaping or a matinee
Movie;
I sing these things, the pale orchid coming above ground
Under the gibbous moon while my better looking Sister and beautiful husband are sleeping.

Robert Rorabeck

My Bluest Wishes

If I can do for you in the séance of everything,
Then I am happy;
And my dogs leap and snap at the nude air,
And there are nude airplanes buzzing;
And you are just the first girl I've kissed in seven years:
I want to cut me into as many pieces and Become your tin man of just as many poems:
Really, do this to me,
And we can leap across as many canals;
All the sad reasons that are metamorphosing into the rain clouds
Of well-fed romance;
And I should never shirk your eyes again, because there in
Is the bluest kingdom into which I have flung all of My bluest wishes and even bluer promises in.

Robert Rorabeck

My Bosom To Your Rose

Rainbows are so loud while you've Been playing games and I've been running away:
This is just how I've been thinking of Myself,
Trying to persevere through the lonely hours of
A lonelier day-
Trying to make eyes with myself before the possessed
Mirror,
And yawning, believe in the things that I am certain are Not possible:
Daylight in a crèche over the bouquets I give you
Open mouthed while I've been running around in circles-
As the race horses run around according to the hours-
And other diminutive superheroes in the lassos of Daydreams- pilots in the fake light of Abandoned light houses- or another story whose Yet abandoned pages are yet folded:
I supposed I loved you, and yet I supposed: what does
It mean to surrender my bosom to your rose.

Robert Rorabeck

My Brothers Of The Lonely Roams

Is this the place to set in my ways,
The bungalow for a bachelor and his laughing dogs;
To sit and watch the fallow sun rise and fall
In my anonymous poverty;
To drink the liquor prophesied in the advertisements,
To walk through the skin of the forest fire
Inebriate in a haze of lunar houses spilling into the hills;
To be done and out of it before my body falls,
The spindles of energy unwound by the clocks
Bearded like old men melting lackadaisically in the trees,
Too afraid of the gentle adoption of the female element,
All the better women transformed into centaurs and feasting
On the lightning storms;
Her eyes a bad wonder for more suitable men accessorized with
The studded accoutrements of success;
The growling warmth of the steady eyed glares from out of fast cars,
In the fine houses of natural selection, beneath the gated communities
Of affluent foreplay;

Let me spend my days here instead,
Where the fire has already ravaged; where I feel at home
With my likewise environment, on a burned down hillside steadily populated
By albino trailers of the moonshine blind and strange, dysfunctional homes,
Half eaten, like ribcages of whales left over from the last oblivious age,
To howl in the windy night with my brothers of the lonely roams;
And to listen, content to be alone, to the listing creak and Inevitable surrender of this accordion foundation swinging its gin
In the gusty bordelloed night, like a seafarer's boat tossed on the spitting foams.

Robert Rorabeck

My Cherry Sunday-Ed Pillow

I want to live with the animals in Sherwood Forest:
I want her to toss me her brazier during
The show so that I can take a mental note
Of what she smells like,
And wait for her to come to my stage door,
As the rains come,
Billowing like pillow fights with soar mouths too
Full of cotton candy and wax knickknacks
Bought at the over spilling zoo;

Or, at least, I would like to win the game,
To have the ostentatious chance to squeeze her
Breast like an orange,
To circle around her three times, only paying once,
To have a good chance to look deep into her mouth to Seek out all of her fillings,
And too grin to see that in actual fact she is just as Scarred and sweet-toothed as I am,
To lay upon her chest like a cherry-Sunday-ed pillow,

To want to say how much I still love her,
Dear unrelenting god,
But I do not have the guts.

Robert Rorabeck

My Danse Russe

Could I turn back time if I bought
The house on Anastasia Island, the one
Built in the middle of last century, before
Even Tolkien had discovered a voice
To decry machines, the lines of tattoos
In modern English,
An ubi sunt sweated from his hands,
And brow furrowed the way the farmer
Attends his field, or would I just be putting Down more inattentive drifts,
Right around the time my parents were Coming into thoughts, as Einstein invented
The bomb while gossiping around the Coffee table, Sylvia Plathe having lunch
With dollops of cream cheese, a horse
Fly draining the scar on her cheek, not yet
Knowing she would rest under the calligraphies
Entombed, like Sara Teasdale in St. Louis,
Her Pulitzer wreathed to her feminine bones,
Like a starving worm, her blood still warm
Though now ethereal; Even then, I could not Join them, video games the brail on the torpid Computers of lazy Titans,
Men still wary of Martians, the wives good
Cooks, pot roast, and missionary positions,
Black & white televisions, bomb scares,
The kids running down the street with b.b. Guns
And tomahawks, Oldsmobiles, John Wayne
Immortality, toy trains around Christmas;
William Carlos Williams writes his Danse Russe, and I am naked in my room,
"The sun a flame white disc in silken mists"
And I am lonely by H.G. Wells,
Going back into her, says the waves going,
Eyes the stains of radiation, thighs glowing,
Just after New Years, fireworks in Miami, I would Have enough to make an offer, to step back into The halls preserved by the island, to see my grandmother
And walk my dogs until people visit

And play games where they would count
And then jump the curb,
If they opened their eyes and called
And prayed, they could find my grave
And maybe put flowers on it.

Robert Rorabeck

My Dead Grandmother's Wall

There seems to be a new wash in the Pageantry of bones—
I am still standing right here for you against
The lamentations of the river,
But I have become just another kind of sick tourism—
Something's tragedy to be gawked at
Through the skies beneath the highway—
Gutted, as I wait for you to remember why it was
That I became this way for you—
After the tornados had swallowed all of the trailer-parks
And all of their colored televisions—
And I walked out for you like a firewalker through The unbelievable pains of the midways of Your grottos—
And, drowning, I couldn't help noticing how long you held Onto his hand—
Watching, even when I was nothing else—
And the paintings still held onto the illusions of my Dead grandmother's wall.

Robert Rorabeck

My Dear Sea

I am dying now by your love:
There are three handguns beneath
The upstairs bed,
So I have a choice,
Though the conclusion is the Same impermanent permanence,
We shall all choose to lie in finally:
My ex-lover took a husband
To bed with her,
Of similar persuasion, I wonder if their happiness will last-
I still hope for change,
And by this dream of the sea:
And you, who are my sea, dear-
My dear sea, won't you beckon?
Won't you have me expeditiously
For what I am,
Or is what I am too broken?
I am just a boy in a little world all afraid,
Waiting for you to sail with me....
This is not like anything else
You have heard before,
Because this time it is true,
If you could only love me,
That would be the best solution:
To come awake in a song no one else can hear,
But it may be that you are too
Far away to even consider,
That you are the sea which can
Flood my body with new feeling,
To evoke that change I need,
Like a continent dividing into
New Paleolithic definitions,
To set sail by your post-modern history,
To know myself by your relationship,
The beautiful calligraphy of your Caesuras, peaks, and troughs,
My dear sea....

My Diaphanous Muse

If the doors close, will the lips too pull back:
I feel alone even at the delta of her kiss,
And the airplane's wings are spread and flying in the dead
Of night where the luscious students lay sleeping,
Spread out like adventurers lost on a quest,
Persuaded by their own hopes of monsters to fall into
The field and to dream of apples-
With eyes closed, I dream of my muse as she sleeps in Her own house- even while I have been so close to her-
The neighborhood of her soul lies in the South of Mexico- and I am shoeless when I come to her,
Wondering around, her mother's womb opened like a churlish
Rose in a busy apiary,
Showing her to me- pulsing with the eager pornography
Of my diaphanous muse.

Robert Rorabeck

My Discriminating Taste

Let me sprinkle salt on you,
And plagiarize you, to show you off
To the professors down on the farm:
To pass you off as my lover,
And lay you out on the table, and pour wine
In you while the television is broadcasting
Reruns we both know:
And the city is moving outside like some sort
Of metaphorical ocean,
Like the ones I read about in classics,
And sow my fingers on you like a lullaby
Army, a children's story awakened from the Dinner's gardening, under the lights and Electricity bill: Let me pretend to read you
With great intensity, and raise my hand above
My head, as if to signify that I have an answer
Sitting down at this meal:
The way I always imagined I would do to you,
While I was living with her, and the screams
And shouts and the crocodile tears-
But if you do not call, or if you don't even suspect,
Just allow yourself to imagine a holiday
Where we could set aside time in our busy schedules,
So that I could dress you up and eat you,
So that we could get to know each other, without Silverware, your thighs denoting the proper table
Manners, which I hold apart to tongue the portions,
And you give your peckish exclamations as politely
As you can, or moan from the pleasurable sensations,
Like a recipe broiling in the oven;
Or, if you don't want to, or already have such dinner Arrangements with another lonely gentleman, just Imagine me upon your table from time to time,
Feeding you between your opal stems kisses from My tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

My Dissolving Courtyard

Vehicles returning early, like my father's Dreams,
Though the canal is so close as to steal away
What voice I might have daydreamed I had,
Or walked right out into the fata margona of an Aboriginal school yard because the Hem of your pretty skirt was so yet tremulous and Unpinned;
It was laying across the midrange of your body's
Watery playground,
Like something newly evolved or lost from the unsure
Rejoin where the tide perpetually leaps only to return,
Like a manmade playground with all its hope
And incubating desires;
And you were there, though you were not,
And I laid a hand upon the opal bottle cap of your Rope skipping knee,
But it was a hand that I had amputated from a motionless
Body;
And if I did touch you, you could neither see nor feel
The leftover beauty in a calcifying river
Until like a marble braze, I did not turn at all, and you laughed
At something you could not feel and finally went Home from the ineffectual séances and from the sightline of My dissolving courtyard.

Robert Rorabeck

My Dreams Aren'T Even Sad

Proficiencies north and south of the Mississippi,
All these lines I have drawn are the
Corrupt calligraphy
Of my face smiling in its daylong dreams,
Through the satin laces,
The spikenard, and the motor races:
A mask that knows how to bite its inner
Cheek,
The peckerwood hope that you will come
Floating to me,
The wife of a papier-mâché samurai with
Shortcut bangs:
In this sympathy of crickets I make my
Dark parade,
I bow and gesticulate and caracole with my
Weapon of choice,
My eyes the dark poltergeists no longer amused
That you've done finished picking apples
From the top soil of my dungeon,
Pulling my stodgy roots;
Now that you are floating in your wedding ship
Across the crenulated sheen like glossy sod
Slicked across a meaningless highway,
Like a high-blown wreath,
I realize I must have you again well kept,
Attending to my estuaries,
Decorating my lawn like a car, even if you are
Only my favorite monster,
My dreams aren't even sad without you.

Robert Rorabeck

My Empty Dove

Pageantry of their star-crossed heavens,
Just as another beauty pretends
To dissolve
As the katydids just so
Immolate in their open yards, just as I've Been swelling up,
Trying to become just as gigantic
As a perfume-
But I've been slowly dying- bloated
Dog on the concrete of your Expatriated ballroom-
And all of the flies are laughing,
And there is not another bird that ever has to Sing again,
But the theatres fill up with bodies presupposing in
The lamplight that someone especially has to be Their king-
As they try filing out and then to making love-
And this is just the empty pageantry of my tomorrow-
If it just so happens that you happen to be
My empty dove.

Robert Rorabeck

My Expectant Door To The East

Here I am calling from the uncertain road,
Where from it reaches its possibilities and leaves in So many ways, after I have leapt over so many Faceless rivers, not unlike a small forest animal Might leap around her opulent ankles after
He has been set down and she has wondered off into Other plays. She is so high up from me, I don't recall
The expressions of her face, nor the fatty cradle of Each breast, but I try to listen to her as I venture into
This busy east: I turn the radio up and position it
Toward the signal where she lies streaming and unclothed
And waving over those scholarly avenues like the great Banners of beloved extinction; but ever so quickly these Allusions settle down again into the nourishing meadows
Of familiar continents which sate them, and give them respite,
And a rented bed behind a key and lock, where so many Lovers paid and bled, while even still the harder men rush
Eastwards, careless of bouquets or grooming:
I can see them now doing lines as insouciant as these:
Their reflections as haunting as an abusive childhood,
They are all in a race, each with their own shortcuts, leaping
Dandily over the ways and high edges, with gifts of switch
Blades, exhumed arrowheads, and shards of glass:
They wish to pierce your heart the same as I, and place
Within there a fingerprint that cannot leave, but controls you
Like a wicked stamp from without; but I know another way,
And I swear to beat them all, because under the covers there is A backdoor that swings into you, and while my jaw is drooling
Like a diademed hinge, I will enter in your subconscious reflections
And swim and spear you there, and leave upon you with words,
The gentle persuasions like easy tattoos, like cheap prizes in the Bottom of sugar filled cereals, the frantic estuaries that I would Have you devour; and so to cradle you breathlessly in my nervous
Hands within the hour, only to release you once more with
The galloping sun, so as not to destroy you,
But to see you again once you sigh and rest your puzzled ahead
Against my expectant door.

My Fading Tomb

Lamps are jeweled with the drool from a sleepy sky,
And I have told her to get off her knees,
But she was only checking my navel for the hibernating
Butterfly- When it flew away like a beautiful disease,
She stood up on her own with disinterested eyes;
So many years ago she forgot all about who I was,
And followed the asphalt rivers into the drowsing rooms
Down in the smoking earth, where the irascible men are curling
With the lizards, and they are all the same, and she goes
And entwines with them, not remembering my name,
Though she remembers how the butterfly flew away,
And for a second she looked into my eyes, and there were Almost thoughtless tears far beneath the fathomless sky,
Where the azure lamps gave their halos in strange swaths
Of newly conducted electricities, and she walks away
Still echoing, for she no longer hinges upon marrying me,
As she is the whispering tune reverberating with symmetries,
Changed like a butterfly, hovering in his soft palm as if He was her flower,
Bloomed from the wispy cracks of my fading tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

My Favorite Monster

Proficiencies north and south of the Mississippi,
All these lines I have drawn are the
Corrupt calligraphy
Of my face smiling in its daylong dreams,
Through the satin laces,
The spikenard, and the motor races:
A mask that knows how to bite its inner
Cheek,
The peckerwood hope that you will come
Floating to me,
The wife of a papier-mâché samurai with
Shortcut bangs:
In this sympathy of crickets I make my
Dark parade,
I bow and gesticulate and caracole with my
Weapon of choice,
My eyes the dark poltergeists no longer amused
That you've done finished picking apples
From the top soil of my dungeon,
Pulling my stodgy roots;
Now that you are floating in your wedding ship
Across the crenulated sheen like glossy sod
Slicked across a meaningless highway,
Like a high-blown wreath,
I realize I must have you again well kept,
Attending to my estuaries,
Decorating my lawn like a car, even if you are
Only my favorite monster,
My dreams aren't even sad without you.

Robert Rorabeck

My Finally Blessed Team

Pallbearers, pallbearers
Bring me on home, for my dream is done roaming:
Take me to the copper kettle, take me to the Iron stove,
Flay off my bologna, wimple my holes:
Give my eyes the nickels to pay the ferry:
Don't tell me who I might one day have married,
Just boil my sweets with cabbage,
And give the mutts my galled stones: For I am made now
To rest easy, my guts like moth-eaten clothes in A wormy vanity;
The detritus of the magic trick of my being,
The lush garden revealed a cemetery; and even if My aunt was Mary,
Give me to the earth and in my bed so bury:
For this is the existence I can better know:
Pallbearers, Pallbearers, do what you can, and what you
Must while all four of you are still dreaming:
While your bodies are moving to auction the strange gift
Of a lonely carpenter;
Look, the sky is unworried: the cars still move impassibly by:
The swans still trumpet, and the jaded women cry:
Not a single mother need know one blessed why
My body lays crippled, my functionings faltered:
The house is empty of windmills and goldfish:
Pallbearers, pallbearers, be you not my fathers,
But be you my grandsons sons and my grandsons,
And proceed me outside the stage of my worrisome dream:
Yes, pallbearers, pallbearers, bring me on home, and be you
My finally blessed team.

Robert Rorabeck

My Foremost Muse

When Pablo Neruda shows up, I think again
That you are reading me,
Soft brown eyes across all the scrolls of my Nakedness,
Even as the buzzards turn out for their hoary meats
That caracole everyway into the juvenile fields
Of your lost town,
Where even still the vagabonding male children
Play all over you,
As you collect their merry instruments like golden
Honey in
The clefts of your warm basins, that my voyages
Will never know,
Because they have forgotten the need to steal
Those taboos,
Even as the light of your bedroom homeopathically
Diadem all the pretty creatures of
Disney World,
And you lie down again absentmindedly in the heat strokes
Of your perpetually beautiful fugue;
But do not say now that I have forgotten you to go off Climbing in the wet throats of Colorado, who turn into Substantive graveyards in a few months;
Yes, do not expect that I have forgotten you apathetic appreciations,
Even though you are most certainly not my foremost muse.

Robert Rorabeck

My Forgotten World

Sanctuary of a playground in
A rainstorm
I never took old girlfriends too—
A swing-set, really—
All I carried about—
Thinking of muses in the armpit of Florida—
Above the navel oranges of Ocala,
The commercialisms of Orlando—
This was my forgotten world even While I was there—
And the lines I sewed beneath the
Swings
For a love I always knew was never there.

Robert Rorabeck

My Gallant Stuff

Broken psalms in a discothèque
Lose their way to the south of France through Wind tunnels on Christmas day:
Green knights with birds in their hair, on parade:
Far away places,
Nose-bitten cliffs overlooking orange fields attended to
By dryads named Galaphile-
The plains on which we exist, covered by angels
And hobos,
While my muse is far away from here: she is in a house
Across the railroad tracks: my soul, my alma,
Seems as if on another sphere,
And the things that I write for her, that I toss out from My mind seem not to belong,
And I go this way towards her, like a quixotic knight
Approaching windmills,
And I say and do my gallant stuff, like foam
From the lips of waves until
I am dissolved- tasted by her lips,
Effervescing- I return to my truck, floating like a feather,
Like a wish
Over a world that just continues to go on.

Robert Rorabeck

My God

My god doesn't have a
D$ck: she is the other
Sort of god,
And I was held up at Gunpoint,
But at least I can fly:
My god has tits and peppermint
Breath:
Her eyes go on forever,
Cataracts distilling
Her spirits for long
Jawed tourists;
My god does gymnastics on
The apex of my childhood's
Roof:
My god lounges tonight all
Fun and glowing
Maybe my god is
With child tonight
Without even knowing;
And while I get ready
To slip into despondency
Tonight
All I can conclude
Is that my god
Is still Going,
A beautiful young lady
Whose yard her fine
Young husband is mowing.

Robert Rorabeck

My God Given Supper

My hands were on her throat just once:
Perhaps they did not pressure her enough because now we Are just friends,
Alma: Oh, Alma, aren't we just friends, just the way the swing-sets
Tell the lies of birds to beautifully undying children
Until they curl them down again
And make them eat the dirt fluttering by so many kicking feet
Into the bellies of dusk that the school buses have caracoled,
Until there is no one left here—in this place,
Alma,
Where I have forsaken my God-given supper: where I am still awaiting.

Robert Rorabeck

My Grandmother's Eternal Resting Place

Without my parents here I have to improvise,
But I don't skip lines:
I bake sugar cookies for my dogs,
And talk to my grandfather's ghost wearing a fur
Coat in the blue tiled bathroom:
There are no answers from the gods, but their Echoes keep up all week, like something which Lives up to its advertisements,
A miracle sleeping on the front porch, her Lips on the swings in the park where she's never been:
Even with no one here, its funny the way they Look at me, and the last time I saw mountains
We were driving by where she tests wine, high above
Where her husband was last seen approaching the summit:
And I haven't been lost for sometime,
Because I've begun using fourteen point font, and I Still tiptoe to the left of the lockers in the empty hallway
The day after she kissed me in the dark so I wouldn't know,
And I woke up and tried to speak Latin into the juxtapositions
Of my fast lunch at the foot of the hurrying ants all around my Grandmother's eternal resting place.

Robert Rorabeck

My Grandparents' Trailer Home

Rain on a boat.
Your mother and some other
Animals watching from the shore,
Their mouths and pockets
Getting filled up—
While I dream of getting rich,
Go to the flea market seven days
A week,
Get so much sun my skin cracks
And bleeds
Cancerous peonies—
And I go blind from the wastrels
Of capitalistic hallucination.
Some fat rattlesnake,
Belly fat from lucky rabbits
Sleeps underneath the rotting Floorboards of my Grandparents' trailer home
That doesn't exist anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

My Head On The Pillow On The 50 Yard Line

At 4 a.m. I watch the stadium getting bigger all around campus the sun is getting ready she still drives her Lexus all over my bones
while, in the dorms,
some students have sex others sleep and dream mathematical vibrancies of ghosts floating in the old grotto trees outside their windows what they don't understand is this situation never dies but goes down to sleep with new lovers
every 4 years she graduates and for as long as I live a part of my mind will lie down on Jefferson Street down the lane from the white washed sororities how she left me to love an undergraduate and the day I passed my thesis my truck was towed I had to borrow some young lady's dapper legs to retrieve it, she still was my silhouette these days she is fine in a new yard with marble cherubs shooting arrows toward her young man's office window and now one more morning I go down to sleep my head on the pillow on the 50 yard line of Doak
Campbell Stadium while my ex students dream of tailgaiting and the three minute swim of their sex across campus and my head.

Robert Rorabeck

My Heartfelt Game

The airplanes echo as you drive home
From school,
In a neighborhood made out to be some kind
Of theme park,
A plagiarism of sprinklers and Cottage cheese after the original Ferris Wheels have moved away with Their gypsy hearts:
And this is the world I teach in, telling the kids
Things that cannot possibly make any sense—
And, laughing,
Show them my wounds: there is a theatre inside,
I suppose you know—
Marionettes in my ribs playing through the Beautiful foxgloves—old muses—
Mexicans and athletes—they are going to School—inside of me—
And I show their vermillion zoetrope to my Classroom,
But in the darkness of their impotency
They can only see the shadows—
The playgrounds of murder that they mistakenly
Take to be my heartfelt games.

Robert Rorabeck

My Homeless Home

Suns on fire; it's what they do,
Like your children on the Merry Go Round,
Or in their yards after school:
And you told me you had two rabbits; but now you lie in the Very same bed as your man who left you for
Mexico
And came back again- and in my silent thoughts I wonder if I Am the only man you have had otherwise in the imperfections of
Your flesh:
Soon your daughter will be two: her bones will be solidifying,
And her vocabulary will grow:
She will walk prouder and prouder across your yards,
Until she cannot be contained;
As I wonder how many times I may kiss your lips again and
Again;
Alma-it is all I ever wonder, and at night while I am alone,
These thoughts become my Christmas floating in beautiful lights
Across my homeless home.

Robert Rorabeck

My Hourless Job

Having nothing to really show for ourselves,
And the show is done: the liquor is just the spit on our bottom
Lip and where will we go now:
Now that Alma is at home and fast asleep,
And her son Michael went bowling today, while I cradled Alma
In my lap and she told me
She had bowled just once, and she wasn't any good, which is What I expected;
And I showed her pictures today of my other muses, Caucasian and Far lesser than her,
Here and there, like paper snowflakes in Colorado,
Like songs that sing themselves to sleep:
And then we made love, and I showed her the dress I had bought for Her even though she doesn't like wearing dresses;
And I have taken walks with Alma to the very places I have written Novels that will never sell;
And I have been underneath the overpasses of those novels to buy
Unrequited gifts for Alma,
Because her very name means so- and she has been the only woman
To see my soul burning as it does for her,
And to accept me for that infinite flame- to taste my lips and lay down
With me atop the azure caesuras,
Even if she cannot say that she loves me:
Alma, you are younger than my youngest sister, and more beautiful,
While the cops head out tonight to harass unicorns, I will keep Blowing my instruments for you, hunting for your body
Because we make love
As infinite as all of the possibilities in the seven seas, and we both
Have skipped into movies;
And you don't know exactly how beautiful you are,
But I am still here happily doing my hourless job, which is to Tell you so.

Robert Rorabeck

My Indescribable Scars

Weary furnace reforms the deja-vu rain clouds
Over my head- The green rain is starting to fill the pearly
Seashells so very recently sucked dry by the beefy
Tourists and everything they had:
I believe they went that way, officer, like an entire herd
Of over inflated swine, far away from the resting place
Of my sea; but I am not so sure now,
Because I haven't had the courage to look at myself that Way in so long- but everything that I fail to do, Everything that doesn't occur to me is sure to go the Way they went, like forgotten teenage lovers long since Cycled apart from the orange groves of hormonal romance,
Bedded down anew and well-financed and more speedily
Situated; but oh, how I remember the humid classrooms where We used to sit, my eyes stacked away bat-winged by my drowsy
Elbows. How I'd never changed out to fit for PE, just read
Scribbles and jogged around a bit while the Jews played Basketball and the coach's pacemaker ticked like a cardiological Metronome.
Now all these scars and the dogs singed by the fire. They don't Trust anyone anymore, not even well-dressed officials,
And when my hand goes out to them, unconditionally emptied,
Like a housewife after a long and drunken cry
Settling down after all the dishes are stacked and children put Away, they do not come near me-
For memory is like a plastic bouquet placed atop the windswept
Grave, and the pain and grief set in their eyes
Like a birthstone in a tarnished ring, the irrefutable calligraphy scarred
In their gaze. Now that I am far away from them I can barely Hear their scream like lobsters in a broiling sea-
Just a feral thought drowned half evolved in the brambly wake,
And soon the storm crosses over and the waves disentangle
And before you know it they are out again, a parade of primary mariners
Out upon the sunny combs too blinded and drowned
By all that laughter to recognize my indescribable scars.

Robert Rorabeck

My Inescapable Of Tomorrows

Oh god of vomit, god of filth, don't ask me how

I am doing:

If you know, I am surviving, you are my tomorrow of my

Tomorrows:

And how I am doing, while you are first riding your first

Men's horses,

Getting down on your knees and giving head to your choruses

Of choruses:

You of all should know how I am dying, dying, dying;

Because this is our song, and I am not even crying:

And this is our blood bath, your ablution, my tomorrow:

You awaken a sweet song, you legs creaking like wind chimes

In your birth, seesawing for breakfast:

I have forgotten what I am worth, except that you are always

My inescapable of tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

My Kingdom Of Wimpled Ghosts

Days, you come- even in South Florida, smoke rings
Caracole the sky like costume bells,
And I can see the shadows of my face hopefully
Tremulous in tainted wishing wells,
And older parks where I knew I used to like to Jaunt,
But they have been combed over by the more novel
Flaunts, the easier and more reticulated love affairs,
Girls with blue and black nails who make it
While the alligators watch,
And the cold fronts ripple the sky with thunderbirds of Homeless liquors- the sky in the color of a chilly pantina,
And I am the homeless king underneath swinging on My lonely throne through my kingdom
Of wimpled ghosts.

Robert Rorabeck

My Little Sisters

And the beautiful espionage hidden behind
The sleeping jasmine
In the tennis courts outside of the dressing rooms
In the middle of a daydream of Florida
As the waves come
And then retreat and the tourist bodies bronze
Around the shoulders
And eyes like raccoons that never figured out
How to sleep-
And everyday through the climax of America is filled with Sunlight an cocaine: the angels cannot seem to Figure out how to come down
Nor the airplanes- even though the bodies
Remain juxtaposed
Inside the windows beside the televisions-
Beating hearts positioning elbows-
And my littler sisters are in love-
And the alligators sometimes sleep uphill from
The canals never imagining that they should ever say
A thing.

Robert Rorabeck

My Lovestruck Fairgrounds

In the throats of pretty chords hold their notes,
As lakes hold their tears as if in bluish plates, even while
All of a sudden the incensed ripples of Disturbing loves appear and then fish outward, skidded
By the moon;
And all of suburbia holds its soft and easy tune:
In one strange ululation of a shared but calmed dream:
The bean stocks are all plundered, the Titans are missing,
And Jack will never be coming down again
By those old means:
His fairytales are all used up, his throat is shaved:
He could be played by a beautiful girl,
If he only knew how to behave; and he has become lost somewhere
Over the middling fair,
Because he is like me, pining over your hair, languishing in a fruit
Market, though maybe neither of us belonged in there,
Alma;
And the world as become your cup for me; and I hold you in my Eye as long as I can, and then in my mind; but I always feel you
Slipping away, like a beautiful child trying to leave my mind
Which becomes a ticking graveyard when you are not
There,
Across the borders of which the thinkless cars pullulate
As if they were trying to fertilize the chalk abounding a fortress
That can never awaken; as my words set off for you
The unspindling fireworks that hold no joy and burn everything down Until you are once awakened and called once again into
The senses who so busily once again awaken the insatiable hearts
Of my lovestruck fairgrounds.

Robert Rorabeck

My Make-Believe Loss

If I should mention to Diana tomorrow
Again how beautiful she is,
I will not be worried about being made fun of
Or ignored:
I've been all of this and so many things before
In the morning waiting for the school bus,
I am an animal in a pet cemetery
Abandoned, absurd:
I have a plastic coffin and a tin horn of paper flowers,
And I will sleep forever outside of her
Warm tresses:
She serves breakfast and lunch to prettier boys,
Is the word,
But I'll wake up and move the paper stone from my Toy crypt my absent acolytes put there as a joke;
And the bicycles will spin their Mandela's of silver spokes;
And the naked room will smoke from Forest fires and happy airplanes peeling their exhaust;
And the sea will come up and console me, kissing me
Happily as a master over my make-believe loss.

Robert Rorabeck

My Misinformed Delusion

Now I am up again, loveless above the meadow:
The most of me a failure in the light-
Looking down at the tossed about cities,
Developing vertigo
And the nose bleeds of forget-me-nots:
And if you have to travel all the way up here to Find me,
Then you are as if a serpent exploring the higher
Boughs of a tree,
And everything I have said has failed you,
As I come down barefooted in the spurs of the Graveyards,
And cutting myself on the rusty barbed wire,
I swear and curse and try to kiss you:
As all of the nights knot together in another illusion:
A useless kissing ball filled with cotton mouths,
And the throbbing heartstrings of
My misinformed delusion.

Robert Rorabeck

My Most Cherished Of Things

Trailer in the underbrush where the little children play,
River just as rusting filled with the old cars of dreams:
And this isn't the city,
This is every emollition underneath the thunderbird's
Wings:
This is the windbag of winos courting alligators in a park
That has sawed off and is un congratulatory even amidst
The hurricanes;
And Diana, here I love her while the snakes sing:
They coil from the jungle gym, from the monkey bars:
Fat bears and pleasurable ants in a honey beneath the Slide;
And I have thoughts of her in my eyes: they cast the moon into
The stars and wait for her patiently, and the cars proceed
Back and forth like saints, like housewives in stream,
As I am in the dusky truancy feeling her up into crepuscule
Far into the amusements of my most cherished of things.

Robert Rorabeck

My Most Limpid Star

As I drink my song, I become as immortal as any Cherubic man out on the lamb counting is pearls and swinging his Ham:
That I have escaped from the pallid banks where the ancient
But also most beautiful misconceptions starve:
That I have tied bows over the presents of your body in this world,
Alma,
Is a glistening and special prize that I breathe: even though I have Never counted your years necking with you in the gazebos;
And even if my artwork is flawed,
It still bears your name: and my love is unrequited for you, and we Put our fires together just to blaze to get a better view
Of movies:
And maybe you will bare my child, as I cry out your name through
The drunken windows of the pointless multitudes,
As the landscaping blurs into chicken coops, and then the forest runs
In shaking its naked limbs,
And we sit for awhile on the promenades of my high schools and colleges
Where you have never been- you then are coloring in the gaps of
So many séances that I had gathered searching for you;
And you have become my brightest student, and my most Limpid star.

Robert Rorabeck

My Most Unrequited Of Graves

Teaching him again into your bed, but I bet he doesn't Know all of your secrets:
He left you for Mexico, but look here he is again,
Like a zoetrope, or the uncanny life in Pinocchio:
And he gave you a daughter just so you and him could Survive,
But I still see the fires for me burning in your eyes,
Like the playthings of your soul who don't know who they
Are,
Leaping as sacrifices for my body alone:
And I buy you so many gifts just so you might remember me:
I have neither gun, but I am still your sheriff,
And when you go to sleep I want you to feel the bight of Sharp spindles off my symphony:
Because I live by you, as is my right; as I wish to die by you,
To have our names gathered together through the forever
Infinite night,
So that our brethren will know what we were meant to be,
Two souls in boxes of dirty symphony:
Alma's nocturnal soul playing uncontained without the need
Of life's illuminations to entertain my most unrequited of Graves.

Robert Rorabeck

My Mother's Middle Name

Purple is the throat of the pagan flowers
Up the Welsh slopes and their darker sisters- where
It rains unevenly for the weeks, and keeps the tourists
Inside- and the kings there wear antlers,
And their baseball diamonds are ten feet underground,
And when the ants crawl up too they are all of Different sizes and made of half hewn stones,
But their sisters are beautiful, tossing their hair
As they come out of the underground trains-
And the foxes that they have there live in the hollows
Of trees and eat figs and smoke pipes:
And when they see her, they have this glint in their eye,
And they are not even scared of the hunt until she Comes to them and bends down with her hand gesturing.
Why, they are so quiet then that anyone can here the Toads ululating all the way from the carports and Wells of the hotel rooms stockpiled with tourists-
And their legends are mute, and their horses are tamed
In fields at the end of bruised cul-de-sacs while
The soft mountains rise up in a chorus that happens to Sing of deer with antlers soft enough to fall
Asleep under- and the sleepers remain there,
Weeping, as the world that they lay under wakes up
And moves on, with fireworks as quiet as maybe Pickpocketed across the banks of a river named after
My mother's middle name.

Robert Rorabeck

My Muse

They get married in their Winnebago's
And drive looking across the pumpkin fields:
In the sublime sunlight of the Midwest
They open up the buttons of Their chests- and they drive through the golden
Maize, never thinking of what lies beneath them in a daze:
All of Mexico and her butterflies
Stripped naked for the forked tongues of serpents
And the yellow gold- browned skinned goddesses just Doing what they were told
While I loved you waltzing in a catastrophic promenade,
And her virtues splintered outwards from the church
Of her inner church- and, yes, she became
The anatomy of my soul;
As she walked across the embers of my old high school,
The waves gossiping enviously
Knowing that they were not as beautiful as she was- my muse.

Robert Rorabeck

My Muse And Silver Airplanes

Feelings in the falseness of these Bodies fills up a room,
Giving us the same diction as her elbows
And putting us at angles
To us all:
When outside, where the housewives
Are basking like wet paint,
What should we find in glades of their retinue:
The trophies of their day long obsessions,
Their yard men happy to please them,
Or the firecrackers of truants:
Or my fingers spread in yours, the higher hand
Of a card game,
The easy cradle for my birds- off in the soft
Woods,
Speaking different tongues- silent caresses
In the sunshine or her cousin rains-
Opulence- and blades of grass-
My muse and silver airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

My Muse's Beautifully Scabbed Knees

Ashes of a forest fire sparked by paper airplanes Down through the secret mills and Cotton gins,
Clouding the eyes of unicorns and tornados.
Or the different ways to spell for her,
While alligators lay sunbathing on the patio, prematurely the Happenstances of death:
They wait for the long boys to get out of school and Spark fireworks that tear up a suburban sky,
And they masturbate,
Or anyways they make love:
And they go down from this while the stewardesses don't Even wave goodbye-
And it gets plain as day- that they are ready to leave,
Even though the bones are dancing
And dinners are served through the housewives like Waves, breaking again their patios for their husbands:
And they do this in rows like spectators,
Long after the flea markets and ferris wheels are closed-
Closed,
And the dogs lay scratching at fleas, and I lay on my floor
And look up at my muse's beautifully scabbed knees.

Robert Rorabeck

My Other Sad Psalm

I've been waiting for the soar throats of song birds to End,
For the bath to fill, and for you to get naked;
I have been waiting for myself to grow beautiful and big Muscled along the oracular streets of Saint Augustine;
And I am learning Karate and watching my aunt cut up like Star fish into so many sisters:
I have been defending myself and supposing up children
So they too can spend most of their times in their
Graveyards,
Never forgiving all of the hallucinations which have left them:
The cars and blimps and Eskimos:
I am trying to perfect my weaponry to pierce your breast
To bring you wounded home to me,
To suckle and warm like a coral snake upon my chest:
All of these bitter words like orphaned children waiting for a
Home,
Only because her womb was already wrecked and the night was too
Cold to cut paper snowflakes to put on another act
To perform my other sad psalm.

Robert Rorabeck

My Parents' Horses

My parents' horses feed in the sky: they are big enough
To devour the largest fire in Arizona's history,
Or to feed from the hand of a god
That knows all about them, and keeps them in his Petty zoo that I do not believe him, while I sit
On my thinking rock at the end of the bluff and count
The insouciant traffic, so far and so distant
From West Palm Beach: the sky has her own palette
Here I am sure that you do not know- and the fossils
Lay beneath her like chalk-
And when the moon comes out, the horses are yet
There feeding,
But they cannot imagine that the light that they eat
Is not even hers to give.

Robert Rorabeck

My Pessimistic Expectations

Empty and alone under a big White tent in South Florida.
I could be shot any time,
In the back while being alone,
Which is significantly better than raising
A house of embittered family,
When thought about and realized that's
The way it always works:
Bicycles always rust,
Cut flowers die, and eventually she drives
Away into other skinny dives
When you thought she might be pulling
Into her driveway:
And I don't know, but the traffic is so
Plenteous and every car too is so afraid to Die:
None of them swim upstream to deposit
Their roe way up in the skyscraping backs of Her youngest god:
Maybe they think she will turn off them,
Maybe they think that they don't have a chance,
But whatever it is they keep low and well
Fed coming and going through the required hours,
And she lays off of them,
And takes pictures of herself in Colorado
And hangs paper snowflakes from the clouds
As she dabs her lips on her husband's Neophyte cliff: he doesn't know what he is doing,
But unlike the traffic,
He has no reason to be afraid,
For she is gathering over him even now,
As she is happily crying in the tiny glacial lakes
Which crown
A happy home so far away from the skittish traffic
Of my pessimistic expectations.

Robert Rorabeck

My Pitiful Earth

In the morning there are still roses,
After the sororities have yawned,
And the mists are leaving raising like stupid flags
Above the elderberries and cockleburs:
And it makes me wonder how Sharon got up,
And how close to high school she used to live.
I used to imagine she was very poor and just moved into
To be a neighbor of affluence,
But I don't know: Who am I to say,
And she has gone a long, long way along her separate way;
But the woods here are still all the same:
Little saplings awakened bright eyed and singing,
And she kissed them into an even bigger being-
And somewhere over her shoulder where she has cut her hair
Like a badge,
Like a silky otter, the traffic is flowing-kidnappers and murder,
Away and back again;
And I suppose she doesn't care. She is so beautiful anyways-
She just lets them all take her children for the day:
Sharon, Sharon what are you doing?
Won't you go on the rides with me? There are so many ways
To go about disproving,
The color of your eyes are disguised to me; and what am I doing,
But I can see you there right out perfumed before my Aroused senses, complimenting your leggy extensions:
You are flipping over a thousand times impervious to the expenditures
Of this earth-
The way you go about pretending you care about the boys
Who are dying, it really makes me laugh:
You know you are as tremendous as the sparks of immortal fireworks;
I wonder even now what you might be doing,
Combing your conspicuous tresses, floating so easily above
My pitiful earth.

Robert Rorabeck

My Poem To Her

Oh merrily we drink to rhyme
And in the sad courts to waste our time:
Singing our shanties red-nosed
Akimbo,
Down in the shanties of the legless assemblage:
She says you love her with a wink,
But all you say to her is
Drink, drink, drink:
Because if she was with you then she'd Sing, like a bird stuffed in a cage
Weeping-
Then you'd have to kick her out,
Manhandle her tresses, sock her pout
Until, trill and lined like a fish won for a game,
All you'd garner from her would be
Shame, shame, shame;
Because, her body is beautiful, scarless and Young,
And what she does she is free to do it with Ten fingers and tongue, tongue, tongue:
This is just a job anyways,
And I can do it with wink;
And just as easily reflect to the sky,
And swinging my good arm, sloshing my beer
Calling her the same as my other old deer;
For my rhyme has no favorites, no flight plans tonight,
She might as well be a leggy stewardess on a
Early morning red-eyed flight;
And just the same as the girls on their bicycles of Game, I'll rhyme her with a wink,
And end my poem to her with
Drink, drink, drink.

Robert Rorabeck

My Poetic Airplanes

We are always on the job
And there is nothing worth crying about:
That we don't know the names
Of more expensive flowers,
Made by scientists out of the dead body parts
Of our wishes
Into sweet and caring monsters who should Have never existed,
And find their love all alone in the cold places
The furthest away from Sunlight you can get on this leapy blue earth,
Or grow on the underside of leapy blue airplanes,
Like old fashioned barnacles
Upon a galleons birth:
And there's girls I love who aren't worth mentioning,
And I sent out my doves
But they all were eaten by hungry mothers
Other than whom I have no social obligations:
Their adopted wombs,
Their erogenous sensations like the she wolf who Made every darn thing:
She has gone back to the boreal swing, under the moonlight
That doesn't exist,
Which is the strangest of things, because her moon is Still there:
And I just want an apartment, and a woman for a year
To ruin my life again forever after,
To help me disappear, like a circular foundling,
Like the wild flowers who don't have a name
Which I have greedily sowed well under the naked bellies
Of my poetic airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

My Poor Muse's Sister

Last of the populations in the snows,
Wearing the last of her feathers:
The mountain, a breast—in her weathers
and pussywillows—
My dogs get lost in the heat of her summit:
Two brothers, German Shepherds:
We find them the next morning, they come
Leaping, so glad to find us again,
So we can carry them off: I guess neither one
Of them weighs eighty pounds:
Eventually, one disappeared, and the other
We had to put down:
And last year, selling fireworks, the entire
Garden of Mount Escudilla burned:
I fell in love with a Mexican girl, but very Little was returned—
What joy that shown from my soul was not Enough to dissuade her from her husband who
Used to beat her—So, eventually, I caught a plane to Shanghai, in an effort to forget her:
And the mountain still stands, but she is full of Ghosts—and from her towers—her aeries—
She can still see all the across the rivers and into Mexico, where my poor muse's sister is still laughing.

Robert Rorabeck

My Prayer Book

The camera focuses on the pretty thing-
It always does, even when the author is promoting His book,
And in the theatre you can find me kissing her
With rum on my lips,
As the dog is hyperventilating back on my bed,
My lonely bed I have slept on alone for nearly half
A decade now,
But it is unfathomable to consider I am not a superhero,
And can't make flying suits out of tin
And pilgrimages of spit:
Instead, she sends out mass emails pleading with Strangers to help her strange lover to transcend
And become a staple of pop culture,
And the roaring crowd surrounding the rich clay
Shapes of the baseball diamond:
So I gladly vote for them to make love fully aware
That there were no rock stars in ancient Greece,
But hemlock and the zygotes of philosophy,
And the traces of my DNA populating the tragedy of
The rainy theatre, like weeds creeping about in the cracks
Of the marble busts:
And I have strange daydreams in the middle of summer
Movies: That I will become discovered and easy,
As we are all in the middle of the cemetery, even though
There isn't much of the presence of death,
And maybe I am still getting published, which will,
After I have paid for the doe eyed girl's drinks, get me a Flash of Botichelli breasts, and the anthem of high school Athletes. In the dark, unidentified girls choose to sit Next to me, and I am pleased for whatever reason,
Though I can't help but contemplate her lips pecking his Chest, diving in little wet sips the way hummingbirds
Divine their daylight meals:
When she goes to his orchestra to worship after silence.
Now I will rhyme, because I am weak: Nothing is real,
And, strange enough, it snowed all day in Northeast Arizona:
Caked the roof of my car given to me my professor grandfather,
March 22nd, and in less than a week my mother will be

Turning fifty-one, or fifty-two, but older, older,
As the sun goes round again, like the earth's manager checking
To make sure nothing is stolen, and that not too many two year
Olds have died from plagues,
And still most major poets are homosexual:
Ginsberg,
Rimbaud,
Lorca,
Nerduda too (but not Micheline or Bukowski- Oh, no, never,
Though from time to time I have seen them
Slapping the faces of my imagination)
And there is a picture of Jesus on the thick door in
The noisy abbey,
But I cannot help still liking leggy women, particularly
One:
She knows who she is, and doesn't care,
Because she has someone fully engorged in her mouth,
To the tune of mortalities:
And I can't blame her for her disinterest in my scarred
Presocratic erections, far away across the populating sphere,
For we have never rode a roller coaster together screaming,
Melancholy fills the mind when I see kings,
And they will not remember me,
Because I am alone on my mountain with my dogs,
And their lives are short, just a decade, maybe two,
And then the great day will come when we will
All be contemporary facing forever east,
With little epitaphs carved by unidentified men
Who have made their career out of painting lies
For the inevitable deaths of all-
The greater and lesser men,
And the anonymous men who have no category,
But a word or two paid by entrepreneurial fathers to Sell the riches out from under her forgetful seas.

Robert Rorabeck

My Religion Of Many Saturnine Fables

I drink to my religion of many saturnine
Fables,
In the architectures of woebegone galaxies sung
By the eagles in their patriotic
Aeries,
High up in the clouds of yesterday, and those Green summits
Whose august cradles the birds sing in
And making love;
And in which I find you waking up with me,
Your eyes the Bosque of brown butterflies,
Your body a religious symbol all folded up like
A kite asleep;
And we don't have to do anything, but turn into
One another, the way our mammalian gravities
Are attracting
To kiss and to sing.

Robert Rorabeck

My Remaining Breaths

The rum is an anesthetic; it is also a truth serum:
I took two Guatemelan boys past my yellow cottage today:
We swam in a car down concrete rivers:
I have the Virgin of Guadalupe on my back window
Instead of my state university,
Even though I have a master's degree: It is better this way,
To buy houses with coquina fireplaces,
To cram oneself into little rooms again that are as good as A century old,
Because those places have experienced so many moons,
And the earsplitting pleasures of bobcats
And heavy machineries:
Now today is Easter, or at least it will be this Sunday:
And the church girls will drive out to churches,
And the grave girls will drive out to graves:
Just as the honey girls will lead the cheers and the bust nudely into
The aperies of migratory apartments;
And I will have to think of her in this way just so I Don't have to cry,
As she slips out of her surplices and gives her time to the corduroy Gentlemen who have as little moisture in them as
The sponges in the tidelands;
And I will dream of her slipping like sleek boats through Watered down jungles, but only her eyes will brush pass me fawning
Like hair-lit moons,
Like places that have stolen their light from their parents or other Burning guardians;
And she will go buy me light footed or winged: Then she will Be gone, though I will not be able to stop thinking about her while
I draw my remaining breaths.

Robert Rorabeck

My Reptilian And Jet Engine Way

I keep moving without moving:
I keep tramping without song, and some folk call me beautiful Underneath the dark tresses of the Night so young,
And I haven't been doing anything that hasn't been figured out,
Like softly molested fingers pressing through the Youngish earth of graveyards,
Like dragons who have just learned how to fly:
And Alma is going back to school, and she is the brightest barb
Burning before my eyes,
While the captains sing out their next play,
And the ghosts keep their cities in the rubble above the brilliant
Though pigmy city randy along the outlines of the Pagan bay;
And it has not been so long since I have felt her blood seep like Rich minerals, and pregnant, like red caves along the phallus of My charge,
While Alma asked me today if it had really been five years since
My last love,
And I said yes, but did not go on to say that it was even longer,
While witches send their curses across the soft deltas of the Bobbing airplanes;
And if she doesn't know what is real, then I will not bother her:
I will just suck her name between my teeth like the suicides
Of virgins,
Or something else that I have no business describing, before
I go on along my reptilian and jet engine way.

Robert Rorabeck

My Resting Body

Now the city really burns in its pageantry of clouds
And I just thought of that and wrote it down,
Like words in a library underground of my skull, while the kids
Go skipping down their pubescent halls,
And I am still wishing that I could have given up its all:
The seat on the bus like the ticket inside a coward;
The pretty girls munching like narcissistic cannibals inside the cheeks
Of their own flesh;
And I wanting to get it right all of the time, and becoming a weaker
Creature all of the time because of the air-conditioning,
And the cars parked in rows like imperfect diamonds:
Like the teachers sitting at their desks, their minds and bodies wrecked
And on the doll,
So it should please me to say all of this, lounging in a stroll of my forests
Of slash and pitch-forks,
While the girls come up to me like curious fish, bodies shrunken into the Fruit of their poles,
And the traffic goes by forever lushly,
Like these words spilled ever outwards from the drunken glasses of my Quieted lips and my resting body.

Robert Rorabeck

My Room Is Transitory

Green light flecks and splits
Like the wings of a swan through the crooks
Of a lime tree.
Joe was born in Holland and his father farmed
Pale celery in the upper muck bottoms
Of Michigan.
Tomorrow is thanksgiving and we're getting in
A load of Christmas trees.
I will think of you,
While the steady hands of the sun hold my face
Up for the inspection of
So many harmless eyes;
And I will think of you,
And then at night when my mechanism is unwinding
I will find new ways to be untrue to the unhappy
Empiricisms required
From this insurmountable fleet of tourists,
Because I understand that my room
Is transitory,
But if I want to move on, all I need is you.

Robert Rorabeck

My Scarred Yet Truesome Eye

If you havent been Able to make it
Past
Your progenitor's
Inch worm projects,
Go ahead
And stick it
To the man,
Lay and
Bask in the sand,
Buy a cheap
Kite,
Let it tug your hand
And watch it turn into A Chinese high school's
Metamorphosis:
I know you want it to,
Without any obligations
To ever have
To lie
While smiling again into
My scarred yet true some eye.

Robert Rorabeck

My Son, A Puppet

The time stopped clocking the avenues
And the crocodiles looked up smiling the Entrails of one-armed Pirates:
Little birds and angels in the sky seemed
To say, or at least portend,
That tomorrow was another school day,
And the juvenile echoes got Brighter and brighter without end:
With beautiful pages outside of their Habitats and adventures to go on we Do not know the names of—
She has off and left us,
Stewardess emolliated with the angels—
Very impressive.
And my wife sleeps. The dog is finally Off of his fours—
A child is about to go outside of
The tomb to see the bright day after
The movie has ended—
My son, a puppet leaving his cage
To hold my hand.

Robert Rorabeck

My Song Of Songs

Songs in the long windswept suburbia of empty tombs:
Now you know exactly where I am, without reading this,
Where my mind is bubbling like
Unhealthy cauldrons, like purple bubble gum bubbles:
And the buses turn around like the custard of Frightened ballerinas:
They are returning their sweet children home;
And I am over thirty and drinking rum.
The sky is so cerulean that looking up at it, and trying to Believe,
Why then most of the time I don't really want to die;
But when it gets late enough, and everything slows down,
Then I touch myself and think of ancient professors and Snow skis,
And my next drink;
And my time is mixed up between my two or three muses:
Those who last within my like oracular candles,
And then the ladies of the moment who are always Circulating in me like wind vanes, like the dancing Euripides;
And so, I don't have to drink alone,
Even though I am always alone:
And these things come and do the cancan; it's what they're good
For, and my eyes mow the yard of another house wife
Without even having to be asked; it's just what they do,
But they still aren't good at math; and that old high school just Keeps on going on and on,
While old lovers continue their new songs with their Precipitous law makers;
And I just keep singing my song of songs.

Robert Rorabeck

My Spouse

She is already yours: and you can dream for awhile that this Remains here:

But you have made progress:

Like tourists going high up into the ice cream shops of Colorado with their just as many children,
The marvelous wind chimes echoing them like the lost
Children of Peter Pan:

You can go in anyways and flex your muscles, but it is the only thing
She can still hear:

Warmed to the muzzle, as Heidi bites her teeth and learns her first
Words:

You are making progress and catching the sunlight winnowing over
The hopscotch of your penultimate grave:

While the clairvoyant boys from Guatemala count their lucky eggs before They're

Hatched, and the thief and his liar fly their kites above the Flea markets of their over pass;

But it always has to end like this: it does: it's true; and

Yvette certainly does have to be my sister in law, because I have been Ultimately respectful to alma and all of her rules;

While her soul and all of her names fire like bees keeping kindled in An apiary in a forest fire in the downtowns before the sea

Even before I bought my house; and now I am lonely,

But before long now I recollect that Alma- Alma will certainly have to be My spouse.

Robert Rorabeck

My Stalwart Metamorphosis

Up in the apex of a Ferris Wheel,
Looking down at where you live: going nowhere, turning
Around,
Like a tear falling on your roof to sleep,
While my dog sleeps alone, and my house is the woods,
And it feels good to be going towards you-
Like foot traffic to Mexico, Alma; because if I am broken
Stained glass, you are my muse;
And the city accosts you, for to it you are the harem of its Wilderness,
And you are blowing kisses of weather fronts, pushing away
The invading armadas,
And flexing your strength, bowing trees like your body,
A brown stem wetting in my bed: good for starting fires:
Snakes crossing the highway of your abdomen,
Fireworks on holidays where neither of us belong;
And then you are going home,
Across the railroad tracks- to other constellations, to that Family I do not know, like foreign gods with hungry veins,
Stealing into the coops
Of my stalwart metamorphosis.

Robert Rorabeck

My Town

In the rainstorm the trigger is cooling: The hand is Letting off,
The barrel of the transom is smoking; something has been Done.
Green is gone, and I've dropped off everything at the Library and come unwound:
I sit and lie and take refuge: I remember the Pledge of Allegiance,
Alligators must remember everything, since they Have not changed forever;
And I wonder how the birds survive while the sky is Coming down,
Or maybe that is just a rumor. Maybe you are still here,
And have not packed up and left with everything of My town.

Robert Rorabeck

My Unspoken For Friends

The nights tend to display for me each sorry number:
And it would feel to me so much better to be all down
Bellow,
All in body and all in slow, sleeping in the six foot slumber
Of the grave in the strata of graveyards that we all should Know:
While bodies emolliate, while driver's slow,
To look up at the delusions of wishes in the snowless show:
Each single light something that should never Have existed:
Alma, you will be kissing his lips, while I should be sleeping
In the newly plowed dirt, waiting for the kiss of another
Evil enemy defeated by your heroes,
To awaken jubilant and jingoistic with so many of my Unspoken for friends.

Robert Rorabeck

My Useless Senses

What have I finally done wrong
Muse of shells and hourglasses- how will finally Fill up again after the rain,
As the weather come down again
Kissing the skirts of airplanes- the rivers
Who ribbon the earth and touch all of her planes,
Will lie in their basins and protect their mud:
If I ever see you again, I am afraid it will Do neither of us any good:
For the night of our predestined architecture has Past away with the summer- carnival of our Spent offerings did not bear any children-
And I had no friends to share your honey-
So go along now with your poisonous butterflies,
Your bearded ladies and your lion
Tamers- I will not see you when you leave
For you've taken all of my vision from me:
I have placed all of my lights outside the yard,
And given your brown stems my useless
Senses to take away.

Robert Rorabeck

My Usual Catastrophe

In the four wheeled folly of meandering
Bric-a-brac we keep our common destination to Ourselves:
Housewives who are even now looking at me
Don't see how much trouble I am in: How they might Save me with their own casual intimacy
With their ravishing souls sunbathing in their Soft eyes:
How you could save me if you had a sweet tooth for
A dysfunctional starfish who knew we were
All just animals,
And even that was happening too quickly to happen
Like sweet omelets frying in a pan of flash bang,
With the most callous beauty foaming to the top
Like the snideness of waves:
They suppose they are angels, but the gravity has them
So well pressed that they might as well hope to Be winged ants:
And once everything really gets going its one fiery shift
Into the next crimson ruby:
You were born in July, and you are the most burnished of
All the animals petal smashed on the highway,
And I don't want to spend another night without you,
But I will, won't I: and this is my most usual catastrophe.

Robert Rorabeck

My Vagabonding Heart

As dear as the monuments that once climbed
Up to look into your window,
I see you bathing as a little girl, as you put green on Your body,
And the butterflies gasp their melodies, and then go onto you
To stamp in suicide
Across that brown architecture that travels everywhere beside Your best man:
Maybe even once he breathed beside you in the dun valleys of Kindergarten,
And that is why you are so far into love that I cannot understand that you have tattooed that way,
And the roads curl around you like bouquets of water snakes,
And the sky turns up on its own and weeps over your bedroom,
Over which, Alma, my vagabonding heart drunken tramps,
And quakes.

Robert Rorabeck

My Vanishing And Beautiful Bay

To the bodies who enjambment in spice and rigmarole:
And to the parasols that never open up even in the rain:
These are the emptied sidewalks of my adolescents to which I
Have to complain
Of my love to Alma, of my sweetly alcoholic and contemplative
Art:
That I have ejaculated into empty parks near the high schools
Of my first loves and their moribund dinner prints;
And never any of it was ever resolved,
As if I were Frank O'Hara, as if I were really gay: and her legs parted
Like a tennis courts of the red seas and that was all that there
Was to say;
But maybe you will be coming over again tomorrow and maybe we will Be making love,
Because I really love you, Alma; and even though I wish to marry you,
All I have is song;
And you can never be my housewife, Alma:
All you can be is my conqueror- all you can be, finally, is the emptiness
Of sunset of my vanishing and beautiful bay.

Robert Rorabeck

My Version Of The Cartography Of Your Heavens

I contemplate for a second how beautiful
You are; I sneak into empty movie theatres
To see its true;
I masticate on the rinds of an imperishable world-
I do all these things that are left better misunderstood,
And your cities are the quiet place s kept
On hooks,
And nothing is told my your lips that can't
Be promised;
And I'm doing it again tonight, failing in my Anonymous way, my version of the cartography of Your heavens;
I've finally dropped out of school and tight-roped
Across the canal to figure out what is real.
I am having real liquor to perform this feat. I am Writing so quickly,
Hoping that they will call me Henry when I am dead,
And resurrect everything that was never appreciated
In spindling monuments- They can just be clouds
As long as they hold your breath,
And I can continue alluding to you forever from the Grave.

Robert Rorabeck

My Very Own Alma

At the moment of existence, drunkenness- and all of the lights
Bleeding away,
Queasily, like in an office of newborns and coral snakes:
And then I get into her car- Alma's car- and I see the child seat
In the back seat, and if I look into the mirror, I would See all of my scars- and it seems like a novel I've already written;
But it seems miles away,
As if I were reaching up to feel the purring beliefs of airplanes:
They pregnant themselves with the dreams of stewardesses,
And the weathers hard and really rotten over the stately campuses of Our America:
And I myself dreaming of doing good art, and trying to pull it up
Like new found preciousness from the gardens of scree,
With the lighthouse at the summit calling down:
As if I could see her naked in her boudoir kissing the donkeys of
The three wise men, bare-chested and expecting me:
As she made love in Mexico and then grew tantalizing wings just Before me; and then wretched herself from my soul:
As if a songbird making a jailbreak from my ribcage: and then nothing Else to do, but stagger and starve on my old blood, as my very own
Alma flew away.

Robert Rorabeck

My Very Own Heart

The belly of a cathedral hung over with the winos of My hermitage:
Remembering the last cause of the knights to crusade, and Sauntering into exhaustion,
To bed with harlots, to get tattoos somewhere no descript
Along the greasy road:
The toads were ululating, transforming the tadpoles
From the early breakfast of blue gills:
The little girls across the canal were paper, paper,
With wet lips, with eyes of grapes stolen from foxes,
Tantalizing like my muses from Mexico-
Airplanes were berets in their hair.
Their hair was the sugarcane emolliate- the scars on her
Brown cheeks
The panthers and key deer in a zoetrope that stole my very own
Heart.

Robert Rorabeck

My Wishes That Will Soon Be Gone

I am not here and yet
I am not very there: perhaps I am not anywhere,
But the traffic rolls and the relatives
Come to visit relatives
Under the seeking planes- under the juju bees,
And the sad tips of weeping mountains:
I am there, or I am not:
I am vanished like a fortress, or a swing-set:
Alma, or a forget me not:
And I could very well smell you right there
Today
Even though you were gone,
Like the airplanes that touched down from here
Were swept away into the sky:
Oh, Alma: they were gone; they had migrated like
A baseball game,
Even though my mouth was so wet, and there was all
Of these opposing sex of my species growing up so young and Springy in the grasses;
And maybe all of this is of your song, Alma,
Because I told you that I was a gringo, and I only had need
For the rhythm of one beating of one heart, Alma,
And that is your heart,
Even if I am woebegone, even if you sleep beside the man you
Love;
It is still only the one rhythm of your beating heart that I kill myself
Over,
And upon which I blow my wishes that I will soon be gone.

Robert Rorabeck

My Word

I am trying to weave a
Finely glowing net for you,
To catch you as you swim by
As you stare up from the Milky waters your emerald
Looks giving me the evil eye,
But I will drag you up
And let you breathe....
I will teach you how to speak
And I will set you free,
Because there is almost no
More time for us,
Gas and travel are Getting so expensive
And running alone is
No good for you....
So, here I am searching
In my little boat,
As icebergs groan and creak
All in these waters
Like drowning gods frozen
By the infinite space....
I have brought a bushel
Full of red delicious apples
That I will use to chum
The waters,
To make you want to kiss.
Then I will pull you
Up and show you a new world,
I will teach you how to walk,
And the first word out of your Lips, as they taste the new day's Fine young oxygen,
Will be mine....

Robert Rorabeck

Myself

Overgrown with careworn tundra,
The sky is yet friendly after holocaust the way
Mountains pretend to be beautiful in their Apathy
Like a woman bathing forever, taking her time;
So many summits of knees and bosom
To reach a place that cannot mend, dredged by Ancient allusion
So busied by tourists searching out new trinkets
From her quarry;
Each claiming to be the next best artist of her
Topiary's garden;
And when she rises the end of the world in a balmy
Night as she slides into something wonderful
And saunters off like a galaxy of symmetrical Avenues to become again against
The only man she has waiting for her in bed
Until the night shutters in a garden full of purposeful flowers she Would not allow me to give her myself.

Robert Rorabeck

Naked And Inspective

Wrecked in the fjords of green presents-
Diademed by the dead skin of dragon flies and their Long forked tails-
The homeless knights, beards unshaven- are always Sleeping,
Where the fattest wildflowers would grow,
If there was ever any light: it gets so much tears,
And we set up our tables
To sell the most humblest of things to the patrons
Who are not there
Anyways- Evaporated into the exegisis of Sunlight- Now their wings are spread- and they Are the voyeurs of fairytales where they are not Pretty enough to Belong- and we sing to them, our wounds cleverly
Arranged- we seem to be playing ourselves:
Until we are done,
And hanging on a cornice the blue eyed women spy
And come around us naked and inspective.

Robert Rorabeck

Naked And Planning New Retreats

Like the pamphlets read,
A memorable ibis in the home of
The dogs,
And now even the houses move,
Following the housewives after
The storm of their leaving—
Following them across the canals
And into the fairy tales' neighborhoods—
Awakened, a little boy amidst
The rattle snakes congregating on his Front lawn—
From the ocean, pearls—
Up in the sky, opalescent, laying down
The censures of time—
Did they see her leaving, or did
They look the other way?
After all, no one returns from high school—
Not in their right mind,
But she is over the ocean now—
Beautiful, naked and planning new Retreats.

Robert Rorabeck

Naked Eros

If there is somewhere a wheelbarrow as red as naked
Eros,
Filled with cut flowers bought where they also sell bread
And Lipstick;
And if there are hands, even if wearied-
Weather-locked hands of a grandmother or one of Her many daughters- twins -
To take all the sad flowers up to boot hill to put on the grave
With rag and polish for the stone;
Even in the eye of a hurricane, or on a weekday afternoon
While truants are flipping arcs on the green,
And talk shows run gabbing through many a lonely living
Room,
And furtive husbands come home with baseball bats of liquor,
After they have spilled so much rum on the red diamond.
Now there is only a coyote loping into the mist,
Unafraid of his own name, smelling under the bleachers the salts
Of snacks and sex,
And the memories up on the hill whipping like prayer flags,
Then what need is there for these words,
What need is there for words at all?

Robert Rorabeck

Naked Narcissus

If I put my pen to you and scrawl,
Longingly like a pining god, would I bring Reason to you, or the thoughtfulness of a pacaderm,
Or only mar the flesh;
But if I do it, let me come at night and think
Beneath your clothes, and line up syllables denoting
Seasons like a military parade,
For I am fearful of other lovers, Caesars and languid
Matadors, men whose tongues must extrude
The fermentations of European seas, the homelessness
Of vagabonds of Paris, the tragic sensuality of the Greek,
And when I was away doing my patriotic duty,
Laid down in your sylvan sheets, you take them to Your secrets and put their francophone tongues
On your belly in invisible romance, their musk extrudes
From their vine, veins like either pollen or hypnosis,
So upon returning, if I lie with you and by flashlight
Scrawl my hard-won jaunts beneath your breasts,
Above your navel, while you giggle and delight spontaneously
With me like any other, and upon daylight returning
To your other woman, a work or a study, and let your Eyes linger on the casualness of convenient opposition of My sex, content yourself to know I am as your narcissus,
Interested only in the words I might find fluttering that day,
To capture and pin in lines along her inner thigh
So proudly and unsuspecting....

Robert Rorabeck

Naked Rains

Naked rains on Saturday:
We don't work. We look at her,
Chartreuse or persimmon
Without skin, or sad on the Linoleum. A pagan for every man,
How she hunts, and I can say no more,
But that she is there beneath stucco
Banisters, and the mirages of ceiling
Fans; On Sundays a pigskin
Pressed to her nipple, her eyes wide
Open her allure, the pebbles of costume
Jewelry swing against her chest,
Speckled and tugged as if by robins
From within an egg; so they moan,
And she hatches,
The catastrophes of touchdowns,
But I should say no more....

Robert Rorabeck

Named For Another Man

The snake's skin is cast amidst the Night blooming Jasmine along the green chain-link Fence,
Where it must have disrobed sometime last night
After the fairer cars had passed,
And when the entire park was its stilled abode:
Up to the nocturnal blooms it strode,
For a kiss by a creature that buds like flame:
Just like that she kissed me-
My soft skin lay torn on a tangled yesterday-
But she went back to her husband,
Even if he was never home: and lay beside her daughter
Whose ribs were not mine-
Destroyed into the promises of metamorphosis,
I climbed underneath the airplanes that did not wait
For me- She remained, beautiful- named for Another man- not for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Narcoleptic Magics

This time, I am
Going straight to grandmothers:
I mean, I am not cutting out
In the middle of
School—
To join the forest of my knotted sisters:
Who are trying to Metamorphose into a wishing well
Of gold coins—
Of quartz—and topaz—And I will not Go outside, even when I hear strangers passing
In front of my house,
Gossiping of tin men, and straw men,
And lions that yawn fearlessly up to the sky:
I will just go down to the bank of My canal and watch and listen,
And feed the blue gills the bread crumbs of My abandoned lunch—
And when there are shadows spreading over
The emptied pews of bottle rockets
And roman candles—
Perhaps I will hold my own soul in my little Hands for just a little while,
Like some gold fish won as some cheap prize
At a gypsy's fair,
Before it ran away from me, packing up on all
Four legs and striking for the sea—
I know the housewives will say whatever they Want after it has left,
Just as long as they leave me to myself—
And the sunlight creases the abandoned lot
Where the Ferris wheel once danced—
Like a tortoise,
And you once kissed my very neck at its apex:
Over the highway and the strip malls,
Before abandoning how we felt—
And going home to a husband and your children,
The lights of the television flickering in your Otherwise grotto, using its narcoleptic magics

To keep you from imagining who you ever might be.

Robert Rorabeck

Nation Of Used Car Love

If your warm legs were seen by your husband,
How would he spend his time kayaking
On you like the Loxahatchee
River:
I can only smile like a belly of mud to think how he has done
It to you every time for seven happy years or more
In little trailer parks upon the beds of the homely river:
Does it feel differently than the other boys who did it to you before,
To make you feel, your despondent corneas never dilating,
Never turning channels.
The greater monoliths of the sky were never christened after you,
Nor the amusement parks they were created for,
But I think they should have- if you had given me this time,
What a country we would live in:
Beautiful, vibrant, huffing like an entire paratroop of hearty men;
And the turnstiles never evacuating,
The musicals without interruption, the constant pollinations of Joyful traffic, and the little boys flying around and fornicating
With the hi-jinx of their bicycle sports-
The greenness of limpid unicorns you've never experienced
The new car smell of my thorax and a-jax.
We could drink to your children of both atmospheres,
And all the sixteen forbidden seas. Didn't I say that I knew your shadow
Was more precious than the legs of every lathering ibex;
But you just fell in love with a coworker, as they say that they Always do; and that is your nation of used-car love.

Robert Rorabeck

National Feeling

Open yellow branches inside the yellow
Sun—I don't know why it feels so good to be feeling
As much as you've told me to feel—
Branches over splaying throughout all of the estuaries:
This is the song of all of those reruns while
Across the open orchards the water moccasins
Fawn—open mouthed—and keeping to their guns:
Their beautiful or chartreuse bellies open as the playgrounds
That here eyes meant to feel—as then there is unto them
A national feeling to her eyes—or another part all Strung out through the echoes—and all of the midgets
Run away and string their clothes into the parks—
Figuring out whatever it was that she was forever meant to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

Natural Disaster

Tenures of rain and all the world a song,
Girls tramping in voices that get deeper but are Never more than shallow:
Seemly reflections in the Pentecostal refinement Underneath windmills which are like
Out of doors ceiling fans: There is no refuge from the Airbuses of her eyes:
This is her drowning revelry, and she has all day to Mouth off:
Cloudy sky her canopied bed, she rises like a nocturne
Punching a face in the middle of its day,
Cutting out a harelip of summer, and giving it all back
To us as some sort of perfectly crucified gift
Run over by joyriding cars: This is what she's had to given Us for our birthdays:
This is what we's gots to make wishes on, and it seems
That it is enough to keep us sucking through our teeth,
Our body the road kill of her deluging palaver:
She curves and it gives us something again to believe in;
She bends like a flag in her angles,
And it is enough to put the children to bed in the middle of A natural disaster.

Robert Rorabeck

Natural Equations

College algebra made me scratch
My head—I had to take it twice,
But after class following the girl in
The miniskirt, I finally understood
What made the mathematicians so Interested—
The ever changing triangle made
By her legs and the sidewalk kept me
Hypnotized, like a moving bridge under
The sun, leading up to the canopied
Summit, the cool underside that threatened
Harlotry's revelations,
The desire of all men to do mathematics
Laid there, the will to add one body plus another,
The indented shape of nature's trap
Swaying in its white cottoned hood,
And her smile not in her eyes but on
Her lips saying it was okay,
She wanted you to look, and to understand
Her through simple additions....

Ever after, when I saw a woman, I Recognized her as nature's beautiful
Numbers and the motions she took, the Strange and enticing algebras she put on
For men—The arc of a woman on a swing-set
In the bright sun, added to it the movement of Her long auburn hair, swaying seemingly chaotic,
But each swish of motion, a new equation impossible
To calculate, unless she let her hairs splay in Your hand, to catch sunlight through,
Then you would know the solution, which
Was her lips multiplied on yours'.....

A woman swimming in the ocean near shore,
Her body becomes a point from which a line can be Drawn through the plane of crashing surf, as if she Was swimming about in an attempt to distinguish Right from wrong, and when she steps out and

Disrobes from the sea into the sunlight's true shower,
She becomes the first mathematical
Proof to which your eyes can comprehend the universe,

So when I returned for my second attempt at College algebra, I wetted the tip of my pencil on My tongue and set to work
Putting to paper all that I had found out;
Woman was the answer
To all the equations, simple and true—
The professor, an understanding bachelor in his 50s gave me a respectable B, because he granted
I had found the first universal solution,
The sad and hungry desire, to all of Humanity's mathematics.

Robert Rorabeck

Nearer And Then Farther Away

Long avenue that is the serpent of our history,
We live in trailer parks that do not exist
And drink beer beneath the deer antlers—and go outside
In the rainstorms for a piss—
And I have loved my women here—browned skinned
Daisies continuing up into the stars:
Goldilock's who do not know whenever they will Be getting home—
And love that disappears into the insouciant of nocturnal
Bars:
Feelings in the rhythms of my glass—another way to go
Home before I sleep—
Terrapin and hobos sleeping beneath the overpass—
Soft whispers against her absent minded cheek—
The lactations of a world that moves so far away from here—
Crystal clear rivers bleeding from an ocean
That rushes nearer and then farther away from her.

Robert Rorabeck

Nebula's Lasting Wish

I don't know how to Hold back.
As soon as I wake up
I use up all my batteries.
I shoot all the arrows from
My quiver into her heart at once,
But she is still standing.
I take up the rosy mountain
With it's rainy fedora on My shoulders
And place it on her doorstep,
So she can step outside
And go skiing.
I swallow the oceans
And all the seas
To fill up her vases, and Then I hold up the Netherlands at gunpoint,
To steal every last one of Their flowers, which I present
To her with a box of chocolates.
I swat down airplanes and Nearby planets I string together
With the guts of comets to Make a mobile I hang over her
Bed, to put her to peaceful sleep.
I pull up the skin of the earth
For a blanket to keep her warm
From November to February.
When I wake up,
I have mighty great strength,
But I don't know how to hold
Back for her.
As soon as I wake up
I use up all I have on her,
Until my gravitational field
Becomes weak, my electrons escape,
And I come apart in a fiery nebula
That watches over her helpless

To do more for her all of her days,
Except that I can shine down through
Her window at night,
And she can read for as long as she Wishes by my dying light.

Robert Rorabeck

Neighboring Heavens

Little heart palpitating onto the stone, lathering
In a daydream outside of the movie theatre that doesn't
Exist anymore:
But pale heart, exercised from the chariot of a good
Body,
Plagiarized for the ants in the grasses, with the azure
Easter eggs,
The snakes with gaudy mouths coming around
Sometime after the nurseries,
And laying there smiling, like one long silver bone
Underneath the moon,
Stealing things from a nest of earth, as she does
The same to the neighboring heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Neither Handsome Nor Romantic

So you have a pool
And you pay your dues to the gated community:
I have three dogs
And all my teeth and scars;
I can slip in anytime I want and slap my scarred
Belly and smear your beautiful crenulations
While you and your lawful others snore:
I can proclaim to the sky,
And all that is my natural habitat revealed with The saber-toothed alligators when the lightning
Flashes:
I can sell my things, and keep on waiting to be Published;
I can fish all night on the Lake Worth Pier,
Because I've been thinking all day long that I am
Frightened but insouciant;
I haven't bought new clothes in ten years,
So I doubt I'll be able to eat under the ambience of Your phosphorescent dress codes, dear;
But I am hung over, and in general I appeal to Lucifer
While the rocks are gossiping atop the Highest spurs of our America; I don't believe you've Ever made it that far,
Where the dogs are scratching in the snow,
Drunken the goblet of Vampires? No;
But I'll let them in to creep in a silent chorus line
Long toothed, hungry for you- sheep;
I almost failed high school, because I constructed a swing-
Set in my tomb, and all day long arced in it
Like a censer in a silken loom- And I remember Stealing your bicycle, and riding it between Chaucer and
The South of France,
Down in the humid belly of Florida where the professors
Danced;
And now you are husbanded in your jocular curfews;
You don't remember the scheme that I planted with you-
It's like as if I was always told, I'm only 1/64 Jew,
And too you it means nothing- the night is askance,
Abrupt and unromantic- I can see you highlighted in the Dinner theatres of the theatric Titanic;

I have to cover this new half of my face as I think
Of other girls on recently discovered planets-
Ending this session, I must admit that, yes,
I've lost track of something,
Neither handsome nor romantic.

Robert Rorabeck

Neither Of Our Disquieting Mothers

Heart beating the hallways of nostalgia, the water fountains
The valves, and your eyes the doorways and the transoms:
And all of it this delightful truancy, where I never met
You,
But I met you out in the pure, naked swings, out in the Green corridors of my semi-adult intentions,
And did my best to greet you with the quiet though savage
Gifts that I knew only I could provide,
While all of the traffic bemoaned myself, and both of our houses
Lay as silent as awaiting ballrooms,
For neither of our disquieting mothers were attending home.

Robert Rorabeck

Neither Shadow Nor Sleep

Set up in the fanfare of cemeteries,
Hocking these same old words, having no business
To do with sports-
But just girls I once never knew, who clung close and Separated near their backyard pools,
Who found surcease away from the tidal swells,
Who closed up at night, eyes pinched shut,
Dreaming of Appalachian dells, and beautiful greased boys
Who came awake like blue bells;
And I even went to her house once, and drove her in my Old spider truck,
And she has the brownest eyes- I'll tell you what,
But she doesn't care to fly on my broken wing
(I can barely fly myself) So that I don't travel anymore:
I buy poetry books thriftily for twenty cents and read
Them in my truck,
And put them down and bite my scarred lip,
And then she wearies and sleeps in unwound coitus-
That's what she does when the busses get weary and are Eventually put to pasture- What are those buses doing that Once drove us separately into those clutches of cormorants,
So peacefully put together
By chicken wire and ambergris- For the world never slows
For the tired or the ceasing,
And I am sure she is just like all the world, her brown eyes Never creasing but burning like open wells, like spumes in the Desert
She goes on all night, thirstily drinking the amber sky,
And in its open wounds her reflection crackles constellations of Spinning tires pin wheeling and sloughing off tears of Gasoline-
And so she burns in her nations that no neither shadow nor Sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Nerves At The Bottom

Nerves at the bottom while the blind men felt their Castles—and the feral cats pretended to know
So many poets—and the world was struck out
Like baseball into its séances—
And the pleasantries of movie theatres and baseball
Diamonds were washed out—
And the schemes that you happened to have didn't Come true forever—but they discovered a planet
That just floated—as the young man gets a
Tattoo of his mother on his forearm—
And the better part of the world has to swear that She will live forever—franchises of drive in movie theatres—
And the night is the void of a kite that is stolen—
And this place is a poem like a scar of a highway told to
The lights of a primordial juggler—
And then they are in the shadows or wherever -
And the albino alligator pretends to live there for ever—
And, yes—and, yes—it just so happens that he Does live there forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Nests Of Naturalistic Adulteries

If the rivers of spikenard are blowing over her
Shoulders,
What is the tiger singing over the trailer parks while
The biggest of forest fires blows out all of Her candles,
And she falls down sighing his name,
Like a mermaid placed upon a swing or a metronome
Of a kindergartener or a famous musician-
And the words spread across her like reasonable
Bonfires or other out of control similes,
Until Christmas was over, and all of the familiar gods
Were down,
Or up in the claustrophobic attics above the houses-
While the truants farted and skipped school
And lit off roman candles through the palmettos
And masturbated like winos
To girls they could barely see in their visions:
Girls with bare shoulders speckled underneath the Australian pines- girls with hair lips and freckles, Cousins who you might have played doctors with Who no somehow have become Stewardesses for conquistadors who are always flying
Towards the unconquerable hemispheres,
The names for her like serpents biting their lips,
And her birthday candles all lighted up and burning in Their beards, like songbirds stealing jewels to Build nests of naturalistic adulteries.

Robert Rorabeck

Nets Of Honey

Nets of honey spooled around a muse that doesn't Exist—you get up in the morning and wash his car,
Waiting for your husband to come home—
The neighborhood of your existence is gilded if beautiful—
And you are all of the tricks of a two headed coin that Once touched my bedroom—now you are in the flight
Of your life, never learning how to leave the ground—
Loving him from inside all of your nests with the hopes
That hibernate straight through all of the sunbeams—
Hoping that very soon there will exist a season for all of You holidays, and the old days can be forgotten—
The infidelities, and the money that you owe me,
And you can go on hanging by his side, finding new ways
Of getting around the absences of loving him year by year.

Robert Rorabeck

Never A Tourist In My Lines

Over the current years I've replaced
Each lost part until the entire
Man came to be made of tin;
And my old dogs and my new dogs love
Me just the same;
And it is the same moon over yours and mine
Head,
But maybe it is not proper English:
There are layers of clouds like frosting and fluff
Up to the moon candied by airplanes
And impolite boys who are taking their time on Your trapeze and not giving me my chance
At petting up;
And you've gotten as fat as a super confident alligator,
Even if you are not quite as Saturnine,
But I don't know about you, or how you really smell.
Do you smell like your new car,
And where are you going back and forth along your Chartreuse boulevards singing the favorite
And popular songs of your ballrooms;
And I don't want to have to wake up tomorrow,
But I guess I will, if only because my lion outfit
Is made out of two real lions skins; and I've already vanquished
The gunfights who had any chance into the creek,
And now all the girls are congratulating me,
As I sing like the last song of a song bird at the mouth of The mine,
And looking up I see the cross of minors standing out against
The skree and snow;
And I know nothing except that death is kind, and I
Was never a tourist in my lines;
And this I know.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Around

Aspens are all naked now,
And I am not around to see them- to let them
Remind me of you
Lost on your dime store moons:
Just little breathable things, as round as a suburban
Yard;
If I were bound on some narrow gauge railroad
I'd go to the concession car and buy over priced
Hotdogs and caramel corn,
And crack some expensive farts and think of you,
Because that is why I am getting around,
To climb those mountains who are your sleeping sisters,
While you as well are sleeping even as you
Move around, selling things;
But you transcend your assets,
But I am not around to see them, and my dogs are chained
In the yard even as the trees are shivering,
And the airplanes brush their continuous hands through
The tops of their lustrous canopy,
And somewhere above the town the sky opens up to Blow your hair in wimpled concessions,
While in high school I crawled like a featureless terrapin Underneath the broken down school bus and made it my Shell,
And loved you even though you were never around.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Belong To Me

Scars of this impotent fjord make me spill my Juices,
And everyday is done,
And I have ridden through the hours and counted
On my fingers that it was fun,
And the waves go on forever lapping,
Repeating the multiplexes of my rum;
And the days go on forever,
And the tent breathes with the children of the gun,
And I think of you and put you in the runny aquatics
Of my masticated truancies;
And I've said your name and called you out,
And you are so beautiful,
And I suppose I want to tell you that you are so beautiful:
You are so beautiful and it is fun to tell you
You are so beautiful,
Like floating, like being a super hero, and a success
Science experiment,
As I try to look into your eyes from several states over,
Even though I am not,
And all I can hope for is to punch dream so anonymous
Children between the thighs of a likewise anonymous women,
Like a voting ballot while thinking about you
And biting my tongue,
Like working on a stolen car between the clefts of godly,
Oh so f%cking godly mountains
That will never belong to me....

Robert Rorabeck

Never Close Enough To

Scars mote me like a dark age field.
A space craft wrecked in a dying meadow,
And epitaphs to sailors who are better off fed to the Sharks:
I want to move into my own holocaust and drive
Cars which are cooler than me:
I'm going to work at Wal-Mart or Burger King,
And watch goddesses climax on the silver screen
Who are better than me,
Who are adept at servicing their trifling, burnished
Gods:
I'll watch teenagers surfing the ocean, coming like the Spume of bouquets- wont it be so romantic and Tranquil and medicated,
And now I try not to look at my scars-
I listen to Johnny Cash, as I pass on through the Awful séances of another day I shouldn't spell-
Back into the daylight where teachers never believed in me,
Where she smiled and turned away
And cut her hair for another man, and I had nothing left
To do but truancy, the funny skip over the ripple of Suburban corrugation; and now she has married,
And is in another state, wearing clothes I've never seen
Nor smelled on her;
And Delia's gone, and I've nothing left to do
But go bowling in between classes,
Tipping my glass to that green swan making romance under
The bitter swings who never thought to change for me,
So that I forever remain the toothy fox leaping for the Wild scuppernongs,
The nursery rhymes succulent on their northern boughs,
The real-estate of really sexy graveyards I somehow
Still remember,
Bending low enough to worship but never close enough
To touch.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Coming Down

This is where I live: this is where I live
Is good,
As I am starving on liquor, as it feels alright to Estrange myself before the hospitals of the jungle of Your eyes,
But I am naïve,
And the arcades are all Nordic and blue and filibustering
For the heroes desposed of in plane crashes:
Now the mountains never close, as I Am becoming homeless again, while the sun is Going down and I
Am moving towards you: and this is my art, Sharon-
That you can never feel,
But I am still moving towards you, while all of the horses
Fall asleep standing up in their fields,
And I can't even suppose that you can truly feel me now, While all of our grandmothers have fallen asleep in their Graveyards,
And time marches on,
And Alma's fleece is so brown, and it has spread across me,
And time has slowed down,
And her lips have embraced me, and it was the warmest sound
I have ever felt or stolen,
Even while she wants to be alone, and asleep with her own man
Flung across the fields that even the richest of heroes can Pretend to have defeated
Across the diadem of islands, that talk amongst themselves like
Sisters,
While all of the ships have wrecked underneath the holidays of Clouds that are so sad and weeping;
But deeply christened into their holidays; and they are never coming
Down.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Dreams

Little birds, wounded ones:

Hung up on the trees, under suns-
Laughed with echoes from the mines,
From the throats of mountains

Freckled by wildflowers:

The mountain lions run, chase the snowmelt
Like lovers-

They go down until there is no fear,
Where they have no brothers, but are met upon
By eyes who cannot see, who have never Seen, and who are blinded:

And through those they leap, vanishing,
And carrying on- down roads that move not a single Step, upon the lips breathing of the open throat
That through all of its sleep never dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Enough To Say

I drink beer and eat cold hamburger.
Romero bought all of these airplane beers,
And I down them while I try and figure out
What to say:
I want my words to be paper snowflakes:
I want to play football with paper lions,
But school has been over for so long, that I don't know what to say.
My great uncle is the head of his department;
He studies the meaning between the stars:
Right now we're selling pumpkins,
And my day is so long and scarred:
I'd rather be jumping trains- My day rained all Day, and from somewhere a giant snake spoke
In my ear and told me things I wasn't suppose
To say; and there were weddings and funerals,
And the stars skipped a beat,
And I wonder how that's supposed to work out,
That we are all leaving on impenetrable voyages,
For it seems that people are leaving each other just
As readily as each of these universes;
And to reach out and touch someone through the Epileptic pulsars is just never enough;
And you have your daughter's eyes, but there is Just never enough to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Found

Mastiffs bark and flick their skulls like flint,
Like machetes against bright copper telephone
Poles,
And your sister lives in Saint Augustine where
I once rested,
And smoked the stolen spikenard from a blue
Creche of piggish infants
Until I was alone and in the shade;
And I didn't even have a lawn chair or a phone,
Just the parade
Of things that used to live in pretty shells,
And the old fashioned conquistadors courting their Iodized mermaids,
Or at least that was what they were trying to sell,
But nothing lived there anymore,
And it was just the ghosts of failed students slipping
From the shores of that Beautiful hotel,
Swimming in their rooms and making love for the First time
Once again happening into many lives filled with Such glances of longing as to compete with
The sky of stars,
The sail boats wandering beneath them all like the bruised
Lips of lovers, entomologists the lights search for
But never found.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Home

Oh, the days are poor with only family-
Hermaphrodites to my scars, can anyone see me:
But Diana says I am beautiful:
She is the best looking woman I have seen in fifteen years-
While my doggies die, I jack off to her,
And the city leaves; it takes up its pittance of roots and leaves,
Shoots off just like rockets into the skies,
But who gives a rabbit's sh%t for all of those Russians;
Tremulous in the quietly insipid orange groves of Spain,
Girls I have loved I will never see again-
Set off castaways to state college and further into their Oort Clouds, their propitious, unsolicited after-lives-
I don't know what I am doing;
After the ululations of the arcades of nothing, a plane shot
Down, something quaintly commercial, and I am going down
In the comfortable armchair of an amusement park,
Cotton Candy, gold fish- I forgot how to have fun,
And the fair is leaving before I could even be born,
Even while there are still some girls who still wish they could Love me if only if I were beautiful,
As beautiful as Colorado, or the planes higher up,
Where the angels end their play well sated, mopping sweat like
Pearly sororities off their brows,
Going home, being tucked into a bucket of chummed wings;
And now you are with child, and now you are utterly alone,
While the amusements croak, while the amusements
Groan:
I am the only one who loves you, who has ever loved you;
And you have always loved me-
I have rung your bell, but you are never home.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Land Again

Why there isn't a sound outside-
The sea is so far away, in a thimble,
In a fairy-tale of threes:
Three little pigs, or Three Billy goat's bluff, or
The Pardoner's Tale- Three petals
Left of limpid seashell,
Because the waves have gone away from here-
They have gone far from shore-
Little girls are putting seaweed into pails,
And there isn't a mother around-
Will they ever come back from the uncanny
Shoals, or will they disappear like magic tricks?

There isn't anyone on the swings,
And runaways are not inside their grandmothers'
Cars: I don't know where they are,
But even here there are plastic bouquets in Tin horns crawling with ants,
And rows of powdery sororities fast asleep
Like royal crypts;
And sweet, lonely men dancing naked before
Their mirrors,
Physics professors who look like Jimmy Stewart,
Who are my great uncles,
And the heads of their seven day departments,
Water skiing on blacksmithed lakes;

And I am going away too
On a silent ship into a silent room,
Leaving behind all those things that never called,
Leaving behind the most foggy of seasons:
Going to where the gas-lights stay on all night for Truckers, where lovers always seem to slip away,
Disheartened, where there are always vending machines,
The land striped in fast-food chains and folderol,
Where my father is fast asleep and snoring,
Dreaming of bygone cliffs teaming of conquistadors
And blanketed Andalusians;

Where the motels go quietly rattling;

But where there are no alligators,
Or Mickey Mouses,
The tourists in southerly streaming motorcades;
Or girls who know my name and say it
Like blowing cigar smoke out their nostrils-
But these don't exist:
The sea has come back like in a silent movie
And reclaimed the good-looks of their leading Men,
And the sweet smelling stewardesses of Airplanes never land again:

This is where I dream I belong,
Looking up the chicken-wire tresses of egg-shell
Castles,
Catching soldered mermaids from the shivering bathtub of
The next wave's caesura:
But the parade is over and the little girls
Have vanished;
There is no one left to throw rose petals:
I am going somewhere they don't exist,
On a green rollercoaster under the sun of Super villain comic books-
I am dropping fast and the movie is almost over:
I am going somewhere that doesn't exist.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Of This World To Begin With

What nights in Diana's truck I'd Spend sleeping like a needless roach
In the ice next to her bottled
Breast milk:
Now that her daughter has grown up,
Like a funny daisy,
First learning how to project a bicycle
Like a blushing rocket,
And then learning to swim, and finally
To walk:
Then the boys would come out of doors,
After finishing with their badges,
And they would wear the golden skins of Bears,
And chains of incredulous sharks teeth.
We would encircle her in our pantheism,
But I would be the only one she Wanted to be with,
Because I am no longer drunk, but if you
Look into the sky
You can see an entire playground evaporating,
First made from her offspring.
Now that they are off to college and summer
Sports,
There is no longer a need for water parks,
And thus they go into thoughts.
I am the only one who can tell Diana any of this,
In her truck of silver diamonds,
And so she comes to me when her rounds are over,
And the other boys fat like lizards off of black
Guava the flies circle and caracole.
Then the airplanes stick to the funny parts of blue
Sky,
As we stick to each other, two weeks of a lifetime
Of weak minded thoughts,
Which are all I have to give to her and her spills of Light ochre tresses,
Because I know not what I do,
Nor who I might grow up to be:

I just want Diana underneath the sky
Of things that are not only no longer real,
Were never of this world to begin with.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Supposed To Be

His Lancelot has been naked but courteous
To you,
And very familiar: so many times questing into your Octopus grottos
As to make them so well tilled as to even bear
Children without any sort of wicked serpent's
Fangs,
Except for his; and they rose up springy,
And were met by the heavy hand of the gravity of your Trailer parks and tom cats;
And this is what they said, but oh boy, and baseball:
Witches on red diamonds telling secrets to Dust devils, or the blue diamonds of pools enriched with Chlorine,
Your sister's eyes- and by her I mean anybody's sister:
I am not speaking directing to anybody, how could I,
Except that I mean that he is your knight,
Proud and religious and adhering to a king;
And you both know so little of the world: you are so young
And eager to be questing;
And when he falls asleep inside of you, when her furls and goes away
Then don't you close your eyes and realize that it was never Supposed to be this way at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Never Wish To See

If the sun chirps, it is chirruping in Spanish stirrups,
But it doesn't: it whistles, making its rounds,
Swinging its phalanxes of missing keys-
All it is a head banishing the light:
The sky is not its house.
The moon is not its wife- What is the sun
But a father of world it has no business in,
Penetrating,
Stimulant and spurious it has created a child
It does not know flooding like busy and Angry ants beneath it,
As it purveys blind and gallant all that it would Never wish to see.

Robert Rorabeck

Nevermore

Alma goes to the flea market to fix her gold,
And I want to buy us matching Virginsitas, even if she Doesn't want to make love to me
Anymore, because she is feeling guilty, even though we've Never done it on my eighty five year old floor;
And I love the old monarchs who so long ago only existed
For a season,
And I love the old airplanes who once existed but never
For a reason,
And if there are clouds in the sky, then perhaps they are Basking over the sea,
Who is sashaying her skirts of waves right up to my door,
While all of the animals sleep at the zoo where we once kissed-
Next to the aquatic cages of endangered bliss,
Where probably we will again kiss nevermore.

Robert Rorabeck

New And Awkward Light

My mustache curls up at both ends
And men that I meet out walking
Tip their hats to me and call me monsieur,
And women out strolling their children
Through the waning neighborhood
Curtsy demurely to me and kindly say,
"Sir, " And I repay their courtesy
With a tipsy grin, like a mountaineer
Dangling from the edge of a precipice,
I let sunlight in through the lean gap
Walled in the ivory of my front teeth,
And exhale a gentle cloud of Spiced rum in their direction;
I inebriate from a secret flask
While I watch a beautiful women
In a state of undress
From the shadowed seat I purchased
For approximately 2 hrs.
From the fine people of this City's floating hippodrome:
There in the magic box
Happens celluloid flickers
As pyrotechnicians go down
On both knees,
As they would to please a woman:
A graduate student of ribald philosophy
Wearing a translucent nightgown as she Reads in an Elizabethan theatre.
Searching through intelligent spectacles,
She takes stringent notes and recites
Lines of Thomas Marlowe,
As the tongue is busy lighting that fuse
To start off the pinwheeled display,
Like eating mouthfuls of sugar
And then stepping out into the sun:
For a moment your eyes lose their place
And your legs walk away
Into the dizzy feeling whose only structure
Is what the proboscis smells through

The clean cut grass,
A yard decorated by homes and walkways:
The lemon trees sentinel along the promenade.
Coming to, this is how I hope she sees me,
As I step toward her deliberately,
Holding my deformed book of posy,
A somber badge for the heart,
As I step up to her bar in the settling evening
When sleepy school boys
Meander home from classes,
And good school girls in pig-tails
Stay afterwards for extra lessons
In all night sessions
Where crickets sing and strum their legs,
Solve vibrancies up the classroom's
Dimmed chalkboard.
I am coming home to see her
After six long years at war,
Where I grew my mustache out to Please her,
Where I fought and slew many a strange
Man who ran towards me in the middle of
The night through the red drool
Out of the shelling cannons,
Before I could hear their weapons
Enter me.
I come home to her now, and the Town on display welcomes me,
But I remember she has a short memory
And only loved me for a day
And loses her place easily,
Looking up into other men;
But I have survived for so long
On only the hope of eventually entering
The sphere of her engagements,
So I step through the doorway of her
Fine establishment,
My mustache curling up at both ends,
My eyes adjusting to find her in this
New and awkward light.

New Girl Smell

Houses like limpid shells,
So limpid, smell and taste like their Previous masters,
Like girls so god-d-mned old;
They no longer smell of the sea
Before it might have been the sea, but of
The wash basins and jet fuel;
They don't smell like swing sets anymore,
But their daughters are still arcing in Sunlight:
Their daughters are real play- Just these Things: believe me, you don't understand,
Not even if you think you got it on
The tip of your tongue:
Pretty little girls sandcastles, spider-flume,
Arcing in the breaks of God,
But if you lay a hand on them, corrupted:
He will leave them,
This jealously abstaining bachelor:
He will just get on his bike and ride away into A greener neighborhood;
And all the little girls you've seen will settle down
From play.
They will either graduate high school, or
They will not: making love in newer beds further up,
Or their own,
But they will live in their new masters' homes,
Like dogs' houses, enchained, washing dishes,
Pulling out laundry like the guts of game,
No longer smelling like how you left them; but of
The dry-walled shells, shellacked,
Landscaped by palms, as with her shampooed pubis;
and though the house
Is beautiful, she goes all day weeping with it
On her back; shopping,
Drinking with her enslaved sororities as if drinking alone,
Never to smell like god, like nothing, ever.

New Subject Matter

When I drink, I pray to my three foot tall
Virginsita for the safety of Alma and her two children:
And to return her to me without a thought,
For I am that hungry- like the fox that is always Leaping fruitlessly:
And I made the mistake of calling her zorra on Friday, when we both came back together and went Back to work:
Why then all of the cars and trucks parked underneath
The paper airplanes and watched the movies
Of my parents lost and needing money in Arizona-
So now all of my dolls are broken,
And the world spins, calling up new reasons for the same
Monsters:
And nothing very important ever sells, and all of The conquistadors are lost anyways: I've tried at being Very demonstrative,
Or even starting new subject matter, but she always comes Back to me this way-
And then the sky jumps off its cliffs, and I fall down again
With her brown body ululating with all that I've Known to be ecstasy.

Robert Rorabeck

New Turns In The Light

They'll make their new turns in the light
Of the bric-a-brac until our hegemonies
Have new households,
And I won't have to keep buying dime sized memories
Of you,
Laughing as a consequence
Of the after-course of consent—
Soon, so soon—the storm will have moved away,
And they, our cousins and our ancestors,
Will be picking up the pieces—
But they will be counted together within the Time of shells—
While they thought to be making friends,
We will let our dinners cloud over—
And the hills will mystify the airplanes—
I will drink whatever I can until the angels come down pledging their Allegiances to the flags of whenever
For awhile, there will be a heavenly light
Basking in the skeletons,
And then no one will figure out how to survive,
One way or another,
While the princesses are sleeping and counting
Their monies—
The winds of jet planes will come in and Tell them of their birthdays
And that will put an end to the brightest tears that I suppose they ever saw.

Robert Rorabeck

New Years And Beowulf Is Dead

New Years,
Cyclical like the Anglo-Saxons,
Her monthly period, presidential elections,
A night (like all the others spent, droning)
Rolls on, the completion of a circuit, circular,
Pointless, indistinguishable from the rest with Their eyes fawning and making love in the forest,

As the streets under the atmosphere (speared by the aerobuses starting and landing in The compacted dream) under the stars, always the stars (sung to by the multitude, by the Minor poets- and I amidst the Howl, being lost to her, being drowned out
By the undertow of all the middle-class
Traffic of this sloppy dictionary at my hands)
When her legs are done with the Buck,
When the show is over, and she has cleaned off (when they can still Find me at the very back of me, but if they go down
That deep inside me they will be lost with Me and drowned like the misplaced diver
In the submarine before they are out of me) , before the yellow eyes close,
Like the median telling you
Not to cross,
I watch the middle-school kids on TV,
Who are smarter and better tuned than me,
Spelling words I can't remember (which lubricated
Me) televised before their first erection,
(when I am on my second glass on the sofa, Already ejaculated into the green carpet of memory) ,
Pull off erections to the sad president,
The urban sprawl nightmare,
They've made pyramids out of her sheets
And are playing pirates:
As, across country, younger and Younger body parts are being found Inside dumpsters (As, she is sure that no one Loves her) ,

My young cousin, Tyler, has won a
Spot on the Orange Bowl
Half-Time show, she's About 5, and already she's Being taught to swing around the Pole pantiless,
Foaming at the mouth,
For the fame of her sex, the ultimate privilege
After the Roanoke Virginia mystery left unsolved for 300 years,
And the green of the bankroll left uncut
And unpaid for since the time of the dinosaurs
Under the sun,

As the hurricanes pick up,
(As Zeta appears on our radars,
Like the sad caves carving the rest on me
In the great calcium monoliths removed to the back Of my mind) ,
And dropp the windowless
Chambers of the farm house on the witch,
Like the drought of the early 20th century,
We all stand from our seats and cheer (and pay)
The spectacle,
The lidless monster flickering in ash

Year less, I have no home
And no destination to dock success inside,

As the sun rises, Beowulf is dead,
The cycle is complete and headless (sure
To come around again and eat itself with the pulp fiction, the reticulated python of the masses) :

They strap his body to the front of the Grill and spit some Spanish slang on his remains,
And raise him like a god,
Before the sirens and the repeating lights
Of the city this new year.

Robert Rorabeck

Next

The fruition of a single thing
learning to duplicate itself like the ruby spores of a pomegranite bleed
forever.

The forest's pinioned tears brushed by her cotton-picking wind,
the arboreal children that grow in the motionless carnival fight like statues of Russian poets,
like the freckle-gilled fish, forgetting something,
leap backwards up the acrobatic rivers into subterranean homes of melting silver-azure,
breathing jewelries of molecularized snow;
The undefined couplings of fleeting virgins in highschool metastasize into the middle-class stock-market adultery, the leaping blue electricity of migrating eyes,
the printing-press of opposing sexes,
the zygotes of bald mammals stampede,
as she screams the john's name
from the open window out thrown into the available night, where aeroplanes recede

its passengers the wayward children of a millioned silenced wounded things dying into the next.

Robert Rorabeck

Nice And Slow

I write love letters to you,
Because even though I am well sated
In a good and damp lot underneath
An aquamarine tent- I am starving for a woman,
My muse:
I have one or two and they don't seem to mind;
They just toss their heads back like wild palominos:
They don't give me the time,
Or the seesaws of their alabaster pride,
And I don't even have an oven to be good and died-
So the traffic crawls- and the traffic slows,
Cars filled in with girls who throw their heads
Back like palominos,
And the eight o'clock sun is gusting through their Windows,
Like peeping tom, like an un somnambulant
Inspector of job:
Yeah, I loved her- This I know because my porcelain
Heart cracked in her lucky camel toe;
And she is just as lustrous as an Navajo casino,
Because I have seen her swallow entire armies of Fashionably plated men,
Her barrettes undone, her haunting head swimming through Their bayonets,
Accomplishing all of her turbid banquets well on through Crepuscule,
Placing all her unconquerable bets with the traffic crawling
Nice and slow.

Robert Rorabeck

Night And Day

I gulped the domestic voodoo maelstrom
While the cadavers of airplanes flew;
And I remember the bridge over the dry riverbed
In Saint Louis I could Still be driving over, but now it's almost Halloween,
And I am kittycornered between the blue gills
In the canal and the affluent housewives
With their mowed lawns in their affluent city:
And the day is sweaty,
And the day is long, and it is always growing longer;
And the army ants are mean,
And sometimes the housewives are meaner,
Swinging their children like Catholic censers at their Hips, making me want to unchain them and teach them
How to really swing,
But I'm just filled with the doodles and caracoles myself;
And my hair is gray-
And even Romero knows how old I am- That I drink
Two of his beers every night,
To worship the airplanes stuck like cotton candy in Ganymede-
I keep telling myself tomorrow will be beautiful-
Tomorrow will be luxuriant,
And I will get a little drunk and then go out amidst the swells
Of traffic and their cloudy shadows passing through the sky,
And I well get down hard and work with my hands,
And pretend everything I touch is running around the pearlescent
Sluice chroming your body,
Even though some other gentleman is brushing against
You and giving your hair a hundred strokes in the same faraway
Night and day.

Robert Rorabeck

Nightgown

Festooned by the night,
The boys make love to the sea.

On a 1,000 waves they call her name,
And echo back to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Nightmares

The angels sung over the castle;
They sung real hard,
And they prayed like nightmares.

Robert Rorabeck

Nights Of Sleepless Love

Almost real dead men sit best by Sally-
They are polite but losing their hair and genesequa,
But are quite captivated by the telly;
When I am around them, say on Sundays,
I am almost real like them
And their gray mustaches are pets, like
Fury caterpillars that have passed their long winters
Refusing to surrender into a gayer metamorphosis:
Now I will be one of them,
For the parts of the evening, even while jogging
Under the beautiful though lazy clouds,
And the cul-de-sacs are warm and easy,
And one house even has an antique fire-engine,
And all of the homes have a beautiful woman,
Like a vase placed amidst the orange trees of
The green yard's luxury,
And alligators in the backyard slows;
Where time grows feebly in the absence of numbers,
There where the city tapers, they drink from their tumblers,
Where orchids peel like slender ruminids,
And flies as blue as bashful jewels practice sweet effluvia;
Where there are sometimes family reunions,
And sometime torpid faithfulness, but the moccasin's Venom is always punctual against the throat of the careless Though speckled doe,
Things our actors almost see from out across the Ping-pong table in their backyard patios;
The almost real dead men with drinks on key,
Those players of this evening tranquil on their houses in
The deepening ambience cycling the twisting roads;
Tonight I will be a part of them, and the ice will tinkle
In the glass with my liquors and cranberry juice,
As we sit best beside our aunt Sally, and not look askance,
But at the spinning wheels and the leggy blond models
Of the telly's game shows,
As outside the evening devolves into a nocturnal serenade,
Scaled and poisoned by a deadlier romance.

Nina Hermosa

We've made our decisions and Sent ourselves out,
And we are hunting for the humid purchases
Off the salts of our high schools:
Girls there, yes—
Like the little brown girl who comes to see me
Every early morning—
Nina Hermosa, in brown skin and tulips
And the temper of a maelstrom flooding a desert:
Had to watch her making out with an eighteen year old
Freshman all of my first year,
But now she loves me in bits and pieces,
Like the kaleidoscope of memory of the monarch
Butterfly flooding and returning to the jungled mountains
Of her Mexico—
She doesn't appreciate these thoughts:
She doesn't even realize them,
And it is a good thing as well that my wife only speaks
Broken English,
For it allows me to get away for a little while Haunted by the things I shouldn't
And I am not supposed to believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

No Beauty That Is Actually Her Own

The soon seems to be playing with the night and the stewardesses
Wherever they are cannot get any sleep—
There they are impossibly up in the angles of the clouds
And I do not know what else to say to them—
But when the time is right, I suppose that they will fly down
And plant their kisses upon my mouth,
Giving me whatever they have to give me at any angle—
And then the moon will steal the light again
From the sun and bask herself with it—unusually happy that Only five or so men have come to know that there is nothing
Truly about her
And no beauty that is actually her own.

Robert Rorabeck

No Business Of Understanding

Cenotaphs of us will live forever,
Pointed, jagged spears vibrating consumptions
Between the cadaverous lick of waves,
You know the melody
They sing between awake and sleep,
Because we made them together
Hunchbacked in the shadows,
Like tortoises spending the day alone anonymous
To the tourists fair-weather strides,
The little bits of our children out rippling between the Waves
As the sky explodes for fairer holidays, on an on,
To which we have no business of understanding.

Robert Rorabeck

No Echo

None of my poems will survive;

They are all lost children blown to the sea.

After 4th of July,

I will not get paid....

I will not get laid. This is the end of me,

So often I worry about what you are doing now,

That I do not even think to buy

Myself a tomb,

A year and a half,

My grandmother is still waiting for her headstone,

I want to feel my children inside

Your womb,

But you are hot for some other man,

The playboy of your week,

Even when you get on top of him,

I'll turn the other cheek...

And live near the sea, for a decade until

I am forty, gray and gummy,

And then I will say to the open stillness,

I still love you,

Though in the flatness of this land

There is no echo,

There is no echo.

Robert Rorabeck

No Good Tears

What little talent leaves us like a draw of blood,
And still the doctor is not sure what ails us, except obscurity,
And the nurses' squeaking nouns they but in place
In red checkmarks on the clipboards;
But we can't help but think, they'd look better in a swamp
Barefoot and nipple round confessing to an older sun,
The alligators like new dinosaurs hatching from the speckled clutch,
The poet's hand opened like a flower curling from the crook
Of cypress dripping like dismantled swimmers from their pools,
And the minor sounds of the local orchestra putting on
The darkening hoods, the nurses fainting like perishable goods,
And nothing all around except for the slip of reptiles into the Open womb about the knees of the petrified knights of lucid green,
The croaking amphibians between night and day, swirling
Like the joy of dark little children in a bath below mouths of red orifice,
The navels open through the pearly abdomens, the perfect scar which Once connected the pretty nurtures with the mothers of their spotless goods,
And I swim around them like a crocodile myself,
Shedding feverish tears which I know by heart will do no good.

Robert Rorabeck

No Longer Anywhere Near

Down by the hop-along Cadillacs of my Sad memories,
Bivouacked in the junkyard of the lonely
Months-
The house and the dogs burned away,
Emolliated in sacrifice
To the goddess who flashed like phosphorous
Across the canal:
My wife- like a kite of flame- Didn't she Know that was the wrong way to the mall-
The donkeys galloped first under
And then over- neath the moon:
The conquistadors asked then how they could Do that- but sunken as they were
Up to their chins in the blue nests of Dunes- how could they see:
Like cenotaphs praying to the waves,
I realized that I was amongst them-
The heavens unwrapped new holidays in the air,
And the stars shed their skins- maybe they Were making believe,
But my heart was stolen- in its place a shadow play
Of puppets,
She was no longer anywhere near to see.

Robert Rorabeck

No Matter How Inappropriate

I'll call you the joy of blackbirds-
You won't look at me at all-
You'll say I drink too much-
I'll listen to your echoes down toward the Saturnine basins of your first marriage;
And I'll sit and wait in the abandoned hallways between Classes, green scars like broken glass,
Romero outside drinking his cheap beer- I've finished
My bottle of wine and am ready to banish my head as Well,
But I have to get out these rhymes- might as well:
I still can barely stand looking at myself:
I am a lonely freak show- I sell pumpkins- I don't Smoke- I wait for you, still fishing in the Disney World
Of your first marriage: a girl came into today who Might have been your sister- she asked me my name,
And didn't mind how bad I looked:
She had two kids, maybe she was that desperate:
I am a good man- I am so lonely, but maybe that doesn't mean
So much:
I finished off my bottle of wine; it cost me five dollars,
But maybe that is enough:
She looked just like you, except her hair was blonde- She had Your same body: she had two children, but she could still Play soccer- and right now better men are flying above me,
The sky sheriffs of this esplanade, going to their common ports
Maybe they could have you at any time, so tin star winged
Above my head:
I haven't been on a date for seven years- but she said she was Coming back for a Christmas tree- If she doesn't
I don't think I should hesitate to ask her to bed,
No matter how inappropriate.

Robert Rorabeck

No More Shadows

There are no more shadows.
For the sun has chain-ganged
The stars on the dark side
Of the moon,
The hoary bulb he has stuffed
Into a gunnysack and smashed
On the night's cool table,
Breaking the delicate filament.
He has snuffed out the lights with Enormous bells and putting his finger
On the earth, to see if it is ready
For eating, he has stopped it
And made it stand before him
Without blinking.
Now I can no longer feel
Your name in the soft shadows
That linger around the canopy in My mind. No longer do I see your Truest form, undressed of flatteries
Reclining under the stitched branches
Of an oak tree planted before
The Civil War over the far side
Of the mountain. For all the places
I use to come calling for you, those Sad and relaxing enclaves that you
Would lie about like settled animals
Around rings of bright water,
Are doused with kerosene and Ignited.
He has taken you away from me,
And set you there in a relentless cage
In his perfect center, like the crystalline pit
Of a citric geode hung on an emotionless tree.
Unabated, he fondles you, like a surgeon
With precisions flares and blow torches,
Never allowing you sleep and the cool
Return, to slide naked into an ocean of whispering
Shadows,
Never allowing you to douse your head

In my cradle,
Never allowing you to remember that
You loved me,
Never at all—

Robert Rorabeck

No Need To End

Land plays baseball with Stolen goods: little
Black boys smile like gold
Chains on their mezzanines,
And I wander so far
Away from school,
Just to get out of the Range of your eyes:
Far away your atmosphere
Rises like a mushroom
Cloud;
Your narcissistic echoes
From the classroom are
As sweet and musical
As an icecream
Truck;
And I think of you all day,
Leaping over canals
And graveyards;
Pretending to be a conquistador
With my plastic sword,
I see you rising through the
Sky,
Like an unreachable sprig
Of grapes,
Like dancing without gravity,
Something truly beautiful
That has no need to End.

Robert Rorabeck

No One Else To Blame

Why are you're eyes so much like
Midnight that I should feel like
I need to die into them,
Like a faithful mailman,
Like anyone making his rounds:
And you don't serve
Beer,
Or have children, but you just lie in the Lap of the yard under the flag;
And I have money for you,
And I can make it worth your while,
While the gnat eats the sleep out of my left eye:
And I am scarred,
And impure and boring: I am not your prince
Transplanted from Disney World.
I said I would live forever but that was because I am afraid,
And because Erin doesn't love me.
I don't think she can love anyone, but she knows
Better artists than me,
And she has been with them. And now it snows,
And the crocodiles fart,
And I have had my wine, and my medicine,
While you are looking good.
Your eyes are midnight trapped in blue Lakes- You home goes on
For many a mile.
Your ancestors made this country but now it has no
Use for you;
It is so proud, but you are very useful all the same;
And, likewise, I am not Robert Frost,
But I am Robert Anyone,
And this is my song:
There is no one else to blame.

Robert Rorabeck

No One Goes To School

Shaking like the stars,
Like the higher and lower amusements in 10 pnt font,
I write to you what should and must be the last Poem of my drunken evening:
I have no foyer, no writing, room no desk,
No dolphin: no career.
I am no king of France, but if I believe in god,
Then you are him,
You are a single rose lost in the street,
You are my pecker: Do you understand?
I am dying- I am dying with my dogs,
And you don't care- The audience full,
But none of you understand: That the lights are dying,
That it is raining still but almost done,
The last conquistador is on his knees,
The pie is on its sill; and I am almost done:
I am really, truly almost am: the amphibians ululating in
The carport,
The sea with its perfumes as with its unktion's- the fumes
They keep open to sell the dolls and the wrists,
And I am done with college,
And done pretending to be at the fair with the underage
Girls and flying saucers: I am just selling things,
As we all do on these half a dozen continents,
And tomorrow it will be used cars and wild ponies.
South Florida is a fine place to die, if all a sudden it should Be an end to my drunken poem, so be it:
I will not write to you tonight- The birds are stuck up into the Trees,
The golf balls are missing in their holes, the waves are dying upon
The sea; and I would have been a virgin for so many years,
If I hadn't been with you so many years ago-
I am good enough now, and the doorbell doesn't ring-
In the bright sunlight it keeps the girls inside with their dolls,
It doesn't ring at all,
And no one goes to school.

No One Left

Loneliness is my day, and it is almost perfect:
I jog the quietude of the canal just west of the freeway:
All of those commuters don't perceive me;
And I wonder if I went to school with any of them,
Or if any of them are girls I have loved going to and from School and caves:
And I think of beautiful flowers in rich bouquets like
Girls I love,
To whom those sad flowers I gave: and even now crepuscule
Is coming, into which I always look more beautiful;
And even now I could move right back in amidst those Sad graves, or I could climb the tallest mountain in the world,
And look down the dresses of all that is beautiful;
And I am almost done: The fire is smoldering, while Her eyes have always, always turned away,
And this night is just another silken menagerie into which I am off alone, into which I have no one left to play.

Robert Rorabeck

No One Outside To See

I try to write a novel. It goes nowhere,
For a half hour a day, while the ravens make love
And then defecate like spots of summer snow on Rotting wood; it should really be a movie,
Feckless and waiting for the bus to display
Like a cloudy eucatastrophe forth from red holly,
The cradle for indigenous serpents, and legless saboteurs.
I had this idea, and it involved men and the sea,
She was an early goddess, now, defunct:
A waitress with sagging breast, varicose, wrinkled
Shagging cigarettes, though beautiful with a chainsaw
Purring from her throat- i am volatile, like close history,
Shaking before the cadaver slumbering on display
In the center of the theatre, like pre-science, and the first
Small metal sent up into the sky to parlay the lightning;
Her surf is malleable, the shore palatial, though barren-
If studied, predictable, but still no less violent,
And, afterwards, forgetful, awful- the way footsteps
Come inevitably down the stairs, how the knuckles rasp
The lonely flesh of the door, how the solicitors ring persistently,
And finally, how the rains show that the sunlight is deceitful,
And thus flood the lawn and make suppliant each flower and Tree, and give the beautiful slick colors to the road,
In such afternoons when there should be no one outside to see.

Robert Rorabeck

No Reason For Light

Contributing to suicides:

The starlight on her skin, outlasting her patience,
Her will to move into the lucrative arms of well-lit pools,
And the estuaries of bank accounts;
Their light could last for ever on the pale bareness of Her upper arms,
Shimmer there like monarch butterflies in the sparse
But powerful forests in Mexico,
Resting their delicate foundations after their migration;
Even after they had died,
Their light could remain upon her well into her grave,
Given the chance,
They could feed her, sustain her with the permanency
Of famous oratory, but she moves away:
Again and again, like a teacup of water tossed into the river.
She is not herself anymore- She is a thousand others
Rushing to embrace the sea,
Where the unknown lights fall now is not for sure:
Lies in a complicated meadow, a parking garage,
A steep driveway after a slick rain, vibrating with the Trepidations of loneliness
The poet stoops to unread,
For now, living or dead, there is no reason for light at all.

Robert Rorabeck

No Reason For The Astronauts

In this new heaven—an infantile god,
Left exposed amidst the echinopsis of the easement of
The canal—
With his crocodilian smile having already eaten
The hands of reprobates and pirate captains—
As my mind swoons in rum—
And old, old traffic continues
Beating its drums—
The traffics will sail forever onwards—
And the moon will weep and weep beneath starships—
But I no longer suppose that you will ever
Love me—For nothing that
You once spoke to me has the ability to survive—
And in the same amount of time it takes housewives to Kiss each other,
You will be as round and seeded as a pomegranate—
And when you look up tomorrow, the sugar canes will Already be burning—
And there will be no reason for the astronauts or
The angels to ever set foot again upon the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

No Reason To Exist

Night unglues,
Chemical bonds of homeopathic cities
Return to the spindles of a wimpled
Sky,
And not far a field, the teal collateral waves
Paint the limestone fences of the Conquistadors' graveyard,
And nothing is seen, and nothing is heard:
And the memorial park is spaced as evenly as
An orchard of wooden faith,
But instead of oranges and Mexicans, they Are putting in plastic bouquets
For immortal faith- and no cats are buried,
And no dogs nearer their families
Tumbleweed tombs, except in Ancient Egypt and Polynesian bedrooms;
But though I barely have touched you, I still lick
My fingers from the slight molecular bonding of Unreal high school,
And you seem to come down like a moat of light over
The sea,
Jacob's Ladder leading me to the higher fruit of Defeated fables, so that there is no purpose in morality,
Or reason, but only your nightgown fetching
Sweaty snowflakes,
And uninvited I should really come and be happy if Just to be the shade of your illogical annoyances,
And collect with the impassible spaces
Between your opal shoulders, your marble hips,
Those unrelated heirlooms which are all the more
Priceless because they have no reason to exist.

Robert Rorabeck

No Sea

There is no sea here,
I see no sea;
This is the body of the desert,
The rich made faint blue,
From stolen oceans,
And it is where I live now;
In the dizzy trail of the sleeping conquistadors,
In your memory,
And the super-market sample of love
You gave me to try some many years ago:
Here the cactus I pricked my thumb on,
And this one has stolen my jersey;
These are the naked declivities,
The changing rooms absent of shadowy abdomens,
The red stones of stolen Indian reservations,
The retirement homes for snow birds;
The corrugated roofs where no rain falls,
While your lips peck his opium neck,
His steroid elbows,
His cocaine phallus: I walk out into the naked abscesses
Of some disease;
The doctors have given it your Christian name,
And the perfume which smells like your showered flesh.
Surely now, I will live into obscurity,
My dogs chasing the jack-rabbits, and I your c$nt;
The sun is a bronzed gladiator, upon which I decapitate;
Tomorrow the stock cars will go around and around,
The smell of expensive gasoline, worshiping you;
The legs you keep unhinged for the carnival of strong men,
Baptized in the single fluidity we have here;
Pagan, I worship you,
Without a breeze, the dead boats, and it feels like crucifixion,
My organs pricked by the briars of the blistered graveyard
Of you, unblinking.

Robert Rorabeck

No Solution To Anything

All of the thunder that is out of fire—
What noise does it make when there aren't Any cars—
What sad lions frown when the wetness
Threatens their cages,
And then they have to put their manes
Down like the empty bottles of winos,
Like ghosts of dead baseball players in
Their batting cages—
And the fearful illusions have given up,
And all of the beautiful girls have traveled home—
It almost seems as if you can still see them,
Pretending that they are lingering upon a Darkened road—
And that they keep their needs for you in Their thoughts—
And the day languishes badly:
The ribbon is cut,
And there is no solution to anything anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

No Special Roses

I have no special roses
Or anywhere else where I can move—
The acolytes pantomime
The stars as the stewardesses leap across
The oceans in the airplanes:
Everything seems to be okay,
But who am I to guess:
I think of her lips in shanghai—
Or the forgotten parks of our marriage,
As the bones get ready to dance
As they do again and again.

Robert Rorabeck

No Such Familiar Echoes

Liquor is cheap and her eyes are gone,
And the school has not accepted me- There are Thieves in electronic gardens with yellow fingers as thin
As dabbing siphons trying to lick up what I've Saved all these years:

My scars are sometimes receding like a giant surf,
And I have forgotten the sticky thumping of the only other Sex:

All I do is this, and the liquor helps. I do not range after Bulls- I do not go out and pan for gold, or fish,
Or through the wind tunnels they have in the deep blushing
Hills of other countries- I do not try anymore to interfere
With the natural curves and persuasions of a lovely body:
I happen to imagine she is well satisfied, engaged to better
Artists, watching football; it sounds like I'm about to cry,
But I will not do what is expected.

I only have faith in what is most likely, the way things go
Like little children rolling one by one down the hill to the ever
Resting cemetery, laughing, and then up to steal plastic flowers
From their flameless tins;

No, I will be home for the rest of the night. I've already begun
To lie down with such certainty. I will not get up to check
Beneath to see by the lights of the pool if anyone is coming up.
There are no such familiar echoes- it is as if I never met her
Out in the open air of boisterous cafes, or that she kissed my Neck, brushing against me with the comfortable fires
Of a phoenix becoming reborn.

Robert Rorabeck

No Valentine

I procrastinate on my poetry:
I have nothing lovely to add:
You turn me on, you turn me on, you
Know, but it doesn't get me anything,
So I look up ghosts until I have to get up
At five a.m. to meet the Mexicans driven in
From Chihuahua, or Mecca- We work all Day with the yeguas- Soon they will make my Father so rich that he might as well become the sun-
I can't believe its been five years now, and the pain
Still lingers in my throat like a bite too big to swallow:
She is happily married moving around in her puritanical
Tresses in the humid sanctuary of his last name hitched
To hers like a train car: She can't even remember me,
The half decade we spent together. I can't look at My face, either, for I became lost long before I found
Her crying in my bed, and I should never have turned her
On: Never visited her high school bedroom, got naked
With her and watched the colorful plays of her childhood,
Wanted the connections of transcendental love,
For she is now the sulfurous ghost driving around with Me as I try not to put on my reflection, and she is all I have Still when I am all alone in my room with my dogs about Ready to crawl into dreams that I fear; I didn't want to Write another poem, but it is all I have, and her like Ashes in an amnesiac storm: Already now they have kissed
So many times and made love in a bed which shares both of Their names- I was just the healthy transition for her,
A part of college, another way of growing up, but she never Understood that I was made of an eerie material, already Gone into her grandmother's valentines, I can barely breathe,
But the second half of this last decade was theirs,
And I have been in my room howling with my dogs taking myself
Back in time, trying to believe I don't need no
Valentine, don't need no roses.... anonymous and another poem,
Until I display my bones to my dreams, and let the pallbearers
Carry me through another year.

Nobody

Nobody's fall from the sky these days.
Nobody's are ever home.
I like to stand at the edge of the green with
The white tent and Christmas trees
In the opposite of crepuscule;
Then the traffic is somehow tamed,
The lights seem to have a cause. All the necessary
Mailmen are sleeping,
And my muses are unhinged of bras.
Sleeping with their men, or sleeping alone.
Maybe they turn to the side and scratch an itch they Can hardly feel:
That is where they've stolen my rib,
That old exotic deal,
But by morning they are busy with scrambling eggs.
They walk out into the Garden of Eden like they Do everyday and put their hands on clay:
They are making better men that they can feel,
Breathing unreal life into them,
Their children entrained like ugly goslings to them
Swans,
While the sky snows nobody's from its ceil.

Robert Rorabeck

None That Resemble Mine

How beautiful Satan is, and how perfect
A social crux:
There he is standing before us, my auburn love,
Spinning and burning like a valley side of windmills,
Making you come and go down into the valley:
You are his child and will live forever in the deep
Underground spaces of his roller-rinks,
While I will perpetually be the crazed soldier of a Defeated war,
Beating my chest for you which echoes, while the waves Become disinterested beneath, when before they'd been
A sorority beckoning for me;
And maybe one of them rises up a muse and cries
For me, and reads my lines while painting her lips and Blackening her eyes, because she sees me as
A little boy in the hallways of her high school a decade ago;
But I have gone my soul: I am a dead firework,
And am the everything that cannot please, that is spent;
And you can't get your money back,
And my love has gone underground with Satan, past all of Those spheres,
Melting the other witches with her tears, making her home
In the cities that cry with the suicide and dead family pets
Into the earth,
Like crystals of sad birthdays going the wrong way;
And her Satan is a beautiful man with so many heads,
With none that resemble mine.

Robert Rorabeck

Nose Haiku

I want to put my Nose in your c^nt; it's all
I need to be in.

Robert Rorabeck

Nostalgia's Marching Song

Robert

Wants to die in a pageant of 25 cent confetti,
Because he remembers the long days of high school,
The fake knives;
The indigo tears cried out under the school bus,
How he used to get there before anyone and the mist
Mad love to the red baseball diamond:
And now he is typing so fast 30 years later, everyone
Forgotten:
Even in high school people were drifting,
Pretty birthday balloons escaping above the roofs of prom:
And now we're all legal: the class of 96'
And some of us are rich, and lawyers: we've worked
For governors and patent offices:
Some of us are well hung- But I don't think I ever Made it through a full day, even back then
I'd fail into Dave's van;
Or I'd smoke the pungent weed out in the failing aqueducts
Which put an end to Palm Beach;
And there are still some sweet things from our class,
But I don't know how they done it: How they didn't turn gray-
Maybe they're Scientists in California-
Maybe they shave with Occam's razor, Tesla's genius abstinence,
Dreaming of our mothers performing in church for sunlit holidays:
And I must admit I still loved them, even though they betrayed
My insouciant trancies:
And I still put out for them, waiting to get rich and Turn young again, to find my eternal princess trying out dresses
Far out in the everglades, perfumed by the burning sugarcanes:
And I loved them all, even the bullies;
And I'll cry for them alone my efficiencies, alone with my Dogs; but to tell the truth, I am winking, because I'm that crocodile,
Never of their sincere religion,
I'd skip the bus as soon as it came down my way;
And slept through the humid educations which swept us past
The verdant orange groves, one step nearer the grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Not A Rhyme

I want to be beautiful.
I want to be Santa Claus.
I want to go to school and learn how
To more expeditiously unfasten bras;
I want to watch her stepping out of the sea,
And wash with me under the same open-ended
Shower seductively,
Which pissed off my girlfriend ten thousand years
Ago, which resulted in our later end break-up
On the far side of college,
And her subsequent marriage to a more colloquial
Boy of her similarly ancient persuasions:
I want to drink my rum,
And fold down my own house and sail the seas as I want to, alone or with spouse:
This is what I am going to inevitably do,
Because I can't be contained in the imaginations of Shakespeare,
I can't write with the vitriolic etiquette of Mark Twain,
Or learn every curve of the Mississippi by midnight:
And I shouldn't try to seduce Erin Adamson with another Expensive bouquet. By rights,
I should learn to die peacefully, dramatically out underneath
The Australian pines with a bottle of Ketchup and paper snowflakes, reading off my lines to My kindly grandmother, the entire audience,
A tear in her eye and clapping with sincere compliment:
I must shoot up my last bottle rocket into oblivion,
Figure out the nesting place for my last line and Then go to sleep, because everything I imagine is so Beautiful, and inspires to the fortitude of infinity,
But society has another game with all the boys better
Situated than me, copy editors and their ilk ready with mitt
And ball out in the red dirt, and I might pray to my Special witch to persuade them otherwise,
But my satanic muse is just this:
She doesn't exist but for the amusement rides behind my eyes,
And she must disappear in me with it,
With all the sadly flawed language I have tried to surmise,

I've cut her out of copy paper and breathed breath into it,
But giving the busty golem a will was a depressing
Mistake,
She'll heard the steak sizzling on the grill,
And the ants crawling through the grass, the blue midges
On the Victorian field: She can hear everything;
Set loose like a well-crafted paper-airplane, she's gone
To take advantage of it,
Leaving me with a hand that I can't play,
An empty bottle of booze,
The last line of a poem but not a rhyme for it.

Robert Rorabeck

Not A Single One

Don't you have time to enjoy the rays of the sun?
Grazing the decapitated field,
you could be anyone of your brethren:
Sometimes you take the lead through the barbed-wire suicide slums, but where are you
leading them,
the stray-hoofed pack
conjoined by the space of your neighborhood,
the leather you show off,
the suits of your field your children grow into.

Your handlers,
the greater things
that skip-a-rope between the space of your valueless horns, the shoot you follow as if through a ray of sun,
instinctual and barren,
you have many good days, but do not own a single one.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Another Mate To Be Found

Our house moves on wheels, and I've been Drinking without her acknowledgement,
Like Mickey Mouse without any horses:
My mother looks at me, hair as silver as ice-clouds.
When will she be going away,
So I can touch myself. Yes, she is going outside,
To know what little of god, I suppose, as she finds in her Amusements beside the marriage beds of committed Roads;
And if I were more beautiful, I would have her looking Toward me every day,
I would keep all the horses entertained in the valley
In a drive in movie theatre; and I would call her over
With her eyes of some month's green birthstones,
To entertain her by flexing like the biceps of an orchard,
Or that is just the liquor speaking,
Always howling at this time of the night like a cat on his Proverbial roof,
Down in my perpetual valley of moving stones, like some Kind of desecration, the only cars exploded,
The tourists as weary as skeletons,
And not another mate to be found.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Another Turn

How will it feel when they go down in love's arms,
After friends and relatives have told them that they should-
That she has gone and left me for the boat,
And ever since I have done my best to lose my charm
And sink amidst the dunes she has no right to follow into,
The memories are mostly dead, ripped and scattered
And under root; but there is no liquor in her stead, no
Room for anything but emptiness- They have gone away
Like I've said, taken the bus down to New Zealand,
All the girls are dead and I am toast;
The men are fishing deep in the cliffs, but all the girls
Are dead, floating on weepy breasts;
And I am dead (but dry) , but for this little thing
Ticking out in my head maybe Morris Code- I should Have looked out for them, I suppose, I should have called for Help- Too caught up in the thorn and rose that the neighbors'
Planted- I corsage their yard and the bee kisses me:
I should return this morning, or hand them their paper in the Least, for word is that she's returning, returning softly weeping
In the east. I guess she left from in his arms, or maybe she is Just taking a break. Maybe she remembers how it felt Down in my arms, but I could not feel her deliberate returns-
Could not feel my dead loves concerted rippling;
I could not answer her to tell her that I was dead,
And will go down into the dunes to do no work:
I am left of all my charms, and all the girls are dead, but one
Says she is returning, but I have left off all my naming charms,
But will open my eyes one morning under the rosy thorns
And let the bee kiss me as it should; but not her, because I am dead
Come morning.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Anywhere Around

Beautiful in the common place
Underneath the bricks of blinded
Rainbows,
As all of the parks wait in the recesses of
The highways until
We cannot remember our loves:
And you go back to your husband, and I buy a wife
Who is more beautiful than you are
And puts delicious scars on my neck,
And keeps me riding all the way
To the west coast
Where new poems can be divided and I can Live out my younger years
In a trailer park that never knew your name:
In the luscious abstraction,
In the curl of the waves not a single tourists
Has ever heard,
In the cusp of the shallow nonsense that Feeds itself in the gloom,
I will find another playground and amuse myself,
Pretending,
Even though you are not anywhere around.

Robert Rorabeck

Not As Big As My Sister's

Days lounging in bliss and are afraid of new shadows,
And it went down like this:

I armed wrestled with her today, and told her she was very Beautiful:

She pretended not to believe me; and my sister bought
A house to in Phoenix, Arizona: A house much bigger than mine,
But much further away from the sea as well,

And she didn't pay cash, but she will have plenty in time:

While I have been alone for seven years: I told Alma it was only Six years, and she still couldn't believe me:

And I want her to cashier for me in Moriarty New Mexico, when we Go there to sell fireworks, for I have never seen hair as dark and Red as hers, and I am not afraid to tell her how beautiful she is,
And I think that she likes to hear it and rather believes what I have to tell her; and I already have a house for her,
Just like the Alamo, so sweet near the indentations of its Spanish
Rivers- and just down river from the Norton Art Gallery,
And it is mine, and maybe Alma's too, even if it is not as big
As my sister's.

Robert Rorabeck

Not At All Like Sunlight Through Those Graves

Impolite to recall what cadmium we cover
The graves with,
Pretending to pack fading names with fireworks,
Then how the clouds touched down and studied
Over our shoulders,
Grew depressed and frumpy-
How the dog got stuck between the wrought iron
Teeth and whined a little,
And then was too tired. After all, the university
Had rejected us, had finally set us free like
Prisoners after so many years,
Saying now that there was either cockleburs
Or stars in our eyes that it was wrong to keep us
And that we should go away,
Even though our cheeks were scarred and we had Ink stains from the dress of their library
Under our quivering nails.
Here in this segregated graveyard where thimbles
Of blood ants battle for unlucky chicken bones
Through each vibrant blade,
And the damsels across the student way open their Windows in slick young rows,
Exposing their bosoms across the humid panhandle,
Speaking words that are lost beneath the traffic.
Perhaps she loved us, I don't know,
Under one of her perfect masks,
But there is too much sunlight playing through the Divine emptiness for her to see us,
Even if she wasn't looking for someone else,
And the job concerning the dead is done fore,
And time for us to drive away, I think to watch
Hummingbirds levitating across the Arizona desert,
The weight of their two cents just enough to skim the honey
From the procreative cactus,
Proving once and for all that we walk too heavy,
And are not at all like sunlight through those graves.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Chaucer

This is not Chaucer,
But I've had the chance to finish it
Before I die:
So I love you,
And this is the underdeveloped post-script
I haven't really spent much time on,
And the bus is coming around,
And the lions are busy yawning waiting
For their trainer to fling into their Mangy insouciance entire pink-throated
Mackerel,
And I am too nervous to flee towards
The mosquito truancy deeper in the Florida holly where the traffic
Would not see us,
And from where I stand I can see
A moat falling for miles
Into that old familiar cave,
If you remember,
Where we pretended to live.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Chinaski's Rhyming Poem

Silver fish stream like metal cars
As dead greasers play chicken in the stars,
Dead greasers play chicken in the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Disney World

This is not Disney World- This is something better:
This is nothing that the tourists read: this is my homeless fitt,
Finally coming around to third base and then on to home:
These are my wishes making love to Alma:
These are how I make love to her, and call her out when she is Not at home,
While she has been so conditioned by the starshine and by their Chrome;
And this is my fairytale meant to persuade my queen to put away
The greenness of her cannons,
And to remember all that I might mean, while the turtles are making
Love into the strange calligraphy of seashells,
While the airplanes are leaving their ex-lovers and going off to Explore the rhythms of newly unexpected folklores:
This is my burning house for her- Alma, this is My everlasting wish for you- In your beauty is capture all of Woebegone Mexico swimming upside down:
The virgin of Guadalupe swings her amusements upon your neck,
And the airplanes and the hurricanes roar,
While I am only good for recording the sincerity for my feelings for Your lush and un supposing sounds,
While your extended family sleeps next to you, and I am left to crawl
Nearer the sea,
And to take her lips to mind, which is and always is a poor supplicate
To drowning into you.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Entirely Sure What I Saw What Is Still Taking Up My Time

I just don't care that there
Are so many people moving in my mind,
Given over to drink and conversational
Séances—That I cannot succeed with them
All inside me at once,
And even though many of them are beautiful
And have tall legs, is no good excuse;
Or that I see them riding trolleys through the Overgrown city, and even though it is Another day they are still sharing in the Same conversation and drinks;
And everyone of them wants to be enjoyed
By me, but they do not want to understand me,
Or sit by me, or say, oh well, and give up a kiss:
Rather, I am something like a steady grandfather
For them, and seeing them is what I do for them, Because their business really isn't any good unless They have someone to be seen by;
And this is what I do for them, but curl on out of My avenues and watch them moving without effort,
Seeming to stand still in my vision, conversational
And well intoxicated;
And it occurs to me that I'd been wrong the entire Time, that, yes, not one of them gives a nickel for art,
Or the smoke halls of abandoned theatres,
Because I can never find them there when I find myself
Out of work, and must go driving for them;
But they also care nothing for money, or becoming Rich, which I thought was the America profession,
But rather they care only for this, being accepted and well-
Liked by the other people I have picked for them,
And sent running into them bosomy and well-suited so that They at first might apologize, and then begin in conversations
Which last all afternoon, tall men leaning up against these Petit women all dressed up in street cars,
Their eyes the subtlety of their greatest needs, so that I Could only say truthfully that I had seen but one of them

Glancing briefly toward my emptiness,
Making sure that I was still there and painful,
And keeping my unrequited watch, taking mental notes□
Of the lovely things and their perfumed apathy
As they quite eagerly carried on.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Even A Drop

If the night sings, then the days get busy,
Boisterous almost- The airplanes never let up
They go by their ways of fishermen as busily
As maidens leaping beneath all those stars,
The junked satellites ceasing to wink, forgetting
Their managements:
And this is true, that I don't really understand the Paper tombs, the happy exploits of paperboys by Their expanding routes, the professors in their Ancient caps, the beautifully young wives,
And the red bricks they all play in well stacked and So very high: So, toss your hair as you will quite Carelessly, not even looking at me or contemplating
To explain this: I am not drunk anymore,
Not drunk over nothing, I am quite dry- Like a fish
Who has evolved, who has discovered some new formula
And sits quite slyly in the grass wide-eyed and brilliantly Smoking his pipe, waiting for the man who might have Been his father, if he'd only thought something more
Of the sea,
All the ways to go, and by what means you plan to use
To get what you want out of it; but now I can't even think,
Because you've walked by and the day is so busily empty,
And I have not had even a dropp to drink.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Even An Echo

As they dimmed over high school,
And the baseball diamond,
And the inevitable wives went home to Their inevitable husbands:
From the malls as from the estuaries-
I thought of the romance
In the valentine of a firework: very cheap
Romance bought in packs
Like cigarettes- for an amusing moment-
To scare the children,
And annoy the neighborhood- and yet to Come from so very far away-
And to be so profound in their beautiful
Daredevilry,
But too end up not really there- to last for
The moment of a lover's holiday-
A honeymoon of overpriced nonsense-
And that is all:
Not even an echo, not even a sad knock on
A sad door.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Even Bret Harte

The day pours its molasses over the older
But still working body; I have nothing to do,
And I am almost as old as Christ was....
I think of a Jesuit college, and graveyards where Beautiful women already sleep who Have won Pulitzers, and were married to men
They did not love: but I cannot look into Their eyes, even though they are everywhere.
My mother is away at the grocery store,
And my dog is asleep on the sheetless bed,
And how he runs as he dreams I can never be Certain. There are older tales than this, little seamless Plays, echoing of high school which never quite Happened. My father is fixing the fence, and I have a book published, but I should be outside
Working, loving women in fastfood restaurants,
Beautiful women who might go down, who do
Not expect so much. Soon there will be a new president
And a parade, and then I must stop hibernating. I've Saved almost enough to buy a house, but not quite,
Like the poems I display to no one, the great band
Full of spittle and sincerities. If I had awakened earlier,
I should have been Mark Twain, but now I am not Even Bret Harte, and no one even knows who he Is anymore, and that should be the subject of my Dissertation should I ever step back up to the plate,
And show the blue devil on the red mound what I am capable of....

Robert Rorabeck

Not Ever Will Be

Now the night reciprocates and I can't Even believe I am doing this:
I have lied to you for so many times, the sea knows and
She is no longer amused:
The sea does her thing every day, traveling from spot to Spot,
Just like you: and she only loves one man, just like you,
I suppose;
And now the night turns herself around, and I am not well:
By what hour do you touch yourself, and do you ever wonder
About your daughter,
What future she might have in this vast midnight;
And it is awful, so beautifully awful, and the orchids swarm.
And maybe you don't even know,
The reticulated cul-de-sacs where I once grew up awaiting the Ice-cream machines that you are never really attending;
And now you are fully grown and don't feel the sea:
It just comes boiling up to your eyes like a pet,
And you pay it no mind, but keep boiling up the cup that doesn't Even know my name;
And now I wonder, Sharon- Now that it is too late, and all the lions
Have bitten through the chain-link habitat you built
For the ski masks of their beautiful moonlight, that you should Care to be afraid to die before I awaken;
But the sea is so beautiful; and your orchid has never had a need
To know anything other than it is marvelous,
Having created your daughter;
And the world turns like a vase you made of water:
It just turns and turns, and there isn't any need for any other language
Into its being other than it is beautiful;
And it's name isn't nor ever will be, Sharon.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Just A Werewolf

If I could dream of you then after school
Where grass stains and burns
Kidding knees, where you might Fall all tripped from a rather long basketball game,
Held over slightly weeping:
Just all cut down because you couldn't grow anymore
After seventeen:
I bight my stained teeth without looking you in The eye
Lounging through classes in the flooded parking lot
With no one around to tell you what they like
. Oh, how so like a steamy love scene in a
Rain stained teen-romance,
Folded pages of cartoon characters and knick-knacks
Almost humming; or just beneath the press-
Metal corrugations out at lunch, and the blue eyeliner
And all those truants smoking in their rows,
All in their finely gaggled tresses like fashion
Read macaws, but not one of them a true Indian-
Not really anymore on any long term warpath-
Not even conquistadors, not even
One such: Alligators as tiny as plastic green grenadiers
Lost in inland dunes,
Nipping at their bashful ankles, ant lions and me too-
Little love bites like stain glass splinters,
Like the humid spindles Mosquitoes flume:
That night they threw a little carnival amidst the red courtyard
Where we sat around seven in the morning, casually gunning
At each other with lustful eyes, the special ed students moaning,
Trying to eat early morning butterflies; and two liter pop
Bottles full of Vodka, and quarter sticks of Dynamite-
Suburbia all drawn out around it like an orgasming picnic.....
Then pixie sticks and cocaine on Halloween-
Moms in the kitchens and rotten eggs
And cops and Roman Candles on David's roof.
Stop.

Now I'm 30 with scars to prove it that you never did really Love me- never got my name.

I tried out for track and got lapped by a black kid,
Try to follow after your neverending legs,
But ended up stealing from the neighbors-
Then had fever-dreams of becoming an ornithologist
Awakened again in the expensive Scotsdale desert.
When I told you I'd written really good analytical writing,
I foreshadowed you'd slapped me and drove off into the cherry red
Show floors of used car salesmen,
Revolving with romantical cliffs of silver chrome
And elevator musak:

Then, home again, hung-over,
Engorged and onto something bad:
just a careless child as foxy as Tom Sawyer, skipping school
And smoking my corn cop pipe,
Not just a werewolf
Flicking something bothersome, I catch blue gills and slap them
Promiscuously against palm trees, because someone told me that Fish couldn't feel your eyes upon them smoothly like pre-Socratic
Trainwrecks in newly washed linens: Those candies were for him,
All your lavender spaces,
Lemon drops, warm molasses poured into quivering
Recesses, cakes on the griddle

But the secret knocks and epitaphs on grayish tombs
I'll keep,
The not so far off lightning,
Something Gothic foretelling on chipped porcelain,
The letters above my head sealed but for the nearly blind woman
Who feels them like a cantankerous fire lapping like
A fine young specimen out in the open skies of her
Double-wide bedroom
Like an ever living library rolling an almost green
And cold hearted sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Just Tomorrow

Knocking one out as the Saints go marching like ants,
Under the rings of cherubic lattices,
Just as chubby as rabbits, their whiskers ululating
Pejoratively into another lettuce garden;
And I do this to resurrect my friends, and to Befriend my sisters:
I get warm on the evaporated substances of my youth,
And I cuddle to her like resilient fish surviving in its Sea of fire,
Like a poor student emoting all that he feels underneath
A broken down bus
Until it finally takes flame and becomes the impassible
Dragon,
Under which all of the earlier muses fail or are sacrificed,
And the rivers of beneficent incest begin to sing out loud:
The conquistadors come again,
Silvery polished and caroling; and everyday there is a wedding;
And beautiful things tend to happen in these moments
Where water and sunlight falls expeditiously and not Just tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Not My Muse

Who am I reading now: The long adventure
Of this thing,
Breathing in the goldfish at the movies,
And then you are there all tucked in and crenulated
Coming up and going down
phallacio for firemen and wresters, and other things
I can't spell.
Oh, if we were in New Mexico, but then you would Be in love with my brother in law;
And there should be some greater morality to this.
There should be a better way of saying this,
And the mythology which would give meaning to Selling used cars;
But the sky is just blue, and tarped a deeper blue in Crepuscle: You know when that is,
Because the airplanes are coming in, touching down,
And leaving off their trams of lost sheep,
And the ocean is roiling like unending pieces of Eight, the cutthroat monies of little white towns that Don't exist anymore,
And fore some reason I am thinking of Michelle,
And I am thinking that she is reading this,
Even though I do not care, since she is not my muse.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Sebastian

Shower off everything else,
In the little apartment biding time,
The recourses of the month, the sad tuitions,
And the dreams that step out the door and Drown with the leafs in the communal pool:
The clean death smells of chlorine.
Two stories up she lives with her two Dalmatians
In a studio.
She studies to be a paramedic, a house wife,
Something greater than working at the drive-thru window,
But she doesn't look at me.
She has always looked at you, but you are already a father.
Someone not named Sebastian, a grad student in a bad economy;
Everything here rings like the wind chimes' telephone.
I knock on the door, but no one is home.
She is making love somewhere else,
A place of greater expanses, a concrete prairie,
A movie theatre, the football stadium,
And the blowndry herds masticate towards the gymnasium
Where their eyes fawn, their bodies move
Under the greater lights of the upwardly mobile marches;
The bellies of middle-class diplomas sweat in the tanning booths,
But she doesn't look at me.
She has always looked at you- Someone not named Sebastian.

Robert Rorabeck

Not So Very Loud

One thousand gypsum fairytales
Just trying to keep my tailfins
Warm,
Pretending to be another
Metamorphosis
A thousand and ten miles away from
Home—
And when it gets cloudy, we sell
Christmas trees:
Just me and my wife,
And the dwarf—
And my grandfather, why,
He is dead,
But fully satisfied now that he has
His anatomical request—
And in the morning floods
And toy boats
With vaginas—
And my hands typing away in the Hedgerows beneath a cloud—
While a thousand girls get off to Themselves—
Inside the theatres of the hurricanes
That are trying themselves to be
Not so very loud.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Tell Anyone At All

Building up in cornpone fountains:
Building up right here, where the fairies fountain:
And right here, where the rhymes crown themselves, speaking
For themselves,
As all of the night proceeds, speculating:
And maybe my loved ones won some prizes, but the night is Another memorial, because it is always because,
With their knuckles in their mouth,
While all of their wives and pets sit speculating: and then
The city is hard up in its jazz of hyperborean lights right up Against the hyperborean:
And there it was, while I was trying to strange myself:
And then it was alright while we were all trying to move
Away, upstream into the closets of suicide outside of guns
And the popcorns of your unicorns; and here it is, after hours,
And afternoon, while all of the elves have called their Terrapins, and there they are, while the busses are all turning Around: and there they are: while you are in his house of bodies
All alone- and I just wanted my fair bit of suicide, fueling up
The semis:
There down deep in the highest lowest aeries: and it wasn't very good:
And there it was, just so floating on their tiny planet:
There it was on my cartoon of a planet with no one who could Really change to love me with the soul star of a superhero sun coming Up just to commit suicide: and Then there was nothing that nothing was, and the lions came,
As the kittens growled, while the tourists curtailed but whom they loved
I could not tell anyone at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Not That Hard

As a male of so little means, this is how I
Won her:
I told her I couldn't be defeated by any old sort of Fire, and then I told her to look at hers,
And to think about what she really saw.
I put pinwheels in her yard to distract the other boys
And their mean bicycles;
And then I sang of the rivers and the mountains of Her body:
I sang up spikenard and juju bees all around her:
I told her she was a topiary and an apiary and both of Those were a mirage:
I bought her lingerie and I waited for her to come for Me,
Because I had bought a crèche to hold her daughter
And her mother a deck of playing cards:
And I kept holding my breath for her and reminding myself
It was not that hard.

Robert Rorabeck

Not The Same Thing As Angel Wings

The birds are having their Own fun
In their theatre above the Park-
The sun is peering in through The aperture
As they spread their wings,
As I see you walking across the Street
Underneath the miracle play of Airplanes-
From behind I can see that
Your shoulderblades
Are not the same thing as Angel's wings.

Robert Rorabeck

Not To Tell Us To Anyone Else

Now the time continues like bicycles carrying on,
While after work Alma goes home and catches up with herself,
While I have so many things left to be saved,
While the bodies jump ship, forsaking their instruments
Or anything else accordant to their metamorphosis:
While Natalie cleans up and I try not to starve,
Even though it isn't hardly even winter,
And we have just meant underneath the overpasses in passing:
And we have made love to the cold meats of our bodies'
Retreating,
For we have been mutually hurt in the cold cellars that tell
So many mitigated fairy tales that it feels like Christmas; .
But not here, and according to the facts of her gods:
Not anywhere else, as the night comes and unfolds her hair,
And promising in whispers not to tell us to Anyone else.

Robert Rorabeck

Not Without Motion

You cannot live without motion—
You cannot reach her lips nor plant yourself
In her arms— You cannot speak her name without Breathing— You cannot whisper to her the Secret things which would have made up your children
If you could have moved into her— But,
You cannot live without motion, and though
You may have captivated her briefly,
Like a landscape she walked through,
Like a portrait in a museum in South Florida
Where she heard her own echoes and saw them in
You— Eventually, she had to move on,
Because she could see no way to move into you,
Because you could not stand up beside her—
Nor could you open the doorways for her
And hold her hand down the busy streets to protect her—
For her, you were not a living thing
Though for five years she tried to make you move,
To rehabilitate you with a miracle, but it did not come,
So now you stand like an empty window
Watching those busy things outside copulating,
Moving further and further away the more they live
Without you and she is gone like a fever dream,
Ever restless, like rain that slicks the world in falling tears,
Like rivers running back to the sea in his arms,
Moving, living— Though sometimes her memories
Shudder the tremulous branches of your forlorn tree
Rooted at the edge of the lapping currents of the world....
You cannot live without motion—

Robert Rorabeck

Note In Class

In this matter
Our certainty is important.

For example,
I would say I love you
And you have to
Circle either "yes" or "no".

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing At All To Do With You

This compares to that, but nothing compares to you;
That second person pronoun, for me definitely feminine:
You said goodbye to me in college,
You kissed my neck out on the walks of the red brick
University; And what are you doing now.
I am so ashamed, that I don't even want to know; but your Legs are so long, so long they deserve to be upper-middle Class- if you start out walking they'll get you
There somehow. I know they will; and you would suspect
Now for me to begin a detailed shopping list telling you about Every part of your mythical body that I came to the store to Buy, to fit you in a kart, as a bachelor to assemble you;
but come now, Pocahontas,
My mythical squaw camped by starlight who lactates pin-wheeling Galaxies from her tits. Why would I do that when you Don't even read my poems anymore; you cannot smell me
On the wind. You smell like Dr. Pepper and shampoo.
You eat dead chicken on a bun with a pickle with Lips so red and vulgar they are like numbed and tranquilized
Mollusks, they overflow like anti-Semitism, like deluged Rose petals; Why should I give anything more to you after I bought all of the bouquets; after I made you immortal in a novel
That will never sell, a quiet pulpy tomb human eyes will never Rest upon like kine on a restive knoll; Not you, you who are Already a champion with great assets, with him to lean upon
And an entire bullpen swinging their bats and spitting dew,
Ready to get upon the red diamonds and clays of the earth
When in early morning you undrape from the sea mists, and I walk
Out upon you, or at least I did when I was a virgin just got back
From running away to Michigan with two black eyes; how I fit nearer
To you, and slept dreaming of you in the hydrangeas by the student
Parking lot; and now it is not fit for you to say a thing,
The certain part of the Anglo-Saxon which is my Achilles Heel;
Turn around like a sprinkler on a lawn, catch his hand like a child
On a swing, and leap away now jumping, yipping, singing as you go
Off the stage, to the backrooms to undress and gossip, you deadly
Beauty a spear in the beating heart of the big city; all possibilities
Laid before you,
But do not turn back around, because this is my poem I keep:

I have run away from the common grounds with;
I will roll it up and smoke it on the swings, use to find buried
Treasure, or leap with it across the irrigation ditches until I find myself
In a cypress glade watching the leaping bellies of airplanes; it is mine;
It has nothing at all to do with you.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing At All To Prove

I can't breathe around you:
This fishbowl is a nightmare that I haven't
Been going, but around and around
You caracoling, mouthing off a fish spell:
Diana,
Diana- The mountains are yours. The streams
That fall down from the mountains are yours.
These words that pattern mutely from my lips are
The dying children you will never feel leaving
Your womb like jugular tarpon;
Like bright and unabashed news revving its Reveling engines out of the carport of absolute
Sunlight,
Like liquor, like unrequited housewives so burned
By seamless shopping that they have nothing-
Nothing at all to prove.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Bad About Anyone

The tiniest fingers of a heart playing a flute
Over the embers of a kindergarten
Fills the pit where I've been singing—
Watched by the cold gems in the eyes of Crocodiles and alligators that once
Watched me kissing you on the mouth
While the whole world turned:
Teachers who were full of themselves,
And housewives too—
Going to and from stores, air-conditioned—
Petty, always forgetful of how they once
Wore roller-skates—
Or how the firefighters slid down the poles
Backlit by the prepubescent mountains
That carried the purple and blue mountain lions
Not so far away from them,
But kept all of their finest secrets to themselves
In the keyholes of their bosoms—
Until the rainstorms came, so full of gasoline
And forgotten fairytales—then the goldfish
Gossiped inside of their wishing wells and Plastic bags—
And mothers whispered to themselves
Underneath the penumbras of the migratory
Ferris-Wheels, where they swore and swore
That they could say nothing bad about anyone else.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing But Cartoons

Rain came of sleeping foxes—
Rain slept underneath the palmettos:
Waters came
Of serpentine conquistadors—
Filled up the baths of alligators
And all of the day long,
The youngish children in their dalliances—
Where did they go in the middle of
A school day—
Not to school, not according to their chances:
Sunlight sang like golden lances
Over rooftops where
It was they spent their afternoon—
Visions of virginsittas came to them as they Drank their bottles,
As they skipped classes,
And folded airplanes and lit off rockets—
It was their springtime in the afternoon—
Where they learned nothing
But cartoons.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing But Rhyme

In the land of bolts and blood,
I saw my old girl riding stud:

He was fast, and he was lean;
Her hips took to the shape of a gumball machine-

I worked all day and blew up the tent,
While they rode around squealing like rust,
Paying the rent,

In the desert their scent was coy but professional,
And the dirt around them was something sensational;

I got their game smack dab in my face,
While they continued braying the two headed caucus race,

But what a thing to behold, the lights growing mold,
And around me a certain patina:

The dimmest Jim, and uncertain John,
The procession of devils and shopping malls may care to live
On,

Though without a dropp of water in my throat,
I thought of her lips as a rosy red boat,
And circled around them as if my tongue were a serpent
In a medieval moat,

But she was not there, for not long did she care;
Tore the curtains, let the windows lay bare,

Like open wounds, processions of apertures curling divine,
She galloped away, I have nothing but rhyme....

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Else To Lose

Vague and beautiful obtuse, '
I am the wino in the satin sheath,
The guy in charge of the remote control boats,
Or at least that is who I would like to be
As I wonder why you keep that moist taugt
Graveyard so well clinched between your legs,
While in the least I very love you,
Which isn't good grammar, and I've spent the better
Part of the evening looking for the moon to denote
Airplanes,
Not thinking of either of those muses,
Just the girl from Columbia who delivers lunch to me:
I could fall in love and watch her spread out her gladness
Across the glades of the sea,
But she is probably only interested because I am the only
Americano along her route,
A curiosity, like china in a shop of bulls:
All these tiny matadors who populate South Florida can Get tiring after awhile,
And yet, if Diana only needs one man to string her bow,
To fletch her arrows,
Than I am the man for her: A good man, gray headed,
Yellow of teeth who still gets carded in Arizona when he went Out once a week to buy his cheep liquor,
But now there is so little proof otherwise except that he still Gets drunk and goes out to the graveyard swings and makes
The airplanes cavort along with his secular censer,
Proving in the very least that his shoes are very wet from working
On the yard or esplanade all day,
And that he has nothing else to lose.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing For It

Reaching inside the passionate gold,
Or tv shows which come on around noon for spent out
House wives: She still has great lips and a clean pool
Her son swims in as a truant: She spies and thinks about Planting new flowers, heliotrope or taking the bus
To Michigan. In her mind, she doesn't even give me a Thought: she is the well-groomed affluence, transmuting,
Insouciant: for this week, a wave coming in, crypt orchid,
The distillations of the shopping mall. She wears a diamond
Ankle bracelet and paints her nails black or bruises them:
I can only give her my time, and how I create her out of a Specific conglomerate, an easy species. She doesn't come in Today, maybe tomorrow. She will go around unpublished
And beautiful just as long as I do, but she's saddled up
And perky. She doesn't read anything but Good House Keeping,
And I've made her this way and given her a pack of cigarettes,
And laid off the scars. I've combed her hair and sat her aside/
I'll come back around tomorrow, have a drink and make her croon.
She has beautiful eyes that like to storm and never look into mine.
She is my third poem for tonight, and my last sip. Boy, she Is looking fine. I almost dated her in high school, and saw her many Times in Disney World on all those trips, watched her flip over in Her dress, doing her routines and cheers before she got married and Took up casual drinking and karate and now I love her and there is nothing
For it. She is Italian and Catholic and insular, and that is all
There is to it, and there is nothing for it.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Human

The pine trees had a crowded soul,
They made a chorus in the salty wind, or they Wined like wounded hounds as the conquistadors
Tromped within their needled cradle;
They placed crosses of forgetful stone about their Knees; or they fell asleep quilled into séances
By the lovely feathered shafts of eerie natives
Who disappeared, the vermilion iguanas hissed and curled and,
Cold blooded, waited naked in the shallow pools
Of limestone. An empty amusement park waiting
For the adolescent band, the little boys and girls
Out playing rented instruments out in the immeasurable Wilderness. They will play games and make love, until
The sport transcends to marriage of cannibalisms:
The forest loses faith into a suburbia, turns cold and wrapped
In copper gallants. Street lights mote the stars, fiddling them
Into blindness, and the cars are busy foraging upon the misspelled Tombs. Now they are married and going to town, the Cypress wear garland and the grass is mowed. Beautiful and Rented, the trees persist like monks asleep, like velveteen cocoons.
Who knows what better language they will sing once again
Nothing human is at home.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing I Have

I like to look at photos of pretty women
And their mothers,
And dream of their husbands as I hike in Autumn's blushing, to where there are couches
Hidden in these woods, and springs in broken
Jaws of igneous stones, the drool from Withering memories, like faucets:
The sunken amusement parks where they can
No longer recall my unrequited bouquets, like Couplets, the prenuptials I gave to them and My sheepish grin: Where the furs stay green
For all holidays, and the draws with teeth of Lightning-scarred trees line my cheeks like Grandfathers: Those subtle-moonlit stones as slick
As wishes, and the blue passing by of a propitious
Lion: I know that she is my mother, or one day soon
Will become her, but now I should not speak of such Transformations; for the elk are making paths to Suite the aspens' colonnade, the conspicuous wind
Rushes through with so little to say, but rushes in
The dawning gloom, and the stars go as sisters
In the wall-less room, go as sisters far away;
And I have said the things I might wish upon
Until I am still, and stand alone save for the ghosts
Tattered and rippling beyond the forest's perception;
But what have I really had to say to her, that is enough?
Nothing I have written should be spoken out loud,
For it is the failure of a stone wall the horde is already Across, and I have watched the well-mannered barbarians
Take her far away from me,
And I lower my head with its sunken birth-marks,
And weep, for nothing I have is good enough for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Left To Prove

Swing me up from the glass lake,
Because I don't believe it is real anymore;
Crocodiles can touch their tears to the Toy soldiers of its plasticine shore;
And Keats died a virgin, as I should have died,
Because the fires I stick my pins inside were
No reason to succeed;
And now there are so many children in a house
That doesn't move,
So many lines of words with nothing to prove;
And the night seems to be evangelical,
But I wonder if it would be as religious if some science
Hadn't invented its better light for it;
The atheisms of fish with shoes;
And you are my brightest bright of hotel muse,
And you come to me in the middle of the night and fluff
My bed and huff my shoes;
And it is because in the end that you are not real,
And I am jumping trains with the cenotaphs of my canines,
That I can finally get to sleep, as I have nothing left to prove.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Less Than Marylyn Monroe

Beginning to the reservoirs: after the dogs
Have returned home,
But the paper airplane we sent out has somehow
Made it to the other side of the canal
And seeing with her vanished eyes
Many of the other things we have never seen before:
The bottle rockets over the path ten months we Sent out lying around her like
Nothing more than the pitchforks of cenotaphs—
The reindeers trampling us to Get to the comets that sing in the remedies of Moonlight—as she lies bare naked for
The serpent with too many tongues,
Even though she has told us that she once
Loved the terrapin who came wandering to her Door while we were playing cops and robbers
And she was dreaming about
A housewife transmogrifying into the migrations of a Butterfly
That happened to be nothing less than Marylyn Monroe.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Of Its Own

By the savage dreams,
Cannibalistic airplanes spread their
Over eager wings:
And sing to snakes and ants:
Red and blue fallen onto the white floor:
Off the tables with no more space
For elbows:
The heroes weeping in the soups of witches,
The masterless dog scratching at the door-
And the moon sick in the sky,
Like a lost child out of the doors of a
Supernatural school,
Ashamed of the glow of its own thievery,
It swims through the meaninglessness carrying
With it nothing of its own.

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing Slips Out Of Her Dress

Nothing slips out of her dress
And disappears into the sky—
Across the street, they are having
A wedding and I am not invited,
But the moonless night walks by;
My feet clap on the sidewalk
Beneath the lights like languorous dancers
At a prom that is over and done,
But no one lifts their heads my way.
They are too busy mingling with Their drinks, pink martinis and flamingos
Though the bride,
She looks young again as she smiles at him—
When I have nothing left to say,
My childhood friends are getting drunk
Under the steps leading down to the sea,
And their lips are swimming in green smoke,
So their eyes dilate on each other
As the waves undulate like an army of whores
In a swim meet
Against their secret enclave—
They are singing, everybody wants to get paid,
While a dead woman with waverly eyes
Sleeps in the bending limed knees of the mangroves.
There, the nourishing ray lays quiet in a bed
Of somber sand, as above on cypress bark
The mantises pray,
And cicadas sing as they shed their old identities,
And even without ceremonies like in the mowed
Yards of people who live day to day
In the backyard patios where ribbons of Effluvious light swim out from the sunlight's
Cascade upon the screened-in pools,
They are able to change themselves— to Leave those old husks clinging
Like the deceased upon the mosses
Hidden in the discreet ferns' shade as
Nothing slips out of her dress
And disappears into the sky—

Robert Rorabeck

Nothing To Her World Always Turning

What is the girl I always think of doing-
I bet she does as she always does, so far sunny
From my glooming:
And I have won prizes today, and shaken
Hands with the really long haired contestants-
I have brought warm soup to the poor, and then
I have taken it away, because I figured I was Hungry myself:
I have thought of words like spoiled beef and who
To feed it to but the sick muse-
In this world where it is impossible to close a thing
Because it is always so busy revolving,
The nursery of epitaphs and uncooked attempts;
I would just like to find her once and lie down beneath
Her frilly stems and sigh, and say almost nothing-
Because nothing I could say would be worth such an Experience- All the wealth in a dropp of her shade,
And it would not be pornography to watch her
Breastfeeding;
Oh, but the things I seem to say just sort of happen,
And mean nothing to her world that is always turning.

Robert Rorabeck

Notice

Awaken, jet gray, while some other grandmother
Is dying today;
And the bells of new satellites ring; new planets are being Explored:
My body feels like my body in that it is a first person horror;
And I have been doing so much exploring along the dress of Her I-95;
And, Erin, did you ever dream that this is what you would Be doing:
Erin, I stared across to you in Latin class and I lamented,
And I bowed my head; and I wished to god I could be more Beautiful for you, if only to capture you, to make you salient
And calm,
And a housewife blushing in your rosy balms. Because how many More years do you figure you can be considered beautiful going
The route you are going; and who has failed you for you to Become so broken, or am I just wrong,
And should be spending my time reminiscing to more beautiful
Muses under the sorrows of those mountains, you know;
How much longer do I have to wear these leeches for you, to Pretend to be impervious to the grays of your apathetic shadows.
Which boys are you kissing now, or which motorcycles;
And is it never enough that one scarred woodpecker loves you,
And has let off carving out his regular figurines of conquistadors:
That I love you, and want to live with you in the very same indoors;
Please, E-, don't let my meatball be lost;
I am still worth something, if you have ever cared or even had an Inkling of love that has floated so slowly out back of your outdoors,
As if you didn't know that its only wish was for you to notice.

Robert Rorabeck

Novel Cartography

I have given a good report of the mountain
To the general and his staff;
And now I must lay out with all my truck and belly
For the east;
For when I summited and had my lunch, it occurred to Me I was not seeing god there in untracked highways
Of boiling air, not so much as what I caught from her;
A glint from a sharp ankle, I think,
An elbow like soldered glass, turned in my way as if Giving a signal of hope strung near the redacted sea:
My tongue spoke as if in its own entity,
Clacking the palate behind me teeth, like trusses on A railway; a mollusk who has caught the cuff-
A silken smoke signal, a whiff of a soda fountain as it Makes love to a beauty parlor: She was a waitress moving
In her stuff; but you see, I am not sure, Major, and that is Why I do not come when called to revelry,
Because I can't anymore fight an enemy impervious to Anything but vapors and hearsay: she has given me a good Reason to start a memoir underneath the shadow that
A heron blooms out to lunch strutting against the dustbowl
Sky; If you wonder where I went, its to the east,
And what for, this is why: She startled me like a sound which Gives harmony to a mottled soul; it resonates now.
She may have already struck
Other fools panning for her illusive gold,
But until I get there, harping thus, she should be a novel
Cartography setting out from dawn to dusk, serving brilliant
Platters to love-struck tourists waddled inland to the sea,
Along the same path I now truck to see.

Robert Rorabeck

Now And Again At 2 Am

Another night alone
In the cage of ribs,
This heart beats like a song bird
Hoping to escape the body's solitary gravity,
To spread out in the rhapsody of heaven's immutable aspect
Like notes on an endless page of unchaste sky
To meet you there at the breach, the last two foaming things
Challenging the other to collide as effervescing stags
On our Elysium Field naked
Before the calamitous extinction
Our two waves destroying the alienation
Of separate bodies,
The recipe of dreams I hold you in my eyes
All the vibrant colors running down the limbs in pressing needs
Before the thunderstorm of fertile possibility Expressing now the way we might become,
Our bodies gathered in a bed and passing hours,
Nesting in those reddest parts where our Secrets collide then become tranquil
And we take on new hidden names
Those we keep pressed between our lips
To incubate and then give to our children.

Robert Rorabeck

Now I Have Seen

Now I've seen through the keyhole of an angel's eye
The valleys of divinity filigreed with curling Spring,
And in them lay two people crooning like song birds,
Pretending they are each flower and bee, dabbing,
Inlaid upon the coliseum basin where sunlight leaps
And streams segment like bubbling yarn before they come Together in a watery tapestry further down
The muted villages where people live and stroll about Admiring the rushing voice joining all as one—
The symphony of two lovers....

Now I have seen you lying there like a marble fawn Resting on a green lawn, with all the light of the day being Attracted to your body as if you held a special element,
As you seemed an endless leap of breathing as your Eyes strolled the sky, even though they sat there watching
Nothing—And I have seen your fingers enfold a speckled egg, Softly like a nest in which a downy chick hatched from your Warmth, and I wondered what it felt like to be held that way
By you.... As God must wonder every day, looking down, Glad that he chose the finest clay and his first breath of The morning to make what you are....

Now I have seen you every day as I wake up alone, the Distant beautiful visage that I recall every morning since
The first day I opened my eyes upon you, like something only Perceived through the keyhole of an angel's eye. And I Have longed for you the way the earth longs to disrobe in Seasons of sunlight, to spin you around in my arms like a ride,
To make you so happy that you return to that point in Your childhood when happiness was all you knew....
But you walk restlessly breathing sadly next to the sea,
Forgetting, as each wave laps away a bit of your injured memory,
Until you are a child of loneliness again, taken away by the Upset plane of blue, coroneted by seagulls shrieking because They don't know who you are....

But I have seen you and even from a great distance I know
Who you are, for all the light of the spheres seems to hover about

You like phosphorescent moths in the backyard of some deep night,
So in my eyes all else is the darkness of a rainy sky, except where You are, and even so far away I have seen you blazing the gaseous
Orb sounding out, spinning unabated in its search,
Like a torch carried by runners between two armies hurrying
To tell that the war is over and now there can be peace....

Now I have seen....

Robert Rorabeck

Now Is Another Time

I have a hard time moving through the day,
Sharon;
So I sing to you between my teeth, between my eyes:
This evening or the next, as always, you will be my sick muse,
Because that is how I borrowed you,
While you let suckle the daughter of another man, while You live like a candle burning in those
August mountains; and if you were to move nearer towards me,
As I know you should; it would do us no good:
Because my mind is made up at the movies, and I am not beautiful,
Though I am almost beautiful: A woman even more beautiful
Than you, Sharon, has almost loved me,
But she has not loved me, though she is the only woman I have ever Known to be more beautiful than you;
And I can still settle for you, Sharon, and I can place your daughter
In a very expensive crib stolen for her off of antique row, which Is now my backyard;
And I am ancient, Sharon; and I have been up and down in the neighborhood
Of most of your mountains, even more than you should know;
And I am very sorry that you have a bruised eyeball,
But it is really what you deserve for making love to other men than I,
And marrying them, and maybe even loving them- I don't know:
All I know is that it is very easy to play-defend the Alamo from my quiet
New home, and if I step outside my door, I can jack-off
Straight into the sea, or I can get drunk and ride my cheap bicycle straight Into her, and you will never feel a thing, Sharon:
I can light off fireworks for you all day long- and I can skip a school for You in which I have never belonged: Sharon, Sharon,
I have breathed like a goldfish won for you, and I have closed my eyes
And perceived being with you, a knight in your court of three days,
Sharon; but now all the random flowers are blooming for your carillon,
Sharon; and I believe I have made a mistake, because I am not certain what
That is, or who you are; but the graveyards I have been in have Been beautiful, Sharon- And now is another time for me to move on....

Robert Rorabeck

Now So Gone

Sepia colored swing sets, how shrewd:
I'll imagine you in the nude,
Bending over the oil barrel or wishing well,
Painting on the liquid enamels a
Homeopathic spell:
Put on your birthday cake fast rabbits or Swifter terrapin,
But no one can ever claim your virginity again:
Like a bike thief in the night, he made a little buck,
And afterwards on both your legs you watched
Movies you could thoroughly quote,
And the university awaited for the morning,
And all its expensive doors: I have never seen a place
More deciduous, more beautiful, for future housewives
To explore:
And I am putting an end to this, like boxes of chalk
On concrete- Little places for you to put your skipping
Next to some barber shops and traffic, how sweet:
And we ate breakfast with your mother, who had important
Secrets to tell you,
Your senses flooded by the usual dreams, I looked out
The effluvious windows at the regular traffic streams;
But I had new pictures there, entire corpulent gardens to Imbibe- You had your tattooed identity, and I my blooming
Lost tribe: Now so gone so gone so gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Nowhere Else To Go

I am soon gone:
I will soon be wealthy enough to love
A prostitute
Forever, or at least on good holidays,
As my exlover has married a lawyer;
And your name swings like a phallus upon its Ever fluming censer,
And I dream that the whore is in love with me
In these eyes of oh so many worlds,
Even if I know that it is only the lackadaisical
Traffics,
Swimming, topless, masturbating,
With your eyes sweltering in the green and Irish Shallows,
With my hands on my pricks,
If only, if only because They've nowhere else to go.

Robert Rorabeck

Nowhere Land

There are roads in this country—
Great, long byways that stretch all the way across.
On them you can spill one sea into the other—
Upon them, ribboned in concrete and tar,
All the day's sunlight flickers and bakes.
These roads leap across chasms then burrow into the earth.
They curl back and forth upon one another, join and stitch
And cross—
They are the avenues of great commerce
And anything is possible— They bleed people and ideas
Together, and before you know it everybody is a neighbor—
Upon them, the barriers of the earth are defeated and laid low—
The ancient becomes primordial, the future the present—
A few minutes and you're there, laying down in that sweet
Destination, making love to a new plot of sodden ground
As you listen to the cars speed by—

With our great highways space has become a singularity—
The lines of movement go by so quickly, and destinations have Melded into one another like the seepage of a rampaging dream—
Here, populations of towns spill along the road, congregate and queue into
The other—They become identical and borders no longer
Have hope of meaning. Billboards raise their ill-shapen heads
Like cubist premadonnas lifting their skirts in long chorus lines,
The lazy flirts hoping that you'll
Buy what they sell, and the franchises of their masters pockmark
The once sleepy burgs which before had risen their beautiful
Heads, disinfected from anything but their own simple purpose
For that day—

Towns are smaller versions of cities, and cities are burgeoning Metropolises—Going into them is like traveling down the mouth of Python you've been in before— You know the names of things
It has swallowed, because they are all here festering in the concrete gut works
Like great pyramids of similar symbols and color patterns....

The roads have brought the addictive infection.
With the speed of modernity, they have flattened the soul of this Nation, and splaying open the dream they have copied it

Again and again, so that the original vision has become muted
And dulled, a dissected canvas mirrored by viral plagiarists,
The cancerous commerce, and instead of our roads taking us anywhere,
Instead, we find ourselves manacled to an inescapable spot
Disfiguring the greatest beauty the sun once shone upon.
The roads have made us prisoners to our capitalism,
And driving down we are put on the assembly line of our bloated franchise.

Robert Rorabeck

Nude Crenulations Of The Backyard Pool

I can go everywhere where this is nothing-
I can give it a good go and insult your mother-
I can blow my battle-cry to windmills and attack
In empty deserts where once basked bouquets of wild
Flowers;
But, I am already gone, the hand language the shimmering
Gesture on the back of the bus
Who rose up when no one was looking and flashed
His fake knife, and told who I love with fingernail polish
In the faux leather;
But there are no seatbelts where I used to go to school:
No safety devices in coffins: my language kind of trudged
Out of the soft ghettos of preplanned lakes fabricated for
The tourists who wanted to see what it was like to transcend
One afternoon: I am here, checking my pulse-
The tampons are floating like postmodern orchids, and at Night the housewives don't think anything of witchcraft where the Gentled cypress are so tame, least of all on Halloween;
And we kind of float out here and tell other fables, like down
Under the safe gendered lights of the meat market-
The adulteries of mindful professions: I have seen you in a parade
Of high heels silver, and I lost my sisters to your nudge;
But I cracked myself to see if I was still real while being very Young, and thus try still to make a sensible motion on the Swing sets denoting the borders of your greengrocers, the silted
Pantheisms of ostrich and alligators above where the sky effervesces
Commercial airplanes, and your sisterhood sings well pampered
Nursery rhymes to well liquored children who mark the hours
By your sweet ellipses in their kitchen, by the nude crenulations
Of the backyard pool.

Robert Rorabeck

Nudging Her To Proceed

Rivers glow for two weeks overboard the stems
Of saplings:
Rivers down from her neck are gracing us with their Effluvious ribbon:
Rivers down to cars and walkways under the terraces
Of the heartbeats of lovers:
Each segment of river a stupendous cord of music
With indiscernible tutors sitting along side her, panting out;
And the wonderful animals there,
Each with his own food and paws: and maybe a girl
Lost from a story book, or torn from another state of Being, her feet naked and breathless beside the bend of the river:
Maybe she will go down into an apartment some day,
But now her eyes only look deeply into our river, as if Hypnotized while every kind of animal you can imagine is Nudging her to proceed.

Robert Rorabeck

Nudity Of Stewardesses

Trapeze of evaporated conquistadors
And other troubling situations—
Hidden by the canvas of the forest
With its red tongues in the cypress,
And blue tongues in the leopards—
With its manageries and kaleidoscopes
Filigreed by undefined hours
And gardens that twist across the napes
Of sand dunes
That sway beneath a sky barren of the nudity
Of stewardesses.

Robert Rorabeck

Nursery Rhyme

I did what I could but the rains still fell.
If you couldn't find me, then you didn't check Hell.

Try as I might,
the floods still came.
If you were not there,
I am not the one to blame.

And the sun blames the stars.
and the stars blame the moon.
And the moon blames the little girl shut inside her room.

Robert Rorabeck

Nymphs In A Romantic Garden

The queer duck
Wants to f*ck
The cement truck

In the rain
As the rain was
The rain because

Humid,
The room is lonely
But opulent

The fan is Moving while
The boy waits

She undresses:
Her first bra
In the grass, roller skates

Robert Rorabeck

O Seasons Of Fraternity

And I see the skeletons swimming in the sky,
The fractured heirlooms and a green dresser of scars;
Those which we were born to distill into,
The finer elements and the camaraderie of ivory widgets:
They are circling in a salmon bloom, brushing off
The last tendrils of murder, like a ball of fish
Try to preserve their virginal memories, making a beautiful mistake-
Like a washing machine cleaning a gluttonous storm,
But only seasoning rust and rabid dogs leaping at the Ball joints swiveling on a point above the earth.
Slowly exhausted they settle like rags on a barren forest
Of rattling sticks, and the crows pick between them,
Cawing like grandmothers lining up at a going out
Of business sale: They call others distempered by the albino
Flume which receded into the whiskered trees,
Like marionettes first tangled in a spilling dog fight and then cut
By a worried mother and discarded as ruined fun;
Here the fortune hunters settle too, and ringless knights,
And weeping widows and maidens who refuse to cut
Their hair; and they are all taking away the portions that They can find when the sun doesn't creep and blind across
The batwings of elbows and knees- A crop of prickly corn
Rowed in the husks of a dervish's plagued army, kernelled in jaws,
Something that leapt upwards across the Nile's prehistory,
And now like a fraternity of forget-me-nots they weather
The glowing storms as the foundational sands fill in the meaning.

Robert Rorabeck

Oasis In The Desert

I have seen you lying under the sky
Like the Great Victoria Desert of Australia,
Your body the milky smoothness of Oasis,
My eyes come to drink with the animals off
The streets, to cool on your body as it yawns
Up to the night—So I toss my head up and Howl and laugh on you with the speckled
Hyenas, as mysterious goldfish swim like
The reincarnations of mute children
Through your reedy shoulders; As your hair
Ripples the auburn banners of its nature,
The aboriginal flag of the forebears of this Mystical continent your body relaxes upon,
Estranged from other women you drifted away
To become the extraordinarily distant place,
The exhaustive study of man's science;
As your thoughts coalesce in the stratosphere,
Each of your memories a winking constellation,
Eerily distant and indiscernible from all others,
Unreachable by our lips as by our fingers,
Though we sate our lonely thirst upon your body,
As our eyes drink in like throats your soul the Length of the earth in dusty dress, you who rises
Before us like an Aleutian well in effluvial waters
Which spray and mist the night-lit desert,
As your eyes are sometimes seen relaxing in Camouflage in the folded places you purposefully
Shadow, until the sun emerges like a bannered king
In the bright conquest of thoughtless empires;
Then you turn yourself away again, become the Settling earth, the crisp red earth, the dry talking
Earth where we hunt upon with naked spears.
We feel you beneath us, guiding,
As we long to lay down beside you, to sustain
Our bodies on your streams and otherworldly portions
Which crouch and pant with us, as we become but An aspect of your indescribable nature,
When you lay down your body, the Oasis in
The desert, sustaining and defining.

Robert Rorabeck

Oasis' Unfaithful Mirage

A sea that never feels has drifted away,
Sad into the changing yards outside of the wharf-
And the lips who have tasted
The sangria underneath the orange blossoms have said nothing
As she slipping away,
Leaving the pebbles of her necklace as she retreated
Behind the rocks-
As if the sun boiled with the engines of her Carriage,
Taking her from the walls of the civilization
That cried the tears that inevitably metamorphosed her
From a peasant to a queen
Until she thought so little of them that each one
Of them became as but a pearl to diadem her saturnine
Dreams- as she curled into the mirages that leaped
Into another shore, leaving only the stones
To marvel at the illusions that haunted the grottos
Of such an oasis' unfaithful mirage.

Robert Rorabeck

Obsessions

When I was a little boy I had similar fetishes,
I drew cars on paper, crayoned in- I cut them out,
Gave them names- hundreds.
Later, I did fast-food origami airplanes,
Entire fleets, tricks and jets- female airplanes too,
To kiss at night and tuck their wings under my scabbed
Ear, to listen to their engines purr,
To the lieutenants whistle- They sailed around
The cavernous green living room, and got stuck in
The rafters, the ceiling fans' vortexes- When I was getting bored, I lit
Their tailends on fire, sent them high above the Crocodile's famished eye, to burn on the Florida
Holly on the other side of the canal....
A land as heavy as Venus under the tractor's plough,
The smolder of sugarcane....
There have been other obsessions, one or two:
Plastic cowboys and Indians in Lincoln Log skyscrapers Attacked by rubber bands in my room- That's How I went on my first date, and Hotrod dye casts Which raced systematically beneath the angular shade of The tall white pillars out in the trembling crux on
The humid front yard, crushing fire ants like four-legged
Pedestrians, and fixations on girls too, ever since kindergarten
There has always been one I have stolen things for,
Have offered arrowheads to down with the doll's head
In the hoary pastures: Chelsea, Daniel, Kelly, Stephanie, Sharon, Becky, E-.... E-.... Sorry if I missed one or Two. Now I play games of little books in my mind, how many
I can read in a week, and tally them up at the end of the year, Offer myself prizes of rattlesnake poems- See how many
I can do in the period of sunset, as I think about other obsessions
Shushed by their men and the unfathomable Atlantic,
The tickling salts where there are just too many to count....
Those would be a few more of my obsessions....

Robert Rorabeck

Occam's Razor

Less complicated and more beautiful
When you don't wear an expression,
I will never know what you are thinking
Except that you love your father.
When he held you as a little girl,
You were free to believe in nothing.
Behind your house the trees began
And the indiscernible cry the birds gave
As they tried to dissuade the sun from setting:
But even that, you soon learned
Was inevitable, as was sleep though
You found time to be alone.
I like to think perhaps you thought
Of me, before you ever knew me,
Even more so than after our brief encounters,
The way I thought of you when I was four years old and cut
My knee on a toolbox:
I could see you driving south along the highway,
Your eyes situated out the window
In a kind of cerulean future.
And even then I knew you would run
Beside me once or twice,
As our lives shared the coincidences
Of the greatest triviality,
But I have never known looking into Your brown eyes in passing
If you ever thought of me as someone
Worth recognizing, which is your beauty
And the source of my love.

Robert Rorabeck

Oceans Of The Grave

Satellites in their fields
Waiting out the fire drills; but little girls who go out
Into them
Sometimes don't return: lips exhausted from blowing
Glass
And birthday candles, wandered into the woods
To see
The incest and the amnesias of the dragon of Mars-
Entire kingdoms and swing sets in those woods, and Doorways to other houses,
That look so much like ours:
Candles on the dunes, in the symmetry of yards that Stretch out to our neighbors
Delineating what is ours- children who knew our Elbows,
And the fragrances of our car ports, passing away:
Pricked into sleep,
Exhausted into day- while the sunlight yearns a Ferris Wheel,
And tumbling of oily make-believe-
Migrating through the static foray-
A parade of illusion, oceans of the grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Ode To Stephen Crane And His Ilk

Get on your high horse
And beat a dead dog-

I've always known who I am,
And never had to show you-

Here I am a furtive whipping boy,
The one-legged ruffraff,
Like Dickens and Shakespeare,

Only half as sharp and waiting with my spoon,

One year older than Stephen Crane, the old boy,
When he was done god reincarnated him as a missive doe,
And set him out with the hunters for his lies,

But still he dances and has learned to leap from Wave to wave,
A red sword in his singing chest,

So martyr me with your dissuasive etiquette,
I know the tune if not how to spell.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Celestial Township

This is a family alone, on a cattle drive through the Sea,
Each one a passenger more beautiful than me,
With the great nebular cloud banks escaping from the Ajar capsules of their senses:
They move in steps of Earth, the sun is the backlight
For their titanic zoetrope,
Behemoths in the glooms of a preschool of a galaxy
Still forming,
Each angel a vesper, taxing the lengths of his yarns:
And suddenly there is life,
As her eyes form a brethren in her morning,
The yokes of a breakfast crackling in the kitchens of A bad outlaw
Who smoothed over the eccentricities of a celestial Township too young as of yet to have any misconceptions of Any god.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Dreamy Canal

Corners of stone children changed irreversibly
While getting off the school bus
By the busybody eyes of some housewife medusa
Who slithers back inside,
Enjoying the air-conditioning of all her days off,
While the somewhat tame otter enjoys the pool,
Cracking cashews on its silky smooth beer belly;
And I laughing down at myself from the seepage
Of the green easement so green
As to be the wedding gown of a vermilion fairytale;
Anyway, it is here, and I am lying like my dead
Grandfather in a great orange canoe:
And the clocks are not running, the milkmen are being Easily cannibalized by dogs; if they were dogs themselves,
And the paper snowflakes snow of fish hooks and Fish strings;
While she bleeds beads of sweat onto her naked legs,
Saltwater confections building to nourish the refined blemishes
Of fire ants;
And I am just the cleverest thing, jobless, skipping school,
Resting assured that the telltale bastards of gods and stewardesses
Will never catch wind of me up the torpid avenue
Of a dreamy canal.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Lizard

The warm spine of a lizard hanging upon a rosy ixora
Bouquet—outstretched from the unruly head
Out front of the house that is for sale, which you can outlet
As four separate apartments—
The lizard lies like a diver reclining on his board—
Insouciant though thoughtful eyed—Knowing that he is On television, but never carrying or even mindful of if
It is his turn—
Nor is he mindful of the airplane in the sky,
Or the hurricane in the Gulf of Mexico—
Or you up in Ocala with your husband and two children,
Or even of me—a man who has to wait one more Month for his pregnant wife to arrive from China—he is just there,
Enjoying the limitations of his senses—
This lizard, a matchstick or a wizard—
Lying there beside to the river of the sidewalk that is Running through the day.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Pieta

Knowing what you will not use,
They glow at night by themselves: they pick up
The amusements the moon pretends
To steal and live off of
The wishes cast down from airplanes:
You never have to wonder where they are going
Now that she is gone—
Her children suckling all around her like a savage mockery
Of a Pieta,
And the garden overplays and becomes so overgrown.
She doesn't even have to pretend to be real
Anymore now that she is so close to you.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Pornographic Disney World

I can say everything to this window,
But I do not have a wife to Say it too:
In this playground I sleep barefooted in,
Just like any other Spaniard,
Listening to the sound of Your voice from my Blind house:
It sounds like an airplane or a storm
A long ways off;
It sounds like wolves who have Lost their voice
But still drum hard-ons through the Forest,
And I swear, I've even heard you
Crying out through the forest
For dragons,
Even as I was wondering off
Somewhere to die,
Even though I was not even sure
How badly I was wounded,
As the traffic passed above me like
The shooting stars of the unnatural heavens
Of a pornographic Disney World.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Spectacular Revelry

Mountains have roots and doorjambs that
Dragons call castles and draw bridges:
And they take their virginal yams down to these places,
And see for themselves the underage nudity
Given to them by the forthright lottery-
Man foolish men want to vanquish them,
Want to leave their libraries and conquer the wilderness
Running underneath the wheels of sky,
And they can try: whole heaps of them littering the gulch:
Sometimes four turtles at once sit on the biggest of Those naive skeletons, sunning themselves
While the dragon licks her like ice-cream and pretends
To want her for a wife, while she screams remunerations
Up to the airplanes circling like tin-can buzzards-
The pilots too frightened to stop watching
As their passengers come in up through the chimneys
Of a spectacular revelry.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Sunny Day

Life is hard all the way around
The angels:
Even as the college blooms as it was Paid to do:
Beautiful in the lumber of its shadows,
Spilling over
Kaleidoscope down slope from
The reindeer—
And maybe if she is in her bed she
Can remember me:
Maybe she can get upset and push off
Into shadows—
I hope she can be the wife of the king,
And she will be triumphant—
With her roses,
And with her ring—
And I will be forced to slip away
From her—like shadows from the graves
Of a sunny day.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Wider World

A field obtrudes onto dusk as my dog sleeps
Between my legs—So very soon I will be taking an airplane
Again,
So far away from the streets where your echoes sting—
And the pessimistic rains put upon them their passion's play:
And I went to work in the middle of the week
And had to speak to my students with tongue and cheek—
All around us, the unsparing light of another day's folly:
Through the chaos of burning waterfalls,
Maybe a sparrow sings—
And children make love like satellites enjoying themselves in The merry-go-rounds of a wider world.

Robert Rorabeck

Of A Yard That Only Grows More Beautiful

Wounds in words scarred from
The thoughts of too much rum—
Brown words as dead leaves filling up
Abandoned swimming pools between my ears,
Filling up the abandoned places
Better people have left for good—
Desires that fill up the lamplight inside the Caves of the middle class—
The very same thing that housewives sometimes Get drunk and have sex with—
Never knowing the full latin names for Either plants or birds,
Those beautiful caesuras of wings and hearts
That happen every day outside of their Windows—but why no latin names
For airplanes, or the other things they Know—and then they close the eyes,
Like terrapins inside their wigwams—
New children come and go—
Young women vanished from the day light
Of a yard that only grows more beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Absolute Discoveries

Bullying faggots of werewolves:
Don't you see that I am still dancing,
Even after the premature ejaculations of Midnights when the crickets
Are still singing and the airplanes are still Flying—
Even if the banners and the singsongs of Carnivals have been taken down,
Even if the Ferris Wheels are no longer
Revolving—
Doesn't it seem to be a beautiful world
With the flowers blooming
That I do not have the power of Describing—
With the busses turning around like butterflies—
And the illusions of our clandestine
Transparencies
Melting away as if pinwheels upon the brink
Of absolute discoveries.

Robert Rorabeck

Of All Of That Beauty

I have become fat with beauty,
Trying to make myself glow with the charisma of Hefty swans for so long,
I have drunken all of the milk at the end of a long line
Of a brigade of philanthropists,
And I thought that it would finally distinguish me
Above my sisters
And that I could steal anyone's bicycle and do caracoles
In the middle of the courtyard to the applause of Those four strong years of girls;
But it has only made me churlish, like an aspen who was Once thin and if destroyed would have made a good walking stick,
But now I am fat with the excess of my stage,
And girls have been so busy looking at me, I have worn them out
So that now they cannot even moan,
And the cannot even be the wind through the branches,
And I can see my mother through the trees still waiting in her
Unlucky car, still waiting to take me home
And put me in a bedroom where I cannot even look up at the Openness of all that beauty that ended up defeating me.

Robert Rorabeck

Of All The Buried Currencies

Bodies are here and then they are not:
Souls are taking a vacation, and if I had prettier things then this Then I would lay them across the knotted strings of marionettes
Across our fair and ventriloquist nation;
And maybe all that we know is dying; and maybe all that we know
Is,
Alma,
And I kneel to the Virginsita every night and hope and pray to You as the cars crash and eventually the planes crash
And then maybe we can make love,
Because all of the conquistadors are all dried up, and if I give you
A child then the copper canons will cough joyfully and all the dogs
Will bark up daisies,
And we can jog on forever through the forever morning,
And forget that anyone else meant anything at all between the lips
Of our sweet and most exclusive of all the buried currencies.

Robert Rorabeck

Of All The Many Hills

Knocking off underneath
An overpass, waiting for the petals of Angels to fall in Charity,
Waiting for the roses of bridges and Whores-
While, above my head, I can hear the wild
Horses and the tourists,
As the sunlight falls down to the other side
Of the mall-
Where the housewives grease up,
And their children learn what to do:
But I don't want to talk about those things-
I just want to lie here,
And keep the heartbeat of the sea
Against my head-
I just want to remember how beautiful
I remember you
Like the first day after kindergarten,
Or when we became lost in a pet
Cemetery,
The day the lions escaped from the zoo
And ate both of our hearts
The way ants eat watermelons at an abandoned
Picnic,
While fireworks expend their short lives
Into the sky, discovering something richer
Than all of this- something unexplainable,
As the windmills kiss across the necks and shoulders
Of all of the many hills.

Robert Rorabeck

Of All Those Hapless Angels

Right now I trust her, while the bees spread her Blossoms,
And the charms are lost into lavish green living rooms
After school:
She finds her own way home again, stuck well behind
The crown of thorns,
In the rucksack of the Mexican neighborhood
Who made its way all the way over here,
Crenellated by the sun who geysers as he always does:
And she stays home again
And gives her milk to her children, but she promises
That she thinks of me; and I hope that she always does,
Until our neighborhoods can bleed together Straight underneath the harps and toenails of all those Hapless angels.

Robert Rorabeck

Of America's Highest Of Basins

Pedals pulling in the spokes of another world,
Even while the rest of it is silent, past the store fronts
And the washing machine,
And the vibrant fabrications in monoliths of invented
Light;
And even while the carnivals turn and make awe struck
Visions that turn our heads up to their bellies,
I fashion for you a very solitary kind of Yard, Alma-
An enigma of a plane that cannot be described except
By the ochre despondency in your eyes,
Where I have seen entire platoons of indescribable octopi
Swimming
Without their secret agents; and you looked at me
Like a pleading mythology in the early morning wishing wells
Of the fruiteria;
And I couldn't count on both of my hands the times I had said to you
How much I loved you;
But the opposite wasn't the same, except that I seem to understand
Now how deeply your soul swims in the tiniest of bodies,
Like the quickest of illusions through the most feral estuaries,
As sunlight seems to skip through the boreal equipages
Where the earliest of the creations still knows how to dance and Keep the pregoniscence of the innocents the very same way
The sunlight sings like titular virgins in the soft stone throats
Of America's highest of basins.

Robert Rorabeck

Of An Immortal Hell

You love him: the storm chirps, the liquor drizzles
Of my lips like rain:
My grandmother is dead in Michigan, but at least she will Never have to be dead again:
Oh, the soft stone, who speaks the finality of the last words,
But to the greater generations,
Like the storm succession of ants in storm drains,
There is no record of their unrequited love, or of their mindless
Hate:
Their many-legged wars on valentines day, or to muses which were
Their progenitors to which they will never care to write again
For:
They have their own sandbars, and their shelves in the recesses
Of the long-jawed barracudas,
While you have your Almas that are worth fighting for:
The pretty songs the depths of her eyes give off like gunfights on the Frontier,
Like monster movies so deep in the night that nobody has energy
For staying up for;
And Sharon is still selling her wine, just trying to survive,
While the Rocky Mountains like the undone Titans of lore line up for
Her:
Like boys with sticks against picket fences line up for her,
While the ponies run and the orchards bloom finally into oranges,
As round and as perfect as unicorns who are blushing
For their immortal batters who are even now rounding home with A satchel full of letters like butterflies in the foot traffic
Of the lower level of the heavens where the feral and pagan boys
Can still throw their paper airplanes without any prayers or Any other fears of an immortal hell.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Another's Good Time

Dandelions lying with dragonflies in the pools
And swirls of perfume—
Lying on their bellies and looking up
At the busses of clouds—
The thoughts that are filled with little girls,
And the fairytales of stewardesses
When they once read nursery rhymes
And had not been out on picnics
With the Arabs,
Or been down the Mississippi of Broadway—
While I was looking up at you:
How I've forgotten I looked up at you,
Jewel in the haunts of day laborers
In the orchards of Mexicans—
And coins skipped across the make believe Borders—the way Indians once lived
On the sage and the brine:
The way lakes once clouded the hinterlands—
Like the lines in a loved- one's palm,
While she sat looking out a window,
While the conquistadors conquered the shores
Of another's good time.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Baseball Players And Really Lucky Genies

It hurts to look myself in the eye
Of gray eyed mirrors;
Hurts to come again on valentines while
You've been playing baseball.
And my mother is washing herself again,
Noisily while the higher basins
Are full of wild flowers and unfortunate
Yardarms:
That I have made you part of the happenstance of my Mismatched collected;
And, no, I cant even smell: and I am sure your Sh&t stinks:
You will never be a stewardess but at least you might Yet still save some lives:
Your hair is as auburn as an apiary of bumble bee
Hives;
And now isn't the sky so low over the apple orchards,
Or the uncanny species of both wisdom and evil,
Body so plumped as to be its own kind of Holiday gone out into the night unafraid,
Sure to make it to grandmothers and get laid by wolves
And hairy men,
By bestiaries of baseball players and really lucky genies.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Blue Bells And Washing Machines

The serpent gave its flesh to my hand—
Leaving a sheath there of what it was done with,
It lit out like an arrow curving into the sea,
Slender rod that does in the god
Kissing through the painted toenails of the waves—
There was nothing great about the art
That covered it—
It vanished across the shoals that had already buried
The first granite crosses ever to come into this world—
There was nothing correct in the direction it
Was heading—
And as it was going along, in slender biceps—
It learned how to petal its stem through the waves
That sang of blue bells and washing machines—
Burying itself into each slender daughter that leapt
In the ways of light to see.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Brand New Spells

I can hear airplanes and misfits too, and the world
Feels good as it works up its hullabaloo:
The world marching through the pinwheels and wind tunnels
To Christmas:
The world tying its bows,
And laying its brown skin through the embers:
The young lovers who touch each other and have no more
Troubles after the darkness,
Their children picked up from the swings of daycare and cared for,
And dinner cooked,
And the voices spread on the sweet television,
While the cool waves bask like sated dogs far beneath the bellies
Of the airplanes who seem to be leaping like hot tempered saints:
And now this,
And now that- the rattlesnakes who lie low grandfather,
The holly bows that switch the donkey's back,
And maybe even now a new god is being born in the terminal's
Lavatory;
And right now I am feeling warm, and the serpents curl like a new Mother who takes, me down with her enchanting eyes into the cauldrons
Of brand new spells.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Cloudless Days

All of the bodies happen for a reason across
The séances of clouds,
Or that was just the beginning of an answer to the stucco
Staccatos,
While the mountains were humming like pygmies,
While all of the rice was being thrown like dice in the games
Of weddings,
And then the fell in love, and then they fell away,
Like beautiful sisters who once had slept together only to Open their pinafore of eyes across the bodice
Of a revealing day:
And then to make the frantic, professional motions
Back into the cloyity of clouds and airplanes,
While their cars hustled and bustled, and tried to make Merry all through out
The most awful and most horrendous of cloudless days.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Coins And Of Flowers

Unicorns in the soft meadow
Fogs,
While Alma is letting off of making
Love,
Dousing her steams and elated
Screams,
She will increase again into Shopping malls,
Deciding again on the Garments who will Jubilee her pitch perfect
Skin,
While I will work for her
All day long,
Working over the genii in his
Brown bottle,
Until I have done something right,
And so deserve to call her home,
To play with her the lucky games
Of coins and of flowers
Of our love.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Course

Disprove me to the traffic
Of lonely mystified occults;
I just want to disappear from the dinner
Party and go up her beautiful
Pathless backside;
I don't want to entertain with the brides
Of beautiful car salesmen:
If I suppose you'd say her spine has the right
Of way,
Slipping, or undulating actually like the Ripples of bannered shade:
I have seen you here underneath the comely
Skirts,
Hibernating with the outdoors bears,
Or I have made you here, slipping into the Rhythms of my feral divorce;
Quietly, ejaculating into the shadows of
The mouths of volcanic rock,
Long since cooled,
While the day drapes in further tresses,
The clouds like floating mailboxes;
And I have loved you here forever,
Forever, my heart leaping like the stride's
Of a godly horse,
That I should have to cry your name
Hoarse: Well, I say it even now,
Of course, S-, of course.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Evaporated Kindergartens

The bears who shrugged and turned into men,
Taking their lights from the dimmed cave
And going down town:
They are not hibernating anymore—they've sweated
Off the aurora borealis,
And this is the place where it shows the most:
High cliffs that have no trouble going down—
Where the briars snag—
Where the foxes frown, crowning my father and my Mother's house—
In this kingdom where they used to live,
Until some ungodly dream smoked them out like Marmosets,
Like weasels—like ferrets— like some knight a witch
Chased around an ambivalent and Superfluous tree—
Until they were too tired to continue in these none such Fairy-tells—
In the iron gardens of Ferris wheels—that lactated gardens
Of evaporated kindergartens.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Everything That She Wishes For

Words in a beautiful book fall naked
Like clothes around open shoulder blades,
Or the propellers of airplanes; and oh how mouths come
To take a look,
And even the projectionists come down, as the tiny kittens some How nimble through the glossy ivy and hurricanes
To find their mother all strung out in the silken sack of the Weathervanes;
And I have been down to the belly of the Grand Canyon three times;
And the last time I almost lost my father,
But looking up this morning there were so many new advertisements
As high as the clouds,
And the sunlight was speaking while Alma yawned awake and brown
In the corner of her little house;
And all of her world was vibrant: it was a jewel who moves and Spoke and combed its emerald hair;
And Alma was born in May, and her birthday cake is still on my lips, Though I am uncertain of everything that she wishes for.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Fallen Needles

Sweet mineral room of a talking skull,
You linger over my desk as the sky ticks-
Echoes of girls on the swings
Over the rain puddles that dry before lunch
And leave the shallow declivities the Mexican women perpetually carry their Newborns over to sit them atop the mat
Of fallen needles and play with them
As the red clay dries on the riverbank
Across the road and the alligators watch the Traffic as it moves.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Fruit Trees The Airplanes Crisscrossed

Becoming a joy to those burning cathedrals you Cannot wake up from—
Flying away into your elements, lactating over the ashen fields—
A single horse stammering your epiphany,
Frightened that you are not yet part of the unreal—
Beautiful, ephemeral and made to collect
Down at the base of the mountains where once the Grizzly bears roamed, walking on their hind feet and Talking to butterflies—knowing nothing of the simpler joys in Each place—dividing in the cells of the nursery rhymes of
The first born—
Who shine like pearls in the keyholes of mountains—
Until you found another man you pretended to
Know
And made love to him underneath the stepladders of Your favorite uncles leading up through the bowers
Of fruit trees the airplanes crisscrossed
Like lovers trying to keep ahead of the heavenly bodies
That were falling to the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Guerrero Mexico

The foyer of my house has a virgin too:

She is right there, and to her I give my blessings to you,

Alma:

And I light my candles like a witch in a cartoon,

While sumptuous airplanes circle the nipples of hot air

Balloons:

The sky is building up its clouds, and I actually sat with you

And ate lunch today:

I tried to get you everything that you wanted,

And I told you that you were the most beautiful girl in the Building while the sky was falling down,

But I was not perturbed because it was not a lie:

A lie would be that your favorite color is purple, Alma,

Or that I did not buy you sun flowers today on the spot and on

The road,

Until I finally got back and found you waiting for me:

And I don't want to give you a child anyways, to decorate the Inevitable swing sets of the sunshine of graveyards:

Yes, a lie would be, Alma, that I cannot swim, and I don't

Wish to do anything to you- Alma:

And I can cook, but I do not love you, and this is the only song

I have to sing for you tonight, or any other night for that Matter,

Alma: Alma Delia Mojica of Guerrero Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Heaven's Beam

What flesh—And nude in the daylight
Of a starfish—
As the consumers come to it—not knowing that you
Can be divided by any number—
The housewives so unkind—
Not knowing how beautiful you might become Knocked out beside any canal
Lost in the daydreams that slip away beside Soft shelled tortoises—
Until the day burns like a beacon and all of the Fireworks swim and Spin—
All turned out, like lips around a bottle of Gin—
Even after high school is lost, burned out, or gone:
And all of the televisions are over,
And the cars have turned away—heading home,
Like a sea this is hungry—
And the great philosophy is hefted up to the stars
And to werewolves, who are no existent—none the less—
They will bury their relatives underneath of museums
As the heavens and the comic strips—
And I will burn everything else down that in inconsequential, Struggling up the mountain until I have a wife
Or pinball—
And can be counted with all of the rest—and not
In a daydream, but in a grotto of a carport—
Gazing upwards as all of the lavishing sides of heaven's beam.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Her Graveyards

Returning to me all of the stars from their Games of baseball—
As the higher basins emulate the laminations that
Our mothers have keeping to themselves
In the apiaries—in the bee hives—
And all of their other rotten places
Where they pretend to grow fruit—and there is,
Otherwise,
The very same echoes of other men—
And the cars sound off like bottle rockets in
The middle of the night—
And you keep the playgrounds of your very own
Saddles pegged to your classrooms—
Until all of this is abundantly in remiss—through
The cold of everywhere in the early mornings—
Until, even before sleep, I can hear the airplanes
Touching down—
Pretending to play with themselves in a game of Baseball—until all of the lamplights close—
And the end of anywhere accounts to the flight
Paths of the luck dragons—
As the bottle rockets are sure to misfire—
And then there is a sunny winter somewhere over
Her shoulder—just as the stewardesses are Turning around—
And another school year seems to be over forever—
And forever—with her eyes expecting the fires
In the night—and the moon continuing to Shadow herself by the shoulders over the own imaginations
Of her graveyards...

Robert Rorabeck

Of Her Hungering Dish

I have a book of all of your shoulders—
And you do not remember who I am—But Won't the dolphins surrender to the sun—
Evaporations of the merry-go-round of Your mothering shoulders—
Until all of the day is cradled in the night of Those mountains,
And the magnificent spins—a world of spiders in Their equinox—and other things I do not Wish to comprehend—I can hear a muse putting Her fingers in the kiln to Retrieve her children—they are already something
I haven't knocked—
And the sun blooms in its kaleidoscope of knuckles,
Another easy if insouciant wish—
They day is a pinwheel of airplanes and arrowheads—
Another soldier goes dying in the amusing waves
Of her hungering dish-

Robert Rorabeck

Of Her Senses

All the lights leave the chorus,
And the hills and the bluffs glow:
Strange creature strut on cloven feet;
They are inedible.
The spikenard quivers and seems to hum.
Butterflies metamorphose out of the frozen ground.
I am alive-
I am alive and each leaf is a silken drum:
The doe leap through the sky,
The rivers flowing across the desks in class:
Sharon opens her eyes
And the world flows into her:
Sharon opens her eyes and her daughter forms,
And the teacher conducts her
As she makes creatures out of clay-
Sharon opens her eyes and men play on the fields;
And when tired, the firemen slide back up their poles,
And I pull the covers over my face;
It rains and Sharon's theatre closes. Marionettes fall in with The thorns of roses,
And wait for the sick and delicate muse to come awake again
To form us together
As her child plays through a sloppy sky
Where even the snowflakes are indistinguishable except Where they become unparalleled and utterly beautiful
Across the vision of Sharon's eyes,
And of her senses.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Hidden Pleasure

Lightly stuffed bodies interceding
Amidst the ethereal franchises of locksmiths;
Tiny trained bears slipping through the keyholes of Featureless summits
Adventuring into that part of the world that is always
In crepuscule
Where dusty angels weep, secluded and hermaphroditic,
Curled like either end of a seahorse
Waiting for their time with you, a girl who stares like
The water-life of transoms: stares on for a good ways without Knowing of or reaching destination,
At the manifestations of waves like boys and their fireworks;
And then partaking through the slim wall,
And through that anorexic hemisphere that keeps her warm,
Buzzing with the wax and honey of an apiary
Of hidden pleasure,
Which she might take on the go but otherwise doesn't Need to believe in at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Of His Grayer Love

Proud is the peacock at the fair
Filled with his own hidden shadows, colors dimmed-
And the long ride from home forgotten:
And all of the faces about him, jovially mooning-
This exhibit is his, and the joys of the world sail
Around, candles in a hallucinatory mass
But not one burning with prayers to him of his Grayer love.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Beautiful Animals

Hiccapping into a world of blue nincompoops,
I watch the Mexicans walking the earth or at least
Lake Worth east of I-95,
While I ride my bicycle searching for that special oil
To anoint your feet:
Alma- while your body is a fire-hydrant gone explosive,
And the world needs new words for you,
While your children bask like happy pups and seals
Underneath your lovely penumbras;
And you know all of West Palm Beach, because you have Been here for seven years,
Even while your bad man was away in Mexico for a year;
And all of the secrets of your body I may know, but Not the spirit that lives like a holiday in there:
The thing that can't even be proven, but which I know is real,
Because it is every park, and ever Ferris wheel that I have ever known to exist;
And when I kiss your lips it becomes my every truancy;
And each of your ribs is missing inside me, like a zoo missing all
Of its beautiful animals;
And now I know that I am all right here, but how are you doing,
Alma; and where are you?

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Dusky Mercury

I flex my calf muscle like a scar;
Like a thing trying to be beautiful in the courtyard,
Like a firework that wont really work
Going off;
And now the administrators aren't really amused-
There is Orion,
And Italian is really a beautiful romance language,
But I just really want to be perceived making love:
I want to live in a double-wide that won't
Be taken away from me:
I want to soften the Ganymede's of this familiar graveyard:
There they are all mothball tongued above the city-
Boulevard, making love to themselves and to their Families that are still living;
And it is truly still a jubilee in their cars; and I have stared Down upon them from atop the mountain habitats of Breathy genius; and for a moment haven't I loved her morally,
While the three bears ate her porridge,
And she came; but now don't I miss my dogs, while the Airplanes are leaping like whores and angels;
And she didn't care enough to love me to draw anymore love
From my body than a mosquito, than the casual angel who Loves, and awfully loves her tomato daiquiris from the porticos
Of the awfully colloquialisms of That wonderfully fairytale university, like a homogenized
Dolphin leaping yet for its never mindful fanfare in the Heavily platinum hemispheres of its dusky mercury.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Ever Young Tarmac

The moon felt good when I slept on the roof
Of your house for two hours:
He felt good, and maybe you made love to your brown
Man,
That astronaut who smokes but never leaves the earth,
But who doesn't beat you anymore:
Whom you said to me two days ago hasn't talked to you
For two days:
But now you lay down beside him again, like as if your Little sub stellar room as another garden of Eden,
And one of you was the lion
And one of you was the lamb;
And I was just the winged serpent up in the planks Overhanging the heads of your children: following you to
The super-super market and telling wishes,
Like I did today: following after you, Alma, and your Heidi,
Laughing as you let her smell the shampoos; and helping you
Make a choice,
And kissing your head, and leaving your money,
Watching your two year old daughter stop dancing like a pinwheel
For awhile,
And as still as a wingless airplane all doused in the brown apertures
Of its ever young tarmac, watching me either fly or slither away.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Knavish Heavens

Trying to save up all of my pennies
For another wishing well which is only useful
In captivating your daughter,
Alma- with its casual aurora,
Even though all of these petty wishes will be Lost into that shallow estuary
Nearby which we grew up so far apart:
And your daughter will arrive bearing gifts
I will never know:
She will love me herself, neither you nor
I will ever know: but will we know each other,
Mutually through the fields of falling sun and Falling snow-
I've called you my muse, and many ways you've Awakened towards me,
Playing those games of wet summit spilling to Cover the mouth of an erupting volcano,
While so much time is lost,
And the honeymoons are spent- and the eels
And the otters swim in the flood planes
Like ribbons and puppies- and I thought that you were Beauty while I survived,
And the traffic moaned, and the heavens perceived
Up there above the amusement parks
And the trailer parks until twilight fell into its Dimness- and all that could be, turned to its metamorphosis,
While the jasmine spilled its perfume into another
Night, and you went to a home across the train tracks
And to a mother and father who kept
You near the bed the way a rattlesnake covets a Turtledove- or the way the moon looks upon
This earth, trying to captivate a teary ocean into the bosoms
Of its knavish heavens

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Lover's Deity

Now I am growing up and they are making love
Either way,
Like nimbus over the fruit market,
Like the sounds of lips and teeth eating an apple
In the shadows of the prayers before bedtime
Above which the angels sing
Like lighthouses, or the birth of steamboats over Legendary rivers:
Pressing their own promises upwards the way ceiling fans
Blow on the elbows of paper airplanes:
This is a fantasy, but it is building itself, and soon it
Will be selling Christmas trees,
And making wishes of its own promises like model
Battleships making love to green bottles with so many paper
Cries for help all throughout the Ferris Wheels
And uncommon playgrounds yawning and lapping up
The sunlight throughout all of the caesuras of the unforgotten sea;
Or anyways, it buys its tickets:
And then it either rains or it doesn't, adding light to the sadness
Which is always moving, and dancing in the light of its lover's deities.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Natural Catastrophe

Made of soft illusions, the boys play baseball
Inside the backyards of school—
And my son nods off into his grandfather's birthday,
Wishing for something—
Maybe to return to the Platonic Realm
Where he once lingered, a zygote riding a zoetrope
Of all joy—where Buddha played, potbellied,
With the silverware of a make believe housewife:
But up in the morning, the clouds all purple and Pink clam shells, running like gasoline over
The graveyards,
Falling into another pit of her memories,
Where each wave is a beautiful creature trying to Find itself in the roiling schoolyards of its natural catastrophe.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Its Old Glory

And all of it is beautiful slung over his shoulders
As he sojourns from the park:
Over there, right next to the fire trucks,
We once swung on the condemned swings: it was the last
Time or two I would swing on them,
Even after the red and then the yellow helicopters had Left and gone out of sight:
And upon the rise beyond this, the small beach and
The sea so few Mexicans know about where We returned together and I threw you over my shoulders
And into the waves
Even though you could not swim:
And, afterwards, we came back into the coolness of my Little yellow house, like a butterfly house,
And made love with you atop of me atop of the wicker
Furniture,
Until you received a phone call from him and had to Return to him,
As you would return forever to him—
Drawing your lamps with you, and all of the brown warmth
Of your false apiary: going to kiss and sting him as well,
Weren't you,
While the sunlight fell into all of its old glory like deadfall
Of a wounded horse over the stricken and wounded earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Knights

There was a fort near the sea—oh
How near the sea it was—
And they were making love at high tide
And the mermaids found their ways
In and curled around
The stacks of cannon balls—
Hard emerald glistening and pink
Confection wetted down
Diademed in the perpetual
Crepuscle of their obscurity
They sighed and had wet dreams of Knights who never came.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Last Resorts

I want to climb up this world like an Ant up a leg- the leg of any mammal until
I find you and can rest panting in the little flower
Bed making an areola around your rusting
Mailbox, just as I knew it would;
And then to raise your little red flag like the fruit of Surrender to make you come running outdoors
Like for the ice-cream truck in the early days of after school;
To get you to look at me and to remember if you can
What I never meant you to,
To pull me in like a nurse gathering the die cast trinkets
Of fighter pilots to her breast,
The little zigging tails of airplanes too tiny to be attended
By stewardesses;
And to gather me indoors beside your fire of sorts,
To rest and cuddle with your dogs and to join with your Kind young family of last resorts.

Robert Rorabeck

Of More Surefooted Resorts

Colorful knights with beautiful scars,
And beautiful young mothers drinking at bars,
Looking up into the eyes of their sisters and across the Street tire fires,
And polecats and buildings of knowledge that go up and up
For some stories though it seems forever;
And I have no girlfriend because I can hardly write,
And Erin, sweet Erin sleeps with someone else tonight,
While innocent Dragons come down from their orchards and olive Trees and brandish their green wings over the soft clip of the Seven seas:
They go to see dinner parties having out upon the yachts and barges
Of the hoity-toity: their sad eyes shimmering like glowing plums,
Two for a dozen over the nuptials of the floating partygoers:
The beast who would like to say their name, who says nothing
And remains just long enough to grow weary which leads Him to the hibernations far away and over the shoulders
Of the west bound trains where there are fireworks and simulacrum
And owls just in the very shoulders and veins
Of grizzly bears and soft footed panthers, which should prove to Be better friends of more surefooted resorts.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Moths And Guitars

River, what do you symbolize- it isn't
Love that flows through you
Coming down the mountain, leaping
And showing yourself over
The stone, the little things entering you,
Like wedding rings,
Becoming lost into you as you travel
Down and join your other sisters who Carrying your name in their throats-
River, river coming down the mountain-
The sky reflecting the memory of your Greenness- Was it the trees who Cried you, or the very pinnacle of Stone reaching up to the fanfares who Coalesced and made you run- soon you
Will be reaching the sleeping village,
And then hurrying further to the sound
Of moths and guitars.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Never, Never Land

Diana, Diana: you are real while I am wrecked,
And upon all of this sorbet I have collected by senses for Another try:
Another roll of the dice into the epiphany of rainbows:
Another shot at bull's eye; and Diana, Diana, this is just another
Trying while all of my veins are just as cold as ice,
Because I could never be a university professor, could never Even be your niece, and all the pools, the pools of affluent houses
Sure do, sure look nice:
And yes, yes I am wilting, wilting on your windowsill:
A beautiful, beautiful flower that yes, yes! Once was real:
And now is just a flower past midnight,
Tearing itself to death, picking its petals and smelling its earthy,
Earthy breath:
While fireworks, fireworks shoot off underhand like softball in the Working class parks of Royal Palm Beach,
And of Never, Never Land.

Robert Rorabeck

Of One Or Two Or Three

I have already written
My
Five poems for the
Night
But I keep going free
Handed,
Feral;
Because I was robbed at Gunpoint tonight
Which made the Night
Really wonderful:

And I am William
T. Shakespeare
And I just wanted you
To know how much I
Have loved you;
Alone and emptied
At some truck stop
In West Texas
At the apex of a Ferris Wheel smiling at the Empty constellations with Some boy from Guatemala;
That I love you
More than house
Or car-
Or mailbox-
I have loved you on into
Crepuscule;
And you are a sister of
A very slim sorority:
Of one
Or two Or three.

Of Our Amen S

I'm sorry—but she looks like she knows
That I love her,
And she is my wife—and I get up every day,
Evacuation,
Becoming the art of archeology—and the vanishing
Indians end up misconstruing and vanishing again
Into the heart of an emptied airplane:
And this, at least, is the place I have dug:
Waiting for all of the rest of the armies to finally come
Out from the jungles and fall over us:
Peace in her eyes, just like a corpse's peace—
And a bouquet in her hands but for a dead man,
As the fireworks play out in a dance hall that the angels
Once danced in—but long since have moved
Out—as the angels leap and leap about across
The uneasy ululations of a Ferris Wheel from which we've
Had a falling out and this is the all and the last of What can be said of whatever we had to say of our amens.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Our Amens

I'm sorry—but she looks like she knows
That I love her,
And she is my wife—and I get up every day,
Evacuation,
Becoming the art of archeology—and the vanishing
Indians end up misconstruing and vanishing again
Into the heart of an emptied airplane:
And this, at least, is the place I have dug:
Waiting for all of the rest of the armies to finally come
Out from the jungles and fall over us:
Peace in her eyes, just like a corpse's peace—
And a bouquet in her hands but for a dead man,
As the fireworks play out in a dance hall that the angels
Once danced in—but long since have moved
Out—as the angels leap and leap about across
The uneasy ululations of a Ferris Wheel from which we've
Had a falling out and this is the all and the last of
What can be said of whatever we had to say of our amens.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Our Disney World

Green hills do not make a sea—neither do
Bicycles make unicorns—except that they are there,
Underneath a Christmas of palm trees,
And this is the vanishing resort of Emptied bottles—
Of fox's tongues tasting only the bitterness
Of an unreachable promise:
Its venal muses on their own metamorphosis,
Themselves dreaming of the sweet arms
Of baseball players—
Mexicans sleeping underneath them, their sport
Done with the orchards,
Their trumpets put away—their children failing English—
And yet their minds do not languish over the Dreams that will never come ashore—
Climbing up on their ladders of starving yellow mules,
They will sing as they make the orchards bare—
The sunlight swimming over them like
Vermillion swans,
Basking on their shoulders
As the clouds become a piece of fiction—and the orchards
Where they believe, truer than all of the Wonderfully superfluous architectures that spread their Papier-mâché over the chicken wire of the aquamarine castles
Of our Disney World.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Our Esoteric Purpose

Every night has a church, and begins this way,
As a dismissal for pilgrims, the long voyages of a zoetrope
Through the junked pornographies of the trees
That the butterflies climb out of like feral infants from
The sea,
Kicking and scrambling through the forgotten easter eggs
Until they become the victorious firework in the glassworks of A storm,
Bubbling instrumentally over the forgotten crowns of the Conquistadors who are now compartmentalized into the beds of Sand lions;
As over this we hold hands, forgetting how to ride bicycles or Who it was important to us who went off to war, carrying
The colors of a great flag:
Her eyes steaming across the waterless caesuras of a sea of dunes,
The burs sticking to her brown flanks unceremoniously
Until we lose all sense of direction,
And purr like the derelicts of a metamorphosis, the carbons of A perfume or a recipe lost to the steadily increasing worlds
Who flood over us without any sense or acknowledgement of our Esoteric purpose, just as happy as unsoldering bovines who proceed.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Our Previously Wakeless Dead

I want a baby with you: we make love I guess,
And now you sleep down by the easements of another man:
Who isn't even a man in comparison; but, well, god damned:
I think of you at the mall,
And I fold paper airplanes underneath the ceiling fans:
And it all goes some ways in the opulent grottos of my Adolescents:
And we don't even have to propose or grow old together:
I can just picture you with the oranges, and not a far ways off
From the highway:
You make me the happiest man in the whole world,
And it is really fun, but I know that you cannot marry me,
Because your family has arrived:
And you want to marry a pilot, the wife of an aviator:
And because I have left school and cannot spell, it has all come
To this,
A beautiful corpse with legs so exclamatory beside the busy ways
To Canterbury; but I guess I am just remembering an old and Familiar way straight down into hell:
While you, Alma, are just my heaven or my butterfly, and you keep Me captivated while all of the older and prettier girls
Are disappearing underneath the promontories an ingenious caps
Of the expletives of salutatory mountains;
And all of the rains come and gather and keep company before
They soon move their own ways to other ventures, like a casual
Game of she loves me or she loves me nots,
While I guessed that you loved me, as I held you neck in the rain
And the chickens were hypnotized;
We all laid off of counting, and the forest grew into its own country;
While the turnpikes and graveyards grew;
And I promised you breakfast, Alma, straight into the smiling
Kills of whatever adversary we were facing for the day;
And then the astronauts suited up over those suburbias that I could Never rightly explain to you:
And your aunt smiled while she was dying, and her three boys
Grew into giants as her man made love to her cousin:
Alma: I have loved you since I met you and even while my parents
Swam away; and all of this is the calligraphy of the previously
Mentioned dead;

Inhaling in, how sweet the perfumes lie over the graveyards
And the festivals of less than primary lights that swing in their Ways over the penumbras of how we have loved ourselves
Over the fables of our previously wakeless dead.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Our Utterly And Illusive Tomorrow

The savage packages are day-gone, even without
The numerations of your envelops,
And I drink rum and think of a marionette while Trying to be politically correct and a
Best name for him—
Maybe I will have to send you back to China tomorrow—
While the cabbages shrink into roses—
And the days of our honeymoons relapse into
The animals we were yesterday—
Anyway this is the joy I could not bring you to tomorrow—
And the lamplight sounds through the depths
Of the sad distance as I reach out grasping for your Hand that is too far away from me
And you will go on to enjoy the sad head rooms as If this were another matter of the make-believes of Tomorrow—
As the city stretched out its panalopy to display its Vanguards of our utterly and illusive tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Sights And Wonders

Defeated by long days of Fieldtrips,
Little boys that never learned
How to fly just lie out
And dream of their Mothers; they don't practice
Anymore,
And the doors have shut
Them away from the Contrary goldfish,
Not lucky anymore;
Maybe after all of the unluckiest
Of rabbits are dead,
And all of the pornographies
Have been found across the street
And read,
Across the gutters,
They will parcel themselves out
Like conquistadors
In their outdoor world
Of sights and Wonders.

Robert Rorabeck

Of So Many Tv Shows

There is a science up in the air given over to Juvenility and lunch trucks—
As beautiful girls are given to their men,
Like the sacrifices at the ends of their dusty roads:
Sometimes individuals amongst them will fall
In love once or twice
But it is never pleasant
And none amongst us will ever have to read about
It—
These words now are the scars I have developed Sleeping alone in my wife's parents' bed in Shanghai, China—
While there are not enough feet amongst the mountains
And the camels go without water
As the cars go without gasoline,
But I only know so many words—
And it is a shame,
That not a single soul in the world loves me
The way I once loved a muse or two—
Now you can find me,
The King Kong,
The Godzilla of the perpetually anonymous zoo—
Fretting for no one,
Ready to destroy cities,
Learning how to love his infant son in place of A muse, while the blind stars shine down
Across all of the voluptuous gossips of so many TV shows.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Some High School's Class

A reef of history built around a sphere:
I thinking of in the middle of some high school's class
In the preternatural day—
Eyes haunted like ghosts on billboards
Underneath of where lovers traffic through the grass
On so many legs,
As fireworks move up against the highway
And students plagiarize, get married, and learn to Reciprocate with the opposite desks
In the cul-de-sacs of a music box:
They realize there, blistering—
Chapping their own lips as their pencils chisel the Circumference of a well: they take tests—
The ghosts fizzle, juggle fading balls, and weep
In the corner of the portable hotel room:
As outside,
Foxes leap higher and high for grapes painted like Nipples in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Some Lost Yesterday

They tried to settle down with long brown
Stems,
As the wind seemed for awhile to try and suckle
All of the
Honey out of them- and they remembered
Far and wide
The superstructures the demigods built to Get a peek at the nudity of
The other side-
Enraptured in a breeze of holidays, in the strange
Floats arising in her eyes-
And she came from here, as you went away-
As the clouds finally winnowed amidst the cliffs
Where all the Indians disappeared
Accounting to the tales of the evaporated estuaries
Of some lost yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Strange Lilacs

When the warm liquor lactates through the Caesuras of these bones:
Off home, like a little girl curled away and sucreased
Off of school buses
Waiting for a family with her palm out stretched
Before the television-
And her mother is outside in the penumbra of a
Blue church surrounded
By dragonflies who very soon will have to turn in-
With the night filled with cats
Who are homeless and making love-
And the girl is without a father:
There are hurricanes in the east, and helicopters in Tandem in the sky-
She remembers jumping rope as a man who isn't
There sky walks- she thinks there is a
Beautiful illusion somewhere hidden in the coloring
Books she left out in the rain,
But until then there will be more of this- beautiful
Epitaphs of wildflowers who have gone into
The ground, hibernating after making love at the very Base of the mountain- in the meadows
Of strange lilacs to wildcats and grizzly bears.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Suburbia's Daylaboring Truancies

Writing in the earliest joy,
Caracoling the old neighborhoods that never raised
Anything new,
And even made the sun seem wearied, going up and whistling
In its payrollled hullabaloo
Above the parasols that shared the still-life of the housewives
And the alligators,
As the parks swung, smoking its childless days in the middle Of school,
The debutants all spilling out of their boudoirs and heading
To the doors of busses
To let their perfumes decanter through the transom's dreams;
Where bicycles floundered
And the fireworks sang all spinning out invisibly in the middle
Of suburbia's day laboring truancies.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Such Silly Bliss

All of the brown ocelots on the beach and on the Shore made eyes with the brown otters,
As they should- as it was what they were good for,
Even while I was failing math,
And skipping in the suburban glades and onto the arcs
Where my feet could leave the ground:
So far away from the immensities of the classrooms of eyes
And breathes,
I slept alone under the eaves and made up wishes for myself;
And Alma wasn't even there then,
Even though there were then airplanes in the sky, and fish
In the sea;
But now Alma is here, and all day long she shines so close to Me; but it has been too much of awhile since I have touched or Tasted her flesh;
While the brown otters curl in the zoo, their habitats enmeshed
For the dumb and bounded eyes of the roofed tourists;
And they almost seemed to come together and once again to kiss,
But our eyes and lips had parted before the show was over,
As it seemed, Alma, they had enough of such silly bliss.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Both Of Us

Oh, for awhile,
There was a zoo, in the lighthouses of
The sky,
Kissing opened mouth, oh—for a while,
While there was any room—
And then the sun was coming down,
Disturbing any bonfires of Chinese misfits—
And then there became a cold still Grotto between the rebar and
The dead frogs that were any other part
Of us—and while I thought of a movie
Theatre and any other part of us,
You blossomed into a playground
That didn't even have to pretend to be Coy to the reasons and the forlorn séances that Were the vanishing daydreams of
A playground in the cold near Dowell weathers—
While anything else had to spelled out for
The both of us—
While the city and the rest of her lighthouses
Vanished-
We became a star in the morning,
And the rest of the nothings happened over
The cradles, while the playrooms vanished over
The cradles of the marionettes,
And then listened to the anonymous heartbeats
Of the both of us.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Canal

A bloom of clouds across
A cord of rattlesnake- where I was
As a little boy-
Growing up into an absent profession-
The flesh scarred,
The foxes captured by hounds,
And the housewives lost from the water fountains
Of high school,
All found in the diamond mines of
Their pools- as my mother leaves the hospital,
As the dragon makes love to a
Carport of the sky-
The evaporated daydreams exfoliated
Off the afternoons after school-
Entire trunks of locusts lurking in the grasses
And ready to make love,
While I look for your eyes,
As the alligators eat the blue gills, and the prettiest
Metamorphosis escapes to the other side
Of the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Day She Must Be Married

Radishes curled on a table of white,
Placed there blushing by my love's brown fingers under the Twin penumbras of the maroon coolers
In the open cavities of daylight where the sore throats of Feral cats used to sing all night: never wanting more Than I have wanted you,
While the piecemeal traffic stumbles through; and it is a spectacle,
And somewhere atop of it like the icing on the cake,
The lost and premature angels draw their bull horns and sing a Fright:
Because they were lost before they even got to school;
But only if they would look down to see your brown avenues
Smiling so giddy as to seem so innocent,
Like a lighthouse that has never had to turn its face to the conundrums
Of the drowning sailor, like a petrified mother watching
As their some months old child is surrounded by Rattlesnakes through the deadfall of pitchfork pines,
And thus dumbly amused by their warning signals
Until the fatal strike-
And the venom's meal sets out through the vineyard of the untried
Avenues- like grains of sand who think of seashells,
Or my little sister daydreaming on the school bus of the day
She must be married.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Earth For Awhile

Now what a daydream:

Now what a daydream in the world for a while—

Another chance through the forests—

Pistils of love

In a roller-rink for the apiary—

Smoking Ferris wheels become a metamorphosis through

The heavens,

Until it all takes an absolute while to cool and

Distillate:

$5 dollars of romance to watch her surrender to those

Flags:

Taking off in the middle of the day,

Forgetting to reimburse ourselves through the courtyards

Of our school-time daydreams—

Until she had her own children, hatched from underneath of

The webs of a crocodile,

And they were counting the dew drops of the minutes

For class to end—

And they were all getting up together and swearing to

Themselves:

So many words to remember, but only so many

Passages upon their ways home—

Like airplanes stuck in the clouds of the sky—□

They already know that they can never come down but

At least they can daydream of the earth for awhile.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Graveyards- Of The Monuments

Burring your gold, like my eyes—next to the sea—
And the other nouns and pronouns
Dance by themselves in the middle of the afternoons—until
It is finally alright to struggle and to Account for the heirlooms as they are left from the Wrists of the graves—
As menagerie of a million slender things slither—
As the other teachers pretend it is alright to empty out
A headroom and find the spaces to conceive
Of out all of the inevitable outcomes for the defeated
Tourists—
And then there are pillow fights underneath the light houses—
And the seahorses become unmanned—
Diminutive unicorns—what places are for them,
Except for in the aquatic bouquets that can only swallow the Aquatic playgrounds of the sunlight surrounding the Nuptials of all of the careworn holidays—
Until the battle has ended, and all of the fireworks lit—
The bravest of the penumbras stand up for themselves—and Figure out for themselves the constellations that still Remain burning, like one plus one, the gods to believe in,
The singularities that remain burning—
And all of the repetitions of the after lives of the Hindus
That can never be seen in the post cards of cliff dwellings of
The tourists that are forever returning—
And I love you—and I love you—as the waves say,
Keeping their mouthfuls—of the graveyards—of the monuments—
Of the grottos—that go on forever—repeating.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Kingdoms Of Far Away

This is a peaceful union that doesn't exist:
The king kissing a peasant, the prom queen my neck;
And these are the roses that will at last wilt
Unjustified and sweltering in the throats of the forest,
And the rain patters over the roofs of the kingdoms of Far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Nameless Glades

Now I am not here
But the carnivorous rose
Eats my skin,
As sometimes in the middle of the day
I ejaculate in the bathroom
Thinking for a long time of stewardesses
In the clouds,
And building for them gardens:
Gardens,
But for now you sleep again with your Husband as if in a crypt:
You sleep with him
And your lights go out into the hemispheres
Of abandoned amusement
Parks,
And I pray for you- as you touch him
Softly,
And the airplanes kiss and disappear into the Sky:
I know that very soon you will forget me,
But for now the Gulf Stream still Makes love to hurricanes-
As the long beaked herons still somehow kiss
And make love
Strutting haughtily over the cenotaphs of the forgotten
Conquistadors freckling in the impenetrable heart
Of the nameless glades.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Night Blooming Jasmin

Sad as an elephant who can never drive—
Looking up through the Disney World of your Heavens—
All of the joy bought and sold,
Until what is left matriculates down to your neighborhood
While my very own wife is preparing to fly over all of
The hemispheres of the world to me:
When I get up, yawning, I find myself in the daycare of
The best of the headlamps:
Here is where the world is the best at illuminations
And there is nothing left of love letters to be given to Recede with the tide—
You will belong here, pressing to my heart, while better
Poems jump off of their middle of the day roofs
Like little boys and roman candles—
And the same damned plagiarists will sing forever and
Forever in their choruses—that once this place was Bright and echoing, when angels decorated their
Very own Christmas trees—and faeries awakened to Kiss and make love to roses in their little garden,
Falling asleep to the sweet smelling caresses of the night
Blooming jasmine.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Night Blooming Jasmine

Sad as an elephant who can never drive—
Looking up through the Disney World of your Heavens—
All of the joy bought and sold,
Until what is left matriculates down to your neighborhood
While my very own wife is preparing to fly over all of
The hemispheres of the world to me:
When I get up, yawning, I find myself in the daycare of
The best of the headlamps:
Here is where the world is the best at illuminations
And there is nothing left of love letters to be given to Recede with the tide—
You will belong here, pressing to my heart, while better
Poems jump off of their middle of the day roofs
Like little boys and roman candles—
And the same damned plagiarists will sing forever and
Forever in their choruses—that once this place was Bright and echoing, when angels decorated their
Very own Christmas trees—and faeries awakened to Kiss and make love to roses in their little garden,
Falling asleep to the sweet smelling caresses of the night
Blooming jasmine.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Orchards

And there was an echo:
As the serpent slid from the tree:
And there was an echo,
As you remembered me- cherry tree,
And scars on my cheek:
Panhandlers sleeping across the oily creek-
How I loved you, you don't Know,
The camels of cigarettes baptizing on the billboards of Sunny snow:
My wrist was open, unshelled, clean-
It led the fight for you,
But you were so mean- crying, deceptive, perfumes
Erupting from the well:
The windmills turned for you, but they whispered
Only hell-
And I. a sailor, lost but unafraid- the lighthouse of Your soul lying deceptively-
The hope of angels closing shop, to go on trancies
Stealing marmalade from the orgies of the orchards,
And very fine fabrications left into the wanton
Sky- I saw you children,
But I knew you could never cry.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The Sad Misgivings

Of the sad misgivings which remain
With the afterthoughts of Jet-streams—words that appear beautiful
On the page,
As the housewives in their streams of Sorority go home
Again and again to him—
Lives get filled up just like cemeteries
The same way the tears some dreary angels
Cried can fill up a lake—
Afternoons molt into the obscurity of Crepuscule,
Where amateur housewives dance with Open extension chords—
When they are stung, the whole tableaux
Becomes a faux pieta
That the frogs watch still waiting to be Kissed,
As the foxes kiss the faeries in the aloe
Even though they do not know what for.

Robert Rorabeck

Of The World

In the clefts of purple monuments that don't Belong here anymore,
While she is arraigned in her homely tenements
And the mountains
Rise like clouds over the substrata's:
In fact, they are not here:
But the cars are here,
And the people upturning through the abandoned
Afternoons:
There are so many of them:
So many of them that you do not know:
While I've been so busy shoplifting, and lying down
In my bed after the aforementioned grasshoppers
Have skipped over the concrete trying
To compete with the airplanes in their
Some kind of show:
As the fireworks show their stuff but so easily die
Across the tenements and the garage sales of the Word we were all supposed to know.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Their Habitable Dreams

Beside the highway the alligators are Yawning beneath the red armpits of air plants-
And, coincidentally, airplanes-
And it feels alright that they haven't a name for These places
That yawn out in the sprawling open:
Places the conquistadors passed thoughtlessly,
As they themselves were namelessly shrouded:
And I love her,
But it doesn't matter: there she is, already in her Own cul-de-sac with her husband and
The other various people who love her:
Her children and song-birds as well-
And I've slept on her roof, but now that Christmas
Is over,
And I have scars to prove it- and I must go back
To my nameless place beside the road,
For that is my home- In the sunlight of a wandering Beauty beneath an arc that spreads the curtains of Daylight and looks down to where
The lions yawn, and her family plays across the sandy lots
Of their habitable dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Their Pornographies

I have fun fore playing with my mother
Because she never sleeps:
She is like a candle on an endless god's birthday cake:
Then by Wednesday I will have my own house as Old as my one grandfather who is still living:
I will have my own fortification nearer the sea; and if it is Good for her, then
It is really good for me, but I miss my dogs,
And I miss the sound her legs made playing a mammalian
Violin against the crèche of my body;
And now I wonder if I will ever wake up, while the buses for school
Come around the neighborhoods of my baseball diamond,
While the rattlesnakes also sleep,
Sweet cousins who also keep cloistered to them the sweet venoms
Of their pornographies.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Their Wish's Flame

Pages turning to the yellow crayon dust of A soul,
And a fox who has learned to walk steps out
Underneath a jealous streetlight—
There are robbers in the graveyard—and Thieves of airplanes in the sky—
The classrooms are emptied, and the ways
He has been thinking about it are emptied—
He has echoes of the thoughts of going home:
The road in his mind used to be like going
Into the caracoles of a shell
Where you can still hear the oceans of her
Name,
Before she forced him into the venal metamorphosis
Of an all too common jealousy,
Taking her fried chicken and watermelons up
Into the clouds—sharing and sleeping with pilots
And their stewardesses—never looking down
To where is mobiles hung, limpid—
Where he continued jumping his impotence—
Like birthday candles burned out of their wish's flame.

Robert Rorabeck

Of These Or Those Afternoons

Long leafed lilies in the Short bladed yard-
Scarred in the anthems of Exhausted circus performers strayed
From the avenues
Spilling from their churches;
Strange young guys who Once sang to airplanes-
Or butterflies, lost from their totems or Colonies of far away;
Now here they are bee stung
Fetching, laughing underneath mailboxes
Just as toothy wishing wells
Wishing for housewives to show up
With their bags of stuffs
Sans lawyers and doctors
And dentists,
While the sand lions pray underneath
Paper snowflakes,
Arranging here into the lattening
Baseball games of these or those afternoons.

Robert Rorabeck

Of These Shimmering Coves

Open your eyes to the showers of birds—
Like spokes in a bicycle of sky
Pin wheeling above the call-girl waves:
And stop and sit beside me for awhile
As I sell fireworks to blind men underneath
A pale tent skinned from the moon
And made into the pornography here on the Beach in the middle of the day—
Bask your tiny brown body in the ludeness of My hands—and watch me color pictures
For you with my tongue,
Mollusks of roses to curl inside the seashells of Your senses—gifts you never have to Tell your husband, as the sun bows us with its Light,
Bending the airplanes to make silver barrettes in Your hair—and calling the dolphins to sing
Into the bedrooms of these shimmering coves.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Things That Remain This Way

I have to work tomorrow while
The sun sounds
Vociferous,
And all the people who are
Out there
And who have said the Pledges of allegiance
Are collected on home;
They go this way over canals
Filled with water moccasins
And stolen bicycles
Pondering across the houses of Lovers who will never love
Them,
And into the lights of
Their own estuary to Douse,
To dream of things
That remain this way.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Things That Will Never Be Seen

Merry-go-rounds of new and other words
That seemed to be going around just like this Underneath the olive groves
In the curling sepulchers of Spain,
Another poet as well has gone amiss—
Amidst that massive times
Where airplanes throw themselves
Haphazardly over the wishing wells—
Like virgins go to movie theatres
Or empty parking lots in the rain—
They seem to be showing the movies to Themselves of things that will never be seen again.

Robert Rorabeck

Of This Again

Trying to shake myself awake like a fish,
Born in the lower regions of the Marianes Trench;
Now I suppose that I am beautiful or that I have to be beautiful,
Because I have come up from so many piano keys of depths,
And now I am looking thoroughly beautiful if starved;
And that I have my own light which should light my living room
To give of two good halos to my two starving children.
But otherwise I should not have to know, or have to look at them;
All of these bodies of men moving around just as they should,
While some other shadows have had to push me around on
The trams of these swings; but it has not been me in the playground
Of all of these needy and heedless things:
It has been you in the shadows clinging and scratching all of this time,
Alma;
And I have been starving all of this time, while the fair has been moving So utterly far away, but if you have been able to hold your breath and Love me for all of this time, then tomorrow;
Then maybe tomorrow, we will surface together, me holding the beautiful
Promenade of your head, with two lips whispering, speaking to one another
And gossiping like two wings of a butterfly and doing;
And doing all of this again.

Robert Rorabeck

Of This Better World

Candling ships of marriage vows-
I want to touch you in a playground's house
Underneath the pine trees,
Underneath all the blue sadness and the silver
Ingeniousness that skips through it;
And my tongue is out and dragonflies bejewel
The armpits of invisibility:
Where are you but with the easier refrains of Sandboxes that have metamorphosed into
The greater suburbias which line the creeks like Thirsty daughters of drowned brothers,
Where everyday goes its fair pace and then swoons
Into the off-white crèche of street lamps,
And you don't even have to go to school to have Your religion, the snowflakes talk peacefully
Gossiping to each other of this better world.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Those Unfortunates' Dinnertime

Houses falling down beside old cathedrals and Praying, praying:
Their chimneys smoking until they could be seen
Up in the woods and to the housewives there
Who had run away from them
And turned into naiads and dryads, letting their hair down,
Speaking to the harts who used to be princes
Or kings, now hunted by their fathers or sons:
They stop for awhile at the edge of the curious pool and
There are detained by things who have run away from themselves,
And who are not real:
And thus becomes reason for their demise- their capture, their Decapitation, and by a round about means, their cuckoldry:
Paraded on the streets by all sorts of tourists:
Decorated with ribbons and bows,
Until their jaws hang down sorrow faced, and the rainstorms
Come and otherwise all of their practitioners go
Indoors:
Leaving them for the crows, who sing to them, and make a merry
Dinner out of their lingering metamorphose,
Their purposeful solitude, and malingering to remember the bodies
Of better men: as the sky kidnaps them,
And the runaway houses pray to their cathedrals smoking up the naked
Bodies of mountains
Where other things live, halfway divine, waiting in their cockpits
Through the swinging testaments
Half mad yet hungry eyed looking down at the macabre carnival
Of those unfortunates' dinnertime.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Time Honored Baseball Games

Here is the prism, floating up like a mad
Scientist on Nitric Oxide:
This is the turtle dove sticking its neck into the Sea,
Afraid of the ice-cream truck and baseball games,
While the long necks of giraffes graze up extraordinarily vast Above the earth,
Pillaging for snowflakes,
And they can see how the sails of grand explorers are Melting eventually away,
And the can tell of the convexities, even while your children
Have become lost again:
And only if you'd waited; if you'd had waited, I wouldn't Have to practice my cap guns up into the fortnight,
Or at being the poetic so prematurely buried;
And we could hold hands together knowing that we Were fully in love
And growing up and up, like over eager foxes learning how
To pillage the grape vines,
Even as the caravans of red faces conquistadors were making
Their own way up the switchbacks up what would eventually Would become the overly clever mountains,
Who in their prenatal eons were too dumb even to contemplate
The distempers of fiercest humidities of time honored baseball games.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Us Coming Together

Everything is good, or even too good to Remember;
I cant feel the air-condition or even recall what I
Was doing,
Except that the light is glowing throughout all of the Various tributaries,
And into the boudoirs to bask over the lunch meats
Of lonely housewives given into their Dissected sorority;
And it is a kind that you will never have to know what It is I mean, Alma:
That you were raised up all alone except for your sisters
And your cross dressing brother who I
Must remind you of all forlorn in the watery guts
Of Texas and its stretched out
Tourisms;
Because now I think that it will make you all right, and when I take your brown hand down to the sea it
Won't be for any sort of baptism:
Maybe you love my cousin, or just want more fireworks;
But it's okay,
Because I still have so many things that I keep hidden for you,
Like undisclosed holidays that it will take an entire lifetime
Of us coming together to find.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Vanishing Electricity

This daydream they give to Sabbath and other schedules
And for awhile it feels alright to believe
Looking up into the delusions of airplanesâ€™
To be here in the graveyard of the pets won at the midway of The festival that has moved away:
And remembering everything, with her hands of amber Interlocked underneath the cathedrals of the Museum:
Now I am married, waiting for my wife to arriveâ€™
I am struggling towards her,
A jelly-fish lost in a vast sea of vanishing electricity.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Walking In Ice

Abutment to the stars, is this the shallow places
We ride,
High in our knickerbockers, with swords
And feathers:
I eat two hotdogs- I don't think about you,
And my hair almost looks blond. I have an interview
To go to at three Underneath the skyscrapers floating above the Barge;
But if they ask me, I will have to tell them
I've never been to Iceland, never laid down either
In between your levies, to feel your waters rise,
The sluice and buck of each individual thigh,
But I have some ways to go- I keep the skulls
Of all the canines who were my friends tied behind me
Like sharp, grinning cenotaphs:
I will not sell them. If I have to I will break into houses
At winter, I will lay with the half eaten celebrations in The cold, mute and pious; and only in my wet dreams
Will I howl for you,
Silly thing always pondering upon the moment of embarking
Upon your next sunny day fieldtrip,
Skipping through the bare breasted meadows and on into Chrysalis.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Wayward Men

You can fill out into the dreams the Laymen sing,
And they will give you a chariot you can color in
As it proceeds you to work
Over the jiggling heads of hobos and their hobo queens:
They sleep underneath the ribbons of necessity's
Surcease:
They pitch the raggedy tents in the windswept bungalows
Of the east,
And they sing as the waves come in and then retreat:
And they whisper against the rush of traffic under the craning
Necks of the dun work buildings
While they juggle hoping bottles and rustle wishing bones like dirty feathers;
And they count the tombs the dead go traveling in,
While the weather flutes through them, rippling these stuporous flags
Of wayward men.

Robert Rorabeck

Of What Fireworks

New evaporations do little enveloping the clouds
With tulle—
With hearts of evaporated shell, singing of Ghost mothers and ghost girlfriends,
As little feet get lost on the road to sunset again—
Stumbling amidst the cenotaphs of Conquistadors amidst the orchards of Pornography again—
What will they ever tell their mother—
Of what fireworks will their blindness sing,
If they should ever make it home?

Robert Rorabeck

Of Who Fed The Lions

I try another thing while
The girls get up and go to work,
Segregated in the caesura of each wave;
I don't know what I'm doing
Myself,
But once affluence sets in then every night
Is balmy and well-manicured
And there are places to go in our car;
Dinner dates and such,
The power lines garlanding the city and giving
Of the glows of what we should do;
And the side of your face is a Junoesque
Profile,
And my liver has turned green.
Our daughters are ghosts garnished with holly
Boughs- Think, my dear, of all the people
Who died before us,
Of who fed the lions;
And we all have our troubles, our accomplishments,
Our fresh secrets in the repeating dark-
I know you wanted to be famous. I used to dream of You as I tramped and slept in stock cars
Hidden by tall grass;
But you couldn't know me- I tried to find you
In Hollywood, but the hills had burned over and lost
Their role in the play,
And you kissed me goodbye, and moved to Colorado
Where you fell in love.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Who She Really Is

I've got the blues picking the sound
Of cherry blossoms as they wonder
How they will be
Pollinated- as there is a ghost hung up
In her,
As she is coming perpetually down a
Hill beside the lake:
It seems that she is forever stumbling to
Her knees,
As the gravestones rise above her,
And the airplanes tip their wings:
There is nothing mortal that can save her-
All the barrettes of flowers in her hair,
But as a little boy you can climb up inside
Of her and hear her whisper to
You of who she really is.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Your Day To Day Life

I sleep in a different bed from you
And you can call me whatever you want,
Even though you are too stupid to Survive the baseball game that is happening out
Back of our espionages and the schoolyard—
And it is too late for you to improvise something Beautiful or something else clandestine to the Sport- so I am sure that we can become another
Mishap misspelled to the usual daylight hours that Are without fanfare, until another beach opens
According to its misspellings—an d
You are filled with joy even though the teachers
Have not been teaching you,
And this is just a haunting as you belong to the higher
And higher elements above Disney World
And I think of you every day without actually trying to Contact you—or having to become a significant amount
Of your day to day life.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Your Even More Infinitely Unmolested Shores

I am whispering the halftruths of my own obedience:
That I have slept the night underneath the nocturnal helicopters
Of a house near your house that was falling away
Like love letters dying like uneven petals in a game of she loves me
Or she loves me not:
And this is how it happened that I used to get off the bus from high school
And was immediately attacked by bullies for being so strange,
But I could even smell your scent right there, Alma:
This is how it happened next to a mailbox amidst the mists and in the Unholiest games of love:
This isn't proper English: this is how the banished turtledove sings to the Waves it can never appropriate:
This is how we beat the system, Alma: this is how we still listened to the Fireworks in the sad kingdoms of the neighborhoods long since after
They were gone going off:
This is a hobo making love to the emptiness of the night:
This is the dreams of the novels I have felt up along a certain stretch of Military trail,
And this is how I want to call you, Alma:
This is only how I want to call you: and I know that you are Mexican,
And so may be more declined to take many lovers,
And thus reflect this on me,
But other than this I am only a graveyard and until this graveyard comes A cemetery:
Otherwise, I love laying you down and kissing your lips:
I love laying you down to call you awake and home to town and to the Principal's office;
And this is how my soul sings, swinging its immaterial body in the cages
Of the same things that you swing:
This is my last attempt at nothing's nothing- and I know that it is unutterably
Unbeautiful, Alma, but it is all of your thing: and I recognize you, Alma,
And I humbly bow to receive the reign of my queen:
For you are that butterfly at the end of the rainbow: undeniable, unavoidable,
And more beautiful than the caesuras of the blush ingest canyons, and more
Divine than the summits of the Colorado Rockies:
I am receptive to you; and I am waiting for Friday, because nothing else
Will survive:
I push all of my bouquets into your hands, like rushing kisses onto Your shore, hoping for the silence of machine guns,

Hoping for your unabusive answers, while the silliest of kings reign,
And the dolphins lay like satiated drunkards upon the infinite grains
Of your even more infinitely unmolested shores.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Your Little Make-Believe House

Teach me the names of flowers, will you,
Because I am done;
And your children are running towards the bus;
And I wish I had more time to say nothing
To you,
But your husband is coming home like a
Languid tornado
And he will take up all of your affection and love;
And put you into such a tizzy as to bring out all of Your sisters from inside of you:
And all of you laughing at break-neck speed
All just for him,
This man of workman's gloves and a smile of comely cinder.
That I will have nothing left to do but to stand outside
Of your little make-believe house and applaud.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Your Misinterpreted Game

They seem to be laughing I want to think of
You with your brilliant, tender eyes as I buy a red barn,
And somehow seem to survive across the Graveyards for all of the winters while I am not there—
And in the absence of my presence a stallion—
As full of light and as majestic as the midnight of All of your vanishing cars—
But I'll awaken again tomorrow listening to the yawns
Of lions until all of our seats are lost on the busses—
And I can spend forever trying to misspell your name—
Until my classroom will be emptied—and there will Be nothing else left to call me recluse—
Just the movie theatres that somehow seemed to echo
Upon the vanishing enterprises of your misinterpreted Game.

Robert Rorabeck

Of Your Yesterday

The words travel on out like vagabonds with their feet,
And you are already lying on down with your man, Alma
Like a vagabond butterfly who has found something to eat:
And in the morning you will have to dropp Heidi off at Daycare,
And then maybe you will be here: maybe you will be here,
While our lovers beds make their casual caesuras flipping off the Unabashed sky,
While you kiss your uncles, and I tell them my goodbyes;
And maybe you have loved other men, Alma: maybe you have loved
Them, while the sea has slipped away:
But I don't want to be any one of the, Alma: I still hope and Pray to be the fieldtrips of your sweet tomorrow, to winnow our perfumes
Of wings and pollinate all that will be our children over the graveyards
Of your yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

Oh Brother, Who Knows!

Brother,
She could be doing anything right now—
She could be making love,
But she's probably serving domestic beers
To the undergraduate boys who come in
To get drunk on her.
They don't have a chance....

Brother,
She could be doing anything right now—
She could be on her pink tricycle
Ringing her bell up and down frat row,
Trying to draw the attention of the ice-cream truck,
Because she has a craving for praline....

Brother,
She could be doing anything right now,
But who knows....
She said I shouldn't feel this way toward her,
Or anyone, who I haven't seen for most of a decade;
I shouldn't think about the ways she goes
But, brother, how can she know—

Oh Brother,
How can she know the ruby fire
She ignites in your soul?
How can she know the singing rivers
Of sunlight her name brings when spoken out loud—
Even God sings when he walks into her bar
To sit down and buy a round after a hard day's hangover
For all the good Catholic boys who bat their eyes
At her in choreographed Christianity?

Oh Brother,
How can she know
The way her amber hair flows—
Oh, the way her amber hair flows
Curling, curling like lovers around
Lips, fingers, and toes....

So when we just look at her,
Around, around the world goes....

Oh Brother,
How can she know
The way my heart goes, swimming
Silently around her too afraid to approach—
I've unbuttoned my shirt for her and stood there bared
Waiting for her stare to tattoo my heart,
But she's a mighty fare Clair
Running about in the world,
Changing to water and trees whenever no one is looking,
Whenever she fancies,
But I'm not supposed to think of these things
Because I don't know her....

But, Oh Brother,
Who knows!

Robert Rorabeck

Oh Cat

Cat who loves more insouciantly than dogs,
You are the more valuable mammal worshiped as the sun:
Clean yourself and put on make-up
And now your legs- With your briar tongue lap away
My indigo patches of fairytales,
And curl beneath the discombobulated bus with me for A second or two,
Between classes while I build you pyramids
And a sphinx with my Jewish rum
If just because I am out of magical spells and
The word hyacinthine doesn't seem to work enough;
And I will feed you macaroni for dinner,
And drink wine wrenched from the skeletal hands
Of a legionnaire of a friendly cartoon;
And won't I put the moon in a saucer for you to lap,
As soon your saddle bags will be squeezed by a half dozen mewing
Thoughts,
And the children will love you on my birthday,
And candles will be blow out for you;
But once famine comes, oh cat,
I will not be able to keep you on my trail:
I can go all around Colorado fishing out of sunk-tanked seas,
But you will follow your own premises,
The men who congratulate your senses like a pagan flicker;
And the literary agents likewise will not bother me;
And I will never see you again-
But I will have my dogs; and if we do see you again,
Oh dastardly cat, we will chase you up a tree long tongued;
And if no tree why then, long tailed goddess,
We'll make a messy dinner of your gut fried succulent in our Drooling mollusk bed;
So afterwards, licking ourselves, we will never again fear
A heartfelt flood.

Robert Rorabeck

Oh Dear, My Dear

Coal fields are black without pinpricks or lips,
And the sooty men sit there too tired for tricks;
And, above them, the sky is so black, so eered by night,
And the black little children fly black, eerie kites,
And sometimes I sit there in the coal dunes all cold,
And pretend there to know you and your fingers I hold,
But here are not your lips, so insignificant in ire,
For one single match would catch the whole place afire,
And what the angels would see as they ate lunch in space,
Is the insignificance of a distant star insouciantly lit,
A speck on a field like an imperfection unfit,
Or a hole in a yard which is otherwise uncommonly kept;
In truth, as you sit there cleaning your plate,
Your porcelain, your china, and all your estate,
I could climb up to your summit without bottled oxygen,
But just as swiftly your disinterest would knock me down again;
So I stay here gazing intent as a blind man,
The remnants of a cicada hooked to a banyan;
Where the sea of oil flicks the waves of an onyx harem,
And the sky above is a great, empty cauldron; Oh, you,
Whom to I say this song, so long since I've seen you;
I'm sure you are there bathing, but with even that, what do I know?
I have nothing to behold, for there is a reason all of this energy
Is held in blackness in the apex of a vacuum,
Like the wick of a candle kept by a faithful virgin, for to come
To you in this dark room, to pull the light on, to bend and kiss
You, without reception, would be the plot, the headstone,
And every inch of the coffin,
So I sit here in the unmatriculating headroom, while their Waves draw inky caesuras, and you sit on your bed with your Head turned, and let his fingers unhook your brazier,
So in the end I can say I've never known you, or swam in your country,
And you can kiss him with more innocent luxury,
Though when the work is done and they day is lulling,
When the shadows of creep and crawling, come a little more near,
I can still turn my head to you in the innocent darkness,
In the way I think you are waiting, and call
You dear,
My dear.

Robert Rorabeck

Oh So Many Times

Worried by the hurrying news- the patenting of Lost fights glaring in the cinders just before the yawning of
The mailboxes,
And my little dog left back in the woods,
Stroked by virgins with serpentine bodies that do the tricks,
As the day sets off like a match, by the heedless wonder
Of newly realizing stampede:
That this is but the outlook of another séances, going through
The motions as mothers pack lunches, slender straps slipping
From their shoulders heedlessly beside the canals.
Showing the freckles only their husbands and their coworkers
Should see to the alligators and the fanfare of Likeminded tramps: there they are starting downwards from
The pool,
With eyes of ruby, or the lapis lazuli that weeps from
The empty genies of too many bottles,
After all of the fairs have gone, like butterflies are gone-
Packed up to die poisonously over oh so many rivers- into the forests
Of lovers she will never admit to,
Where I wait for her to fall across me, to shroud me in the old skins
Of an unspoken dressing room where I saw her mirror less,
And kissed her oh so many times.

Robert Rorabeck

Oh So Sad And Clever Boy

I.

I'm not very smart, so for you
I have to be clever,

I can be a dolphin clapping in the surf,
You play coy and feed me pregnant tuna
Barefoot in the amber sands;
Up to your exposed knees-
A whole bucketful will slow me down,
And distinguish a gunmetal sleuth in the sunset.

I can be a boy again mind numbed on vodka;
I can set off a quarter stick of dynamite in the Ruby courtyard, crack open the geode, and draw your attention,
Smile bare-chested and pick a wild pomegranate,
Juxtapose it near the stigmata of my navel

Or I can play checkers on the green geometry of Suburbia,
Listening to the sweep of waves like
The alluring static of a coming radio;
but not very well,
Distracted by where you might be molting on a sprig;
Roller-skating over the bones or privateers,
The metal patina of bad conquistadors

And with the canary go down into the mines
For subtle tests of subtraction;
And I'll see you in the halls and wish you to quiz me,
Wish you to fall across me like a masked ball,
To flutter peacock feathers over your exposed teeth,
Pretending to be genteel while flaunting
A powdered bosom

Or I can hang around the parked cars again,
Any drunken afternoon and Wait for your smell to waif with sunset, or the cerulean

Bleed of students to homes again:
Restless on Sundays,
I can pretend to see you go,
And begin the tramp of scars- Which I've Been on now, Oh, so long I guess;
Whistling in jest of my own troubles, skipping
Like a Yankee-doodled over the skulls set there to Trip me,
Or time travel to pick you up from the stink of knightly armpits
In the feral courtyards of Camelot

II.

But you don't live in the palmettos anymore, do you?
Like a cicada you left your bedroom askance the cypress and Somewhere else you went

I am not very beautiful, so for you
I'll have to be clever;
I'll have to lay down and switch the sides of my Face, to confuse you: how easy you forget,
And love in those waves you've abound in
The stacked pornographies of proletarian
Superheroes,
Pecking at the watermarked biceps of your
Saber-toothed, navy-anchored sailors.

You've always had to work for you dinner,
And exercise your legs around and around in
An all too quiet parade:
The discombobulated merry-go-round of T&A
I known, it looks just like how they Bussed the students in so long ago into our lapsed
Anglo-Saxon fairy land:

Now look at my scars, and lay flowers; I've cut a rose
For you: I am a clever boy- Place it in my teeth and I will Turn about you three times in the air before I disappear
For a spell,
Clapping

Become the gentleman walking north in the dry hills

Of Spain,
Again over the bones who knew more than I,
Who were flayed by Civil War and turn away so you might not have to see

All the sad men who think my ink a jest:

Or not, for cast off this fibbing cloak and I am not
There at all; I am a failed used car salesman,
As nude as a huckstered king,
And the truant who tight-roped across the canal,
Laughing gapped toothed and spry,
Even when you would have called me home to your Honey-bosom stung by April bees,
For we would have showered full blown in the pollens
Of vertical meadows populated by sugar rabbits,
And the immortal jay-like bodies of virgin soldiers
Massacred in the pollen,
Stacked like a busty wedding cake up to a Golden-titted castles

III.

But, oh no,

I am not a smart boy, and I've never had to earn my Dinner at a trot: I'll buy a house instead and waltz with all You've forgotten inside, and all the pages I've written Never read for you; instead,
I'll find a wife and put her in a garden,
And hold her there and keep her until she is too tired
To move and wait for her to Smile, and see how long she'll stay if I'm properly egalitarian when she bends low,
And I trumpet her like in a Chaucerian revelry,
If I spit and shine at certain angles of the day, and put off my Bayonet and watch her trough the daisies and
The blue bells from a fort overlooking the sea:
And sigh, and say like the son of an all too forgetful king,
That this is how it should have been one day for us
When I was yet blond and as well read as a comic book;

But now the storm front moves forward one move;
And it is frighteningly cold, and uncommonly beautiful in
The same town you drive for sex and show back and forth;
You who serve fried chicken and coke at the rodeos
Underneath the shopping malls,
And it has the smell of you on its cleft palate;
And it is pushing you in front of it like a cinnamon doe,
A smell of caffeine and runny ice-cream and cocaine,
A scar-less, carefree and forgetful bouquet that Leaps clear over the shoulders of new brides,
Making me look for a little while up through the highest windows
And power-lines, to see the blue birds quivering well-fed in their Nests,

To feel you blow over in a possessed front, tipping over stop-signs,
Eerily shoving down everything you know to see,
Your smells pollinating across the highway, causing traffic accidents;
A stunning breed of musk haunting the intangible borders;
Even while the buses turn around from school, delaying your Offspring for awhile-
The kids shouting first-time heirlooms,
I can toast you from my middle-class
Parapet,
Uncorking my toy musket and dawning mouse ears;
Saluting you in a nursery-rhyme of an overgrown fit,
Give a turn and start down my sometimes clever stairs,
To greet all that I've known to anonymously become.

Robert Rorabeck

Oh, Hell

Now my soul is as wrecked as the face of my body
On the shoals,
And all of the pirated ships of kindergarten are waiting underneath
The caesuras of the blue gilled knolls,
And you don't know me by now, Alma:
Now I am all f-ed: like the unrequited love of ducks in the Playgrounds of preschool,
And you have never had to taste the blood off my tongue:
You have never even had to ring me bell:
All you have done is knocked, and I have come, like a ghost
Hooked into the mouth of a bright
But lonely shell:
I have come, and my soul has torn open like the wash basin
In the grotto of a suicidal virgin in the forests of The seventh layers of hell;
And you blew me out, and you rode out ponies, and you
Defeated our games, and you ate our baloney;
And oh, hell, Alma:
Oh, hell....

Robert Rorabeck

Oh, Yeah, Yeah, Yeah

They've bought a beautiful house- she
And all her beautiful friends.
I don't know what to do but to write another
Disposable poem,
Toilet paper to dab sweat and excrement,
Soon I'll be in her neighborhood setting up
Christmas trees,
Though its impossible that I shall ever deliver one
To her living room;
And I begin and end my truancies in expectable Ways, always the man who hoped for
And got nothing, but they humored him and Let him garland the tree: His ex-girlfriend's house
Cost $230,000- If he finish up next year,
Licking off the boot-prints and shell-fish of His paternity he'll have that out right
And be able to move into the tourisms of Saint Augustine- He'll be able to diadem them in a way,
Which would be kind of like growing in the monsters
In Beowulf's fairytale- He would rather love the Bartenders in the ghettos in the savannahs of North-central Florida- those goyem without much debt, without Secular holidays, who are always ready to fill the story-Telling glass with her forgetful eyes; and I am really Almost done, even though she has allowed me to Believe that not only passable neighbors can live up and Down the rows of Siamese houses, each with their own
Crenulated swimming pool, like a frosted birthday cake,
Really hoping that is extemporaneous file will crash-
No one will read it anyways, underneath the witches or
The tall implanted palms- She will go to work in the morning,
She will attend Hallel quite presumptuously;
Thank whatever god crawled out of the canal, she will never Read this poem- She will brush her hair and smile for Her routine and secular morays; they will have a house together,
A mortgage, and children to rays,
But I will never have to go down on her again, to wake up
And realize that I am not in love,
Though the mezuzah is still drilled to the door,

The Catholics, under swell juniper, are still putting on Their passion plays.

Robert Rorabeck

Old And Copper Men

I will give you another head start—
And then I will right away start hitting the bottle—
As you yourself begin propositioning some other genie—
We will see who gets through with it first—
And who gets kicked out of the mall—
And I will get so drunk that I will never again have to remember
Why it is that you go back home every night to him—
And in the morning, the stewardesses will touch down—
And they will be selling the sacrament or giving it away for Next to nothing—while, over their shoulders,
The sky will bloom a new nebula—
And you will wait it all out, to see what the result is:
Another white dwarf or a black hole—
And you will be free of all gravity that you will virtually run
Through the backyards of time, kissing and falling in love
With the boys that you see even as they turn into
The graveyards of old and copper men.

Robert Rorabeck

Old Memories Of High School

Old memories of high school,
Like a vineyard tantalizing my lips from
The elbows of a voluptuous airplane—
While my wife whistles like
A ghost,
And our first child plays baseball in her
Belly—
And the fish swim,
Certain there is someplace still left to Survive—
Like the phosphorous of forget-me-nots
Burning over the forgotten playgrounds
The ill begotten governments have all
Taken down—
The missing playgrounds I once swung on
With my evil muses—those beautiful
Girls whose hearts went missing while Their husbands just so happened to Be out of town.

Robert Rorabeck

Olga's Guitar

The green fields are empty and metropolitan,
And I am getting paid to be here with my temples
Bandaged,
Hoping there will be echoes, or her face in the moon:
The monks chant, "C0cktease, " and orgasm the lovely
Avalanche, thus the mountains unclothe,
And my mother finds me dead, or just in a faint;
She uses the store-bought bouquet to resurrect me,
The donkey to remove the stone,
The stick to break me, or send me further along, because My peers are still preening and they are joining Catholic Mass with the prom; I go wearing scuba gear;
She went in a thong. When we brushed together, we moaned
Like little kids putting on, until I was blinded and put in The wind tunnel by the nurse; This was Christmas, a curse,
And we walked halfway to France looking for Olga's guitar;
Everyone was drunk on new years, but I remained a virgin
Eating grapes on the train, the opposite window reflecting
The side of my face,
And the hills were dusty and clayed and smelled of dead poets,
And dogs who'd never eaten a meal howled and grew into men
Who grew domesticated and worked the field,
Until they got the juices out of her, and married her daughter;
Thus, became rich, and spoke in whispers of little boys leaping
Their fields,
And when she bent down, she showed her bosom, and they Thought this most generous, and went out night barefooted and danced Alone for her beneath her muddy window, where she looked down,
Slipping out a breast which cried down to them;
In this they were leavened and rose
Up and caught her around and undressed above the house,
And bathed kissing in the moon's penumbra, the dogs in the cellar
Howling that they too had once been men,
Though by morning their masters had them generously fed.

Robert Rorabeck

Omaha

Alone in the building of red bricks
I pretend there are ghosts outside my window-
Even when there are children walking,
There are ghosts between them-
And the high trees rattle even up to
The 4th floor where I am turning my tricks
Five years ago, maybe more-
Reading the scrawls on papyrus is
All I'm good for, and now
Not even that. Just an old hat
Discarded on a forgotten floor
Where man and wife once christened
The threshold and filled the walls
Full with the new eyes opening
And hungry mouths needing,
A turn of the century boom town
The houses are all pell-mell up the hill
Where the workers lived near the factory
And to the side a little red bricked university
Where the ghosts and the students are Always walking, humming the tune
Of the way things once were
The knowledge scrawled like graphs
On the makeshift tomb,
As quickly as these times proceed.
They have build a grand highway over
The old city, now a forgotten museum
Returning to the red mountains
And the rut of glaciers that slid inevitably
Up to where the barren branches go
Tapping this early in the forgotten year-
I turn my eyes to look out the window
Knowing that there are ghosts down below
And that I am not even there.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Birthday Cake For Dying Rabbits

Storm clouds laughing over bowling alleys where
No one spends any real time in-
And the jaundice east blowing out the sick
Candles on a birthday cake for Dying rabbits:
And this is my toy sent spinning out onto
The concrete field,
Covered with so much graffiti, like tattoos
Around your neck,
And the airplanes coming across you
Carelessly every night, but never having the mind
To look down and see.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Cheek Of The Moon

Through the lips of the stars who are like vases,
Who drink through the night while all of
The cats are slinking away after the automobiles,
And the imaginations of the strangers are captivated by
The other motivations that cannot contain us in our Bedrooms,
As the ambulances go around, chasing the fees of werewolves—
And we fall in love with the roses pressed against Our tombstones—until there is no more room for us,
Not even in the raindropp stolen into an eye of A witch—
And the thieves come around barefooted, collecting
Those things that do not belong to them—
And the students of the soulless grottos gather
In the gymnasiums to play basketball—
And the rainstorms carry over—filling themselves with
The holes of another love—and I wait for you,
Getting inebriated in my living room,
Hoping for the resolution of a good novel—
For the sun to paint my fingerprints, as if developing A theft, as he comes out to give a peck on the cheek of the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Drizzly Doorstep

This is French who cant speak it,
Rimbaud without his tongue- I got a C
In the language of love,
A C+ in logic, and horse semen that has Gone bad waiting for my truck in Show Low, AZ:

I look at myself in the mirror,
I look at myself again, at another angle, standing
In the corner- I can't tell by the way people are Looking at me, how the dogs lull their tongue-

Right now on the back of the buffalo, father is putting
The forks on the tractor to unload the tons of hay
Stolen from Silver City, NM,
The sun is kissing Molly's Nipple,
And someone just shut the door upstairs without Saying a word-

The lady at the post office is bovine though congenial.
Still, her restaurant finally went out of business, and
As she smokes, she blames the German cook, who else?
I tell her I am moving to Saint Augustine,
Into the canopy of ghosts and nuns, where the conquistadors
Bugle bright plastic birthday souvenirs for the semi autobiographical tourists-

My ex-lover does the Kaddish as she does the laundry,
And she serves her new Hassidic husband potato latkes which they both enjoy,
And when they make love, while the detergent desalinates in the thumping
Washer, does she think how my hips used to poker as their hips conjoin,
As she drives away hitched to his last name, like the inbreeding of royalty-

Outside until mid afternoon the mezuzah sits alone,
The palm trees whisper as the wind blows
Them casually in the landscaping of the cleft lips of the carport in Royal Palm Beach,
And down the road there is an unused library, and a park where I
Have sold pumpkins and Sparrow Lane, where a girl I never knew
Grew up playing in the humid detachment of a latchkey childhood forgotten
On a drizzly doorstep.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Gloomy Wednesday

Gay-lords are in the apple sauce;
Water brothers brush through the aquatic kelp
As colorfully as a Saturday Morning cartoon:
They share nests as perfect as curious teal.
I read Heinlein's master work and weep,
So full of scars, and someone has already taken the Prize from the lucky cereal box, like taking her
Virginity
And letting the cat play with it under the couch
Until it is mauled and penniless
On a gloomy Wednesday;
and on the bright street maybe three girls
Are swishing back and forth in buxom shorts practicing
For the roller derby,
but they will not publish my book,
Because it is not that- Just a hang-up of a nod;
My eyesight is getting worse,
I do not have a hair that isn't gray;
And she said to me, it would have been better kept in Dreams,
now come to bed my silky felon: And I can Do this,
just about anytime now.
I can move out and
Buy my own house with that thatch of green carpet
Good for my son when he gets old enough to need to Jack-off. -
And we can pretend to not know of Such needs,
Good for romance and dime novels and the Censer the sun swings to each day hearing the high benedictions
Of vultures and airplanes. This is almost enough:
To recede like this into the waves, to hold hands with the Fake species and then to trundle like a washing machine
Blindly with the penultimate mermaid, her breath burning of

Rum and sugar-cane-
Her eyes smoked in the everglades,
And worked over by black men as sleek as cougars, her shoulder blade tattooed by the sooty thumbprints of Triumphant privateers and wash-tub hooligans. My parents rock the House upstairs,
and this is how we do it,
go out into the world like
A schoolyard and watch it flood with the hollering conflagrations
Of waves hallucinating in time, so that entire student body is Dredged up, and professional streets
With pinstriped angels singing hallelujah,
And the little marks under the eyes,
And the paper-cuts,
The delusions put on stage by busty house-
Wives now glow like somnambulant
Drift wood,
Wavering where the caesuras grow outward in
A thick forest roiling,
Waiting for the sky to boil over, so that the floating cuts
Burn forever like gifts of ignited gasoline,
Each yard like a pillbox on Omaha beach with smiling
Machine gunners and bomb-shell mortar teams
With crystal chandeliers and great tits,
Smiles white enough to sell gifts to a thief.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Promise For Indians

Sad wounds on a promise for Indians—
Another night falling down across the birds,
As the hobos settle in,
Knowing that they are lucky,
That it is the entrepreneurs who have
To go back to work tomorrow,
And the teachers and the students
Who have to go back to school tomorrow—
Even after the sun has set,
They wet their lips, and listen
To the apathetic romances of the Traffics—
By this way they come to know themselves.
In the morning they will pan handle
And put new personifications onto
The clouds—
They will never have to go to Disney World—
Their minds are free, and where they are Going they have never been before.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Rainy Day

The cars are filled with meat:
You could say that the cars too are filled with hearts,
And sometimes the sky is filled with hearts,
And they go by the ways the know;
And they get love struck when they leap so far away
Across the burnished sea-
There are no clanging cities and there are no dichotomies
Of lovers;
But some might say that the most fragile, lost little Girls live in the deepest of seas,
And that is why we must become pilots, because we can Meet them there,
Or at least look down as they put on mascara riding upon
The backs of unafraid dolphins:
They go so far away from their homes:
They go where they cannot be found, and we can only follow
Them for our some few ways,
For our planes are like minnows compared to them,
And I would like to give them names,
But I am so afraid-
Where they go I should not say, but I believe they go to heaven.
They go to heaven on a rainy day.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Voyage Which Had No Need For End

She said she loved me,
But it wasn't me, but the horses I attended,
And Thomas Hardy, and his Tess:
I loved her anyway, and lassoed for her endlessly,
The colts of spitfire in the lightning storm:
I wept and on the back of the ridge:
Upon the combative plates, it wreathed,
And the spurious balls curled between the horns
Of bulls and the leather horn of my saddles,
As in a myth well satisfied;
And she watched me from the kitchen and did not Stir, her breasts powdered with flour,
Smeared with the gristle and tallow of buffalos:
Indians cried from the sink, their arrowheads
Onyx, and chipped, resting beaten on the shelves:
I said I loved her from afar, but I could not leapt
Such a ways to her: She took other men while
The blue lions slept in trees. They did not stir,
But ate deer way up in those crooks, as the waters
Gathered and gossips in shoots of quartz,
As the sky was marble and veined with rich premonitions;
But afterwards upon them, her eyes did not open,
They did not attend my endless leap: Well sated,
They fled away, on a voyage which had no need for end.

Robert Rorabeck

On A Windy Day Down The Mainstreet Of Saint Augustine

Songbirds open with jasmine song,
And I don't have to do anything else today
But lay on my back and open my eyes;
When I'm not feeling lazy, I drink milk and Patrol the yard- The farthest I go is across the canal
Where there are naked pictures strewn out in a Zoological collage matting the fermented embankment
- Women in leggy orbit and Fetching polyester: Busty prom queens of science-fiction that look Good going down behind the cypress;
They give silver tensiled winks and rosemary nods in the lazy
Ways and estuaries where he, crowned, persuades her down to bed.
The red shoots as tongues from the armpits of cypress
Their roots suckling the pickled heads of silver-scarred
Conquistadors.
I don't know either of them, and I leave before they Start making noise, moaning like a captain of an evil ship
With a bad toothache;
I go back to my own home which I bought years ago
When I was thirteen. The vermillion carpet is mottled from my Fretful masturbations and delinquent pets- Though the Windows peep-show azure, they always do, and creased airplanes
Lay strewn about, the immature origami across my velveteen
Wasteland of emerald love letters that don't even make it out
The front door. After I am done and breathless, my tongue
Hung up on all the pretty names of pretty girls I don't know,
I fall down to eyelevel and wave at Lilliputian stewardesses
Smooching from the portcullises cut out like snowflakes;
I wave to them and they kick off their heels when the talk-shows
Come on the same time as the cicadas;
We stay up all night like old girlfriends and I toss them popcorn,
And they are so small and pretty that one kernel is like a Decadent meal, and their breasts rise up gratefully and swell like Pink balloons tugged by kindergarteners watching a parade
On a windy day down the Main street of Saint Augustine.

On And On

There are no more birthdays in her eyes,
Because they have opened up a new venture.
Some part of her is still French,
But I cannot tell if it is her upper lip
Or her left elbow when it is resting in the good
Light of a game of chess.
For now, though, the best thing for me to Do is travel on, perhaps even get married if I can get by with a prenuptial agreement,
And beat her at the money game, for I had Been married before but only in agreement with Judaism, and I was left hanging by the heart strings,
Though I had long since lost the ring she gave Me from Jerusalem, and what it said.
Even now, there are many faces in books of People I should know, who maybe I do not even Want to know, but there is a sad urge about it
As if I was a castigated horse wishing to return
To the stormy herd who had trampled him away.
She, though, is surely leaving now, for it is early Morning, and time for her to put the key in the Lock of some classy joint. I don't even know
What she might be selling, nor if how
She greets the men is true romance or a sales ploy,
But she does greet them that way, time and again.
I should leave her to that business, because I don't even know a thing about her,
Except some small part of her is still French,
And on and on.

Robert Rorabeck

On Bones Or Tulips

I prefer to drink,
All alone and all night long,
Slowly like a love letter kindled on the logs,
Like a little girl on a swing set all alone,
Beside the moon and dogs-
Not at bars
Crowded with the lackadaisical society of Lunch boxes- Girls whose legs are mostly pinked,
Only a strip of pinstripes,
Boys who are boxers, raconteurs, and other
Gay professions I shouldn't like to spell:
Drink alone is the very essence of life,
The purest confession of any kind, not just
A fieldtrip, a day-drive: This is how the Spartan did
It, his brethren stocked up in the pass,
This is how the mailmen do it off shift, humming
On their slender cinderblock porch in all the rains;
But I shouldn't drink at all unless I should Succeed, rack in the monies and fames of spring,
Surpassing my dirt farming forefathers;
Tendonitis of adverbs and similes, instead of Briary cottons and combines;
Spit-shine, and make my money with a bit of whale
Bone, scrimshawed and rhymed:
Then I should drink! And drink alone! To Hemmingway,
To Bukowski, to Bogey and Macaw:
See me swim so gallantly with the knightly fishes,
Like Twain, corn-cob pipe firmly unclenched, enjoying
The cheapest tobaccos, and of course my cheap liquors:
To make a name for myself, such a talent,
And to go around campus and perform that way, all in Tweed or gabardine;
mustached, making girls fall in love with my debonair
Intelligences: gentle policemen tip their caps to me,
And we share a nip and parlay- All of that finely fashioned Dream, and making love to young girls I just met who Checked me into the library,
My artistic reward, a lap dance in a crackerjack movie,
A long-legged secretary in a brewery makes love to me:

But I should say, I shouldn't at all, not one dram,
Until I can pay my way, a celebrated libertine,
Celibate of liquor, spiced rum, and sea;
A life of thirsty abstinence, until the funeral parlor,
Or acclaim: Then, on bones or tulips,
With these lips and with these dreams:
Celebrated or forgotten, but at the end of my drive,
I should drink in such a solitary contest
As to line up the alike animals two by two once again in a
Postmodern fire-drill, flood of inundated deluge:
Drink to the girls, the dead poets, the dogs,
On bones or tulips, drink.

Robert Rorabeck

On Even Days

I'll see you first from the
Crows nest of my soul,
And jerk off to the first aerodynamic flume of Airplanes,
Because there is so much about you to love,
After a few beers and all the terrible
Traffic has past;
And we've defeated the British and are singing about
It on our July 4th on our little yard which is just Ours,
A menage trois between us and the bank,
And our one citrus tree which has canker but so many Children budded roundly plumped from the vine,
And many words unspoken,
And all of it like a strangely fruitful model of the universe
I slip down under just as I am about to go to Sleep, so warmed from liquor and speech,
All these people around me who are friendly,
But who I really shouldn't compare as friends;
And yet I love them,
Even as your eyes are truncated like soft, easily bruised
Fruit into bedrooms;
And your name is E-, and you don't write all,
Which is very unprofessional of you,
And I just keep going on and on, breaking like a kaleidoscope
At a steady clip,
Like so many waves, like soft palates clapped together
Like cymbals all across Loxahatchee and Wellington,
And graveyards full of so many friends
Who don't know me at all but should wake up with me
Yawning in the unsteady dawn,
Nervous when greeting the lord like a conductor or a bus
Driver shaking his hands
Who we never knew anyways, but like our love for you,
E-,
Are grateful for all the same- At least on even days.

Robert Rorabeck

On Fairytales

J.R.R. Tolkien was my prom date,
And if you believe hard enough
Any boy can become a fairy.

My good friend's father was
A cop.
You see, you see,
There are better things for us.

And there are gravestones in the east.
And there are gravestones in the west.
And storm clouds like herds
Of combustible cattle.

And pet cemeteries like little tears
Along the highways
Full of plastic coffins
And mewling spines.

Robert Rorabeck

On Her Amber Body

I pay the toll for my artwork with the lucidity of these crimes,
The cauldrons gurgle for their witches,
And the city diademed in centerfolds spins on an axis twinkling for Christmas;
And we all pirouette, both man and beast,
While the twinkling creatures rise and flutter and children
Are birthed to their weeping mothers.
My fingernails are dirty, and I have spent my work week staring at Pretty Mexicans; and America is more beautiful because She is starving: the middle class is jaundiced, and they are always moving out
Or being forced out;
And I couldn't care so much where they are going; I think of her hair
As dark as it is red, like the witchcraft of sacrificial maize:
And I want to stare forever into her eyes, and on her amber body graze.

Robert Rorabeck

On Her Mind

Windows spread over brightening cadavers,
The sun a tourist, a child creeping his eyes up through
The corners,
And the flag pole is raisedâ€”
The children have gone home, mollusks to their Shellsâ€”something beautiful remains in a park
For the werewolves and paper snowflakes
And other things that donâ€™t really come wintering into
Night:
The church a blue agate where the homeless
Men soon see their love riding a silver horse over
Christmas:
And they breathe their drunken entities into her bones:
And she rides away into the dark surplice,
Poison in her bosom, another god on her mind.

Robert Rorabeck

On Her Way Home

The roads hitherto go from here:
They have been going from carnival: they have been going
Up their roads;
They have been waiting for all of their stalwart children, but What about this:
What about all of this, the Mexican dances, and my soul gone
Away,
My Alma gone on home, waiting by herself for the bolero to Unfold,
Or neither waiting for anything from me- this is just all there is,
And the forests are the testaments to all of Our hopes grown up feral and
By themselves,
Like the airplanes skydiving, and her heart there in the middle of The road, accruing to other scimitars who shall never Rust,
While she listens to the music in her car on the way home-
Blustering and contented,
And far away from home, but on her way-
On her way home.

Robert Rorabeck

On His Amber Lips

Amber hair which ends dip drunkenly
In amber beer,

Frame amber eyes which gaze drunkenly
Through the diffuse, swimming light,

Move in intoxicating currents, swaying oceanic
Alongside the patrons' tilting continents,
Where they collide like yellow ships disembarked
Without crews, drunken boats
Who dock up to amber
Haired barmaids back in port through early morning

All the heavens smashed,
Slanted angels sing,

Winds grasp their steerage, directed by drowsy fates

Overfilled vessels,
Spilling

Her lips brush his amber hair, her amber eyes
Roam across his brown skin, dimpled chin lifts up to say a Word to his ear and her inebriated tongue writhes forth like
A creature from its bright shells to taste last Night's beer, numbly, for the last time
On his amber lips.

Robert Rorabeck

On Monday

Wounded without cars, and there are no more
Bright new houses:
Everything is out of a book burned in a fire,
And father is dead and still laughing
Where, in the cemetery, her hand has fallen like Misspelled leaves strewn carelessly by the birds,
Cannibals. Rocket ships leave past noon,
I suppose, with their books of poetry and their Dusty gunfighters. She has no more cares for me,
Not even an epitaph on a tomb bright new lovers leave
Smears of lips on like snails and other things.
On Monday, the asteroid passed so dangerously close to The earth you could smell it,
And the car salesmen stopped dead, and my scars tingled,
And supper is ready:
The last orange grown in the earth and cut about in
The sad kitchen atop the scales of a three-headed fish;
But I am not called up to eat it,
So I douse the light and dine alone:
Associating her tears with mine- it is the only thing
To eat in such a land where all the cars lay buried,
And the gas fires sizzle, rimming the failing eyes of bums
Like wayward saints lost in a dusty park- it never ends.

Robert Rorabeck

On My Mind

Girls whose bosoms heave behind cash
Registers
Every day I perceive
Underneath the honey canopy,
Out from the days of our school,
Venal truancies, I don't know:
I just get drunk and tan out on the easements,
My body in hand,
And these are the songs for the days or holidays
Of long ago,
Paper airplanes all basking on the open
Patio,
Match box cars bogged down in the grass,
And now she comes in and shakes her ass,
And later on we'll have a long siesta limbs fully entwined
Underneath the penumbra of ceiling fans;
The evening will surcease and I will float away with Sharon on my mind,
My sick muse making me very sure that I can plagiarize
Whenever,
And the test will still be good,
And I will not have to die as long as I have her on my mind.

Robert Rorabeck

On My Very Mind

I have just told you the reason
Why the stars haven't fallen; and maybe you are still up,
But what do you believe in:
Not swimming pools, but the call of my voice,
Echoing to you on the birthday of your mines, and everything Else
While the saddles lay unstaddled save for the elk and for the Unicorns,
While the seas circle around their curious harems,
While the rainbows leap, and leap and finally to settle down,
Like even the most industrious of airplanes finally have to Touch the ground:
And now this: now this, touching dirt unto dirt,
Lips unto lips, while the Ferris Wheels close up like envelopes,
Like a roses' lips down deep into the centers of a hurricane,
Or something even more cleverer than this:
Like something that I haven't even felt, though, Alma,
I have felt you, like the very same way that a forest fire has felt
His very same way up the spine of those distant mountains;
And so now lips are now ash;
And you are lying down while this clock I know counts all of The highs and the lows until the cock of cock crows;
But all the same,
I have you, and I will always have you on my very mind.

Robert Rorabeck

On My Way Home

Painting in the four colors of the universe
Underneath the microbes of your lost
Love,
After someone like you has gone from a window
Like mine
Once the snow has melted
And the Ferris Wheels have folded like wet
Wasps,
And this is the song you sing after school
As spring is supposed
To melt,
And the trailers of history and social studies
Look like a drunken park underneath the tall
Sunlight:
And somewhere around here there is a
Baseball diamond,
And an alligator yawns- but I do not see you Anymore, because I figure you were my Make-believe and I am on my way home.

Robert Rorabeck

On That Great, Great Come And Get It Day

I've been waiting for the rain to come:
It comes:
The raccoons have been eating in the garage:
The wedding cake is almost gone:
I've been waiting for the rains to song;
They song,
And how long have you been home under the roof
And not under the tree? Where are your children gone
In this old neighborhood and far away:
Where are they all going if not outside to play;
And they play,
And maybe the rain goes away: it hurts the voice of my Heart to hear its absence in the gray:
Rainbows are gray knives who have been cutting their Fabric to the sea:
Why don't you think of me: I am like a scavenger looking
Up into a tree; and climbing up into the tree,
Waiting for the rain to come: for you to come down the Narrow way,
Basking in the echoes of what little you've had to say;
And you'll come
Tomorrow or today, and I will awaken inside the arms of A tree that shouldn't be growing here,
Full of song birds and then it rains
And you come: It happens, everything I've had to say Happens on that great, great come and get it day.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Amber Abutment

You come off like a firework manhandling
A toothache:
Your mother was a dragon I could never slay:
You lay in green meadows openly praying and fiddling
Your legs:
Moving so fast as a hummingbird, you pass over all the Overpasses:
Your father was the first green copper cannon to ever
Enter America:
Now he sells rime salt and popcorn:
His eyes are the very same eyes that were once thought
To be aqueducts on mars:
Your neck is a crystal column no Hollywood movie could Accurately describe;
And yet you have no daughter: Or maybe you have just
One daughter born in the jungles
Of Columbia, depending on who you are for me tonight:
And I have $207,000 dollars and one pair of shoes
Without holes;
And I think of you continually: maybe today I have given
You a flower,
A pink gladiola, though I would like to name every Article of your paradise: every bend of your auburn body should Be charted by me, ever swiftly perfumed dime,
If you would only lay still for awhile or two for me, maybe
In the house I'll buy, maybe tonight or tomorrow
If you have a daughter who I have never seen, if your mother
Named you Diana
Then I have already struck out for you and am even now
Just as upset as a wolf soaked to the bone on the amber abutment
That looks far out across the sea of your perfect games.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Cattle Drive

On the cattle drive we called someone boss:
The cook carried a bed frame with four knobs
Made of brass;
And it was only the sky that moved:
Moved, moved like a flag at high mast-
The flag of country of only one beautiful
Color: It was the place where in her tiny city,
Her eyes looking up from the table
Met the horizon
And defeated it.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Feet Of The Clouds

I am gone now—
A million moons away, going to China—A million
Requests away underneath the Christmas trees
Of a blistering Christmas
As we sell ourselves away—
As we cry out—
For those who are not here—
Who are fanfare and comatose beneath the milky way—
As a I loved you a thousands miles—
As I closed my eyes and pretended to count coup on you
And the lawns stretched out all of their Greenest mouths for you—
Emerald and other words for green—
As the graveyards lay just right there—a million
Diamonds in a checkerboard of un-played
Dimensions—
And it was all right here for all of this time—
In the unopened story books and the unmouthed rhymes—
But I am going away, while the pictures repeat
Masturbating themselves,
And pissing on the feet of the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Green Carpet Of I Don'T Care

Scars, cars, and traffic signals,
And steps down:
Empty cities now, going into one thousand
Acre graveyards,
Going to where horses used to live and ate
The forest like entire cartons of cottage cheese:
And no one cared,
And if your legs are tall and sexy enough,
And how sweet I don't know,
They can leap down the stairs how many
At a time?
And you can catch my paper airplanes right out
Of the mocking air,
And if you did this how so much I'd like to kiss
You and lounge with you on the green carpet
Of I don't care;
And mother is upstairs right now talking on
The phone; and if she is a witch, she doesn't Believe it is true,
And I used to love her so, let me count the waves,
Ejaculate off the cigarette road coarse not very Deep in the fronds of aloe:
And there are dunes where GI Joes sleep,
And canals to go leaping,
Many different ways to skip school;
And right now my father is driving a stallion far Across the country, entering and exiting on the Slick interstate in and out of all those cities:
And America is beautiful but only painted in so many Colors,
And the lips are always blowing on the grass, and Winnowing that kind of dress,
And good poets are always dying by forty,
Aren't they?

Robert Rorabeck

On The Inside Of Town

Encoded into a rich harem where
Nothing can last forever
I listen to country music and wait for your Older sister to come out and sun
Beside the pool;
It smells like the chatter of propane and Obnoxious lilies,
The black spattering of woodpeckers and Porcupines
Mark your breasts while your eyes are closed
And the airplanes are circling like pugnacious buzzards:
The day of the dead is having his parade on the street,
The grateful and the ungrateful dead
Stealing your car and reneging on promises;
But you are already in love with a better man, perhaps an Airplane pilot, the very one circling you,
Caracoling you like a ribbon unlaced from your gown:
The boys are watching you from underneath the pool,
Like truants in the bleachers;
But you never look up and you never look down,
At these ghosts painting your body on the inside of town.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Lam

Arrows, arrows in her hair, calling for the summer
Stare,
Like robins, robins out in the perch, red birds waiting in a lurch,
And miners, miners cresting the golden
Crawl,
Like sunbathers taking in their haul:
And horses manes flower over water that is like glass,
As the hobos step empty footed across the Overpass,
Where weeds cry up to angels that they cannot sing,
As bicycles drift away to Spring;
And Alma casts her eyes once more out upon the world that becomes
Her shore,
Every morning she awakes, and her eyes whisper like brown
Wedding cakes, out upon my softly padded bones:
I wish for her, and I bemoan the subtle fates that waited too long
For us to break together as two waves out on the make:
And maybe we will get together on our days off and rob
Banks,
Or in the least see the art exhibits as the pen,
Or the asphodels in the gardens as they come, and come again:
The graveyard whispering the names of its two lovers on the lam.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Merry Go Round

Suns on fire; it's what they do,
Like your children on the Merry Go Round,
Or in their yards after school:
And you told me you had two rabbits; but now you lie in the Very same bed as your man who left you for
Mexico
And came back again- and in my silent thoughts I wonder if I Am the only man you have had otherwise in the imperfections of
Your flesh:
Soon your daughter will be two: her bones will be solidifying,
And her vocabulary will grow:
She will walk prouder and prouder across your yards,
Until she cannot be contained;
As I wonder how many times I may kiss your lips again and
Again;
Alma-it is all I ever wonder, and at night while I am alone,
These thoughts become my Christmas floating in beautiful lights
Across my homeless home.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Move

Skin secretes this new day out on the Open, banal field: Deep trumpets proclaim
What a traffic jam,
The interstate slithers with a corroded belly,
Moving slow now up past the shade of The Bellefontaine Cemetery;
Wash basins in the grass, like drowned
Castanets, Sara Teasdale in her place, both
Pale and quiet- antique jubilee how the parade
Cannot be seen marching,
The devout students so quietly trying at the University- images both real and mostly imaginary.
I shall move here, following the railway tresses,
Becoming again illusionary far removed from the Sacred breath of my parents;
I will proclaim here, stutter, and skip here,
And lie down where the Nez Perce leaders embank
The sodden green haloed by the rustic green water tank;
I will suck life through my teeth, imbibing cheap
Liquors and anything garlanded and caustic enough to Deny the existence of tourists more beautiful or studious
Than I.

Robert Rorabeck

On The Steps Of Gold

Alma on the steps of gold—
Fishermen with their hooks of empty hands—
This seems to be the way to
The heavens,
Or so I am told—
Alma on the steps of gold—
Greenness in the sky and airplanes—
Waterspouts dancing with their hurricanes—
Apoplexy in the silent race of clouds
Shaking their silvery rains over
The everglades on an off day—
Alma kneeling in the shade—
Plants being sold from the seeds by which They're made—
Sad men painting themselves runaways
On stolen bicycles—
Lovers being what they are told—
Alma on the steps of gold—
Brave young men taking death by the hand,
Dividing everything by three,
As if that was their plan—
I cannot imagine everything ever being so again,
Alma kneeling in the shade,
Feeding ducks from her soft brown hand—
Her children all cast around her again
Practicing becoming again as if they were Made,
Alma kneeling in the shade—
While airplanes caracole in the grottos
Of their somnambulant sleep—
Blessing angels, counting sheep—
Stewardesses listening to what they are told,
Alma on the steps of gold.

Robert Rorabeck

On The The Other Side Of The Earth

Accumulating in the wretchedness of their petrification,
Stoned in Riga mortis: how will these corpses now enjoy the vacantly
Pleasurable shelters of the structures they deserved
To hold mortgages on: while all of the fireworks shout like Football players stoutly in the jubilee of mud pies in an Away game across the centuries of tattoos and bruised
Cheek bones:
As if at night there was a fair ground high across the cross saddles
Of a truly believable high ground where the countries could have Fought each other forever: and the night could have glowed with
The petulance of farm boys
Who had discovered kerosene and masturbation; and taking the Tractors of the adults, driven into town to buy whiskey, laughing
At the stuck out spokes of the bicycles of a world underneath them:
And laughing just to swallow the rain believing it was her tears
For them,
While the animals were so infatuated they moved back into her
Forest even while the ambers curses:
For they were so in love, and they learned her language, and curled
About the fairytales of her maypoles wrapped in the butterflies and Rainbows and the candy dropping of the yesterdays of her old Skin: even though she'd gone, finding everything they believed they could Sell to her useless- taking the forms of the forest and the streams, Until she could find a lover who would suite her fancy- and the Sun pulled her up by the throat and promised her the better adventures
On the other side of the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

On Their Bicycles

Knights tucked into their tombs, underneath the apple orchards
And far away from home-
Like decorations in pretty arcades that will soon be Obsolete underneath the sun and the moon
And the otherwise uncountable heavens:
But the angels have freckles, and they eat the daylight of its Apples,
And the pretend to pet the goldfish swim around and Around in the unbeknownst oracles of their living
Rooms,
Waiting for the children to come and come home again,
Returning on their bicycles, underneath
The clouds driving their highways across the effervescing moon.

Robert Rorabeck

On Their Four Legs

We made love
For an hour at a time:
We made love for
Two hours at a time:
We made love for
Three hours at a time
Underneath
The banderas of Mexico,
While her husband waited at home for
Her,
And her children waited at home for her:
And I rode my bicycle around
Her neighborhood
And made her promises I could not Keep:
And it rained, and it was sunny:
And she stopped coming around,
Because she felt different because of How I made her feel:
She was a new woman,
But she could not tell anyone:
She still lives near the dog tracks-
And they are running, and running,
And running around-
Luckily on their four legs:
And I'll tell you that she still thinks of Me, as long as you promise not to Tell anyone.

Robert Rorabeck

On Their Soft Brown Skin

It seems real that my joy is drunken:
My heart burns like peeling glass, the dogs run underneath
The overpasses and after class:
The cars motors purr, stamped by housewives, swaying in
The caesuras of their dreams,
Shopping, bearing the negligee that is hardly even there,
Like the spit of rainbows on her brown skin,
As her children come back home from school again;
And I wonder how her soft brown kisses feel on their Soft brown skin.

Robert Rorabeck

On Those Thorny Feet

Made something out of longevity in its Beautiful cradle:
Now don't you realize that I am still here
Beside the highway underneath the overpass
In a rainstorm
Waiting to buy Mexican candy:
Listening to the waves speak though they
Have nothing to say to me:
Waiting for the grasshoppers to hop
And make way for the beautiful flowers trying
To poke their heads up from beneath
The slippers on those thorny feet.

Robert Rorabeck

On Tuesday

The soup of my legs runs over the spokes of my Bicycle; it feels as if I've been eating eggs with Alma for breakfast again,
Even though I was alone for most of the day:
And I ran so fast back and forth beside the sea, with the Rich houses staring over my right shoulder,
And the rest of the world away or at least too high up in
The clouds to reach;
And their yards are beautiful if short and misspelled:
And the ants crawl up like runny veins into the open of
The middle class orchards that cultivate nothing
But short tempered housewives;
And it blooms like this some if not most of the time,
While I keep the reality of my lies like a fleece over my Shivering body,
As the airplanes achieve their destinations not unlike the Orgasms I gave Alma after her unsuccessful protests
On Tuesday.

Robert Rorabeck

Once A Wolverine

Filibustering in the muck of
The hyphenated stars, lying down
Associating with death in assassinated
Playgrounds;
Girls I love like porcelain dolls riding
The hoary terrapin through the Thunderbrush,
Yelling out absinities like Mickey Mouse;
And everything about me feels naked,
My nails torn about from the earth of
My work,
My sister slipping away beside me has Lost her hands,
Her nails painted like bruised pears,
But I cant help to think that my nails are Prettier,
Rubber balls in the sky
Moving west again across Florida-
I can almost smell my dogs- good weather
Dreaming of girls up in steamy glaciers
Who never would have thought
They are marsupials clutching the young-borns
Like hairless kittens to their breasts
When they have a zipper underneath the jacket's
Tundra
Where I might be allowed to dig in with lips
And tongue, the little ballerinas of hangman farmers,
If she were to discover again that I was Once a wolverine.

Robert Rorabeck

Once Around

Words loom like a forest of unsettle men:
The trees shiver like those men who have seen
Action, and their brothers mutilated like tossed
Grain into the waves,
And acrobats falling from thy sky into the fire
Beneath the tent; and for a moment it should be Beautiful and without conclusion; but that is Such a certainty, how her form shall be revealed
As every one of her ancestors, the wardrobe
Unfurled, her lips metamorphose into weeping Children underneath the heliotropic sky where
The braided willows swim, and the vaudevillian
Migrations repose with their gawking brothers:
This I say to you, as we drink together at a table,
And the wind howls and the wolves pretend to be Beautiful men. We should sit together and watch her Leave with them, and drink to her, and now how
Her throat will open like curtains peeled from a stage;
But where is the audience when there is not a footstep
In the snow; and where has he taken her so that we Cannot hear? But she paid for us this liquor and filled
It around the open glass, that another man's lips blew
Taken like something naked and glowed from its kiln;
And she left us this way, well situated even though
All the lights are out, and the trees are moaning like Starving men, rattling the sky, but she is taken out and Passed amongst them all and will not come again.

Robert Rorabeck

Once He Decided To Self Publish

Natural voices into quietude,
The busses rushing home into crepuscule,
The bullies waiting for me with dumb bats,
And vampires floating like kindergarteners f*cking
In the air:
Kids get drunk to look like they're in charge,
Lions yawn and then fornicate inside the electric fence.
I suppose that once Sharon thought to love me,
While she was coming up for air,
But when she finally tasted the rind of this green
Amusement,
Maybe she had another taste in her mouth,
Like another man's child in her womb.
Controlled by giant robots disturbed out of sleep
And busting up the sky,
We let the comets in through the sun-lights in the Florida
Room to floating like presumptuous butterflies around
The plastic fire-trucks:
I told Erin I was celibate this entire time,
While Tesla operated on his sweet experiments above tree
Line;
But I am not anymore, and her eyes won't look at me
Through the keyholes of little bears,
And Tesla has found away to conduct electricity through the Tuffs of snow.
And Mickey Mouse is a dear old gentleman we all congratulated
Once he decided to self publish.

Robert Rorabeck

Once I Reach Your Threshold

I wake up with booze and strut like a
Male peacock his feathers in the zoo,
Not knowing that he captured and partaking in an act;
And isn't this strange,
Sharon-
Sharon underneath the marigolds, your daughter cooing at Your hip
While the serpents and ventriloquists are running wild;
And you are out of money, or something;
But you still have great taste buds- and a house and a husband
As young as quarterback of dime;
And the river has you hypnotized and kisses your neck every time
It floods;
Sharon, even down, you can never be defeated:
You are a headdress without a crown, you are so many ways
Through the darkness;
And the cities finely gowned in their tourisms leap like excited
Ants at their picnics,
And the mountains bow like bards; they curl like the shoes of Minstrels to smell your bouquets;
While all of these flowers I once hoped to give to you are Homeless,
But I am walking without a sound up your footpaths, roaming without The sweetness of hope that once I reach your threshold
Wont you still be home.

Robert Rorabeck

Once More And Again

Little faces singing in the crepuscule of a
Doused ballroom;
Faces where gravity has its hooks; and they are singing
Folksongs:
Lips flicking like coins off the gravity you have never Heard:
Twining up like the friction of springboard ballerinas:
They leap a little ways like the geysers of tinfoil
Fireworks,
The meteors who don't know that they can be stars:
They leap over trucks and caracole windmills;
They turn this way like ashes from a grandmother's tomb
That is burning;
And you have your lover, always folded into his arms:
I can almost see him, and I know he has been talking to you
All day until it was muted again
And mutually you closed your eyes and lay like angels in A matchbox in a tool shed in an aquarium;
Or in a slender ballroom;
But listen to these lips: They are not doused; they are still Flickering so you can almost read by them;
They happen over power lines and empty churches;
They open for no one: No girls love them, while you sleep in The comfortable afterglow with your man. Maybe they will Start one last fire to reawaken your senses and bring you back
Once more and again.

Robert Rorabeck

Once More For War

When the children finally go to sleep underneath the Architectures of their shelter,
Aren't they just like balsam wood in prayer:
Aren't they the sweetest sort of things, like all of my mother
Is young and apple round on her wedding:
Eyes like two candles looking up at him, the father to Be of her children-
And the roof always has an apex, leading up that the rains
Run down;
And in the carport of my childhood the car is blue with electronic Windows:
My mother almost drowns in a canal pregnant with my sister,
And I don't even know:
I go to school to get caught: I dream of beautiful girls,
I dream of my mother in a grotto filigreed with Tadpoles and pearls,
And she is there now sleeping in the darkness.
The washing machine is quiet, the sills on the windows need mending;
And she has a dream, my mother,
Like a Virgin in the darkness of the aloe where she is sleeping.
She comes out at night and prays beneath the synagogue
Of the trailer from Michigan,
Casting her in its blue flags across the street from the Australian Pines
That whisper luridly of the other girls wavering in amidst
Their shallow pornographies,
And the conquistadors march on the footpaths of plastic sailors
And the men who have dreams of her
As they leave once more for war.

Robert Rorabeck

Once White Sheets

I want you to come over here
And plunder my trousers—
Don't think about it or
Your father's starched collar will get in the way.

Don't take your time about it,
Become an underwater welder
And plunge into the work with
The passion of a 5th grader
On the first day of his course.

Here you will find on me those planets
Every man has, to which women are constant satellites,
But these ones are particularly mine,
And they are here for you to move around.

My family's lineage extends to you here passionate Greetings,
In my misty currencies I wish to deposit,
In your silken hand bag, if you will lean back
And open your legs like a good girl,

Your otter's mouth when it swims
About on your lake with hot springs and caribou,
Kicking back and forth and forth and back,
Like a sloppy fish,
Slapping it's tale on my rosy branch.

I will fill you up, fox of my den.
I will let you down, little blue bird into
The serpent's mouth
If you are a good handler
If you say my name in your prayers and Kneel before God, and wash up
Before you eat

We will do these time and time again,
Our mutual baptisms underneath the sneaky alders,
Through the green rivers the sun hues,

Like a yellow mason, his palms out and placing Red brick on hot red brick, building for us
A school house in which we learn.

And I see, your silken joy says you will,
Your lips and eyes pay up and there is dyed
Blue smoke coming from your bones' kettle,

So every young nuance of your being
Starts to stiffen and coil, before your springs
Are unhinged, like broken golden clock gears,
And you are screaming my name, as I
Asked you to, and time has stopped

So now all the concreted cities shed away,
Rotted petals washed down,
School buses collapse like drowsy horse heads
Into mouths of chirping green swamps,

Where the vase of heady night, shrill
And delicate on the edge of the table,
Begins to fill up with red hunted roses
By our exchanges,

So soon we are panting from our rich diggings,
Our hands filled with each others gold,
So we laugh and kiss, satisfied and filthy,
Until the deluge bends our flowers,
And moistens the matted grasses,
Leaving only the ringing of our ears,
The echo of our caves,

As the trees drip and hum in
The last of our moistures,
The last of our evidence on these
Once white sheets.

Robert Rorabeck

One And Only

The memory of your auburn body,
Even though known but casually,
In the passing of those bleached halls,
Will forever be my only muse:
And that is why I am so lonely,
Just me and my dogs reclining in lawn chairs,
Drinking rum punch- Tongues lulling,
The whole lot, bags of fireworks and p*rn-
The simple amusements which can hardly Distract from you; and us
Just homeopathic whelps far diminished
Along the settled rockslides of the uncountable
Slopes I envision you sculptured-
A lady of crackling natures,
There are so many ways to paint you
Long after the night has stretched and, masked,
Everything can truly said to be beautiful,
Like your cousins;
And everyone I sat in class with, are now housewives
And lawyers-
All the beautiful blonds are grayed
And fitted into the bricked foundations
Of the situations they strove so hard for;
and their names have changed so many times,
Their faces too are now but the dull reflection of A quieting sea
And the moonlight is leaving them
To watch kittens being born-
How many of them have you served
Your drinks to, your body smiling;
But what did it mean? Which one of them are you for?
And still I saw you jogging casually alongside the University, your fingers unbanded, your legs so high
Up like wonderful crutches that, leaping,
Might carry all of my scars, if not my name:
You were so free and bending almost claimable
By the fox, and still I did not have you:
And I haven't even seen one ripple of your areola,
But in these nightly destinations they attend me,

Sweltering stewardesses of sweet penumbra,
And I watch wasps digging in fleets through the cells of Your feminine flesh, depositing in you flowers,
Bringing their young to you as I would have brought mine;
And even if the seasons retreat, even as the chrysalis is Left empty and weeping on a sallow branch,
I remain with you through it all, your echoes what Scientists pine for,
The boreal architectures of your legs the tributaries
Of an undivided sea;
And even now that I should never see you again,
I hope that you might come weeping to my grave
And drape me in your sweet nest
For you have always been my only muse.

Robert Rorabeck

One At A Time

Filled to the brim of egrets,
The clouds lose their surface looking down
At the paper airplanes stuck having crossed
The other side of the field:
Across the canal, with the spent bottle rockets,
And now in the glossy apiaries and motes
Of time:
Left there forever like teenagers who never have
To grow up, or awaken, to taste her soft
Treacheries,
To watch her grown into a married woman:
So the same exact comets cross them, even after they Are indistinguishable-
And the new blue gills grow up from the silver
Throated minnows, washing away their numbers
While eating each other one at a time.

Robert Rorabeck

One Canal Further Over

Hey baby doll- now you are in my visions
As the clouds cloud over the snakes milking the cows
Or the housewives just watching them
With ravens in the nets of their eyes:
The snakes get as fat as fists, like the grasshoppers
Eating the corn, or the bodies in the river
Like a beautiful ribbon tangled and clotted
Like nettles in the fine tresses of her bosom,
As the waterfall falls over her, and the butterflies
Return to another forest- As the bicycles sleep Without conquistadors down in their Slow crypts beneath the otters- with the housewives
And the truants each going their own ways,
Until the doves are folded into the nests of rattlesnakes,
And the sugar cones pile up her banks,
As the sun falls thinking of her in a zoetrope of smoking
Sugar cane, obscuring the fields one canal further over,
And thus keeping mystified those other worlds.

Robert Rorabeck

One Day's Work Thanksgiving

When the thunder spark rolls
On its eighteen wheels
You know the hawk
Driving it is the last Holdout from the Great confederacy- there's The southern cross on his Grill and here he comes Cheeks full of chew
With his front set of Teeth caved in somewhere in the back
And they bring their Screeching big rigs around
The tent the Power pistons whirring
And wheeling and
They come like some Mad procession of Ancient Titans who've
Fled here south to Enslave us with their work-
And we must open their Iron jaws to let them
Vomit their North
Carolina loads in piles
In our tents, slaving like
The ancient jews for These upper middle-class
Pharaohs we create
Strange conflagrations of Christmas trees as the Mexicans call me "muy fuerte"
And band about my Determined arms to Stay alive in the flood of Green Noel tells his Novia Carmen for me to Call myself yo soy un caberon
Just to be sure that I am

The bad-ass I've become
Then, after knocking off
Their strange head for security
They follow me blindly
Religious, I think
These Mexicans love
Me, and I am their working
White lord and they are my Disciples when they come Together around me and we Go out ceremoniously
Into the field where
The metal behemoths are Belching and steaming, clanking
To release the Christmas gorge
Of these centipedal beasts
The southern drivers
Spitting their rebellious
Young boy thoughts against Our Union work ethics
Still we work it out
Through the day on this Wednesday when I am
Made a saint of the Work and see strange
Visions from the inside the bed
Of a semi truck
Moving backwards to show
Me the changing vision
Of latening evening shrub
Pines which is Beyond the words in codex
Holy and wild on
The kitty-corner wood
Island between the
Stop and go red light and green
Yellow light metallic road sloth
And glut when by seven our Day is thankfully over though
The Mexicans don't want to leave Their new Carmen/ we've Fed upwards of 700 trees

Their throats cut and bleeding sap
To sacrifice in Middle-class homes
The sangre dieses our Father son and holy ghost tents
Which blaze rebirthing when
The sun goes down
And the Titans rest
In the evening empty field for 4 to 5 hours before
Lugging their half full guts
In their silverick ceremony
South to Miami
Where the good old southern boys
The redneck beatniks
Complain that this is Too far south for their
Metric rhymes- its
The new mexico pilgrim meter
Out by the brave central American conquistadors and tire-sailing
Cubanos, but even the drivers
Have to obey the glut and glory
Of their beastly
Berth this Wednesday
The 24th when tomorrow
The sacrifice will start all again
Over for the metal continues
Rolling and the forests strangely
Moving into middle-class
Strongholds on Thanksgiving.

Robert Rorabeck

One Final Glass

Now I am drunk and given to my mute horrors
Which will never sell;
They aren't quite beautiful, anyways, the bouquets
You thought should heal;
And if I've been to your tiny city, it was just as a Little child: I've probably been to Manitou but it
Was only to buy ice-cream,
For the rest of my time is always used to break trail,
To break ice, and to pretend to kiss my sister on
The lips for the movies we go together to and don't Like;
And you are sleeping now, dreaming of strange dusks
And their mornings- so I am safe to come out and Howl,
Marking my territory down your street which isn't
Real, wearing my masks of defeat: and I love you,
I love you how true; I am the punchy moth who comes Out through the braveries of cheap rum,
Knocked out in the twenty-ninth round; I drove my Truck straight past Disney World and didn't look Back,
Because all the billboards depicting your lactating mountains
Already showed me how much it would cost to succeed toward
The migrations of a sea of just one woman who wasn't
Real tonight anyways, but the careless light
Sheathed in a silky glove used to crush my wings thoughtfully
As green-eyes reaches for one final glass.

Robert Rorabeck

One Final Time

I can lay here for awhile and survive
Like a goldfish describing, and having won into its bag
The airplanes of Monet:
And the world just turns and turns, losing more of its color,
And getting closer to the blistering lights of Forgotten comets and their likeminded species: and while
We go about our
Day to day, like a carousel that has nothing left to lose,
All we become in our successive delusion is more and more
Disappointing,
Even though the butterfly house fills up like a glass of Undecided color,
And the tourists turn out and getting happy until the leopards
Decide to jump their easy cages and have lunch;
And you are always there, Alma,
Swimming bare-chested with the otters, chirping and shedding
Your skins:
Becoming more and more beautiful, and less and less tamed;
And I held your hand that was covered with gold,
Even though I knew I couldn't ever settle you, or feel the wishes
Of your heart:
You at least slept beside me, and helped me step out one final
Time from the so many coaches of the uneasy dead.

Robert Rorabeck

One Hearted Sleep

I settle for more rum
While the bad weather comes in dancing like
Kleptomaniac angels:
Sharon writes me a one word love letter,
And I fall in love with my
Loneliness,
While my singular man sleeps beside her bad
Man
Who is dreaming of guns and chaos next to
Her sweetest body,
And I don't know what I am doing with myself,
But the Virgin whispers to me in my
One hearted sleep
That everything will be okay, if only she would Go with me.

Robert Rorabeck

One Hundred Fifty Watt Gutter

To aborted words gathered in Clotted gutters, in the annals of Sewers with the excrement of mother's Harnessed animals, the tamed squatting
Of little shaggy legs nearby the curl
Of the satisfied lip,
Painted blueprints for greeting cards—
The worthless places beheaded and Tossed away
Pieces of our uncle's splattered butcheries,

To Leviathan's bleached carcass,
Coroneted by horseflies, spiced by maggots
In the contaminated surf where ocean-liners
Age in red flaking briars and piss motor oil into the Festering snatch of the infected sea
Toasted by fleshless architects with
The venomous goblets of garroted pirates,
Their eyes and lids eaten away by microscopic
Sea creatures with her Christian name....

In the places that rot, the crumpled
Legal papers, to treaties stomped upon,
The annexed bedrooms, the expanding putrid
Distance of ex-lovers, two nuclear warheads
Shot away from the Heartland to Contaminated coasts, fallout the pallid glow in Driveways of homes of gated communities, on soft
Green walkways, where murderous hands
Hold each other, trembling the sickly mask
Smothering love's grander design,

In the morbid voluptuousness of ballroom homes
With min-vans on the borders of gentle green golf courses
Lay like a manicured landfill over the unavenged memories,
The rape of true love with her dress torn off
And her name beaten out of her,
Running naked and lost through purple thorned suburbias,
Until captured by the well-suited poachers who

Skin her gentle in married bedrooms,

Whored between bachelored grandfathers in the Name of Christ and sadomasochism, whipped
Until she forgets her maiden name and the country of her origins,
So, like a whisper indistinguishable, she travels back
Every night to the white-washed sewers,
Hanging her owned skin near the door of
The sarcophagus she crawls into the 150 watt gutter.

Robert Rorabeck

One Last Kiss

I see the dead through the windows of our cars
As we drive—
Vehicles that disappear under the sun,
Like the men of the Alamo—
Now there are only resurrections at
Disney World,
And the little tales of cenotaphs hung up
In misspelled classrooms—
And the fingers of the blind are always Needing new brail,
Like leafs need sunlight and rain:
Even after I have driven past so many graveyards—
The corner stations where the old men disappear,
Metamorphosed from the young boys
I thought I knew—
Knowing that there is no longer a respite in the Angles of their cities—
All that they have known has gone away
And they are only good for one last kiss of a dying rose.

Robert Rorabeck

One Last Look

There is a place in the green emblems unobservable
By the major players of baseball—
Where I have skipped school repeatedly and gone to Try and drink the lucky fish from their Lucky well—
I have tried to imbibe entire fountains of gold
Coins the conquistadors left underneath
The full moons of trailer parks
Trying to give their high school teachers a Hard time—
As from the emptied recesses of the game,
A new belief bloomed after all of the stores were Closed—after the streetlights budded like Facsimiles of the moons—
And the world of night transcended—gave birth
To zoetropes and drive-ins: made the watermelons
Grow—and placed his scarred hands upon
Her tiny breasts: showed hidden paths to
The nests of monsters who fornicated over the Bones of defeated heroes—to which the conservationists Gave entire parks and estuaries to—
And so they bedded beneath the gold moons of the Egrets—and kept their soft and hidden secrets—
And the street lights turned on, like dying men trying To get one last look across the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

One More Calligraphy

The elephants make Friends with mice-
It is just one more
Calligraphy-
As in the center of
Your hemisphere
One snowflake
Falls countless Times,
As I imagine you
Riding on a horse balances on one
Hoof
Atop a sparrow-

Robert Rorabeck

One More Time

Frightened saw horses birthed from Acorns,
And I don't know which way to go.
Considering my face,
There is only one option for me,
But I still want to buy medicine and Photographs
From the middle aged Japanese woman
Behind the counter-
I want to lay with her in dark rooms that Smell like cherry lozenges,
That help to remind her of the cherry blossoms
That bloom around the singular tit of Mount Fuji:
I want to eat her apples and plant her pits,
Like friends in cool green gardens
Arranged by serpents;
And the night is a wicked thing of its own accord,
A car of silence,
It is making me sleep alone again,
While Pedro has a boner in the bunk bed,
But at least I am free, scarred and crooked haloed
And nodding as the snake passes over like ribbon
In a stream umpteen times,
Trying not to think of you,
Just trying to get away with this without dying
One more time.

Robert Rorabeck

One Of You Of Every Kind

There is a homeless man living in these woods.
He came by tonight looking for work,
And in the shadows were bullhorns and girls in Bikinis:
He smelled like turpentine and domestic beer,
The leggy wheels of runways:
I am drinking Casillero del Diablo two thousand and Seven;
It is a change for me,
And the housewives come and the housewives go:
When the lights are on:
They walk through the grass picking up easter eggs
In their stilettos-
Sometimes they want to look at one side of my face-
Sometimes they want the other;
And Italian boys come in beefed up because they want
To beat up their older brothers:
Oh well- The cops come too, after the lights are turned off
In my zoo:
Females cops are mighty pretty- I think female cops
Should populate the entire pretty city:
And Romero is here now too, smelling like after shave
And jalapenos-
He likes to interrupt this gringo- He sleeps all afternoon,
While I think of you-
The traffic comes and the traffic goes, while I think of You in pretty paint metamorphosis;
And now Romero is talking to me and distracting me
From this, but Can't you see that I am drinking wine, and the city would Be so pretty if it was populated only by you,
One of you of every kind.

Robert Rorabeck

One Or Two Brown-Eyed Girls

Wounded on a mountain waiting for Inebriation—a decade of drinking at the feet of
The gods,
The rain running down like lost boys to
Their sommeliers- -
And other curses tangled where there are Too many trees fallen down into
Pieta—
The brevities of delusions stretches out—
Soon, the schools we'll have to attend—
Trying to remember where there is purity:
Children unabashed in the evaporations of Foreplay—
And the glances of one or two brown-eyed
Girls.

Robert Rorabeck

One Or Two Muses

I've ejaculated into the summits of those mountains
But never into their tears:
Far too high for casual angels,
For romances of chocolate and bouquets,
Where the wetness comes down as the sharpness of Lightning caught at that starboard pinnacle,
Refracted of the bleeding nosecones of some worry-
Lipped Airplanes
Far above the drooping heads of tourists who Never had a problem licking their sweet corpulence from All those mirrors,
Perfecting bobcats:
I haven't been able to look at myself straight since middle-
School,
And that is why I climb, and that is why I miss my dogs;
And drink this time
Waiting for the returns of my echoes from the lips
Of one or two muses, that I am already sure have no possibility
Of resounding.

Robert Rorabeck

One Other Humid Crepuscule

Working girls out in their songs and airplanes;
All of it almost like a children's lullaby, gone astray,
A truant from Disney World taking a leak from
The wonderful day;
And in the dirty hospices of their rooms, I saw
A marble glowing with the tricks of the first ventures
Of science;
And I saw her breasts, squeezing them like a toddler
From his nest, wanting the fairgrounds of germination,
Wanting anything to save his far astray nation;
And I did, and the airplanes purred; and it wasn't long Before my prong had demurred into the pallid wisping
Spin some hour after I had drunken all of my old
Liberal arts teacher's gin; and gone and seen a movie,
And thought and talked of little minor things;
And the rains,
And the rains; and this girl was only twenty, as pink
As candy and she said no kissing, but I kissed her neck
Once softly- Her temple as warm as a candle lit cathedral;
And the park spoke to me in the cusp of her charge:
It was like living a model life forever:
Like this little wife in this little room with soft mirrors,
And her body taken under my body, like the still breathing flower
In my awful book- a colorful army surrounded by rainstorms,
So she could afford her house; like little bits of nothing to Love in her diary- in the marginalized spaces of her notebook;
And then we parted like two body-drawn carriages that must Pass through that night of many stars,
And ceiling fans, and the open tongued lapping of mailboxes
Trying to get one last salty gist under the billboards of this,
One other humid crepuscule.

Robert Rorabeck

One Single Love

Groggy night in your estuary—
I can still hear the Mexicans trying to sell some Ice-cream
In the afternoon after church on Sunday—
And it is all a miss—the graveyards are dancing,
Your knights have chased off
After their witches of another Christmas—
And the baseball fields lay out all
Emptied as an archaeological dig after a rainstorm:
My muse has hung herself like the Heavenly ornament in the living room
Of another man she cannot possibly love
Because she happens to love me—and this
Is the end of this—nightmarish serpent devouring
Herself throughout the swing-sets of eternity:
As the day in its life goes:
Candles blown like paper airplanes across the canal:
And the boy whom we have known as Jack flits and Leaps, doing all of his tricks without so many
As one single love possibly being in his heart.

Robert Rorabeck

One Thing

Wounded in your everyday throes:
Looking forward, looking back- and all the time
Mad at love,
While something purple grows- through the city's Cracks, that fit like gloves:
The young boys through them lost as dimes thrown Into the lobotomies of department stores:
While something more beautiful becomes lost into
The higher aeries;
And it feels as if for a while she is with child,
So brown and so young,
The night pullulating around her so fat an
So pregnant as if something which was stung:
While the vagabonds file all out,
And the fish that were one at the fair- the golden
And yawning fish,
Are pregnant: at first beautiful, but they abort
Their row:
And on the swing sets the angels swing, over their Shoulders, tossing their golden things:
While I rode in my car one day with my Alma,
My muse:
And told her: I, who was not a gunfighter, told her
That she was just as beautiful as the see:
But it did not change- it did not change one thing.

Robert Rorabeck

One Thousand Pages Of Tuna Fish

I like beer,
And cheap rum and Space ships;

And if you signal me,
I'll turn around and collect you,
And name you some type of flower:
It's a beautiful name,
I assure you,

And most of it hidden like Hemmingway:

And birds and planets revolving too
Across your room,
Across the higher basins:

I'll lay you across a star ship and christen you
With a bottle of wine lifted from her store,
Because I shouldn't have to pay for Anything to reveal you,

Because what would that make you?
What would that make me- And I loved her,
But she's married and has a child,

And its still raining outside,
And you are quite peaceful and easy enough
To carry down to the sea to make love,

Like eating a tuna fish sandwich,
And sending a greeting card: a thousand pages of Nothing,
When I could have you right now.

Robert Rorabeck

One, Two

Downed by the investments of the dogs,
Or by the reasons that you don't Give me:
She doesn't have a peso- and I don't have a dollar
Bill,
But our hands and Christmas are in our pockets,
And the sun goes swinging through the
Sky:
One, one; One, two: Children go back to school,
And the Mexicans back to cleaning their Yards:
Airplanes fly side by side: there they go
With our without you:
One, one; One, Two.

Robert Rorabeck

One-Trick Pony (Censored)

Upon the mounding b-llsh*t
The one-trick pony
Clicks his heels
And whinnying, lifts his tail.
Rancid green apples
Drool down and plop,
Summiting the head of a
Ludicrously happy centipede
Who is eating it up.
The one-trick pony seems to grin
But this is only because
The last two clean shaven
Jews have cut off his lips
In a bauched circumcision:
A Catch-22:
If you'll F— me,
I won't F— you,
No matter what you do.
Now everything is for sale.
Entrepreneurs who smell like
Incest with your favorite aunt
Are getting pennies on the dollar.
The new god is crucified
For a used car which is Driven west and ditched
In the Pacific.
The world is a fire sale.
The cities are pitching mounds
For nuclear strike outs.
Everything is returned to dust.
Like territorial highbreds,
Fathers ingest their Screaming newborns
And mothers m-sturbate
Their lactating t-ats
Just to get a glass of milk.
All around the world
The sky is being torn away
Like shingles on a roof in a tornado

By toothy mobs
Of black hole angels.
With their lips they $uck up
Lost souls as if through giant
Pixie-sticks,
And bodies walk around homeless.
As The Man comes around,
Virgins are trimming their wicks.
The last two clean shaven Jews
Share a kosher hot dog
As they slant their eyes a Little upwards with Greedy wonder
As the one-trick pony
Clicks his heels and grins like death
Strutting in his five minutes of fame
Higher and higher upon the ever mounding
Bull$h-t.

Robert Rorabeck

Only A Nameless General;

Oh, there are so many many casualties when
We can only talk about
Giants and football, and even now none of any of this
Will survive:
While I and her maybe survived for a month or two:
It was always what I was good for, and then to falter again
Like a really fabulous plane die,
Like a superhero out of sorts, and like the triple crown horse
Braking down again before super time:
And I have cleaned up again and talked to myself before
The broken yards:
And children are playing football and going inside again
Feeling happy about themselves
Down the donkey strips of dirt roads; and even while I suppose
This is beautiful,
Like the failing end of Christmas, none of this eventually
Will survive;
It is pretty in its bloom and it does its time- Alma,
While you make love in your room, and the world spits out
Its jubilee and turns around again,
And again, but even still it is only a nameless general in its
Mass graveyards,
And I am afraid, of course, that none of this will survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Only A Nameless General

Oh, there are so many many casualties when
We can only talk about
Giants and football, and even now none of any of this
Will survive:
While I and her maybe survived for a month or two:
It was always what I was good for, and then to falter again
Like a really fabulous plane die,
Like a superhero out of sorts, and like the triple crown horse
Braking down again before super time:
And I have cleaned up again and talked to myself before
The broken yards:
And children are playing football and going inside again
Feeling happy about themselves
Down the donkey strips of dirt roads; and even while I suppose
This is beautiful,
Like the failing end of Christmas, none of this eventually
Will survive;
It is pretty in its bloom and it does its time- Alma,
While you make love in your room, and the world spits out
Its jubilee and turns around again,
And again, but even still it is only a nameless general in its
Mass graveyards,
And I am afraid, of course, that none of this will survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Only An Uncomely Ribbon

Highway, your motion is adulterous and Mathematic,
Though the sea can defeat you:
Highway, you are male, and the sea is female,
But she doesn't love you;
It is not you she is always trying to get to,
But the orchards and Shetland ponies,
And even the more illusive things I couldn't
See:
We put bonfires in her because she doesn't
Care:
She doesn't even seem to notice or mind,
And we hide our weapons in her,
Our swords, and she just laughs
And leaps against our coquina forts, and salts
The pretty flowers of prickly cactus:
Highway, the sea is from another country far
Far away,
But now it seems to be that she is moving
And becoming so many sisters all jubilant and fleeting
Before your front door, highway;
You can go to work, but she just remains repeating
In the bridal showers of vast and unvanquishable
Staid;
And the birds go forever diving into her, trouting
And knocking on the terrapin; you know, highway,
It is because we love her,
And you are only an uncomely ribbon she doesn't Even have to worry to misplace.

Robert Rorabeck

Only For We To Feel

It troubles me to think of you;
It is all the liquor the fish needs to keep swimming,
But his luck is not great enough to genuflect enough to the Lion- the king whose mane is streaming;
And I have thought of you while traveling on my bicycle across
The low hanging bridges,
And I have tried to touch you through the ways of my genuine Dysfunction,
Mostly by skipping school and laying my body low down near
The water moccasin across the easy grades of the meandering
Easements;
And I have not changed- and this is real: That I love you and
My love for you can never be filled, but it can be controlled
By the waves of your body pressing to my shore,
Drinking from the lips of my eager cannons, basking together
Spilled onto a table like something that isn't real
Posing for the artist,
While those things that no longer matter continue traveling
Through the illusions that enter and exit through the doors that Shall no longer have the privilege to feel the contours
Of our bodies: for now we are only for we to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Just Because

I suppose there is a graveyard made
To believe the negro—censures of my graveyard:
To choke the children into believe they Are swans
Before even the earliest enamel of the city streets
Have to dissuade themselves at anything:
Make it all make believe and beautiful,
Even with another country coming up above the Horizon:
Make her first emergence beautiful,
If only just because you can:
And the city is laid out on her slab of patriotic
Graveyards:
And made to taste the lactates of lycanthropes and of Werewolves:
While the other cities just piled underneath her anyways—
While the most picturesque cities
Seemed to tame themselves, basking in the lameness
Of their very own meanings and then—then—
Only just because.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Loneliness

Words bring the familiar places: poets of living rooms
And neighborhoods,
And memories of holidays of Halloweens and Christmases
That I've been drinking to since high school—
But I am not in love with pretty girls any more—
I have a son and new reasons to share with him.
Yet, the mermaid languishes,
Catatonic illusions underneath the motor boats—
Better words thought up by better men
Are more deserved by her than by anyone—
And yet where there once was so many misspellings in Her heart, now there is only loneliness.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Myself

I wish I could sing for you:
I wish I could step right out over the warm cinderblocks
And bare my ass,
Cracking jokes with the trumpet of that baboon;
Sparking the unicorns in the sky,
And making your house fibrillated like the machines working Intensively on a patient,
And making your eyes ignited into the oils of that day,
The pastels who bleed away their pictures on the sidewalk in The rain;
Even now aren't you making love to your husband, your best Friend,
All gussied up: What animals are listening? I can only imagine.
How my tongue is rusting, like a luckless door,
Mute stopped in time
Waiting for the bus of your charms:
You lean outside the windows or the transoms, you know,
While your kids are laughing:
Look at those verbs:
And you are rose but when I close my eyes you are a lion sauntering Towards me as I step out of my car with that Tuesday's Offerings of orchids;
And you know and can spell your name;
And you can take me at any time: I have only myself to blame.

Robert Rorabeck

Only So Many Possible Conclusions

The passions are in you in the words we cannot feel;
And it feels strange to be alive, and so lucky to be next to you,
Alma: but not to be yours,
As the city f*cks, and the ducks chirp:
I've seen you diademed with the gold that I bought you, and now
You only wear this:
And you feed me your mother's lunch, and now it feels almost Okay to believe:
And I go by myself like the remote control boats controlled
By a strange fate,
So I have traveled so far nearer by goal, that it almost feels okay
To believe:
And I kiss your throat, and I kiss your ankle, and all of you is a
River that moves and laughs in her certain way;
But now you bed down with him, and your brown skin closes shop,
While the clouds continue to make anything above your Roof where your father still calls your name,
But there are only so many possible conclusions that can actually
Be real.

Robert Rorabeck

Only The Beauty Lost Above The Trees

I have been up mountains- Lost in the dark penumbra of my Post adolescents, unwilling to leave my mother or Her pretty mythologies, purple snouted,
Ivory horned: I have felt her up these ways, switch backing in Evergreens, I have gone up with my dogs everyday
To see the angels of high school pumping the chains,
And the smoke in the field that leaves with high noon;
And the ballrooms of used up glaciers; it feels as if her sorrows
Have gone away,
And everything I have left behind; and now there is only the beauty
Lost above the trees that I continue, scrambling, to find.

Robert Rorabeck

Only The Fire And Sunlight

You wear a blue cap but you are not my type—
The rivers evaporate down your body,
And yet you insist that you are going on a fieldtrip
Somewhere,
As the skiers stream down around you—
They only know touch by their tourisms, and
It is not a feeling in the deeper sense of the word:
They have not slept submerged in the Clefts of your monuments, or been around you
Other than the paths upon which they are Allowed—I have turned into a foundling upon your Meadows—resting like a jackrabbit in the euphoric
Roots of aspens and cypress—
Somehow joining both rejoins together in a nest,
As the spiders around their necks catch
The minutest rumors of you—like the tiniest airplanes
Flying into a kaleidoscope of arms—
And they whisper the smallest pilots to sleep
Along the rougher parts of your valleys only the fire
And sunlight have found reason to enjoy.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Themselves

Imaginations of all of those castles—
Over-spilling while the wash is just becoming done,
Over the beds that we cannot realize,
Over the imaginations of the setting sun:
While I have had so many muses,
Just as I have had so many housewives—all of the while Burning, and yawning in their bouquets of Echoes, waiting for the last setting days to be done:
Until all of their spirits are extinguished underneath
Of the mountains—
And while all of their daydreams become so luminescent
As anywhere else—
And the housewives come busily towards them,
Like red-cross workers trying to save
The mouths of foxes,
Trying to find another clear path underneath of the power-lines
And down to the Everglades without ever a glance
For anyone else—
As the knights or whoever they are starve in their own
Palmettos—and the daydreams of wherever they are Learn to take care of only themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Trying To Survive

My mother takes me to the beach before
The shore-

There from her little car we go first to the
Swings,
And I imagine then the arc of motion,
The happy time and blondness,

And it is almost as if I have blue eyes,
And have found the glass of a medieval and Aquamarine civilization

Simply at my feet,
As if something the sea has spit up almost Like a pet,
And then to swim away and play with the dolphins
Whose form is good for selling
Jewelry to tourists;

And they converted the old hotel into a Catholic
School,
And that is the oldest city,
And some time ago-

My mother moans upstairs from sex,
And this house is so young, but it is almost cancelled;

And the waves are still so burnished,
Doing their best to look pretty even though they Are only trying to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Only Yesterday

I am now your song that never sings—halfway up the Mountain's switchbacks and gone to proposition to your Kings—
The cold antelopes stir—they are tired of being bed ridden
In the sauce—
They go a long ways across the holidays—and they have A tendency to become inerrably lost:
And I loved you—and your sweet, sweet uncle has just left
My house—
The mountain sings in my backyard like a castanet:
It twirls, making an inconsistent dance of the heavens—
As I am afraid all that is beautiful is becoming lost—
My hand that has inerrably given is finally taken away:
The monsters tear down the labyrinths—and I imagine
As the heroes lie dying they Smile, remembering how beautiful you looked only yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

Onto A Pillow Of Innocent Grass

Now the numbness of lunch,
And later on trailer parks, talk shows,
Art and fireworks;
And you can sleep underneath her broken
Axels;
And the rain comes and does its pattering of Onomatopoeitic, and the roof looks smooth
Like stain glass in a church,
And the entire bus is emptied like the ghost
Of a vanquished terrapin;
And it would have been so good to love you,
And to have never started out like this,
To have picked you one perfect rose which would Have been sufficient enough to starting your Motors of love;
And we could have started out on a fairer avenue,
All perfect, all glued- Having vanquished death
In a painless funhouse, having our pictures taken
With mostly our teeth,
And then tripped with the Pegasus so many feet Above the earth as to make out in a playground of Canopied swings,
Throwing all our loose change so that we would Never have to come down; or I would never have To look myself again in the mirrors of a
High school bathroom,
Or to have stuttered uncharacteristically for the Averagely beautiful substitute, or even to have thrown Myself away again at the feet of the cherished and Shallow drainage,
Where the lips of adolescents drain, drooling, drooling
All their dreams onto a pillow of innocent grass.

Robert Rorabeck

Onto The Teak

In the way I understand love,
I risk you onto the teak,
The hard furniture not to be touched; from here the Insouciance of the pool is not a fraud.
I can stare from here and see that you
Must love him,
Once or twice down the line of your men,
You must love him and not me.
Now they have bought something which will Last the week,
And I have risked you onto the teak;
Here I must not touch you, but I must:
Bare-backed, I have kissed you on the cheek;
Or, these are some things I must say before
I skip on down the creek,
A river of schoolboys coming home through the yards,
Mistaken as early-morning soldiers, shot and misted
Into the grass. They lay there silent as more soldiers march past.
They have broken things all of teal, made for you
But you're not real; though their jaws remain of unbroken steel;
But the passing of a songbird's shadow,
A lover who in time will show the peacock's color,
And kiss and fawn straight on the brother:
I have loved you, and thought of you barebacked on the teak,
Cooked and scrubbed, and in you sneak,
Just like the sham cut from the pool, you cut through the yard,
And in your drool,
Made of tallow, fishing line and sin; but I'm a fool,
I let you in. You love me no longer, or you
Never did, and I am a crippled, abandoned kid
Listening to what you has asked me to do,
And so I kneel and polish you.
Onto the teak you're finely drawn, the shades are drawn,
And the sunlight falls and fawns upon the early morning lawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Open Mouths Of Your Starlet Constellations

Your lips taste better than this bottle

Alma:

I know because I have tasted your lips today.

And how is that possible when you are more beautiful than

The most beautiful woman I have ever known:

What are you,

And you don't believe me, but you have a beauty mark,

And you were right here today,

Telling lies and moaning; and I love you, and all of my other

Muses pale and turn to jealous ghosts,

And now the bottle is empty, but my windows are filled with the

Zoos of your eyes,

And all of your kind animals, Alma. Move into my house and

Bring your family because I love you:

I worship you, Alma, and any other possession would be most

Contrary:

Your world is a breathing portrait which would elevate me

To the cockpit of a fabulous daydream; and I am right

Here, Alma, holding my breath and counting steadily for you:

I am sorry that all of your rabbits were unlucky;

And I am sorry that my dogs are still in Arizona, but I don't

Have to vagabond anymore: you are right here and fluctuating:

The movement without movement of your body is a

Carousel that really turns me on, and

I am glad that I don't have to go anywhere, because I have already

Slept on the roof of your house;

And I already know that you really love me, while the comets

Burn their graffiti across the open mouths of your starlit constellations.

Robert Rorabeck

Or All Alone

This feels the joys of a poisoned arrow,
Precise and to the heart:
The apples split over the heads of Siamese twins
By the same thing:
Two serpents entwined from two branches,
But looking down as they kiss,
And then sunning and telling each others lies all day
As the angels and stewardesses fly overhead
All day
In airplanes or all alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Or In The Waves

Up in the numbers of trees
And the other high abutments of the nosebleeds of things:
Here in the windows of the franchises of our gods is where Our forefathers saw the bald-headed eagles who seemed to Represent the origins of our things:
And they sang out wickedly—and cruelly
That we were the first of our continent to discover electricity—
So, so long to fire—
And the haunts of grizzly bears—and to cave paintings:
Now,
Electronic butterflies
And the deaths of Indians kitty-corners to the super markets—
To the bassinets of the elbows of narcoleptic airplanes—
And my wife is asleep,
While I am turning a corner—or,
Where is she—
While the electronic diamonds blaze: and this is her song,
Turning in the arcs of a million blazes of homonyms—
They sound together, anyways—
Truth in their eyes, and in their mouths the juices—
Pornographies of conquistadors
And their extinguished exploits—anyways—
While the billboards sing of newer and brighter gods—
And my wife lies asleep in the shell-rock
Or in the waves
Anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Or Maybe I Should Not Let You

I'm doing battle with John Keats:
I'm watching a movie about hi, after I've jogged
And punched the hanco of a hurricane in the eye:
And hurricane season is over.
But there are still Christmas tree lights strung over
The fjords;
And Kelly's toenails haven't changed colors since
Christmas;
I've come for my poetry class, which is a line from
The movie playing in the background,
Which is just how good I do poetry when I've Had enough undulations of poetry:
Kelly, I sit with you on the bench in Riviera Beach on Tuesdays, in the early afternoon.
I gave you strawberries; and I am very brave, because I sit
With my sad side of my face into your blue German,
Face;
And I want to zigheil junfrau for you; and I certainly will,
While traveling by foot: Kelly, I remember reading with you in Fifth grade, while your mother was cheating on your father;
And I already know that is what you are Trying to recreate, while your soul goes leaping so blonde across
The haughty bridge;
It seems to leap so far and spread across every mausoleum in Every cemetery ever thought of; but tomorrow will be So rapturous, for I will feed you strawberries again; and we Will both think about your husband,
As we count the dolphins finally coming up so smartly to Breathe;
And you will try to kiss me again- and maybe I will let you,
Or maybe I should not let you....

Robert Rorabeck

Or Some Worse Fare

Sleeping all day long in a house of tears,
All day long the sunlight a golden tourniquet with which
The housecat should play:
Red roses on the shutters, tiny fish in spoon fulls of Graves in the back yard
Where the puppies are going over to the rattlesnakes to See if they should behave:
Empty bottles in the aloe holding neither geniis or wishes;
And you step out barefooted and into the dying grass
Wondering where your rabbits have gone:
Off to good luck, or some worse fate: while the katydids
Leave their old bodies and armors on the trunks of Palmettos and the armpits of cypress:
Not knowing where they are headed, but neither looking back.

Robert Rorabeck

Or Some Worse Fate

Sleeping all day long in a house of tears,
All day long the sunlight a golden tourniquet with which
The housecat should play:
Red roses on the shutters, tiny fish in spoon fulls of
Graves in the back yard
Where the puppies are going over to the rattlesnakes to See if they should behave:
Empty bottles in the aloe holding neither geniis or wishes;
And you step out barefooted and into the dying grass
Wondering where your rabbits have gone:
Off to good luck, or some worse fate: while the katydids
Leave their old bodies and armors on the trunks of Palmettos and the armpits of cypress:
Not knowing where they are headed, but neither looking back.

Robert Rorabeck

Or The Mail Man

Builders for these castles get their hands wet
And then sculpt the necks of parapets and heron:
They burn around the shoulders
Growing freckles like periwinkles as they step
Over the jelly-fish—
Their mother leaving them to be watched over by
The sea so she could go
Shopping with another man or the mail man—
In its innuendo the sun will burn,
The cloud with disappear—and the birds will turn.

Robert Rorabeck

Or The Sun

Soon the moon will see us or the sun—
Kissing in the carport of a vanished honeymoon—
And the bluegills will have to sing to themselves anyways—
The tomorrows will get up as an entire band of Awakening elbows who go polishing their silver—
Because this is their world that we cannot remember—
It is a joyful place with the sunlight of the daylight
Floods us out of school—
And I give to your bedrooms, awakening in the morning as
The rooster crows—gallivanted into the pastures
Of the arrowheads crossed before the
Nosecones of the airplanes on their honeymoons—
Perfumed by the strangely obnoxious steps of the
Infatuated conquistadors—as they stepped out of their crypts□
In the early mornings just after the wetted séances of
Star crossed lovers—
Realizing at that very moment that all of the rivers led
Up to colleges and this was just another given to us to believe
In—like an afternoon abandoned indoors,
And like latchkeys raised by the cartoons of their children.

Robert Rorabeck

Or Un Derneath The Moon

You tell me the English word for electricity
And I will drink all
Of your wine-
And call you a butterfly
Underneath the Sun- picking the Flowers from Graveyards-
Carrying away your Feelings-
To the candelanrums of Too many ancesters-
Across the canal or
Underneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Orca's Theatre

This opening seems clandestine for another go around,
While the octogenarians are falling into their parasitical sleep,
Feeding with lime the roots of aborted orchards nodding like Unused utensils against the steady roll and shutter of the interstate,

The sun sets as it always does along the palates of her spine:
She sleeps this way, something in hibernation of coital dew,
Her back warmed by the lapping of the Gulf Coast, her breasts leaking
Against the Atlantic,

And I say this to her, as if another of my breaths were her candle:
I hide money for you in an old piano, and rest my cheeks against flatbed trailers
Stolen from Florida, watch the bannered world slant against the cusp of holidays,

As women and men fondled by tattoos recede into the ghosts of the dwindled tent,

And I give this again into her, in such a way that it should not be stolen,
Nor is it recognized as an element leading towards the reproductions of her flesh,

But a mostly silent memory embarking to neither shore, but panting there
In the middle of her Orcas' theatre, freckled by the clichés of her beauty,

An attentive child lapsed into the dunes and briars scribbled into the worthy shells,
Discovered by her hands momentarily, an oddity from this salty throat,
But indistinguishable, the perishing commodity we leap from, the unstemmed
Swarth of zygotes, pores of her breathing flesh, pinpricks of the amphitheatre

Spinning this religion above our gaping mouths.

Robert Rorabeck

Orchard Of Such Splendidly Misplaced Gifts

Over the chaos rumbles that we're are soon
Approaching our time,
And she has great breasts to which I look out for
All through that stormy myth,
And it is a great scar to know that she is Approaching,
Dragging that cloudy ship,
All the young men she has claimed by a song,
And I have seen her amidst the aloe
And the extinct, moist toads,
Seen her like a slender bee somewhere
In the gladiolas,
Something gothic about her,
Something misplaced—
An all too ready myth, a hybrid of my song,
Something not only flesh,
And I would like to take her hand—
Didn't I say I would like to take her hand
And lead her through the fading pornographies
The choicest junked cars all their doors
And trunks opened housing crèches of dead
Pine needles on mottled leather—
Take her across the canal, the border for Such definitions,
Smell her nostalgias like high school,
Heady in the early morning maybe out
Upon the baseball diamond hemmed
By the chanting palm fronds again
Into the humid myth—
\Across the canal and into the cool trauancies
Of such living rooms,
All out and smoking and lost,
And the end of this thing, fingered cross-stitched
And into the next set of satisfied lips,
And the better words left unspoken,
But the only thing remembered turning around
And around and around all up and Down an orchard of such splendidly misplaced

Gifts.

Robert Rorabeck

Orchards You Abandoned

Busy visions of a childhood and her ghosts,
Words that linger in a poor man's clutch, as she looks Away perpetually, browns stems quivering over
Her children, but she is out of leaves and warmth-
Sexy vision of catastrophe, how you loved my gifts
Of flea markets for a year, but could not entirely give Up your sailors of Mexico, and the pretty cannibalisms
You put into your bed across the train tracks at night;
While he still doesn't satisfy you, you are the personification
Of any soul, but it wouldn't be right to say your name again,
Not on anyone's birthday- though I will not be waiting
Anymore like a rabbit in his green hutch or rock garden
In the little yard I remember bordered by rattlesnakes
And aloes- Like the urban legends that exist in the Highways of gossiping sky: I showed your aunt the hickies
You gave me as we made love for the year that is over;
I gave your sisters and more of your cousins fireworks.
And now I am left counting other butterflies who migrated
Across the orchards you abandoned, while my mother
Falls down in some mock Pieta, a wasp or some power
Cord stinging her foot again with its preschool lavishing,
As she dries the clothes of my childhood underneath a thunderstorm
That is already passing.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Bruises

Open theatre on the hillside of a graveyard of A campus:
Purple bloom: there in the student ghetto of A tomb:
Wasps and werewolves
And watermelons: the sky looks up into a
Birdcage of gigantic skeletons:
As the world continues selling around us
All year, or all afternoon:
And I will have to get into my classroom tomorrow:
I will have to unlock the door
An answer in the morning to her and her
And her:
And it will become a sparrow lost in her nest
Of doorknobs:
And it will become another firework in mimicry
Underneath the space shuttle,
As all of the doors close in, and the beautiful animals
Retreat, and you look into his eyes
Forlornly for another hour- your soul
Disfigured by the tattoos and other bruises of a world
That will never close.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Instruments That He Cannot Even Use

Dying, they wait for the breath of the living, which spreads
Over them like paper ships in a river that is all too fragile:
That means nothing to creatures who cannot have it,
Creatures who are even more lost than the blindest night;
And they call for her, while the kidnapers loom like death,
And the carnivals stop turning
And dying like unjustified hearths; and the dogs weep and paw
Beside their unwed master's grave;
For they too are ashamed that he should remain so hungry for Her meat and breath, and other instruments which he cannot Even use.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Men's Bicycles

Sky of brooms and witches over empty
Baseball diamonds: trailer parks near the sea where Turtles make hollow nests
Leap over by jackrabbits: and you are here in The cradle of a book that is already folding, like
A homeless man underneath the saddle of a on Overpass, burning a worn tire, as the Mexicans
Who have stolen bicycles and women
Mock him like serpents: this is their joy now,
And their brown skin will see it tomorrow-
And they will burn like fire underneath an unapologetic
Sky, as they ride nearer the playgrounds of the sea,
The helicopters passing them deliberately not Knowing that they are riding upon other men's Bicycles.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Mighty Fine Transgressions

To my sister Christine Carroll who gave us coal in our stockings for Christmas. Who gave me hard-ons both times she road next to me— For getting hit by a car and fired from the pizza joint, for wearing a black dress to see me off on my last day.

□

To my sister Vanessa, because your name sounds like clothes coming off –For your name which might fit onto the faces of woman I haven't met, because your neck tastes like the color of wine and sex in rows of fertile ploughed earth.

□

To Mr. Glenn, the distant cousin to an astronaut and the first cousin to Satan—who made me behave like it was my first year in grammar school, skipping school to scream in the waves the last year of my thesis. For bowling three balls at once and pitting Jesus against Allah. For Men! For Madame ***.

□

To the young fool I was. To Chris' father's liquor cabinet. To the cops who chased me drunk across Wellington. And to my friend Shawn for playing Judas.

□

To the spirit of the dead Indian who is best laid in unmarked spaces between interstates and coiling byways. For the broken down buses and appliances which don't work.

□

To political gangs and powerful families, for your daytime tabloids and easy to handle taxes.

Just as to all America and her red, white, and blue fairytales. To the dresses she puts on at various hours, to become the new identities of madams for different colored men. To the inspiration of the production line, the filigreed cotton gin, daisy-strewn drive-thru's and minimum-wage deliveries. Just to all that cheap show tattooed on her fine a@s!

□

This evening, in the higher elevations of the west, in the grand mirrors of glacial lakes where naiads still dare to strip and play nature's naughty sport above the neon destruction of her pinstriped vest she buttons up to prostitute politicians the twelve months of the red night (the glamour of her elephantine lips) — my solitary prayer, muted through the hillsides lying down to graze, to harass the gallantries more violent than nebular deaths.

□

Auctioned for all the good children who drive fine vehicles in tin herds under the shear surfaces of multiple suns, for God's first son and various other mighty-fine transgressions.

□

- But no more then.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Things I Don'T Know

Pressing together the lips of lovers,
Bodies practicing moving through time, skating rinks of Souls and other ellipses:
The way enamored airplanes make movement around orchards,
And the buzzards crow:
They seem to be singing about love, or about other things
I don't know.

Robert Rorabeck

Other Weekend Promises

Maybe you are Famous again-
Filled with new summer holidays
And amusement rides of Easter resurrections:
Maybe I will move my Hands through your hair,
And lay across you like
A giant across a
Stewardess,
As the cicadas molt themselves
Across the savage blue swing-set
Coming alive again in that summer
Filled with blue toys
And other weekend promises.

Robert Rorabeck

Otherwise Forgotten Schoolyards

The band played in Loxahatchee Groves,
And I watched you singing as candles
Floated off into the sky,
All those tragic little numbers above the sweet
Terrapin,
Little mothers going home too,
Though I do not wonder why:
I am sorry that I only have these words to Put you in, to send you off like a feather torn From the chief's cerulean headdress now floating in
The sky,
All the lesser feathers now of lesser chiefs
Catching the coattails of airplanes: All the days lost Grieving, unbuttoning the top two layers of Your blouse or birthday cake with hungry mouths to feed,
The constant pattering of little feet across the linoleum
Floating as if in a fever dream above the Everglades;
And I just always wanted what was right for you;
And I just wished to say goodnight, because I can still Hear you singing in a childhood chorus:
You are the only thing in it I could even remember to wish
To hear; and it is a painful song, and it echoes
Across otherwise forgotten schoolyards.

Robert Rorabeck

Otherwise Has Nothing Else To Lose

Cheap professionals: I have something new for you:
I burn down the news of your pretty houses while the sky
Rains fire:
You know that is just what it is going to do when it is Enraptured, and I have new love, and we are both Swinging in our garden, and I am pitching my fine you seed
Straight down the throat of your newsstands:
And the day gets up all disgusted and continues vagabonding,
And made more beautiful and young because of its disgusted
Athleticism,
Until it finds itself down the throat of deep cul-de-sacs like Fjords overgrown with tulips that the housewives spread to Hang their early morning clothes while the song birds pick up
A tune and we can lay down our swords, and take a break
From being some awful heroes awhile she shows us her stuff
After her husband has gone to punch in the rough, and her children
Are just the yellow shadows on a yellow school bus, and She otherwise has nothing else to lose.

Robert Rorabeck

Otherwise Unperturbed

Inconsequential as a harp played by itself
So utterly far away from Angels as we are from Kenya and its mystical
Bal boa trees,
But I have nothing left to do but to sweep the Floor
Even well past the hour when those things poisoned
Should be well turned back into
The mundane innocence of the room;
And I love beautiful girls with super slick curves,
And no holds barred aqueducts
Under the simplest of skirts like spaceships of Lampshades
Those oversized zoetropes spot naked in the Phoenix
Desert
Like a well lit dressing room for special eyes to see
The men and wolves leaping naked behind and Changing into each other
While the hummingbird waits like a turbid gentleman
Over the mole of her breast,
And her eyes swing away, swing away
Like children who will forever be too sad to become Exemplary,
But who are otherwise unperturbed.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Amens

I'm sorry—but she looks like she knows
That I love her,
And she is my wife—and I get up every day,
Evacuation,
Becoming the art of archeology—and the vanishing
Indians end up misconstruing and vanishing again
Into the heart of an emptied airplane:
And this, at least, is the place I have dug:
Waiting for all of the rest of the armies to finally come
Out from the jungles and fall over us:
Peace in her eyes, just like a corpse's peace—
And a bouquet in her hands but for a dead man,
As the fireworks play out in a dance hall that the angels
Once danced in—but long since have moved
Out—as the angels leap and leap about across
The uneasy ululations of a Ferris Wheel from which we've
Had a falling out and this is the all and the last of
What can be said of whatever we had to say of our amens.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Bedroom Of Sky

There is the mother
Carousing in her grotto—
There is the place filled
With so many Misspellings
And not enough Christmas
Lights—
There is the problem—
There is someone else whom
You love waiting in the driveway—
And the same pictures are on
The television—
Nothing is changing—
Zoetropes of mirages—
The same classrooms we go into
To partake in our daydreams—
And those classes that make up
Our bedroom of sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Communal Fieldtrips Ot High Schools

I can hear the topiaries of my jungles:
They are outside the opened windows, and my skin is like
The open throats of opals;
And oh how this is all wrong;
I should be vagabonding, or back to selling Christmas trees-
If I was a better person, I would know something classical;
But all these nights away from the red bricked and blushing university
Has shrunken me:
Now I am blown away like a dandelion, like a lily;
Oh, look, Alma, but what has shrunken me- I am on a quiet voyage now,
As emptied as a seal into the refrigerator of the great northern sea,
And all of these things whom I had thought once were beautiful
Have just gotten a big laugh on me;
And my body finally turns browned and beautiful, and the captain
Finally wakes up,
And all of my old wives turn back into a doctor's office of trees:
And the bodies push together to see all at once what is ailing them,
And the sea brushes them in pantomime,
In the fake science of cowardly heroes; and then we all wake up together
And take our communal fieldtrips to high schools and then to far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Communal Fieldtrips To High Schools

I can hear the topiaries of my jungles:
They are outside the opened windows, and my skin is like
The open throats of opals;
And oh how this is all wrong;
I should be vagabonding, or back to selling Christmas trees-
If I was a better person, I would know something classical;
But all these nights away from the red bricked and blushing university
Has shrunken me:
Now I am blown away like a dandelion, like a lily;
Oh, look, Alma, but what has shrunken me- I am on a quiet voyage now,
As emptied as a seal into the refrigerator of the great northern sea,
And all of these things whom I had thought once were beautiful
Have just gotten a big laugh on me;
And my body finally turns browned and beautiful, and the captain
Finally wakes up,
And all of my old wives turn back into a doctor's office of trees:
And the bodies push together to see all at once what is ailing them,
And the sea brushes them in pantomime,
In the fake science of cowardly heroes; and then we all wake up together
And take our communal fieldtrips to high schools and then to far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Days At School

Poem a version

Of what was mentioned to happen

In art class if I were divided:

And had the chance to hold hands with the girl

I love

To kiss her while a butterfly's wings divided

Over Mexico

And strut out and got horny into middle of

An august festival and a looked around

At all the open things they saw

Like windows on vines to which the foxes

Smiled

And danced, preening: and later on there

Was certainly roller coasters and water falls

To which I took all of my students to

And we made a day of it, holding hands

And flipping head over heels

Drinking libations to our dead relatives, and

Try to forget about all of our days at school so far

Robert Rorabeck

Our Delusion's Heartbeat

Busied from the crenulations of another heartbeat—
We pilgrims start out by making love from our Side of the blue abyss—
The traffics streaming by into death: they cannot tell who Is in charge—But now it is assured—now that our art
Has found itself—
And combined itself into the union that all of the angels
Know underneath the sun's armpit:
For a while there was beauty inside the carnival of Semipermeable truth—and it stretched out,
Affecting us like a beautiful woman walking the street
Without any shoes—
And then for a while there wasn't another soul
On the street—
And we found ourselves lying like cats—tawny, Mewing for princes in our strokes of Heat—in their castles of asphalt and graffiti—
Never mindful of our delusion's heartbeat.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Eager Young Possibilities

Kelly wrote a poem to her mother I did not Read;
But at night I guess I ejaculate the same way,
But to the girl and her friends,
The little fat roses I am too afraid to give away
In the immense daylight of our Cages;
The way grizzly bears may stop and sniff before
A cerulean tent way deep in the permafrost
Of its alluvial planes, before
It gets down to its businesses of dismembering;
And I don't love Kelly,
Not in the way I used to, the way a young child
Expects and loves his crackerjack prizes,
Even though they are not enough;
But I suppose I could- She is a beautiful woman
Who can spot dolphins and manatees just as They go about licking the world,
Metamorphosing practically out on the surface world,
Like adolescents unsure of their graduation;
Her husband masculinely hung and can work on tractors;
But when she starts out with her eyes when
We are alone into the midday crepuscule of our busted
Lip playground,
I like the fact that I don't know anyone else around,
And what we are doing lasts just as briefly above the earth,
Almost gloriously, a welding torch,
A fix for those angels, before we separate and merge into Traffic,
Forgetting the effects of that harvest's kind gravity,
Whose impermanence reminded us of our eager young Possibilities.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Fantasy's Castles

It isn't a joke, the tearing apart of a
Womb—
The way the blind men commit suicide
Underneath the sunlight of Their own home,
While the scientists try to prove
That there is life on other planets—
And the housewives try to breathe in Their own living rooms—
By rifts we keep our hearts high up
In the locked dungeons of
Our fantasy's castles—
But it is all an obligation spied on
By eagles—
Like birthday presents gathered for
The vortexes—and it isn't enough
To make a living—
As the foxes make eyes with the doves
Who keep on promising them that
They will come down in time.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Father Zeus

Alma, I love you, but you know that,
And that isn't that I want to be to our game:
You shave your armpits and I kiss them:
I leave dewy mollusks there underneath the swing-sets where Your children will play;
And you shave where they were born too, and now all of this Is just something else,
Something that was made to be forgotten, while my ancient uncles
Water ski, in their little sports, and my other uncles
Make money:
You work for them and I work for them too, and it all seems to be Happening for us under the moon who isn't shy,
For she seems to be pulling us upwards from under our arms
As if we were demigods and she wanted to kiss us:
Now who is your father, and who was my mother too:
But they were together in the natural pools in the bosque,
Even before my mother could sail airplanes and then look up to the Higher slopes where in the savage and but also most nearest weathers
Our father Zeus was calling down the lightning bolts and Making the skrees and stones whisper to us of all of our most Christian names.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Hallucinations

Fairs have gone and Ferris wheels—and soon it will be time for
My wedding banquet:
When I went to Shanghai for the first time Around Christmas of last year and saw her for the First time holding a bouquet for me next to The airport next to her Uncle John:
I thought she was more than all right—
With all of her eyes lighted up with a pinwheel the Same colors as I've never seen before:
And my heart is as happy as a jackrabbit just Come out of a gentleman's hat for some type of Magic trick underneath the mountain I just used to Disappear of:
And I just want to have a daughter with her,
I just want to have a sun—and forget about the heart attacks
Of valentine's day—or the way the stewardesses run and Leap over ethereal candles illuminating the dungeons on Their birthdays—the way that cantankerous death finally Grabs them and shuts them out,
Like my last muse at the bowling alley or at the fruit market
Until the day is gone—spent into the soft necks and Kisses of house wives—
And the stolen bicycles rest pensive and illusive:
Where are they—only those accustomed to skipping school
Will ever know, but it is an eerie thought,
And all of the gardens surrounding her become over abundant
With deadly tricks—
And the sky blooms with dying heavens: Up there,
A grandmother who lived for unfathomable eons—giving her
Live to civilizations we can never think to explore or to Even imagine:
As she waited for me on the tarmac and wept for me
Even after she had become my wife—and we were both staring
At each other through the corridor, something unutterably true
Down at the end of the mystifying kaleidoscope of all of Our hallucinations.

Our Heavenly Souls

Softening nomenclatures
Into name brand desires—
What we call the divine process of
The assembly line
Is what has sharpened our existence
Into a single point—
Inescapable: This is what science defines
As a black hole:
Approaching Disney World,
You have entered the Event Horizon
Of all that we imagine to be in Existence—
The crushing gravity of our Capitalism's
Street of fast food
And affordable goods:
North or Southbound occurs as Events in a mirror—
Insatiable is how they describe this effect
In our chapter books:
Hard working Americans affected by
A dream of mass production—
Every centerfold holding a torch above
The chronic waves,
Welcoming the pilgrims who cannot Escape her concrete and iron allure—
Until softly into the night
Where, further defined, our dreams desire
To return to this "reality";
Where we are processed as men of Business and enterprise:
Any other possibility having become Indescribable in our language,
Like fingerless brail—
This schoolyard of factories
Where we dutifully produce
Utilitarian currency from what once must Have been our heavenly souls.

Our Kindred Obsession

Bodies like matchsticks counting,
The nights that they know are going to be very cold;
And they can only burn for awhile,
Stuck in the gravity of the atolls, trains like silver
Passageways crossing them,
Wind tunnels in Spain: The hard knocks resound through
The parks in the rain,
The swings drip tears from the chains of birds:
The light houses have all been punched in the eye by some Hooligan truants who have been turning out,
Pretending to be sailors, to be your love
Where I drove by a cemetery today delivering impatiens,
And I said your name; but you had already returned to him
Like a dove,
Like a story book folded asleep upon itself, the way I remember
Looking at you in elementary school
When I pretended to be descended from the Mayflower:
And what were you doing all of this time but making excuses
And getting new tattoos;
But we are both descended from Germany, so we are both Very insane-
I've had so much liquor I cant remember my name; but you
Are so very beautiful like a match burning in the woods,
Keeping a kindle all the light as if could so I could dream
Of my dogs;
And I am not very beautiful, but now my woods glow with your Ablutions:
Your ears that were pierced so many times for you sailors
All dusky on rum in the leave, kissing your lobes;
I wonder if you even hoped to notice that I was perceiving them
Also in the barrooms underneath the kerosene lamps
Of our kindred obsession.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Legs Bent Our Noses Bloodied

Fairly obscured as if esoteric science in the rain,
What these pornographic explorers have been doing,
Trying to burry pain like plastic army men,
Lovers of ghosts and their sandy grail waiting for the Horizon to lengthen and pale;
And their horses have sideburns and saddlebags,
Their dunes ridden with the mothers of all centipedes,
Freckled with flint arrows;
And Erin is brightly in love: She is so good in love
With her centaurs and strong men:
They pile up and shave and grunt and flex and strut:
They do every macho verb you never been able to bend:
And the stars concentrate for her around the Milky Way,
But she just looks up and smokes them out like
Presocratics from their platonic caves:
They come out like worthless bees, so what is them but the Useless pollinations of tourists all stacked up with their Red ribboned boxes of forget-me-nots;
But Erin already doesn't care. In one step she is over us all
And shopping in some fare flea-market forever closer to the Sea,
Leave our legs bent and our noses bloodied.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Less Than Perfect Attempt To Remain Beyond Nothing

Moving away from the Green Beret
Slanting downward, in the Smoky mead halls of travelers
Lost underground beneath
The suburban forest,
The working girls' legs go on Forever,
Pointless, their apex a universe
And stars expanding outward their Bodies a capturing gravity creating Planets,
Recreating and populating themselves,
Homeless in bed at home,
Out of body experiences,
In their silver and pink children
That drive around and around with them,
In the metallic haze they are Galvanized in, the tin soldiers
Stored in household tins,
The evolutionary manifestation of Cars and super computers and rockets
Rolling along the highway of their thighs,
Forgetting to make love
They still look good while shopping,
They scream and scream
Go away to come back again
Their inescapable space separating
Our home from the neighbors,
Our less than perfect attempt to Remain beyond nothing.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Long Lost Places

A red dragon of fireworks smiling lusciously tongued:
Giving clues to the out of work helpers-
The men who pass the green smoke underneath the overpasses
As it rains
Diamonds with your name on them- the way both of your children
Tugged the way they did in the summers
Before I knew you and smuggled you to my bedroom:
Just because maybe now they are calling out through their fanfare
That maybe I am a playboy;
But maybe I am just coming around, circumnavigating-
Appreciating the features of the fairytales of your Landscaping,
Alma- And I a just getting started: soon I will be drunk,
And it will be your man's birthday- but what can we give to him
But the emptiness that he left in you,
So that it has allowed me to build you up in your flesh;
And turn you by the jaw to the sea, which is your mirror,
Even as you come home from Ocala from visiting
His relatives for Christmas- even though I spent it mostly alone,
Or with a jumble of strangers at the movies:
While my old girlfriend's new child was infinitely tugging-
Until I drank something with fire,
And made your soul spill out of its car and linger in my eyesight
Light a precious jewel bleeding off its illusions beneath the motes
Of starlight which spotlight our long lost places of work
When neither of us happen to be there.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Merry Way Home

She has olive skin and this is what she does,
While my mother is coughing in the next room:
She defeats me,
She curls up in the smoking forest against the Cabins where she doesn't Belong:
She strokes my dogs and defeats me and she rides
On my chest straddling backwards:
And I really appreciates what she does for me:
This night like Christmas of oh my god:
I drove to her without knowing, like a newborn never Suspecting which of the airplanes of her mobile
Would come leaping for her eyes;
And I drove right up to her turnstile and expeditiously
Leapt inside:
Her name was Melody and she let me kiss her mouth:
Her name was Melody and for the vivisection of an hour,
Her body was my house:
And I loved all over her like rain loves the gills of fish,
And like rain loves the sides of carports,
And the rich and the poor all alike: I kissed her so many Times, so many goodbyes for a little world of lies:
And then she opened the door so that I could fly,
And I did fly,
But so many things had woken up outside that they'd Formed a chorus and we all sang to Melody as we drove on
Our merry way home.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Mutually Fresh Water Wells

Airplanes, you are turgid but horny:
You fly low stretching your wings and pretending to yawn
Just to see who has arrived:
And the baseball diamond gets all cuckoo, as upon her bases
The fireworks whistle:
The bicycles rest in the grass, snoozing, while the Ferris
Wheels turn doing away with our troubles;
And maybe we would have made love if we didn't both live
In mobile homes;
It is true that I do not know the way your body feels when
It moves;
But it is as perfect as the perfect wheels, and your eyes
Are as deep and real as wishes waiting
For words from my throat to answer them from our mutually Fresh water wells.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Own Atrocities On The Other Side Of The World

Relaxing and arguing non commital with my wife,
Does this mean I am approaching my middle years while In China—
The air here is terrible,
But when going out on the street, say to the post office
Where my wife can pay the month's utility bill
While her parents are in the hospital,
It is like going to the moon:
It cannot be properly discribed—
The trash in the gutters,
The wild flea-bitten dogs:
The little shops, row by row—
Selling every parts of ducks and pigs and rats and eels:
It is fabulously unbelievable,
And what is most remarkable is that I and my half blood
Son remain the center of attention—
While everyone is looking at me, my extraordinarily American-cut with super hero, ballooning, I try to Take it all in: but it is impossible
And too much to describe to my imaginary friends:
On the suburbs of Shanghai, coughing, polluted,
I am ringed in a kind of fancy
And tonight, because I cannot sleep and having drunken
So much Chinese wine, stronger than American liquor,
I am telling you, because I am feeling warm
And thus must say something about the unbelievable
Monsters and their dirty fictions as they try to mirror our Own atrocities on the other side of the world.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Own Gods And Patron Saints

What have I done,
But haven't looked her in the eye;
If she is a beautiful woman, she doesn't
Care,
But makes love to others of her kind in
The gibbous pool;
And they are under the cloth of deciduous Coitus-
If I have good friends anymore,
I don't know- There are still girls in High school, skipping- skipping,
Crossing chalk with flesh,
A sorority of lippy ankle bracelets- where they go
I am asleep under indigo blocks,
The unused motors of adulterous housewives-
In the green space, we all have our own gods
And patron saints-
Maybe she is in Oregon (or Washington) , homeopathic in time;
What fruit is she plucking,
What ghosts I don't know, but dogs and budded gardens
Lips of obese flowers jeweled with bumble bees;
She's lost a lover like a good leg,
But she is still exploring. What does she do,
But dress this pretty thought in the pathos of army jackets,
Somehow underdone in the crenulations of old Photographs; and I would like to shake her hand just
To get up close for awhile to deny what coffins I haven't Seen by her famous senses,
But if I confided this to her I would be afraid it
Would just be another thing she wouldn't understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Questioning Tomorrows

The last poem of the night should be hardly beautiful,
Or hardly enough;
While my mother has gone out into the mowed easements to Talk on the phone,
While I rightly love a woman who is hardly old enough to throw
Me a bone;
And all of the strawberries and all of the watermelons are properly
Saturated,
And all the queens are in the sky; and if I was more beautiful I would Know the proper words to give them their goodbyes,
While they set across the earth like pop rockets singing songs,
While our family left us along ago,
And so now all we have are these caves glowing with the reruns of
The photosynthesis of our bodies, if we were brave or if we Were heroes,
We would come out singing open throated from our caves, giving up into The world our new bodies;
But now all there is, is a wife that I should have if I was even more brave,
And if I had the guts to put candle-lights in my beard,
And sing to her of all of my sorrows; then how she would sing to me,
Passing out greeting cards with pictures of our family.
Giving sweet promises half-heartedly of all of our questioning tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Shoeless Skies

My body still curls up at the toes after some fashion:
Alma still makes love at night and Sleeps with her husband,
And by this she makes me more unreal while I am still hooking
My jaw on the juices:
I wish that her eyes could see around the unseemly echoes of My vanished defenses,
And that I was right here in a gilded cloud with a broken wing,
And the rains did answer for my truancies,
And they pretended that I was at some high school and a king:
And that Alma played along through all of the nights together
With her alone at a sweet and lonely petting zoo,
In the back yard of some sweet young mother's sweating
Pool,
While the night and day turned around in a bed of lovers.
And we learned by them, and cast our lots into the Sea of their sweat and tears,
And we bled out together, but our romantic passing lasted for the Length of the years of grandfather as and grandmothers who Are still in love after all of these years:
Oh, if you would let me kiss you again, Alma, like laying a prayer
Between the hyperventilating wings of a butterfly,
Then we would have our own church and our own grotto
To baptize,
And there wouldn't be any profession that was above us,
Even the airplanes would fly between the caressing bedrooms
Of our shoeless skies.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Slick And Breathy Dreaming

What are these days doing, but jogging out
Again under windows, potbellied
Eating donuts, but climbing such ivy tresses
That you can see by the lights of dim sum sororities,
The hollow chested dogs stuck between the teeth
Of the cemetery;
And I am growing older; and I am growing all
Right, like a calendar while no one else looks at me, While my great professors swell on the lakes of Another woman's dapper blushing;
While Diana turns around in a cul-de-sac where I'd like to marry her like a ballerina blushing,
Pirouetting;
And we all have time to spend our time, hatched from
The zygotes of two bodies noshing;
And the world is a city; and the world is a void,
Smoking tires, riding far along the unperturbed blocks,
The gnarly, vast corrugates of alligators unreciprocating,
Looking so beautiful underneath the unctions and Surfs of the moonlit satellites that we don't even feel
The need to retrieve ourselves, but go down nearer the Boggy earth suckling the pinecone coffins;
Putting ourselves belly to belly with the better and better
Ancestors, making ourselves last even some weeks
Even though we no longer have the parasols together of Our slick and breathy dreamings.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Souls Uncorking Flumes

It now feels alright to wet my throat on the letters
Of a jaundice mind:
Now that the cars will move, the planes will fly;
And there is nothing more so professional that I can Prove,
For I am just lying blind, like the bicycles in the aloe,
Like the housewives in the moon,
Moaning down in the sad epiphany all curled in
The old alma matters of the blouses of their High schools,
As the chickens scratch chalk lines in the beach of Dunes,
And latchkeys straggle home some hours after noon,
And turn off their souls and watch cartoons:
As Alma lies down in the blue bedroom, and forgets
About my inebriated cadences through all these After hours, and yet her sunburned auburn flesh twitches,
And her lips hook a smile underneath her beauty mark
For a second of a while,
For she happily knows that tomorrow will bring her in The morning breakfast, and by closing flowers;
And for as long as while I come beside her and both of Us bushing our working brooms: tomorrows will always Bring tomorrows, and our souls uncorking flumes.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Time At The Zoo

Our time at the zoo—if you cannot remember—heavenly light before
The second time we made love—
The ostrich took a special interest in you—
We watched the kaki attendants pretending to know falconry—
We sat together like man and wife,
And you did not know the size of your soul upon me—
But then, unusual joy, as we kissed in the make-believe grotto of The albino alligator—
Your heavens went around me, apiary around a tenebrous form:
Even now I do not know who I am—
When you said it was enough—and went back to your husband,
I made love to prostitutes—
But you always came back to me, and I liked the feel of your soul in My hand—
Even after I am married, my soul can never expect to believe in A life without you—
And my naked form, routinely presents itself to your abandoned
Elements—and there he is- in the middle of a hurricane That doesn't care that he must make himself to your shore—
And you have gone away like overpriced
Fireworks that didn't matter—
Taken your family up to horses to enjoy the silence of a Mexican world—and I am here, waiting for a wife—
The high school slumbers like a tortoise—
The waves highlight the theatres of your abandonment—
They don't know what to do without you—
But remain out in the careless elements, receiving what little there is
To believe in—
And you—like an amusement park that has abandoned its heaven—
And there you are, caressing your children in a Pieta without any joy.

Robert Rorabeck

Our Venal Senses

Minor poet sing your
Canary going down into the mine.
Never mind your fatal night,
Swing and glug your venal
Wine:
The city moves; it moves for the currency
That isn't really there,
But it moves until its tender shoulders
Are bared;
And I love you, but my quarters are a wreck;
And I am too ugly to touch myself:
Likewise, you are not here to touch me,
And I wonder for a little while
Who is touching you now.
Sometimes I think my face is beautiful underneath
The milking moon like a cow;
And the University is just across the canal.
And all the little sailors are liting in sailor song,
And I just want to reach out and
Love you,
To caress you like a velvet tortoise his neck
Stretched out into your boudoir;
Equally, our eyes closed into the changing room
Of our venal senses;
And why is that so wrong?

Robert Rorabeck

Out In The Middle Of The Phoenix Desert

I specialize in the innocuous motions,
Like the gleeful caesuras of roller-coasters
Put up by the missing nosed-men
And their dwarfish assistants, the half-witted Tycho Brahe's who have yet to identify the Comet's ellipses,
But who fight and dances just like I do,
Weaponless and sprawling in dimly imagined
Parks; like the menstruations of taxi drivers
Run away from the embers of their highly Functional parents, trying to situate themselves
In the unnerving alienations of Midwestern cities
Taking wayward fairs and transgendered call girls to earn
Their lonely cessations in hardwater flats,
The inebriated recipients of scientific progress,
Looking out into the swayback glow of the night
And her tresses; as I jog two standard bred
Colts both of them newly castrated, and yet so
Studish: I coo to them in tongues not dissimilar
To those whispered to her when I am alone under The covers; they move around me, skittish, like Too leggy satellites, just the same as I am with Her, like a rugged tide moving in only to fall away,
The casual witchcraft who encaved the haunted inlets,
Her neck like an opal chalice my fingers would resonate
Upon like an ornithologist's whispers to an extinct
Hummingbird some leagues away from the busy highway
Out in the middle of the Phoenix desert.

Robert Rorabeck

Out In The Penumbbras Of The Wide World

The quiet brutality of juvenile life,
I have to write it down while I run from the cops,
Checking out the skirts of trees,
And I make it too, past all the indigo canals,
With so much burping life, the goldfish mutts,
The lethargic pets who rub scaled bellies against Casual embankments;
And past the housewives too, glowing like blonde Angels from the highlighted portcullises of their Kitchens. Seeing them makes me stop and bight
My thumb,
Because everything about them is lined up that way,
Perfectly in place holding apple pies,
They belong on the nosecones of aeroplanes,
Fine instruments strummed at night by bulbous business
Men,
Their children swinging in their yard like Catholic censers,
Or playing basketball on wide-swept driveways;

So I move on, and the sirens recede, and the boys
With their billy-clubs can't find me, and my feet
Have rhythm and have not been too molested by the rote
Memorization of the state enacted school system,
And there are places to the side which are trimmed green
And lazy, where crickets play in the night,
Past the little tinkertoy mall, past the firehouse its vestibules
Emptied of burly men, past the skate park
The hound-dogs sirens receding like fan-blown tinsel
Down the armpits of fake Christmas trees-
Here, speckled in the suburban estuary, no one knows me,
And it is a beautiful thing, to be out in the penumbbras of the Wide world, making my way to Scott's house,
My bare feet cut on little pieces of irony,
Making me laugh all the way across
Wellington, FL- A slender pugilist lit on wine,
So far away from where I am, given so much time and too
Many similar recitations- these scores have scarred me:
The misplaced yuppie,
no more the high-stepping escape

Artist, blindfolded and arms stretched
Between two avenues, awaiting the chartreuse bus,
Its bullying lies: no more the uneasy youth sleeping through his classes,
And when awakened leaping through windows
And over canals, through sun and through shade
Where no one can find me
With so many places to run.

Robert Rorabeck

Out In The Silent Planet

I have nothing new to say:
The sky is a furnace;
The sky is a womb:
There are still Victorian astronauts
Abducting unsuspecting philologists
Inside their oaken ships
As round as footballs:
There are planets with different names,
And places to go where silence is
All that there is....
My hand remains a crooked harp,
Crooning for you,
Strumming outwards into the fields
Of modular homes and cardboard castles:
Those dreams which lay in your eyes
Like lazy roadmen:
Their handsome greens and blues,
Like cats staring unconcerned and Half interested out from windows....
Your bosom may be bared:
A man may be suckling your bosom
With a disinterested stare;
But this is nothing I haven't said:
I do not know the shape and Complexity of your areolas:
But I chap my lips on the arid discoveries:
Lying on you,
Lying in the thoughtless sunlight
In the spaces that cannot change,
Hidden out in the silent planet-

Robert Rorabeck

Out Of Doors Wedding

When I see you again I want to Remember my wolverine heritage,
And shop class:
How I bent empirical matters, or
Like Nicola Tesla invented the rags of electricity;
And clap down on my knees before the Hotel rooms of careless monuments,
And the mountains white washed in snow:
Before Sharon and all that She'd like to know, Diana;
And smell your vibrant crotch like the crook of A perfumed citrus tree halfway off the Lips of Spain;
Diana- I want to reciprocate from the prow of An over infatuated boat;
I want to ruin my teeth on your venal acids:
I want a swollen jaw from the repeated swill of Your curvaceous song birds:
I want whole nests of them in my mouth:
I want to live forever in South America lollygagging
To the show tunes of your rich c&nt:
I want to invade your pathetic country and undermine it
From between the cruxes of hot plates:
I want to pay for a room with you by the hour,
And double date:
Diana- I want to get married in a cerulean church under
The banisters of cancan hooligans.
I want to do it right and take your daughter with us
To cartoon movies, and kill off all your evil witches
With squirt guns;
And then we can sit together and see how the sea moves:
See how it moves like your less beautiful sister,
Diana,
All warm and lost into the lesser complications with my banded
Hand on your knee naked of the garter,
Diana, you oh so carelessly threw away at our out of Doors wedding.

Out Of Esoteric Necessity

We died on school buses in the rich morning of Some indescribable consumption,
And girls loved us while we were green;
And we attended to our gardens underneath the portables
With the rattle snakes and jack rabbits while some Old woman taught math;
And after school while our parents were still picking lettuce,
We played football until we kicked some pretty boy in the temple
And were sent off courting to the office;
But it was a really pretty mystery, and now two decades or so
Later we will have our first plot of land and a little house
So close to the sea that we can hear her waves roaring as she Feeds them all the felicity of her gold fish, and boys even younger Then us keep slipping into her boudoir dreaming that they should Be her princes, as she bares the rich staples of her shoulders,
And her corals purr and her seahorses maintain in her shallows
While some unseen ballerina, like a housewife on the lamb underneath
The sweet orchards of an undying moon vacuums the frolicking
Esplanades out of esoteric necessity.

Robert Rorabeck

Out Of The Sky

Families gathered together preferring the unions
Of what they are at large in:
Bodies multiplying through the staples of the breakfasts-
Roadkill down the bricked in avenues,
Their underage memories forgotten- yawning up
To the silky hierarchies, their mouths are filled in:
They are colored so brightly they swim:
And there they go passing through the yards, manifold.
Billowing yawns- a ruined world renewing around
Them,
Managed into the joy of billfolds, like swans hunkered down
In swampy pastures for the night,
The virgins masturbate in imagining coital unions and Suicides:
And the horse is there, the stallion, Siamese nostrils summoning
Geniis- his mind as big as an ant's:
The stars molest him, until he breaks over the fences,
Destroying other yards, encouraged by the pheromones of
The pastures, multiplied into the strangest of properties-
With the foxes, he becomes a general- and he makes love to Mares who eagerly accept him,
The light abandoning, the airplanes and their passengers slipping
Out of the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Out Of Thought And Mind

Call up the devil on his rack,
And with your guts he'll make a sack

And fill it will all the thoughts you'd Rather wouldn't have, and cats and Skunks and whatnot

And bury it beneath the roots of someplace
Dark,
Beneath the shivering Clemintine
In the zodiac park,

And put upon it a horn of tin,
And from his lips he'll cast a grin,
As upon you he'll set up a curio shop
And into it he'll cry strangers to drop;

And fill that space between the trees
With spider fingers and bowed knees,
And eyes that always seem to peek,
At your corpse just beneath the peat:

Your boots will stick out just like a rind,
And your eyes will stare beneath the Clemintine.
Out of thought and out of mind.

Robert Rorabeck

Out Of Which Metal

Children going home to sleep in their cathedral's
Nursery after their crusade:
The light pullulates like sea-life above their crimson heads.
Then we went with my sister to the aquarium
On Tampa where my friends once got married,
But she was so venal:
She had already turned out to the marines; but I can only imagine
Your man kneeling for you in the saw grass as you knight
Him like a promiscuous queen and then kiss his lips
To see just out of which metal he was made.

Robert Rorabeck

Outlaw To Me, Danny

Outlaw to me, Danny,
And I'll become your thrall,
And we'll both go romping,
Busting down the hall,

And we'll go out shopping
Out in the sylvan glade,
And if we both get lucky,
Then we both get laid,

Underneath the vermilion angels
Hanging from the trees,
Where little girls spill from bicycles
Scraping both their knees,

Then we'll both be wise men, graduating
At the end of the class,
While all the pretty freshmen go around
Kicking newer ass.

Maybe we'll stay together, lounging
By the pool, turning gray and turquoise,
Still breaking every rule.

Robert Rorabeck

Outside Our Shaded Windows

Broken here: all the rope tricks come down- flaccid
Snakes from the pop corned ceiling,
The thieves stolen away beyond the cooling combines of
The ceiling fans:
They have surpassed the roofs, and now are floating life
Masterless kites:
They swing like loose feathers underneath the sickle moon,
Possessing the wives of Acrobats who have gone off to other shows-
The cars beneath them with their blue families: the roads the Steady courses pestered by rain and surrounded by Soft yards whose driveways contribute into them:
And this is the way that out country was made,
And bound up as offering: it is a Christmas then, every time
She takes her brown body away from hers,
And comes over the railroad tracks like something possessed:
Like a chime set loose, and something
Escaped them- crenulated to my door, she pesters:
Bright uranium she fingernails- she defeats the Elysium Spheres:
She has her own presents on her body,
And she promises it all to me as she enters through my threshold;
And all of the world disappears into a little pool
Where like two jubilant otters kissing on each other,
Lying in the speckled shadows underneath the torpid ceiling fans-
Like lackadaisical windmills who pretend to be Saturnine nemesis- and knights who are inept at drawing daytime
Wages blessing us outside our shaded windows-
And we making love.

Robert Rorabeck

Outside The Sphere Of My Influence

Worlds spume, like orgasms
Or bouquets,
And faux beauties pirouette on the Displayed palettes like books,
Like dance floors;
And even as the cars drive, blue,
Or red, or green:
And supermarkets are open,
Where hungry old people shoplift outside
The foreclosures of the everglades,
And the sun puts their bald or hoary
Scalps on display meandering through the scalding
Parking lot like hot liquorish,
I am left wondering why I am doing this again,
Why I can't ride for myself- Why it must go on,
The futile attempts, the passivity of each
Elongated war sinking with the timely seas-
What for, because her eyes have never yet displayed
To me the green Burbank of her breathy city,
Or the areolas which are seashells mounted on her breasts,
Because all my songs are better sung to girls already vanquished
Than for the lips and senses of the ones who are yet
Busily here, going shopping,
And getting perms- Kissing the unbruised lips of those Boys and things already on display,
Who have made themselves readily available to their Lives and limbs,
And attracted to their jockeying gravities they fall forwards,
Diving in flumes of and the needs of salty cataracts.
They could go on and on forever I think,
Outside the sphere of my influence.

Robert Rorabeck

Outside Your Realm Of Chances

Your house looks like a daydream of simple structures:
In fact, I remember vomiting in the wishing wells of Your mall—fouling up all of your establishing compliments
Kitty-corner to the bookstore
Where I bought all of the pulp fiction, and waited
For the pet fish to fall in love with the heavens:
And you grew up—and grew up to emerge to love the World—a cheerleader in love with football—
A metamorphosis of the carport and echinopsis—
Don't you ever wonder of the everyday beauty of the landscaping
Just outside of your door—Privileged youth
Everyday beauty and commonly named princess: your future
A spotlight upon the comatose heavens—and the otters
Swim and swim, making a luxurious delight for the feral boys
Who are utterly outside your realm of chances.

Robert Rorabeck

Over

These women in my castles making bones
And over her, gentle suicide in the garden:
Sea anemones in the sky,
Evaporations,
Things to tell the king and princesses,
Weather vanes blowing their challises towards the Airplanes,
As summer continues floating as she does,
Palatial—sumptuous cathedrals in her arcs—
And the day is long and filled with daisies
And even longer—
The bulls pull the grasses, while laughs
Until it is over—and then she laughs
On her birthday in the graveyards—
And the sun waits until it passes,
And then shines: yes, shines all over.

Robert Rorabeck

Over A Lonely Man's Grave

Employed by the rioters who tried to blow out
The city,
While the lovers were making love in parked cars
All up and down
The rows of softly planted trees:
Resounding like narcoleptic charioteers, and the amusements
That glowed when nothing else was around:
Dreaming of holding hands with the brown hands of Alma underneath the Zoetropes of constellations of roller coasters:
Dreaming of taking her back into the swimming course
And living with her off of cotton candy
And musketeers:
There she was today in the fruit market, not meeting my eye:
Terribly afraid of losing her husband,
But she put a pink rose in my lapel which made the patrona
Angry or jealous;
But I will be gone tomorrow selling Christmas trees:
Gone even before Michael's birthday:
And Alma just right there where fate placed her: my heart a Fair ground of manic glee when near her,
Enthralled by the entertainments of her petit midway:
Until she takes her lovely biplanes to fly away- back to Mexico:
Like a butterfly torn from the paper dolls of a lover,
And flung over a lonely man's grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Over All Of The Sleeping Worlds

And the moon is a poem—floating azure
Over the cathedrals of the runway of Another college I seemed to have attended
So many long times ago—
So very long ago that it all becomes a cemetery
To me held up and defended by its armpits—
While even the bravest pilots
Swerve and correct themselves—
And the moon paints the ribbons upon these Bows—
And the graveyards are unemptied,
So they collect the elements that are lighter than Air, lighter than paper dolls burning—
And you once called me even though you
Were married and I had my parents in my car:
It was the very last time I sold Christmas trees:
Now I am a school teacher in the graveyards—
And I, drunkenly, I am about to have my first child,
As the night balloons into the architectures
That just so happen over all of the sleeping worlds.

Robert Rorabeck

Over And Gone

There is no good hope for me,
No second houses beyond the gravelling pews,
Nothing beyond the first and last move-
Fatally entranced,
Picking my nose:
I am no good at football,
And I cannot remember my lines-
For a sport I can mow the yard and kill garden
Snakes because they serve a master who won
The spelling bee:
Tied up in ugly scars, confused with innocence:
Paper snowflakes fall from the jubilant airplanes,
And I am in debt to the spin doctors of
An immortal high school;
I can fish and smoke a corncob pipe,
But I have no freckles-
I walk straight past the rattlesnake who ate my Little dog from Kansas,
While the alligator stares on perversely from
The canal's imperfect glass:
I can keep on walking because there is no end
To this neighborhood,
Past the checkout line of topless sunbathers,
All married but not one of them calls me over,
To help them carry riches out into their cars;

And I leap so many ditches until even
The housewives appear strange
And unreal,
Circling and chored-
Their children blond and social- Somewhere beyond
All this uneventful maelstrom there is that Golden fleece hung upon a smoking tree,
But with no friends to help me defend each department
Of the courted monsters,
Her hand has slipped away and ringed,
And I can hear them making love form inside the church,
Carrying along with their well-attended play.
Delayed outside indefinitely under threat of rain,

Trying to tie up this shoe even after it is
All over and gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Over Another Theatre

Looking up into the arc, it is time to celebrate:
See there, there are balloons,
Being blown by the zephyrs into the lips of Vagabonds—and in the living room there
Is enough space to count out the terrapin—
Until another bedroom is divided—
Your mother and father are still alive—
But the katydids like themselves inside the cataracts of Cypress,
As the airplanes fly across overhead,
Spilling their silver ribbons over another theatre
That is too afraid to disappear.

Robert Rorabeck

Over Both Of Our Towns

There—in her eyes that swallowed me,
Was an untrue light,
Stolen from other heavens that were neither
Greater or less than her own—
I realized only later that she Swung with me near the ocean
In the same park my mother once took me to Years ago,
Only for meat and gold,
And other possessions
And other necessities;
It took a trip to China to escape her—
I wrote her a thousand poems before that time.
I cannot say I used her for the poems.
If not my only muse,
She was my last- but not all destructive,
As she must have been should I have been A greater poet—
She did not destroy me,
But forced me to get a job
And to become a lesser man,
Which, acceptably, seems to be the fate for All things that wish to remain alive
Or at least to grow old—
Remaining with her family, she celebrates
Her childrens' birthdays one after the other—
I still keep statues to her in my house
Even though I have children of my own-
Once I save up enough money
I will move farther away from her—
But for now I sit here atop a bed she Thankfully never touched,
As I listen to the very same airplanes that Travel over both of our towns.

Robert Rorabeck

Over Every Other Candied Daydream

Brown shouldered on your broom sticks—
Starve like a match in the very air—doing a carnival above
The courtyard: Look how all of the tallest boys have Stopped playing baseball and are all
Putting their bats down:
It is a wedding up there—that is what you are,
But not of Christian ceremony—things of the ground grow wings
To metamorphosis nearer your body—
You light off—a playground with a fuse, curtailing and periwinkled,
You go until the amazed hobos see you like a comet over
The cerulean lights of another catholic church,
And the waves areola and nipple, wetting their chaps—
Like boys busy to realize who you are—
Evaporations over every other candied daydream into sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Over Mountains And Barbed Wire

This kind of reason feathered in the eyes
Of a peacock
Strutting impertinence through the ferris wheels
Of our memory:
You kissed my mouth before the albino eyes
Of an alligator
That most certainly was; but what of us-
Strange infatuation of two species
Becoming undone underneath the elusive
Heavens
While all of the white mothers are out with their Children,
And you remain so guarded- indeed we lasted
For approximately five hundred and eight days;
But I can see that you will never leave your husband,
Even though he cannot see all of my scars-
And so we come to an end,
Like the amputations of a windmill brought to The surface,
As sailors made to suffer through the blindness of A lighthouse- it becomes like this-
Lies that only whisper of truth- octopi,
And strange, giant cats in their darkness-
You were my muse for many starless nights,
But now all of the appendages of my body
Spread this ink in fear for its very life-
And I run across the hotels and their blinking yards-
Of sleeping Indians and of bobcats:
Away- away- over mountains and barbed wire,
Fearing the thoughts of love for you that Still remain inside.

Robert Rorabeck

Over My Beefy Grave

It doesn't have to be real to go this way,
Singing its pledges to the empty sea,
While I will wake up tomorrow in the new birth of My bachelorhood into which Alma has promised
To come and ride the bicycle I bought for Her, that I myself rode today: across the city to the Taqueria, and then to the swings,
And all the bodies like marionettes of their brown family's Swings:
And the world I knew has changed: America has Absolutely changed; but she was never my world anyways,
So all I have to do is drink my liquor and wait for
Alma,
As she will come slipping her tan beauty like leggy sunlight
Over my beefy grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Over Neighborhoods Like Yours

Wake up into the distilling mortifications of Buzzards,
Because the day is Sunday and wrecked. There was a little Bit of rain,
But it has stopped, and birds sing irritatingly:
Your wife has told you to go to bed, but there is going to be a football
Game,
And you can recline like a snake grown more intelligent in his Own game
In which your house is his golden nest:
He is speaking to your wife in the next room over, in the kitchen
Or the lanai:
He is stealing her away from you, and you can watch it happen
If you wanted to,
But you don't care: they are building a bright fair upstate
Somewhere,
And you plan to leave her and go to there, once this Sunday is over,
And the game has won over the day,
Your children slipping like starving and yet curious cenotaphs
In the little rooms over which the clouds break like elegant Rivers, worshipful over neighborhoods like yours.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Canal

You can give your echo to me—
Or I can be your Romeo—
This is my thought as your younger sister lies kidnapped,
Happily over the canal
With the hummingbirds in the palmettos:
And I am always searching for something
With scars on my lips—just give me time:
And throwing your wishes like pennies into
The well of stars:
That is where she doesn't have to say and single thing
To us—and that is where her work gets busied:
Where the cars are underneath the airplanes,
But unreal beside the sea:
And her thoughts become lost well before she can Think of me—
And your eyes become blind, and your other senses
Surreal—
Awash in the formaldehyde like the pornographies
I am trying to share with her.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Candle's Leaping Flame

Penumbra- forgotten echo over a rose,
Like a fingerprint over a theft-
This is my newborn amusement for you-
Silk of amber sleep trailing out
Along the page,
As if your children looking up into a magisterial
Gust of an airplane:
Who knows what they will actually think of This once it actually lies done-
And forgotten-
Underneath the swing-sets over the graveyards:
Perfumes of fruit too softly sweetened
So they fall and lie against the adventures of a rattlesnake's Kiss: they lie like the pornography stamped at
The dog's hoof,
Underneath the heavens of windmills-
They have all turned out so suddenly as to be unrealized
Tricks- as the tourists busy up the motels Underneath the mountains who
Personify the uneasy stairwells that we all lie
Under- mumbling our dreams or whatever underneath
The surer feet of the giants who are never named:
Just as the stewardesses learn how to leap over the candle's
Leaping flame.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Doorsteps Of My Forsaken Hearthstone

I am getting tired of worrying about those shadows,
Like the wearisome estuaries of speckled trout beneath
The eyes:
When, shouldn't they be moving on, since the Rest of the forest is changed and calling out beautiful
Numbers through the slate-cliff's auctions;
And the cars are purring like mountain lions,
And a new king in a red velvet tuxedo is galloping through
The lower glades, picking all the wildflowers,
Clapping his hands together,
Filling up his steam pressed pockets with little throats-
He knows the right rock and roll to change the aspens,
To make her pale and naked; and I guess it his thing,
And already the new mothers are feeding their children along
The conferred rows- Open eyed and open lipped,
Stepping on my head and gills; I struggle like a rare Lichen beneath them, taking my part in the forest where It is harder to breath, waiting for them, revealing pure Veins upturned from the secret corridors beneath their Swaying sororities-
But it doesn't do any good, for they are now all passing,
Giving not a thought to my unrefined pistilation of riches,
Going down to him, checking their mailboxes with flags raised,
Checking their refrigerators, and cleaning their houses as they Go, until the moon is out and perfect and tracking
Showing which way the ambidextrous werewolves must hunt,
Hungrily leaping, going this way and that from each garage and Den,
Floating down across the rented moats cast from cheap crystal
Chandeliers chimeless and overhead in their well-lit foyers, finding out where they are waiting unwrapped with the svelte stag
Pretending to be in love;
And though it is mourn some, I have no one else to root for,
For the king is only one man, spilling over so many red carnations,
Making the entire prom's heart beat with steady ululations,
That I should not be contained, and my sickness burns like heart fire,
Though it has only aroused for a short while to see what unfortunate
Justice it might find calling to him forlorn and suddenly
Well-attended by a brighter metamorphosis,

A torn chrysalis that shall never again re-emerge by moonlight
Rippling over the doorsteps of my forsaken hearthstone.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Downhill Shop Of My Tomb

Filthy and incomplete,
I want to die while giving my soliloquy
From the upper window of an old museum
From which you can barely see the sunset
Like a glass of rum,
From which some terrible accident is burning,
Smelling like a stew of letter-carriers
In a long train wreck,
Satchels gutted and strewn and all their White creases high up in the air
Like unripe cinders;
They come down unopened over the downhill shop of my tomb-
Someone is trying to make some extra money-
They have fused a monkey with a fish and called
It a mermaid-
I am set up next to that, probably the last of my Kind,
Counterfeit,
But well atop my soap box next-door to
The great Indian chief and one grizzly bear.
From down beneath us, the scuffing of polite feet-
They are coming in, one or two,
To look around as the trains rattle on through
The spilled letters,
Carrying dashing young soldiers with gold
And blue buttons along the way,
And back to filthy sweethearts-
The cottonmouth perpetually striking my wrist.
The bar is opening with much commotion and fanfare.
I wonder if they should make it up to see us
Before closing.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Far Away Seas

My dogs are all alone and I don't know what they Make of the snow;
But I am not beautiful, and I will not live forever;
And I have been hibernating for five years,
And even still I live alone;
And I don't know what I am doing:
I don't know for who I sing, S-,
S-:
You have such a beautiful infinity, and maybe it was
You I perceive leaping like chrome airplanes from Holidays at the top of all the mountains.
Sharon,
I climbed Elbert and Massive on the same day,
And went down limping with a gaggle of grandmothers;
And they seemed very beautiful at the time,
Even though over fifty percent of all of us could be grandmothers,
S-:
You will be a grandmother, S-,
And share your common knowledge with the flags of your Little countries.
I believe Colorado should become entirely yours;
It should be your country,
Because it is the most beautiful place in America;
And I sell fireworks,
But I am not beautiful, S-: S-,
And I am almost done. Oh, I want to be done: I want to be Inanimate on your shelf. What else could I be.
I still remember you in class.
Did you join that class to join me? S-?
No one looks at me anymore:
I have nothing to rely on, and my dogs are howling,
Howling.
Please, lets collect them and if you'd allow the entire Colony to resonate about your shadow,
Fibrillating like limbed cars, I would bless you:
Bless you, S-; I just want to love you and sleep on your Beautiful floor:
I am not beautiful, S-, but the sky is wide open and filled
With comments and billboards,

Even though I was thinking of E- when I
Submitted
Her, I am still all alone- I can do good work for you:
I am ugly and I am all alone,
But all I wish is to sleep with my dogs on your floor,
And listen to the nocturnal sounds of you suckling
Your child,
Making love to your husband,
Because that is all the immorality to which I climbed
To enjoy and cherish forever
Like a greeting card carried over the far away seas.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Featureless Graveyards

Glistening in the shadows of the pools that
Have stopped entirely and given up or not even thought
Of discovering themselves,
Where the heavy brown bellies of the fish escaped from
The plastic bags of the midways of the fairs
Of my heart
Come together in a marching band of opposite sexes
And make love;
Alma, as I would make you, pregnant with the liquors of My spirit,
So that in our thoughts all of our hidden places conjoin
And mix around,
And somehow metamorphosis in your womb into a creature
Of our own forgotten expressions,
Until she is born and steadily grows like the didactic magics
Of so many fables,
Taking us straight up to the immaculate heavens to show
Us in the pantomimes of zoetropes, in the zeniths of the lessons
Of our tamers
Who have us jumping through fire,
All of the other expressions the angels leave like teardrops in
A sun shower over the featureless graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Fluted Bones

I started out as a child in a sports utility vehicle,
Going up the Pacific neck of America with my young parents
And my two miniscule sisters:
I play with Barbie in a plastic hamper: My father called me a Cripple,
And when we got to Alaska we flew over glaciers and Got Amnesia over the deep tundra where the mosquitoes siphoned
Our flesh like vampires;
And the grizzly bears arose like reckless surgeons:
The sky was just a palate losing itself at both ends, reflecting the Knives of my father's wishes;
And we walked through the stench of overgrowth, we heard him
Growling for another plate of our innocent limbs,
So pale with so little meat over the fluted bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Happenstance Of The Moment

I seem invest in your shadow,
Thought I am here,
Resting after your cadaver,
And if your cards get low enough,
Eventually,
Forever,
I will be glad to sell the echo of your Soul back to you
Far to soon for you to reconnoiter
With the white caprice—
We will make a Christmas out of Halloween,
For this you will know forever—
That my words are small
And infinite
And I like to play them across the living Room floor,
And they seem to dance forever,
Just the ants with the prisms
But soon they will make us millionaires
In our utter abandonment
And, at least,
We won't have to go down tomorrow
Fight like cannibals atop the glaciers
Without any airplanes,
And I will be able to meet with your eyes
For at least one more moment—
And prove
For a second that we are yet right here—
And my child seems to exist forever
In the perpetuity of the hallows and the Nests of carports
Before burning whatever infinity is given
Over before him
To the places that he once had to
At least pretend to preside
Over the happenstance of The moment.

Over The Heavens

A Christmas tree in a living room,
A maiden lost in a forest—
Words spoken from the top of an empty heaven
Having to call down to an overflowing living
Room—
The joys of a life castaway—
Waves that beckon to the ill-wrought highways,
To the lucrative misspellings of Disney World and all of her rides-
I still keep the decorations of your gods up
In my house,
But now the moon is empty—the airplanes having Flown over the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Last Canal

All of a sudden the stars were in Mexico,
Like you were in your bedroom:
You had no last thought of me:
You were married:
Two children slept around you like satellites
In a hemisphere where I couldn't breathe—
So I went across the sea to be married—
And you lay on your back
Like a marionette finally put down—
The smile was painted on you—
Sometimes your husband set you on fire
Just to see you dance:
It was why you are still married—
But in the languishing shadows—
I tried to imagine you with my Eyes closed in the darkness underneath
The airplanes or angels—
Whatever avenue you took diverged
After one year beside me—
And you are in love with that darkness
Which your mother taught to you,
That you have carried by yourself in your Heart from the first moment you've Ever collected—
At one moment sweetness, sweat surcease
Of sunshine—your husband's face across
From yours in a Chinese restaurant—
And then the highways of your abandonment
All across you—what is it that you cannot Remember, but the places we should have Been together in—
Memories taking solace in nowhere—
Kissing me in
The darkness with the abandoned crocodile—
And you move on,
As the sun slips like a cadaver over the last canal.□

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Movie Theatres Like A Gentleman

Arrowheads that sweat and dream
In castanets of valleys
Know of the way that I think of you,
Driving underneath the Clouds from ghost town to ghost town—
Stopping down by the river where the maples
Drink
And the lilacs, whatever color they are,
Coming with the morning's pornographies—
Each daylight a pressing lip waiting to Be seized—
As you bend back and forth, shopping or Going to school—
And the weather pulls in over the movie theatres
Like a gentleman, who is up to no good,
Watching you.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Rivers And Through The Woods

Anemic ballrooms of sheer delights
Gaining higher
And higher
And higher and higher:
That you have added me
To your friends,
Who started off from Kansas
And ended up in the Emerald City,
Only to find waiting
For them
Behind the wizard's curtain
Every thing that they Brought with them:
Ticking
Roaring
Thinking
Barking,
Wearing the souls of their travels
The splendid sparks
Of the turn of the century experiments:
To fall down laughing
Smiling in the victory of the rainstorm,
As it came rushing back out of dreams,
The currents of the sea,
The paths of muddy roads leading Home again,
Speckled with the footprints
Of little dogs,
And the memories of time's
Inevitable passing,
Smiling familiarity from the splashing puddles.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Sad Old Earth

Deciding to start fresh every morning,
Pallbearers put any old thing into the earth; but bless
My soul if it isn't a young thing,
Now just a pittance of dearth while the Helicopters are scouting, each a bladed hallucination remembering
Suburbia:
They go through the sky counting the trailers in parks,
The lines of your loved ones stamped to the earth;
And in the day they fan out like children in a playground each
Of them uncertain of what all there is to do;
And I remember you in that playground; and I think of you,
While this funny young boy gets ready for heaven:
Beneath him his sons all lucky and seven. In the evening after their Work, they smoke under the poplars. Afterwards,
They will go to sleep next to their seven brides, their seven wonders:
The helicopters will watch over them like floating angels
Until another morning comes again over the sad old earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Shoulder-Blades Of Airplanes

Placed in the soft abutments over
The shoulder-blades of airplanes
Where the thunderstorms live in their Ethereal parks—
Running and leaping in the feral
Joy of its helium circus:
Little girls I don't know sometimes look
Up from their bedrooms towards
And they see where their mothers have Never tried to lift them—
It is a holiday up there filled with wonderful Cremations and the promises of
A metamorphosis that will take them
Away from school and out of their very lives.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Silent, Rain Drenched Fences In Hidden Pastures I Think I've Never Seen

What do you want from me
When you tell me I'm all alone
And that I've been drinking—
And the mermaid/barmaids are all loose down
By the river laughing at my ideas
For novels about them and their mothers;
The great tits which sag from so much
Lustrous s*cks,
And the beauty is a Siamese rainbow
Leaping through the sky,
And the trailer parks hustle,
And there are so many things to sell
And drift through the silent sounds,
Better boys than me with so many Tattoos and ways about it
With their tawny hands gripping the skiffs;
And so soon I should be back in school,
Learning the threnodies of their Catholicisms,
And I am on my second beer,
And today was a slow day,
And my father will soon be losing his house
To his so many enemies;
And she has great eyes and a secret intelligence
And four astounding legs which go leaping
Over the silent, rain drenched fences
In hidden pastures I think I've never seen.

Robert Rorabeck

Over The Wash Basins That Emmolliate Themselves Over The Sun

If life happens to slip away
Over the bushes where the little girls have had
At play,
Now all the time blushing and runaway:
Then there will be some good in the world;
It will be two by two,
And the airplanes will come down like creation
And mix with the blue
Over the trees and carports
And the other mixed stains of the earth:
Then if I will be there to see it,
And if my father will be there open mouthed like
A desert
We will listen to the fat girl sing together
Over the wash basins that emolliate themselves over
The sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Overreaching Tomorrows

Arrange the night for cadavers
Who could not possibly know your name.
Take the turnpike to Disney World,
And observe the blood spatter of Tinker Bell
In her small world of murder.
Stay until there are fireworks and anonymous
Rain showers which slick the sclerotic tracks
Of roller coasters, who seem to be sweating
Hard from making little girls scream all day.
Allow her in your mind to lie down and make Love with fabulous men,
Then arc away on the swings from the Elementary school,
Understanding that it is not perfect what they Are doing. Without knowing it, reproducing
The accident of their parents, the occidental
Currencies of rearranging fluids in the swimming
Parks of their passing rooms. They are not Accompanied, not anymore than you are watching
The deciduous strip show in the high picnics
Of everlasting bachelors. In the morning they Will drift away like salty tourists, and their eyes
Will turn, and they will not remember. They Will go to class and become good, but you know
The scores in the red clay, where you have sat
And excreted your fluids and odors, where the Pale legs jog into the overreaching tomorrows-
The inconsistencies in the plotting of postmodern
Tulips, and the inappropriate landscaping which Needs too much water to survive in this fickle Climate.

Robert Rorabeck

Pablo Neruda

The dwarves went down into the earth—The dragon rose and Stretched its curtains to a purple world:
The earth and the world was ours and hers, though she wouldn't Awaken—as the pilgrims shivered,
For upon the earth they were shaken—
But it was a beautiful plane they lived and feasted upon,
And there were so many types of birds—
With wings of the colors of a school desk—and I loved to think about Kissing her,
Until my day did come—It spread out in a thousand pinwheeled angles
Speeding up the mouths of the field laborers across the canal:
And I skipped school and thought of her—
Snow white and beautiful, done on her pills—the dark shadows
Of mermaids underneath her,
The unicorns in the alders and holy in the thickets—
She kept her sisters like the numbers around her—
And little of roman candles and bottle rockets who made love in The canals—
Until the days were lost upon her—and the monuments who were Supposed to be were fed up upon her—
And she lay like a silver trinket into the shallow streams, Breathing steadily for
Pablo Neruda.

Robert Rorabeck

Pack Lunch

A god of higher pharmacies,
You live in a tree house to come down
At night and steal the ground.
Born into what you have become,
A feminist professor smiling tinfoil,
You give even minor poets Bs,
But when you fart it smells like
Popuri and fireworks,
Though you make no excuses for
The way you've made sex with the Legends of your field, the mostly bigamist
Dons who are light headed and incontinent,
But fall on you like the rutting rams
In the highest basins of Colorado and Football fields;
You are a sommelier of the wine box,
A school boy crush on network t.v.,
When I was the only one in your Wisconsin
Classroom to defend Holden Caulfield,
Booed out of the leftwing successions
Of good housekeeping and waxed legs,
I rode my moted bicycle home whistling
To make love to the dazzling Judaica
Of the micaed excavation sight in the Middleclass ghettos of average grammar;
She was a tune, and you a meatball submarine
From which Plathe gassed herself to escape
The meaning- both in relations to your Family's east coast pallbearer upbringing,
The gated stride and odorless wind over
The saddest classroom of gutless rhododendron;
I packed my own brain in a paper sack for lunch,
And ate every curve and squiggle up deep
In the expensive landscaping, and licked at
The greasy crumbs, before you could get in
And complain about all that you found wanting.

Robert Rorabeck

Pagan Holiday

I wait for customers in this bay,
Or I read Anne Sexton and hope for quaint
Stigmata, like overly dramatic Catholic plays:
Or the overly education girls from the peripheries
Of high school; I can now smell them on the wind,
And far away they should love me,
But nearer they would lose all interest,
So I keep them at bay. The customers are coming
In. They can't afford their houses, but they don't Know what to do without this pagan holiday:
They wear the same clothes they wore a year ago,
They are fine and worked on and ivory, and I love
Every one of them, and the god hanging in this sky.
The power lines are conducting us through the grid,
She moves away across the unmowed grasses,
Across the everglades, her back always turned to me,
Her nape freckled and bare, maybe eleven stars,
Jupiter. I love her, but this is only another saying,
For the sacrifices are turning like satellites up in this
Sky. I was married to a woman with the same birthday,
But she doesn't listen to that anymore, but the way
The traffic comes and goes a river going anyway,
And thus I lie down to her and repose, and sell to Her in the dusk this pagan holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

Page That Is Just Now Turning

Starting a fire with my dog in the Darkness against an overpass of sky,
With turtles as a series of stones
Finding their way to a sea that no more ex-lovers
Ever go,
Because their cars' engines are failing to get Out of the garage,
And the days around them are hanging like a breathless
Carnival,
And the words we sent them are past dating, and Lactate sourly,
So the fox just lays there, now that the engine block
Has busted,
And an apiaries of bees have move in, as if into A dry-rotted room of a house I once might have Bought into-
And the light just fades and crenellates so more,
Like tear drops of an entire ocean watermarking a page
That is just now turning.

Robert Rorabeck

Pageantry Of Snowstorms

Pageantry of snowstorms beating against the random
Shells of the knights' chests—
The mobiles spin perpetually across the weebegone
Mountains,
And the sun of a god I never knew looks a long ways off—
They seem to be all caught up inside of
A cheerful orchard,
Like marionettes spilling their guts: the way I remembered
Making my way to Christmas one day
All of the way from Spain to France—
Until the last raindropp fell into her cup,
And she arose, shining like alabaster—like an obnoxious
Birthstone that blinded all of the forest
In the early morning
Of its unfortunate birthday.

Robert Rorabeck

Pages Of Elephants

Pages of elephants and a Pegasus—
Little gastropods like tears down the sides of Movie theatres,
The night train home wearing the negligee of Her hours—
And I am off on the honey moons of weekends,
Drinking rum,
As the sunlight pollinates with the daylights of Her harems,
And the most beautiful of brown skinned girls
Lies the furthest away—
Not like the eeriness's pastiest Disney
Worlds,
But with the accoutrements of the deliverers
Of the driest of gardens:
She is not here,
And she will never be here again—
It is not a lovely game I play with her memory,
But she is about and breathing
In a zoetrope of her Catholicism's which will never Return her this way to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Pain Lingers

Pain lingers
After the cacophony of relatives
Disperses to seed the country,
As a continent depicted by cartographers
A deep runny purple,
For no discernable reason,
Like festive stalactites
Hanging from the dress she chose
To wear once and never took off,
Because a stranger with loud eyes brushed
Against it and remains in the glades of her mind, Burning atop the strange distance of the Man she sleeps with as the days
Recede, not unlike waves from
A swollen sea that has overtaken her residence,
So now they come upon her,
That salty undulation she can feel
The tide that brushes against her chest
And brings strange things out of her
While she sleeps, like familiar animals
That glow down from the moon and vanish
Through her smooth forehead.
These important things she soon forgets,
For her eyes' opening causes such a blindness
No one notices, just the imperfect forms
Rushing toward her, sweeping her up,
And making love to her when no one is looking,
But in the quiet spaces, pooled in primary colors
Around the swing sets where she is newly born,
The gently brilliant things wait for her to play,
But arising, she forgets to notice and so
Pain lingers.

Robert Rorabeck

Painful Friendship

A queen ant in the core of a mortal apple,
And spoiled morals,
Picked up and tied and bosomed enraptured
On the diving board:
The cormorants are heady from the Jupiter
Dump and all those dumb
Mickey Mouse Billboards:
And, hey there, I said, I had a friend
And her birthday is in October, the grasses bend
For the grinning lawnmower:
I told her I had a friend, of a very quiet and Bashful species:
She laughed, her blue eyes were death rays with Mascara- she celebrated the winning team;
They mined diamonds and whistled and congratulated
Upon favorable comparisons;
And when she overheated I unhooked her bra
And we went fishing, and I used it to do the dishes,
Or I taught her of Peter Pan and Pinocchio,
Two better representations of the truant she thought
I should be: Then my friend leaping over the Irrigations:
Then my friend waving with the blue gills,
Or waiting under red berries and mistletoe,
Lips like a line of custard;
With beer and bowling alleys and dreams of Almost plutonic kisses of my friend: I thought the Lions were yawning; I thought that the herons were Waving, and roman candles saluting;
But they were all in their eager, comely waves just Like that sun asking inside the school bus,
Trying to steal my friend away from me-
And they did:
And the sun took her out over the clouds, just like
The reddled bull took my innocent sister away from me,
And I forgot who I was, but it was still undoubtedly painful.

Robert Rorabeck

Painful Hours

Here is where the sidelines end
Upon the mystified avenues I walk alone.
There are no spectators to worry over
This laboring heart, which she once said
Was without emotion, though I
Can hear it now beating out this dirge,
That futile song which pumps through
The lonely blood. Beyond the stadium
Where the great athletes sport for Fine women in new dresses dawned like
Speckled coats of awakening fawns,
I labor away in an unjustified direction
Naked of hope, my wrists bared liked
Mollusks from their shells as time
Showers down the gravity like arrows
Cutting days into me, in the cells of my Empirical carriage I pass the painful hours.

Robert Rorabeck

Painted Enigma

You hurt me so much,
And this is not your bouquet,
Because now
I am peeing like a goldfish
Through the
Drain-storms of goldfish where
You don't Care to happen anymore:
I happen to be touching myself
Like the open mouths of Watermelons
At a party of neighborhoods;
And I seem to be Spoiling like the tears of Chalk
Through the tear eyed afternoons
Unrecognizable concrete:
But this is just another
Word,
Another ghost:
Painting itself into the sidelines,
As I am here,
Touching myself- as I manage to Become,
Another painted enigma-
Another specter, panting besides
The daily walks of its pavements besides
What, exactly- I suppose,
It was supposed to become.

Robert Rorabeck

Painting The Throats Of Leaves

Too many scars to start drinking, and too many
To stop writing poetry, the wilting daisies which Spring from the edge of my fingertips;
And this is the dry season of my celibacy,
Where forest fires leap like court jesters over
The cracked and brittle courts, and the days are Arid and propitious, and my father greets me politely,
And I catch horses one handed,
And listen to a baseball game on the radio-
Time flows like a sunny river, and mother cries at Her kitchen table, and I can't think of anything better
To do;
But I still get one over the librarians who try to fine
Me- Can't believe I could read Walt Whitman,
But rather believe I'm a dusty thief of ancient highways,
Ask me where Don Quixote and The Idiot are, and I show them like a simple card trick, and then they Can't look me in the eye, and have to concede that I Am quite swift, but I do not lecture them, but leave them
To the bucolic weeds,
For I am already dancing like paper and a match,
And here is the reason I am to be alive: Here is the reason
Why my dogs run to greet me, and she reads me over Seas with sweaty thighs: This is my summer, and things
Are happening; But I still play alone, and reciprocate with My loneliness like sunshine painting the throats of leaves.

Robert Rorabeck

Pale

You plan for long silences, days at the mall with Your comely siblings,
Window shopping for firemen and maypoles-
Losing me to the bitter hooks of my wild isolations, Crooking my neck over the power lines to Billboards and the soft bellies of airplanes;
But none it can make anything right:
Tucked away in your mountain hideaway, skinned by Rainbows-
I am left with the need to cut out the heart of my Infantile need and feed it to sharper reptiles:
Now in your kitchens, cutting your things, your children
Throwing all of your loose change to the gold fish
And Chinese carp there in the pool behind your head,
Why you never once think to look for me as the shadows
Pass softly over you, freckled and warm,
And you drink your glass of red,
Draining me through lips that in comparison make Rosy carnage pale.

Robert Rorabeck

Paleolithic Mermaid

Broken as the tailgate to the Alligator's eye:
There she is, smiling toothily
In the gutter downhill from
The blood bank,
From the dime store:
What has she made for herself?
She has just grown larger
And without one thought,
Insatiable—
Girls from the college
Petal over her aquatic boudoir
With a million thoughts like a
Bee hive
Made up in their minds.
What will be their major?
Who will they marry?
And where will they live
After all of this is over?
She doesn't care—
After all of the ferris wheels have Closed up shop
And moved out of town,
After each and every window
Lies doused
There she remains,
Paleolithic mermaid
Airplanes leaping like mathematical
Fireflies over her perfect body.

Robert Rorabeck

Palindromes

Hopscotch is easy if you're a tourist,
And the sea is easy if you're a fish,
But your eyes I'll never forget,
Like a woman singing in French-
Not matter what she is saying,
It sounds like she loves me,
It sounds like she loves me,
No matter what she is saying,
But you're eyes I'll never forget,
And the sea is easy if you're a fish,
Hopscotch is easy if you're a tourist.

Thus the rhythm falls through the trees,
While little girls dust the sticks of chalk on their knees,
I want you to look at me,
But you just do as you please,
And I think you love me, no matter what you say,
And no matter what you say, I think you love me,
I want you to look at me,
While little girls dust the sticks of chalk on their knees,
Thus the rhythm falls through the trees.

I have driven the highways you have forgotten,
To find you I broke my jaw on the oracle's bottle caps,
And I have ridden the roller coasters through the splintered light
Just to get a look at you through the sky,
And is that all right? To kiss you in my slender mind,
To kiss you in my slender mind, and is that all right?
Just to get a look at you through the sky,
And I have ridden the roller coasters through the splintered light,
To find you I broke my jaw on the oracle's bottle caps,
I have driven the highways you have forgotten.

Day by day, as you lay your head down to sleep,
The kittens mew in a forgotten world,
And the rain scrawls the names of runaways on your roof,
But that is such little proof, like a cousin to the ocean,
I would love to find you by accident as I think about you
Riding to school on your new bicycle.

Riding to school on your new bicycle,
I would love to find you by accident as I think about you,
But that is such little proof, like a cousin to the ocean,
And the rain scrawls the names of runaways on your roof,
The kittens mew in a forgotten world,
Day by day, you lay your head down to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Palindromes And Paramours

Palindromes and paramours walk back
And forth in the night,
Tell each other secrets, kiss:
Floods of bicycles suddenly speed by like
Schools of wheeled fish:
They are having a race, slick like
A dream, ready as a coffin:
Two girls say they should no longer make
Love, even though they are ready.
Underneath the palms they fail,
And that is where they are still.... Making love.
Though, my children are behind a
Red aquarium, sleeping on the couch-
I haven't touched them since their mother
Turned into an eel and swam wisely in our Bedroom with another man:
Now their fingerprints glow forensically on
The inside of my skull.
There is a serial killer in California who is Seven foot tall,
And today I am drunk and out of work,
And sleeping under an overpass where the cars
Proceed like vaporous waves,
Commuters from high school laugh toothily
In the air-condition and fart self-consciously:
Outside the park, there are tools in the work shed,
And games to play till dark,
And the pet rabbit sleeps in the owl's lap,
Who is well-sated and cheerful, and all Around us they are singing of peace, all the Women are beautiful, all the children blonde-
There is no reason to be fearful,
And its time to move on.

Robert Rorabeck

Panhandling To Angels

The greenness has no plans for defeat,
So close to the sea
While the blood is up
And the bees are exploring madly
Through the fumbling of words and feelings,
The fire hydrants wait
To exhume their bright
Pressures
For the forest fires of birthdays,
And the airplanes leave to win,
Panhandling to angels
And stealing so many pretty girls

Robert Rorabeck

Pantheism's Ballet

Golgotha is a special place with new fonts
Spuming ink;
I skip out from the horse-flies, and dally in My thirty year old truancies,
Swaddling in curdled milk and alien sunbeams-
Then there is glory where it is almost getting Too cold for butterflies to come and hibernate for Awhile- Transmogrified, roller derby girls with Wings and wedding rings;
And I can't get the format right to sell it,
And I've lost my knees, so how am I to propose
To her? I am just a youth blasted by war,
My mouth is all I need to eat, a firework's cone spumes
The geysers of a swarthy rainforest:
I let her pick the colors and then we roll around in
The jungle and get lazy, looking at the sunken riverboats
Where the alligators are bathing,
And from those esoteric windows, the long stringed
Orchids bulb and upspring, turning, like girls freshly Picked from the ballet, their white arms unfold,
Propositioning the colorful birds of our gods,
Who have learned to speak.

Robert Rorabeck

Panting Over His Master's Grave Until Resurrection Day

Dark and welsh and sometimes gone,
I live in the footprint of King Kong;
And the days going pell-mell through the picketing
Throng;
And all these shooting, spuming things
Make me wonder how you came upon your Diamond ring- Upon your child learning her first Words from the hidden spring
I showed her using preschool telepathy- Now none
Of these words are good enough to be
The true thing,
But it's true that I once saw you through the bus window
Driving by on a rainy day:
It was just one day, and you were just going your way,
And I wasn't doing anything good enough with myself
To captivate you,
And so you soon went your way, up your hills to A sunnier day,
But I kept along truncated in the unforgettable shadows of Your unrequited yesterday;
And I'll keep on following you, like a faithful pet
Panting over his master's grave until the very resurrection
Day.

Robert Rorabeck

Pantomimes Of The Storms

You need to come home to me from the Offensive legions:
Because this dusk has no eyes, and no
Juliet—
The airplanes cannot see by this, words
Underneath an overpass—
The cars pass seemingly like roses collecting
To the sea—
Each one being thrown away into
The grief of those caesuras—like feral
Bosoms rising from the old phantoms—
Pantomimes of the storms
Trying to catch up to her, their hearts in
A lonely place trying to leap to breathe
From the city beneath the sea
Beneath all of us.

Robert Rorabeck

Pantomiming The Clouds

Pantomiming the clouds, what strange verbiage of Mercury poisoned haberdasheries
These words become, hardly recovered, though they Are gathering themselves from a battlefield of plagues
Halfway to Saint Louis or Egypt,
And the dogs wine up to the night, the coyotes bellowing,
The mother possums bighting their lips,
As the rockets of cosmonauts continue shooting off:
Shooting off as all of the stars of their nations die,
As half eaten horses get up, but do so little good,
As the enormous and poisonous centipedes dance
Halfheartedly with little girls,
As I call my best friends from their newly dug graves and we All stand like a chorus of flighting carolers outside
Your bedroom's parlors, singing of the night's holidays,
The banshees of misshapen housewives beating their Unkind hearted knell into the roof; and it rains broken horsehoes
And hardnosed pix-axes;
And the gypsies come like cold hearted butterflies and steal
Everything, so in the morning our tree is gone, but your eyes
Are still burning holes straight through the world that has killed
Itself so many times for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Paper Airplanes And Dragonflies

Paper airplanes and dragon flies are the Code words I tell my seventh period class:
Code words for spies
And blue cars
That fall asleep and make love together
Not far from the sea
And underneath the overpass—
While mothers clean the linoleum;
They are beckoned backwards by the slender sleuths
Of their youths,
As fireworks are stolen from underneath the noses
Of baseball games—
And witches float and spin in the sky—
Beautiful delusions
Making love above the parks of Michigan—
And when it snows it is like Fire that warms the churches and all of Those grottos—
While boys as young as I am wait outside
The schools they never go to—
Waiting for you to come out to show even the smallest
Diamond of flesh to their naked eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Paper Heaven

Trying to break into Hollywood underneath
A vaudevillian sky:
All of the billboards are answering the cool shadows
Of housewives
Which roll off of their shoulders like cotton candy
Or angora sweaters:
And she still goes to work with my cousin:
She still gets up in the morning to Paint those signs of blue berries and Indian Corn:
But we don't make love anymore: I just masturbate
And lie on the carpet with my dog
And look up into the ceiling fans and into that Paper heaven where the airplanes of My miss calibrated soul keep turning around and Around.

Robert Rorabeck

Paper Snowflakes And Ashy Cherries

Turn my sugar into alcohol.
Rippling on the stamens of a dream,
I watch the underbellies of your spaceships
Leaping,
Lucky-legged,
Green eyed; but venal things:
Each word a tomb I raid for you-
I become so many John Does, lost in the spilt
Forest of your bitten tongues;
I get high for you, and steal things for crèches
And mobiles,
Kicking out the yard lights of popular romance
Authors:
I've been to the south of France chasing a guitar
On Christmas, I have;
And I've sold tannenbaums and strapped them to The roofs of family cars;
And I am an honorary Catholic-
I want to be a saint for you; I want you to Add one more hyphen to your name,
I want to slip down the scree for you,
And rest in your verdant bosom when the boss and
Your husband is away and you have nothing to lose;
And I am dying; and I want to die into you,
While the sea is spitting like a venomous snake
Who coils with me up your naked roots,
Pale disavowing, wishing to whisper our ripened knowledge
To you,
While your husband is away cutting down mountains,
And you are turning sideways, curious for awhile
Rippling as if in a dream
Not quite certain of the portent moving in like a flood
Of dreamless things coughing paper snowflakes and ashy
Cherries up to the neck of your doorstep
Until you smile, askance, understanding that None of it is for real.

Robert Rorabeck

Parable

I am an echo underneath the airplanes: they Keep going places,
But it is only to make money while all of the goldfish
Sit and languish
So much like housewives:
It is an unbusied, somnambulant enterprise:
But they do it—
This is the same as all of our truancies—voices of Strange children outside of the bedrooms of my house:
While I no longer give flowers to any woman
Not even my wife—
I get drunk on the evening of good Friday,
And remember there is a god at the end of the rainbow—
Like a Titan at the end of the beanstalk
That I wish to climb up to and steal from:
As he tries to wed the stewardesses he has kidnapped
While giving nothing special back to the world,
As the chicken crosses to street to try and make it to
The other side.

Robert Rorabeck

Paris, Arizona

In the White Mountains of Northern Arizona this evening,
The rain gently falls where I live,
As if the earth has asked
The sky to make soft
Romance with him
As the sun fell weeping
Like a wandering monk
Over the hills in the West,
Lighting last upon Molly's
Nipple rising up
Perpetually areolaed in stone
Where she sleeps
Across the valley....

Soon the moon will slip
Out of her tempermental
Boudoir
In her gown of beautiful
Muted light, and
The earth will ask her
If she saw him making
Love to the sky,
But the moon will only shush
Him
With a finger of opal light
And there she will glide
Like a pale maiden
Through a lake
Looking for her burning priest
Who, like you right now,
Is running on the other side
Of my world,
Doing things which are Hidden from me,

But soon you will

See her too,
As she comes to the shore
And slips away again.
For we sleep together
In a garden where gods make love in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Parks Of These Dullards

passing on lies to their children the hangdog smiles of their own addictions words for moon copyrighted.
they cloister in the suburban grottos
that the beautiful and the shallow women are diademing.

looking up,
see the moon framed by silhouettes of palm trees.

hear the ocean hushing in the great expanse of her bedroom.

she represents the boundless truth
that last forever beyond the hapless and blindly constructed

parks of these dullards.

Robert Rorabeck

Passengers Of A Thousand Skeletons

Scribbling in the places of naptime—drooling, stealing—
Waiting for my Mexican uncle to come home
And cook me devil shrimp—
Smoking out of tinfoil next to the canal—
Where a tree without any roots spreads across the fields—
Where there are angels there,
And entire castles woven out of the cypress—
And a thousand other areas stolen by the ways the branches
Bow—hiding the trellises of conquistadors—they with Their zink crosses painted blue—
Stuck in the reservoirs where a thousand automobiles should Rust—tinkering with the folklore of alligators,
And the silent plains—passengers of a thousand skeletons—
And the clocks only the daylight of the sky—
Wandering off a ways—looking for a sanctuary faster than itself.

Robert Rorabeck

Passing

We are passing now;
We don't need
Guns;
We're passing quick
Enough:
Our boys, and arrows,
And our squaws
All dancing in the Buff;
We have no reason for These laws;
We are passing quick
Enough,
Through the windmill of
The devil's jaws:
As with Judas, Brutus,
And Cassius:
We go down nine blocks
On the bus,
No time for lawyers, wives,
Or trust:
Its our destination or bust:
We are all passing quick
Enough.

Robert Rorabeck

Past Of Absent Memory

I have placed you here in the rainstorm beside the pool—
Made you into the aestheticism of
Things that cannot spell:
I have lost you here, and listened for you for a long while:
I have grown a gut and I have rusted with the Bicycles that have been carried up from
The sapplings metamorphosed into the springing trees:
Thinking to find beauty in what we used to have—
And not able to put it away—even though the pilots and
Their stewardesses have turned into great uncles
And aunts in the sky—watched forever by open jawed
Titans, flatulent in their castles at the high end
Of the beanstalks—where they have looted
All of the gold of the stories I have tried telling you
To bring you home from a past of absent memory.

Robert Rorabeck

Past Of Absent Memoryu

I have placed you here in the rainstorm beside the pool—
Made you into the aestheticism of
Things that cannot spell:
I have lost you here, and listened for you for a long while:
I have grown a gut and I have rusted with the Bicycles that have been carried up from
The sapplings metamorphosed into the springing trees:
Thinking to find beauty in what we used to have—
And not able to put it away—even though the pilots and
Their stewardesses have turned into great uncles
And aunts in the sky—watched forever by open jawed
Titans, flatulent in their castles at the high end
Of the beanstalks—where they have looted
All of the gold of the stories I have tried telling you
To bring you home from a past of absent memory.

Robert Rorabeck

Past The Mailboxes

Copper thighs gleaned by golden razors as
The stewardesses prepare to fly; or as I road in a car
The other night with a woman who looked Like a female super hero;
And when we got back home, I touched her leg:
I touched her thigh,
It was as smooth as the ancestors in a river of a laughing
Boy,
And she ran away just as fleeted, like every girl whoever
Half loved me,
Promising me that at least a few of my lines were
As beautiful as they could be: but she loved another boy,
Another man, who was more impossible than I,
And that I loved someone else besides;
And I knew that her words were no good, but I watched her Throw them up anyways, like paper snowflakes in A saraband of sky; and they danced over the shoulders of a Pretend cowboy who pretended to bleed and die,
As she got back into her car, out past the mailboxes
And out past crepuscule; and underneath the airplanes and Pretended to drive away- Or I suppose, at least,
That she really did drive away.

Robert Rorabeck

Pastoral

If you come running back to me now,
Like a tamed deer back from its ventures in the woods,
I will love you just as I ever did.
See me put down my rifle and lay out my palm
With sweet grain for you. If you come close enough,
I will only pet you for as long as you stay,
And I will not fence you in, though my pastures are green
And I would have you in them.
Not far from here there is a spring in a rock,
Which I will take you to so you can drink,
And paths which we might climb together which Go far up from the earth and are brushed by innocent
Sunlight. Here, where the air is sonorous there are valley sides
That lay rich in alfalfa, and purple cabbage for your tongue,
And twists of ivy in rich green draperies hung down from
The windows of our deities who we might look upon
The great soft blue murals that arc through the effervescing
Clouds. There we can listen to the first words the wind brings,
The fluxuating temperaments of a golden orchestra,
Strumming like fine instruments our vibrating souls,
So we can feel one another without moving,
If you come running back to me now.

Robert Rorabeck

Path Of Your Uninvited Yesterdays

My misspellings are gone—as the rainbow is gone
From beneath your shoulders—
And don't you have any idea about what exactly we Are doing now—
Burying ourselves like overused castles against the Sea I took you to once or twice—
And wasn't that a pretty thing—and another lie:
I told you that your beauty was just as great as
All of that cerulean mask—the monstropolous houses
Pressing neatly against our backs—
And I took you upon the swing-sets of my childhood
As they were just abandoned for one last time—
And left derelict in their neighborhoods of classrooms,
Like butterflies left like imperfect glass—up against Wherever it was that I remember you last—
Hyperventilating - making a show of the uninviting
Weathers—but I guess he entered you, anyways—
Invading all of your paths of your Uninvited yesterdays.

Robert Rorabeck

Path Without Any Kings

Once again a path without any kings:
Several hours taken up the slopes to the watchtower
To see all of the valleys already burned
By the fire—I seldom have time to Wonder,
Teaching school down where the creeks have cut
The valleys like seesaws—
And the weathervanes look ludicrous up against
The chapels of her weddings:
But it is almost near where my grandmother and aunt
Lie buried—
They will never know of my weddings, or how
I found my way up to her repeatedly—
And laying off my gear in the holidays of midnight—
Held my breath to a show of comets and airplanes—
As my dogs painted their snouts into
The raspberries
Wreathing in the lazy summersaults of wind atop
Of that summit where almost anything could be observed.

Robert Rorabeck

Paths Of Airplanes

Softly embittering bruises on my flesh,
Each as unique as a snowflake,
As a rattlesnake's kiss- living underneath the diesel
Paths of airplanes,
Permitting to the horticulture of this un heavenly
Place:
With and without daylight and sunlight and moon beams,
As the waves rise and breathe softly in crèches and Wreathes in which the mermaids cultivate
Like a bosomy obstacle course, but no one believes
Of them anyways- which only
Increases their worth.

Robert Rorabeck

Paying Cash

Paying cash, so I don't have to sleep alone,
Though the tarmac is still hollowed as the rains come,
And to the sides like pews in a wedding,
The orchards hum to the lions of the wind, and this is a country
Yet birthed, that I have seen in the brown prisms of your Eyes that skip around the daylight
Like little girls in circular yards; and you make me feel so Warm about you, Alma,
That my loneliness burns away like a good wish, like
A prayer torn from the summit of a mountain,
And I feel as if I can survive even if I don't yet really have you.

Robert Rorabeck

Peacock Feathers

If you are getting up and coming off work,
And your eyes are lamp shaded with little silhouettes Leaping and foraging like a giant zoetrope of A spaceship out in the desert,
Then I don't know who you are; but I am betting that
You make soap,
Or you are like a student in Fort Collins, CO,
And you have a bicycle, and you go that way across
The lemonade promenade
As you get up on the antediluvian plain of Long's Peak,
And I have found arrowheads under your lip,
And though I told you that you were beautiful, that was A long time ago,
But it is even truer today, and the baby we should have had Creeps like lighter fluid through the grass- You see he Has learned to get up, our little gamma ray;
But even if we'd had him by now, I am not a man who ` Knows how to keep a women tightly pleased when her skin
Is the perfect amber, her eyes like precarious though stalwart
Bridges crossing the fjords,
And her bosom the brown squeeze box,
The peach fuzzed harpsichord- and you had no reason to love
Me more than two seasons of a day,
Because your thoughts are lighter than chicken feathers-
You watch talk shows and wait for the fox to enter the coop,
And it is a different fox with a new moon
And yet their bright red tails are always such murderous fanfare,
Like the throats of drowsing conquistadors, blushing
Crustaceans in the nearly prehistoric beach, their jugulars severed
By arrows feathered with proud birds like peacock feathers,
Though now I am sure they no longer exist.

Robert Rorabeck

Pedro's Siesta

Taking a siesta with pedro in the Middle of noon,
Looking good for a ways and made
A five dollar tip,
Which you can do here all days.
So yesterday old Betty said I looked like
A blonde version of Aston Kutcher:
I punched her several times in the eye
To cure her glaucoma and reminded
Her to call me Jodie,
While the lights leave us, only to return,
Like misunderstood and confused lovers
Bighting their lips,
Inadvertently letting the dog out.
And I am in my bunk rustling with the Dry needles,
Thinking of my dogs in Arizona- Trying to Become the boy good enough to drink her
Wine,
Wanting to pay her to hold her hand for
A day at the zoo,
Or for her to become my junoesque shade tree
Budded, titted, something that could Move away at any minute
With the traffic,
And yet something indescribably more beautiful:
Her breath my billfold
While ducks like mock monarch butterflies
Pretend to be swans in the man made lake
Trying to look like the hazy resilience around
Beautiful old age,
Like a French impressionist I will always be too
Insouciant to remember her name.

Robert Rorabeck

Penumbras Of A Stranger

Beginning to grow beautiful-
Metamorphosed by my letters and drinking
Habits,
Getting to be frenetic and daubed,
Masked by the penumbras of a stranger:
My face uniformly mottled like an ancient,
Though subversive book of forgotten fiction,
Or the next pseudoscientific hike of impossible mountains-
My real scars now are hidden by my jean jacket:
The hollow between my ribs hurts like sore
Teeth, pulled out from where they took her,
Like a restless, stolen flower;
And now here on the mountain it is raining,
And upstairs the simulacrum is drawing and singing
The few things its French inventor gave it unique copper gears
To draw and sing;
And I have hidden on my person the lichen and pyrotechnics
For the capital of a new bride; and so I sing to her
From my body's convertible wounds- I fill it with my vociferous
Ululations, and the trauancies stolen and hidden from School buses;
And from my backyard, though it be endless, I encourage
The hooped zebras to bend down in the mowed grasses and
Kiss the hyenas even though they are breathless from taunting;
And behind this the virgins are getting naked across the Canal, and now they are dousing and laying amidst the holy's
Crinoline,
Just as similar to the eclipsing blindness of a scene;
and they are shivering in their rainy, crippled
Bedrooms, uncrossed with letters awaiting, to be broken
Beneath the waxen seals, like the lips of a queen or one
Of her hyperventilating ladies in waiting.

Robert Rorabeck

Penumbras Of Illegal Architectures

From the door: the window,
Openings of senses that blind themselves,
Words on their fingers
Discovered by ants in the grasses undissolved before
A bluer than blue house:
While we all live together- goblins and unicorns,
Preaching to our betters,
As if trying to find out how to escape the genie's lamp:
As the entire world has to dissolve
Like smoke on the brink of her lips- Multiplying her
In my house of bachelors:
While I keep her uncle here, before he has to go away
To marry his cousin in Mexico,
Singing to her like the yellow songs of my witchcraft or My anyways,
Ending up like snails on her pillow- awakening,
She comes to me, wounded- I love her:
I heal her- I give her my imperfect soul, my Alma
Lost into her borders,
She receives me-
She gives me this atmosphere to breathe under, like a dog
Who has discovered the milky tears of some Foul mouthed heaven:
Like a fish who escapes the sea to bare its unfortunate
Young,
Only to return, empty handed- but watching the sunken
Hemispheres as jingoistic fireworks explode in wonderful
Penumbras of illegal architectures.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfection Concrete In His Promise

She doesn't call and I learn to live alone in a hurricane,
The disembodied eyes falling dead upon me-
With each pupil dilating, I learn to step further from the Door to the soul and embrace the changing medium of
The wind that sculpts mercilessly until I am the thought Unremembered,

I have no place in my body, when she moves so far away
I feel her breathing next to me stepping out of my skin,
My hand passes hers' as my thoughts drift back to the time
That never was, like her lips on my body, pressing what
She once was mercilessly against the flesh

She is the adaptation, the survival, when I am gone
She is still here, making love to the boys and the bodies
Who come her way and line up in her path,
The curves evolution takes, the athlete's completion of The race, stoned,
She lays in her bed and tries to remember how the rains
Hit her once as she fell awake, loving something distant,

The passion of a daydream laying in the sun, she Walks down the hallway alone never thinking of the Possibilities sleeping out on her yard waiting for her to Step barefooted toward him, the imperfection of His immediacy, the perfection concrete in his promise.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfection In The Perfect Lines

I have looked for perfection in the perfect
Lines of a highway, diving equally like a fair cake;
Or on the sweltering horizon of done where School buses skip like yellow, wavering stones
In their waterless mirages, the way the killers move
In their dress of heat- I gave my sister 200 dollars
At her wedding, and now she hates me even as she Bandages up a stray kitten and sends it out to meet
A rain so sure that it will turn to snow by latening Afternoon, and then upon the tawny shoulders of Little brown housewives, the most privileged class
In their cavorting, leaping out like lost and wandering
Elves into their amnesiac shopping, giving off the Alluring smell of freshly baked sugar cookies:
Almost obtainable but perfect helpless in a sudden whiteout
Where brilliant cars skid helplessly with sudden fireworks,
And then rest, canned up again telephone poles and Evergreens, spilling such splendid guts of gift rapped
Christmas gifts, while their leggy owners stumble out
Perplexed and bummed, their cleavage already working Out magic for a stud fest, even though they don't Remember this store.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfections Of Flames

Downed in the pantheon like Christians making
Love to lions,
Something triumphant as it dies into a bigger universe,
The headlights of cars,
Mismanaged into the many shops of songless birds:
All of it equated by the strange ribbons
Garlanding her wrists in the bathtub:
The gifts of peasants- the atrocities of garish airplanes
Trying to circumnavigate the Christmas tree:
The misspellings of my soul
Who has to awaken again and get up to work tomorrow
In a world that doesn't know how To receive- a father flying up to his son who Burns him like a forest fire of lighthouses-
The exfoliations of many legged angels upon the barks of Cypress until we get down to here:
Until we get down to the bosom of nature, and sing to her Throat like a hidden fountain we drink from:
With the foxes, and the silent turtles:
Debased in a soul of forest fires: this Alma from Mexico,
Trying to cross and re-cross the borders,
The fronteras teaming with the mismanaged jungles of Serpents and fireworks- like chickens and dead
Bodies telling jokes across the railroad tracks,
Smiling at the flea markets of cerulean madness:
Just to sojourn into her castle perilous,
To sleep on her roof housing the brownness of her perfection,
Until she awakens again,
Forgetting us like a dream of a healed scar- and the sun
Rises, and leaps as if a lion in its perfections of flames.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfectly Pretty Rains

Filling up on the resin of god,
The hateful spiteful mouths out of doors,
When they could care less,
Because they have them some bicycles and some Good hands of cards,
And the sky is never judgmental:
The sky is very sexy all the time,
And you can fish so far into it,
And it is like a great exhibit of Spanish women,
Or girls name Sharon,
But it doesn't cost a thing to stand and sit beneath her
And imprint her to your tattooed soul:
The sky doesn't give a care if you are not beautiful.
The sky is always a prairie,
And the sky is a dog lover who has perfect breasts
And commercial airlines as chalices
And necklace:
I wanted to name the sky after you, but you just Laughed and stole my breathe.
While in a coffin I surmised that you were even Prettier than the sky,
I guessed and held on to the visage of you in the wild
Blue yonder,
Something untrue and wholesome for which to Pine and ponder
Far into the afterlife, while the cars and chickens changed,
But the sky held on forever to its sunny days
And its perfectly pretty rains.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfectly Round

Juvenile swings underneath the careless
Pines
With another thing doing,
And biding its time:
I want to love you- I want to masturbate
And pet your oily coat.
I want to bite your lip and feel the un struck
Meat of your inner thigh,
Like a lobster after it has done screaming,
And skipping school,
And dreaming:
I want to put you there on the springs
And pull your legs up like pedals,
Or ride you like a bicycle,
Like a butterfly over full Vietnam;
And I wonder what your father had seen,
Or thinks of you
Now after he is gone;
And I wonder if you can hear me even here,
Whispering my body language,
Writing you in my hand-signaling psalm,
While airplanes stroke the night
Like matches,
And you lay down for your socially galvanized
Stud,
Another man who could never say this to you,
Scooping my flowers of guts,
Chumming the wake of infinite regrets,
As if we were alone together in a room that was Un regrettably perfect,
And perfectly round.

Robert Rorabeck

Perfume

A great well crafted sting,
Folded in the pages of a butterfly:
Where the sea rises and breathes
In the afternoon of epiphanies,
Far away from the pines who are singing,
Because even though they have Never seen you, they believe:
I sat amidst them and watched
The shadows craft the dying carpet,
And whispered of my love,
The sailing break of waves,
The undulations that go perfectly uncontained:
These stalwart men,
These bowered sentinels,
Breathing in ways you cannot know,
Watch my language go off like fireworks,
The cart wheeling performers out of caves,
The stilted jesters lispng tunes,
The jack-in-the-box out of tombs:
We sat together like conspiring minors,
Under the forgotten walkway of the grown-up world,
And bowed as the wind came to us
In whispers of your slicked limbs,
The strut of abdomen sliding back the door,
Getting out of the shower
And blooming in your evening's room:
I tell them you smell like saltlick and cinnamon,
And your eyes are the haunted fires of hungry men:
I tell them better poets could contain you
In their potions, and I only hold the slightest notion,
Of the ways and avenues
That you come stepping towards us out of shattered gloom;
But you must not disappoint them,
As they are rooted in the eternal open,
And I have become nothing but the Scattered bones about them, waiting for your Entrance, as the winds scent us
With your perfumes.

Perfumed Into The Ephemeral Dresses

Spelling this way, the wounded hound or bachelor,
Unaccompanied beneath all of the windmills who are replete
With her name:
They dress up the hillside and spin and spin, like very Simple Ferris Wheels
Hung up in the adulterous winds; and this is the way they sing to
Me,
And make me drunken, so I dropp my gun, and hang beneath the trains,
Watching my wishes pullulate and the pop rockets
To come down and lay beside me:
Panting cenotaphs,
They tell stories of the stained glass windows of churches,
And that they got so high up as to see the top ornaments of
The Christmas trees;
And their hearts sung and whistled, until the farer winds left them,
And they became the foundlings of airplanes;
And thus here they lay, like little boys fallen from an endless sky
Never to return again;
And we can almost see the ships turning on their noses
And burning,
Burning: and the windmills churning, churning, perfumed into the Ephemeral dresses by which they so sing.

Robert Rorabeck

Permission

I am not asking you
For permission,
To make love to you with My own hand,
Alone in this bed:
I do it quite often,
But I can still see....
That my mother knows.
Just as, I am not asking you
For permission to write this poem,
The little flecked note
Tossed out of the nest,
Yet having learned to fly:
It is too early for it to become Anything but the crocodile's
Feathered attribute,
The sad proverb which Keeps it from drowning,
Only to snuff it out before
The fuse contacts gunpowder;
I am not asking you
For permission
To end it before the curtain rises,
And the false applause;
I am not asking you
For permission,
For I never intended
To reach the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Perpetually And Again

All laid low in the patio of sun: after school and in the sun
Then the day is green populated by her dresses,
And if the day is green, how you swim across him like a dream
Thought of by the busses who have removed you from Me once again; but I will see you once again tomorrow, if I don't Skip school again,
To think of you while scooping the silver roe with my hands,
Scooping up the tinsel of minnows, watched by the horned rimmed
Stares so crocodilian that they should not care how I miss you
And think of you on and on, perpetually and again.

Robert Rorabeck

Persevered

Well then I fought the monsters
And then I fought their Young:
So like tattooed stewardesses with
All of their body scars:
And they were so flexible,
And they were gymnasts—or then they Were entire constellations
And we were hanging around until Christmas
Across the easements—we were
So easily hung up—mouthless—song-bird less,
And I swore that you could not describe
My last monument towards you:
But the way to you turned out to be in echoes
And skateboards while the alley cats
Were cleaning their mouths of fried chicken and other
Uncertain forget-me-nots—
Dastardly awakening upon the frontier between here
And Mexico,
And why won't you awaken—muse with my better
Parts and brown, brown shoulders,
But now it is too late: the men you know
Are already playing golf and it is almost Christmas
And this is the way they sing,
Song birds in the body parts taking their own
Orchestras for themselves: because I don't want to Fall asleep—to go forever into the bedrooms
I cannot afford,
And some enlightened hemisphere slips over
The graveyards and the children, once again,
Are arisen over the forlorn places where they were Qualified to have persevered.

Robert Rorabeck

Personifies

I will not see Diana tomorrow.
What I'll do is travel straight across this Peninsula fat and strung off of shell-fish,
Leaping with my young family to see a
Great uncle,
A father figure who's good at tennis:
In the moribund sport of trailer parks,
The sea in its unending spume of caged sparrows;
Then I will think of Sharon,
Her world a music box in Colorado, turning snowflakes
As delicate of souls,
Making real movies:
Then I will think of Sharon and the make-believe of Her daughter
As we pass so many billboards and alligators, both of Those species, selling the same thing to the eyes,
Products of peace and sanctuary,
Gifts of a dying body to feed and nourish the animalistic
Deity, like a fuguing trumpet
My muse of open spaces and ice covered slides
Personifies.

Robert Rorabeck

Perspective

Learning the imperfections of my desire:
I go again, the weapon of a game in my hands- taking swings with Regression- taking words as they come like Raindrops, savage tears, vanishing children on milk cartons that
The hypnotized glass blowers over use:
Drunken, and carrying on over each new succession of the perfectly bluing
Hills, so that by morning they have new marriages
And new children;
And they step outside into the tiny front yard where all of the out of Work kidnappers are having a street festival:
And the overeager serpent is up in his citrus tree, curled there and talking
To whatever pretty girls still survive who have yet to taste him;
But traveling around still further, past the diminutive slayings
The dogs have overdone to the rabbits in the echinopsis of the rock
Gardens over night: and there to the grottos of the car port,
Where whatever goddess that was always promised is still there, like
The sweet nectar of oasis bare breasted behind the electric semen of A naked extension chord, practicing a housewife's pieta before the Washing machine,
As the conquistadors who havent yet eaten themselves lay around like Cenotaphs and spent bottle rockets in the backyard, adding perspective
To her beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

Pestilent Orchard

Outside, fishtailed palms
Exaggerate the wind which has come from Underneath the overpass:
And down in Miami, my parents are Selling Christmas trees-
My father is not talking to me,
A coward-
As the conquistadors christen the strata
Into which they remain anonymous
Landmarks-
As she swims away, an entire fair of my Heart,
Pulsing like a brown jelly-fish:
She will go into the many nights of her
Family,
And return even more assured- just
The flirtations of nonsense over the graveyards
And the churches that I busy with her
Uneven promises-
Lines on my wrist casting out fortunes-
Another night spent alone,
And my skeleton a pestilent orchard into which Sleepwalks her unicorns.

Robert Rorabeck

Pet Cemetery

My dog will never see
Death, nor know him
When he comes,

But death will own
My dog,
And his master,
Upon whom that scent even Now buds

Like wet copper exposed to
The sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Peter Redgrove

While I am here another poem,
A crapshoot at eternity, a roll of dice,
I carve my name into the auburn sky:
This is my tourism, my saccharine hobby,
Like an infant masturbating, the pseudepigripha
In full bloom, she wished to take me by
The hand to the football game where the Fantasy of her lovers waited toothily,
But I hid away in the rain and recorded the sounds
Of under aged ghosts pattering on the infinite Linoleums of suburbia. Should I go back to School to stem the tide of fading away?
Or should I just walk to the east until I
Begin swimming, this is the dilemma, and the reason why
I cannot meet her gaze. I remember the first Time she showed me her c&nt unshaven in the High school of her incensed bedroom, and the Waves of another feeling, the fieldtrips of Presupposed sex: we share the same birthday,
But now she is married to the tribe of her own flesh,
Insularly, hymned- On weekends they shoot off
To Disney World, admire the lavender alligators
And watch how Cinderella is kidnapped, abused,
Their farts a curtain cadence: he stops to buy
Roadside fireworks, she thinks of me, she guesses,
But I am not even good enough for this,
I can't even recall what it was, little more than an Easy trick so early in the morning I was
The only one that was up.

Robert Rorabeck

Philosophy Of The Motionless Tribute Band

Too old to care now what lays just over those hills.
I used to go out all the time and dream of you,
And walk up her curls like a fairy-tale-
I wanted to take you there, even while you were all pearly
In your bars.
Sometimes, the rain fronts must have reached us twice,
And the same cars, sunny-day tourists on their way to visit
Grandmother at Disney World;
But eventually I have to move on. Even dogs die after A few years, and I love them;
Its time to take down the lights of my tribute band,
And stop dying my hair: Even Arthur Rimbaud lost his Leg when he couldn't find anything else to sell.
And the bouquets I sent a decade ago must have wilted by now.
We were born into similar cornfields, but you didn't care:
All you had to say is that our seasons didn't swing together,
And you pouted for other boys in all those photographs:
You don't have to remind me that I'm not there. And yet,
Stephen King recommends writing four to six hours a day;
And the miracle is I'm doing that- Sometimes still using you like
A crutch, I never go outside and practice on windmills,
But I'm still here taking my little turns, making a usual little sister
Out of your frightened soul: And the playground is open under The moon in full swing, so I have no reason to move.

Robert Rorabeck

Phoenix

When I saw you after several years,
You were the young motion of a god learning
To walk for the first time, as the cars blew by you,
And how many thirsty boys the same as me did not Turn your way, their visions focusing from the blur,
The eyelids hooked on that form you had taken to Showoff how delightfully you could shape the flesh, but it was Only I who knew you for what you were, and loved
You for it, for I could remember coming to find you
Before I was born, in those first lives where my soul
Found itself suited in ancestors, I saw you there serving Drinks before they invented electricity, you went Well with kerosene lamps hissing with the taste
Of vinegar on the tongue and the sprawling lawless towns
Of the prairie, where you were the only decoration,
Too delicate to touch, you somehow survived outside
In the wind on the yellow grass, all of that which was Part of you spread out unto the roots of mountains,
Which were yours as well, and so to recognize you
Now, and to see the sway of every sea in your hips, you Could wonder how I could just drive on by as you Jogged the other way, taking everything beautiful, but read this now for that was Near a decade ago and still the vision remains, behind
It all is all I see, you there, a fine young god moving
For the first time in that decoration of flesh, now speared
Like a blazing sun in back of my eyes never to burn out,
So that when this too dies, those of my offspring sure to Remember will see you for what you are, an eternal thing
Meant to flit and leap your beauty through their windshields
So that they too feel the familiar longing you've brought down through their ancestry, thus what you are remains always as you pass them by.

Robert Rorabeck

Picasso's Pugalist

All I can really say is that my new face
Looks like Picasso got punched,
And that's okay: a little crooked, like President
D$ck, unsymmetrical, but big,
Like Dolly Parton's tits- Some things which Are real: speedy motorcycle, hearse's right-of-Way, sea-shanties which stormy areolas mermaid:
The phone rings from another planet,
Or demoted Pluto- I think its just you, but it never Is: Solicitors, tax collectors, sisters.... Rivers
Run to the sea, but that is not where you can find me,
So for very long I've been reading naked in the igneous
Rockslides of her undraped back, crooning-
Video games say I'm overweight, but they're stupid,
As the hands arrest empty Michigan, your groom's
Flannel tuxedo accordions- When you didn't answer,
As you can see, it was a Holocaust, a default,
The bankruptcy of a favorite super center- The trick
Lady's overweight shoulders shrug, and we light off
Fireworks: Semis honked, this is the great America stretching Its independence until it wakes up in the morning;
Then I pantomime questions I wish to ask you, as my dogs
Begin the jumping games of amnesiac foxes,
And from bashful angles my face stares back at me like
An unsymmetrical mansion, something I grew up into,
A tire swing's ellipse into the arcade of branches,
I hold up to show everybody as they try to guess who it is.

Robert Rorabeck

Picking Time

Pools of accordions, and other young wind instruments:
If I'd died young, I'd never have written this underneath the softly
Pleasing penumbras of the wingspans of airplanes
Even as they slipped away,
Like the sluicing rabbits through the vines, and like their Very four legged souls through my very four legged mine:
I have seen her there in the morning like a cenotaph for a wave
Who was breaking against the rose bushes of the fort for the First and the last time:
And this was her journey, and her beauty, while she finally laid Down in bed with him, for the first and the last time:
And her name was Alma, a muse, a candle lit for a saint in A lactating grotto deep inside the inebriated amusement parking
Of my picking time.

Robert Rorabeck

Pickpocket

Pool and cuddle in the amalgam of Centipedes,
Which is the same as seeing a fire's orgasm
With the sky so alarmed that it removes
Its curtains,
Compromising the sunbathing maidens of an inkless
Justice,
As the mountains arise over the prostrate Samurai
And nudge the burred chins of the gypsy angels
And the homeless men are taking the ski-lifts up from The wigwams of the dancing chicken,
Filibustering the Christmas tree lights of an irreverent police. Nothing is Made secure;
Our hands out for alms; but we are very rich:
In fact those are our yachts over and across the sea,
A sea of men who you so casually fish.

Robert Rorabeck

Pickup Lines And Lipstick

Sometimes while delivering pizzas in Gainesville, random girls would ask me
To pick them up and take them with me
Dressed up to go dancing with Men they did not know- this, they said,
Was their best chance to find a husband
Who would love them and drive them
Places for the rest of their lives.

I told them to hop in and then I drove Off campus with them. They sometimes
Would tell me they weren't wearing any Panties, and then they would ask for a
Slice of pizza, please,

I never argued,

And, applying my foot to the gas,

All I needed was a pair of frosted

Shades and a hard on

And I was a NASCAR driver

Making my qualifying loops around

The college,

Where women came out of their

Apartments wearing nothing but their

Pickup lines

And lipstick.

Robert Rorabeck

Pie For Breakfast

Beauty is the pinholes through a forest
The trucks of families drive around, lost children
In them never figuring on the conflagrations
Of the heavens: they are going to the amusement
Parks beside the sea,
Beside the fort of roses where the nameless working
Girls get buried,
And the hillsides of pinwheels turn their heads
Trying to kiss the butterflies who echo down
From airplanes: they seem to dance a zoetrope
Of yellow horses,
And the sun milks them, and gives them buttercups
As lovers to kiss and attend,
As the tourists return back to their homes-
And you languish in the brown apertures
That open up revealing your children
And a line of would be lovers holding in their Hands what they hope to be enough tokens
To kiss you and to feed you pie for breakfast.

Robert Rorabeck

Pigmentation Of The Shadows

Pigmentation of the shadows,
But there isn't any other way to start out
If you are any other tadpole on a journey—
And all of the dry fields cannot be counted,
As my very own parents send me on adventures,
Licenses for fireworks and for Christmas trees—
It isn't very beautiful, having to look at my Own self in the mirror,
As they sell their very own beauty to the racehorses—
As the daylight comes up over the battleships of
The pacific theatre—
And there happens to be a joy remembered by
The boy scouts that shot off roman candles towards A jubilee of the zeppelins—
Until it really happened, and someone else had become The victor, and the flowers bloomed for the Movie theatres,
And the boys played with themselves far into
The midnights of the bedrooms of their very own Toys.

Robert Rorabeck

Piling Up Their Roses

Thirty three years to divide all of this stuff:
Burning up the newspaper of my open wrists and armpits
To keep warm,
Or to be recognized by the mermaids all curling in their Pits,
While I've made them underneath the overpasses:
And, recognizing their perfumes,
I call them all up from the over priced rhymes of orange
Fields,
And undress them into baseball diamonds- while my Mind is gone,
And the field is not blue- the field is not blue,
Because my muse is being turned out by another man,
And all of this is the day gone Shakespeare out on double Display in the dime store courts of another man's Ferris wheel:
And there she goes, and there she comes again,
Taking off her cloths, and putting them on again, and yet
Singing so sweetly, as the world slips around my ears,
Taking off her clothes again, unbudding her roses,
And swearing up the streets that the airplanes wish they Were stamping
That she will be around again, only so that her gardens will Finally have to lay off of her long hallucinations
And have to take final rest in the long and glazed fields,
Where the butterflies were superimposing- if only if because They are always lighter than air, and only if because
That was always what they hoped they would one day asked
To be changed into,
While from them the days turned on, piling up their roses,
And giving up their wishes even to the wishes that never was.

Robert Rorabeck

Pillaging Airplanes For Stewardesses

Upping the revelations-
Cypress trees who are like my sisters getting out
Of their bath of everglades;
They call up to their sisters, stewardesses
Leaping in airplanes after their john does:
Diademed with
Red echinopsis and katydids- their nipples
Bristle- like banshees all Around Disney World,
While the alligators wait forever- they've been Doing the same thing forever,
As the panthers keep eyeing the key-deer,
And the tourists drive through the smoke and Ash- soon, they will be home
And emptying their refrigerators: but I will Be here, keeping time out of Doors-
And once my beanstalk grows, I will climb it
Up to you,
And I will sleep on your roof, and I will stand
Eye to eye with helicopters-
And when I want to come down, I will use
My roman candles as flairs against Your windows,
Insisting in my holidays, that you let me
Into your bedroom to make love while the giant
Is out pillaging airplanes for stewardesses.

Robert Rorabeck

Pilots For Christmas

The champions sang their songs whilst I was sleep
Or, rather,
They laid down and made love in the carport underneath
The ceiling fan and the other bothers
Of paper airplanes and tangerine spores:
And whatever art there was about me forgot itself and Settled down to watch racecars
Going around one specific scar of the earth like hula-hoops—
As the cowboys looked brazenly under the skirts of A barbwire waitress who had come down from
The gaslight only the night before—
Metamorphosed from a stewardess while the planes
Leapt into a blue and weeping sky—
And the children tucked themselves in for Christmas
While their fathers, all pilots,
Were forever so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Pink Lemonade

I put down these last words
Like a street vendor selling sacks of Oranges in Miami, out on the Granite rivers where I have seen her hips sway,
And wished that she might know my name,
So that I might be invited over to her house
In the drowsy hours of a humid afternoon,
Fix an easy lunch of white bread and bologna,
To lie and sweat out in the green
Swath of her backyard, to let my fingers stretch
Across the pink tongues of lawn chairs,
To touch her thigh and feel it quiver,
To dab the mustard seed from the creases of lipstick,
Such a lackadaisical utopia without periodicals,
Our mouths closed, her eyes hidden by cheap
Sunglasses, but the meaning lucidly sweated,
As the waves perpetuate daylight prisms,
To go down easy knowing all the definitions,
The tributaries by which she might be reached,
And then let go again, released to become the alluringly anonymous woman walking Through the sultry arches where the concrete falls like the architecture
Of urban playwrights, where blinding shadows echo that Precision geometry's noir, and yet her body flows just like
An orchard, and the tiny white buds which perfumed
Against the surreptitious press of my tongue,
Between sips of pink-lemonade, and other things.

Robert Rorabeck

Pinpointing Our Souls' Heady Altitude

Broken records of balmy amnesia-
Everyday reading like a farmer's almanac in A cloister of Sundays;
The socking meat has vacated the oysters,
And esplanades are f&cking rich with sand.
My life proceeds with no moisture,
No feminine hand in my hand, no line to drop
Anchor-
Fading, enchained by bothersome amusement,
I petition for a look into your eyes,
For a dream, to feel wonder and real merriment,
To be a ripple in your lake,
To be the solitary moon joined by a captured
Satellite,
And to look coincidentally with you, past the rushing
Sanctions of commodity,
The traffic repeating into unsatisfying homes,
And see those very apexes brushed in the reflecting
Light of another sea on the other side of the world,
As if our eyes were reflecting through a corridor in A lake,
Pinpointing our souls' heady altitude.

Robert Rorabeck

Pinwheels Circumnavigating The Earth

Featurette of butterflies across the canal-
Or in the effervescing playgrounds where
My parents left me-
To piss my pants, as my very first sister
Cried for me:
Not very far from where my vanishing muse
Lives now,
Just like an extinguishing candle on her
Birthday,
Just as she will die for him a thousand times
As the serpent strikes up at the Sky- unlucky-
And I will vanish, myself chasing my muse
Around the rock garden my parents
Never proceeded to have corrected:
Alma- Alma- isn't this your last song,
And what do you know of Mexico now, anyways-
While I've just tried to love you like a vanishing
Thought through the poisonous midway
That sees me out dying in the graveyard
Over which all of the airplanes fly and the
The bicycles vanish-
As I've loved you into the rest stops of all of These skeletons, perfuming their favorite graveyards-
In the bones of their particular amusements-
Blooming, as the alligator yawns,
But never grows young, as all of my old muses
Faint for themselves in the make-believe confections
Over the migrations of their earliest Sororities- so the day sweats off its fireworks of Its sweetest confections-
And pinwheels circumnavigate the earth over
The cherished neighborhoods where, like plum trees,
The memories of your buttery lips
Still seem to perplex the heavenly furrows soldiering
My lost friends again into the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Place For My Shoulders

I want a place for my shoulders—a home beside the carport,
And a Pieta when it rains and all of the horny toads come in from
The rain forests and congregate across the cinderblocks
That are painted blue—
And there is a statue there of my mother—or somewhere
Nearby, my father is setting up a tent and selling fireworks
Or he is selling Christmas trees—
Beneath the dinner table of those opulent pornographies,
We have already gone through so many extinctions—
Now time skips us across the sea, not knowing that we Are just a baseball team out back of some innocuous high school—
And forgetting that she is already falling out of love
With a man she has a hard time remember,
Inaugurating the process that she will begin forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Places You've Never Believed To Look

Morning of heirlooms
Waiting for Diana to come on her bus,
Roller-skating the aisle,
Enough for the both of us;
To take me off to work or school,
While the airplanes blast off the golden rule-
Or I can play hooky and sleep with the Cowardly lions,
I can go places you've never believed to look.
There are naturally occurring crèches down in
The soft pits of wayward cypress,
With the broken hearted doves and their Lovely cormorants;
Don't you know strange girl, bartender,
I can go there or to class, but it doesn't matter
Anyway- I am always thinking of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Plagiarism And Sunlight And Stars

Eon is your number as it flies over a wing of a hummingbird that remains
In her bedrooms:
After all of the heavens come alight with gasoline spilled over the fireworks:
And their wombs are alighted by all of
That pretty stuff, until all of the cars park and are enamored
And so make love:
And the sea gives a wave, as if saying goodbye to ancestors or Lovers,
And she says it's okay to strike a match off of her—and then she is Going—going: yes, she is a pretty bird,
And then she is all thumbs,
And we cannot despise her—she is a rhythm in the thoraxes of the Trees,
And then she is almost married,
And then she says the pledges of allegiance, and then
The phone rings—
And I touch our lips underneath some Christmas of some mountain—
With the snow coming down,
And our dogs are kissing foxes—and the rest of it is
Plagiarism and sunlight and stars....

Robert Rorabeck

Plagiarisms Of The Sunlight

Plagiarisms of the sunlight happen every day,
As we get up and go
To our classrooms just to look at the Girls who tell us about the weather—
When, outside, it is the Real men who get to enjoy that,
And the bums underneath the overpass,
Licking the foam off beers
And staring at the tortoises that bask with
Them,
While we stand and yawn to the pledge of Allegiance
And the songs canter like the sun around the Earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Plagiarized With Incest And Cannibalism

Pretty words for flowers
Lost at the fingertips of an idiot:
Words for flowers
Repeated to fire-trucks, but they Don't care:
Words for sea- and the waves the answer
Them:
Flea markets above the ground, underneath
The overpass,
Thoughts of rain and sunlight,
And stolen bicycles- the day comes to the earth
In its ellipses, figuring out itself,
Traveling through its preordained mishaps:
And something about its death is beautiful,
And even more so when it is forgotten:
On this day of trailer parks when the swing-sets
Are taken down,
And her lips are buried into pillows:
The roses have died- the children are with the Rattlesnakes: her man has left town,
And road winds around, dirty and plagiarized with Incest and cannibalism.

Robert Rorabeck

Planet Of Oxygen

Without my neighbors,
I will die in a planet of oxygen,
Falling down from the mountains into Silver
City, like an immaculate surgical cut
In New Mexico,
Where the freighters move like lonely echoes
Across the drowsy country, our America.
Off the road, strippers swim in their lucrative Aquariums, in the forgiving lights where Folded dollar bills smell like flowers,
Lap dances the races of love-
They go home to sleep in a tin garden of Fermented trailers,
Preserved beneath the wizardry of heaven,
Where helicopters take up like dizzy birds,
And grandmothers in nickel make-up
Wake up early in the evening to go serve black Coffee at the truck stop, like a thick and Greasy estuary dug by crocodiles for their brides
From the translucent speeding highway,
The dry-throated Amazon, where newlyweds with Blond hair and freckles scream and laugh out their Windows,
Clasp cigarettes like freedom which is quickly ashes,
The red lights moving away, a flowering of hibiscus
And their floral cadavers- Each light leads to somewhere
Lonely, and homes trickle outward like thirsty tributaries:
Spilling down from the mountain, this cemetery-
And the walking, talking bones blundering unaware In thick veils of time-capsule oxygen, the nights and Her music blow so softly that we are fretted,
Blow so softly that the buses move like bloodhounds
Searching for her from New York to San Francisco,
Blow her saintly sadness between the Atlantic and Pacific,
As if we had found her and now ride in her bosom,
But the planet of oxygen is not sure that she loves us,
For in any number of her rooms, with our body's walking
Ceaseless, there we have found exchanges only sadness.

Planets Of Our Earth

I am scarred: I eat penny candy, just as I would Have eaten your cunt;
My grandmother doesn't give a lick about me, but she Gives a lick about her seven runts;
And this isn't a novel, of course: This isn't your novel,
Your lucky number, or nimble horse:
This is my new Sabbath on another night of my discombobulated
Intercourse:
This is just how I drown everything I've ever had into the Anonymous canal;
This is just how I get the liquor out and make friends with Shadows:
Shadows, or cats name Shadow, or Lucifer, or so much worse;
Oh, If I had only been Mark Twain or some other well spoken
Jerk,
I fear you would have given me something more than one French
Kiss:
Something more than this, Kelly, knowing that I have loved you
For as long as fifth grade, and if I had more balls, I'd made out with You in the shade of a Catholic church,
Or something worse; but you have given me names to remember:
To remember; and you should always remember,
Remember, Kelly, that while we went up to Washington DC together
Like a snowbell in line to be wed, that I had always loved you then, and I will love you still,
While the nights flicker on and off: until my very soul is the ash
Of a defused light bulb: yes, Kelly: yes- I am no charlatan:
Though recluse, I will love you still, Kelly: even while my Father's horses pummel their valley of scuppernongs, Kelly:
O, I will love you until death, Kelly; and O,
Kelly, long afterwards: long after your body cannot figure:
I will love you then, even while the heavens make unto them new Planets of our earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Plastic Bourgeoisie

The doctor spanked me from my mother's Womb and handing me over to her said,
"Here he is, " and she held me and cooed
And said my name, which was the best news
I had heard up until then:
And my first word was goat,
While my first lover's word was hot,
But she left me six years ago to marry a Jewish Lawyer in South Florida;
And now I think it not inappropriate to say,
That my word was better,
And that, considering the magnetic dictations
Of her routine Diaspora, that what became of her: a
Paralegal with a hyphenated last name,
With a sports utility vehicle
And a ways to go, savage irony:
Like the name of a hair band, her parents condemned
Her to a lifetime of dinner conversations at seemingly Upscale restaurant chains, and on special occasions
Places that require a dress-code,
And light conversation without scars:
The daffodils above her head are plastic, like the Mezuzah hung in the doorway in place of a Catholic
Cross: But she is not without guilt, doing her Casual betrayals, and paying for Chinese with Her thirty pieces of silver on Christmas:
When, even on informal holidays, she might see me slipping
In and out of the caesuras with my bawdy mermaid,
Drinking to my dysfunctions with cheap rum:
I had lost my way, but remembering the name
My mother had given to me, the guttural Ango-
Saxon: goat, as in,
Robert saw the goat out in the fields of Michigan,
And felt happy,
Kindled such individual faith that she should never know,
And I keep from her when she is even far away and not looking,
My first word grazing out in the frozen fields of upper peninsulas,
So that I should never have to experience again,
That easier language she has used to regale herself even while

She burns her hand.

Robert Rorabeck

Plastic Cowboys

Now the teams have numbers and plastic
Cowboys carefully settled with their gun hipped Atop the terrapin;
And toy boats sitting around my aunts undeveloped
Breasts in the bathtub before my yet living grandmother
Yelled at both of us to get out:
That aunts and nephews should no longer play that Way at eight or seventeen;
But we hadn't realized we were going to die,
And had only been rumored of Adam and Eve:
The earth was sleeping in its furrows in utopias of ants:
And we could grow larger together by exploring each others
Pants,
But nothing matters know but slipping into the city,
The city of aliens and strangers, and the barges with their Boxes of fireworks which couldn't be anymore real,
That still slip empirically like sleeves of velveteed concrete
Under the low hanging bridges and the sheriff badges of stars
Annoying all the valiant people who are still Trying to kill themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

Plastic Flowers

Little broken birds with broken
Wings
Never to return to homes
Or arks—
They fall right here,
At the feet of leopards
And pizza parlors
And other places
I would prefer to live:
After my second child is born
And I have shaken all of the remnants of Muses out of my head—
And then, in the perfect anonymity of Used book stores
I can grow a beard or, stepping outside,
Show my scars to the moon—
At least, nearing the end,
I will be with my imperfect wife
In the bosoms of mountains—
The muses I began with—
In the snows—
And I will languish in anonymity
That was clan destined,
Tossed towards the lakes like the Pornography of a rusted chassis—
Like the uneaten rind of
A cherry pie—
I will languish with the half feral
Dogs and the floppy discs—
And somehow, in the middle of the Night, we will take on an adventure game,
While the alligators bask in the Glow of the canals
Of the tropical amusement parks
And zoos
Where only my dayglow shadows remain—
And I will make my peace from the tippy-top
Of the conifers—
From there I will sniff up the skirts

Of stewardesses
And I will hang on for the ride,
Hoping that she comes down the chimney in
Time for chistmas—
And even if she is mythological,
Hoping that she at least buried some diggable
Arrowheads
Around the circumference of my perimeters
So at least I will not have to steal the plastics flowers
From atop of her make-believe grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Plastic Roses

Primitive candle glowing like
Rum in my head—like one last wishy-washy
Dream
Abed in a trailer park of cathedrals
And you can walk down from
There—
Down from the white trash basins that sing of
The sweat of cousins,
And collect their tears,
Like panhandling doves: you can follow
The medians with the migrating bears—
And you can set out on a quest
To the flea markets of the gossip towns:
It all lays waiting for you
At the very end as the same day we supposed—
Lying down together in a graveyard of Plastic roses—
Cadavers taking another shot,
Stewardesses doing another round.

Robert Rorabeck

Plate Tectonics

They passed away this time with the Nearing of Spring; there were no more
Undiscovered lovers sleeping in the grottos,
In the fault-lines of continents,
And the dictionaries carried like
Newborns in the wisest of hands
No longer held the slightest of meaning,
And even hummingbirds were too big to understand,
Where they lay suspended,
Motionless above the wilted lips of consciousness;

For here everything was clearly mapped,
Raped by the cartographers and put out on the streets,
The war was settled and the dominate race had won,
Now busy fucking new buildings miraculously
Into being along great highways where Young children shot out of the Thighs of sexy automobiles, and
The face of God on every billboard as the Families caravanned to see the undead wonders of Disney Land, down 75 where alligators lay nude in
The shadows, waiting for sunlight for miles around

The Father and Son selling sports cars with Full color ads in Bibles, and their smiles toothpaste,
With the asphalt charisma that entombed the naiads
In the sea; they would all get laid out back on
The dirty straw beside the camels and wise-men
When their shifts ended and the plates of the earth
Moved ever so slightly, making little protest.

Robert Rorabeck

Plated Upon Another Day

Palmettos panting in the frosty glade
Easter eggs lying where they were laid, and the sun
Going up and mollifying the earth like
A stone
The pantries being raided while the heroes are Un home
And the bold earth is lying with the yard
The dogs are basking in the perfumes of the spirits
Acquainted with the tulips
It seems as if each four legged creature is in love,
And it is not hard to find them out
In the open
Believing that they are free to leap through the keyholes
Into their latchkey homes
While the sugar canes burn across the canal
And the lions wait yawning their yellows across the Concrete, like eggs running waiting for their Breakfast to be plated upon another day

Robert Rorabeck

Plathe Isn'T Free Anymore

Neon stars are open in the sky,
Advertising for aces and high flyers
While I lick my finger
And try to psych myself up for another poem:
I haven't been able to look at myself outside
Anymore;
It has been so long since I've tasted a woman's Lips who didn't appear invisible
Swinging from the boughs of the orange tree
In my backyard-
The alligators slip in,
Passengers sleep just under the surface of
The canal,
And the girl I don't know anymore goes along
Her way- She watches the men proceed,
But I don't want to live here anymore,
Because they say that poets are unattractive,
And look at me,
And the words they form, misappropriated glass
Returned to the kiln's glowing womb,
Birds shot from the sky and stuttering in the Grass, waiting for the mastiff's jaws
As the cars drive by such busy aphorisms of another
Keen season,
And I write to them like dressing up for a celebration
And the clouds move in and stomp their feet to Get off the weather,
And the swing sets creak like old silver over my shoulder,
The dullness of linear professors
Floats over the lake, while the ghosts of little children
Snag their trousers on the little white cenotaph;
It is cold out here,
But through the window I can see her voluptuous tulips
Blowing up balloons,
Laughing, slapping her knee and taking a moment
To bend down to kiss him,
Watching cartoons.

Playground Of Voluptuous Catastrophes

Churches and playgrounds where
The kind hearts recede—
And the lilac airplanes can be seen doing anything to
The purple hemisphere—
Just like arrows fleeing Valentine's Day—and Other echoes
Called from the tulips of housewives—
There they are on their verandas imaging that they could Be making love with the Mailman or the milkman—until he comes, and he looks away—
They go back the mirages in the grottos of their Kitchens—the evolutions of their destiny—
They keep trying to remember the schools they attended
And the boys they loved—
But their thoughts keep eluding me—as I write to them
And it rains—a figment of my imagination in a
Playground of voluptuous catastrophes.

Robert Rorabeck

Playgrounds Of A Lesser Sky

Liquor of her pearl-brown shoulders, and all of
The night the moon: I think, who does she make love
To now,
As the trailer parks sway underneath the cinders-
The evaporations of the sky that have eyes like alligators;
And they remember their pasts, the short lives
Of dogs, or the easy tricks I brought upon her, moving
Religiously in my cars:
The dolphins swam out in the intercostals just so the Tourists would have something to look forward
To while eating their lunch,
But afterwards they would have to again reveal themselves
To their children getting home at the same time,
Wishing they were cicadas so that they could lose themselves,
Accumulating on the shoulder blades of cypress
Like the busts of heedless royalty, or the pitiful words like
These said to a muse that no longer reads the fire signals
Jumping up to the airplanes mark their territory in the prodigious
Playgrounds of a lesser sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Playgrounds That Cannot Breathe

Coveting your heart- where it does now
Beat,
Across the train tracks and inside another theatre:
Tomorrow your son will even be Another year old,
And I'll still be drowning in a wishing well
Through the lugubrious moonlight outside of Another lilac church,
Licking my wounds through the cavalier
Memories of you-
As you go, and become lost, dancing with the fairies
Who would not dare mock the carelessness of Your heart- And I go that way too,
Some kind of shadow burned off the souls of Your moving feet- as there seems to be another of Your banners in the air-
As the foxes leap for the nuptials of airplanes in the Playgrounds that cannot breathe.

Robert Rorabeck

Playing Across The Playground Of Heartbroken Memory

My legs are cold from drinking slow sips.
Again, I am upon the mountain in a wicked tent,
Slanting as if something trying to affect poetry,
Curious,
Looking at your sunburst eyes- Mascara the sundogs
Leaping very pagan and scarlet:
I lick and bite my lips trying to achieve the profound,
Trying to capture you abstractly, like running my fingers
Under the quicksilver fuselage of an airplane leaping Low- Trying that foreplay in the ambers and Precious natures of these burning woods, to have you in A quiet though compromising manner unlike any other Man might yet think of having you: all the stags
Juicily horned acquiring their leggy herds, trying to gather together
A bus of entire housewives,
But I would rather select you alone with all your pageantry of Sad fashions, even though I am not so spectacular
To see the entire depths of your verdant nature. Even now
You are answering but just as softly as raindrops in a Woodland bathtub; because you are already obligated to A better harem, sashaying into the resins and ash left over
After the business of firemen, but I would rather stand around
In these fickle emolliations to catch one pestilent whiff
Of your complete corruption, for in that bouquet of rich
Compromises remains the essence of a cadaver of innocence
Playing across the playground of heartbroken memory.

Robert Rorabeck

Playing Football In My Graveyard

Perfect on my imperfection, you fall:
I close my eyes but you are real, traveling
Effortlessly up your hills and then
Down,
Basking all the dogs, and their stones so
Round;
And I've made up these words to disavow you,
But you are not something I can take out to eat;
So you are real,
And I lie the last of my bouquets at your feet;
And my parents are so lonely after your passing;
It's as if you've taken the last airplane,
But my grandmother lies unweeping the kinder
Weathers of her kind:
They are the kind that used to know you, but
Will know you no more,
And they are all the kind that I've been waiting for;
And you slip over my head like a child in A dress;
And you go over the sea, and the women in their Cars:
You go so far as to come around again
To watch me playing football in my graveyard.

Robert Rorabeck

Playtime Amnesia

Choose me for the bedroom of your play
And I will trim the fat and lackadaisical.
I will even stop entirely thinking of other girls,
Curled and crenulated on their other swing-sets,
In their other states give over to other sunsets,
In their sweet unadulterated time and nostalgic
Truancies:
Give me to the foreplay of your wound,
And I will stop believing in death: I will write Screen plays of your mammalian garden, and grow
Folk-tales for you;
And with great cunning how to leap up and procure
Those lips of yours, like a stream of radiant custard:
I am not putting you on; I will become both less Despotic and more responsible. I will even flirt with Other girls to garner your attentions,
And I won't have a need anymore for graveyards and their Ashy roe:
Oh, I'll love you coming forward on my bicycle and I'll do some tricks, all my silver spokes hypnotizing in Siamese spiral: It may be true that there are better man for
You,
But for me you are the endearing apocryphal scripture,
And I am drunk again and laying low- gut shot and bleeding
Plasticine fighting men who all say your name in great argument;
And the tiny city shifts with the science of bleeding playthings;
And isn't it a shame, that I am so abashed that, dying
Repeatedly like little boys and their make-believe suicide,
I can't even once remember your name....

Robert Rorabeck

Pleasant Words For Lovers

Pleasant words for lovers in espionage
Thought out as the spines of flowers trapped in The teeth of dancing foxes who are Just learning the first words of a bucolic country
Of windmill hazards- they go down dancing
On their hind legs, their fur feeling all the motions
Of last night's jasmine- will they enter the barn
And find her like a milk made weeping in the Hay's pincushions- will they steal her from her
Knights who were meant to be so glorious
Who have all ridden away to be cannibalized by Witches in their flying chicken-legged huts:
Yes, he will whisper to them with sharp teeth itching
Of the vineyard, and he will lasso them in his Forested patina, and brandish along their sides
The hungry kisses he laps them with, until their Milk is as blooded as when my lips are with thine.

Robert Rorabeck

Pleasurable Excuse

I lick my lips for something liquor,
For coming on to midnight I've been reading
My poems;
And maybe after midnight, I'll be masturbating:
Both with sweaty palms:
They're really the same thing, both about a girl
I haven't read about,
And she's really the same thing as heaven who is
The twin sister of Hell:
And tomorrow, I've cleared my schedule to Go hike the mountain with my mother:
My mother who cannot move, whose womb has Become the whole d%omn thing:
The roof, the stars, the chicken wire, the valley or
The sea;
I will see wildflowers, but I will not pick them;
And airplanes like shooting vestibules with stewardesses
And their legs; but I will not see them:
I can only imagine: Women who become water,
Drink; women who become trees and foliage and Vegetation: eat and rest under,
And mow their yard and make their lips hum with the New found pleasures of air-condition;
And go down to South Florida and dropp in, and make Love to them; and I make myself these promises so until Midnight; and I read my poems and masturbate,
Which are really the same thing: and I don't ever tell
My mother about the art or the pleasure I cannot excuse.

Robert Rorabeck

Pleasure

I like trying to smell your body.
You don't know what joy I have just sitting beside you on A rock:
I can barely even look at myself all day,
But I can look at you looking away over the yachts,
Flinging yourself over the sea:
I am sorry I am not good with words like the baseball games
Of your husband;
And if we first made love, I am sure I would tremulate like
A thrush stuck out in the cold trying to get warm
In your naked branches,
Like small children with numbed fingers trying to hide all
Of their valuables in the orchid-like hollow
Under the navel of your vineyard;
And I know if I see you again out in the super-fine
Resin, like another tourist out yarding with you in the Clothing of yellow pinafores of this daylight, I might have
The hardest time communicating to you
Like the blindest man in the softest night; If you helped me along
I would eventually find your way and I am abundantly sure
That you would see me and it would pleasure me so to pleasure
You in a way I am sure you have never seen before.

Robert Rorabeck

Pleasure Haiku

One hundred thousand
Bucks just to give you or-
Al pleasure just once.

Robert Rorabeck

Pledging Allegiances To The Day

I am the catalytic and amplified
Thug of cold ennui;
What am I doing here
But looking with the cat into
The goldfish's bowl
While another housewife
Has escaped down the cinderblocks and
Out of her room; but where is she going
But across the canal,
Kissing the otters and the bicycles
Lips along the way
To feel another cold brush
With reason
As the airplanes fly marbling planes
In the make-believe
As all of the high schools open once again
Like nocturnal flowers finally pledging allegiances
To the day.

Robert Rorabeck

Plenitude Of Goodbyes

She will go with him, and the day is long:
Old and preaching and drinking liquor, they will mine for gold:
The airplanes will settle down and make love in the trees,
The sun will set and the sun will rise,
And eventually they will exit together, kissing and singing
A plenitude of goodbyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Plenty Enough For Everyone

I wake up from Saint Louis with news scars on My lap,
And errors waiting for the page:
I wake up closer to noon than I ever done,
And I feel like a Hindu in need of a kite,
And the yard is Long and falling away from here,
Falling into a graveyard before it turns:
It never gets finished,
This is all it does and there are lonely and Jealous Mexicans always mowing it,
Because all the Guatemalans have to do is feed the Birds who drink from the marble vases,
Who crown the steaming heads of the rich,
White dead;
And there are so many of them, resting yet pensive,
But for no reason, because they are all quite affordably
Out of work,
And the sky is a mall above them where great jealous
Woman-like entities fart and tinkle,
They create the honey-suckle weathers which enrage
The nostrils of the day laborers,
But there is really no reason for anymore jealousy,
Because school is over, and everything is still falling,
And there is plenty enough for everyone.

Robert Rorabeck

Plush And Soft Kingdoms

Suddenly my cliffs arise with the necessity for Breaking the sound barriers,
While the cars park and stare, and the wine I have Been drinking is from the deserts of Spain,
And filled with tannins, but I don't care:
When I am done drinking I will light out of my house,
Light out of here,
And I will jog straight across the intercostals of her bridges
Where the rich men continue to endear,
And I will think of you, Alma, while I look up at the soft
Underbellies of airplanes,
Who continue their leaping, who seem to be so unreal:
They seem to be leaping right over the walls of Christmas,
Which might as well be your favorite holiday,
Because you told me today- and decided as well that the Tiger was your favorite of all the animals in their Plush and soft kingdoms.

Robert Rorabeck

Poem

Turtledoves who lie dead and celibate
Sniffed at by the curious rabbit as if they might be Sweet tufts of asparagus;
And this is where the wind breaks, gets distraught
And disasters,
Making an effluvial mess all over the place,
Like little girls whose hearts squirt candy-apple
Oils,
After they have turned out the loser in the race
Of adolescent romance;
And I have the evidence all over my face;
And the moon is no good for hiding things in a hangover:
The bicycles seem to float under the moon,
Disturbing the crab grasses so very little,
Never leaving marks again to follow the way that They had come home-
And this is not a sad story; this is not even a poem,
But you are out there in the park somehow, and you
Are not coming home;
It is as if you'd never been, somehow,
As this had never been your poem.

Robert Rorabeck

Poem Before Sleeping

The silence is pervasive,
As the caravan approaches midnight,
And I am on my bed but cannot feel her.
Girls with outstanding I.Q.s are looking good,
As they are looking away,
They eat egg sandwiches with extra mayonnaise;
They cross their legs and fart sideways,
Like little archeries,
And it has been half a decade since I've made
Out in the park, next to the junked cars
And pornography. Two months until
The primary, and I have only apathy,
And no longer make wishes upon the suburban
Lake, as the sky goes through its menstruations.
I am the desperate man who has settled,
Who doesn't draw a steady paycheck, but likes
The way the sun looks wet and bareback,
Fancies himself a rimbaudian poet, throws
Jibes like knives from a blind man's grasp,
At she who spins in short tassels and gagged gasps.
I love her, I love her, the cliché of my muse,
And I will keep drawing my imperfect abuse in the Sky they have paraded for holidays, all the angels
Sea-sick from eating too much fleur de sel on their laconic
Voyage, so instead of a prayer I offer a jest,
I'll lay down my fingers and put the body to rest.

Robert Rorabeck

Poem One Four Nine

Cheap rum goes down with Little burning of the pocket book:
Funny thing is:
I'm quite rich
Sitting in my beat-up truck
Watching the procession of ghosts
Sitting straight forward in the Passenger seat-
Without looking around,
The liquor dulls the pain,
And lubricates the written throat,
So I can wail a little,
And forget the weight of the Meaningless in
The half opened eyes of morning:
Though I hate to even look outside,
Because you are always Rising over the air above the Swimming pool:
There is no one else so early,
But you are always there....
This is true, and sometimes
I look like I am homeless,
And sometimes I don't remember
Who I am,
And these are the best times,
Like right now
And maybe tomorrow....
And I might move back again to Where you still live,
Like returning to the only
Significant continent where
We sat up together
And shot at lions,
But even then it won't be
Until after you have left,
And I have spent all of my fortune,
And forgotten who I am,
So if I see you, it won't even matter-

You will just be another ghost
In the whore house where we Used to live,
Flickering like the forgotten lot,
The misspent word in an unnoticed life,
Unattractive to the flatteries of the stage:
I loved you where
I used to give,
But your eyes would only look
Straight forwards
In the passenger seat of
My beat-up pickup,
Even if I sang to you in French.

Robert Rorabeck

Poem Seven!

While you already know that I am
Saving my soul for the heart of a poem,
Dancing and leaping and Trying my luck spread forever within
And hour of
The happenstance of high schools and Trucks stops,
While there seems to be a luminosity
Of anywhere—
And then right here,
While dying and blooming and seeming
To be the medium of
The truck stop while we cannot get
And end to this just supposing equipoise -
And then, there it was,
Another word I could not understand—
Just while daylight and moonlight
Fell across the shoulder blades of airplanes
Equally in equipoise and there
Became another name for another name of These same angels in equipoise—
And even I don't know if these just same angels
Can save us from anywhere or even if I don't suppose—in Vietnam,
There will still be a child born,
Out of wedlock and in the shadows,
And he won't even account for mine:
But it will be so fine—laughing
And even laughing at all of the angels
As they doze.

Robert Rorabeck

Poems Of Distractions

Poems of distractions like Ferris Wheels
Who are only here two weeks in February—
Like my muse's love for me—
Now I pine for her, like a moth to its Hallucinatory light-bulb—
Clandestine to its penny-ante factories—
Oh, the love of the false lights that Garlands the dyspeptic cities,
That rides the trains and subways by Midnights- hasn't the fair gone since from Here carrying away the illusions of her
As well?
The same thing as a dragon or a unicorn,
Or the crocodile waiting for all
Time far down inside the wishing well.

Robert Rorabeck

Poetess

Poetess, you watch the sun sink
Beneath the tresses, and lie down beneath
The power lines which truncate over
The drying grass;
I used to see you out of the corner of my Eye, where you carried rings and dishes,
Like a gaseous planet, goslings your Satellites. You burnished dilapidated houses
When you went into the lake, which Was your parsimonious bride. Flowers awoke with your Perfume, and otters swam and grew
Tame, fetched you the thimbles of forgotten
Queens, who have slept so long
That they have not heard the metamorphosis
Of your lips,
How such lines cascade, and you walked with My sister as she studied to be an animal doctor
In Kalamazoo, but only half of that is true,
The second half because it was convenient:
If I caught you on the swings of a park in Mississippi,
We could motion for trains to exclaim,
And we could cross on the broken concrete over bridges
Which leap like petroglyphs over morbid bayous.
With some respect, I could be your mystery,
And hold your secret like some kind of blackmail:
That you have never written a line, but Wept when the sky expressed the hosannas of nimbus,
Thus I wrote down for you what I knew you
Would say, after you set down the cup of tea
And hypothesize on the peppermint dregs:
Another man is your lover, I should say, but yes,
I speak with you in vibrant silences,
These things you bight your lip to Keep from revealing.

Robert Rorabeck

Poetry From A Forgotten Avenue

Every night I leave the sad hotel
Where the tourists all are snoring;
Bellies stuffed with buttered lobsters,
Toddlers curled on the bulbous laps
Like house cats,
Rising a storm, a nostril's forest fire:
I wander along the canals, watch the Tamed, teal waters where Trinkets, wax lions float; There is Not a single fish where I cry your name:
Too many words in one syllable,
The princess has removed her costume.
Arching, she turns tricks against the Wall, her body a sorbet, the thief
With the tongue of a knife intrudes:
She moans another's name down,
Flowers bud a pantheon, and things are painted
In a tidal blush,
Little children purr in dreams of Ferris wheels
Not far from cloudy sticks of cotton candy
And the little murder,

Each line a succession of oceanic breathing,
If the surf were to continue hypothetically over
The university, and the unions of rodeo clowns
Laid down in the grass where the blue ants
Are building sand castles for their queen:
I should awake, drooling upon the stony lip
Of my reflection,
Echoing the jewel-reeds, the extemporaneous
Flight of the dragonfly;
But it is too painful to read my own lines,
The failures of rusted amusement parks,
Ghost towns in Colorado basins:

Thus, you kiss his lips; your body
Arches like a bow, insouciant hunter,
And happenings proceed further away from
The abandoned rectory, where from the Promises of doves have long since migrated,

Abandoning only the inconstant pain of this art,
Calling the apathetic winds, and my tears
Which feed the waterwheel's steady work,
Grinding, grinding, flour from wheat,
Pearls from sand,
Poetry from a forgotten avenue.

Robert Rorabeck

Poised To Fall

I get the shakes,
And my parents run down the hill,
And the world is fully doused now by the Emolliating sun,
And I have novels inside of me that
Will never live,
Beyond the suburban precognizant,
In those little heady rooms where the televisions
Are whispering voicelessly,
And imaginary housewives pirouette while
The morning enraptures them in their white-comb
Beams;
And soon I will be moving away to become
A better no one,
And I will still be further away from her,
And my scars will matriculate with me, the savage
Blue places where my innocent loneliness thrives;
And I loved her,
And I took her in my car and we parked under the Reciprocating amusements and tongued to the sea;
But now everything is moving down the hill,
And my parents are getting married again,
And the otters preach to little children through
The glass at the zoo,
And the world burns like a valentine caught in A tragic misfiring beneath the autumn monuments
Poised to fall.

Robert Rorabeck

Pollinations Of Angels

I get the feeling someone has stolen the water
From the bucket filled up hidden in the ruddy hibiscus
Where my childhood played in afternoon,
Where I saw her needled and meek saying nothing
In the aloe, but looking perfect, as the storm clouds
Built like hungry stomachs and dissatisfied engines
High above the cutlery of waves....
Now the cement is dried and we've forgotten to write
Our names, or something clever in Latin,
As the students take the safe rivers from muted classroom
To silvery car bought but not yet paid for by the busy
Hours of their parents, the emulations of their curling studies;
As I eat lasagna and type out on my coverless bed,
Watching the games the clouds play as they build up towards
The purplish monsoons, giving promises like flirtatious lovers,
I send my own messages out like microscopic doves from
The rafters of Arizona, pretending that I was once beautiful,
And my ego un-bruised and yet receptive to the gifts
Of strange young girls giggling like the pollinations of angels,
Heard as if in a memoir floating out the whitish windows
Floating symphonic well above my head.

Robert Rorabeck

Poltergeist Yum Yum

Taken down in a single slender
Comely dash,
I get back from the movies and I
Crash;
Yes, the sun is just yet coming up,
And putting its light on the green pines,
The coney pups-
It is a beautiful day in the world, spinning,
Spinning like a rubber duck in a bath of Make-believe,
The little boys drive their trucks
In a sea of make-believe,
Diademed by the icy centaurs- they don't Even know what to feel-
They grab their guns to get a handle on the Dizzing pinwheel, and gods shines down on them
In a Mandela of pretty resorts,
New tiny t-rexes grow up from the earth,
Right out from the center of grandmother's
Grave,
And she's still whispering, you need to shave,
You need to shave; yeah, but anyways,
The sky is spinning in its own insouciant enclaves,
And it doesn't need to feel,
Or look down on the trailer parks of the tin metal
Surreal,
And that's just fine with me: I'll eat my microwave
Dinners by the false light of all her days-
I'll love her- love her anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Polychrome's Fairyland

Pseudo graphical lovers know the curiosity of My sharp hips,
The changing weathers of my gaze inside the frankfurter
Apartments of yellow smells,
As all day the rains parachute like little enemies,
While cats clean their kittens underneath the scissoring
Palmettos beside the carport's bric-a-brac,
And all of it looks like Spain or a good romantic movie
About that Arid country. Maybe I got a tattoo in Madrid,
Maybe she sang down to me all the way from France;
But all of that is over now, just the midpoint Diaspora of High school. I was remedial my senior year- I took freshman
Art and P.E. for the second time fully dressed around the outdoor Basketball courts- How strange that there were no fireworks,
And no laws to amend, and psychology in the overflowing
Trailer park next to the canal where truancy was too close
To resist; and all my poetry comes from flight many years
Ago. Now sedentary and dependant there really is no woman
With eyes so precious as lapis lazuli, no conquistadors,
Or commercial airlines- The amphibians are going to in their Teal wet-suits. They go into polychrome's Fairyland
Where you can find all of it unpublished- If you are an ex-lover,
It will give you a smirk, for you can see I've been doing
Nothing, but looking real coy- An ordinary boy with ordinary Skin, hair, and eyes; Say it ain't true, or I am just a hare leaping through the dunes
After the terrapin, just gossip of a fable passed by tongues
In the vineyard who in the danse ruse of their twilight
No longer have neighbors to speak of, but live in a pre-Socratic hospice, and give reason through the feeble lies that grow like wet
Ivy along the lanai- There are cracks a mile long out in the neighborhood
I drive home too, and incredibly sexy banshees in their chillingly
Brilliant smocks cooking dinner deep in the fjords of crypt orchid Mountain ranges, crying home the lonely one-legged mountaineer and his best friends.

Robert Rorabeck

Polygamies I Shouldn'T Know

Lost pageantry of a cenotaph's art form
Dances in a carousel of hard licks
While the rain makes bereaving motions against
The window in the house where everyone has left;
Where have they gone
With the alligator down against the canal,
The grass mowed
And still smelling of the girl across the street
And the fireworks of truancy just that afternoon-
The burning sugar cane makes a feasts of clouds
In the sky, roiling- roiling with some strange
Gumption,
While the Mexicans move in from across the canal
Living together and warmed by rattlesnakes
Whose smile in poisons of the polygamies I shouldn't know.

Robert Rorabeck

Poor Luck

Dance for me
Willy-nilly, wild
And free
Where the grass is Wet.

So are you, I bet.

I am entirely naked and scarred,
Except for one sock:

If I want to live forever,
That's my poor luck.

Robert Rorabeck

Pornographic Drunken Heresy

Gorgeous hoodlums, who are you:
I've seen you walking around in the zoo with Brilliant stockings and nothing else on except
For your drunk smiles and ray guns;
And your cities are so complex, but you don't Give a d$mn, but stand out and air
Your window dressings,
And you accept just about any drinks offered to
You, and any rooms:
I would like to pour a glass of cheap rum for you,
And make you show me your profile for just
A little while, and pretend you're anyone,
Even if you were born in another country,
Or even if I will continue this slopping down into
The flooding insouciance of a Catholic graveyard,
Because that is where we're all going,
And the dug graves are filling up like a mud bath,
And it's a pitter-patter through the eaves, when beyond
All the iron bars, the windows of better situated romances
Are all closed and occupied,
But I'll love you here all the same, out in the wild where
The exhausted socialized recline anonymously
Finishing what they started:
And I'll grab you just beneath your garter like something
From the sea, and grow my great big trees inside of you,
And put new ribbons in your hair,
Making you remember if not my name who I am.

Robert Rorabeck

Pornographic Mythologies

I think of orgasms and a guillotine;
When I deliver Christmas trees after ten pm.
I come back and joke with my friends,
And pretend I am their king-
The night rushes in grand insouciance, with no Place really to go: I try to look them in the Eyes as long as I can,
Until no one has anything left to say to me,
And I no longer have to think of how,
How she might even now rise like a leaping
Harem off to the east, dancing in a silver dress
The moon has placed, and long ago seeded
With the lesser gravities: I would like to imprint Such romance there, amidst the tangles and
The man o' war, but she just turns her face
Away from with me, with the time. Tired of The sport, she covers up, until even my words
Become settled and homeopathic,
Like phosphorescent glitter in the brine,
The scattering of a destroyed penumbra haloes
The heads of her deeper pornographic mythologies.

Robert Rorabeck

Portions

Envious cataract of Lonliness spills like overturned
Liquor from my slaughtered
Heart: A salinous lake without wind—
That organ is bleating like
A stuck pig,
Killed for a holiday:
Sacrificed for your table: salty meat;
A candle-lit dinner shared with him.
You go to bed with me on your lips.

I think about f-cking you all the time....

Robert Rorabeck

Possibilities

I play dice with
Bicycles,
So don't you try to look
Me in the eyes,
Or I'll roll matching poisonous
Right into your
Changing room of souls;
But you can look up to
The skies,
To the sweet underbelly of Those jouncing vessels
Drying their gowns in the layers
Of sweet atmospheric
Clothing lines
Through castles of....
Oh well, I don't Know how many Viperous
Possibilities-

Robert Rorabeck

Post-Modern Conquistadors

I get cold and homely as I lose my mind.
Soon I will have enough of it,
And I will curl up with some dogs and go to sleep;
But the best thing now is I have so little jealousy,
And I am just as beautiful as something that Is patiently waiting off in its corner of the Crowded mall,
Hungry, unable to move its legs, watching the Grounded stewardesses mill,
Watching the sad and lonely video games-
The prevalences of fathers harbingering their suns,
And all the cars waiting faithfully panting out in the Scalding parking lot,
Ex-lovers learning karate, out of work shoppers smoking
Pot:
I think I once bought her a glass castle I sent to her
In a cookie tin while I lived in Tallahassee- She Must have smiled and put it away and jogged through
The graveyard, breezy or misty, until the trucks commenced,
And meteors fell far a field hiding their beauty from
The post-modern conquistadors;
And sweet sororities yawned only after the morning
Started delivering things, and I got up and rubbed my eyes
And scars, and fell inward even though my first Thought was of her.

Robert Rorabeck

Prehistoric Red Room

I've created behind my eyes
A prehistoric red room where extinct women gyrate to the flickering kiss of kerosene lamps, everyone who lived before me and died in Detroit with the junkyards visits me here-relaxing on red vinyl blood smooth when the room changes it goes all the way back over the hills like yesterday, it cools in the shadows over the secret valleys of an Appalachian gin, amidst the alders where sun and shade play slowly on the suffocating lips of a naked woman eating huckleberries my eyes are full of immigrants, ancestral highlanders, round-headed bandits putting the blade to the Tories, they come inside me for refuge and I introduce them to the woman behind the bar.
In the corner booths, with their fingers beckoning, and their eyes opening butterflies, women are the sexy gray of old photos, silky ancestral sisters dressed in red corsets their eyelashes are silver filigree speaking to me, their lips like smoke rising the subtle shift of tectonic plates moves in my body in the booth where the analogue radio, in circular mouth, plays the bluesy prayers of newly freed gentlemen.

Robert Rorabeck

Prelude To A Job In The Service Industry

When I sometimes don't believe in Poetry anymore,
Most particularly my own,
Then there is no wind, and the sea
Is all doldrums:
Dogs are just dogs,
And men are just men,
And even Neruda's lines hang like Wet clothes in the backyard of some Foggy home too poor to inspire
Anything but pity, and spare change,
But I know this is all I can afford,
Because all my experimenting in high school
Has ostracized me forever from
The peachier labyrinths in my brain,
Leaving my fingers to wreak the Halfway feverous mob of drunken zoos:
Bukowski when he was only part way through
His first red bottle, and just beginning to light;
Rimbaud in his waning twenties,
Believe instead in importations and
Not pink sluts open in the cheering balconies;
Stretching, Baudelaire in a grave christened by Deep graynesses of topless gin:
Broughtigan with a self inflicted bullet in his pan,
Jim Carroll with a needle in his vein
And crabs in his pants,
Ginsberg without any young boys to godhead
And a nuclear meltdown,
But that shouldn't mean these digits shouldn't
Tap dance extemporaneously in their canceled show,
Alone on the keyboard's stage below my boogied nose-
These streets are mine, even when they
Are without a care, and even if my rhymes slur
Like the leaking guts of a blue car
Beneath the moonlight of the sleepless streets;
These words are mine,
True if broken, weary and struggling through
Their classes of incomprehensible professors,

And the heretics of a better gloom,
They can sleep anywhere there are friends of the Liberal arts; and, if not, they can always flip burgers....

Robert Rorabeck

Prelude To That Song

I can sing now that the Lamps our down, and it is the beginning
Of the next century,
Even if people aren't ready to say so
And they are leaving their homes and never Returning,
Because she is still my special angel my wet
Imagination has commissioned to photograph
Leggy and simplex across the pressure
Washed mausoleum
Like a flower fully spread without any shadows
Over her ancestors;
And she doesn't even know it yet,
But she is about ready to scream.
She will spill her milk, and expose herself,
And the song birds will sing like the bringing in
Of another wedding,
And this is just the beginning of that song.

Robert Rorabeck

Premature Surrender

I speak in whispers of polyglotal chants:
I just want to be beautiful in so many voices,
Like race cars ignited, like cousins in
An orgy;
And from the foothills of Colorado I start up the Side of the page- wet sisters sigh and sway,
And maybe this is how it was suppose to be done,
Mining for the lesser silvers,
Wanting only to be halfway forgotten,
And Sharon in her nursery rhymes feels feverish for Her cartoon loves:
In the middle of the sporty glade, she tries on shoes,
Lies back and overdoses,
A butterfly or dragonfly on her clitoris:
I suppose to was a dream she had feeling herself melt
Into the grass;
Once or twice in the nicely mowed continent. Very early
In the morning, before the windmills started
Or Chanticleer, or any more of the old voices
I could even started-
Her vases of wet clay on the riverbank I once drew on my Desk,
But now she doesn't care.
She bights her lip and surrenders to policemen,
Even though I am still fully loaded and with a gang stick-
Up men: bang! Bang!
She is in love,
And this is why I die like Jesus into my crypts of premature Surrender.

Robert Rorabeck

Preschool

Young impressionable suicides
Sleep in parking lots, avoiding ex-lovers/
I saw her for the last time
When I was 5/
She was the substitute teacher
Who made me stutter,
But I only saw her for a day,
And after school I could speak just fine,
Though it left me wondering
Where she had gone away,
As the school bus picked me up each morning.

Robert Rorabeck

Presents Of Sacrifice

I christen my ship by the cheapest species
Of rum- In a basement sea I float around and Moan like a pitiful cat: Oh, what will Forever come of me- Bleeding out in this Bed they switched while I was in Saint Louis-
The bed I had my last legal intercourse in A decade ago; after that its just been Working girls:
Naiads of the sea, dryads of trees and snow.
When I look into your eyes, you do not hear.
My inconsideration has no tongue,
Just my busy fingerprints smudging the boot heals
Of a mongrel soul. When I spend my days alone,
When I drive for an hour to the movies that are my Lesser spectacle, I think of you arriving, lactating in a shaft of Sunlight, locks of your hair curling like spry weeds
Around the meadow lake where keeps a hidden sword;
There you are forever making love far bigger than life:
I close my eyes through the entire show, seeing your Fashions better in by that imposed darkness;
And once while drinking from glacier tears in the highest Basins of your state, it was like kissing your bathtub
Where you'd become inextricably lost,
And there was no excuse for me; but looking down
Those steep and beautiful tragedies,
The ever vermilion slopes, I could almost see you there Dancing for tourists who could only appreciate you as Much as they could Disney World;
But I knew that was where you belonged, somehow making
Something otherwise a commercial charade
Sincerely beautiful; and I wept in a sun shower which Happened all the way down, dampening your shoulder blades
Like softly speckled doves, knowing that even though
I had failed, you would live on in an undeniable daydream Never affecting my name, kissing the foreheads of a chorus of Children who sang your name, garlanding you like a Christmas tree expecting the presents of sacrifice you will Never think give.

Presupposing That Spring Had Come Again

If I kissed her it was under the halo of a lunch truck.
Or I didn't kiss her:
And all of these backyards are so sure of themselves without
The need for the playfulness of otters;
And all of these backyards don't have a single cypress;
And they bleed all over themselves,
And Christ is waking up fully yawning in the surveillance of an Empty bed, but he has no need for detective work:
He remembers just what he said:
And then last year at Thanksgiving I was king of my high school again,
Because I saw things from the top of that rooftop,
And I was young again: while all the families bled out into the world
Just like birthday cake making wishes, or just like the little golden
Dishes of little golden fishes,
And my new old love spit into a drinking fountain: spit and it was Enough to bring the birds again,
To bring all the little birds whistling with their hands in their pockets
Happy and not so happy, presupposing that spring had come again.

Robert Rorabeck

Pretending

After midnight it snows
In the alkaline world-
Your father is smoking
A cigarette in his 6th or 7th story-
Your colleague bought me
This notebook,
The water comforts itself,
And the lighthouses
Shine like hopeless
Candles
Beneath the mirrow
Where your mother is Crying.

Robert Rorabeck

Pretending That It Never Was

You can go with me now
And I can lift you high above your yard:
I can carry you high above the astringencies,
Even if it is only that I am not drunk: I am not far from Mexico,
And the purple dreams are Purple
And getting deeper, and the time spreads out
And remembers the few times that you made
Love to me,
And after the minnows have followed:
And the blue gills,
And the mermaids: then it is time to go,
And there is no time for remembering your Kisses:
While everything that happened to us
Has come up to the surface,
While the fire burns around the silhouettes of
The pretty windmill:
While fire just burns over the slow avenues
Of the blue gills,
And then just disappears with the anonymous
Morning, as if just pretending that it never was-

Robert Rorabeck

Pretending That She Could One Day Be Mine

I go into a strange neighborhood and make love
To a strange woman- back and forth through the gates
Of her suburbia- she seems as if about to fall
Asleep as I make love to her,
But she says I am sexy and bigger than average:
I say she's about ready to transform into the next
Starlet of the overworked Hollywood block buster:
And when I go home: I go home and I have no
Dog waiting for me, but my house is paid
For and a water fountain arrived today and a place
To put my television: I put them both together
And it helped to take away the hours of the day:
And now I sit on the sofa that I got from a place of God, and I listen to the water that I poured earlier
Into the fountain from a water jug- and I think of and I feel the pain left over from a muse who has left me
After a year: a brown girl who was married to another Man: a brown man who knows nothing of the circus,
Who used to beat her, but he didn't know how often
I picked her grapes and like a fox I hung from her
Petit vines, as she asked me to promise her boob jobs:
Now she is gone again back to her children and their Little brown arms: and she is- his, because she has Stopped pretending that she could one day be mine.

Robert Rorabeck

Pretending To Give A Shadow To A Girl

Obsessions from the opened backs of trucks
Lying underneath the citrus trees
We have heard so much talk about—
The dwindling sun makes a zoetrope of These orchards,
And pretends to give a shadow to a girl
I've never seen.

Robert Rorabeck

Prettiest Monuments

Newer possibilities keeping to themselves while
The racetracks are let out into the rain—
While the artist weeps, wondering whatever is to Remain—
Until the day flies above and beneath—
In the heaven's wonder—in the satanic reef—
And all of the promises
Of angels are swallowed as pills—and all of the gills
Of swordfish are Taken to go to sleep—the marionettes wonder,
Empty handed, as to how many cardboard stages they Must creep—
While their master is drunk again—thirty year old
Magician happening upon this hapless land:
This is my fantasy I keep to myself—
My very own soul in the palm of my hands—
This is the delight I keep delight in,
Crawling upon the perimeter of the dusky swimming pool:
The very same fairytale the selkies delight in:
Surmising that the do not have to change—forever
And never again—
Drowned bicycles resting beneath them—
Just as cherished as the very young pools underneath the Very old stars—the wreckage of catastrophes
Ever wonder forever who they are—
But the daylight will awaken around them tomorrow—
And swirl in Chablis of uncharacteristic monuments—
And the heavens will keep forever—as long as there
Are pretty young girls watering the front yards
Of their prettiest monuments.

Robert Rorabeck

Pretty Drunk

I am drunk.
Continents divide,
Planets fall into the sea,
And for the first time today
I am pretty.

Robert Rorabeck

Pretty Lips On The Holy Virgin Mary

No liquor and I'm droll- Scarred and more,
Waiting for rain with the spit shine poor-
Here is my apartment. I sleep on the floor-
Walden is a long way from here, so I plagiarize,
Look myself in the face slantwise, wandering,
Wandering: To untie her ribbons, unlace into dreams,
Outside the faithless traffic streams;
And if I had a poem in me today, this can't be it-
I slept all day, or most of it, and I missed the poem;
It stuck to something else just as imperfect and purred
Around her pretty dark lips- There are always lips,
And they are always pretty, pretty lips around the whole
D*mned city. Yesterday, I saw pretty Asian lips at The library, what perfect commentary;
and statues with pewter lips,
And lips on my cousin Terry,
But I haven't kissed any of those lips in so long,
Very; and pretty lips on the holy Virgin Mary.

Robert Rorabeck

Pride

You live in the blue
Cavern that your Mother seeds
Looking up at her
Like awakening in an Azure tent,
She washes your hair-
Rippling like the sea
And the sun proceeds
Its warmth through you
Like the outline
Of a God
Beginning to create
Fire from wind:
You are undressing;
Alone,
This is all you are Knowing in the morning
You will summit the
Earth
And then you will be
Amongst the tallest of men,
Flesh unfurled:
Far down in
The valley
Your mother smiles,
Unknowing
In the living room
All the things you will
Do,
Foreshadowed by the Daytime talk shows
Which speak just for her
And even though
Even now your girlfriend
Is making love
To another man
Far down below
Where there is no

Color
On the flat dog-eyed sea
Only hypocrisies of children;
She can think
None the less of you,
As you hold your breath,
Step up
And fit your hand
Around
The ankle of
The statuesque maiden
Engaged to the horizon's cerulean tarp
With your head in the clouds:
There is almost a
Tear in her eye,
Your mother is so proud of you,
So proud.

Robert Rorabeck

Prime Numbers In The Elbows Of Her Gardens

All of the busied happiness tries to pretend there
Reptiles
Whist across of all of the unhappied wishing wells
Shows the visages of presidents
Into the knighted dreams of Miami where America
Doesn't belong anyways—
Whist my legs echo like crickets for all of the busied
Romances of airplanes—anyways—
While then, of course, all of those collected nights
Become so utterly unromantic—
And yet the commercial airplanes drool and drool
Like hummingbirds whist you remember where
You kept your spot—
As the bed creeps along by itself—and no longer
Any of the busied perfumes are collected from
The apiaries—as if I would make love
To freshman or someone else underneath that Un busied—art—underneath the moon or Anywhere—anywhere—
Whilst I am getting older and older—
Now a king of his un busied letters—waiting for the Hurricanes of wherever it was to unfold and for The rest of its heavens to so eagerly be Found out-

Robert Rorabeck

Primeval Tanking

Congratulations on your downward spiral,
The self replicating coils of the inky stairwell
Disappear into her bindi,
Sinkhole the mortgage floorboards all the way
Down to the last layer of hell,
Where the octogenarians are ice-fishing
Up to their necks in the lake of frozen sinners,
Right into the 3rd mouth of the devil.
Sitting with Cassius you ask him why he wasn't
A greater criminal. He replies, "Who are you Anyway? I am the great Cassius." Then he goes Right on being chewed like raw hamburger
Between the devil's bleeding gums,
Moaning ever so slightly, parting his lips
Like a butterfly on the web of a white midnight.
The rest of the senator is gone into pink beefsteak for the Gullet, his decapitation retaining the sightless ego;
Lucifer is too busy chewing to palaver,
His teeth like sharp pews receding up the church of this throat,
And his wings are churning like the great putrescent windmill.
Sick cats have crawled into the shadows of his Armpits to die, and they smell like mildew under her eyes
Who have been asleep too long,
Lacquered shut like difficult windows,
Eyelashes clasped in a terrible nightmare which has her in throes,
One she refuses to part with, and lies there like
A rusting Disney world princess, her dress mottled
And felted with vermilion lichen, the house we once lived in Melted about her as the forest has stepped in like
A locksmith after the final foreclosure notice,
Hiding her from view as he does his job,
Reinventing her chastity so I no longer am allowed my familiar approach.

Robert Rorabeck

Prince Cherry Blossom Esquire

The joviality of a prince tucked-in and Slept in the indentation beside the highway
In the corner, like a dimple, of the malevolent
Penumbra, while many curly-headed devils way
Back in his kindergarten, in hindsight, loved him
As they drove through the wash of first blushing
Hurricane; They could say they understood him Far to the bottom of a homeless estuary where They could dimly perceive him, nuzzled by their Dogs in the alluringly mysterious mask overshadowing
The well-drooped economics of the pet cemetery
Fallen into tin bouquets and overly rouged spinsters
Resembling famous aunts and misspelled heroines;
There in the recoiling surf, in the last hours before Closing, he wore a crown of peacock feathers and Danced ever so strangely, though with the airtight
Presumption suiting his position; swimming in captivation
With a school of well thought after fish, who metamorphosed
Into clandestine relatives, and various lugubrious
Politicians by cherry blossomed dates on the Chinese calendar.

Robert Rorabeck

Princess Escaped From Mexico

Words as short as miniskirts

Stopped my heart: and we ate and had pancakes,
And then I promised to take you back home with me
To show you my Virgins of Guadalupe;

But not to make love those some weeks after July 4th:
Alma, Alma, but we made love:

You in your mini-falta, which I hardly even deserved, curled
Up to your belly like a wrapper in a chocolate bar:
You as brown and as perfect as the epiphany of a sun shower
At dusk:

And we made love, and some weeks later I drove with you
Past the opulence of houses in palm beach; and I told you
Not to look at them, but to the perfectly calmed sea,
And I asked you if you could not see yourself out there,
Lying in completed tranquility with the elements who never Needed any further occupations:

Out in the cerulean, which was not ever your favorite color,
I still told you that this was exactly how beautiful you were;
And I wanted to hold your hand even though you'd Never been to Disney World,
Because you were already a princess escaped from Mexico;
And you were: you were.

Robert Rorabeck

Prizes That They Took

I've been playing by the rules:
I've been to California and touched the sea
By myself,
But never thought of the butterfly- web of Shear sunlight that the scissors cut,
Or the running ponies tethered to their Flag,
Like airplanes on a string:
They were echoing, echoing like fish kissing
Hooks- and they left us without Remember the particular prizes that they took.

Robert Rorabeck

Procession Of Weddings

If my house wines in its own epistemologies,
So I am here,
And burning up all of my comely liquors
While the dogs lick my open palm- as if I were saltlick
And they were deer,
Until the morning comes, and in it the rodeos, and the rounds
Of those daylights
Pilferings and stuck up through the snobs of smoke signals:
While nothing else has to be concluded-
And this only has to be a classroom that was once attended and Then abandoned like a burned down school room
Into which all the pretty bouquets are suddenly bleeding:
And so then suddenly there is her bedroom,
And little fairies and she is home safe,
As through all of those winters on the higher mounds
Her loved ones come as if in a procession of weddings-
Sound, and safely returning.

Robert Rorabeck

Professional Lyrics

Dangerous personifications
La la la
Dance upon the hinged-jaw
You can't see them,
But its my job to serve
The hyacinth to these snobs:
Girls with pin-job knees
And down they go
Just like porcelain faucets
Deep into snow
And men so clean
And finely jobbed,
By just looking at them,
Lesser men are driven
To rob,
And I love you
Yes I do, but I've forgotten
Who you are or even were,
But I love you, its true,
Because its my job, its what I do.
La la la,
I love you.

Robert Rorabeck

Profile Of A Fatherless Kite

Abandoned halls still live in echoing footsteps,
Like the ones the little ghosts keep Tapping around my skull:
I try to drown them out with alcohol,
And her eyes- The persimmons we stole
From the overgrown jungle-
Then we'd ride our bikes past the movie theatre,
And the music hall,
To see the fans and the debutants disembarking
From their daydreams-
We saw them all, and counted their locks of Nimble hair;
But not a single one saw us, my friend,
Not a single one cared:
Now, down by the lake where the frogs are Making love and spilling tadpoles into the greenie slow;
We press our brakes for a second,
And listen to the machines growl, as they Start up and begin their roll: Soon they will be taking Down the sides of the old buildings, the blinded study halls:
For a second, our spokes are glistening in the sun,
As the school busses parade by like rolling cages,
The screaming yellows of youthful vertigo;
Then we disembark like this again- You to your Wife and child, me to my nothing at all-
The time is spent, the day is done,
The clouds are building atolls above our skulls,
And yet those distant legs still go echoing familiarly,
Like a storm of mice up and Down my crumbled hall....

Robert Rorabeck

Promiscuous Cats

Forgetting to relax and entertain,
I shoot right for the glass- On the wall,
The girl from that movie has turned away.
Yes, she is looking across to Spain.
I get a tattoo in Barcelona. We lose a guitar in France, and I weep because I love her mother
Whose artwork is exhibited in Rome
And Japan-
The blurry sailboat cockleburs hanging from her
Sweaty underpants,
And a thousand of dots in a park of slurring holidays;
They might as well be constellations,
But one of them has the lips of beautiful clichés.
She says to put my fingers to them- she doesn't Speak. She is the nude in a giant wine glass in the Fieldtrip I've stared at all week.
She has a husband distilling gin from the creak,
But he's in love with a salmon colored fink;
I do pushups on the noisy floor- I draw my trees on The desk,
She crosses over to me and turns the court blue,
And we eat our lunch beneath the tits of coconuts, the Messy eyes of alligators who've caught diseases
From eating promiscuous cats.

Robert Rorabeck

Promises To The Angels

Beautiful midgets in the cylindrical grasses Underneath the fuselages floating on Coppertone wings:
I suppose you will go to Spain or Mexico tomorrow:
I suppose you will go somewhere- and she Lingers in the fruit market with plastic barrettes in Her hair,
And she seems like an angel next to the baskets
Of tomatoes
And the sunlight filtering through the canopy
On the very spot where a speak easy once
Existed underneath the footsteps
Of stewardesses who are always ascending the Ineffable stairway that expresses our Promises to the angels somewhere.

Robert Rorabeck

Promising Away Their Maybes

Revolving the carousel in days of untried wonder:
All the woman sticky tongued-
All the men spent of their thunder; while, underbelly,
The sea has ridges: has caracoles,
Breaking anyway that he finds her, combing around
The sloughs and bends,
Whispering to the traffics of her elbows and knees,
That this pain should surcease,
And be amputated from the moon: there it goes,
Something stolen away,
Something bled- discovered of its thievery:
Like marbled children put forever to rest underneath a mapled
Cemetery,
And then the angels drive around them, breathing out their Insinuations of condolences,
Breathing in the stolen daisies- while the nursery rhymes continue
To exist,
Cursing their pleasures, and always promising away their maybes.

Robert Rorabeck

Promising Her Enamored Reflection Across The Setting Denouement Of Meaningful Atmosphere

Incurable disease- Looking at the paradox in the Sun-shower,
Dreaming of emptying baseball diamonds in a working Class suburbia,
Freckle faced witches with no ambition
Stealing just two apple buds perfectly symmetrical
Under her blouse;
A languid antebellum out along the switchbacks of Cerulean canals
Incrusted by the swift lived shells of husked insects,
Just as innumerable as the original armies of Spain-
I used to imagine in my cherry-red Oldsmobile,
Draining into her eyes, dabbing an adolescent immortality
Where it aches to fit,
Running my fingers like an otter swimming down her
Sun drenched spine, toy locomotives whistling around
The tree at Christmas,
The alligator approaching the minor birds outside,
The lawnmower quieted, the Mexican done with his job,
Siestas in the voluble bloom in a crèche of pointed-blue echinopsis,
And very soon some kind of fable will happen
Drenched in the cul-de-sac- The vulpes vulpes leaping
At the wild scuppernongs- always afterwards, some type
Of escape or defeat that was supposed to mean something;
Sated or hungry,
The naked gifts molted on the efficient rug,
And then on to dusk, breathlessly,
House-wives incrusting with inexpensive jewelry,
Their husbands like charioteers going to hit the glass,
And she is rushing in her body leaping off the dusk,
The same old alligators grinning as is she were their pretty sparrow,
A shinning afterthought which must not fear its graduation,
Promising her enamored reflection across the setting denouement of meaningful atmosphere.

Robert Rorabeck

Pronouncing My Given Name

Strange Saturday without cartoons made to Laugh endlessly in the heart of Shanghai—
My wife is here
And in her presence my loneliness,
My American vagueries and insouciant laziness:
I cannot understand Mandarin,
Girls laugh when they look at me on the street:
Cover their mouths, bat their eyes
And go on their way—
Thirty million Chinese and no one here to Learn my particular English.
My one year old son still hasn't learned to walk,
But knows the Chinese and English words
For cat and dog
And uh-oh—this sort of life is fond of us,
I in a limbo no one cares about, no one remembers,
Just a strange face standing out in a sea of Assured regularity,
And my wife stable with her family—
And no longer have my muses to complain about,
No more pretty visions so far away from me—
But I have a roof
And a heart that has trouble pronouncing my given name.

Robert Rorabeck

Proof That Is Lost From The Blindness

Why not a river going her way, wound
Like the suburban tropics, languid, tangled—all of The evidence that it needs—
And in this plays you can sometimes go to Sometimes the beautiful elements that you've forgotten—
There in the shadows, trailer parks of your Poorest relatives—
And in the upheaval of cypress arms—the transients of Your ancestors—proof that is lost from the blindness
Of our vision—where your childhood might Have been, barefooted, straggling latch-keyed
Down a road all of the prettier cars refused to drive upon.

Robert Rorabeck

Proper Dog

Beware the proper dog
Who barks like a gentleman—
He will sniff your woman's Crotch when you are not looking....
He will take your praise
And lick your palm if you
Feed him a biscuit,
He will even allow you to be
His patron as long as
You have the wealth to back him,
But as soon as you show weakness,
As soon as you are out of cash,
He will turn his hat and
Lift his leg to mark his territory.
He will hump your woman.
He will eat your cat,
Because though you thought
He was your pet,
He is nothing but what he is,
And proper is a misplaced adjective
On him or anything;
For though his home is beautiful,
His coat is full of flees;
He licks his crotch
When he is thinking.
He practices polygamy when his Loyal bitch is not looking,
And the moon is his ancient cousin,
Eons before the leash and cane,
His first nature runs in the bloodthirsty
Packs through the night's tundra.
No matter how you dress him,
No matter what he drives,
Or what he does to make a living,
Your proper dog is much like the man
Who feeds him:
A creature of its first nature,
Be it either werewolf
Or a proper gentleman.

Robert Rorabeck

Proud Of Us

They said I was a sancho in the land of Milking-blood-
The white sands, the caverns of Pieta
The dry grottos, the husks of virgins shivering
Like dead Christmas trees.
Now I know why they never come up,
Why Sharon doesn't have to think of the Water-colored paintings I lost for her:
All the old-time settlers are in trailer parks,
The cantankerous wives have slipped over
Sweet canals and into other men's parks,
But what about all of that our mothers
Promised us-
The sun blinding us with snake-oil and
Years of ancient gravity:
Bending down upon the earth as if a lustrous
Woman,
Orchids, orchids pretending to be in the sand-
Orchids, and her children,
Nothing but promises. The horses are grinning,
But not because they are proud of us.

Robert Rorabeck

Public Places

Sometimes the sun sets sideways
And pushes outdoors all of your hopes,
Like Cinderella is sweeping
Her eyes so beautiful but no one cares,
And her lover comes with candles in his beard
All tide up in nooses for little dreams,
Somnambulant toddlers culled from the waves,
And now they say that they have no backbone,
But even Satan has a backbone,
Even when he is lighter than the clouds
And caracoling the moon,
And the traffic sings his praises and dances
Every which way it can,
As Evan comes down from the uninhabitable
Mountain sideswiping with his brother,
As Sharon is in her little joys and her little stores,
Mopping up with all her eyes,
And I would just like to be as beautiful as her
Shadow
Coming down the mountain trying to make friends
And kiss strangers through the brambles and Spikenard of my motionless bicycles,
Those things that are too hard to say and which Most beautiful women would prefer not to Hold hands with in public places.

Robert Rorabeck

Published Author

I hate to look at myself when
I go to the barber shop.

My mom has cut my hair
For the past five years,

But I am a published author.

Before,
I once met Jeb Bush
At the barber shop in Tallahassee,
Near the lake where I read
The Bell Jar,
And dreamed despotically of you;

And now I select my amnesias;
And I am affected,

But please remember

I am a published author:

My hair and beard are gray,
But I still get carded- Like today I got Carded buying cheap rum,
Even though I always buy it from
That store,
And I need a haircut, but

I am a published author,
And you are my despotic dear
And I have had cruel dreams of
You,
Though I can hardly remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Pulsing

Pulsing, the woman is not real
Or, she is like something far underneath
The ocean which gives off her own light,
As if she was a star evolved that learned to Swim and copulate with the dark mysterious
Things which come out of her bar
And walk home with her after all
The students are finally sleeping....

Then the world is wet and dreamy as They hold hands, the way beautiful things
Sometimes do. I have never seen them, though
I have walked down the streets alone many years later
And followed the trail to her doorstep and Inside they make love and her lights pulsate,
Something alive and giving of herself,
Humming like power-lines under her control
And I wonder what she must feel with The effervescence flowing out of her like
Casual daydreams....

As the rains come gray in the sadness of
A forgotten god, I walk alone trying to figure
Her out, and sometimes she goes flying overhead
Like a meteor or a jet, and it is a secretive kind of Flash, like something that is leaving never to return,
Like the smile she gave to me in high school
Before she realize what she was and took off....
A heavenly body too quick for wishing upon
And I try and reach out to her thinking that
Her internal furnace would keep me warm,
Like a fire crackling in its earthen hearth,
And I could set up a house around her and let her
Run all the appliances from her fingertips,
But she is already in another world....

Pulsing, as if she wasn't real, like a
Bright angel who used to guard me from the darkness,
Who has since tasted the red fruit of a handsomer

God and ignited for him, all afire,
Like something burning deep beneath the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Pure, Pure Sunlight

Her eyes would not give me a red cherry,
A chance to smell her along the languid body of rises,
Hiking bone-deep against the plates her body makes,
Coming up, writhing with the sweat and stain
Of getting things done on the 3rd plane this Planet is known for,

Where her body lies perfectly nude,
Dripping the juice of the pomegranate,
Writhing, a holiday for serpents to curl about,
To surf, and to call those bright eyes a new poem
Cast out of Eden,
To saddle on until the buck of the act gets it:

Homer's voyage

Until she calls your name for the neighbors to hear,
She sinks your battle-ship,
And all your hopes collide into her, torpedoes,
Commanded from the thighs which killed the Neanderthals
Where your class finishes in the overgrown fields
You learn something new, hidden,
She slips our childhood into a rabbit hole
We go down with Alice, in the forgotten wonder
Of her auburn kindergarten dressed up for Easter Sunday,

And her hair lays in the light without shadow, pane,
She plays on a field of pure, pure sunlight.

Robert Rorabeck

Purple Violin

I stop and think of something beautiful.
Around me, the world is flipping over itself,
Bound in relation to the factory's sun:
The greater masses have the most control;
The sparrow swims around the Punctuating branches of the written tree
Where we build our nest.
But I cannot call this home—
Here the horses create the weather in Strange stampedes they eat the green hair
Of mountains, until the regal entourage
Of the Queen quickly becomes withered
Old men crawling, looking for diamonds
The hoofs have crushed from coal.

Hark, I sometimes hear the sky declare,
For in all the land he is the one who sees
The farthest. I set off from my work and Scare away the frightening winged insects
Who were trying to build a nest of sleepy colors
In my beard.
To the edge of the world I travel,
The familiar sloping of the town
Just some feet away, down to the water colored Prairies where monastic drunkards
Are tumbling and dropping meaningful
Trinkets in certain places in the grass
All in relation to sunlight and shade,
The systems of coercions, the lilted fingers
Which say, here you go now, here you go....

Hark. Hark. Hark.
The wind jumps like a leaping dog
And blows in pollinating trespasses.
Yes, there was someone new down there,
Lost in a clutter of mismatched regalia,
Her hand fluttering like a weathered
Garment in need of mending;
But I will not go down this side of the earth,

Where the stranger needing things revolve
In places of time that intrude like
The red rubber ball's tin horned dreams
Through the day,
The sleeping snails of sunlight's crawl
Licking the last dew from the grass,
And the multicolored men with no names
And no homes,
Ostracized like ex-husbands
From their children's home....

I can not understand how
She has traveled so far
And how she has become so lost.
I think before she must have won some medals
For her eyes still sport the beams of Her triumphant athleticism.
She is sitting in a stream and reading
A pamphlet on the advantages of
The new towers which will send Radio signals across the Atlantic.
She is sucking her thumb.
Now she is bearing her ass for
The creatures of sunlight
As they leap at her shyly and then away.

Hark. Hark,
But no, I will not listen.
I am in the weathered hills where
The horses run and carve out canyons
And estuaries for the Great Herons.
These are the things which I move around,
Asking me to stay and disappear
Through the reedy clots of Juniper in High elevation. There, the effluvious
Light is playing a sometimes purple violin
Over her shoulder
And she is picking a scab on her opal knee.
She is perfect and lost like an ancient mineral,
So I must turn away now and pick up
The rake of my enterprise
To clean the good earth beneath the Sparrow's nest.

Robert Rorabeck

Put Me In, Coach

Two dollar beer is the life for me,
Because I don't have the memory but for
One or two things:
I used to cut paper and make snowflakes
And airplanes;
And there are very little things that I still do:
I held off writing poetry for ten years,
And then alone beside pool light I wrote poetry
And bled ketchup for you in the Tallahassee graveyard
I took my students too on Halloween:
They don't allow me to teach anymore, but that is Nothing to brag about,
Or like the stories I make up to keep from feeling alone
At night:
And you still live in the student ghetto:
You still live beside the youth lights, and they still hold
Celestial baseball games for you:
Your bullpen is so packed, but you don't even sell
Wine-
My hair is gray now- my love has struck out,
But the amber greased bat is still in my hands in the rain
And moon light;
And I'll keep swinging over the hair lip of the canal,
Thrashing the alder berries and tulips like as if I
Were really Mexican,
Writing poetry every night,
Because I am still ready to play.

Robert Rorabeck

Put Ourselves To Bed

Pedro is in the sun pounding away
Wreathes:
The sun that is crenulating the trafficking
Unjulating of the sea:
And, yes, today don't we have holidays
To sell underneath a big white and smoky
Tent,
Underneath the pines and the amphibian
Airplane bellies sparkling of the drool
Of birthstones and diamond plants:
They are amphibians because they can both
Crawl along the road,
And then leap for great distances;
And they are many sided carriages right out of Georgian England,
But never once do they go to Australia to see
What is cooking in botany bay:
They just go leaping, leaping,
Laughing and serving drinks pretty lips sip
From,
Creched and mélanged well above our heads,
As we sell beautiful Christmas trees
And then put ourselves to beds.

Robert Rorabeck

Put Your Lips On My Words

First whispers in the morning meaning nothing,
Give no candle flame warmth, unless they are of your Lips,
Just so these words crawl meaningless through the Bleached white pages of the llano unless they are Softened by your careful eyes, read
Thoughtfully by your lips,
And my body is a derelict oil rig, a sturgeon without his Gilly mate, a train car providing little shade in the Sandbone desert, unless coupled with your body,
Kissed and whispered upon by your lips,
Spoke through and discovered upon by your eyes-
Just as a sunny house is faded into a walking crypt,
A jail cell, an empty tent- without your presence,
The faucets of incubation, your legs drape the bed and Give it purpose and decoration,
The couch becomes a playground with you on it, the backyard
A green space seeming infinite- If your lips shouldn't whisper
Across my words, feel them there like a saucy kiss,
Every syllable should wilt and mold, become the droopy soil
And dimmed husk of a rooty skeleton hampered in the wind,
Should your eyes not Find my page, and track your lips across it with the honest hunger
Of foraging egrets, then nothing I have said is real,
But the hopes of a little boy trying to fly in his bedroom,
But there is still a chance should your lips come across me now,
And feel my words brush them like a teasing feather duster,
Then you should know that they are bona fide and blooming, like
The only flower of a species, and your lips their light and food:
Come feed them then, and they will sing for you the way flowers
Do silently in the germinating wind, and believe them here, for that was their Purpose: to be read by you and put down like seeds in your mind,
Asking for body and mind, little children plumed in their rooms,
Faucets, sinks, cabinets, brooms, refrigerators, gas powered generators,
And all of the rest of the things that go along with it,
And all the rest of your time, for your lips to crawl up to mine,
And find there what I wish to say to you.

Putting A Price On The Sea

Putting on the green
And foaming rounds,
The sea goes up,
The sea goes down

And my love has Changed so far away,
But she'll change back
Again someday

And lay against
The brown embittered
Earth—
Who will tell her
What she's worth.

Robert Rorabeck

Putting Away My Toys

It rains so softly over
Resilient abutments;
It feels as if I were seventeen again,
And made of beautiful scars,
And the atmosphere on my skin,
A woman's kiss who is about to die,

Like a stewardess on her last trip,
Thinking of a candlelit dinner- of the Men there,
As she flies by my window
Never looking in and Disappears into the turbulent mist
That will see her off.

Robert Rorabeck

Putty In Another Man's Clay

Back into the park of daggers,
Beaten up by customers of an unashamed
Sun,
Failures to look beautiful mean no pollen,
No reciprocation with her better joints,
The useless water fountains the bees lay
Sprawled around- all turned out
And truncated into adobe moles:
She would say to me I say to the thoughts of Children:
Your mother would have a park and there
Would be tender nudges,
If my flesh was perfect like walking into the Air-conditioning of a bank and doing
Your business all with smiles:
I guess instead I will have to hold up the place,
And pack my truck halfway through a
High school day,
Because fences are so easily bounded when
You have the soul of a pointer,
And there is no use, no correct bouquet,
When her dreams and softy bicycles are Already putty in another man's clay.

Robert Rorabeck

Quaffing Her

Words come because I need them,
Skittish, because I have yet tamed them,
Though sometimes I have fed them well,
And done as little harm to them as I could,
But they are meant for sacrifices for her beauty,
So that I should cut and press them
And remove them from their moist habitats
In my throats, pull them forth like tubers
Using the extemporaneous tap-dances these Fingers do: each knuckle should wear
A suit and tie; When stymied for better
Usage, the two hands should fight and choke
Each other, which might appear to strangers
As a self-congratulatory handshake;
They want to unbutton her blouse; they want
To run along her and practice the only sense they Know; they want to curl around a steering wheel
And take her to the beach, or wave to adoring
Fans, but she is the elusive allegory grown nubile
And tantalizing from a verdant stem, and
Other words which are only suitable for a future
Midnight, should they clasp her neck like a chalice,
And leaning her back drink from those lips,
As she is poured into these.

Robert Rorabeck

Quality Of An Illusion

Quality of an illusion that the heart cannot disavow—
This is how we remember her belittling affections:
See her family in the aspects of the billboard—
See a homeless unicorn in the sun shower, like a spear besides
The aspects of a busy highway that runs like
A graveyard beside the sea—
There is the utmost where we cannot survive—like making
A house in the grass underneath a swing set—
Of holding her lips to yours amidst the dunes and the Stolen bicycles: there it is—
Awakening tomorrow—where the butterflies and less flattering
Insects breathe for a couple of weeks—almost going
So far as airplanes that keep up her soul
But haven't yet learned how to lay her down.

Robert Rorabeck

Quarterback To The Civil Wars Of Spain

I drink the last bit of rum
And think of the color of your underpants:
The alligators, if they think of anything,
Think of runaways and the Pirates of Pinzance:
They have been doing this for so long
And so well,
They have very low rates of insurance:
And your eyes are blue like the ice moons of Jupiter
The scientists sing and croon about:
My sister Janice has a sugar glider named
Gustaff who eats sugar globes and earth warms,
And farts his way across her rented rooms
Like the living recreation of a
Paper airplane:
And I fell in love with you in fourth grade:
You were the captain of the patrols; and the grasses were Mowed and very green,
By the tax payers' silver dollars, and by all of their loot:
I remember looking at video game magazines on the back of the Bus with a boy named Chris;
I remember traveling home in the lips of the rain
Like a tiny quarterback to the Civil Wars of Spain;
And I pined for you for a decade; and I will see you tomorrow,
And splay my fingers like cypress bows against the Shoulder blades of your sugar cane:
I will push you in our species of simple ways, like blue gills
On hot summer days;
And your eyes will move like constellations, anyways,
Like the gravity stars give to other stars;
And your feet will kick up off this plane,
And point the direction to your sorority of other stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Queen Alice's Wheels

Reposing without liquor,
I personify a street-deity where
The higher-grade angels are passing
Overhead with loud engines;
Unaware, other more flagrant bums
Are getting, and giving head in the park;
It is their only capitalization,
And once they're gone enough they perceive
The lazing alligators as green-blooded
Mermaids stretched out on long, sinking
Driveways, eating Astroturf and looking Fine enough to fiddle
As the sun spurts and spins like
Queen Alice's Wheels; getting drunk,
The waves are less inhibited, and so they
Are coming in quite uninvited in a glistering
Calvary, but Sommeliers in Colorado couldn't Give a damn.

Robert Rorabeck

Queenly-Acanthine Estuaries

Jump along with me wherever my train is bound
It is sunny- It has to be,
Now that you are found and no longer need to sling my Words around to string goose necked traps for you-
Because you are now my homeless honey:
And it is bright and balmy
Wherever we are running, and the yellow dresses drip
From your piercing,
And the waves are so calm that our newborn children Run through them and pick up shells from their Quieted lips:
If you would know this, it would be so beautiful,
And nearly impossible the way you have been running,
And I haven't been doing anything rightly for so long,
So how can any high basined goddess love me:
And it is only this, that I have been so forlorn for so long;
And I've been thinking of your eyes,
And the better ways to spell them- Or dreaming of other Eyes to which your dresses do not belong,
And maybe I have been wrong, but I am not a bad man:
And maybe that is why you do not love me,
Not that I am not your bad man, or that I am your good man,
Only that I am not beautiful enough to be your help mate,
But I said I love you- I said I love you,
And I want to jump trains with you and name children
Whatever new children we might have painted by the names
Of homeless caesuras;
And if you can only see this, or even hear this the way the Snow melts from the very summits down to the palmed and Balmy:
That I love you- and before we are only epitaphs,
Ant-sized calligraphies underneath the surcease of starry tides,
That you might wake up from your cat nap,
Your nipples perking- yes, and yawning, and realize that you do-
You truly do love me,
Only that you have forgotten, as I have forgotten that I
Was beautiful enough for you,
So that in that brilliant memory we might go tramping together,
If you really loved me,

And so we left together across the tresses of sand barred
Seas,
Our eyes yoked together,
The yellow light running over your piercing,
You eyes shining like the goddess come down from Her higher basins and queenly-acanthine estuaries.

Robert Rorabeck

Quiet Reasons To Live

Cool, cool ashes
Floating through the yard's grasses,
Makes me remember the pantheisms
Of the easy and commercial road-
This is how it looks to me out the pastoral verandas
From my window-
Everything so painless and beautiful,
And in the morning,
If I am up early enough,
The bus will be waiting not far from
Where the lions are snoring;
And if it is the correct season,
By seventh period,
I will be well drunk,
And the skies despotic,
And stormy,
Somehow as beautiful as her lips when
They are beaten, and pensive,
And giving me quiet reasons to live.

Robert Rorabeck

Quiet Singing

No more playgrounds' naked play-
I don't have to skip school anymore,
I just hit the sauce- Not a ribald clear,
But a ribald lost,
Something to sooth the pain all dampened
Out in the long green yard;
Across the street, there is a pale light,
And it is making us aware that a child is Crying,
But I don't live here. This yard to a pure white House isn't mine. I haven't even been here,
But I imagine it is where she lives,
Where she draws her waters from the well,
Bending across bosomy in yellow crinoline:
Peach divine, without scars- When I first learned
To walk and sing, I didn't know I was doing it for Her, but I was- Going straight south to sunny Florida,
And she was somewhere out there too, just budded, Getting tossed. How could I know what she could Be, and that she would come so near,
And given all her free time enjoy her movies;
It is a sad thing to think about that I haven't even seen her,
But the moon is a pretty thing and it is real because Cars go by under it to and from the sea, sometimes disappearing
Beneath overpasses, but returning, proving their existence,
And her- And this is her house so pale and fine,
Like something ancient made by the waves resting on the Endless planes by which we know our lives.
There out front, children are coming to and from school,
And older children and doves- an entire arc of school kids,
And soon she will step out and show some ankle;
She will whistle, her blue eyes lost and following cars;
Perhaps the invisible moon, if it is true,
And I will tip back my glass and once more
So quietly sing.

Robert Rorabeck

Quietest Of Songs

Words pinioned to the ciphering holes of eyes
Into each all of our bodies swim and we can perceive,
Even while the night is dying,
As day's mother grieves; and it is all false, but to this Beauty we fling like fire going along its lines,
Like school busses speeding to get to school on time:
I have thought of you here:
I have bled alone all of my life for you here; and if you saw Me today, you would not wonder anything about me,
As I would be common to your senses: just another opposition to Your sexes; and maybe that is why I have fought so quietly
For your flowers for so long, even while another man
Has won you, laying the senses of his body nice and long
Under the caesuras of your privileged mountains:
I lay my feet nearer the torpid canals:
The traffic of tourists bugles hunting commonly above me,
While I sing and sing to you my quietest of songs.

Robert Rorabeck

Quietly, The Lake Intercedes

I'm not here, but the traffic moves,
Doesn't it- all day? That is inevitable, back to
And forth from work- through the shady shadows
And the palms, so close to the persuading gravity the Sea takes on from the moon:
So even when you cannot see it is there, like beautiful Ancestors lounging in graveyards too careless now to Say a thing. Not worried much about us anymore,
The avenues once patrolled through the singular prevalence
Of human desire- Like these words I flick away
Trying to blind immortality so that he might fall into me
And sleep, before I get too fat and lazy to go out and stroll
The shore for new mermaids, the inevitable curves that will Certainly come, but will never happen again once they are Over- Surely now, the novel will not find its voice,
Not even for the experienced older gentlemen whose time
Has come; but certainly people are outside even now,
Kissing, brushing slightly and considering marriage. In fact,
I am sure of it: We are all doing all that we know how.

Robert Rorabeck

Quilt Of Séances

The waves turn themselves green,
To help you feel better,
But they only end up reminding you of her
Birth stone,
And the trees she walked liberally under
Humming to the chanting of the Krishna's free food:
But she was a meat eater all in all,
And a good one, which added to the Luxury of her form she wore modestly in three dimensions:
Her lips added another, and they were all
I had room for:
The storage space of my memory filled up
By her lips,
By my dead aunt's lamps,
And my grandmother's quilt of séances-
They once touched my neck,
And as you can see I am quite done for:
The limpid tattoo of the penultimate female
Occupied by her silver tasseled phalanx of roman legionnaires,
She is now the burnished bride of the very Same haplite who pricked the messiah's ribs,
Who took the pine stick and stuck it in the Bicycle's silver spokes,
And afterwards shot Lorca, and buried him anonymously
In the navel between the sad hills of Spain;
But I do not love her, you understand,
Because I am full of little white lies who come out
Of me like fireflies when the sun is done cleaning the earth,
And she knows nothing of green;
Born in October, a domesticated witch,
Her birthstone is the semiprecious Opal....

Robert Rorabeck

Quinceanera Balloons

I drank a lot of beer: I was the drunkest man on the boat
That left beneath the bridge where I used to meet Kelly for lunch
Months ago;
And I caught a forty-pound king fish, while the fishermen harangued me,
While I sang sea-shanties and waited for the flood to overcome
My blood and motion me into the direction that I could Go,
And I watched Alma flirting with my father again today:
I wonder if that is what all the girls do who are from Mexico: Alma, our Lives are so fleeting and our chances are so few,
And I ate my lunch today in your truck with you, and I was so frightened
As you told me a little more of your revenue,
Of the boyfriend who you loved while your husband was away, until
He came back to you;
But, Alma, do not be afraid, it is you whom I love, and that cannot take that Away from you,
And I can make our children so, so brave, and I can command them to build Green castles for you,
And we can laugh across the terraplane underneath the airplanes cutting a Rug through your sister's quinceanera balloons;
And because it is you whom I love, Alma- and you can hurt me if you Want,
But they cannot take that away from you.

Robert Rorabeck

Quip

My dog smells like Chinese food.

Robert Rorabeck

Quivering Like A Prize

Deep in the stolen rabbits of my chest,
The day thrusts like a roman spear into the spirit of our Lord:
The sun trumpets, a fugue of sweat, and words
Caracole of the meaninglessly forked tongues of rattlesnakes:
There in the soiled halos of the bosque,
Someone takes a bribe: and it becomes official and gossiped
About through the turn stalls of the gas stations
That I had no faith in her, her beautiful brown eyes
Quivering like a prize and the truth buried so deep in them,
Suffocated by so many lies.

Robert Rorabeck

Quixotic

It cost me a dollar to read Don Quixote,
But the look in her eyes as she put out the sharks
Was worth it.
And the sea was the teal of a tennis court,
Where you could almost see the short-skirted gods
Herding the red deer up the steep jaw of the Albino Titans;
All of that was extinct, and the oil rig was a
Farting hermit squatting on the pot of the sea,
But it was a cheap show anyways,
And when the curtains began to close in that smoky Dance hall, I saw her for the last time, taking Her bosomy bows, the grizzled men crunching cigars
And clapping on their legs,
Moting dusts into the searing candle flames;
As she disappeared in the folds of claret satin,
I was almost sure I could see the rim of areola,
Like a ruddy shelf, and the bite marks from
The wolf young suckled on her potent milks-
Those who had founded Rome.

Robert Rorabeck

Rage Like Klaus Kinski

In our apple-pie and marmalade
Culture the mother's womb is the first Bell Jar the baby is placed
In
Glass pornography
With the Bird of Time
So when it comes out
It is trained
To not cry when the sterile knife
Cuts away the nature
Nor to rage against the death
In the market place;
And they do not bleat
When led into the shops
To put themselves on
The clothing of social skin
Where the Sanhedrin meet ;
They do not rage like Klaus
Kinski;
They are cut off from the Ferality of the first man,
The Wrath of God is not in them
When they wash their hands
In the stagnant water behind
Their homes where they swim
And they are like every other Man inside his cage,
Docile at feeding time,
Being fed the regurgitation of the Masses,
Slowly flooding the muddy banks
Of the delta,
Like a herd of cattle being led
To gorge the streamline sharks
Waiting outside the stores
And parking lots,
Hunting in the great cutting blueness
Beyond the slime ringing
The spoon fed mouth.

Robert Rorabeck

Rain Abates

Rains abate,
But the sky remains perturbed:
Fumbling through my bachelorism, I put my Money in a new bank;
My dogs are wet and chasing expensive cars
Through the effluvious jag of novel water-
My parents walk upstairs, while unperceived
Waves kiss the saturnine beach even now:
How poetic,
How poetic, and how slightly true,
But where do her legs open the parse of lies?
And how the sailors bemoan the tiresome seas,
The restless caesuras, the unabated embrace of Nature's bosom, the laughing tellers proceed to Count the bills, fondling, fondling,
And then away for lunch: Soon the sun will Draw back the curtains of the infernal stage and sing,
And sing the rhapsody of evaporation,
But where do her legs lie now above the coffin,
So far away, though when touched reverberating
With shivers like the sensitive glass brought To the lips, the tiny circumferences of diminutive
Planets, revolving in the ignorant sky,
At first a child and then a man walking through
The forest and the dunes,
Fumbling through my bachelorism; The sky
Remains perturbed, though the rain abates,
And grows as still as a mantis on the curling bit of Leaf, done calling her name, now in the silence
Of unreciprocating prayer.

Robert Rorabeck

Raining Now

I rip off—the times of her eyes—
Like paper roses clasped like tissue paper in
The hands of an unrequited
Chimpanzee—
We kissed in the zoo sometimes
Long ago,
The adulterous fairy tale
That the ducks and the imposters wondered About—
So few words spoken from an amphibian's
Heart not knowing which World she belonged to,
While the shopping malls pretend to be Churches,
And we were just getting started,
But when it rained
She didn't want to come over to my House and make love—
Well, it is raining now
And she is still not here

Robert Rorabeck

Rainstorm Above An Umbrella

Listen to my beating heart like a
Rainstorm above an umbrella
Invented in the time before inventions—
And now I can almost swear to you
That I am still right here
Panting like a leopard done with the Livingrooms of housewives even though
They remain still in them:
Gathering their chandeliers and looking
Out into the mud storms:
Aren't they yet perplexed over what your Birth will mean to me:
Crossing the world into a daydream no one cares
About—and all of the cars are abroad
And crying like the prettiest vortexes in their Kaleidoscopes: until it happens again,
And nothing new is made,
But that strange pornography takes shape again,
And we are rooted into our otherwise purpled séances
And we have to look beautiful,
Shaking our hands and kissing our stars,
Because the rest of the neighborhood is looking to us,
Staring out of rain streaked windows and trying furtively
Just whatever it is that we are made in to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Rainwater In A Barrel

While I was thinking of another girl's atoms
and how even though distant from her
I had touched her
once or twice on the cheek
and how bits of her skin
must have come off
like invisible apples
and mingled around with my bits
and all those bits dancing and have posotronic $ex
before my eyes
unseen ballerinas you
were playing Little Red Riding Hood
in a dark forest of books thinking of your high-school
crush-
you'd f- anyone
and not even think about their atoms,
just to get rid of me
when I some dysfunctional Plato
was content to feel
the unfelt flesh
of my dear love-dryad-
from a distance
let her envelop me
with subatomic particles
and let her eyes and organs
revolve like hurricanes
inside my head, a flashing
galaxy of her parts,
but I wasn't cheating
you had to go get
f-ed by some
booky, hook-nosed nobody
and I bet you
didn't even think of

the tiny bits of him
floating around your head
in our bedroom
you destroyed
with his c^m
overspilling your vag-na
like rainwater in a barrel.

Robert Rorabeck

Rainy Spades

The penumbra found him on a rain day,
And they sat together playing cards;
The brightest moonlight hung over them
Like a roof the rain snuck through,
As the lamps slipped into the blotted swamp;
Here the orchids had died in inky jest,
And the bump on the log barked at the cat fish-
The red hollies bent down to drink,
And their poison was plucked by suicidal gold fish.
When the alligator just smiled like a
Statue down at the bottom step,
And the earth continued its weeping like
A scorned teenager on the verge of seventeen;
The card game continued playing,
Though now even the Aces were soaked through
And ripped.

Robert Rorabeck

Rapture

Open wounds abide without windows,
Here where the children are walking to and from Points of knowledge, in and out of shade,
The foraging of budded professionals,
Two good legs on concrete and tattoos.
This is not Oregon, for it is flat and the sea
Is near, with humidity drinking slow gin fizz,
Where I pass others knew me not,
Asphodel and potted plants, I saw her last
On religion's steps, but she was nothing famous.
Timelessly, and again, they make love until
They unhinge, forgotten acquaintances, winnowed
Into newer lives with more abandon, and up
The hill the black university, the porous Segregations.

□

Half a decade since I saw the show,
Old friends now progenitors, contributors to Nurseries, farmers of cleft and plough,
Lovers on the green and bowling drunken in
The air-condition, or lifting weights indoors in
The lights: a bolero of pattering hearts and jogging Legs on red clay near midnight applauded by Empty bleachers. Even when I was near them,
I faced west and read in the graveyards, but
For instances my fingers touched that beautiful
Sin, a cemetery of classrooms to which my Sophomoric ambitions handed out the syllabus
To the morticians and grave robbers,
Noting how they came in trains in full penumbra,
Glowing silhouettes hung out of cheap apartments,
The cats howling over the pool's chrysanthemum glisters,
Only to graduate once again into the night
Where no one saw the vines reclaim them rapturously.

Robert Rorabeck

Rattlesnake In My Gut

Rattlesnake in my gut:

Coiling: milky, pregnant, eating the grapes like small

Venison:

How long will it take you to exist, or cease to exist,

Rubbing your pearly belly like bragging up against

All of my scars:

And other kids who have all fallen in or out of

High school,

While the cars just putter on the asphalt underneath the cooling

Religions of the rain;

And the classes behind them left unfinished, the clay beautiful

But unripened without the foresight of the kiln:

The post office red but unread- almost bankrupt,

But in the midnight of its straying, the elk come in through

The simple crossroads,

Stumbling, sniffing the fresh paint, and scarring the façade

With the insatiable needs of their antlers:

The feral crowns of earlier metamorphosed kings:

While the highways of the state lie newly languid, cool and

Basking,

And the horses across their ventures stand as still as statues,

Having already eaten the resilient presence of the wildflowers

In that outstanding valley in which, later, I was all but made.

Robert Rorabeck

Rattlesnake's Chant To The Hunting Bird

Hunting birds scream that they should
Have seen the fish in the river,
The girls in the stream; but they have to Settle for rattlesnake and his tambourine;
He chants hissing,
I will make you see what I have seen,
From my belly along the streams
The girls who are chanting to the sailors
They feed, They will never love you,
Never love you- Strange hungry bird,
Though you might look good in the sun,
From side to side, we will make you hear
What we have heard- The women who desire
Your sense of flight but not your love.
Feed us if you will to your children, but you
Are just not enough that thing- Women shall love neither
Of us, laughing on their school bus- but we Do not desire them. We gave them their first Knowledge, their first death, their first reason
To orgasm, and for us that is enough- While you
Are just a bird hunting what it can never hope to kill.

Robert Rorabeck

Reading My Poetry

Cheeks stained with the tears of baseball
That somehow Alma cannot see:
I told her I have all of these scars in her car:
She laughed at me,
And she let me kiss her, and for awhile to hold her hand,
While all the other cars moved as if in a fraternity of A band:
And the clouds did whatever they were doing:
She said that we could only be friends; that she must stop
Reading my poetry,
But then we made love, and we made love again:
The forest opened into the glades that sang for the affections of
Her eyes,
And when she drove away from me again, across the Parking lot of the fruiteria, that was when I went back into My own tomb and waited for her to call for me,
As some times she does:
She becomes a wetted mariposa when we are alone together,
Her brown skin prettier than anything I laid eyes upon in Highschool;
And I just want to take pictures of her pretty feet and hands,
Juxtaposed with my working scars, and the dirt in my nails:
I want to show how she can become an airplane for any man
Who opens his eyes upon her,
Even though she will only take away so few,
Her promises as finicky as birthday candles; but she makes Me glad that I had to suffer for so long,
And that my silent art is so pitiful if unabused, because now
It can all be for her- she can be my insufferable muse,
And the affluence of the world will never Off color us at all,
And we will swing together without echoes; and if I still had A shadow, it would only be for her.

Robert Rorabeck

Real Love

Nights mouth off through the trees:
Beneath their spatters of coned canopies,
The carnies are doing their job
In light bulb erections:
The carnies who come around like butterflies
Of luminent metals:
They don't give a damn how pretty you are,
Just get on the ride:
Then, while flying in a loop-ship,
It is all about the presocratic nature of this Woody fraternity:
Yes, the experiments of all that tide:
Motion without any travel directions,
The tremulous plum trees, the paper airplanes,
And we are the whores underneath them,
Doing good work, getting nothing done:
The way these rivers move,
The traffic seems to be making love underneath the Conducting lights,
And I want to take my headstone here to make love
With the gifts my parents gave me:
I want to squat in the grass amidst the tremendous flies,
All of them making so many eyes at me;
And say, here I am, here it is, whipping around-
I just go a haircut, so now I go swift;
Under the painted damsels, skimming the painted skiffs:
And I love it here,
And everything is all right all of the tourists gathered into
The slick rudeness and traveling together
Through the tinseling cricks where my muses are so Utterly debased, and thus made better for the occupations of Real love.

Robert Rorabeck

Really Is A Shame

Pushing the cerulean fugue
There you go now-
Starting out down hill with all
Your friends,
Not letting me get a second chance
To get tongue tied by how Your indescribable eyes quench on Sunlight
Until they are like inebriate twin
Sparrows
And swinging insouciantly over
The many legged hills
Of aerodynamic traffic,
Leaving me in their cartoonish dust,
The consumption of your
Windmills and ceiling fans,
Spots of blood like
Silly flowers in my cheeks-
You were even too lazy to Use your legs to move away,
Which really would have been Something to see;
And it really is a shame.

Robert Rorabeck

Really Quite Something

You're not my type, or I wasn't yours,
But the sky is green and filled with a great disorganization
Of letters,
And maybe even Disney-like swans:
Apollo's caravan where down beneath there are libraries
And girl's to unhinge like soda-pop,
Even special meanings to the places that seem very real:
And at night, jogging alone traffic filling the cone of an ear
Like a tremendously insouciant waterfall,
I can go beneath the church rising above the dammed everglades
And look at its spire it up and gutting the sky like the spear
Into the side of some fine young god and say almost Religiously that that is really quite something.

Robert Rorabeck

Really Something

A bunch of absent minded mothers are
All stopping in at one time
This morning
Because Saturday is Halloween and they Forgot their children's day school
Pumpkins;

But, I say- I am up to something,

And the sea is really something.

Robert Rorabeck

Really Want To Come

Traffic looks at me, slowed
Terrapin never dreaming of the canal they live
Back up next to,
Loving each others stink;
That the maggots save their lives,
When the girls want to come, they really want to Come,
But they hardly ever want to-
They are just as populous as ghosts,
So if they are even here then they are heaven sent,
Or they are heaven absent;
And I have gray hair and I have quieted and am not Going to the ballet,
But will hide out in the verdant landscapes for awhile
Missing my ear the ants and fishermen took away;
And the boats,
And the airplanes,
And the little boys laying beside me,
Making me smile as they are entangled like lovers with Their auburn bicycles;
And in the end they will swish their heads and bow doggie
Style off stage,
But eventually I will give one of them my crown,
My first child of this solar system;
That eternal pain of maggots fibrous in the staunch rains,
And I will make at least one of these skirted
Brats
Really want to come.

Robert Rorabeck

Reasons To Belong

Life tasseling with amber,
Slowly looking up, somnambulant into the Bedrooms of another
Ship: and now what is this: what is
This, sleeping
Head, but another daydream losing itself upon
The arc of another tree:
While the new day's fires start up slowly,
Climbing up hill,
Surmounting, and then casting a long shadow
Down through the valleys of another
Pilgrimage:
There amidst the limbless asphodels where
It has no reasons to belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Reawakened Sentiment

Look how demandingly the night proceeds,
So finely dressed in a gala of waves,
The undulations of such whimsical forces turning
So slowly while the tourists sleep, save for
The lovers necking beneath the cross lit by halogens,
And all the palm trees whispering in mass
Over the almost forgotten memories in conquests,
Of blue-shelled conquistadors in patinas of cormorants,
And nuns in shrouds of habits sunken in coffins:
This is what I mean, when I turn to say to you,
When every star has been named,
And all the grass mowed, and I can smell you
Just as fine as a blade in dew; finite our bodies shall Be, but while it lasts I will want you as infinitely as Each wave in this sea, and take nothing more from You than your open wrist, and turning it beneath the Secrets of building nimbus, kiss you where you thought
Least, and raise you in my heavens until you shine
Like an eastern star undiminishing, even in an awakened
Sky, and hold you still beating when the tourists drive
By, never thinking how even then they go so fleeting,
Though I am sustained by you,
Even as the waves tire, and with the tide are retreating.

Robert Rorabeck

Reconciliation

I put pieces of you on the threshold
Where the frogs wish to dance like Princes—
And the dogs pirouette with fleas—and
We all wait there to the smell
Of fried chicken and apple pie—
Never knowing when her husband will be Returning home:
And across the street there is a thicket
And a pornographic tomb:
But very soon it will be built up and built
Up,
So far underneath the heavens' swoon:
But the conquistadors will remain a pretty word
Lost at the doorstep of your epiphany, if You ever had one—
If your heart ever swam to me—and told me kisses
Of pretty blue gills—of watercolored mermaids—
In a kaleidoscope of waves that we can never remember—
Just another glass illusion spraying their bosoms
Onto the parapets—where the tourists are looking down
As the airplanes swarm with passengers above them—
Illusions upon illusions—
The sea busted apart and without hope of Reconciliation.

Robert Rorabeck

Red And Blue Shifts

There is still a storm echoing in silence
From the pit of the universe: measurable, and Good for science-fiction:
I like to pretend that myself too is in blue shift;
I go out into the great alluvial plains higher up
Where they keep the grizzlies, and get naked in A cerulean tarp. Now here the Aurora Borealis is kind
Of like a streaming curtain opened at the edge of space;
And now sounds are gambles. Maybe they are just recorded
Over the permafrost- Maybe they have already happened,
Are echoes, or premonitions- I'm not sure;
Yet down beneath in the states more readily lined the buses
Turn around, yellow, comely, depositing and picking up,
Keeping good time- tromping up the fine young students' legs
Yet learning where eyes fall like covetous super heroes and Arch villains under the merciless halogen lights of math class:
I don't care- I laugh- I eat crackerjacks! I am no more
A part of that invention. How could I ever get published, moving So far away, steadily tramping. Tomorrow I might even become Russian- I sympathize with the blue shift, the janitors,
The cleaners up of barren enterprise; and her legs?
And her breasts pressed up against her learning? Her areolas
Freckled silver dollars nipples pen to without milk: Without consciousness,
She turns the other way, dressed all in red, she is the wave which Goes through the door and falls into his arms.

Robert Rorabeck

Red In The Handlebars Of The Sun

Red in the handlebars of the sun,
Something always gold-
And I can hardly hold on:
I don't like to look where she is milking,
Busily enfolded with men from the earth
Who have learned to stand up straight
And dress well for the possibility of Her sex:
But I like to think she's looking at me,
Like something rather devilishly pollinated:
Something that can be bought for free-
There lapping, lapping almost broken
In the come along weeds;
And her soul is fibrous and doesn't digest
Easily- she works all day in her habitat
Of kiln dried clay- and the Busters queue;
And I like to ride around her, red in the Handlebars of the sun,
Until mother calls me home to dinner, and the Woods quiet, turn sepia and religious;
And I know planes are touching down-
But there is so much I have missed,
While she is busily congratulated, ornamented-
She is wedded into a sappy bough thrashed
To kill the gold of her day-
She is spread out the way a river mutates into mud;
And she is even more beautiful in secret, but there
She is gone-
The only thing left of her is my red face,
Just the flesh caught memory of being
When her bosom glistened before its epitaph red in
The handlebars of the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Red Light

The only evidence that he was once
A clown,
Was the way the bright pastels swirled
In the waters running under his chin.
Where he sat down and knelt
In the shadow of the bridge
While the gondolas paraded
Young love before him-
She was a garish whore
Neon in that window above
Where he sat,
A kitten in the crooked purr of her lap:
She invited men in suited and fine,
And mimed the Kama Sutra
Seven to midnight,
And afterwards....
And after that,
The moon a drunken midge on the Nape of the Negroid Sea,
She would clock out and waltz
And read Swan's Way
On the park bench under the tree
Nearby where he sold balloons,
Sold them for free....
And his love was for free.
Shouldn't she take his open hand
Offered for her
Near the park bench under the tree?
Laughing,
He would kneel to her and say,
"Won't you have me,
Right now- Hurry...."
But she couldn't imagine what he Could mean,
For love was such a dispassionate
Lucrative thing.
For she had many suitors,
Pomadened and fine
They strutted up to her room

At all sorts of odd times....
And she shouldn't give her heart to Just any old man,
Especially a clown with balloons in his hand.
And this is why he is crying in the river tonight,
Faceless and hopeless,
As love floats away,
She turns on the red light,
Beckoning strays.

Robert Rorabeck

Red Meat Hearts

Ants without liquor rejoining through the grass:
Soon it will be raining and muting the bed of their queen,
The way things happen to guitars left in the bluing grass;
But they are happy because it will mean that they Should leave off the junked cars of their blue collar pornography,
And go marching down to her luscious antechamber
And court her quite successfully with the successions of their red meat hearts.

Robert Rorabeck

Redhead

Don't tell me your Concerns for other people;
Just jump into my bed.

Robert Rorabeck

Redneck Bo-Jingle

Rednecks Bo jingle for rusted stars:

They come in for work: I wont give them any.

Black men come in and buy Christmas trees for

One hundred dollars. They are out and about and

Smiling, and I tell them goodnight and think of their

Perfect skin made from the sweltering savannahs

Of the unabashed kiln: I suppose I've loved them and

How they go, picking sad flowers along the insouciant

Highway, even as the mercuries of helicopters of

Hatters of asteroid belt cops search them out:

I don't look right, and I don't look them right in the eye:

Ten percent of me is racist, but it is a good portion of

The good half, yet still un homogenized and getting filthy

Rich. Brian has a pin and needle tattoo of a hefty cross

On his left bicep: Or my vision mirrors like a princess:

Her legs skipped parallel beneath the bare-chested reservoir

Of thirsty water moccasins as she ran to the oasis of

Presocratic mythologies: I love her since we rolled together

On the wooly sherbet carpet of preschool, or looked her in

The pastel eyes of sorrow, but we'll get back to that,

For now I am warm and all right and typing in an RV as the Traffic streams up and down 441. Today someone robbed

A sub shop and cops on steroids searched the bushes, the Canal, and the Florida holy, or in that order: I wrote a poem

At 4 am, and this is my second poem tonight. At the library

I read an insouciant book, or it read me, as I repeated that word because it

Is one of the few big ones I remember, and checked to see if

The literary agent has responded. They have not, and I take that

As a good sign. The world is rocking as Pedro jacks off to one of the Many vermilion honeys, mostly Catholic who came in all busty

Today and as randy as baseball players swinging mahogany sticks

Up in the red anthill of their mounds: I have things for them too,

And video games and a wishing-well, and this is a poem that

Has forgotten all there is to know about unicorns,

Which is the beauty of the girls with angelic bone structures from

High school now all trapped in a shallowness of a fading sea,

Kept not so far away at all; and in those shoals

Urchins mauve and ready, the palm's stigmata, revealing a

Tourniquet as religious as a pomegranates' blood, as rich

As a glass of fruit juice she pours for me
Next to the patio in a mote of feature less sunlight
As the Mexicans cut the grass up and down in Perfect rows.

Robert Rorabeck

Reflecting The Heavens

Nothing good left in the supermarket—
Nothing missed or passed over by the eyes of the stewardesses
Having touched down even in the superficial hours
After midnight and wondering around
In the twenty-four hour playgrounds—
They are trying to size things up, their legs increasing their Vocabularies—
Their hands and the parts of their bodies which lie naked
Suggesting the rest of themselves to the men or foxes that see them,
Enjoy holding those material possessions that add up
To the increases of a lonely happiness—
And when they drive by, the parks are just as silent as the Graveyards, and the swing sets have already been taken down—
The places they move beside just as blue as the next—
Back in their grottos, they have marionettes just waiting for them—
And ticking crocodiles they have taught to cry—
The language of poets trying to enfold them, but they shed
The words that wish to don them as muses—and they walk Around by themselves—grape vines for the foxes—
An artwork give aesthetic truth to the shoals—
A pornography that reflects the heavens in every design.

Robert Rorabeck

Reflection

I don't want to read what is written:
I wish I couldn't read at all.

It is worse than looking in the mirror.

Robert Rorabeck

Regular Lines Delivered Fresh

Getting ready to go to the dump,
The sun is itching on the glass, and all that Cornucopia that poetry might be is Spilled out onto the wildflower fields in
The high basin. Here, its so easy to believe in Angels, and tourists stop to watch our Standard bred horses from afar, so they Cannot smell them as they mow the yard.
To reproduce the infinite is to spring from
The graveyard, but leaping is made impossible
By the pounds of grubby earth, or the lack of Stanzas, and the distance of friends and ancient Teachers. Nothing sells that isn't perishable,
So such a line should be engraved in stone,
Each thought is smooth and feral and sleeps
Beneath the house picking bones; and we leave
Them going down dirt roads to relatives who We never visit, and the dusk lays heavily on the Eyes who look far out upon the yard and the Croaking sombulence, filled up with secrets
So regularly, that people have stopped noticing,
And yet still might enjoy the regular visits
Of the pizza delivery boy.

Robert Rorabeck

Regular Motions

Jerk my bones into
The desert for oil—

These seashells are Fossils without time—

I am going to fight for
What I know,

Even if the voice in
My head
Ain't Jesus

Robert Rorabeck

Rehearse

Curious air balloons flatulent over the heads of My Fair Lady;
They are starring her in a prom of swamps and air-plants;
And there's a better name for it, where I eat alone,
My private theatre of dead cats the artistic canines
Paste like Christ onto the cactus garden,
Made them perfect saints:
The dogs were as white as bone; the moon was as white as Dogs,
And the pornographies rested under the rootless trees like Teardrops- paper dollops, pamphlets for Christmas in Cars on blocks;
And looking at my friend's mother knocked me off my horse;
She was mostly naked in her backyard after winter,
And the pool had so many colors it couldn't decide, drooling
As it did over her body;
And we played while we were still alive:
Seventh period was my time to get drunk at school, to drive
Away and say hello to the sea, the drive back again and choose
My college;
And I am going back again, my cheek courting in drool,
Pretty women virgins to the rag, carrying around the promontories
Of England in their purse;
They didn't need to wear shoes, but they did;
And even when they'd all dispersed like frantic magpies from the F$g, I sat at my lunch lake and ate it alone,
Cried as a rehearse.

Robert Rorabeck

Reignited With That Fire

I will silence you without any grief while the Sun is in his high orchard and all of the heroes have Gone to sleep:
And this is my world, while I stare at pictures of Myself with my wife,
And my grandfather sleeps in Tennessee—
How he dreams of my grandmother who I Remember burying underneath the strained perfections of A cross atop the end of the hill her little house sits
Beneath—next to the ashes of her oldest daughter,
While my mother leapt about her—hot embers
Waiting to be reignited with that fire.

Robert Rorabeck

Reincarnating Sara Teasdale

Can we feel these atrocities from outer space,
But only alone,

The merit of your soul lies stamped under stone,

Propitious, and legal, and francophone:
This lugubrious marrow I am wanting to hold,

To cradle, and say a word and pet the cipher of
The echoing home,

The places where you must lay down to rest, the Nocturnal bloom,

And the drooling cusp of the cone which when morning
Will spill silent honey from the tip of the inked plume,

And through the rainy streets you must feel
The throbbing of my monstrosity's feral will:

To release spore with you around your dorsal fin,
And cuddle in the coral for only the morning of a waning day,

And after the brainless sport, look briefly through your Third eyelid, regain amnesia, swim away....

Robert Rorabeck

Reindeer Necromancy

If I raised their reindeer from the dead
The forest would die in soon processions,
The rains would come but have no matter,
Being for I am quite different from the boys in town.
If they knew my heart, they would play
Another game, and try to tame me with gifts
Of seeds, and show me pictures of their Mothers' legs they keep well beneath the beds,
Or tease me from the crooks of trees where Apples grown like winsome cheeks,
But I could take it all away, if their teasing continued
The trysts of evening's fermentations, the love
Affairs on aeroplanes. With a spanning sough,
My hands in the air could awaken migrations of mauve
And lilaced sorrows, the antlers' crux of moss
And rime, the ancient blood of oilslicks; their eyes,
Their eyes are even dusk, and the forest is weeping
Its good-byes, if I should pray and kneel by the River's silver knife, their kind would rise and where We went in misty crew, death would fingerprint
The golden throats of song-birds and paralyze the Beautified Olympics of her springy boughs,
All the same, until her eyes became a perplexing well,
And the high school a boggy plague.

Robert Rorabeck

Remembering All Those Things Which Couldn'T Possibly Be Real

Lost in the transcendental woods,
With a beard as knotted as Walt Whitman,
Pretty girls whistle at my scars,
And even when you get lost its like being in A Disney Movie,
Even when you know what's going to happen,
That there is a slab and a mortician with a scale
To weigh your brains,
And some hungry Mexican to go around afterwards
And pick up the spent fireworks from the weeds
And wildflowers,
Always careful of the rattlesnake's glowing,
Phallic venom,
And the tall-legged ways she wrote about how He'd slip through her exposed window after midnight,
Like a Chinese dragon;
And in the deeper parts of the woods there is incest
Infecting dreams, and rich Anglo-Saxon demiurge,
And suicide over foamy cataracts which
Are also beautiful women,
But we will not go that way: This is only a day hike,
A kindergarten for children to get lost and steal things
And then take breaks for lunch,
And they will not live forever here:
Their names will not resound or echo and swirl in the Obsessive compulsive basins,
And there will neither be time for plastic flowers
Or cenotaphs,
Because soon their steady parents will be coming back
Around from work, or the adulterous cloisters
With peanuts from the bar,
And they will pick them up and hold them in their Sweaty clairvoyant palms for a little while,
Telling them that this cannot happen to them,
That they will live just as long as everything else that Isn't real, and they might chastise us for a little while,
Even while we just smile and mow the cemetery's grounds,

And look up through the shaken stuttering of woods,
Remembering all those things which couldn't Possibly be real.

Robert Rorabeck

Remembering Her Alamo

If I love monsoons, its because they curfew
Mon freres,
Down in the river walks of San Antonio, where
The tourists paddle, and take snap shops of the Alamo,
And little white boys can still pretend they can be
John Wayne:
I care about pop-guns and grape soda,
And getting laid beneath fireworks before I thought
I was going alone;
And I am going to die- I'll become a red savage
And die somewhere in the neighborhood of your cleavage.
Your perfume lingers,
But in my playground the savages always win anymore;
And the alligators smile and wear expensive wrist watches
Which first caught their eye in billboards above the Long and lonely highway; but now they've gotten here,
And they have a good job and are getting married by the End of this Holiday,
And everything I love about you I wrote down in a postcard
I sent away- I've stolen the lovely rose from your hair,
And given it to the lonely river; it hardly ever moves anymore,
The tourists go across her so slow and easy;
And they ask her to bare children and name them after the heroes
Who died there.

Robert Rorabeck

Remembering That They Love

They keep their show on the busses until they get to
Disney World
Where they have to forget so many things they Have learned about life—
The pyrotechnics sing to them on weekend holidays,
Promising them they will be in love forever—
Above them, where there are no mountains—
The sky is a river of voodoo—
Where old insects reconnect with exoskeletons they Thought lost upon the bark of the paper tree—
Just as the knights dawn themselves for Jousting atop of ostriches
In the tournaments of worlds with racetracks of Purple moons—I can hardly believe in them—
But the sun comes up dog-tired come
Morning, and my parents
Peel off the dusky tracks to sleep in the horse trailer
Just as the sun is floating in its yellow parapets—
And the children turn around and go back to school—
Aspects of the forgotten day lingering on their Features—
And, yawning, they regress into their wayward classrooms
Trying their best to remember the things
That they have a hard time remembering that they love.

Robert Rorabeck

Reminiscing

Now there is no need for those words
Used to call her:
She standing out readily, her glittering stiletto
Up against the bricks; but not for you:
For you are a fool trudging with that balsam wood
Cross over the hills, the power lines swaybacked
Above the moist terrapins:
And supposing this is all fable, and the animals
Are making small talk, smoking generic cigarettes:
The hare's eyes are red and just out of high-school;
But certainly now you will not be published,
Even as you fall down in the grass and let the insects
Bother you, and laugh, for the dunes are near the sea
And over spilled with defeated conquistadors,
A word you could call out a thousand times to her from Over the toy seas of bathtubs, but it wouldn't do you
Any good, given her inclinations: Now she is nuzzling
Up to him, and bighting her lip: If you look long enough,
He will be doing it for her, and there will be blood in Secret little places, but don't try to save her,
Because she might enjoy it; so take your lunch out
Of the cafeteria and hide face down in the effluvious oil
Slicks, and skip across the scabby backs of Precambrian
Politics, if you are light enough, and then play the truant
Near in the parks where she readily comes; and swing
For her in the entrained arc, if you must; and wonder how Long clouds last, and if reformed remember themselves as they Spill in their cerulean avenues over the clean geometries of Suburbia's sectarian steeples,
Each pool glistening in semiprecious contrast to the Canal's flat ribbons; because she has already forgotten you,
And it is a long ways home, by foot or bicycle, giving plenty
Of time for reminiscing.

Robert Rorabeck

Reminiscing Of The Fanfares

And it is pleasant- isn't it- even though not Sincere-
In another town with the chorus girls dancing
With tattoos of tears on Their cheeks which just means that they've been In prison
And are now like goldilocks- I.e. a long ways
From home;
But what particular suburbia did goldilocks spring
From, anyways-
And who, exactly, did she have to work for:
While all of the cars pull in- examining the blooms:
They are a long ways from the lakes
Bled off the rivers, but they are right here-
Sunbathing in the exact marmalades of another
Holiday-
As it sounded like a gunshot this afternoon while
I've had a hard time holding my breath-
But the egrets stand stock still right over the tiaras
Shimmering in the ankle deep grasses:
And I wonder what it means, exactly, just as you kiss
Another mouth and wake up to go to school
Again, as the lightning blooms again over
Your shoulders- and it doesn't have to be any theft
That I would ever have to believe in-
But another rainstorm in between the bitter holidays
That forgot to take shelter once again, reminiscing
Of the fanfares of oh so long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Resting With The Butterflies

Are frailty, burning matchsticks in the daylight-
Kindled tallow in the classrooms,
In smoldering nuisances-
Piglets in the shivering cold rooms, under the
The dressing rooms of her Siamese eyes
Which are moons,
Wounded, blue and wonderful, and filled with Frightened animals that live
In her bareness's
And take shelter in her nakedness-
And she is up there,
Blackened off eye, but she pretends to Cry as she looks down
Over the smoldering crops of the funerals
Of our carnivals-
The Ferris Wheels resting with the butterflies
Who whisper to them of their own
Metamorphosis-
But the Ferris Wheels are envious, for they Know they shall never change.

Robert Rorabeck

Resurrected And Reoccurring

The trains seem to peel good in unicorn
Season:
Offering up their goods in linear cavalcades in open
Aired processions
In one long continuous arc through the sugar pines:
And they grow up storming through mountains,
Smelling the nudeness of birch,
And listening to the highfalutin echoes as they cry over
Fools gold in the grottos of suffocated
Canaries;
And they carry the working girls through the midnight
And into the new parking lots
Of petrified mother marries where the johns are waiting for Them with perfect bowties
Underneath the silver moons skipping like coins in An uncountable wishing well above the Bald and hoary throats of the mountains in their smoking
Rooms;
And though they finally curl around their stations, lactating
And collecting the Christmas presents
In a topless room that is chilly and airy, they have to Admit that it doesn't get any easier:
But all of the animals hush around them, and even with all of Nature's love making them to stirring,
It doesn't help them still- even with the lights out
And their engines purring: their beauty is perpetually resurrected
And reoccurring.

Robert Rorabeck

Resurrecting The Girls

How can you help this life pulled by a string-
Coming home again,
Dragging itself to the curtain where the backyard should Exist,
And crying to the midnight airplanes:
Looking up to the heavens where the gods should Exist, breathing through the soap operas,
Causing the stigmata's to occur upon the Chablis of Housewives even in the earliest of afternoons:
And the thunder disrupts the inevitable returns of the Commercials,
As the hurricanes turning like the saltlick of wishing Wells:
Turning and turning, and becoming a poem
For the eels that lay tightroped into her grottos:
I think it was where we were skipping school:
And I think it is where we will appear again, donning our Own departures,
And resurrecting the girls who cannot even remember our names.

Robert Rorabeck

Retreating Butterflies

When school disperses the many brilliant promises
Recorded in her playgrounds that Remain unknown- even in the middle of the day,
When truants pass across the canal,
And all the sky is green and as curious as an Arsonist learning a wooden violin-
Where will we go, but across the shoulders of the Playgrounds,
Forgetting even our peers with angelic bone structures:
And leaping as if waves ourselves, burning down
The cul-de-sacs, telling lies to unicorns that have Wound up as housewives:
That even they will soon be leaving us, as our little World evaporates- as if all the parts of our bodies
Surcease, lying in the shallows
Reduced to the brilliant minerals of wedding rings
And retreating butterflies..

Robert Rorabeck

Return To Beauty

How can I show you beauty,
If you will not first give it to me with your Tongue,
And allow this fieldtrip of baby fat
Patrols to stroll through the capitol
Where important men have erected marble
Phallus' to your legs:
The Mississippi, and The Colorado;
And to your breasts,
The Smoky Mountains, and The Rockies,
And to your sadness,
Niagara Falls and the lesser cataracts,
As to your wombs, The Atlantic and
The Pacific-
Thus we patrol you on your highways
Evacuating the tarnished gloom of inner cities,
Out to the heartlands where your chest
Rises like a child excited on a bicycle,
Trying to make it up the hill where you will
One day breastfeed my child;
Where the sky is your thoughtful brow shadowed
With troubles,
And yet the coolness of watercress when bent over
Me, like an apocryphal pieta, where I lay
About the briar patch of my easy work,
As if two doves alighted to make love in cotton
Field in between their perches of skyscrapers:
Feel my like the rich earth, and touch me as Gently as you would the first evidence of life
Struggling from the furrows,
And in the secret thicket where we glide over
The muddy lake in our trusty tire swing,
Kiss me and show me the beauty which I longingly
Wish to return.

Robert Rorabeck

Returned To Me

In a bed of slopes and tongues that are
Nodding off- the wounds we can only give our selves
When we really did masturbate not to far
Off amidst the Christmas trees
While the traffic was humming and spinning around,
Like our mothers in graveyards-
And then the wars that filled up with the warmth of tourniquets;
The children blowing on their chains
Like bulbs that were still cooling; or the day that I looked up
From the sea to find myself floating in Alma eyes- and the nights in which I sing to her,
And find her almost returned to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Returning To The Echoes Of Her High School

Days begotten of firework chiefs:
Mighty good days, where tomahawks chew
Scalps red under unfiltered sunlight:
Then we knew who we were, what was going on,
Biting our lips lustfully,
Chewing gum as the classes grew-
In the time of mighty chiefs of teal headdresses,
Of papier-mâché beliefs,
I passed Sharon in the halls, my face flaming with Burning paper:
Sharon seemed to smile sadly at me, going through
Her avenues;
But how to describe her avenues,
I don't know them-
I thought of Sharon outside of class-
I almost seemed to die underneath the school bus,
As I lost myself further and further into my Body's loneliness:
All the terrapins went away. The alligators stopped their Weeping,
And my sister was no longer a wishing well I could Throw pennies of hope.
Then buses that were my crèche no longer returned,
And what did Sharon do but fly away,
The perennial bird that no longer was perennial:
She destroyed the word,
And now I know nothing except that all of this liquor
Tastes like returning to the echoes of her high school.

Robert Rorabeck

Rhinoceros' University

This spore walks on the open lips of a
Book like a living miniature of
The skeleton of a parasol;
And I think of kissing her in similar toy ways
In the fully enfolded spring of the earth:
We live in the same country,
But I am afraid we see things all too differently;
I live in the clutch of a cloud, come down to go shopping,
Then rise up again with the whimsical identities of nimbus.
She works all night in a bar and kisses the men that Come in to be served drinks by her,
And the further affections of the rhinoceros' university;
So this is the silver cut, the almost death,
The poisonous leaf pounded into tea,
Brushed by the lips of someone who knows and
Is too afraid to die: To leap upon the lightnined wilderness,
The scarred beauty above the passionate sea of darkened blue....
She will not come around, for the sun does not reveal her
When it reveals everything; A tributary leading to The ocean separated by a continent, I cannot touch her,
For I am too afraid of something that must last.

Robert Rorabeck

Rhythmic Tongues

I couldn't give another thing to this or you,
Without rum, I wouldn't read poems out loud, or
Drive skipping into the poesies of the just:
I might just sit and drool in the chintzy corrugations
Of some trailer park: In two weeks, I've made
$100,000 off these fools, and admired the tawny
Busts of mothers and daughters in matching sets,
High-heeled China dolls newly made and getting paid for;
Such is the thing, the swing they give; they don't Even know how they sing, or what they give to me, in little Ways, farting so tightly like the highest notes from the chin of
A piccolo, walking to and from the whitish tent of the Christmas tree salesman: they are here, and so am I,
Because they made it after school, and I am my father's son:
I get the good spot under the sun, spinning pinwheels off my blistered
Lips until my time is through: I can hardly look them in the eye;
I don't tell them how big I am, or how many mountains I
Have climbed: I either look good or like a fool, but everything
Else is leaping away, and all of it is escaping. Once there was Only high school, as white as porcelain or an unhatched egg;
I talked to her in the echoes heated from the courtyard, until
It was time for class, and the far-away sway of mind into more
Hypnotic gardens- Afterward, the yards were green and well-mowed
Like constabed boards of absent professionals, and I took their Daughters by the neck and said into them like empty vases, until
They were filled up and valuable and soon well placed. Then
I laid across them, sprawling with my checkered knapsack and
Pinafores, and pretended to know about sports, and the manipulations
Of weather; and it was so humid, it was like French-kissing her or Serving her they way they do it in places just underground, by those Ancient things just hidden by the sheerest fabric, easily unhooded and Set to rhyme schemes by rhythmic tongues, or so the rum had told Me, making me speak thus, mamma.

Robert Rorabeck

Ribbons In A Sea

Ribbons in the sea, what will you do-
Now there is a fabulous holocaust,
As you come down from the mountain,
Losing your candle wax on the rocks- going forever
According to the way she does,
Sleeping in her midnight busses, underneath the Armpits of marionettes,
Or inside a dark forest that never stops to linger
For its knights-
Filled with witches underneath the seething stars,
Keeping wolves for pets
Who melt the snow to get to the wild nurseries
Before the foxes
To eat the things that grow- underneath the spindles
Of her sorority,
And through her clefts which tend to lose a Person,
Especially a man who falls too deeply in love with her.

Robert Rorabeck

Riches Of A Misbegotten World

This is a good sipping rum- I have dolls
From Haiti and Peru in my kitchen,
And chameleons that run through my yard-
When I was very young,
I stared hypnotized at the fields where the Cheerleaders left
Metamorphosed into stewardesses, broiling
Confections and stains of honey:
I am sure they went up to be willing captives
Of the gods we misspell
In freshmen English- loving whispers of the Ways that we conjoin again-
Bullet holes of twins overlapping in the Darkness,
As the comely suspects get away, blooming
Cadaverous and spoiled
To simmer underneath the kindling riches of A misbegotten world.

Robert Rorabeck

Ride In Disney World

Abandonment that
Knows itself shut in to the cathedral of the stars—
Like some sort of witchcraft placed Upon a spacecraft dancing in the sky over
A beautiful world—
Black magic in a plastic bag with a blind gold
Fish—
And all of the times I told you to look up
Into the sky as the fireworks burned—
And when it was over—
Nothing:
Some in the clouds—eventually a castle
That evaporated over the forts of Saint Augustine—
As you pretended to make love to my heart
As if it was a ride in Disney World.

Robert Rorabeck

Ride The Rhyme Forever

Her stars weren't filled in:
When she kissed me, it was during nap time.
I had a fist full of woolly carpet
And orange diodes for wishing:
She loved my best friend better,
But he was a redneck,
And I knew where she lived,
But I can't remember her last name;
Ain't it funny how the time plays,
Like catastrophic floods-
All the faces in the coloring books:
Super heroes of mice and men,
And little dogs who eat their porridge;
Scribbling fairytales of all the wrong colors:
Goldilocks unafraid in the woods,
And the rabbits who escaped their hutch,
Made it out alive and colonized the Sand-dunes veined with fossilized conquistadors,
For two years breeding in the
The papal flecks which made the sailing
Lights gleam, like fine actors in the wild
And the mauve runoff of the junked cars
In the Australian pines filled with pornography.
Of course, I am not saying it right,
Though there were naked women
In human-sized hotdog buns,
And Chelsea was the first thing I loved;
I suppose, but now that place is filled with Mexicans, out of work and panhandling at Home Depots:
They are red like maize and chili,
And I know some of their names,
But not where she lives anymore:
They paved those roads way back when
A fieldtrip in kindergarten to the Flagler Art Museum:
Naked women in bowls of gelatin,
And the never ending sea like an amusement
Ride:
You put a quarter in the meter,
And you can ride the rhyme forever....

Robert Rorabeck

Riding Through The Gardens

In rainstorms we made love
Even as we began to die- outside of the high schools
Where the angels
And the airplanes began to cry:
And I suppose you cannot even picture me
Now but I am still right here,
Singing out through the Habitual windows,
Trying to dry my wounds in the fireworks of the Sunshine:
As all of this is your Miami
Licking its wounds, as the beaches glisten,
As the sunlight swoons:
In rainstorms we made love, but it is not alright
Now- this is how I've been Spilling out of my shell,
While the stained glass glisten in the beaches of Phoenix,
In the dreams of the desert that never has to awaken,
And I feel myself
Riding through the gardens with bicycles held up
The heavens, but only because they are supposed
To be the most beautiful thing held
Over above the earth, even though they have sunken-
And after midnight,
All of the beautiful girls, metamorphosed from Their roses- have stolen all that they are worth.

Robert Rorabeck

Ring Around The Rosy

Another impermanence for the early tomb:
Nothing else to do,
But to see you as you lay for him,
A near perfect psalm,
He absentmindedly hums as he goes
Down to work in your mines:
The greedy man,
And you a bright fairy excavated from the earlier time:
Not even knowing who you are,
But liking the reverberations
Of minerals in your hidden cleft:
If I came to you while he was off
Buying supplies in the boom-town
Of ghostly providences,
Could we say that given a chance,
I would do better work:
Keeping the pitch until there in
The sky floated the masks of unborn children,
The subtle doom of the Hollywood starlet:
Let us read the lines together,
And smile in the week's knowing glance,
And without a second thought
I will submerge and begin the Underwater welding:
On the continental ridge the earthquake starts,
Which shivers the city of your lips-
Pulling back the fauna,
The miniature opal glade where
The marble fawns lay:
The hymns better known to grandmothers
In the awakened youths-
The spot of light glossy with
My tongues rhyme,
The conceptual make-belief,
And the familiar nursery rhyme
I can give to you,
And you swim outside the rented windows
In the twilight hours
Precluding the early conceptions.

Robert Rorabeck

Rings Around Her Knees

Moonlight on your side of the world—
Around there, a political labyrinth that is so Easily dissolved—
Melted away with enough desire—
And all of the mountains lactating, bare-titted—
Over spilling with song birds falling asleep
In the sunlight—
And my mother metamorphoses—comes Down with herself from the keyholes of
The snowy rafters that seem to have caught a tear—
Becomes the instrumental lactates
Collecting through the valley's choruses—
Like the aquariums of rum in my belly—
She goes downward in a somnambulant rollercoaster—
As she matriculated towards her daughters,
She seems to be growing younger—
Soon she will be a minnow—
Soon she will be a swordfish—as the candlelight strikes
Across the stars—
Goddesses on a holiday lost in the picnics of Jupiter—maelstroms of bouquets sent to her—
Ships busied in the daydreams of the seas leaping
Like happy whelps for the scuppernongs growing in Rings around her knees.

Robert Rorabeck

Rise- Rise!

The day has died like a beautiful pledge coming so close
To making love to the sea:
The day has died, and all our work has done:
We sold so many cantaloupes and unicorns- and the buses of America passed,
And the impatiens went to sleep beneath the mangroves,
And beneath the graves,
While, Alma, I think of you, while I eek out another tear as if
From stone:
Your body has twenty-four years, but what of your soul:
You have the soul of your grandmother, Alma- you eek out of your Soul:
The tears of your body like butterflies on the cliffs of Mexico;
And I can hear airplanes, Alma: I can hear all of the stewardesses leaping Over me,
And you asked me today who was Sharon- Sharon, like the shadow
Of a cat leaping over the play of your ancestors:
Alma, I don't know who she is, but she is as white as the snow:
But you, Alma: Alma, you are as brown as the forests of Mexico:
You are as sweet as the furniture of those unadulterated woods, un compromised
Saved for one tattoo on your tiny little wing: Alma, what does it mean,
And is the world turning north for you,
Alma- with your eyes as sweet
As the graves of your abuelas - but you have promised to come and See me first thing tomorrow, and if you do, Alma:
Alma, can't you imagine how those sweet graves of our ancestors
Will rise- rise!

Robert Rorabeck

River Styx

They have a system for sorting their patients,
Though everyone is dying.
They put me near a window where
I can stare out and look at her,
Next to the narcoleptic general
Who happens to be my grandfather;
He kept nodding off while the bombs fell,
And telling his battalions they were Doing a good job,
As they lay massacred in buzzing thickets
And roses bloomed like
Redheaded stepchildren out of the Places where they had the greatest wounds
In a fallout Spring misty on the gristly hillside.
There is a beautiful man without any Legs, without any arms,
Without any eyes
Who spends all day singing sea shanties,
As his motionless body is taken out with
His mind's tide.
I've tried to look away.
I've tried to call her, but she is swallowed
Up by the ringing orders of the immaculate father.
There is a glowing priest escaping with the Newly dead through the reeds on the bank,
While starving dogs bark at the Next wing of planes banking to deposit
The magic bombs
Clocking the ghost towns
Causing skeletons
To clap and sing
Abracadabric peonies.
The drooling mouth of the grave
Is getting full;
It is backing up like a clogged sewer line
And the abstaining sisters sit along the Border's wall,
Like crows in a habited line and cast down blessings,

The petals amputated from evil flowers,
The dreams of triaged men chumming,
Cut by the silver fins of primordial game,
Swimming like mystified tourists
In the onyx current of the River Styx.

Robert Rorabeck

Riverwindwolves

I saw the Christ Child
On my street again today
Playing hokey.
He had a nice pair
Of skates
But two jewish kids
Kept on making fun of his Robe
And telling him he needed to Shave.
There were these giant blue
Spruce trees
All up and down the road
Their needles were sharks' teeth;
They'd draw blood
At a distance—
Just look at them
And you'd be eaten,

And when the cold winds
Blew from the north
Country where my mother
Lives,
Those sharky, blue trees
Would shiver
Like my naked father
Getting out of the shower—
I live alone in a my house
And just watch the neighbors
Behaving like bees;
They're all trying their best
To crucify themselves
More stylishly and with more
Flair than the next.
I wonder which one will win
So Armageddon can begin.

They're all trying to impress
The Christ Child

Who just moved onto our Street;
Already he's the superstar
Of the neighborhood,
Though he doesn't talk a lick.
There are so many paparazzi
Last week we had 5 car accidents
And one fist fight

Last night I had this dream
Of two women much older than me
Living alone in a house
Rotting away; it was
A mouthful of black teeth
I moved in with them, like some Stray cat
And loved both women,
But only the big blond
Woman loved me back—
I knew her from highschool—
That's where she's from,
My future, when I go to highschool
I'll meet her and maybe tell her
About this dream I had about her;
I'm sure I'll know her then.
Her name is Nicky;
We'll only be friends
All day long we f-ck in
That house; it would be Haunted, but there
Are only rats crawling
In and out
And we f-ck amidst the rats
And on the dying fungus;
But it's okay
We're friends—
The other girl
A small brunette
I also know from
Highschool
But when I ask her to f-ck she just stands by the door

and grabs her purse;
she waves good-bye without looking me
in the eye,
leaving me a Nicky alone in the house.
The north wall has decayed
And collapsed
And beyond it is a field
Of colorful garbage
Attracting flies
Before a forest of Palms and pine trees
Nicky and me
We f-ck near the collapsed wall
At dusk on the fungus
And I can see Nicky's flesh
She's morbidly obese
And her flesh lumps
Together in black nodes
In this one bad spot
Down her back,
Like cancer, like the house,
But she has such a beautiful
Face
And best she is nice to me—
That's all I can remember in
The dream;
I think about going outside
And telling this dream to the Christ Child
But it's almost nighttime
The riverwindwolves come out at night
And the trees are sharks,
Sharp and silver
When I grow older
I will forget that
I ever lived next to the Christ Child
But will imagine I see him on t.v.
And in movies
But mostly I just try
To remember the dreams I had

And try to recall if I ever
Told them to anyone famous.

Robert Rorabeck

Rocket Launcher

Why in this cold globe did you fire rockets into my eyes?
you were not the destiny
I paid for this was an ambush
and 1/3 of my life has run like fetid rivers through your legs and down toilet drains now I am suppose to say hello to you, congenially, as if you had never bitten me, rabidly like some foul marsupial of my lower regions
instead, listen dear, as I recall the war cry of my ancestors
Rorabeck is German,
Remember.
and in 1945 I was there adding the coal to the cinders that baked your great aunt and now my whip comes,
crack!
as I herd the black angels through a pale gray pain of sky—
and as you pass by, saying your congenial hello—
I yell, "Schnell! Schnell! " and you revert back to the naked beast I made you and I ride you like some Modern Major General across planes of fire—

whipping you lavishly for your niceties baked in insincerity, your "Hello Robs" and oh, P.S., I love giving blow jobs now that my jaw don't crack.
but you are my pet now—cause you remember the mastery of my forbearers so when I see you walking next time on these safe Florida streets with these sororities herding about you
with their beeping blow dryers—
"Schnell! Schnell! "
I will cry, trumpeting us into a new wicked blackness.

Robert Rorabeck

Rolling Their Tomboys

All stuck up in a headdress single file,
The planes and sensations of a great long while:
Burning condemnations
Through the planes of blue sensation,
Until the ripe old gardens grew and knew for awhile
What they were supposed to know:
The lucky rabbits in the fieldtrips of echinopsis,
Making great time and beating
The card games through the white washed gardens
Diademed by the cenotaphs of conquistadors,
Whose bright light shone up from the Spit shined floors,
And seemed to recall just when the jungles were young,
And smoking their pluraled sensations of
The smokescreen of highways, leaping like rider less
Saddles up through their byways
Like smoking guns,
And then it seemed as if the ripe was ready to be pulled
Down,
Just as when she knocked on my door, I took her to the Bedroom, and ungowned her gown;
So from my tongue her fever spread all the way down
Her brown rivers rolling their tomboys across my Cerulean bed.

Robert Rorabeck

Romeo And Juliet

Shanghai is the biggest city in the worldâ€”
It is where I found my wife:
And we road busses together and went to the
Zoo:
Like Romeo and Juliet, we were married
The second night of our daydreamâ€”
But this doesnâ€™t have to be a tragedy:
Our families are not ancient enemies:
They mean nothing to one another, but are stock
Full of good will:
I told you, we will name our first son John Wayne,
Because I always wanted to be a cowboy,
And that is alright with you.

Robert Rorabeck

Romeo And Juliet's Wedding Vows

Juliet:

I will be thy chased rose and take thy name.
My heart will continue drumming its love for you the same;
And though thy mother and father mean nothing to me—
You are the sun rising over the bosom of my heart's sea.
I will go with you hand in young hand
And be like your shadow roaming with you across the land.
In your eyes I see the myriad truths of my own soul
A kaleidoscope of sea shells in a pretty bowl—
To you, my love, I will always be true—
And that is why I say that I do—

Romeo:

To think that the very sun I saw last night should so suddenly be mine
It gives me proof, at last, in a god that is kind—
For to you, I will be the very bird returning to burn in your sky:
And every night, I hope that with you in bed I lie—
So happy I am that you should become the rose that bares my name—
To your midnight's balcony I am so glad I came—
Now if we can only escape the dark fate I am so afraid that I see
And that you can go on forever with me.
Now let me take your lips to my lips and share for a moment an eternity's bliss.

Robert Rorabeck

Rooftop

They've turned off the television, and quiet now.
School children winnowed into beds weep for nightmares,
And in the aloe the frogs chirp and mate along the old rebar.
There is pornography stolen inside old cars on cinder
Blocks beneath the Australian Pines across the road,
And a G.I. Joe lies lost in the sand dunes and cockleburs.
A suspected kidnapper patrols the road, too late for harm,
While the next door neighbors, retired, drink beer and look
At their citrus tree.

I lived here, and watched the ditches flood, and kissed a girl
With short blond hair down the road; she wore a retainer
In her mouth, and tried to teach me a lesson from her bicycle;
There were bees steady in the hydrangeas and a canal they Eventually built across when they paved and widened the road.
One evening I had a bushel full of firework,
And sent a fireball all the way down the street; Now, as I Put coins together for nostalgia, after failing again before this,

I return to six years old, for I only live here until second grade;
There is the rock garden with blue cactus where the white shepherd
Killed the father rabbit, and I heard of death, and the clutch
Of rabbits caught disease, and mother had to let the old hare go.
You couldn't really hear the sea from our little house,
Where the couch folded out into a bed where I and my sister slept,
Where the black and white television sat in the corner atop a corn
Hamper, except when there was a tree there for Christmas,
But I still say I could hear the sea, and pretend that when I climbed
The roof after father had left early for Miami, I could watch
The sun put cream into the sky, and swirl up in spindling clouds,
And was the first to see the ice-cream man come for breakfast,
But this is just another attempt, for I never climbed the roof
Of that house.

Robert Rorabeck

Room Of Open Sky

Rainbows have dog tags- beautiful words
Don't belong in picture books:
And you are in his arms,
Brown as the beautiful woods from your Country of
Mexico-
Airplanes shoot like silver dollars skipping in An evaporated lake over the forts
That you took-
Mestizo- I will never love you again,
Not as my dog loves me- not as a blind man loves
The languishes of sunlight and Fireworks everyday like a holiday where highways
Are rivers
Where your children get older and sleep underneath
Mailboxes, spread out over the hot and Crippling light- the total antithesis of Disney
World,
And the dreams of housewives- You float beneath
The stewardesses like the true cousins of the heavens-
And you don't even know that you are,
But I remember-
Brown shoulders in a lunch room of open sky,
And your eyes all over my naked sadness, wishing to See joy and summoning birthdays.

Robert Rorabeck

Rose

As you can see, I am a good person;
And I can make you live forever,
And we are only spending an hour or so together,
While your children are all so beautiful and all at home:
All I imagine is laying low for you,
And making you laugh, and kissing your freckles underneath
The ribbon of this overpass:
And the days will come and go like caesuras of perpetual Motion:
You already know they will, but I will spend my time
Anticipating your body;
I will learn someday how to catch its throws; and I will bask with You alone in the estuaries of our unhindered language;
And I will fill my mouth with your rose.

Robert Rorabeck

Roses

I wish I could take Diana to the fair-
I wish I had the balls to give that goddess roses,
That I had the guts to summit bouquets of mountains again
So that I could see the fine colors atop the Wings of one sad mariposa,
Forlorn like a lost prism ejaculated underneath the careless
Fuselages of gusty airplanes:
Diana has the hair of a goddess that doesn't fade;
And I seemed to come into the jet stream of her motions
All this night,
Jubilant pinwheels pressing mechanical lips to the motions
Of insightful inebriations;
All the feels manifested in the body's caracoles;
And Friday I think I should like to be a mouthy mailman and Deliver my pledge of fidelity to the very fine Columbiana
Who delivers my pastries every morning-
I think I should like to invite her and her daughter to The fair,
To deliver her faithfully to the oxygenated planets that bud
From the perfume of her senses;
I think I should promise her rings with my eyes;
And I think that I would like to give her
All of my roses.

Robert Rorabeck

Roses At The Summit

If you awaken in the petrified midnight of your Trailer park-
Thinking of me- remember, I am your man,
Even though your trucks
Are stolen,
And the sky is empty: the heavens have burned out,
And it is the lights of a graveyard you
See,
And even though they will not believe you
Anyways- it is just our Bodies dying,
But our souls stay in the horns of preternatural
Stags all winter long-
Keeping the way for the fables of our children
So they will not go astray-
And even though I know so few words,
I use them all to pray for you
Amidst the mountains
Where the last of the Indians were captured,
And I had to sell myself for a glass of water-
As I watched him giving you
Roses at the summit: he might have been a god,
But he was still rude,
And I loved you- and the lightning showed How I felt throughout all of the afternoons
While I waited for you alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Roses In The Abscesses Of Concrete

Let us try hard to remember
The roots that we have enjoyed:
My parents bring a five foot Christmas tree
From Miami,
The waves beckon like Christians underneath the clouds.
My father in law is dying in Shanghai,
And I haven't written for a month-
The days come and come in their naked combs- no one I can remember
Remembers my name,
But I sell things in the anonymous shoals-
The traffic continues, loudly,
And made of sepia's hues.
Girls I remember loving are taking other mens' cues-
And I pass along, skeletons and giant squid silhouetted
In the sky- children come and go every day in and out of schools-
I saw you going the other way-
I thought I had forgotten how to write you name-
But I am drinking rum in crepuscule- my wife
Admonishes my name-
I scribble like roses choking in the abscesses of Concrete, I almost remember you.

Robert Rorabeck

Roses In The Sea

All of the beauty of the cars beside the Road—
The happenstances of the day of truants
Strung out,
The waves dancing like belly-dancers—
And not a single one of Them knowing what
They are—
Tourists heading to Disney World
Sweating like ice-cream,
The youngest of the children in
The back seat wondering
What they are—
Rockets in the sky,
Red astronauts trying to forget her
Birthday—
The Earth turns its back,
As dolphins dream of roses
In the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Rosy Bouquets Of Mars

I've showed you whatever true
Love is, even if
I have misspelled you, I have come
Across you appreciating by yourself
In the foxglove theatres of
Our own delusions,
And what brighter epitaphs I can Write for you,
I don't even know—
I am not smart enough to live forever,
Or to even survive the decade,
But I think about you like I Think of Disney World or some other
Beautiful disease that has some absolute
Control of my mind—
Remembering the past summers
When they took down our swing-sets—
Even if it was the last time we had to breathe
Together—don't you remember how I held
You in the waves—and we pretended to Be perfect—but into those times of Imperfect echoes—I have still kept casting,
Like as if my cadaver was yet doing magic—
You have gone from table without any purpose,
While the world just spins and spins,
So unreachable from the red fingertips and
Rosy bouquets of Mars.

Robert Rorabeck

Round

The roads move and move and
Move,
People drive down their roads,
Sit and wait as the movement slows
As traffic backs up,
They watch out their strange windows
The sun and the millioned-knifed sea
Stabbing upward;
Like them, kicking frantically,
Sluicing over,
Spilling themselves
Into ennui
Never escaping the dull light
Spearing them,
Cleaning and gutting them,
Beautifully framed and owned
By the clothing of their words,
As they move around and around
Trapped by the limitations
The revolutions of the earth's Carnival ride
Never thinking to escape by Rolling down the windows to leap
While the car is still moving

To the beyond....

Each night they return to
Their road rolling on,
Ebbing like the tide,
Traceable and scientific
The explanation of themselves
As given to them
Evident in their surroundings.

Robert Rorabeck

Royalty In The Sky

I sing along with the open windows of cars;
And I smile when I know their song,
And don't have to go too far to get to water
Before I die:
This all around me, the thorny yellow honey,
And the cenotaphs of donkeys,
And the big words make us laugh from our backsides,
The echinus of air-plants- we don't Know what it is, except that it is centrifugal and We bought it from the salesman at the Arid carnival:
We bought it so that we would feel important as we go;
And her dress flaps in the sky:
She has the dozen roses I gave her underneath it,
But they all will die,
And my stomach aches from drinking too much water,
And I am not smiling anymore-
Only the dead pack animals are smiling, smiling
Up to her splinters of royalty in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Ruby Eyes (For Levon Helm)

Put your hand on my shoulder.
This world is sitting in the stars.
We live in the working class cul-de-sac
Where the sun is warm,
And all the swords are buried.
There is a mirror in almost every room,
And I could look at myself in them
If I chose to,
But I don't:
I choose to smile,
Even though I haven't christened the roof,
And I live with my dogs,
And there is a girl in Colorado who opens my Mind like a wound,
And where the river winnows calmly,
I've been rejected,
And my heart beats in the chest like a rabbit
In its briars,
And the coal is black and useless on this train;
It goes around the Christmas tree
Slowly like a child's dream.
Against my back,
The waves are an unguent, and by rivers
She could reach me and sleep wealthily inside
Any of my rooms,
But now I am tired,
And it smells like gasoline
But there isn't anything burning,
And all the pretty girls are down in the weedy
Amphitheatre they keep at the zoo,
Kneeling to the animals
As wise as grandmothers,
Listening to the feral lips who sing underneath
The ruby eyes
So much more beautiful than my own.

Robert Rorabeck

Rum And Liquor

Made of daydreams of silent preponderance,
I drink rum—and liquor,
Eat soup, and then contemplate drinking more
Rum,
Even though I will have to go to school tomorrow—
I read a few poems—look at the girls grown
Up who once might have worn roller-skates—
And know that in the sky is the great and silent void—
A referee waiting for all of us to become winners
Or losers—I came make love for an hour-
I gave my old muse multiple orgasms and yet
I can still not write a sensible poem—
And the daylight lingers over the junkyards of pornography
Just as it always does—and my wife will be sailing here
In five days with little couch-bicycle in her belly—
And the churches sell to us the promises that everything
Will have to be alright, but I will have to lie my head down
To sleep once again thinking of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Running In These Seas

The night is full of somnolent scars,
Black men stealing cars under the Pleiades,
And I still have no right to spell out
For your dreams,
Running my lonely fingernails across the Latin chalkboard to wake you up;
If you don't want a husband, but want to Eat from his lunch truck:
That is fine with me- There are so many avenues,
And so many shoes to try on,
Even if they're all hanging from the power lines
Like the airplanes,
Like Christmas ornaments:
And, like the poetesses from Saint Louis said,
These are rivers to the sea,
But beneath the eyes there can be so many seas.
And to set your toes into any number of them
Can be such a challenge,
And I wonder if you will ever name your children
After the life you find running in these Seas.

Robert Rorabeck

Running Wild

Little words in a toy chest of heat stroke,
And I am yawning
And not paying attention to my position in the game:
Not even recommending the hour to humming birds
Or airplanes;
Just as the stewardesses come so high and far flown overhead,
Just like witches with nose bleeds,
And I know that it is time to finally pack up and call it in:
It feels as if my life is going to end,
Knowing that my soul, my Alma, is back at home in another home
I am not welcome in:
A strange new place unto which I can never be reconciles,
That she enters in and gives her life back over to husband and Child,
While I remain an element out of doors, running wild;
And she recalls me,
And her eyes hang over, or leap across the ditches,
Until she can see the runway where the airplanes are all restive;
But soon they will be playing their games again,
Leaping through the sky and running wild.

Robert Rorabeck

Rusty Hinge

Creak, jigsaw cheek-
My parents make love above this tomb.
My dogs are my cenotaph,
In bankruptcy bloom:

Creak, jigsaw cheek-
The students make love once a week,
And for their final exams the professors
Make love too,
And so do the cheetahs down in the zoo:

Creak, jigsaw cheek-
I don't make love to you.
They've got nothing for me to do,
But I still don't make love to you:

Creak, jigsaw cheek-

Robert Rorabeck

Sad Blue Planet

What better days can say to this, I don't know;
But quiet, for here there are Satanists:
Things die every day here, up in the snow,
And not just butterflies:
I shouldn't write at all, because I can barely spell,
And I meant to ride out to her but she doesn't give a damn.
Oh hell, the night, the night, especially on Friday it is a Good time if you are a cat: the night;
And what is she doing right now, if she isn't turning her ass
Tail end up to every olfactory in the hick town far beneath me:
If I turned this way to her, or this:
Which way is my better side? They are both quite ruined,
Perhaps I should run and hide, but isn't that what I'm doing-
I love science fiction when it is written well,
When there are green slave girls dancing in the till. Then
It is money well spent, but will I ever write a book like that,
Will it ever sell? She lives in a ghost town not but halfway to Mars:
In the asteroids and heroic cosmonauts, she laughs and shows
Her lips: she cleans and wipes and serves and flaunts her
Floating chits; Now the day is running on, now the day is gone,
And I can barely breathe. I've done and gone played paddy whack
On every virgin's knees, and this is but a thing I've made and folded
Like an airplane, like a rocket ship to take off above the rafters;
But what will the consensus pay for it: a nickel, a dime, or Just recorded laughter. I can see her where she sits rocking on his Knee; she rocks so hard I hate to think of all the men aboard her,
If she were a ship, but she's not; nor is this a novel,
But just a thing I've written down like a reminder like a list
We are meant to do before take-off: but she is already gone, already Past the moon and not looking back on this sad blue planet;
And so I sit alone in the empty garden, wondering
What the next line will be, if god the father will give me pardon;
For I am a pacifist and an auteur, and maybe I will buy a house finely Priced and spend such days of this reminiscing of her; for even Though she is gone, her legs linger after: she was quite a leggy thing,
And this why I still think so much of her.

Robert Rorabeck

Sad Land Of Mary's God

Sad land of Mary's God.
My scars cast brightly in the sun-
I haven't any friends no more-
And I am more alive than anyone-
On this vacant lot, this Eerie weeded stepping
Stone-
Hemmed by torpid alligators on Either side,
I'll make my play, I'll pop my Gun.
Bright houses rise up richly effective
In Palm Beach Gardens,
In spume and smoke-
And hazy loam-
Like a forest fire of the upper classes.
I haven't no profession to call my
Home-
And I am more alive than anyone-

Robert Rorabeck

Sadder, More Beautiful Conflagrations

Blood roses on my cheeks
Seeped off the mats where I've laid
The things I've killed or Stolen,
The game that went away after kindergarten,
The nouns and other things which marched
Without much forlorn contemplation
Out of the house at crepuscule;
And Evan is back from the movies
And the housewives will be looking at him,
The cat is alone with the gold fish,
And the strangely sagacious trees are weeping
For the world of another sun,
But that is a good sign,
For I hope it means your eyes will bloom again
Of the opinion of blue or green
Or one of the other haunting colors of Your sadder, more beautiful conflagrations.

Robert Rorabeck

Saddlebags Of Dreams

So many choices, hull hoops of words to choose from Near the first iterations of this other day:
Fire hydrants in the shadows and really most of America asleep;
And Erin just going to sleep in her other world Filled with amber fanfare and things I shouldn't like to Think about anymore;
And it is too muggy for me to sleep so clung-scarred in my car,
And so I'm up again, leaping those old canals listening to the Serpents and phosphorous hissing- they are coming out of The ground in the resurrections of uncertain metamorphosis,
And I shouldn't care to ever go back to school again,
Or to ever go to sleep again-
I just want the perfect words, and bicycles, and my fingers through Her undying hair- There is another word for undying- something
That really isn't alive, clinical of hair and tooth and nail,
Little things to pocket, little things to sale:
And if my muses die before me, I don't think they would mind if I creep into their cemeteries with nothing better on my mind
Than to collect and pocket those little things,
The piggybacks of snails and keep them in my pockets,
In my saddlebags of dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Sadness In The Wound

Sadness in the wound cries the lightest Pieta
From the armpit of the carport
Where your mother does the wash,
Or you know who you are—
After Christmas, look up at the stars
In the midnights where the drunken pigeons
Crawl with the fairies and some other words—
Until well after the world gets dark,
And there are no other names for it,
Down in the deepest darkness of the knocked out
Throats—Well, these words seem to be yours,
But I know you don't know
Whose they really are.

Robert Rorabeck

Said The Night To Me In Her Thoughts

I love you, said the night to me in her thoughts,
But I have another man over,
Who I love better than you, for the moment-
He's been working out at the gym,
And his brawny biceps have bicycle tattoos,
So I really have to have him in me right now-
But you, I don't know.... Maybe later....
We'll see, but him now, you understand?
He is not afraid of the sun,
And his smile is quite brash, like a knight on the lam-
He may have another woman, and isn't that exciting?
I can send him out while I am sleeping
Deep inside the blankets of sea,
And he'll steal little things for me:
The breath of the living, the clovers of green:
He doesn't read text books, or swim in the stream,
But he doesn't have to, not right now, you understand?
He's got mighty big calves for working in ditches,
And rippled abs which get all the witches-
So he doesn't have to, not right now, you understand?
Now give me a kiss and let go of my hand,
And maybe tomorrow I'll be bored of my man,
And call to you from by tower so cleverly gaunt,
Then ask you if you want to be the new fireman
To stoke my hot spot,
But for the foreseeable now, I'm pleasantly his:
Because he's so big, he's the king of show biz,
And I think he'd have no problem selling used cars,
Or picking up ladies half drunk in bars:
So he doesn't have to know me a stitch-
Not right now, you understand?
Now give me a kiss and let go of my hand....

Robert Rorabeck

Sails Me

A tree up in the thorn,
A skull up in the tree,
A bird up in the skull,
A boat up in the bird,
And in that boat
Sails me;

Where am I going for so long
Worshiping you, but just in the theatre
Where the sky seems to shine true;
Flying all in a moment
With my arms outspread across the sheer Cliffs,
The beautiful in the rippling silence;
The flat nosed face sunburned,
Perfect, a palate of the end of the day,
Absentminded, of apathetic happenstance;
And watching me fall, such an insignificant
Bird- such an insignificant thing
But for a moment reduced from grace;
The final sigh, the unseen release,
Sails me.

Robert Rorabeck

Saint Augustine

Getting drunk
And afraid to die
I crawl into a worn-out shoe.
I close my eyes but
Your face superimposes
On the room,
A space for advertisements,
A market of body parts
Living on their own:
Your legs are running around
Like jackrabbits with toes
Painted red,
Good luck charms on chains
For strange, chain-smoking men
Make good pets.
I check to see how much
I have in my pockets: $1.76—
Not enough to buy a piece,
The heart-pounding meat,
The parts of the doll buried by Blue settlers in the pasture
To keep safe from Indians;
But after high school
They stole you away
And made you speak their Language. They tied you up
In an industrious forest and Made you do calisthenics.
Now where you lay down
There is no room for me.
There is not a word for me in your Head, just things you cannot Explain auctioning of
More juicy tidbits.
Cowardly in a shoe,
I toast you alone
And to your legs who have stolen
Away and are even now
Surfing over the sleepy bones

Of conquistadors and drowsy Jesuits
In the rich shallow bays
Of Saint Augustine
Where scattered silver lays Fractured-naked,
Obscured, like valuable pieces
In memory.

Robert Rorabeck

Saint Claire

Houses I dream of,
Good enough for anybody out of sorts:
To move into the village by the sea
To watch the waves and my dogs lull,
To go out in the mangroves and steal the Treasured metals of sunken conquistadors:
Listen to the banyan sway,
To lay down and write a book,
To kiss the lady on the cross
To find out what she took,
The nimble feelers out before anyone by morning,
Then when the mist crawls in penitence,
Crawls on the belly of a saint,
I might step from my front yard, hypnotized
By the lightless fall,
The twenty-four hour convenient store
Less than a minute away-
Stand before her and let my feet drench from Her throat
From where the day before the lawnmower prowled
And trimmed her good:
I could lay down in the mausoleum of the bay
And wait for the tourists to misidentify me,
To run away on a blue pony past the cafe where
The mother works I shouldn't know,
To wind up past the unbelievable museum,
Go down to where the surfers are passed out
In bleached dreams, tawny and sinewed, to watch the horseshoe crabs
Cabaret: I could live here, I suppose,
For there is undoubtedly a library, and I am flush.
It would be the perfect middle class,
And I could lay down in my living room
Everyday and listen to her breathing
Infant shells from they foaming cradles, to know
That she was no longer so painfully far away,
But a convenient woman
Blowing at my door like a flower,
Lain down and mowed and trembling,

Her legs the swimming sea
At rest or in motion.

Robert Rorabeck

Saint Louis, Missouri

In a graveyard surrounded by sweltering
Black children, the poetess lives—
Grand-eyed by the oak trees
That make swimming pools of shadows—
And the airplanes flicking like Matches over the tornados yet to Appear in
The daydreams of the heartland,
Or any place I once happened into
But was too scared to remain—
Even with promises that my words could
Be beautiful,
And all of the lush architectures grown
Over with all of the histories of Unpromising murder—
Alone with my dogs in such places—
Only the telephone poles above us,
Like mistletoe for false angels—
And the ways through the woods
Glittering,
Like Christmas time on a summer
Afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

Saint Paul.

Maybe I will meet a fine girl
At the funeral this Evening,

So I can have sex
One more time so
Close to death.

If not,
I will pick one up
Next week in Minneapolis,

Robert Rorabeck

Salesmen

Anticipating Messiah
Perpetuates this religion:
The reincarnations of Jesus
On the back lots,
The ho-hum Hollywood sets,
The trams of gaudy tourists,
The football star
In a sporty red corvette
Soliciting prostitution
From the saturated lashes
Of failed starlets:
Door to door Bible peddlers,
The disinfected Sanhedrin,
Rabbits who chain-smoke,
Speak machine-gun English-
Use the guilty roots
Of the Catholic Church to Buy their lunch,
And sleep in cheap hotels;
All of this,
Hinging on the fulcrum
Of that which will never happen;
Salivating for perpetuity,
Pavlov's Dog will starve,
And the phone will never Ring with her name again-
Somewhere unreachable,
Farting in the infant nebulas,
The goddess of our creation
Is soliciting new spacemen
She finds interesting;
She has already forgotten
Who I am,
And the insignificant planet
Waiting for her,
Echoing in the pitifully
Faithful moans.

Salt River Canyons

I dream I come into her salt river canyons and she says my name out loud,
Robbie
echoes down into the Blue where the water goes we hold hands and walk in secret heat and salt and it doesn't matter where she's gone before or where she's going after this there is only the red walls and the sun's arrows
right now
right now
right now right now with her is the moment is all I need
I don't see the fossils under her meat Right now her eyes are only for me her thoughts are on me
I am in the moisture of her salt river canyons
right now
right now
right now
right now

Robert Rorabeck

Salty Unabashed Surcease

Unifications of shadow less darkness-there you are Going,
With the traffic on your hip,
And pretty birds that I shouldn't see to describe like Plastic barrets in your hair;
And I do this as I am coming down,
Growing younger and more unapologetic:
Doing this tragically dusty art
Like a swiftly exhausting runner,
While I have held conversations with you in my truck
Alone,
And I have switched sides, but the sea has always held Its indescribable meaning: She breaths just Across the way into her-
I'd like to escape into her now and ride her trains-
And you are the sea, even if you didn't know it,
Waking up in your sugary darkness,
Entrained like a flower of scent to its narcoleptic
Mouthed honeybees;
And these are the things I say falling asleep to Your gardens, because it feels quite wonderful to be Devoured,
Like wounds being unsealed and read without light,
Like the acanthine tiger lapping away its meat- the tide's
Salty unabashed surcease.

Robert Rorabeck

Salvos

This night salvos into nothing;
Narvaez and de Vaca are full of virgin arrows;
The festive quills bloom like pompadours from their cracked elbows.
The waves break like a nurse's knuckles
Over the frightened conquistadors in the eerie bay of caballos;
Like broken ants, they are somehow still alive;
Though their bearded faces scribble in darkening circles,
The amputated buddings of man and his animals excite the opulent gulls,
While the flint and ire fly from the disrupted panhandle-
Halfway to Texas, on an atoll of her curse,
They will eat the rest of themselves,
Before succumbing to the naked slavery of the blue sky,
And the un-flexing knees will beat the dead man's march
On their skin which now tightly adorns the golden sun.

Ghosts enter Mexico City during an eclipse,
The waves whispering their secretive comidas;
The young lovers search their lips for sandy participles;
Her brow furrows primera with the call of his nombre;
This night salvos into nothing,

Her knights have returned home.

Robert Rorabeck

San Marcos Rum Airlines

Going down is easy without liquor
Or scars
Where zeppelins never burn above
The low hanging fruit of foibles;
Grandmothers are soft and laying felt
Children on the green board at Sunday school,
And she is the back room pressing her
Dress, just another saint whose eyes never Look up:
If she did look up she might teach little Boys how to fly. I had that happen to me once
By how a stewardess looked at me coming
Down the serviceable aisle,
Her legs were drawn across the thing
Skipping over the earth-
But she doesn't do this now- She has her
Lines memorized- She is licking her lips
And it is all a treat; and the glass is in my hand.
The rum is from San Marcos which I guess is A virgin island,
And so I drink to trouble, and to the girls who Don't appear to be there anymore;
And to the trips I would have to take to find them,
Though it is already far past midnight:
Whatever they had to tell me, they've already told
The audience, and everything is thus undone
And asleep down to earth, young tennis wives basking
With husbands upon a vast tarmac of a romantic
Tarmac where I shouldn't know how to belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Sandstorm

There was a sandstorm:
But we didn't belong in her garden of Mirages,
While the students were blowing
Glass to make fun of windmills
While it seemed a silent fit:
But it was beautiful,
Especially for the tourists-
And she kept her palms up, even while
She was sleeping,
And her houses were beautiful,
But needed work:
Oh, silent dog with one eye:
How you limp, like a wounded rainbow
Across the movie theatres of the
Graveyards,
And it almost seems impossible that
We don't have to arrive here
Anymore:
We just have to look up, and the airplanes
Are already gone,
Like breakfast eaten by the over eager gods
On Christmas day in the sunlight of
A child's eyes- full of the blinded innocence,
While everyone else steals all that they can see.

Robert Rorabeck

Sarah

The cops wont last forever:
My mother is basking in the windowsill;
I want to ask her if I will last forever, but I doubt she knows
If she is even real;
And I have been baptized for two weeks by these cities,
But they never felt that they really knew me:
I was too scared and alone to go and visit the grave of Sarah,
My lover,
Dead for all these years before me:
Sarahs lost in the valley: Sarahs who lives are again fireworks,
Who have spumed and have come down and lusted
Like the ash of grandmothers like the felt of reindeer abashed into The valleys;
And I cannot wait to be alone, to have surrendered to her gray
Beauty:
Sarahs in the forts and cathedrals, Sarahs in the valleys:
Sarahs in the blood, and Sarahs caracoling the different institutions,
The colors of bowling alleys:
The city picks up and positions itself while the freshmen make love,
The answer is as true and sweet
As the Sarahs who are missing, who have almost been virgins who Now rest in the tenements of graveyards just as true and Sweet are these Sarahs as any songs of my memory:
Sarahs who have loved misconstrued into the oldest cities of America,
A Sarah who I went to school with:
Sarah who I last saw at her viewing: Living, a Sarah of Saint Augustine.

Robert Rorabeck

Satan's Chum

Throbbled in fires of rum:
Doing good work for Satan, Satan's chum:
I chum the waters for this bum-
I beat the silly, silly Satanic drum,
And the smiling dwarfs come, showing that
Their pockets are empty,
Wanting to start smoking and drinking coffee
And playing in the cactus;
Telling my with their Lucifer eyes that my future Lies broad-sided in the sharp foliage of Palmetto fronds:
Lying there cutout of the dead, dug up sharp shoveled
And knocked in the head:
Lying there where her parents lived a decade ago,
Where I used to come over and serenade her like
An uncut cat-
While the policemen patrolled and swung their Blue hats;
And the blue pigs squealed from the chicken coups of Gaudy sin:
And I knocked on her bedroom and
She let me in.
Sharon, beautiful Satan, jewelry clasped in your ears
Like coniferous globe,
Like a sink hole in Gainesville, Erin. Erin, do you really
Read my poems,
Erin- Who are you, but flying on your broom,
You go to inspect the castles of coquina: You leave your Room and the centripetal curse of your ceiling
Fan, Erin:
This is really what you do:
You call up an entire legion of devils and you make them
Your boyfriends,
And you feed them spikenard and make them take off
Their clothes and enter the waves you've Concocted and the waves spit and hiss, white salted:
Making your spells of spikenard,
Erin- you lied to me, didn't you? And the room spins with Your curse,

And I leap over the fires to escape,
But there are always new fires; and when I die,
Wont your beautiful Satan know, three headed,
Insatiable:
There you'll be, Erin- with the frozen golf-courses
And the fires of hell.

Robert Rorabeck

Satan's Dream

So here is the charred millennia you call a home:
Out on the beach, there is the smell of something different,
Where children used to hold hands
When the stars still filled a book of scribbling dreams,
And nothing ever died;
Now the junked cars parade like frozen basilisks
In the knotty surf, where the people were going Sliding beneath the visible overpasses to escape the winged doom:
All of it in some kind of halo it is the only thing
The nude goddess wears as she flickers like a
Fluctuating reception above the compulsive waves,
And the only thing there is,
The only thing there is at all is the memory you tore
Out of the pages of life, and crumbled in your pulsing hands;
Now your body is hot like a kiln with fever,
And your precious future is a butterfly with a wing torn off,
Your tomorrow is blown glass ill formed,
And thus transformed again in the flames into uncertainties;
The women have melted away- all the women you never knew,
But loved compulsively like a foundling child:
All the women floating in the air, blown away like dandelion spores,
The crematorium is the horizon, and they are thoughtlessly Covering you with their remains, and they are covering the Sea, and the cars like snow,
And the goddess hovering slender at the waist, her head a halo
Is sipping away the orange sun,
And flickering like Satan's dream.

Robert Rorabeck

Satisfied And Alone

Pillboxes along the beach as quiet as empty shells:
The terrapins are done,
And their young are running like inky yoke and Ladling taffy back into the womb
That is never satisfied with its occupations:
All of these dead men and starfish dividing into her,
Saying their prayers,
Occupied now like cenotaphs courting mailboxes,
Like everything I have ever even thought of;
And houses are being sold and being fulfilled by semi thought
Out lovers;
Better yet fireworks are being used up by the boys
Out at play gambling on rooftops, never minding the Beautiful chalk pictures of sky the rains will wash away
Anyways;
Bags of gone dynamite blow away: and the day becomes fun
And emptied,
As it starts out and finishes all in the hours that make up itself;
And you are somewhere in its garden,
Mystified and truly beautiful in your mystery; and set out with The other boys in the playground to find you,
Swinging around like knights in unaccustomed chivalry,
Never believing that you hide your chalice well at home and Drink from it constantly your sweet eternity when you
Are satisfied and alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Satisfied With A Christmas Tree

Monoliths underneath the streams of dragons and railways
Up above the clouds—
Floating metal honed into constellations and gentlemen's fancies
Above the domes
Of college and sports—as you hang your head out of the Blue lights of a bar you've worked at for
The same age as my students—
Brown as the autumn of your libations—all of the tricks out of You, but seeming to never be married—
My sad art still pines, like dark embers satisfied with a Christmas Tree in a house that has already burned down.

Robert Rorabeck

Saturn's Jewel Incrusted Rings

Here I come gunning for you,
Calling for the middle-class hemispheres to coalesce,
Only because I am without any other justified cause:

You who tried to cease my years,
Twice in a thri-fold decade,
In my teens and into my thirties, high-school
Superiors double-blinded by jaundiced Catholicisms,
Only because you were without any other Haunts- you cater to the offspring of the presupposed elites.

And it doesn't matter that I have increased
My revenues far above your classrooms,
Or that I have already told my children stories
About so many countless Pegasus's,
Flying fearless heroes to all of the victories far above your demons.

Or that by my dirtied plagiarisms,
And by my hidden markets, I have eclipsed you:
You who are already seem secured into your retirements-
Looking outside of your nefarious classrooms,
You who seem secured by the diatribes of your retirements:

Pegged into the systems of smiling republics,
And waving your trinket flags,
Hemmed into the indifferential treatments of your early applauses;
I am the boy who haunts your would have been golden years:

See me taking down the numbers before your eyes.

I am angry, and in my way I am a poltergergiest:
Helium balloons taking pictures above the swollen boudoirs of Venal mermaids and werewolves,
Dissolving the love affairs of far too different of animals:

Here I am, and I am not done:
You fired me without cause just after my first child was born.

My last paycheck was over four times what the state was paying me,
And more than you ever made:
(and we who were equal servants of a servile state: you never possessed me- and you never equaled what you pretended to be worth.)

Sure, I have to make up my first angel anew everyday;
But, as you can see, I am not yet done with my writing of halfway beautified
Things- she is irresistible when conjured, whilst you never once got started;
Something I have known and loved found a way to survive swimming around
In the ineffective putridity of your hemispheres:

Now I live in the shallows of the Carribeans,
And I burn during the daylight hours, like candles making love to the vanished
gods,
Hyperventilating into the spaces that you have never perceived.
And into the winnowed classes I do more than survive:

I will piss on your grave.
I will write the next great American novel.
I will be Mark Twain, leaving public school at twelve years old.
I will travel across the country and dig for silver.

I am currently worth.5 million.
You do not know who I am. I will dig up your worth and mine it,
And add it to my dragon's sack.
I cum all over you, and in the twilights of your wishing wells,
To which you have never stayed up late enough to ponder,
I will fondle your loved ones,
And make them mine: and take them to the mountains and kiss them.

Because in the morning, this is mine.
And your gravestones will collapse into the knees of cenotaphs-
And you will perish like a decrepit Mickey Mouse into a rotting Disney world-

I hold a flower out to the stars.
I am published and in the stacks of Harvard and Oxford;
Though I deserve the highest echelons -

See me fighting with my sword
And jacking off.

500 people read my poems everyday.
5000 people ready my poems on Sundays.
And when they are done creaming and making love,
I place your skulls back into their graves:
In fact, I drive all over you-

I frightened you and so you released me from your system,
But while you beheld me, I drove unforgettable moments,
Tattooed into arteries of your febrile systems.

I could have loved you poorly,
but you caved into the haunts of your masters,
And so you made me hate you richly, circling from the frozen vantage points of Saturn's jewel incrustated rings.

Robert Rorabeck

Savage Movie Theatre

And I replace you now
While I sleep with my dog and drink all of my Liquor—while I sleep with prostitutes before
I can sleep with my wife—
As the rose that should nod on my belly just Like a cabbage sold at the Produce market as the flea market attracts
A butterfly—while until there is another
Word for you calling across the echoes
Of your high school's classrooms,
Until there pretends to be another joy in the Sport and we wait until tomorrow for the time
When it is lost—
And the echoes spring like cigarettes of Waterfalls from the anonymous lips that don't Have to be here anymore—while something
Strikes out from the jungle that isn't so unusual
And shows its eyes before a few people
And their parked cars behind them—
Until there is nothing and nothing—
But another delusion and a savage movie theatre
That doesn't have to pretend to understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Save Me

Unreasonably, I am lost again
And I am drunk—
I try to look you up on-line,
But your name can be spelled so many Different ways,
And you are always changing residence,
As if you were a goddess of her ancient sorority
Not wishing to be found by mortal men—
You transform so many times it is so
Very hard to classify you, except that I can say you are most certainly beautiful,
Especially when I am here alone
Trying to find you, when the cheap rum
Runs in me like cold rivers of transforming liquor,
You have the eyes that I am called to,
You have the figure that transforms men—
As you are the one thing I can recall,
It is better to write you in this way
Than to spill blood from my wrists into your bathtub,
As I have done before.... So many times;
I can only say futile, again, I love you
Or I have never loved at all, and I have seen
Your name sung by greater poets in the lasting
Embers of their rhyming schemes....
You are out there in the cold true night,
Laid out for the eyes of humanity,
But here alone I can see you more clearly than any
Of those, and I call to you now like a drowning victim,
To see me for whom I really am
And to save me....

Robert Rorabeck

Sawhorse Of Hoodlums

I like the work of minor saints,
Watch-makers:
Girls in high-school still look good to me,
Scorn me on the back lot
The patio the screened lanai:
I am doing this to get a gig- We can go
To mass and pray as it rains,
Listen to priests and pitter pats,
Then foreplay to science-fiction afterwards
Alongside girls we'll innocently influence
Who will later on become philosophers of Ornithographs- Those funny birds with wings
Of numbers: Then she washed out like a crocodile
On the verge of tears;
I gifted trams for her, and satellites of ice and Hiking: And I have been saving money,
A licking my lips in the anticipation of the next line,
But it shouldn't be dedicated to anyone famous,
To the great assassins of hokum presidents:
I rarely eat clams except in your presence,
But I mostly love to fail and walk with lesbians down
The effortless corridors of Palm Beach after midnight,
Making Donald Trump's security draw their side
Arms very close to where I used to skip school and Smoke free weed with the goof troop: beauty marked
Boys who were mostly Jewish or half Asian-Took my girlfriend there and made love on the sea-
Softened terrace-
And wanted to feed the tortoises I took as balance for My sawhorse of hoodlums: Loved them so much
I wanted to feed them orchids,
But could only afford poisonous rubrum, and there is No advantage in the gestures of the sick: skip school
Fleeting like jacks over burning wicks:
I can see us now leaping over the crenulations on the Green, two sporting boys galloping halfway through the Day to a home of ululating video games with Nothing in between.

Saying His Amen's

Sturdiness in the grove of fingers
Where the fruit that no one should touch is Perched-
Wayward sand dollar underneath the sun
A petrified fruit of the sea,
As you make your way back aimlessly
To the whistling trailer parks
Lost with the bicycles behind the dunes,
Going back to your father
As he calls you home by saying his amen's.

Robert Rorabeck

Scabbards Of A Vanquished World

You are so beautiful, and you whisper;
And you come to me out of the waves like an ex-wife,
And these are some of the things that we say together,
As we sat together alone in our two chairs in front of my little house
On whatever road I live on behind the ixora hedges,
And we looked at Armando's picture together today, and I made fun of You and said that he was your boyfriend,
As I wrapped my arm around you as if we were in a movie theatre where I was having a hard time dreaming:
Now I am drinking all of my rum, as the fish swim in the unlucky sea,
As you had to go back to your man without a second thought of me;
Only that you decided that you wanted to linger, that you didn't
Wish to go home,
And the only problem of it was that you said you had your two children
Who needed their father, even when he is gone;
And he put his hands on you last night, Alma, and you made love,
While I slept on the roof of the empty house three doors down from Your parents' home, and I wept into the negatives of Crepuscle,
And I didn't give a damn except for Catholic girls birthed much nearer
The equator-
And I had a thought: that the world was so big, Alma, except that you live
So close to me that I go drunk and hiked to your doorstep last night,
And I could almost feel your body returned to me like a
Spear in my side,
So that the open wounds spilling their guts underneath airplanes was where I ended up sleeping;
And then I walked home and feel asleep, and when I awakened found you
On my door, knocking,
And I let you in, my best hope for a living, breathing daydream,
Like a beautiful flower pushing her head rebelliously up amongst the graveyards and scabbards of a vanquished world.

Robert Rorabeck

Scars

Scars are there for you to remember,
An itch when the mosquitoes decide to pierce.
Slanted towards the sun while the book is read,
Hidden in the patio when the steaks have been eaten.
Saturnine, the eyes of relatives leave my sister's
Wedding, but now we are talking hypothetically;
She has graduated into menstruating and cries embarrassedly
Into the towels of estranged relations, the dictionary
Used as decorations, the bowl of shells in the Flickering light of the television; After the Hurricane's bate and tackle, the orange tree is limbless,
The cats are more fickle than curious,
And the cars whisper by the workplace brushed by Debris; Every day the locksmith is called, and Lipsticked truants escape high school to shoplift
In malls; even though it would be beautiful to escape
The form, the mind is wound: I took ecstasy at Disney World, and everything skipped forward.
Snow White pleaded with me to rescue her, but later
On she made love standing up in the men's bathroom.
We took the tram around the world where the borders
Of day and night were revealed. The scars remain for Me to remember the white belt I earned in Karate;
It was so easy to blame myself, given the secrets of her
Swaying body.

Robert Rorabeck

Scars And Cadillacs And Push Brooms

Scars
and Cadillacs and push brooms

I made love to Sara Teasdale under
The moon.

I resurrected her with My shovel—
Macabre,
But a sexy sort of Puzzle.

Robert Rorabeck

Scars Grow Richer For You

Scars stay open when you drink,
Think of her legs- the things you could have
Said to them;
Scars grow like roses underneath the Sink- they grow real scars,
Deepening their radii, richer areola,
Like breasts fattened by milk,
Is what I think;

And in a decade I'll know what to say,
And the trees will come in beneath the sky
Where I've been practicing my kisses,
The gardening of the glass,
All the housewives on second honey-moon
Cruises,
Or out shopping underneath the rain:
I watch them go by in the rich nostalgia of Their sororities,
And wonder if by happenstance that is how They'll line out when they die,

Each pecker-wood have its own tomb
Affluent and marble out in the quarter acre yard
I could sleep in seasonally, drinking while
Scars grow richer for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Scented Softly Of Your Touch

The clouds gather over the warm blood of
A bull fight that just happened to pass;
And I sit on my couch and hold myself before
The great transoms looking out
On the doubtless street, and the housewives curl into Themselves like agoraphobic ballerinas or Wildflowers;
And this is just a touch of a thing, meant to linger on your Lips and in the neighborhood of your beauty mark
Which is on your left hemisphere
While you walk all around like a titan laughing and Besmirching the reasons behind the first world
Nations whose triple colored flag you bask under,
Your eyes so rich and so round
As to capture and entrench the sailors and teach them
How to drink forever:
And you called your man into the fruiteria today to unlock
Your car,
Because I was already gone to sell fireworks in Miami,
And when I came back again, wanting to make love to you,
I was already too late:
You had reached grandmothers, and had your apples and Your wolf;
And my ax is dull and lazy from too many fairytales,
While the airplanes come down like feathers in a snow storm;
And the clouds just make blotches,
While the waves only rebound in chaos, their caesuras
Happening without reason, like the narrowness of a brown vase
My fingers caressed scented softly of your touch before
You went away.

Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

School Again Tomorrow

So many prospects of cold emblems
Yawning against the fires beneath the overpass-
What do they dream about
While the trucks sell tacos to little girls metamorphosed
From the waves after midnight,
After all of the tourists have headed into the high rises
And the sharks gleam beneath them
Like shallow miracles- mindless but headed for Dreams;
But with the daylight, they shall disappear and
There will be starships and school again tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

School Of Tadpoles

Some instruments are made for you, laid beneath shallow
Waters where the freshman go jogging, where soft-shelled Turtles niggle- Where cheap jewelry is lost in the cargo
Of alligators, our millennium mascots-
They say you have not identified them for many years, for All your times of learning, how the trees cried as insignificant
Lovers broke away from holding hands on the mildewy
Walks between campus and the cafeteria's inedible lunch:
The slow pedagogy of the grayest professors winding down as If in a dream echoing from a well, trying very Delphic for you,
But the words are at a loss and in need of a higher intelligence
Quotient, to bring about spring, the singing of varsity cover bands;
I tried to become something for you in the sweaty halls all Around you, in the city as big as a Jewish ghetto still growing up,
Getting drunker but rarely going on the swings:
Black men panhandling and Vegan tramps digging into dumpsters
For fresh vegetables and cheese pizza around 4 am: After seven Years, the angels were all in chains serving the football team,
But the new female recruits under the deciduous canopies continued
Looking so good. Eventually, I mumbled away into the west,
Into the breathing of mountains and the sticky keys, reintroductions
Of words and fumbled poetry, the lines spun out for things you've Never found, like a sub story in To Kill A Mockingbird edited out
Because it made no sense, and this was her only chance, but you
Can still find me there if you start searching, seashells and feathery
Whispers, shotgun houses tilting, things sunken in the school of tadpoles
Soon metamorphosed
So they will forget all of this and only swim further away, Growing legs and breasts which move them from the shallows, into
The green lands and neighborhoods I will never go.

Robert Rorabeck

School Their Souls Will Never Attend

Mobilized into other parks further along- buying
Her flowers and sending them to places
She no longer works anymore:
Streetless cars losing their clothing and pornographies Never making a sound anymore in castanets of Australian pines-
Ripples in shells and areolas- the tiniest sea otters
Laughing on her chest,
Mermaids whose mascara never seems to stop running,
And little boys flying away from school:
Flying up into clouds to see airplanes populated entirely
By stewardesses,
And giants who look into their windows and seeing them
Like foxes and sword fish in zoetropes,
Turning around with their arms raised
And laughing
Exulting in the showers of the sun, their noses bleeding
From the altitude,
And kissing like magnets on refrigerators, and always mothers
To be
Conceptualizing their children across the mowed grass
As the busses turn around like chartreuse butterflies
So far down beneath them, and in front of A school their souls will never attend.

Robert Rorabeck

Schoolmarm Lane

Underneath The Pledges of Allegiance,
Hand over heart,
And then sitting back down to fail algebra,
To watch the clock:
To hear the alligators in the canal just Next to us—horrible, reptilian things,
Yet freer than us:
We are like Peter Pan in chains
And the sun makes love to the sky that
We would like to see:
Now, all grown up I work on Schoolmarm Lane—
They complain about me, that I cannot Tell the truth,
That I never get things done—
But in my mind, I sleep underneath the lavender
School bus all day:
Children come into my classroom,
I try to reclaim what they have lost,
But my reptilian mind swims away
As free as the crocodiles in the nocturnal sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Schoolyard Of Empty Hours

What have I to say, speaking to the fading colors
That enfold the corpse of roses;
And even I am not here: bound up, and taking orders,
Driving around on roads with names without Lovers,
Like fish trying hard to learn how to spell- even if the Angels awaken before the first bell,
And school arrives, and beauties get tardy for running
Their honeys over the fire engines and beehives:
It is all supposes:
The recesses of tombs a musical held over- lightning floods
The sky in the brevity of held over kisses:
It is gone like the motions in an eye, as it engorges:
Pallid tombs of exlovers and tomboys
Run over- the monuments looking high upon themselves:
Stalwartly, hung over,
Like hands running over themselves at picking time,
Limbs and brambles of bodies hunched over, never recognizing
The weather flooding through the bowers, causing criminy
And laying down all the blooms of their flowers:
So that the teardrops can pass by, falling into the baskets
Unwoven from spouses who are not there- they are not even
At home, unwaiting, but in the feverish corpses of living dreams,
Like suns that run like yoke with the does and with the buses;
And it gives a breakfast to the meaning of the sadness of Things,
Like baseball diamonds emptied by a schoolyard of empty hours.

Robert Rorabeck

Schoolyard's Stormy Vestiges

If it stormed again this afternoon,
I could go back to delivering pizzas-
But they've torn down that part of the world
Right near the University nobody knew me in.
I worked beside a cup-bearing goddess
Who I recalled from high school,
And remember getting drunk in the extinct pastures
With my boss who was already married
And reciting of her beside the ungodly apartments,
Everyone else tucked into parties for the night,
Except for the lesbians stripped naked and echoing
In the brightly scarred pool-
I could go back there again, given the opportunity:
I could go all the way back up the root of Loxahatchee,
Sleep into noon in some corrugated trailer underneath
The Australian Pine trees,
Fish in my own secret pond, take my catches to bed
With me, singing how god is the creation of man-
And when he walks out of the liquor store,
His boots made out of the last reptilian vestiges of the Garden of Eden, his weary father knows to Step aside and wait for the afternoon rain showers
And talk shows,
Because his son has resurrected and gotten a
Haircut, and kissed the pretty lady inside her car
Before work;
And now he is bicycling beside the new dorms
And all the freshmen are looking down thoroughly
Tranquilized from their uncertain windows:
For we have made a better man. Assured to graduate in A few years, and then down south again at a good job
Defending the law, or brightening teeth:
So this is the way he goes, not a hint of returning coffins,
About the burning red schoolyard I used to know.

Robert Rorabeck

Scott's Valentine

Writing to you a love letter on Valentine's—
A small addition to the sea of letters you have Sent spinning inside me
Like Odysseus on Charybdis' merry-go-round-
Dizzy and violent.

How many years ago now?
When I was an adolescent with skin on fire
Who took most of his comforts skipping classes or Hiding eating orchids with a tortoise
Underneath of a broken down school bus.

My only solace anywhere near society
Was gladly adhering to the governance of your slowing clocks—
While looking at you,
Neanderthal of rainbows,
Allowing me reigns to look away from Structures that men are supposed to make,
Allowing me to graffiti an introverted forest onto the Desk that carried me like Rimbaud's drunken boat.

Your classroom's empirical coordinates: 26.6550 N,
80.4522 W; but they could not find you by looking there—
In the place where you taught us
Where aesthetic truth rooted and bloomed,
Orgasms of apiaries and puppet shows—
Mandalas carousel ling with patinas of transcendental
Truth—
Glimmering tinsel and bicycle spokes of mental Truancy—

Giving us freedom to decommercialize,
To breathe from your heady photosynthesis
To survive upon the chlorophyll off the polyps
Of Thoreau's woodland acrobatics:
The slough of a golden serpent,
Evaporations of every day's materialisms:
You freed us from the anchors of the pestilent
School yards of conformity.

And I look both back and up to you now,
As a ghost and a time traveler,
A machine momentarily coming unhemmed
From his expected routines—
A lover turning back after twenty years,
Trying to bask once again in your mind altering influence.

You saw a god in the quietude of all of us.
Our souls continue to migrate around you,
Dancing like a cloak of light in our sleeps—
Wings spread, mouths opened,
Eyes widened:
Continuously sating from you,
In fields farthest away from the football
Stadiums and baseball diamonds,
Knowing you are aware of us,
Even though we may be lost,
Teaching us together in the forests where our footsteps
Fall alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Scrimshaw Lanes

I am of the opinion to blow up
All industry
Except for arcades and
Massage parlors, and to Banish all
Semi-professional sport except for What happens to occur on Campus bowling alleys,
So that I might do this,
Flirtingly with the administration,
And invite her
To sit on my knee
At a steady gallop
For both of us to admire the
Scrimshaw lanes
Of oiled and buffeted teak;
To cheat off her crib sheet
She keeps stuffed in her brazier,
Her eyes overcast by flickering bangs,
To keep a look out for the cryptic,
Spanish skullduggery advertised by her abandoned gaze-
And to serve her green beers and hoers devour
Between her musketeer lips,
To mull over red liquorish and candy cigarettes
While it is storming outside,
To try and keep score while tilting her back
Trying to make sense of striking
And streaked vertigoes,
And count the tumbling pins,
Licking my thumb and smoothing
Her brow,
Shaking her loose
To let her ginger tresses tumble
Down across her dun-wheeled shoulders and her
Suprasternal nick,
To light our fuses in time with the thunder-
Wouldn't that be a gas?

Sea At Dusk

Saddening evidence
Recuperated from the shoreline of
Her heart,
Where strange sea creatures, foaming,
Slap
Those enraged and dicey cages
Cresting up to the handlers
That comb her hair, the cry of gulls
And salty brush strokes
Outlined in the wind's spread fingers,
Cupping her waves,
Like a man's voice she cannot Contain—
This lost becomes
The evaporation of sun into
The western portions
Wherein those horizons the Nebulous colors like a Battlefield
Until the night like a
Dying soldier closes his eyes
And walking through heaven's
High fence sees the eyes of Angels peeking.

Robert Rorabeck

Sea Of Bouquets

I wasn't sure if I had the disease,
But I wore the masks as I reached up and kissed
The bottom ventricles on the long necks of
The long-necked giraffes;
And the day went along for the ride. The Ferris Wheels were just happy to see me.
Their mothers were inside, caracoling perfectly,
Each one getting the royal treatment,
Circling like helicopters over the soft easement:
And tonight it is going to freeze,
And I will pray to you tonight, pretending to worship
The vague possibilities of romance,
But really only cherishing better and more resilient words
That mean the same thing,
But would somehow happen to make your eyes open
A little wider into a greater semblance of acceptance
For the bouquets of my love;
A sea of bouquets, both wild and tranquil for you to bathe.

Robert Rorabeck

Sea Of Lunch Trucks

I dream of a sea of Lunch trucks,
Like fleets of silver-diamonded waves
And you come
In your baby
Blue corduroys;
And look at your Eyes
The softest sheets of brown;
They are almost oranges in a perfectly
Symmetrical orchard
And your birthday was Tomorrow:
Your mother lives
With you,
And your Anonymous
Daughter.
I gave you two rose
Bushes grown
In the backyard of Florida
And baby
Blue lingerie-
I don't like your Boyfriend,
But what's the difference;
I dream of a
Fleet of you
Until I can buy
A house
For us to Live in Anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Sea Of Shadows

Light fixtures
Parade a sea of shadows.
I don't know why
I tell so many lies:
The sky is green,
The earth is blue,
Or at least something similar
And not so sad.

Robert Rorabeck

Seahorses Of Him

Then up in Manhattan, I drip
Rum from my chin
I wonder whenever
I will ride the roller-coaster again—
Again:
As the windows palaver to their Favorite boyfriends all summer—
Corneas in the center of Busied flowers
Flow over—as they fade and
You make love to him:
To him;
And my song metamorphoses down
From a busy mountain:
Cascades from the parapets of
The heavens—
And you entwine in the glowing torsos
Of jellyfish
And seahorses of him:
Of him.

Robert Rorabeck

Sealing Her With A Kiss

Some people are so beautiful after midnight:
I don't know,
I dispose of my head by the parks and estuaries-
I cannot name those birds,
Or by what avenues I would have found your legs,
Hung over, svelte, paved:
I've gone gray, anemic bestial: I am thoroughly
Flummoxed, haunted by your wings:
I belong in a choir of things that died;
But after my emolliations, my ash is beautiful,
The kind they keep to chalk pool halls,
Those homeopathic pewters the pugilists use in their rings
On top of mountains:
Very well then,
Put my remains beneath the barren feet of strange
Little girls, and subject me to their rhymes;
And let the sun strike matches down on my pretty Little head,
But when you are done with me turn me to the graveyard
Where all the poets live, so I can see my lover,
Just the finest thing- Her words who rejected me,
And she fell praying septic into the earth;
Saying that for a time the sea belonged with me so that I should go out and pray, and wait for other things to rise up
Into the air by the time school had ended,
And each female was out walking the mowed earth as yet
To go home and kiss their father's lips.

Robert Rorabeck

Seance On Plato's Swings

Walking around the side of a year,
I bite my lip hoping for more austere beauty,
The realization of her adulterous honeymoon in
The milky swath of all that pain:
While my dogs and I go leaping monstrous through
The defeated shadows,
Knowing we have won the day, and our mother
Will again soon be ours,
I can only think of you lathered in such pantheism's
Hydra-powers:
You are that kind my filthy climbs would reach,
If I could take up séance on Plato's swings,
And tell you that if you know anything of simple Philosophy, then that is what you are:
What I lust over, disembodied from the stock market,
From the gun shows, or the precious metals:
More powerful and precious than a leaping airplane:
You who have proven to me that I am just the shadow
On the marble wall of your Ultimate Form,
Slinking in your
Perfect bathhouse, brazen and crass: looking at the bloated cadavers
Of an unrealized Easter: There is you- whose Christian name
Will remained curtained, and then there are the females,
The pale shadows who walk beneath your body,
The minnows in the swaying tree house of spit and flume,
Reflected off of you like pale shimmers in the guts of a school
Bus lighting from you the entire purpose of bosomy
Knowledge my only thought is to succulently attend.

Robert Rorabeck

Seashells

These shells are empty of their children,
And their songs,
So now only the sea comes like lamenting
Mothers. Cupped to the ear,
They will share in you the wounds,
The empty cradles they used to lullaby
In the shimmering gossamers of spit and foam,
Now souvenir's for the tourists' pockets,
Under the lawn lights of the Castile de San Marcos,
The transformations of sand and salt are Left undone, for the needled beaks,
And the prying wind has got them out,
Leaving them as trinkets depressed in the abated
Surf. About them the pronged tracks of petrels,
The husks of brined seahorses like shucks of Corn, the eels in twists of niggardly chord,
The urchin of indigo and ire spines;
Thus lost, the simple things disappear from the Sea, are mistaken for decorations and bottled
Like diminutive ships, used to make dolls for Gap-toothed girls, and bangles for older sisters,
Are strung out in the grass as beautiful denotations,
But each household dead child takes with them the spell
Of maternal sorrows- Thus put to the complex
Cone of the senses, the will whisper still,
As the sea transforms their inner space;
There in the hollows of empty beds, their mothers
Weep as if they have displaced every wave,
And kept a memory of their nursing clefts even After their skins were shed like scarified saints-
Thus the sea lingers over those who have passed.

Robert Rorabeck

Seasons Of A Bicycle

Do good work now,
Knowing that by sunset the vessel will be emptied;
And if the voyage is not epic,
Let it be familiar
To orchards under roman ruins,
To Spanish dragonflies
Confessing to the seasons of a bicycle;
And if the gift is not certain,
Let it be prolifically humble, yet succinct;
And if not filled with vast friends,
Make sure there is a dog or two to lick your Toes while lying down in the otherwise empty canvas,
And svelte snouts to kiss where her brighter lips should;
And an olive tree for shade:
If worry sets in, and there is no society to fill,
Become picaresque,
Challenge the constables who might press-gang you,
And make you bring your nimble fingers to scars of cotton:
Ride all the way to Orleans and uplift the siege,
Even if you are only a child:
Float down long voyages, or tramp:
Don't worry so much about keeping up with yourself.
Let off searching out the injustices of well endowed
Monsters,
And spend time at the carnival, congratulating dwarfs
On their harrowing resiliencies
To slip into the footsteps of unmindfully average giants;
But never pay for it. Live in your car,
And neck out in your front yard, the weedy drive
In movie theatre,
Appreciating the starlets but never falling for them
All the way.
Make love to the early nimbus rising from the clutches
Of the beach,
Where the ebony hatchlings are scuttling,
Wanting to sequin her effluent dress
The black diamonds a starlit night accentuates; for even she does not Know where she is going,

Pressing herself against the earth into which all of your Forebearers are sleeping in the latest strata not far above
The Incas and them the saber-tooth and the dinosaurs;
And say now that I must go without a word,
I go then with the utmost justice of nature into which Imperfect gifts like me are slipping ever day,
Princesses who die after two years, at last,
Perceiving death's cocoon presupposing in an aloof
Divinity, grapes so high up entwined in the shade
Trees,
Having faith that there is a ladder in this orchard and a little girl
In the lee who is forever singing,
Encouraging the transformations even further.

Robert Rorabeck

Seasons Of Insignificance

Where were you on Saturday? For Any day of the week is arbitrary. Shouldn't Recall how astonished I was to see you
Coming out of the library,
Carrying cheap literature as a stopper for Your heart, displaying the easy words to Make love at noon-time with the preachers
And tennis players of their court,
So naked and near the sea, how the waves
Roll back and forth like conductors,
Now I've come beneath you, speaking my Little pleas; they might be lies, they may show
Up as failures, but she has gone away
And married the lawyer, conjoined names in Hebrew observe holidays I no longer care for,
And you were just the little sport flirting on
The swings; back and forth was your motion,
Tempting the thoughts of flight; I'd thought
I'd see you out on the steps or under the blue light,
But when I came up under you, to live as your Foundation, you floated away because you'd had
A fonder sensation, to follow men just as finely
As you seemed, to express the natural migrations
Of one's eyesight, for you'd had many an adventure
Remembered by your fingerprints,
But you hadn't opened anything more than casually;
And you hadn't thought of me at all, as the light
Fell so briefly, in that moment we passed each other
On the steps, in hindsight, a pseudo-significance,
In a season you found so irrelevant and amusing,
Where I cared for nothing more than this,
Now, I have lost you, dear, without even a kiss,
But what's more, haven't you even thought of loss,
But sing like a songbird too late in winter,
Twittering gaily, but oh what more have you lost,
To not even considered to think as this,
Thus you bloom arbitrary, perhaps to produce in even More seasons of insignificance,
Twittering gaily as the snow falls hoping soon

For its kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

Second Son

God touched the Charismatic youth on
His subtle shoulder and spoke,
"I like this one."

And his light came down
And inhabited flesh

So very swiftly the young
Man ripened into a
Gifted artist
Whom the world adored
And remembered his name
In the vociferous gardens of His art,
For centuries onward to
This day,
God's fond love still lingers for him

Passed from female vessel
Through womanly chalice....

That is the one I both
Admire and despise
As my hours anguish onward,
The futile trajectory of my Words
Spend toiling the dry and Brittle pages of the earth,

My back bent and aching from False labors,
Beseeching God wordlessly
To reach down and bless me
As a father remembering he had
A second, less gifted son.

Robert Rorabeck

Second Story Of Another Dream Of....

Lifeless brides suntan in the blindness of
The dead lighthouse,
I have felt her amber eyes searching through
The back rooms of my address,
And her fingers did the diffident waltz of Skeleton stilts, balancing on each bone
Of my xylophone backbone:
A churchyard holiday of neuron ridges
Arching like caterpillars up to my globed head....
Spinning the whirligiged doodads.
I have her in the back of my mind,
Stenographing my purple intellect with Spiderish good looks.
I have her like a little grave six inches
Down my skull;
Something stolen from a little girl's dollhouse,
And then torn up in the muffling rainstorm.
They took off my cap and placed her in
Like a begonia used up by the bees one spring,
And corked it with a piece of eight
Removed later to buy twenty minutes from a mermaid.
Now she sings my mind like a mauve worm weaving
The silk in a white tent burning the oils in a sinking tree;
She is there cooing as snot drips from my feverish nostrils,
Humming a dream I once had in the ports of Catalan,
Where the lady in the rocks remains stepping outwards,
Her russet locks streaming into the brambles and Eventually the bone-fair homes of artists drinking Sangria and thinking of their dead sister beneath the Kites and the orange tree,
Up upon a second story of another dream
Of another dream.

Robert Rorabeck

Secret

Graying girls make love to Suicide in the rain.
They do not sing,
Nor do they complain—
There is someone sleeping
On the other side of the tree,
Who it is they cannot see—
As the adders hiss Satan's name through
The flooding grass,
"Asmodeus, Asmodeussss"
They do not bite their tattooed ankles,
They just slither past—
There is something floating
Deep in the sea's gray brine,
What it is you'll never find—
And the dead daisy girls just lay there
Looking up at the sky, their wrists
Don't whistle nor wonder why,
As their words curl like escargot
Around their inner ears,
What it is you'll never hear.
For maybe they are already deep in love
With their men lost in the Great War,
Even now dancing on some far distance shore.

Robert Rorabeck

Secret Color Named Alma

Like an otter come out and into her own:
Outside of classes, and outside
The impenetrable bosque:
She is now selling fruit to speaking
Dragons:
While the traffic shuffles unhesitatingly over her Shoulder:
She is an angel that doesn't even realize.
And her eyes are darker and more perfect than the Known seas,
And the creatures who live in them, delighting in the Caesuras, have known my heart,
Even if they do not care: and when she drives home
For the day,
She puts me in an unmarked grave- headless, without Flowers, or smelling of the Blown gas of industrial lawnmowers-
And I go home too, and get on my knees and Pray for this muse, this soul: a secret color
Named Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

Secret Of Grottos

She has her family, and I have my rum
And masturbation:
I have the terrible habits and my dog has fleas.
The rabbit in the forest beneath the house
Has a heart murmur;
And I've had at sending bottles across the seas
To new wives there
And mermaids; but he sleeps with her:
He sleeps with her, but I have all of her love now,
Like airplanes have the sky,
And I hold to her like stones hold the earth.
The light of the lighthouse is in her eyes-
In her brown eyes,
And my whispers flow over her, repeating the gifts
Of my dreams-
And I hold her next to my hollowness- and through
The inebriate bachelorhood,
The light from her most secret of grottos gleams-Gleams.

Alma- Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

See Her Again

The night is windy and bushy airplanes
Sideways,
And these are the things I have to say to me
Love,
Anyways:
That, rightfully, I am not her man,
And if her painted nails were to brush across me
Like a high altitude drug,
She would discard me as a bruised fruit,
And the dry crackling palms would fall across
My head,
And the saints would close their candles,
And all of New York and Saint Louis would shut Down to see my approaching in My shanty ways;
And I loved her still, but it was underground,
Calling up through the oil wells of third world nations,
While her house spindled up on forever
With jubilant legs the airplanes circled like lightweight Toys on strings,
Their motors Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms,
Or another of those shmucks;
And I fell down weeping and clapping belly shot before
The movement was over,
And yet my eyes were still up and lit long enough to see her
Fall exhausted and sweaty like a school girl off of her
Bicycle into the arms of what she perceived to be a better,
Better polished man,
So finally I was broken, and never took the bus,
And never went to school to have to See her again.

Robert Rorabeck

Seemed As Well To Glean

If the city was not divided, it stood out like a Sore thumb-
The kids in it went to high school, but they were So dumb;
And the trees could not move,
Because they had nothing to prove; but the housewives
Attentions were undivided
Before the evenings and crepuscules of Family get-togethers, they were like compound verbs,
And bosoms of chalices of forgotten and vanquished knights;
I couldn't say I could really see them;
But it was like brail, as they sang to me through the Suburb's landscaping; and I knew everything was going to Be alright;
Because there they were, unchanged but seeming to be awake;
And the canals gurgled like little girls in their Bathtubs; and the alligators quivered with itches upon their Saber-tooth backs they could never comprehend;
It was the only malady we were ever unsure of,
But we were sure that we wished that it would never Have to end;
And the cities lay undivided and a familiar but elusive theme
Music played all across them,
Snuggled into an amphitheatre of illustrious mountains
The types and species which prowled there very different and Never seen; but I am sure they looked down upon us
And seemed as well to glean.

Robert Rorabeck

Seemingly Forever

Broken slang accruing to my elbows-
Or however you spell it,
Like yellow butterflies in the Christmas trees of Mexico-
Like overfed tourists into a Chinese buffet-
Across the dangerous felicitations
Of one or another massacre
That we've been overfed of in history
While my mother does the laundry again and again
In a rainstorm
In her surplice like a virgin in a grotto being Stung by the extension chord of A jellyfish waiting for my father to come home
Again,
While the unicorns wait across the river
In the forests of their own pornography- Maybe
She believes in them,
Even if they don't believe in her- but it takes Such a long time to get results,
As the mermaids swim in the sea seemingly forever,
And the stewardesses flit across the sky,
Trying to remember the times when men could actually Become like gods.

Robert Rorabeck

See-Sawing Cindy Cinder-Tongue

Bared at the sea's subtlety,
Whispered by the salt enclave
A rainbow's theory
Butchered like presents
In the footprints on the Unreal merry-go-round:
These are all my parts severed,
Each one drained of blood
My soul has scuttled like
A crab under a stone,
Blushing like the anemic opal
Of a birthstone
As she has left in the fuming car:
Amateurish,
My joints are frayed like old toys.
Nothing about the design is clean.
An expert might say that meant
She felt something,
As she divvied in the knife's
Geometry for hungry beaks,
But I know it was not her first time.
All the waves will have done soon,
And the albatross
Might stop and wonder
Before scattling on
The jaw's cenotaph,
For her honeymoon she can forget,
On the sawhorse of his stride,
See-sawing Cindy Cinder-tongue,
A new job and his last name,
Like a Hebrew's ruby
In a crocodile's eye.
Afterwards I saw her
Laughing on red bricked steps:
She had cut her hair.

Robert Rorabeck

Selling Fireworks

Last of the populations in the snows,
Wearing the last of her feathers:
The mountain, a breast—in her weathers
and pussywillows—
My dogs get lost in the heat of her summit:
Two brothers, German Shepherds:
We find them the next morning, they come
Leaping, so glad to find us again,
So we can carry them off: I guess neither one
Of them weighs eighty pounds:
Eventually, one disappeared, and the other
We had to put down:
And last year, selling fireworks, the entire
Garden of Mount Escudilla burned:
I fell in love with a Mexican girl, but very Little was returned—
What joy that shown from my soul was not Enough to dissuade her from her husband who
Used to beat her—So, eventually, I caught a plane to Shanghai, in an effort to forget her:
And the mountain still stands, but she is full of Ghosts—and from her towers—her aeries—
She can still see all the across the rivers and into Mexico, where my poor muse's sister is still laughing.

Robert Rorabeck

Semiprecious Wounds

In the houses reaped by themselves:
They flee the Mexicans- lost and lonely boys who are My friends
Who have no table manners- only innuendos and excuses
For getting up
And acting like dogs: while full across the sea the silver
Challises glimmer:
And, well, if there is anything good- why then there
Are dolphins and words for spelling her
Swimming nude across the sway:
And even as this dies- or slowly corrodes abandoned like a
Chassis underneath the pines-
Even as the cenotaphs emote to sand lions far removed into
The unrevolving courts never shown to any man
Who was anything more than a cannibal:
I recite this to you again, while the day and the night take off
Their clothes and make a game of it- as their holidays
Of rattlesnakes
Or stewardesses lick their pilot's semiprecious wounds,
And are either flying away or touching down again.

Robert Rorabeck

Senses Of The Forest

This is the way I feel
That my soul should feel,
But you are not
Here;
Senses of the forest
With Christmas lights
In the trees,
Headlights of angels
Hanging there;
What is this memory?
Where does it belong?
Now look into my eyes;
See I am here-
And the forest lays across us
Like a lover
At this hour.

Robert Rorabeck

Sepia

Crawling jade hearts
Out of the bleeding tool-box:
Cerulean sea-horses
Swallowed in
The child's mouth:
Love is an orange
In an imperfect snowfield,
The seizures of amber
Her eyes situate
Fluttering,
Her body all-out
Is untrustworthy,
The waves of the Effluvious cavalry
Take her outwards,
Beneath the current's mumbling,
Her body feels like penetration,
The salt may be a child,
A fetus of whispers
The world in everything is white
The night is the whitest,
Next to her body
Is where I go to work:
Her lips the plate I eat,
The eyes rolling captors
Who can shove me off
With a glance away,
Prehistoric hungers
Diving anew.

Robert Rorabeck

Sepia's Driveway

Love me with no cause, for I am no longer
Beautiful, but bloody bone,
And hung-over for you, rasping,
And make my home leaping between the waves;
They store me in the tumult and wife beating of
The thunderstorm,
Where I kiss the salt-tears madly, pretend
That my tongue touches her nocturnal orchids,
In a meaty garden- Thus a fist;
Each fish and race-horse swirls in the competition,
Where they conjoin in the eddies,
Scaled and antique, a barebacked parade:
Listen to us hunger,
Paradoxically the aging authors grow corpulent
And tentacled, their lights dim, they try their Service in the insouciant light of staged photographs,
But they cannot escape the closing curtain,
The red satin and her mistresses, the line of Felted curves, the tasseled dancing;
But they loved her as they could, and saw her in the Rainstorm galloping,
And looked upon her madly, and wrote upon
Her as they could, tattooing her broken arms with Their needles, and bouquets of infinite recesses:
Now they drive home lonely, passing over the graying
Archipelagos, receding back into sepia's driveway,
Lulled, and lulled, and slowly formed into the mottled
Limestone which expands beneath them like hungry cavities,
And secrets where the waves lay,
Lapping, lapping.

Robert Rorabeck

Settling Down To Sleep

Tomorrow I will have to buy more cheap rum:
That is all there is too it, because I cannot drive,
And the mountains are too high to see over:
She doesn't read me anymore- She lives in North-Central Florida, in a student ghetto still,
I used to slip around her in a decade ago-
I really did; it was a sin:
She doesn't read me anymore. She thinks I've said
Everything there is to say to her,
But she doesn't know how infinite the lubrications are Concerning her- Vast Caribbean rum attributes her,
Diadems her auburn séances- She doesn't care,
She loves cartoons of straight young men crossing their Big across their bulbous chests. I have written that they have Blue anchor tattoos, admitting it was cliché,
And that their biceps are as neat as swans curling over their Twins to sleep: If I really ever do visit her again,
I'd bring her more of the metamorphosis of aspen boughs,
The higher altitude gold she never looks to sea,
The spent rhymes like pin balls ricochets off the bellies of Comely airplanes; and I'd sucker punch her handsome Bouncers and retreat, and that is a sweet enough thought to be My last one as I settle down to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Seventh Period

Crippled inflections of blue birds.

I want to curse, but I do not know her language.

In fact, I cannot speak at all,

But she is smoking a cigarette, her legs crossed,

And she knows.

Now she is just a color and we focus on

The girls running track in the red oval of the high school.

Their auburn hair is streaming. They may be virgins,

They may be wild horses reincarnated, and I can almost smell them,

And it is seventh period,

But the day is still playing like a violin,

But no one has looked at me all day.

We drove to Chris' house and I came back

Drunk from his father's liquor cabinet, prepared for

History.

A blond girl named Tammy walked over and admired my drawing;

She is a lieutenant in the air force now,

And she doesn't imagine me, though I think of her

In soft blues and red lips.

A girl named Amy told me she had a dream that

My cat had kittens last night,

And I told her that was true, though I had to think about it.

Then I also remembered that yesterday was my birthday

And the cat was black, but Amy hardly talked to me

Again through the rest of our classes together.

I had holes in my shoes, but I wouldn't buy new ones,

And since then people have succeeded, and people have failed,

But I once kissed Michelle in the back room of the Catholic Church.

Afterwards, she went home naked with another actor.

Slide your tongue to the back of your throat and speak to me,

Because I cannot say your name.

I cannot remember the pain inside the canal of your eyes,

Even as your legs ran around, their white candy striping the earth.

Now we focus on her again, and she has not moved.

Holding her cigarette close to her face. Her eyes are brown,

Her legs crossed.

I want to curse, but I have lost the power of speech.

Out in front of the school, parents are driving around and around,

And everyone is leaving, but I cannot move.

Robert Rorabeck

Several More Times Than Once

The poems tread softly through the snow,
Following and kissing after the soft necks of their brothers:
It is all that they know to do,
Because they know that they are not entirely any species of Animal,
And that they have no true brothers: Alma,
Sharon sells her liquors so high up in the snow, while you
Always look so young and magnificent:
Alma- Anyway that you choose to wear your hair is beautiful,
And I have been as high up in this state as Tallahassee.
And I have studied over the labors of the high and rich bards,
But I have never sat across any other body as beautiful as yours,
While the streets stretch so gaunt and young across their Rich and lost ways;
And I don't know any other way to save myself, because I once Ran away to Michigan, but I now have thirty two moons and I have my own house Into which you have been no more than five times, and into which We made love exactly once,
But it must have lasted an hour or more, and how many orgasms you
Had I don't exactly know, except that I know it was several more Times than once,
And I have never exactly been kidnapped, but if I had just one wish
It would be that you would kidnap me again and again:
At least several more times than once.

Robert Rorabeck

Shade Of A Deity

Shade of a deity tearing itself above

The house:

Its tears are roman candles luxuriating into the canal—

Going softly away into another place

It is best not to remember—

Where, if you did, you would see her holding his Hand, riding away to a place where words all become

One syllable—

And in the city only a siren, like a lonely man dreaming into

The mouth of a wolf

The same way water evaporates: beautifully, and forever:

Tumbling downhill to find heaven in the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

Shadow Haiku

Did you think that I could live forever as
His shadow on your lip?

Robert Rorabeck

Shadow Of Our Fires

She went out with her family to see the lions:
There they were yawning in
An apiary- the grass beneath them was mowed,
And they didn't mind the school buses
We turned around in
The auburn sun- When my mothers saw her,
They said that she had the bangs of a lion,
And they tried to sing to her
To make her their daughter,
But she wouldn't come- so busy was she Underneath the starless roof where all of the animals
Played: they fawned in their gargantuan
Yard and never once wondered why or How they were made,
Which made them so beautiful-
Panting without shade- that we came to them
Every Sunday without a church- and they yawned
And cleaned themselves- and in their eyes
Not even a shadow of our fires.

Robert Rorabeck

Shadows Whisper From The Lips Of The Cave

When I begin to pass away and the strange skin upon these bones tingles with warning, I turn my eyes toward the edge of the cave, to where the figures keep walking, strutting in show,

and then I begin to eat the apple in my throat which is the glorious thing, rising there the wild sad thing about to leap from my voice to devour
the world,

but I linger
and I am sad,

And I think about the motions
I put my body through from rest to motion, the subtlety of my thoughtless control over the golem staring back at me with these eyes

When out side, I stare timidly through the blinds and there past the shivering palm fronds below the melting staves bled from the sun, the others like me, those emoting automatons move just like me, then lurch toward the long great rows of malls spreading forever forwards like coffins for titans warned by the gods. Even afterwards, they built their homes upon the bossoming sands of the siren beaches, teeth that sparkle like eager smiles waiting to consume those deadly gating

things

And in this fading way all things come marching ever towards me, and down into me
where my body moves and does not, incomplete,
the shadows whisper from the lips of the cave.

Robert Rorabeck

Shady Haiku

I would be pleased
Simply by the bene-
Fit Of your shade, girl.

Robert Rorabeck

Shanty Cabaret

Pale though well-delineated fish
Drink to new hombres.
They don't leap but mull the shoals:
Its easy in this weather.
I stick my leg out and the sea whittles.
The breeze blows my cloak,
And I toss my head back.
After I've fainted, I crawl up on an Elbow with the mussels and write
Poetry:
Rather, all the buses have driven away.
School has gotten older,
But there is a miracle: My friends return,
Gamboling, showing teeth
With caskets full of Mexican fireworks,
These spinning Hebrews how they play,
Each one pretending not to see my scars.
They are very honorary,
And they go about me and set up,
Tapping overhead and down beneath.
They seem to be in a great cloudy room,
And once set up the sea comes to us
Like a woman all rolled up
Which we smoke with bright gas-lit eyes,
And we laugh and play,
Not pretending to know a thing about her
And the sea smokes from out lips,
Each wave scissoring upon the next line,
Waxen legs frothing clear out
Of a blue mangrove in its shanty cabaret.

Robert Rorabeck

Sharon

You'll make love in Colorado and open
Presents while I sell
Christmas trees in South Florida, exhumed in A sweat of plunder I can't even spell:
Maybe I'll get paid,
But what's important is I'll write more poetry,
And I'll think about you,
If only to prove my heterosexuality;
But with your eyes, like tennis courts, like
Teal fjords, the graveyard of every forest spirit,
How could everything I am not be proven true
By you;
Even when you no longer haunt where I make tips,
And try to keep up with the quiet paganisms,
While the traffic streams and sometimes accidents,
Where things are bought and sold-
If the butterflies of chaos are really true,
Maybe you will sneeze; but I am too drunk to continue Humoring my serious pantheisms of your Vanished empiricisms- This is a sport better left
To the Aristotelian logic of the caracoled highways:
Now I am almost done, because the room is echoing
With my ambiguous foreplays: If I get too drunk,
I will masturbate into the high grass-
Dishonoring you, but you've already had your Space pirates, your better luck-
The knowledgeable hands upon you which are subtlety
Discernible from the female;
And now I am even thinking of calling you by the Old telegraph lines of the pony express and their'
Young forgotten souls,
But luckily I don't have a dime, and my other date is Still roller-skating around the rocky areolas of your birthstone's
Mine.

Robert Rorabeck

Sharon, Seashell....

I know you have your other life,
Seashell,
But I love you, and I'm tired,
And quite awful, so go back into the Waves and keep quiet
Loving your husband as you should,
Until I'm quite ready for you,
And once I've saved upon enough money
For poems,
And soft fireworks,
And French juxtapositions tight against your Unassuming body, then I'll come for you
Again crying out loudly in a class
That I shouldn't care,
And taking you in your entire body,
Carefully offsetting your children,
Kissing your lips like a religious crèche in the Parking lots of the rain,
While my dogs scratch at doors wanting to get
Out into the tall grass and mark the territory
While the weather is still fair and you have Very little at all or nothing to say to me....
Sharon,
Seashell....

Robert Rorabeck

Sharon.... Sharon

Cold, visionless: now let me say your Name, Sharon:
I've climbed mountains for you,
Though I am good at no sports;
Things trickle downward into expensive
Resorts,
Sharon.... Sharon, please:
I look ugly on highways, so ugly,
Even my sisters don't care about me,
Sharon..... Please:
I love so few, so little things....
Sharon.... Please:
I've climbed four mountains in one day:
Lincoln, Democrat, Boss, and Quandary,
Sharon;
But my greatest accomplishment was Mnt. Evans
And Mnt. Massive in one day:
That's the first and fourth highest mountains
In Colorado.... Sharon, Sharon:
My body is so cold; it is like it's at the morgue,
Sharon.... Sharon:
While I was doing that I wasn't thinking of you,
I was touching the foothills of god,
Sharon..... Sharon:
The earth is spinning wildly, and I don't know what
To do.... I would like to come and live near you
Like an early denouement, Sharon....
I would like to save you from the paper snowflakes and
The condiments of blood,
But you are already married, Sharon....
And my grandmother is already dead. Perhaps you've Already pissed off a greater love;
But I love you, Sharon: Before I was born I knew that I always would,
But now you are up to no good.... Sharon,
But I will still love you.... Sharon; I will always love you,
Sharon;
I always knew that I always would....

She Doesn'T Write From Overseas, Which Is Understandable

German Shepherd drools on my forearm where I killed a horsefly today-I broke a horseshoe
Once and cursed the game.
I have dark circles under my eyes, really impenetrable
Scars.
That is why I am sweet and so high, and anonymous.
I really am happy and she is going on a cruise.
Where is she going? The sea is the news- How many Cities lost in the waves,
How many ashes of dead grandmothers? It really is a Beautifully thing to hang the bell on-
Christmas time and snowflakes sweat through the sloughs.
My father pays me for my troubles,
But I don't draw mountains anymore- I'm responsible For the kids. Fairies ride sword-fish we hang on the
The fiberboard walls; bright fairies gossip and sauna inside
Vacated tortoise shells we put our galoshes on to dry;
Their little wings are rainbows cut out from the sky
Where airplanes are leaping, always leaping- aren't they Going now, but into the giant world where people who fall
In love are always growing bigger and bigger,
But I don't know why, but leave your shoes outside the door,
And come with me and we'll find out how, just won't we now.

Robert Rorabeck

She Forgets

She forgets.
Her eyes fade off of him
Return to the busy madness
She drives away in—

If she would come back
And let him give it another shot.
If she could use her heart
To focus her vision—
If he would stand there long enough
For her to take a picture....

But she forgets.
Her life is too busy—
It is the mad business she
Has to take care of—
She has a needy infant upon each tit,
And two hungry wolf pups gnawing in her shoals,
Waiting for their turns of nourishment,
So that they might found a city about her....

But she forgets
That she is about to become the Last goddess of a great civilization—
She is too busy with the mad business
She drives away in....

Her eyes fade off him.
She drives away from the linden forest
Into the glinting nameless cities—

She forgets.

Robert Rorabeck

She I Love

I don't like doing the extra work of your soul,
Laying out tattoos for my fingers to needle on your thoughts,
The voluptuous insects secreted with your tears,
The menagerie which glows when you are in the dark,
But I am made of so many sharp things, myself,
And can not lounge for long after lunch,
When even the forests are a half naked harem the wind
Peruses like snooty women in the lingerie department,
And each mountain is a different woman rising up,
Each one I'd like to summit, to see the gold,
Which entwines with the sunrise from the top of her sport;
I've had this toothache since adolescence, and it has Brought me further alone, so I've set up a typewriter
On a private beach and am drinking my isolation from the Fluids and the salt, so each word goes down kind of dizzy,
As if poisoned, for I am too tired to be thirty,
And too juvenile to dance with the beautiful woman glittering
In the back, her eyes so affixed they might as well be stars;
If I were a declassified astronaut I'd chart to her like a
Celestial plume, to what her fears transcend reality,
Until just she and her silhouette waltz the room like extraordinary Twins, slowly matching each other like sexy pugilists, until,
Engorged, only one remains, and it is she I love.

Robert Rorabeck

She Is Mickey Mouse

Look at them driving around now,
No fun in love-
With nobody else; They have their rings,
And their occupations,
A Lexus;
Their spit and their clean
Pomade and amble freckled fleshed-
Hyphened last names,

Anonymous suspense....
The night is dark in heaven:

They got a little alcove for sex and tortoise f! ck,
But they don't got what I tell them what I got/

How I feel!
They don't got what I feel, doc!
Let them in so they can see me rock n' roll,
Alone on the infant atoll....

Let them smash the expensive glass
Down in Boca Raton;
Inside the Chuppah
Let them mull over that bone;
If they knew Spanish, they'd know their High society was dressing nice
In the mouth of the sewer rat-

Moan

Funk! Junk! Cocaine crank:
All she needs is a little spank of lonely love:
My name broke from hers like a kite in a hurricane;
Now she is the domesticated kine taking it in the mouth:

She is Mickey Mouse
Scurrying in the house of a lesser king-
She is the tail end cartoon burned in the reams
For the rest of her life;

Mark me,
Mark me;
Grandmother rodent....

But you cannot even see me.
You are already blind, and I am living on the invisible
Island of snowbirds, mobile homes and citrus;
The place her cheating commercialism will never touch;
Brushed by the sonorous opera of the tattooed breast:
The blue-bird on her tit sings my name
Like a mighty m^ther-f*cking migration,
Of French-kissing which never looks back.

Robert Rorabeck

She Is Not Mine

The dog walked down the street
Where her eyes were languid above him,
Suckling child-
And I cried, my eyes really moped,
Because the child was not mine,
And even more beautiful because the child was Not mine;
Of needing lips not mine;
And I watched her leave for buses home-
And they were not mine;
All I had to do was lie in bed and jack off,
While the souls of tin birds crenulated against
The upstairs porch with the broken-down
Jacuzzi that molded and grew with the ululations
Of tadpoles and unfortunate princes, puckering undiademed:
And I wanted her lips, and ping-pong-
And the shadows stretched throughout the weeping
Hallways of the school,
The smoked out bathrooms,
The unicorns in the soccer field, the cherry red
Keyed cars;
She was standing out there vacillating like a fever dream
Like tapped crystal with something sweet inside;
And I do this because of my stuttering scars,
And because she is there hanging over me like grapes
I cannot reach- I cannot reach because the words are Not yet mine-
And she is sitting straight in front of me. Sometimes
She turns around and smiles- smiles,
But I can't really understand-and the buses leave, and the schools
Leaves- the cormorants leave-
The esplanade remains green and open even as winter
Tiptoes under this women's opalescent throat:
Like a fish suffocating in his hands, fat-bellied, the children
Like roe dripping out from behind....
Like precious gems
And she is not mine.

She Just Doesn'T Care

My dogs fight in a box car of make believe children;
They nock them down like weather-beaten bowling pins;
What am I doing in this city,
With the river so near but not fearful; and yet the correct
English of this is appalling,
Like a fisherman unconcerned there is no bottom:
How will we get to the floor to sleep,
And looking at the phrases critically, as if you are supposed
To interview them for a job: They are paltry at best
They haven't worked for ages, and who have they loved?
How many other words have they known laid down beside Them to keep warm after some such and such midnight?
Their vocabulary is poor. Skin. Teeth. All poor; its diseases-
Not fit for mermaids, those topless dancers like selkies
Inciting barfights: And I'm sure I loved her: I sent her bouquets,
But why is the sky blue? The bad news can go on forever
And the fountain of youth is not real: All the conquistadors laid
To rest beside it are so old and unexciting, they put the tourists
Into a gummy eyed malaria; it is their disease. Cheap candles
Are more exciting, open wounds along the bromeliad,
The lizards who change colors along with the warts; and if the Sea is weeping, it is because she has lost her billfold and that Is why she goes back and forth sweeping across the middle-Class lights of a moribund holocaust, sweeping as if though Homely she might cradle inchoate beauty,
But she just doesn't care.

Robert Rorabeck

She Kisses The Karate Kid

Oh god, the pain in my overworked
Liver:
Blue collar, pushing so many words,
Sands in a bottle!
But I still haven't found enough
Fishhooks to be rich
In Alaska:
The barmaids are still barmaids serving
Lips and legs to
Somebody, deep alone in their Paul
Bunyan bedrooms:
They love beefcake cartoons,
And roller coasters,
And nearby trailer-parks:
I've wanted to love in every one of an Infinite resort of waves,
But she once asked me if I could cook,
And I said, "Only pancakes."
I think about her sometimes, but not on Sundays:
And that she used to surf,
And made love in the burnished surf in great Long towns of relinquishing tourism
To boys I don't know,
Except that they are so flawless they've
Never had to resort to books,
Or the endless attempts of these things:
Soon I'll have a house
With a cotton gin and African-American
Fables-
Maybe I'll even have a shadow in my shower
And female hands to sympathize with these Scars,
Painted nails to beckon snails,
And soon a daughter to relinquish to the Humid, mid-western soap-operas:
But this is not a South Florida
Noir: I love her,
But I've checked my baggage-

But I am just a tourist in these waves
Fading away,
And she doesn't have to travel so far to hear
The beautiful notes
Which open up her needing doors
To feed the herons from her palm:
They are tall and dangerous,
But she has tamed them, and now they play
Sports for her senses,
And that is really all she needs.

Robert Rorabeck

She Never Misses

Some ladies say that snakes are like old swords
Swinging through the grass:
Romero tells me his name is actually spelled with an I,
But everyone calls him coyote, anyways:
Both of his parents are dead, but he has stopped drinking:
I have thought for some days that I am in love with His sobrina, Alma- I have thought that I have been in love
Before- since kindergarten;
The thinking of love is what sustains me, but I do not Think that snakes look like old swords swinging through the Grass:
They should be ribbons there falling through the meadows
And caesuras of her hair and tresses,
Those esplanades of beauty that are spoken for, while he Comes in heavy booted and muddies up the floor of her grotto,
Never seeing her how I see her for eight hours a day,
Needing the hiss of her curves: she is never straight but turning
Like the pressure on a bow,
Creating heat while her body swings and hisses: Alma,
The burning, burning soul:
She is not like a snake, but when she strikes, she never misses.

Robert Rorabeck

She Said Look Here

She said she loved a new cleft
Cut like a core of diamond through
The skyscrapers of the Emerald City,
Grander than the quarts of Yosemite.
She said, look here at me now,
Because I am sitting on his lap
And Big Daddies are glowing around Me, like gentlemen
Getting drunk and sweaty
In a bowling alley,
While his fingers march like
Ruby generals of excusable piracy
Undoing the buttons of my chastity,
Climbing the Roman hills and picking
Bing Cherries with the Mexicans in my orchards.
She said look here, as he
Galoped her on his knee
And she smiled and giggled like
A banshee.
Together they were in a brightly
Lit musical hall in high school,
A room that stretched up horizontally
Without a ceiling where winged deer
Were prancing through a pagan river,
The antechamber for a high king
Or a mentally challenged president,
Full of mumbled echoing,
Bordered in filigreed aspen trees
She kept on saying look here
And see me all the while
Giggling like a banshee,
While Pan pranced and played
A flute, his horns conducting energy,
The Lord's favorite general
Fiddled her on his wet-spotted knee.

Robert Rorabeck

She Sees Everything

White mice play in
The red ribbons entwined
About her ribs— where
She is the permanent product
Placement resting at the Forest's feet.
The new moon is the Wash basin for her
Soul, she swims around in
The milky cloth of clouds.
The queue of stars line up
In constellations like deck officers
Directing her safe landing on
A translucent runway.
When down beneath the shedding
Canopy, all her old meat peels away
Ravaged by the nauseous beasts
Uncurled from the hollows in trees
To dine as quick and ferocious as Venomous green lightning on the Breathless parts of the maiden—
Until she becomes the Juxtaposition of forever and nothingness
Where her eyes are gone, taken
Away to feed the nests of newborn pests.
Yet, up above, circling like a
Pale glider going on and on
In the greater and lesser lights
She sees everything.

Robert Rorabeck

She Still Does All That She Can

Right now horses sleep, and young men sleep,
And the armies cut by acidic fangs from the Strange earth outside the car port,
And the cats whisper, and careless little girls have Gone to sleep kissing the corpuscles of frogs;
Believing each on might be their Prince, an ugly lottery of licks, but the day never Comes- The sun just comes up,
And kicks over the old pale again, but the day
Never comes,
Though she still does all that she can.

Robert Rorabeck

She Swings Up To No Good

These are not songs,
Or cantos to raise the smoky, rose hatched
Dead:
The stewardesses are still alive,
And they are independently beautiful.
Diana no longer lives in the woods,
But has come north from Columbia so that Florida
Must be to her like Michigan is to my father:
And all these used cars are junks,
And yet all the movies are so wonderful,
While my fingers stroke their tremulous flagpole
And lay for awhile the longitude in a celibate
Bed-
This day goes on forever like an unexplorable orange Grove,
And I make slight friends and slightly more enemies,
And I always want to see what is under her hood:
The fairy tales of her loose morals
That are always perfumed and practicing the foreplay
Of her brass knobbed senses,
And she sweats,
And she swings,
Up to no good.

Robert Rorabeck

She Who Is My Muse

I suppose I have been to the top of some mountain,
Looking down for some girls:
Where they sparkle in the murky glades of cars and Supermarket,
Going their predestined ways, back and forth between the Devilish works
Occupying them in their cloyed miniskirts:
I once submitted for in one day, going up and down the Stony caesuras,
My feet palavering in an immensely empty court:
And I didn't know Alma then: and I don't know who
She is now,
But she is in my like, and I am strung out around her like
An evergreen manipulated by the wind
And the biplanes who come infrequently looking for Missing children;
And this is the barrenness of the desolation of my art:
In the proverbial end, only my dogs will love
Me, only because they cannot see in all of the colors
That I have so wrongly painted her,
She who is my muse.

Robert Rorabeck

Shedding Tears

Where you have buried the dreams
In a tin under the sand, the tide is always Washing away the footprints of first loves,
Slow infants learning to crawl towards jellyfish,
From the shiny plates of balding accountants;
When the night is fallen,
And the cars are gone-
They have all moved away to old homes,
Gentle cribs, under the mobiles of wandering airplanes,
The local bars where the girls dance to sad sea shanties,
And the barrage of liquor keeps hitting the lips
Until there is very little sound, very little pain;
Yet, you keep the letters here all through the night,
The secrets you have extricated from your beating heart
To move on, to show the things above that you can be Another person,
Like the changing of a suit that appears identical,
You are in something new and frightening,
But your tears are buried beneath the tide,
Hand in the hand with the hapless conquistadors,
The extinct Indians, the fossils of varying identities;
Unmarked, maybe even now the sea is stealing who you were,
Taking those thoughts away while you look into The windows of a new house and carrying on
As the cicadas pollinate out of old husks, again and again,
Left like graduations on the mottled barks of tasseled cypress.

Robert Rorabeck

Shellfish Kissing Maricon

My ears are no longer listening to the lips who Traffic in the sun:
My eyes are no longer marking the green cannons firing
Their captain's guns:
That my body is only feeling the soft pulse of darkening
Night:
That it is feeling no other body moving; it is like the lonely
Tide in the loneliest playground;
It weeps in the shadows over the empty ground,
Because it knows that it has no one else to love, but you
Alma; but you,
And who are you sleeping with tonight; Alma: while my Very soul secretes itself from my pores like a hive of Lighthouses crying to you:
But you....
But you....

Robert Rorabeck

Shelters Breathed Not From Wood

I look at pictures of your new haircut: you holding your daughter
And swaying a smile against a peg-board:
The light of your eyes admitting maybe that you once loved me
In the Magical Kingdom with the other seniors on their Way to college or at least the concession stand:
And today I am drinking Bermuda rum as dark as the hoary seals:
If I was a narcissist, I would get new tattoos on my joints
That connect me like the spokes on a bicycle; but every morning
I am Lazarus to the news that you are selling, breathing in your Little shops when we once inhaled a classroom together.
Now outside it is raining, and I am absolutely alone. My pets are In Arizona. I am closing on a house that is too small for all of us,
And I spend my life in movies, like quarters into little whirligigs.
Today I went to the dollar store and blew my lips into pinwheels,
And now I am writing about you, because you are too far away to Do me anymore harm:
Your snow is melting and very soon different sorts of tourists will come Up into the parade of wildflowers. Today I bought sixteen articles of Clothing for four dollars just to impress you, and I spent my birthday with Our mutual teacher: Now my blood is roller-skating in its avenues,
Like virgins soon to become stewardesses,
As I know you are yet happily breastfeeding your firstborn child,
Fearing the time that she will let off of your body, like a vagrant letting Go of a kite,
Though I would not worry as I am sure there will be many more to come:
As your park is green and mutual, and I go into it whenever I can
To watch the pretty ladies dancing in a pantomime of endeavoring commitment;
While the sun flickers and moves your body in frames;
And I build shelters for you in hidden glades, but they are immaterial,
As they are shelters breathed not from wood.

Robert Rorabeck

Shoes

My shoes are cold
And I'm wearing them
So I am cold,
But I'm running out of Shoes:
I climb mountains,
I work 365 days a year;
It takes a toll on leather souls.
My other set has a black widow
And 9,000 of her offspring
Living in the left shoe,
So the right shoe has nowhere
To go.
I wouldn't wish to relocate them
Forcefully, and create more youthful Terrorism.
I wonder if great men become Great because they wear
Perfectly fitting shoes,
Or if feral men who know nothing
Of words, should put on an educated man's Shoes, they should instantly learn to speak
As well as their king;
Or, if a poem is written about shoes,
Should it then smell like feet;
Or, if unread, should it smell like anything at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Shooting Off Along His Own Measly Way

You've read what I've written to you:
How insignificantly I blush,
How my scars disappear readily in the rumors
Of moonlight;
And you don't even worry that I go to the library
To masturbate,
Rather than bring anymore bouquets to your check
Out line which is already chockfull
Of the beefier men you prefer;
And my lines are callow, and crass, and they don't Even have as many days left as my grandfather,
Who has water in his lungs, as I would have liquors,
Should I be continuing on these trails for Even one more day:
For you are a beautiful woman, but taken from Appealing angles, or the meatier left to starve,
Then all your race is beautiful or can become that way
By the makeup of your craft;
And mammalian, you are really lacking as you can only suckle
One or two young at a time;
And you are neither like a fire-engine nor a werewolf,
Though it should be said in the simplicity of our American
World,
We will forever make good neighbors; and my poems compliment
Your wine, or visa versa;
And looking at the stars together, laid off our bicycles and
The hearty scuppernongs peeled off my professor's linked fence,
We might deem for awhile to share a god
Who seems to be very much alive, gambling with his engines
Along the avenues of sweet penumbra;
But should he ever look down, he will figure us just as we were,
Two insignificants in love,
Before shooting off along his own measly way.

Robert Rorabeck

Shooting Star

Abandoned toys made real for god;
Tonight the heavens are doused with salt,
Which scarred the streets horizontal to the old sea, and palms-
No one is getting published but the greasers,
Who proved their bravado by counting coo on
The winsome coyotes' dimpled throats-
While the sun was thrumming down the nape of treacle sky:
As soon as I got to school there was a rumble;
And the circus midget fell to stealing gold amidst the mêlée
Of unoccupied wombs,
The brush-stroked cheerleaders of the garish tombs;
The pantaloon cabaret the principle enjoyed at break of dawn.
Then I loved a girl for awhile who was a palindrome;
I became a cleft-lipped Romeo without a date to the prom;
But I serenaded her with crickets from the swamp
Under her desk;
We'd skip school and smoke the hookah in the fata morgana of a bus,
While boys fought outside with bottle rockets and broken glass;
Abating only for the séance of substitutes held at lunch,
And turned the trimmed affluence into a trailer-park
Of dreamers and frog-throat truckers with silver rigs;
While she skipped school and cried in her purple wig:
She whose name I cannot say, for from the very first she walked away,
Until she found another star, a sash for her violet waist
She wore from afar; And signed up for the pilgrimage of handsome
conquistadors;
She slipped like a penny beneath the floorboards;
And it is her I am still fumbling for,
My jaw thrown out to sea, a wishing bone, a cenotaph, a fishing-lure,
While the circus midget pick-pockets the trained Labradors;
In fact, she is the shooting star they were all fighting for....

Robert Rorabeck

Shore Drive

The art is mishandled and led down into the sea.
Tourism's fat lips hang over the water like a flatulent cloud,
Chewing up tuna, blowing man-o-war.
They are buying so many things, where the land shifts and
The children line up around the sleepy tortoises drunk
Off wine like they were in the middle of a park
Waiting their turn for the merry-go-round.
The sun chips away, exposing such sins like a muckraker
In slicks with a bucket at low tide: What is he digging up?
What words should I know to put there in his pail,
To satisfy the onlookers, or the mermaids bathing and Doing delicate laundries (petticoats and braziers) in
The effervescing foliage of the surf:
I want to move here and winnow with the palmetto's shadows
Through dawn, and eat what food I can steal,
To trickle this roe down to my heart and coat it like spilling ink
From an inebriate sailor's runny tattoo,
And dream of so many movie girls who have forgotten me,
Who are pregnant and restaurateurs- who know so much
About wine, and where to kiss a leading man; but here, once settled,
To recognize the constant changing battles in the front yards,
The immigrants and ghosts and fire-ants who've swashbuckled through history
Lounging in a carport that I own, and yachts and schooners further
Out on the blue deck practicing for the ballet: Surely, she doesn't Love me, but here there is so much bright sorrow that it perpetuates Itself: I will drive there and let the shady spots freckle with My scars; it will be on my birthday, and I will be reborn so far away
From her that it doesn't really matter that She will make pilgrimages to see me then, even though she is Blind. Out in the waves she is a good kisser, and she has an Inclination to change her mind,
While the tourists hang like storm clouds with red-eyed lobster
Traps looking down from their enraptured dinners, they see us make Love; and they pay with sanddollars, and still they say that they don't understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Shoreline Of My C

I've tried turning over so many terrapin to see
What their strange ideas have in store,
But all I get is the left over roe of their gluttony breakfast;
And their eyes don't even sing to me,
And I leave them alone until they stop spinning on the floor.
While all of this time the stewardesses have been at dancing,
Like satellites in chorus lines of star-burned rows,
Like dancehalls for sheriffs who are pilots and astronauts:
And they kick their legs up all across the Elysian Fields,
And they remind me of girls from high school even while they
Are dancing, and they are so far off you cannot even notice
When they are dressed and when they are naked;
And I think of buying them houses to live underneath them,
To make them just as jealous, so that in my clever vanity I may watch
Them, while they singing look down at me, and wonder what
Beautiful sort of creature lives with me, and from a closer vantage
Point strikes across my visage and my bedroom everyday,
Like a comet burning holes in her secret negligee, like
A secret older sister getting naked and purring along the well fitted
Shoreline of my canopied pool.

Robert Rorabeck

Shoreline Of My Canopied Pool

I've tried turning over so many terrapin to see
What their strange ides have in store,
But all I get is the left over roe of their glutting breakfast;
And their eyes don't even sing to me,
And I leave them alone until they stop spinning on the floor.
While all of this time the stewardesses have been at dancing,
Like satellites in chorus lines of star-burned rows,
Like dancehalls for sheriffs who are pilots and astronauts:
And they kick their legs up all across the Elysian Fields,
And they remind me of girls from high school even while they
Are dancing, and they are so far off you cannot even notice
When they are dressed and when they are naked;
And I think of buying them houses to live underneath them,
To make them just as jealous, so that in my clever vanity I may watch
Them, while they singing look down at me, and wonder what
Beautiful sort of creature lives with me, and from a closer vantage
Point strikes across my visage and my bedroom everyday,
Like a comet burning holes in her secret negligee, like
A secret older sister getting naked and purring along the well fitted
Shoreline of my canopied pool.

Robert Rorabeck

Shorter Ways To Go

I feel my legs in sweaty black jeans:
I already want to come over myself, and I will
After my mother is asleep:
I will stand outside in the empty yard with
The cinder blocks
And I will come to a muse or the killer of muses:
Maybe I will come to the lady who will soon
Be my wife,
Or my heirloom, or my threat: I will sing for a Long while, out on the clasp of dawn,
Or on a gambling boat:
I will sing which is like pretending to fire a firearm;
And I will get wet from the enrapturing playbills of the Sea;
And I have no arcaded, and I am humble underneath her
Mountains: I am swept under there like a lost cousin
Who was never invited to a merry Christmas;
And I am saving my money- And I still want to be beautiful;
And maybe I was the most beautiful man today, Sharon;
Maybe I was just that beautiful,
As eager and ugly enough to star in all the old Hollywood
Movies of our almost forgotten cemetery:
Where did you live in Wellington:
What is your old address and whose fingers were the first
To unbottun the back of your dress, Sharon-
I want to know the first man you loved, Sharon;
And I want to kiss, and then swim in the waves; for you were A beautiful woman, Sharon, but now you are almost Gone into your ways; and I am almost gone as well,
Feeling all the awful copper metals of those conquistadors sunken
Like greening cannibals into my chest:
Frank O'Hara gives me an erection, makes me all wet,
Sharon, Sharon: who were your forebears, and how long do they Go:
To the saber tooth, and to the hypothesis of Eskimo;
And I swing every night, Sharon; and I refuse to eat;
And would you teach me poetry, Sharon:
For you are my sick muse, and you go down and hold yourself
Properly for awhile while you think of the tropical fish,

The little golden darkling I suffocate in my fist:
Sharon,
You are almost the most precious Wolverine I know,
But I've forgotten our school colors,
And we've both gotten a shorter ways ago-

Robert Rorabeck

Shotgun Hyacinth

Two words

Meaning two

Separate things,

But in the evening

They are both for naught.

Robert Rorabeck

Shouldn'T We Be Going

Kiss or touch this beautifully crooked boy,
Or become a seagull,
But give yourself to my salient desperations:
Open your lips to me like the flower of a
Department store. If I am finite,
If my body is scarred and finite,
What part of me reaches out through the yards
Of weather fronts,
Curls in ways I would never know to whisper
Over your sweet shoulder,
To feel its tendrils underneath your delicate
Straps, and says with its few lines,
That out of all the boys, gray headed, I am still
The best one; and if I've struck out, I Am still waiting for you in the red earth,
Or underneath the bleachers of some sad high school,
Waiting for you to come out. Now that all
The cars are gone, knowing that you cannot drive alone,
I have hidden a bottle for us in place down Desperately near the sea; and now that you have Come, somehow, shouldn't we be going?

Robert Rorabeck

Showers Of The Evening's News

Nonsense of ribbons tied around the apple bows:
The houselights linger and the housewives
Prepare the pretty feast of the bodies
In their views: they spring around the tables that Are being used,
And fall flat into the hearths of the springing news:
Their husbands, glad to be architects of the leggy
Game, catch them and mouth them, and they Do the same:
Every evening as steady as they prove:
Housewives, and sun showers of the evening's news.

Robert Rorabeck

Showtime

A man without his lover sleeps near the sea.
In fact he is dead and nothing but bones,
And, oh how that dead man grins
To see the night and day reciprocate.
When his skull drinks the wine of sunset,
When the sea is rushing and twisting in watery knots—
Then he can think about the love
The world has shown to him,
As crabs scuttle like little forget-me-nots,
Red and hinged pupils dilated in his dreamy eye-sockets....
Then he can see her riding in the red mists,
And already her suitor is upping her razzle-dazzled skirts,
And, oh how he can see her getting it done,
As the wild sea bucks— There in the waves,
A herd of Arabian horses are stampeding,
But that is just a metaphor,
But the man's lover is real. There she is,
Just off the East coast of Florida
Flaming like a disease—He sees her and grins
And gets drunk on the breeze as his ribs
Grow brittle in rows half embarrassed by the sand—
Parts of him are thrown away. Parts of him are halfway
To Africa, but his skull is there grinning like a prize—
And he drinks his wine in awful fits,
As he sees his woman getting f-cked by the flash and bang
Of that sunset—Oh what filthy lust!
But the sex is good and the horizon is its stage,
And the dead man's skull drinks his wine
And laughs at his memory's terrible play....

Robert Rorabeck

Shush And Shush

Sailing on a magic carpet of Styrofoam I broke my jaw on the side
Of I-95,
When I was only four years old and
No one was home:
Now I want to cover the sea with sod,
Because I lost my virginity
To a green carpet in a great big house when I was....
When I was a superhero in high school,
Surrounded by cowboys and Indians
And Lincoln logs
And paper cats and calico airplanes:
And all my stewardesses had names which were Interchanged as they watched me
Beat myself like a foul baseball player,
My pallid oilfield of eternal wealth;
But now shush,
Shush you candles, but still burn on like the dead
Soldiers decapitated in the wishes of my Somme....
Or somewhere shush,
And sway like brushes to the girls I know and love
And want to play,
And say their names like skipping wishes over the dirty
Canal,
Straight over the blue eyed backs of every blue gill:
Sharon, shush, my sick muse,
And love me while the elk and reindeer bugle in the dusk,
For the aspens are all naked now,
And the tourists blush,
And my hand holds nothing.... Nothing but empty
Rust:
So shush, Sharon and your daughter:
Shush and shush.

Robert Rorabeck

Silent Grotto In The Mind

Silent jewel now this is loud—
Cloud happening after cloud— immolations
Above a swing-set that never happens nor Ever has to come down—
Silent grotto in the mind,
As lunch trucks come at lunching time—
Now boy is here,
Just as girl does come,
Two bodies lying in the lying sun—
I supposed I saw you
Opening your eyes at breakfasting time—
They say the swiftest machine can turn in time—
The poetess is dead,
And my muse no longer knows a rhyme.

Robert Rorabeck

Silent Orange Dreams

My body numbs by opulent venom,
Kissed by the lips of still bleeding venison:
And the champions have taken to the sky:
They have taken your hand, Alma:
They are kissing and blessing you and turning giant
Airplanes around like bottles in a kissing game:
Atop the sky, atop the town:
It is like the whispering fantasy of spoiled school kids
Who invite invisible lovers into their own rooms:
It is like all of the hours I am forced to spend with you
When either you or I am not home:
And this is a butterfly, a god, or your name lighted
A spotlight atop the favorite green colors of the stage of This terraplane; and this is my nascent desire
Calling from high atop the coned trams of a conifer,
Like a mother who doesn't move,
But as if through ripples in a wishing well,
Of silent orange dreams that never sleep,
Calls you home.

Robert Rorabeck

Silently (Censored)

In this world the Very loud one,
Where angels fly like
Airplanes,
It's best to say nothing at All,
And if you can learn at a
Very young age
To walk away from your Parents, your favorite
Toy,
There you will come to Know everything—

Silence occupies the largest Country inside you—
That great colorless beast
Cannot be surgically removed
By societal instruments,
Silver of sharp counterfeit—
Talk as loud as you
Want,
Hide in a crowded room
With your hand occupying
A glass of boisterous wine—
Shout across the street
To your neighbor,
Clap to draw his attention,
Ask him to borrow something,
Go drink beer at a football game,
F-ck a woman you love
Or do not love,
Make her scream your name
To reassure your existence—

The beast inside you will Still be there,
Watching you from the tall grass,
The hungry eyes know the name

Even God doesn't know—
It will only get closer and closer
Until you recognize it,
Until you know it is a part of you,

And your family will look at you
Confounded and say,
Who the hell are you?
We don't know you—

But it is best not to Say a thing
Just walk away steadily
With purpose,
But do not run
Or they will devour you.

Live instead in your Own wilderness,
The only thing ever
To exist
With the hungry beast
Inside, purring voiceless
Down your throat

Cut your veins and feed it
Until you are utterly consumed.
Then you will look out at the Bright yellow things that speed
By you
From its eyes
And you will exist as Silent thought floating above
The heads looking up,
The cacophonous seas of Echoing nothingness trying
To survive by turning tricks in The void

You escape from,
A translucent satellite
Traveling ever upwards

Silently.

Robert Rorabeck

Silently Going Along My Way

Since no one is listening,
I might as well dance, going on tiptoes
Over the grinning skulls of crocodiles,
As if the entire yard was of vermillion piano keys:
Without instructions,
Kissing what girls that I may
Who might come floating down through the Swelter beginning to bake through the slash-pines,
Above which canopy the commercial airplanes are Roaring,
Their pull string engines started like lawnmowers;
And I might as well cream in my hand,
Like a little bit of offering to the invisible girls
In the low orange trees;
Grinning, scarred, because no one is looking, and Give my best profile to the unbearable day,
As I would give my palm to the fates of a housewife's
Careless eyes,
Give my entire filthiness over to your washing machine,
Like a tiny commercial spell they've accused me of
While the paper snowflakes are falling;
But what is this, I don't care,
You've caught me by surprise, though I can see you are Barely dressed and in the middle of getting interested for Your sailor coming home from his midday sea battles,
All the monsters he's bodily explored, well shaven-
I should make my own way over to where my parents are calling;
Its time to come home again,
Barefoot and imperfect, leaving you here to following
Your usual sway; it isn't far to go and soon
You will be making love,
And I would love to see you again silhouetted in the bright
Smoke the sun is never done defeating,
But I can see you're all dolled up for him,
And it is not to my nest to which you have flown to
In silk stockings- My parents have brought home dinner,
The earth is made of baseball clay
And we are all its estranged visitors, frantically knocking;
I must really be going silently along my way.

Robert Rorabeck

Silver Fireworks Of Another Man's Holidays

All the way down during the day,
Down the steps to the sea- to feed bread crumbs to Mermaids,
To proposition the virgins in the grottos that you- Alma,
Should think of me,
Sweating like the confections of an opulent daydream,
Into a house with my dog too small for you to Have, and shrinking all of the time,
Diminishing into a dwarf as if by an evil, lascivious spell,
Finding it hard to get into my truck,
Drinking liquor near the torpid and opened lips of the Canal- wading into the fetid presumptions
That collection like in the murkiness of a questionable
Wishing well:
That I have lost my way, over spilling my words, and commingling
With liquor even though I have to get up after midnight to Work into the afternoon-
While you arise from another bed, silver fireworks of Another man's holidays licking through your beautiful hair.

Robert Rorabeck

Silver On The Tree

I cannot think anymore, as happy as if I were with a woman, in the banking of the Higher earths, amidst the alabaster aspens,
The columns for the celebrations
Of the cast of angels,
For in the blanketing nimbus,
The rosy swirl like that of the seashell's
Inner ear, the peaceful colloquialisms
Of people who live so near the sea
They cannot tell their lives apart from
The otter's clever play in seaweed beds,
For it is all of one season now,
The clever dating calendars give no hope:
And holidays could come at anytime,
Or none at all,
As the ancient berths of maritime traders
Trundle upwards in the darkness,
And horse-like skeletons split the Infant grave, braying in the gray snows
As the wolves clean off the last
Of the clever meat, riding them:
The clock has wound down, and
The laughing man on top of it has Breathlessly drunken his tasteless wine
And let us in:
Through the secret corridors where changing
Maidens run, the sea is butchered
By a dull sword and makes no sound.
There is silver on the tree
At the end of the path a long ways down,
Where not a single thing moves
At the foot of the house.
The ladies of aristocracy with ruined names
Have drunken their poisons under the lee,
And now sleep with a bluish sheen,
The opal necks rotting the speechless marble.
In this world,
How can you say a single thing
And not be driven away by the stockless kind.

As the heroes have risen up victoriously
Many times, now they grow old
And the greatest worm comes,
A long crimson train chewing coal,
So there is nothing to be done now,
As we are old and cotton haired,
Given over to the infant's nameless whisperings,
But to open the door and let it in.

Robert Rorabeck

Similacrum Of Love

New Mexicans waiting on
The granite steps of the monuments for
The gifts of the magi—
How will they wonder on home,
Having been defeated by the great powers—
But they take solace by Stealing the apples from their Masters' Christmas trees—
And I have loved them while making love
To the promises they do not keep:
She leapt above her Disney World—
And she wept as she leaped—
The same way that crocodiles cry for everyone:
She did the same to me—
Underneath the airplanes and the skyscrapers—
Giving her love to the skeletons
Tattooed
Everywhere they could not breathe—
As jeweled mermaids swam through the caesuras,
Giving nude clips to the tourists
Who all lived upon their ships—
And they kept peering down into the greater amusements
Where they knew that she kept—
As she pretended to swim for them—
A simulacrum of love leaping across the doused
Bonfires—
As the sunlight doused into the parks—
As the shadows crept into the hours.

Robert Rorabeck

Since We Dreamed That Way

I wish I had some liquor to christen each of my Heavenliest scars
(or at least root beer) : they go better by that, the itch to burn
Next to your legs scissoring, so sharp and sexy
Like they could do paper crafts;
I bet you could create anything by just crossing them,
Witchcraft- I bet there are all Sorts of fingerprints up and down their Siamese rivers,
Not even all human: , but no safe way across.
I don't care. I blew out the candles
And made a wish for your legs, something to take down
And tell secrets to amidst the prickly aloes,
To whisper to beside the ancient car port as my parents
Drive in bringing home fried chicken and apples,
So very young and successful and carefully dangerous.
Don't you see them, that nimbus of lighthearted in-laws?
You know where it is- You don't have to pretend,
Where baby teeth are still coming loose.
Where the gold fish is harassed by the gray cat who Died so many years ago- just wandered off.
There is pornography inside the chassis across the ditches-
Leather tramps and a few Mexicans are licking there lips,
But not for any kind of job. Yes, it is my fairy-tale, but No one doesn't have to know about it, except for you.
So come and I'll give you a cool beer,
And we will watch the rabbits pin themselves all throughout
The turquoise rock garden my mother had an easy time planting
With all the out of work actors and scorpions and
So many little things which like to sting; put your eyes and lips
On my subtle wounds, spit on them and send them off;
and your breasts upon my heart,
Like cold chicken or ham, if you prefer, and I want to make love
To you because hasn't it been so very long since we dreamed that way.

Robert Rorabeck

Singing A Song

I am the guy
Who digs with sticks
In the mud,
Who sometimes sings.

You are the court composer,
And he is Mozart,
So why am I so jealous
When I am not around to listen
To the passionate repercussions
Of the acclaimed competition?

I am not a worthless griot,
But not much else-
The speckled bullfrog who in such Delusions dreams he can be returned
To a prince,
But never was,

A prince
Wrapped up in gold leaf
And crinoline and fine tobaccos
I resemble the aura of a lover delicately
Placed in a radiant shop,
Shaded by the panoply of vermillion
Patinas,
Chartreuse and sweet penumbras

Until my eyes are back in the open,
My class untouchable,
Roofless,
As the rains come down pedantically,
Shivering prayers;
I use my tools into the dirt
Where I can barely here the crescendos
Of better orchestras,
And sometimes I serenade with all
My unfortunate brothers,
Reptilian ululations which seems to

Us a song.

Robert Rorabeck

Singing As She Curses

Hard up from here- a castaway of junkyards
But feeling let down- movement in the gimbals
Of weeds- swore parts for relationships that Never existed, walking my dog alone in the park,
And knowing the names for so few of the things
In nature:
Time passing me around with the other people
Who move so nearly, but always so far away:
The secrets kept secret,
Probably even no existent- the real work out on The signs above the road, proselytizing to
The traffics and tourisms:
And she is moving there, high in her resorts and Bawdy outfits,
Keeping a song bird to her lips and going around me
Like a spell, enjoying herself without ever
Coming down,
And singing as she curses.

Robert Rorabeck

Singing For You

We won't make love, if you don't Want to, Alma:
We'll just park in the dim shadows,
And become obscured to
Your family for awhile:
And I'll just tell you my kindergarten
Secrets the kidnappers could never Find,
The places I wouldn't even know by now,
Except that I discovered on Your body some weeks ago, and I told
You that you made my heart fill like a
Fairground flooded with lights;
And I was going to go right to Bed tonight, and metamorphose again by Myself,
Estranged from my family as if it was this Entire world,
But I decided to do good work again,
And so I went out and bought this cheap bottle,
Which finds me singing for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Singing Like Birds

The rum ran out of their ships:
The songbirds, what did they do? Maybe
They ate themselves,
Singing as the housewives wept
For thinking of you—and the stallions running
Like fireworks up and down the streets:
Making a band play over the shell rock—
As the kids came home around them, looking weird—
What was it they had seen all day,
But kidnappers making the sun dance on the shoulders
Of the clouds—
giving them promises of other places sweeter
Than theirs:
As the buds sprang on the sprigs, like little weddings
Over the fingertips of the skeletons
Singing like birds.

Robert Rorabeck

Singing Verses Of Her Being

Everything in words now:
Her love in words,
On the verge of the publisher's bloom:
Her lips and chin words,
Her tongue the punctuation,
The confirmation of the letter's stamp:
Her eyes the auburn vocabularies
Of her womb,
Glowing dimly like coals
Waiting to be stoked awake-
Her legs the calligraphy,
The art of her form-
If opening they would lead high upwards,
To our children,
The bright vowels of kindergarten,
The angels of apocryphal verse,
Her hands the leading sentences
Conjoining our new paragraphs,
Showing me around the bright canvas
Of beautifully fluidic grammars:
If she saw me in her lines,
And discovered me like an Ancient language,
I could put entire volumes of Poetic species in her mouth-
My tongue pressing into hers
The intimate needs of my body's dictionary,
In swirling caesuras, the commas
Situating the adjectives describing How I see her,
My love for her forming
The singing verses of her being.

Robert Rorabeck

Single Angel

Switchbacks disappear halfway up the Already vanishing heavens'
And you have to scramble with the hooks of Your evolving soul'
And not even a single angel will take note
Of your most hollow of Victories 'with only your car waiting down
There beneath you'
Headlights draining the battering like
Some type of parasitic intelligence'
Your sisters making love to their eventual men
In the deserts of another country'
Your father a prince with amnesia'
And your mother enthralled to a werewolf'
So you pin your art to the hidden classroom
In the apiary of her stone guts
Hanging breathlessly above tree line'
And you start out again, becoming enlightened by False summits 'the day perpetuating its Perfect tattoos upon your skin'
The tourists dining beneath you,
And melting into the storefronts of her blossoming soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Single Kiss

Well, it is raining, and the raindrops make Furtive areolas in the puddles of muddy bellies,
And their mists are like nebulous shrouds,
And unfertilized thoughts of maidens dreaming of Weddings and fine bachelors in their highest high towers-
And I am warm, as down in the valley the safe cabins
Huddle against their pines like satisfied lovers,
And I read my book once more the way a captain checks
Over his ship preparing for embarkation,
For I will be published mutely and celebrate with my dogs
In the consolatory monsoons of this lush season;
For it is what I can hope for, and my smiling mother's eyes,
And the way the doors lay sometimes half open letting
In the glows; but I cannot love her anymore, when my Words grow tangled about my mind like weeds and skeins
Of my dead aunt's yarn the kittens have playfully disemboweled,
For on the swings so far away she is moving in her arcs
As the policemen patrol her, and the apex where her legs grow
Up together and into the seat of a tall ladder placed below
Her window where the work is finished and she leans outwards,
Her eyes so maple and October, and she sighs never thinking
How the rain touches me, as if the kisses from cold little children,
Never once desiring her match-head, and the humming bloom
Of a single kiss...

Robert Rorabeck

Single Tear Drop

I own two bicycles because I still pine for you
Alma,
Even while you make love this evening, even while you
Turn out all of the hope in your lighthouse,
So you cannot see my beauty drowning,
While during the day your eyes seem like brown
Maelstroms swirling with your breath,
Devouring the young heroes far more beautiful than me;
And still you accept my dreams and my bouquets,
While now all of the flowers are getting smaller as I too
Shrink,
Soon I will be so diminished as to be in danger of drowning
In a single tear drop,
Which is all that I wish from you.

Robert Rorabeck

Single Thought Of Me

uses of new dementia—and I have passed through Here—the path I have taken has become Like the littlest story—and the things I have defeated
Have become my friends:
A rainbow, a centipede, a man with purple wings:
And we sing together along our innocuous roads—maybe we Are near the sea, but we neither care or comprehend—
Maybe I will be fired tomorrow—
Maybe the lamplight will build into a brilliant nest over
The fireplace of a lighthouse,
And the windmills will fill their bouquets with her perfumes;
But the rivers will always run south,
Trying to fill their mouths with sea water, and the songbirds
Will follow them, probably all of the way to Mexico—
And she will awaken, mortally to raise a daughter
Who will, I am supposing, never have a single thought of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Sir Francis Bacon Vs. Shakespeare

Looking for the better life,
Long legged girls delight in lawyers,
Well-suited boys in pinstriped suburbias-
Verdant halls, golden foyers:
I've heard them serenading from their Sisterly row,
Getting dolled up, looking gorgeous,
Extending every part of their bodies that
They know how to,
Riding bicycles to and fro under the crenulated
Lashes,
So fast to get where they are going that
They have forgotten to worship their dead
Siblings,
Forgotten to tie a new bow about the poles in
The graveyard,
To bring them gifts of plastic tulips and thimble-
Tiny mewling kittens to appease them,
The rippling specters who can tell the future-
They go right by me too, as if they couldn't see Me, even though I have a thumb up above
My rucksack- You would think that they were Mailmen on their appointed rounds,
Trying to get at the educated men, pomaded in their Intangible positions, but I shouldn't crowd them,
Their bright traffic as busy as a drippy comb,
But I'll sit here amidst the growing puddles
Of humid shadows at the curbside- I'll bight my thumb
And gossip with the relatives they've forgotten,
I'll wait for them all to settle and grow numb
Like snowflakes in a bell jar's trinket,
And when they're unsuspecting, or busy shopping,
I'll sneak to their windows and pillage a plumb
Cooling in their steamy confections- I'll eat
Quietly in their backyards, under their swingsets Conflagrations, I'll appease the appetite of my Erections- I'll take their kids to the graveyard and show
Them pictures of when they were young:
And there I'll leave them with my willow sprig or

Cane pole jouncing over my shoulder,
A leather tramp between the jobs and landscaped holies;
Perhaps I'll whistle in the evenings at their Shaven jogs; and it will be fine to somnambulate and greet
Them with eyes so free in meetings,
Whose thoughts are so read and fleeting,
Careless of all that they've never mentioned to find.

Robert Rorabeck

Siren Who Has Forgotten Her Songs

Tonight my muse lies in sleep with him
Like a mermaid who has come ashore smelling the rose
That will become her grave:
There is her bed between the dunes, and her eyes
Have already bled all of their tears:
And now what is she doing, held over like a prostitute
Underneath the biggest neon cross underneath the Biggest all night supermarket
While the convenient stores are getting robbed:
There she is with her nightgown slipped over her
Brown shoulders in the middle of the orange groves
So far away from where she belongs.
But she was so far away anyways- but I linger there
Still listening at the bus stops, the lions lamenting
A siren who has forgotten all of her favorite songs.

Robert Rorabeck

Siren Who Has Forgotten Her Songs

Tonight my muse lies in sleep with him
Like a mermaid who has come ashore smelling the rose
That will become her grave:
There is her bed between the dunes, and her eyes
Have already bled all of their tears:
And now what is she doing, held over like a prostitute
Underneath the biggest neon cross underneath the
Biggest all night supermarket
While the convenient stores are getting robbed:
There she is with her nightgown slipped over her
Brown shoulders in the middle of the orange groves
So far away from where she belongs.
But she was so far away anyways- but I linger there
Still listening at the bus stops, the lions lamenting
A siren who has forgotten all of her favorite songs.

Robert Rorabeck

Sirens, Or Beowulf's Mother, Whoever-

Cold eddies,
Spills into my holes,
Fills it up with rum,
These beautiful atolls
Where sharks run- There isn't Any shade,
But the coral relaxes.
Airplanes burn underwater,
And I have supreme optimism
Of having my name in print under
A more august publication;
But still, the old dog is licking himself
Noisily,
The horses whinnying, but the lightning
Doesn't flash inside-
Old girlfriends too, show up well-clichéd,
With hyphenated last names and hullabaloo;
But I kind of just grin,
And I quietly shine,
I don't show my cards,
I just ring my rhyme;
And the straights continue their bleached flow-
Veteran heroes come draped in extravagant fleece.
Whatever danger that was before in the Whirlpool blocking the path,
They have cleared and now smile glistening and Bronzed- Showing brilliant teeth and Flexing their stuff: sirens, or Beowulf's Mother,
Whoever:
Undefeatable, they have learned how to Enjoy the show and then mosey on.

Robert Rorabeck

Sister Citrus

Sun-dusk, a cemetery viewed from a cold
Blind window,
Wire framed hutch where the headless chickens are Falling in love;
But who will fall in love with them,
But the discombobulated, in lines of straight
Chock somnambulant,
Bent forks are just exhausted weeping girls
In butchered skirts:
Then, when its pure dark, I want to grow tall,
While children play games in the sand:
Reach up and pluck her from the blindness
She serves drinks in:
Imbibe her spirits myself until I cure my wounds, and
She grows out of me like unsure cybernetics,
Like dirty electricity from my tennis elbows;
And say there, sister citrus,
Isn't it time you awakened- For the sun has stripped
Its plain bed again, the waves are unwrapping
The gorgeous presents-
And I am frying up some bacon.

Robert Rorabeck

Sisters

In the silver-gilled days of late November,
Thinking of what she became for Halloween,
She runs her dove-grey hands through the shoreline's flesh—
On her shoulders, the sun is weeping the final fiery tears
For the day, like a debutant without a date for the ball;
Though she kneels stilly, she is running away, as The daylight flees like a frightened horse over the Far side of the continent, so comes the shivering night
With all of her sadness, because her friends are so Distant and useless, but the sea seems to try and Rise up to kiss her, like a secret caress shared between Two woman, mere acquaintances, accommodating a dressing room—
She sees the sad fornications of the lonely world,
Bare-chested and homeless, she walks the streets
And wonders what she has become,
And wishes that she could dress in nothing but sea-shells,
And the whispers of men lost forever into the sea,
Taken from the quivering closet above the waves,
Becoming thoughts into her, like light finally reaching Her from such great distances, thoughts she has always Known and spent prayers for like a seafaring nun these nights
Upon the suppliant shore where her mind come undone
With the wilting of the day; Here, naked and reborn,
She no longer masks herself for the holiday of the dead;
She has become that costume, her earliest wish;
Eyes closed to trust, she reaches forward for a salty kiss
The curtained sea gives; Likewise, the night lays her body down,
Making love to both the woman and the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Skeleton's Toothache

Fools on the battlefield pronounce rain,
While no one reads nor calls, though outside
Little boys as blond as rays lead cuckolded vagabonds
On the canal so slow,
Though her eyes lay down in middle afternoon,
The text on her breast like a stymied bee,
The areolas twin gardens snoring, raise like the hinges
Of a bridge, her rib-cage the tresses to a lavender instrument,

My eyes so full of scars I see out from natural disaster:
There, lovers are high in cars in between work,
And the sea like furrows in unquenchable being Young men go down to still in high school, get stoned
And float with the subconscious salt, every bit
Their mother's womb,

Out of class: dated, when her eyes fell away from the Next line, and the television lost reception,
Her older sister quite nude juxtaposed with the swimming Pool, legs resting game. I couldn't tell you how it goes, except that there Are avenues in full blow, strolling nature a theme park,
And cars filling up the desert her fingers trail across,
Fingerprints habitats of exhibit with nail polished shells....

When I had a girlfriend for two weeks, she Was interested a decade ago, and I ate lunch with her
In the same school, but she didn't know the lull,
How I see her sleeping in the gutter of the garden, each word
Imposing my smell on her doorstep, but where is she?
Let things play out for I keep my heart in the hollow
Of a tree of clichés hoping to be rich,
And little girls swing majestically in a chorus line with Angels leaping from the greenness of the mowed ditch.

Robert Rorabeck

Skies Of The Like Of Naked Prom Queens

Passing by the window a sudden thing,
Thoughts made forever out in the sudden rain—
A paramour of lilacs destroyed
By dragonflies—
Themselves matted down unto their thighs:
Where they lie like jewelry beside the sudden
Highway—
Sky explodes on the Fourth of July—
As if the beauty was looking my way, underneath
The tent of a fictitious daydream—
Ants curling up from the cul-de-sacs where I guess
They have their dreams—
The virgin in the vision of each of their ruby
Abdomens—
A fruit plucked from the tree, the first evil
Of her second cousins—
And in trailer parks a long way off from space:
They nod their head,
They watch the weekend's afternoon's race—
And then they close their eyes—
Special vision given to them like
Pies given to a heaven of flies—
And sleeping wolves beckon, howling from
The valleys no one has ever seen—
With cliffs of nude opal
Beneath skies of the like of naked prom queens.

Robert Rorabeck

Skin And Bone

Red crafts in outer space,
Or underneath the canopy of apple orchards:
The mountains looking on like
Overbearing mothers:
As the train whistles through the pass of Travelers who no longer travel there anymore:
Windows without space-
Greenness and blueness without breath or wings,
Ribbons entwined in the tail of
A once pretty horse that is now little more
Than skin and bone.

Robert Rorabeck

Skin Of Amber: Skin Of Honey

Delusions of sawhorses who no what you are:
You make love in the park as your day
Transcends even housewives
In a chrysalis of metamorphosis-
Their yards as pretty as dresses
Thinking nothing of makebelieve
But going down to sleep
Across the easement of the canal;
The day transcending, growing even more
Beautiful:
Flowers are being sold;
Planes are in the sky,
And you are home again:
Skin of amber,
Skin of honey,
And I sing to you from my little yard:
A cardinal, a grasshopper eager to make
Love
To the cook-fire again, just to make sure
He is not dreaming.

Robert Rorabeck

Skipping

Buried in the beautiful fountain
Betwixt all the chalk and the laughing black
Men, fawning and clapping
On their merry streets- the world is A wilting gazebo about you, and I moved Nearer beneath the elbows of the trees
Who weep over you,
As black men tend to the stars- and your Lover lives in another cemetery across the Train tracks where deliveries are being made:
And little girls are skipping rope,
And a robin is singing.

Robert Rorabeck

Skirts Of Stewardesses

Light falling through a keyhole as a voice
That echoes of the airplanes it has passed—
Under the skirts of stewardesses that I imagine smell like roses—
Falling down through the highest bivouacs—
And across where the boy scouts have fallen to Their deaths:
Corpses in the green crops where the elk
Have shed their antlers—
Pick them up and it is like the sound of Katydids brushing against the bare naked mountains,
Or another ululation for the plagiarists—
Giving up all of their disingenuous gifts as if that Was all there was to give.

Robert Rorabeck

Sky Full Of Scars

Defeated, sky full of scars,
I waylay, find my empty love
In nuclear contaminated bars:
Oh what a game, won't you listen to Me, one of you busily pollinated sorority:
Anyone,
The girls in their sweet rows,
I ask you, what is more beautiful than the Silence disseminated graveyard;
And I just want to hold hands with you
For awhile,
Naked children out in the wilderness of sun,
And read to you of the open book, the Places where we've never existed,
The gardens we did not attend,
The afternoons of swing pools and bottle-
Rockets,
The fawning air-enlightened corals the wind
Creates the songs of anemones through;
There is no cleverness, no special mystery to
This thing; it is open, yet surreal, but in a Non-aggressive way, the truthful emptiness after
The instructor has turned on all the lights again,
The film explained, and all these things I have Attempted to parlay, just the awful shadows
Of an imprisoned man who has nothing to Entertain himself except for the sick fancies
Of your unrealistic boudoir.

Robert Rorabeck

Slave Galley Of The Inland Empire

(Slave Galley :)

O-Oh-O, Cro-Magnon!
Everyday under the same old sun!

O-Oh-O, Club my Wife,
Take her back home and put her to the knife!

O-Oh-O, Oh My Lord,
Repo-man came and stole my Ford!

O-Oh-O, Oh My Soul,
The richer man's richer, but who pays the richer toll!

(Roman Captain :)

Row! ~ Row! ~ Everybody Row~!

O-Oh-O, Shut your Hole,
You smack a lot of pie, but you still got to row! ~

O-Oh-O, Punctuates the Whip,
Whoever don't row will be tossed off this ship!

O-Oh-O, Do as I Say,
And we'll row right into the next break of day!

(Slave Galley :)

Row! ~ Row! ~ Everybody Row~

(Ship recedes past Sirens and Half- Sunken Christmas trees :)

Row! ~ Row! ~ Everybody Row~

O-Oh-O, We're all going to die,
But at least we're out here under the unbroken sky!

Row! ~ Row! ~ Row! ~

Robert Rorabeck

Slave To Baseball

The weather is brave but a slave to baseball,
And I like that kind of weather for this
Time of year,
Because all the aspens are naked, opalescent
And free of the charms of most birds
And tourists-
I can see you there ghostly presumptive,
Making your free-form rounds;
And it is beautiful to think of you disconnected
From the corporeal sounds:
And I wake up more disjointed- the dogs
Have been howling all night,
And I suppose I dreamed of your high-school-
It's my greatest, most tremulous sin-
Those dysfunctional adolescent currents still Ripple in my head,
Searching for your illusive resins this way and
That between classes,
But in the here and now I develop new obtrusive
Scars and aren't you well-situated,
Tucked in for the coming months- and Mike
Is here,
And soon I will be even further down selling
Christmas trees through those sultry paths,
Even further away- I can't but doubt you could Hardly remember or even begin to understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleepers In The Valley

Defeated men lurching on their backs,
Indigos flies mining the protuberances,
Lining the sink holes
Nonchalantly
The grasses in interludes of sunlight
Caracols their faces,
A little girl of wind the dear bird,
Flutters coffins in the air,
The very air a sound tomb,
A glass box unknown to other kinds:
An office of nature's industrious
Metamorphosis,
Recalling things in catalogues of Heat, strobing amidst the ushering forest.
All in elements of industrious
Husbandry, the fermenting soldiers
Sinking into the green sheets,
Each blade waving like the sea,
The flagrant sun stroking and dabbing
Every lock,
The little birds bobbing to and fro,
Siphoning
As if these were flowers,
As far a field regaled in crimson,
The bugle's trilling calls more men to dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleeping

You kissed me like wax burning
Like something on a religious holiday;
And I looked up through the power lines,
And the jaundice cracks in the plastered sky-
I loved you there:
Open mouthed, horny: you were easiest to love,
Even with your stapled god,
Even with those things in your eyes, and your toenails
Painted for Christmas:
And then your children started crying, and you heard
Them like a superhero, and you flew away home,
Home across the Everglades of so many sunken planets:
You didn't even stop to consider to romance the Drowned stewardesses:
You just leapt and leapt and kept on leaping like a pillow
Thrown willfully by a preschooler yet perceiving he can Fly:
Like I did: Maybe it was my very childhood that kept you
Flying, like a paper airplane caught and thrown by my Deft hand perpetually; and maybe tomorrow I will hang myself,
And you will finally come down,
Your engines busted, your arms steamy: What will you have To say for yourself, pigeon-holed, now that your artist who Amused you should be sleeping,
Sleeping.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleeping Afterschool Against The Playgrounds

I killed myself and now mom is counting
Her money;
And we sell hibiscus, and we almost died;
And I wonder how long she will last forever,
Or if the third sphinx will freeze her,
Or if Diana really loves me:
If Diana really loves me, I can compete:
I can go on forever, with a really deep voice,
I can get wet and baptize in the river,
I can hold out and await for the reinforcements,
Wait for the eagles and the pomegranates to douse
My fires,
And I can hold out, or I can live forever, like Really old books spread like mariposas next to the Campfire;
Or if I am just for the mouth of tourists, I can dry out
Myself, and after they have gone, find my own way home;
Because my dogs really love me, and after everyone has Gone then the valleys bud really beautiful:
They bud really beautiful, don't you know, and the earthquakes
Come really silently; they come really silently on tiptoes,
Don't you know,
And the weeks last forever, or it lasts All week don't
You know; and I love you, or I have already loved you forever,
Sleeping after school against the playgrounds,
If you didn't already know.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleeping Beauties

The more beautiful woman they are,
The less they could care about my job:
That I haven't been published in The Atlantic Monthly,
Or that I can't see the ocean from where
I live-
The better they look in perky angora,
The twin mammalian confections where Rome was founded,
The more likely they are to go to the movies
Alone,
Whose beautiful eyes kill like Superman,
Who only feel lonesome and vulnerable when
At the beach underneath the watchtowers
Sporting Herculean life-guards;
And it doesn't matter that in a few words
I could paint their naked bodies orange,
From tit to toe, bloom them an orchard,
Use my tongue to paint in the highways
And stamp the landing pads:
That I could hold up entire cities and lead them through Each summer until the flowers wilt and they slept
In voyeuristic tombs down past the diamond minds
In little sweltering glades
Where seven or so alligators croaked and ululated;
That I could tear up entire novels dedicated to the Perfect indentation of their upper lip,
Or that I live my life alone just for them sweltering
With my dogs well past midnight while the working Traffic never quits:
And I put down needful things like a grocery list
Every ebony part of them included,
Girls in shopping malls and drive-thru windows,
Secretaries, swinging with lovely hips
Like censers amusing themselves behind stained glass,
And the little things they only pretend to know
In the quiet foreplays for holidays just for them;
And all this panting just to get to the bottom floor
At the end of our shifts,

And she doesn't even wait, or reconsider,
But leaves straight off to get naked and pose
In a giant glass of blushing Chablis,
Or maybe to smoke alone in a sepia wonderland
With the other nocturnal creatures well-
After the motorboats and weekend professors have Gone to bed off the lake,
And she has nothing else to say about it,
Her eyes so wonderfully apathetic and so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleeping Beauty

And so these sad words moan
And continue on.
When they are not pouting
On a park bench
Alongside other tourists
Shopping for love in Paris, France,
When they are in secret
Lonely bedrooms
For some long years now
Hoping for another chance,
Then they let their tongue
Escape like Jean Valjean
From the prison of thought
And in front of a mirror,
A lake in winter,
They set words free
Like sending off doves into
The city:
The swirling streets and
People walking
Far down beneath him,
Carrying each a personal meaning
Waywardly from Places of incommunicative rest.
At their best,
They display their flighty
Features along the road
Like storefronts:
This is the necessary marketplace
From where our children appear Screaming until
They are placated by the Young mother's breast.
There she is,
Walking everyday outside your window:
The sleeping beauty,
The girl you once knew
In whose form you find your dreams,

Whose eyes you cry out to Involuntary in the lightless hours,
Who you reach out to,
The banks of flickering light
Your prayers rest under.
But she is not yours.
Forever distant,
She is the fleeting thing who Routinely migrates
Into and out of her husband's arms,
The man you cannot be,
The goodly working man,
Unafraid, he provides:
Sleeps next to her:
A mooring post of limbs of flesh
She ties to in the storm,
And though out on the street
In the open living light,
She might appear free
And from your window,
Secluded, you would sing to her
These words who like good soldiers
Protect you and keep you
Drunk in fraternal company,
She is not actually in your world,
Though her body comes this way.
Upon her breasts her children suckle,
And tiny finger's splay on the Valleys at her throat,
Her soul has disappeared into him
Whom she quietly sings:
These words from her lips,
Her tended gardens pollinate not for you
And if her eyes fall upon you
It is only because you are now
Sharing the hapless void:
Doing time in a high school classroom,
Passing on the street,
Shopping for necessities
Along the glowing Mercado.
She cannot help but pass by you,
Her starry children following like

Goslings in a lake where Maple leaves are falling.
She is in her beautiful trance
From which she will not leave.
You've had her chance,
And were mute when she would
Have received your words into her
Like a door to door salesman
Showing your wares,
The goods you would have Provided for her.
Now,
Locked away by his kisses,
Her belly producing from the Labors of a fertile god,
Her soul saturnine and restive,
She goes her way,
Leaving you crowded in the distant herd
And to walk alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleeping Children

The meadows are filled with sleeping children:
Whom else would they be filled with,
I don't know:
I make footprints high up in the snow, even when I
Am not even there,
And I think of you, Alma, laid down in your brown
Skin like a bible from Mexico;
And I wish that I could stop writing about you, but I just don't know what else I would do:
But I know that by tomorrow the cars will be Waking up again,
And the entire world will rise, and the mothers
Will kiss their babies,
And the stewardesses will show some thighs:
And I will dream of you coming to in This world again,
Alma: it is the only the that it is, and it isn't even real.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleepless Highway

When I die,
I shall haunt my grave waiting for you to come around,
Just so I can possess you from the suffocating dirt;
If I should see you walking through the plastic flora
In tin torches,

But for as long as you are alive,
You are yet mindful of honoring my pain, and forgetting such engagements,
You should never show;
The closest you get is the busy highway where your eyes do not Reveal,
The destinations of your cropped photos,
And I am left with the breathless torment in which I reside,
Pining in a box of morbid joy for a woman and time
Which never exists;

Just as the easy highway ebbs and flows from
The prior engagements of likewise-souls....
The living who roam the torrential tomorrow,
Sleeping in beds they have yet to earn.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleepless States Of America

I am good
When the liquor is 70% proof
And Wild Bill fires his guns into the belly of Insouciant stars,
And that is enough,
Because this poem is as good as paper burning,
Or the way cut flowers look good for a week on her
Table nearly three years ago because she began
Listening to his music, and making love to him,
And thinking about me in the early morning dreams of Black bears who eat their breakfast smeared off her breasts:
And, because I am only halfway there,
This is not Walt Whitman,
And this ain't even great American poetry,
But the rote memorization of a cheeseburger, or a sand dollar
Bikini she should be wearing in my imagination,
Because if you look at me straight in the eyes,
You who work the deepest nights in the brightest
Holes for minimum wage,
You who sell us the wealth of Iran,
You must see that I am not only old enough,
But wise enough, though passing homely through your store
With my dirty baseball cap on denoting I am only a worker,
And wishing for just what I can afford,
The liquors like the breast milk you fed your children
I now buy from you, and later on down the road
A home and a bed for my dogs and to make love in
To strange young women who can never see me
Who also work in brightly lit stores
In strip malls like long knotted coffins all up and down
These great and sleepless states of America.

Robert Rorabeck

Sleepy Weathervanes

Beautiful frogs are farting in Beds of droopy chrysanthemums.
Chartreuse and poisonous, they are waiting
For her sombulent march, to cling to
Her like wet paper and exterior fetuses,
To steal her dreams through her ankles and Calves of the undistinguished prince who Is even now flying a passenger jet over those Stringy gardens, unbeknown in his azure flight suit,
His eyes pestered by foul weather banks,
And the freshly painted flirtations of the perky stewardess,
That his love is even now fathoms beneath him,
Her feet stealing the soil for roses.

Robert Rorabeck

Slipping Away

You can save me, and all of this voodoo:
While the body pills,
And while we wait for ourselves to holdover,
And some sommelier sells Icecream
In Colorado underneath all of those nosebleed summits
That I've already surmounted,
And while all of it goes away, slipping away like Woebegone sailors across the sea-
And the Christmas tree lumbers, pill boxing:
The train around it sleuthing, cantankerous, spellbound:
While a lummoX in the clouds spills into his Britches, and then pitches a tent;
And across the rest of the country, the other side of the Mississippi is defiled, and the negroes and
The harpies light off fireworks,
While otherwise I am alone,
And counting by my primary numbers, colorful and Fluttering-
And up until then it doesn't even have to spell, while Drinks spill over at their bars, and the muses that they have Known turn into dryads and naiads and slip into the Forests and the seas themselves-
And slip- and slip away.

Robert Rorabeck

Slowly Toward The Sky

My body aches from end to end-
Where is she going,
I suppose from elementary to high school
Is her end:
As she pledges allegiance to the flag
Every morning—
In her equalized standards—what will
She go home thinking:
What has she learned—is this the Harlem
Renaissance—
Is this her last amen?
And if this is just an echo of the final
School bus she takes to school,
Then she will think nothing of
That echo—
Even as if she were an alligator who learned
To cry,
The foxes creeping slowly toward the Vineyards,
The airplanes creeping slowly toward the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Smelling Salts Of Another Sea

Chimney sweeps in youthful fugue-
The dusking sky of hot air balloons, your pale
Brown
Complacent eyes-
Your pale brown complacent eyes,
With his risky macho hand on your pale
Brown complacent thigh-
Cumulous accumulating straight up through the Unbanishable skies:
Watching football, alligators like pets at sandaled
Feet;
If this is what you are doing now, you can never love:
How can you love
With your eyes behind sunglasses:
How can you ever love when you've always been Too beautiful; and this must be the fiend himself-
And aren't you so assured behind the wheel;
And the watering hole is poisonous
And full of dead princes you've transformed one time
Or another,
Kissing them as your color changes- as your color
Changes after work- I can't tell you your dreams-
You've told me, and I know-
I hung my guardian angel in the rainstorm,
So I know- to keep coming down your way without A sword or a good luck candle-
I no longer pray. I am passed out in the foyer when Over my shoulder they are serving hors de ordervs in bright soirée; and the three young boys
Are in smiling fugue in the hot air balloon passed around
By the ceiling fans-
And your brown eyes are smiling or not smiling relaxing
Either way complacent
In front of the television watching your favorite football
Teams
With his hand on your brown knee;
And either way your eyes were not for me;
Past out underneath the crystal boats
Right away, my nostrils suddenly

A flare, smelling salts of another sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Smoke & Mirrors

Cedar smoke waifs from the chimney's throat;
My father has stacked the wood in between phone
Calls; he's try to make a deal,
As my mother reads him the last book by Louie L'Amor,

The grounds are frozen for the first time this year
On the back of the buffalo where we homestead in Arizona,
And I go outside to do the chores; I think a dozen
Times how to start the phrases of my poem;
But I have to do it, my only intercourse....
Ice shoots every which way like gypsum, like
Broken fingers at the bottom of empty water tanks.

I lift up the red hinge, opening the floodgate, and I watch them as they float, break off and mingle
Like socializing icebergs, bragging about the Titanic,
When it has been so long since I've waited in line
For a table at TGI Friday's or Applebee's or any other
Of the yuppie chains that populate the interstates of South Florida,

So far removed from the gambits of ex-lovers, now ex-partes,
Sniveling for judges; they go to eat in warm little nooks everyday,
Gossip over the reheated food, tip and pray;
They do this with the disposable gestures of their routine;
I think upon them as the lowest aspens sway
By the earliest whispers of the mountain.
The cold air makes my scars disappear for awhile;
New scars, not the old ones which made her lose interest.
Those are almost gone. This one I got last year
Because I got too drunk selling fireworks off route 66.
Now I lay down dryads in the books I write;
I leave my chores undone, and lay with my allegories,
They tell me things I like to hear,

Like a chorus of little girls who, conducted by the Northerly winds, sing from each trunk in the forest,
As the harts gambol over the fallen leaves.

Snacking On Peanuts

Grandpa forehead, pronounce me to the Grinning clock: Its past dinner time.
The papers are getting wet around the storming
Block,
Alligators are blowing lascivious bubbles
Between cavalier teeth: What have they done
To the girls this Easter- the little forget-me-nots,
But put them to bed so deep you'll never change
Your mind.
The reaper is a grim guest at the battlefield of Middle-age- He harvests the implanted souls
Right out of the swimming-pooled cage:
He'll make your best friend's older sister just remember
Your insouciant obsessions with her after-school
Tanning,
As in the park the truant hummingbirds are feeding
The imposition of the oracular swings, to newer younger
Kids smoking newer younger things:
And the sun leads you out like an old teacher, trying to Tell you that it isn't that bad-
That you struck out, and now the field is over
Grown and home to centipedes and scorpions;
How in the carnivals of January you had your amusements
The best you ever had;
And everyone is in the same boat stuck up in the slash
Pine trees from the flood,
The expensive vans like discombobulated terrapin
Belly up- Now how will they eat the flowers of their Rituals, or even snack on the happenstance of national Principle;
But you can lie down gray-headed in the fjord, defeated by
The monsters of your lord;
And it will be a long way down- twice as long as it was up,
But there are girls you can dream about while Holding your breath, a snack of peanuts, even if they're still too expensive
To afford.

Robert Rorabeck

Snow Haiku

Maybe the snow that
Melts in your yard comes to Me as rain, as tears.

Robert Rorabeck

Snowfalls

The snow falls like confection; it falls all day,
And slows us down like love scenes,
Or duelists crossing swords:
It blankets the horses and turns my hair gray:
Such snow, so much, where does it come from
But the sky, concealing the way tardy birds should Migrate. For its too late for their wedding day,
But let them eat this cake, this building up of weather,
The hoariness of more loss, the irony that it is coming to fruition,
Over the palms of immaculate hands,
Over her lips like gloss: Fields and fields of snow,
Turning, as if an overturned globe, all men white,
So they might now all sing and get the best trophy wife;
But such weather cannot last, and when the sun jumps up
It will be revealed, the scars on my chest, the crack windshield:
But what really will be lost but the weather, which turns around
Again: kids go back to school, but this is the end.

Robert Rorabeck

So Amputated In The Black And White Of An Out Of Date Newspaper

I can't use a dime to call you anymore,
So I look at you red-eyed in photographs,
And your face looks like the tanned rainstorm of
A pretty girl's misplaced secret desires.
Why are you so sad, Erin- Is it because you are
The last of your kind, and everyone else has failed
You. Aliens in their garden of hotdogs and baseball
Parks- Then you are like me, oh sad thing,
What a vermilion holocaust you give the dusk
When you stand out in your front yard flaunting like
A tenebrous ornament for the homeless black men,
Or whoever else comes around,
As the wayward misfits of your neighborhood are Always courting the comfortable sound of your Doorbells-
But you don't read me anymore, because last time
You thought of me, it was by a different name; and I don't know who you love even though seven years Ago I used to jog around you hoping to soup up some Kind of homeopathic love potion; and even again,
Later on in a month or two I might be selling things for Holidays around your old neighborhood, but I wouldn't Think to call you, because you wouldn't love me
How I look so amputated in the black and white of an
Out of date newspaper- My body is not for you, but For the lips of a coffin which must disembark from my Favorite canal at the edge of the smoking glades,
Though if you would come out for me then and cheer me
On with a few beers, and a chorus of chin chin,
It would make for a better ending to this sad young thing.

Robert Rorabeck

So Beautiful

People have been stealing
Shopping carts to coral reef
Canals-
I don't really care when it's
So hard to breathe-
Go ahead and bust his lips
With your undecipherable
Dreams;
Bake him a ruthless cake with
Tooth and nail-
This is all I am: I have a truck
With 500,000 miles-
I have impenetrable scars on what Used to be the good side of My face-
I'll live and sell produce between Two beautiful women who Don't even know I am here.
They are like two simultaneous airplanes
Forever leaping against the sky-
Silver gills impossible to hypnotize.
Even now when I can't see them
They are
So beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

So Beautiful And Perfectly Content

Happening again through the truths of the brown
Reservoirs of your mouth,
Held back by those lips who only tell me how you
Feel when we are in perfect darkness,
Entranced by the rhythms we put there: but up again,
Sliding out of his wake like a mourning rib,
You put your children into your car and drive them to School,
Off beside the tiny houses which hold at least Ten Mexicans each,
And I can see you sisters trying on each others' clothes
Through the unclean windows,
While the waves move even then out of reach;
As you come toward me, all awake in the daydreams that Take you away from me even as you come nearer.
Maybe I will see you tomorrow, if it doesn't rain,
And you will be wearing all of the white gold I have given
To you, like the tinsel and monuments of my pitiful
Soul hung like the entrails of a rapturous kill
All down the brown stems of your body,
As you lullaby like the tide in rhapsody, so beautiful
And perfectly content, never having to feel what it is That you are doing.

Robert Rorabeck

So Beautiful To Be

I really had a hard time leaving school
The mountains were so long and water colored,
And I could never be a lawyer,
Crawling up their jaws and lay spit:
But thank god for the depression and the depressions that are All to come,
Because it has given to me the greater girth of fertility unto
Which to lay my seed:
And maybe I will never be immortal, or beautiful;
Maybe I will never even be,
And the sun goes up and the world turns round,
And the performers crawl up to perform in their solitude
But better lit above the ground;
And I have waited so long to sing to you all of my praises,
To wake for you and shoo off the rattlesnakes through the daises:
And I still wish I had been down with you to the bottom of The grand canyon three times with you,
Alma, because that is how many times I have been down for me;
And the clouds curl,
And the bodies proceed, except for you Alma:
You are always here, and my liquor is almost done:
The lateness of my work is almost done, and I live in a beautiful house:
It is your house now, Alma, and soon I will leave it to sell
Fireworks alone again in New Mexico,
And I wish that you were coming with me:
Alma, come with me,
And we will leap over the graveyards together, and we will paint
Our names together under the harelips in the overpasses of rainstorms;
And it will be so beautiful to be.

Robert Rorabeck

So Dangerously Beautiful

This is just dumb truth:

Australian pines have no roots, and I don't

Have you:

Used to bicycle all in summer back and forth

While the lions roar,

While the teachers taught their stuff,

I had no muse but the whore;

I went back behind her house and in her canal

Reticulated,

Masturbated in her stuff and thus was marmaladed;

And the canal went a ways back and dissected

The hemisphere,

And I always thought of the edge of the world as

That torpid green ribbon;

And now I am not a success, and yet I still have Plenty of money for my dear;

And I want to buy somebody flowers. I want to Climb high enough to feed the giraffes:

I want to ride the Ferris Wheel up to your extremely

Junoesque neck where you've been practicing,

All the way up to show you how butch I am,

Flexing my sailors anchors two by two

Where your eyes are emoting like chimps at a zoo,

And make real good love to myself in the open

Spaces before their senses,

Because they are so wide and bright like the minds of Elephants that I could hardly think they would find

Room to move;

And anyways would I be as luxurious as white mice

Scavenging at a carnival, telling her she was so

Dangerously beautiful,

Making her too scared to move.

Robert Rorabeck

So Faithfully Have Strayed

A casual touch to be the end of me, like the purring of
A ghost:
I carried your cigarettes to the cemetery, and you were
The most utmost;
But you could not linger in my dally,
Weren't your eyes made of far away:
Weren't they just as newly painted as the happenstance of An all of a sudden story,
And I will not say your name to save me:
My joy was the joy of a firework making for a moment
The curb brilliant,
Making even the most religious of mailmen hesitate:
All of these colors foaming and sizzling down into your Hot plate;
And this was just you out there in the outstanding cold,
Lost for a little while pressed to the jubilee of a needy child at His favorite game:
Hot and wild, until my paper flamed and curled,
And all that I loved darkened and mewed to you, which made
You realize that I wasn't your favorite,
And that this wasn't even real, and that you had a home,
And a father whose warmth was even more certain than the empty
Darkness to which you
No longer linger, from which you so faithfully have strayed.

Robert Rorabeck

So Far Above The Equator

Our bodies wake up from the pressing conflagrations of Fathers and mothers;
At first we have so many needs, but then we wish that we were not Here;
Because we have seen you slipping on your sweet belly through
The weeds:
You all but stuck your tongue out at us and hissed, and then Went off following his footprints:
Are his father and mother better than ours? We bought a house for You on your birthday:
A yellow house with flowers, and we apologize for being born
So far above the equator our skin is so pale and sickly
Compared to yours;
Or was it just that his father and mother knew how to work their Fires better than ours.

Robert Rorabeck

So Far From The Sea

My dog licks his forepaws,
Imagining I am as kind as a god of few colors,
As I want to write a book that is a kaleidoscope.
Down the roads of many ways,
Many animals,
Sweating, basking, giving birth—
And in the bigger zoos, Ferris wheels who are All grown up,
Waiting just to turn around for the hands
Of another tourist,
Like a naked girl behind some glass:
And all of this,
The sleeping schools
And discombobulated housewives,
Like a valley of windmills turning amidst
A stony vineyard in Greece—
All of it a tangle like an unpublishable tale
Too close and yet so far from the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

So Far Into Your Mother's Language

Sorry that I am imperfect and little known,
Sorry that we never meant and at least embraced between the Forgotten classes we were misaligned towards:
Sweet Alma: we never shared lockers nearby where we were told
To walk in a line,
Though your sisters now go to high school just south of here;
And I have walked so far, drunkenly, to sleep atop a roof that Almost touched yours;
As I found you again today- I brought you lunch, just like You beckoned me, and I told you about the tattoo I dreamed of Wanting;
And you said it would just be simpler if I got a picture of your Face on my one good arm,
And the Virginsita or my mother on the other; and when I awaken
Tomorrow,
I will wait for you by the firelight of another same old day;
And I will pray for you in my same my inconspicuous way, muse of My suburban grottos, until you come again to me:
And we sing together and make love underneath all the stars we Can never reach,
Their roofs turning too far above our yawning heads; and then you
Will say to me something so quietly and so far into your mother's Language that I can never even be sure if I even truly heard.

Robert Rorabeck

So Fondly

I stole things from kindergarten to fill my Pockets with:
I stole things from pretty girls at nap time, and pulled Up wishes from the sherbet rug:
I brought flowers for Danielle in second grade:
I masturbated on the green carpet too for which my Father paid:
And the land burned with sugar cane, and the girls I took
For muses touched their imperfect flesh in the paper
Snow,
And we grew taller and tipped over the glass,
And looked down the mewling jaws of the lion too insouciant
To jump through the hoops of flame:
The pretty damsels tasseled there just as tired and nodding
Off,
Thinking only of how the mowed grass would feel on their Bare feet,
Or on the forts looking down to the love making sea:
The way the Mexican tourists remember the Alamo:
Like in the water parks of my love
Taking her stuff off before she has to go home pregnant and Embarrassed to be harassed by the hard noises of Trailer parks:
So fond- so fondly.

Robert Rorabeck

So Little Faith

You've said you've read my poems every night,
But your mouth was dry for
A man with a guitar or anchors on his Muscles,
While the things I've grown went out and got A job,
And still bloomed sickly that way:
And you said, yes, you were thankful to get
The love letters in the mailbox,
And during the beginning stages of your last Transcendental relationship
You might even have been confused:
You have so many friends and so much booze,
Its easy for you to fall in love with anyone
Just because I suppose you have so little Faith in me to lose.

Robert Rorabeck

So Long, Long Ago

And I will sing into the heirloom of a lip
That doesn't matter—taking off into a bedroom
Of the beautiful Barbie dolls that don't Have to swear for shooting themselves:
Yes, unfortunately—there will be another tomorrow—
And all of that stuff—and I don't even suppose
That you will be able to remember the cold
Memories of the spiders and danced and danced Forever towards you—lifting their Legs and swearing and cursing whilst even then Making a mockery of the circus-
Even as it flat-lined—even as there was no
Memory: dancing, and dancing with crocodiles,
Which was its forever fanfair—
Within a mile of whatever it believed in—
While the housewives counted their numbers to
The snows—and then, for whatever reason-
There was no further memory—or there
Was just snow storms that built up whatever to Nowhere—blowing their bubbles forever to Someone I loved so long, long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Bouquets

Trying to change and drinking liquor
Until there is a kindergarten and the dogs don't Have to come out
And I have a book published at Harvard,
But I am still drinking the albino
Rum from Haiti,
And trying to fill in my coloring book of a
Fabulous mouth,
Hoping to never mind the famishing venomous
Mouth pieces of the little children of Satan
Who surround me,
Even while the high steps of Bellefontaine Cemetery
Are unevenly if forever crowded,
And this is a new cloud to cross the sunshine:
A new reason to outstand the vanishing carports
Of the rodeo that was supposed to Culminate before the fire of the beehives: my art
Through the rain soaked cul-de-sacs of something else
The establishment will never stand for:
That I love you: that I love you, but in my hand
My fingers can only hold so many bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Copper Presidents

Even now the bodies burn with the deeper gentrifications
Of my new neighborhood:
Girls are looking gooder than good, as newer than new girls Should:
Dark and saturnine girls skipping down the street and beside Their hips' sway the model cops model ships
Shooting of quips of bottle rockets very quickly:
And Erin was in the sky today:
Who did Erin kiss today, and what was her favorite color of Car today: How did she move today? Did she even think of How she moved North of Disney World,
When I am south of that sweetly mentioned catastrophe:
And I imagine how big gold fish can get:
The can get as big as Erin, as big as my venal muse:
They can devour entire cities worth of wishes, and then they can Go down sleeping with their paled bellies fat off the Heads of so many copper presidents.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Dazzling Layers

All day long in a glass boat
Of worries,
You can see right through my scars,
Like the belly of a shucked serpent
Deflowered by ants,
The rind of a man flung down from
A ski lift,
Lost in the slopes of some jovial tourism,
The busty blonds and their accoutrements
Rippling banally,
Chatting it up with rosy,
Displacing lips,
All their makeup and spangles rippling
Like sick leaves in
A fast car jungle:
But don't you see that the mountain is Silent,
Holding so many dead things, so many half
Evolved meals,
And lying there underneath the blue and Awful banner
Where the trees yet go unmolested where Philosophy still has a chance
To resound in sort of a penal and triumphant Whisper,
Impotently like the sweet voiced castrati
That I love you in a park of floating
Doom,
And you can see me right to the bottom and
All the gold fish I've won for you
The empirically unobtainable prizes floating
Like the wounds of snow
Covering up the more beautiful beasts underneath
The so many dazzling layers of her more
Zealous eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Green Talismans

Now at home with your children- who are stranded
Like tigers through the palmettos;
Leaving me just the old cenotaph of a cicada on the nape of A cypress:
Maybe one which was brushed by a conquistador while in the middle
Of taking an Indian princess:
Alma- and the colors of your flag are as verdant as I have seen
Pictures of you in a dress
At your sister's communion; and by tomorrow I will not have To say these things to you at all:
I will just look at you as bashfully as a freshman thrown into A wide opened ballroom;
And very soon I wont even have to be there at all:
And you will forget me like a fire after it is done with its handy work,
Stroking itself back to its home and children,
Going out at night in the uncanny worship of all the soft walls of Department stores,
Never even realizing that I am right here, unbounded with the Metamorphosis of a knight protected by so many green talismans,
And always up in the morning before anyone,
And painting the walls of his house with your favorite colors.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Harmless Stories

Now we sang of the infinite yards: and now this:

And now this:

The way I sometimes still see my own mother inside the blue carport

Getting undressed and electrocuted:

They way sometimes too I wished that I knew my own

Words:

Like a self aware mocking bird, and the songs that I give again

To you- to you, like a sophisticated if inebriated fantasies

Up the three stories of the galleries of my fantasies

That I walked with you today:

Alma, on our Tuesday of today: while last time we held tennis and

Then I carried you into a sea where you couldn't even swim,

And I kissed you, and held you underneath the teepees of the

Sun,

And all of her vanishing elements: while today we took my own

Car up and down Military Trail, and you told me that your man

Wasn't unkind to you,

But then I remember how he left you and Michael and went to

Mexico:

But he came back again; and again he is here:

But today he was in Orlando with Mickey Mouse, finishing his

Pools for over eager housewives,

And that was why you were right here; and you are either a good

Woman climbing my proverbial beanstalk or I am blind;

And even if I am blind, I still have so many harmless stories

In their homeless gardens left to sing for you.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Hidden Summers

The night has hidden all the cars,
And my loneliness,
But it has brought you out to haunt me
Like subconscious planets suddenly
Doused with the light of a realized sun.
The shadows are so thick they are dancing
In a penumbra of muggy clouds.
The trees and the washing machines are Chivalrous,
And even the rock garden has new haunts.
The very sharp architecture on the roofs
Of houses are delinquents,
And the sky tastes of seashells.
I am alone but not alone, and nothing but
But nothing crawls like the tinder bird-like Hands of lovers along the plates of a
Paper tree,
While the tender red throats still show
Slightly through crepuscule,
While your name whispers like coolly rumors
Way back in the parks of my silent
Reanimating mind the very places you've Forgotten to wonder for so many hidden summers.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Lives But Not So Many Names

Late bloomers in the river
Where your brother drowned;
Water flowers, ballerinas of Corkless furry, and each girl loves
A new man,
Winnowing fingers spread like curtains
Underneath the ceiling fans
The perfect tributaries repose together
In a sorority's cemetery,
Across the canal where the eternal
Garden smokes, crenellating like
Water snakes the places beneath the billboards
Where the living proceed through their Cars,
But they cannot find me because I have skipped
School;
They are not even looking for me,
As the cats slink through the hand smoothed stones,
Laughing because they have so many lives
But not so many names.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Melanies

Pains of the passionate void of so many Melanies:
The passages of so many mute voices, homonyms for dragons
And forget-me-nots; or anythings gathered together and shivering
In cul-de-sacs or sweating out for so many birthdays;
And when it comes around again, this birthday or the next 4th of July, wont I be just as lonely,
Calling you out from the sweet vintage of all that you have planted
For yourself and your children and your man:
And now I am very lonely, and I am just whom I am:
This night divides; it is doing good math before it has to fly away,
And Melanie is on her path: she is eating her forearm just so
She doesn't have to confront the better toothed boys before she has
To be all alone, into the water parks of her sweet amusement.
Into the water fountains spitting over her still articulating bones;
And this is how we hang up and get in touch with ourselves;
And this is how the wolves sing,
And this is just how I look drinking liquor and drawing swords straight Into the mirror of all of this loneliness.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Months Away From Home

Even though I am about to go to sleep,
All of the souls of fireworks are in your eyes,
But they are so easily spent—
In the nights and the holidays underneath the Airplanes—
And where does that leave us, taking off
Without any view—
I want your lips next to mine—telling me lies
As the stewardesses daydream in the middle of
A school day—
They are almost all of the way to France,
And they know nothing of your shoulders—of your Skin—of your scent—
And my vocabulary is limited—and I am not Very good at baseball—but I have made love to you,
And I have placed my bouquets in the shadows
Of your doorsteps—
And I am waiting now for you to step out
To the silhouettes cast from the moonlight—and
For you to pretend to me in love with me,
Even though I am malformed studying in these colleges
And you have become an apiary nearby the amusement
Parks that are already so many months away from home.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many More Of Your Avenues

Alma, you didn't believe me when I told you that I really had a book,
But I am so glad that you came over to visit me, and that the Rest of your family cannot read English,
Because I dashed right away to the garage where I had a copy of My book and I brought it back in to impress you;
And you kept on telling me not to touch you, but I touched you and You didn't leave:
I thought you would leave right away, but you didn't leave;
And I smelled you and I kissed you, and asked you if your husband knew
How to treat you:
Alma, I see you out there in so many waves: I think about you constantly,
The figures your body makes like cars roller-skating in my head,
So I don't even have to think of mountains anymore:
I can just stay right here and think of nothing more than you:
How I walked across West Palm Beach and slept near your house last night:
That is why you came to visit me, so that I shouldn't be doing that anymore;
But, Alma, I have only so many words in my vocabulary,
And yet so many more of your avenues to explore.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Newly Awakened Amusements

Now it feels all like this: all so around the orangish corners
Of another uncalled for canyon;
And this is the way that the newly weds and the preschoolers
Color in:
The way the sunlight shines in your innocent eyes, like Otters making love across the shallow beds of the northeastern
Estuaries,
The way the star light streams across the semaphores of their Nocturnal beds
Until something newer and brighter burns anew;
And it feels alright by this, but it is yet to be proven:
All of the mothers have their daughters who have their sons,
Who have their flags and their favorite colors
Riding out upon their steeds and looking to banish the windmills;
As her lips breathe again the prenatal wishes of the birthday parties
That I have made alright to feel for her;
And this is all that was needed to feel alright; and it feels alright,
Saturated like your soul's butterfly, Alma,
Pressed and kissed to my lips all throughout today, even though
I know that by tomorrow that there will be so many newly awakened
Amusements that are yet to prove.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Pretty Girls

The greenness has no plans for defeat,
So close to the sea
While the blood is up
And the bees are exploring madly
Through the fumbling of words and feelings,
The fire hydrants wait
To exhume their bright
Pressures
For the forest fires of birthdays,
And the airplanes leave to win,
Panhandling to angels
And stealing so many pretty girls.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Reasons

Up and down the subdivisions, this body feels warm:
And these eyes have seen helicopters,
And felt their midsummer swarm- they go underneath the erudite
Moon like a tropical depression of primary colors:
My dogs are in Arizona, but they can smell my blood,
As I can smell the footsteps up the mountains in Colorado, as I can smell Alma across town in her bedroom
Breathing beside Heidi and the only man
She fears that she loves:
But now what is she doing since her rabbits have disappeared,
After they ate the one and only mango tree in her backyard;
And her little brown body tells so many fairytales,
Each of them truer to my ears than the next,
And I haven't yet sat next to her absolute truth in a movie theatre,
As I still don't know anything about the schemes of stanzas:
And I have never bathed with Alma, or been on a plane with her;
Which goes to show that there are still so many things
Left to do in this life,
And when I stare into the brown opulence of Alma's famished
Eyes, I bite my teeth and swear that there are still so many reasons
In which to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Seas

I envision you in the daylight of airplanes:
While the prize worthy horses are making their rounds
And all of the Mexicans are expelled from
New Mexico:
Just like this evening, on Christmas, I sat besides a girl
From Boston who thought, according to my Baseball cap,
That I was also a Mexican- and I almost fooled her,
While my soul was in the clutches of the fox's jaws who'd
Gotten into the chicken coop while I waited
For you to get back home:
Even though I could not see you, Alma- and even though
It was not raining;
It felt like I could, and it felt like it was- as the sensual ness
Of your body lingered before me
Like a manikin luring a blind man across the street
Or into the clutches of an autumn lake-
As I watched one crossing the street before my car again
Today-
As I was driving again somewhere without you-
And then the aspens cried and shed their bows up atop
The switchbacks of some autumn peak I guess you've Never seen, except when looking in the mirror:
Alma-
And then when looking away, my dogs howl, my sisters
Return home across the lonely streets, lingering in the open moonlight
For a sister whom I guess they will never have-
As you return home, yourself, like the soft confines of your Grandfather's guitar- like a bastard stolen from Spain
And thus sewn into the pitiless crops of some pagan continent
Across so many seas and so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Things

Putting off here, pulling up into a park
Of elbows and graveyards filled with grandmothers and
The old axels of their swings:
Trying to plant roses: roses, or anything:
Just trying to make love, and to stay warm into the dark:
As if this was your cabin
And I was the spark- in a flambé way up in the erstwhile
Resonations of those mountains,
Where the wolves were reintroduced and you were never
Coming down:
Where the tourists flocked between your knees to drink
Your desserts and
Spirits and then to go a little further along their ways:
To sleep in the narrow gage train cars between Silverton and Durango:
To only go so far up the hill, god blessing the angels in the Pages of their billfolds- angelic spirits
With the faces of the forefathers of old men bivouacked
In spider webs, ham mocked beneath the sugary apertures of
The stewardesses who, opened armed,
Fly so far in the sanctions of their airplanes: that they travel
All of the distances of the earth,
Making love to so many gods, and learning how to spell so Many things.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Things That Need To Be Disproved

I have questions to fulfill about you:

How many men have you made love to in your life:

You made love to me on Monday until your husband called,

And you had to leave because you are his

Faithful wife,

Like the waves have to leave their imprints for the newly born

Jacobites and terrapins trundling on the shore:

Alma, you lost all of your rabbits to the neighbors

Dogs,

And I wonder how sad you are: I can remember when I was four

And the dog ate all of my rabbits in the rock garden of my innocent

Shore,

And my mother spared me the death: her labor in the carport

And aloes of lore;

But I am still trying to feel for you, like a kidnapped child,

Like a senseless tadpole:

I grew up around here, Alma, because I am so weak,

Because I am not macho, see how all of my cantos have fallen to

To your feet, to anoint you with frankincense and myrrh:

While I made love other women before you,

Like taking necessary sips of water, like praying to some flags,

But I am sorry that I have made love to anyone besides you- Alma,

Even while you cook dinner with your mother, both for your

Husbands in a kitchen on Cherry Lane:

And you don't like to go out into the sun, and that I can understand,

Because there are so many semblances underneath the sun,

So many things that need to be disproved, but of those I am not one.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Times

Parcels in the grass and parasols over canoes to save you
From the shadow less sun as we go across the channel and caracole
The island I once waded to on Easter:
And you are not at my house right now, Alma:
You are at your home across the ibex and green island fichus hedge rows:
Across the sleeping airplanes and unicorns:
Where I have made it so far by foot, drunkenly, swinging my laughing song,
To sleep beside your three bedroom house with eight souls in side:
Purer than any house of any white person,
You personify the ghosts of fish who can never drown:
You who are as ageless as the most ancestral of terrapin on my mind:
I will cook and slave for you tomorrow;
And maybe you are with child; and maybe this will be your home,
And in time you can dry your close on the prayer flags of my banners,
And wipe the sweat from your brow, finding the courage to tell me
Just what I have fearlessly told you so many times.

Robert Rorabeck

So Many Years Ago

Cigarette smoke undulating from my aunt's lips,
And her boyfriend is coming down
On a bus from Tennessee;
And I am working so close to the smoking beach,
But I haven't seen her in so long,
And still I do not go:
I want to be in Colorado secreted in the higher basins,
The important key-holes where the tourists
Are too weak to go;
In fact, I want to summit mountains that have never Been,
Or have no right to be- for her, or one of my great Great aught great forgotten grandmothers;
And her name is- just this,
Just a song happening in the night far to the east and Under her,
Like a French man going down on a airplane,
Like a frog making love to an inebriated princess who Just doesn't care;
But that is all I have to say or even think about;
It was the best I could do when trying to remember how You walked so tremulous and ecstatically real
Your painted nails on your locker's combination,
Your painted toes in soccer cleats
So many classes, and forgotten generations so many years
Ago.

Robert Rorabeck

So Much Fun

I was robbed at gunpoint
But I still will ride horses
Around the acres of Night, of Sick conquistadors and Lonesome coelacanth,
And something new is just Being grown underneath
The graffiti of
My desk,
Either asparagus or
Pale,
Pale celery:
And I have never had
A brother to have had drowned
In a river;
And I do not have
A living son,
But the sun will come up
Tomorrow,
And this is so much fun.

Robert Rorabeck

So Much Love

We are not taking it easy with the bottle:
We are smelling like a hitchhiking artist that moves closer
To the forests of Alma's bone structures;
It makes things easier to cut away the unnecessary plots,
Like Occam's razor along the ribs of a boneless shark
As she sleeps dead center in the sunken
Car ports:
That this is love, Alma, and it means so much more to me
That you never even made it up to college,
That you didn't have to disappear that way into the specters
Of the professions of the unreal,
That I can still find you sweating perfectly and almost Naked out in the open fields:
That you cannot even remember kindergarten or how you got Here,
But looking into your eyes there is so much faith,
And all of the arid bemusements of your land that knows the Witchcrafts of your ancestors and curses me with
So much love.

Robert Rorabeck

So Much More Than Anyone

When I look into the mirror,
My skeleton grins, lopsided, preferring
The left side: There are new scars like old men
Getting along the cheek bones, molting, things
Which draw the eyes of women who have gone
Through puberty, who bleed monthly and like
To climb atop successful men during that time:
Sometimes I will look them in the eye, like dun Fires, like age-old misfits holding a blade between Themselves, and in this way turn them away,
And drive them off me. I herd them up the cliffs where
The clouds are hanging like heavy lace, like opera
Singers expecting things for free. Anyway, cars
Collide, but the finer elements pass right through them,
And everyone moves away to help. The forecast is rain,
But so far I've done so much more than anyone.

Robert Rorabeck

So Much To Survive

Young felicity beaten in to a court outside my window:
I have a hunch, she likes it when I buy her breakfast;
But she doesn't like it when my pain
Bares her name, like stains on a centerfold,
Like the pornographies of rust in a junkyard beneath
The forest:
And the conquistadors slipped to the bone, and now
Made the cenotaphs and entrails of Cumbrous lions, who ache, drooling and sequined
From too much
Meat and potatoes between their teeth until they Finally curl away to sleep with coral snakes suckling in Their harems:
As I drive away, never looking back, as it looks
As if I've been burned: the Christmas trees came in a week
Before thanksgiving- and Alma called me for two minutes
Today, singing a song about how every man
Who came into the fruit market thought she was beautiful:
But then she had to go and buy them all lunch:
But she left still wearing my gold, and the swimming pool
I dug for her and skipped school to watch
The reflections of the sunlight ripple like blue gills from Her body leaving the tears of the playground I had Abandoned so much to complete:
Until she had completely shed me too: and left weeping like Fire, or other things that need so much to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

So Near To Me

I make wishes I blow atop of esoteric houses,
When I really shouldn't be here anymore,
Lingering in the sad and particular wounds that my aunt
Never should have read,
Going up the stilled ladders even after all of the firemen
Have come down,
Speculating on the absences of those disasters,
How they spilled out into the world discombobulated,
As if sweetened roe from the backwards wombs of salmon:
Now the teachers in their winsome chariots are congratulating one
Another all across the sky,
And the fireworks are leaping like hopeful foxes nipping at their Toes:
The world is all well and green with the envious men holding their Breath under the gas tanks;
But they are all feathered and tanned in their scars, and their Throats are filled with cheap alcohol, their tongues the matches,
Their eyes a fire that keeps their senses from blindness:
So soon there will come a show so bright that there
Will be no further need to save the sailors from the sea,
And we will both be together to see the end of it,
Your body so far away, but so near to me.

Robert Rorabeck

So Nice

Looking up words later on while
The airplanes are touching down
When they had no right to be in the sky
In the first place without you;
And I want to play baseball, and I haven't played
Baseball in ever so long,
But without you what good is a game; and your Name isn't Dorothy,
But I would like to go to OZ with you all the same,
Just to be your dog or your scarecrow,
But my heart- it is thoroughly attached by the crossbeams
Of the great rafters you will forever be serving
Your sweet beverages under: You sell soda pop,
And look at your eyes,
The bridge between them the conjunction of two beautiful
Sisters swimming synchronized,
Looking out for the places you are going, and serving as
The corridors by which your memory recalls the places you
Have been;
And I think your senses are really something,
The mathematics by which I might have you around me,
Bearing fruit and scrimshawed furniture from the earlier beasts
You've taken down:
Or going down on you myself in a sweetly darkened corner,
Work and the day lamp shaded,
Even our senses would be hooded, and we would have Great troubles recalling, perhaps, where we were,
But it would be so nice.

Robert Rorabeck

So Purple And Delicate A Flower

I can hardly imagine how Purple and delicate the flower
I wish to find while sleeping insouciant
In the weeds,
So smooth and waspish as to be Dismissed by academia;
But oh to touch the cheek of her
Limpid sorority, barely burnished,
Drooling sleep on her ruffled pillow;
Stepping up early enough on the Worn stage to cut my teeth,
To be her harrumphing thespian:
I could be her Scottish thistle,
And as she walked by my worksite,
Demure and transcendental,
Her legs clicking like timid reindeer
On the firm concrete;
I would show my appreciation,
While she went to and fro with her
Expensive shopping,
Smooth skin as dull as porcelain,
Buying all the sheer delicacies her father
Gives her:
I would whistle, I would whistle
Her appearance of brevity there beside me,
Like fading coincidence, rich and occidental;
But would she turn her head, though,
So purple and delicate a flower?

Robert Rorabeck

So Real

Abigail,
You were Jordan's sister, back in junior high and High school again;
And I just lost my last poem about you,
But I am not giving up-
The way you didn't dance for me, but I pretended
That you were topless across the smooth bricks of that Fabulously crenellated pool;
And where you are now, but the perfect vestibule of that Narcissism,
Still one of the first restaurants opening up,
Graduating when our high school was still young and never Going to college, never believing in all those things
That ruin a pretty soul:
If I could find you this day and steal you from your Tiresomely Jewish husband, I already have enough money to Buy us a pretty little house outright in the berg;
It will be like there was nothing else after Atari;
It will be like Clinton is still president or that I never ran Away to Michigan:
I will never have to cut my wrist for Sharon,
Abigail, you could be my simpler truth, and right away disavow
These lines:
I want to look you up and take you bare-chested to the fair,
And give daughters to you and your grateful dead,
Because that is the music you love,
And we could spend our weekends molesting anemones in the Keys,
And having nothing less or more to do with the rest of these Conquistadors,
Abigail- I like your music and I think your husband is a bore,
And I'm all about starting over:
Abigail, Abigail, terrapin, hare: Come back with me to Wellington
And I will take you there,
Spending your evenings tiding up in the same living room I
Remember masturbating in with your little brother;
Let me use your autumn tresses for a bomb shelter, and we can Practice and lip sink for Halloween,
Abigail, Abigail because you are the prettiness of everything
That didn't have to go away, Abigail:

You are Patrick Swayze,
You are dirty dancing:
You are the perfect Jewess, Abigail and I have entire Brown bags of fireworks for you,
And names for our children that will bring us back to before
Things had to become so awful and so real.

Robert Rorabeck

So She Does

I write because I have friends and people
Who love me,
And I tried to call you but you are already well
Fulfilled into the dreams of unicorns;
And I am so far gone into the dreams
Of fourteen year olds and everything is illegal;
I tried to call you but you are soot,
You are a pallet of sod along I-95,
You have married a lawyer and the castle is falling
Down,
But I want to move to Colorado:
I want to be everywhere, and I've already cheated
Death,
And I've stolen the golden fleece,
Seen your bust that your child suckles, S;
I killed the friendly centaur for your shadow,
S;
I tried to call E, but she wasn't alive:
She was never alive, but now how about your art,
And the places we roam for so long to bury old
Time friends:
S, the river is sweet and long and I have made
Love to Pedro with a song,
And the telephones are banal- banal while the castle
Is falling down you pick strawberries;
I just want to live forever on Wednesdays and that's Just what I do:
S, do you read my simple vocabularies?
S, you will live forever, I made sure of that.
And I played darts,
And S is beautiful, And she will live forever,
No matter about her, while Evan ejaculates into the bigger,
Bigger reservoir,
And we can we can live forever in Catalonia;
We can live right here,
S:
I have money, and I have to live forever, S.
S:
I love you S,

And you are already gone,
So beautiful discombobulated into the sweaty pits
Of Disney World:
Don't you know, S; don't you know-
Without your spectral denouements of atmosphere,
S:
E, I tried to call you, but you will not live forever:
Cut me forever:
I tried to gather up, but now you aren't forever,
And I am tired,
And I am not doing good:
These things you say, or you've had no right to Yet:
S:
S, I am not right, but I am doing good,
But who are you, S:
S;
It id impossible not to love you:
Look at all the wine you sold;
And anyways, anyways, E doesn't give a d$mn
And she wants to live forever,
So look at her tits and never let off:
E she wants to live forever and she does,
Like a blind nursery rhyme who wants to live forever:
And she does,
Without any of my fingerprints:
And of course she does:
S; and you are impossible not to love,
S,
And so she does:
So she does.....

Robert Rorabeck

So She Goes

Naked without snow on the mountains,
I have the feeling she doesn't need me anymore-
Or if she ever did, she's too drunk now,
Swinging around like a laughing contraption in his Arms- So many arms, around and around
With so many hims she goes,
Sometimes hiccupping, and taking tremendous glances
Into the handsome waves she's falling into-
The repeating natural forces never truly contained
Knocking at her door-
In fact all the world surrounding her is going the way
She goes- Seesawing like a strange accordion into him,
Trying to make money and comfortable time-
I suppose he is her king or something official in Love. I haven't spoken to her directly in oh so many years,
And just like anyone else she is probably getting married
And buying a house and painting her nails in it While looking out through the polished glass at the yard lamped by tremendous sunlight
Which speaks to her of the children he will father to fill it:
I suppose I've never loved anyone,
And she doesn't turn down those avenues I've set up for her Lined by silver sparking cones, like little men bedecking beneath
The palms for her,
Like sparkling insects or conquistadors
Drumming in the shade of her sashaying skirts-
Those azaleas sway beside the old carport
By the sea's one time lullaby-
I planted those for her too,
But now I am so alone and so far away up on the Castillo's
Walls- You could never see me and say with any certainty
That it is really me:
But he is already sending in the army to take me down,
To make it safe like a windowless wall, but I am so far away, and her eyes have fallen
From the sea and up above its noisy theatre where I've been dancing madly;
And so she goes.

So Sublime As To Be Your Own

These trees are hooks for your belongings,
And right about now my breath smells like a fire Engine:
Somewhere close to coffins, that ants proceed;
They are unfathomable, all these mighty kingdoms
Abstracted from Dorothy's:
Not a single insect who has ever lived has ever Known your name, or your mothers,
Or has wished to fall down on his crypt orchid
Knees and smell the better part of you,
Or had to have given you orchids for a saltwater
Kiss,
Or been put through minimum wage, or fed to lions;
And maybe this is bliss:
Having had a chance to look into your eyes
And seen the seven wonders, to have ridden once or Twice in your car an to have sucked the air-conditioning together,
Mutually,
To have your wet lips once or twice on my neck,
To have you to say my name and heard my wishes,
To have seen you walking away upon the concrete pressed
By bicycles and Old English,
And, subsequently, to have been fed to lions:
The humane and tame abstracts who might have seen you Gamely, but licking their chops, have never even thought to Guess upon a name so sublime as to be your own.

Robert Rorabeck

So Swift And Mercilessly

Drops of passion from the second half of Liquor bottle:
Now cops come and arrest me except that I am
Protected by the watermelon faerie;
And I am protected by these songs, by the way
I have been playing myself over the Mississippi:
And now your day is done and your beautiful eyes are
As tired as enchanted embers;
And I suppose you have to go to sleep,
To awaken and grow old from your another child's suckling
Barb;
But you have a business and a house, so rejoice:
For all of the men of our race will love you, and you are
My muse,
So now in the morning we can eat the dead animals and Pet at the dogs at the wild track;
And position our backsides again into the earth;
And know that this is the way it comes; it comes so surely
As waves upon the shore, as the moon pulling me;
As I have tasted my meet, and now I know the mountains
Are rising;
As I know you are rising so swift and mercilessly above me;
Sharon- Sharon; aren't you always rising so swift and Mercilessly above me.

Robert Rorabeck

So That She Should Never See Me

I sleep with my clothes on.
I haven't taken these jeans off,
Or these scars,
Since I saw them swimming through
The red aquarium.
My body is pale and marked,
But no one will know, and yet,
When I must rise again,
My hand will be on the plough before
Her man, and I will bring the metamorphosis
Out of the seeds in the earth,
And my friends will rise from them,
Singing to me, and their eyes
Will not fall to my indecision,
And they will not falter,
And we will ban together and wait
For my sister to return riding down
From the sky from his palace before
My parents wake-up,
And then we will go together through
The hallways of high school,
Singing our song,
Waiting for the forecasted rain to dampen
The red diamond,
And then we will take each of our positions,
And play a game of baseball,
Our jaws knotted in the weather,
And the clouds will scroll multi-headed
In a steady bereavement;
Far above us, they will certainly Cluster and, dampening, shadow, and
The wind to bluster; and by evening my jeans
Will be marked and dirty,
Known better than to my dogs, I will crawl
In between their drooling snouts,
And sleep there through the night
With my clothes on, so that she should never See me.

So That The New Gods Would Come

Liquor runs these plebian amplitudes:
These trucks bugle going into a pass of snow:
Fireworks mouth off for only
A second and then are silenced and the crowd is wanting more:
They are a good gage for life;
And the world is so cold, and it feel so good:
Just like it must have felt for William Shakespeare, that redneck:
And I imagine going into this one gorge so full of My load,
A breath in me like a pinwheel, knowing that it led to your castle,
Even though I knew that your castle was already a home for Your husband and all of those dragons,
And that I was not beautiful as a single one of them:
I had my sling and my whisky, and I expected so little from you:
Just a drink of your eyes, and to give you flowers,
And to sell all the precious minerals from the bed of my truck
So that you could build constellations and mobiles
So that new gods would come
And you would become rich; and so I would live forever.

Robert Rorabeck

So That They Can Start Making Love

This is a tomb they put into print around the Clandestine houses where the oldest of the living people
Remain-
Charred up, speaking to the shadows, as the airplanes
Bask like hounds across the East Basket of their Cerulean universe
Their machines know just that this is real, that her children
Remain at home,
Cooed to the television, her mother Rosa cooking in the Kitchen, the night growing outside perfected by the things
That can still be seen,
And she is driving home to them- out of another world,
And into a finer thing- the grass at her feet filled with still Milking rabbits,
And when she gets out she finds diamonds whose Fortunate wealth sings all the time in her ear, drowning out
The death of flowers,
Even when her young man tells her that she should come
In so that they can start making love.

Robert Rorabeck

So Vert

If the dead bloom, they bloom just for you under your
Peeks of tourism;
And I have been doing nothing; and I am not warm, and I am
Growing tired like a pioneer given up between his passes;
And I remember you,
And as that you must sustain yourself of my flesh:
Because I am not beautiful enough to pass beyond into the
Promised land of your sanctity:
That the wolves are uncollared and set loose and they know the Same names as the places where my names know and repeat,
In the latest hour before my parents are returning home
To their little place beside the canal
To interrupt my profession; and I am thoroughly enamored,
And yet I have almost saved enough to buy a beautiful house for you:
And your daughter is just as beautiful and as well kept as you:
And I want to stand out perfectly in your easements and
In your storms rumors sell perfect things for you;
And I am failing again tonight for you: and my night is just a plagiarism
For you,
And now I can see the lights of another sad return: and the day is over,
And the doors are slammed and people are home and the lights
Are emptied because you are not home;
And your eyes are absolutely perfect underneath the very same moon
That pulls my strings so very far away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

So Very Far Away

If the dead bloom, they bloom just for you under your
Peeks of tourism;
And I have been doing nothing; and I am not warm, and I am
Growing tired like a pioneer given up between his passes;
And I remember you,
And as that you must sustain yourself of my flesh:
Because I am not beautiful enough to pass beyond into the
Promised land of your sanctity:
That the wolves are uncollared and set loose and they know the
Same names as the places where my names know and repeat,
In the latest hour before my parents are returning home
To their little place beside the canal
To interrupt my profession; and I am thoroughly enamored,
And yet I have almost saved enough to buy a beautiful house for you:
And your daughter is just as beautiful and as well kept as you:
And I want to stand out perfectly in your easements and
In your storms rumors sell perfect things for you;
And I am failing again tonight for you: and my night is just a plagiarism
For you,
And now I can see the lights of another sad return: and the day is over,
And the doors are slammed and people are home and the lights
Are emptied because you are not home;
And your eyes are absolutely perfect underneath the very same moon
That pulls my strings so very far away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

So Very Far To Go

Caldron in the sky gurgling spells of stewardesses
Giving them ink for their nails,
Fermenting their juices; and all the day long they Ride on their chariots like outstretched pies,
Like nothing but good news shooting through
The truly wonderful skies;
When down beneath pigeon toed children walk deep
In the hungry peat,
Their saucers as silent as the prenatal dawns of Birthdays; they want you to look for them,
To cast eager glances like commuters who drive to Work before a vermilion fruit stand; look for them if You can,
But even if you do, they are so overworked with their Loves that they will have to eat their own tongues;
And then you can glance away,
Because I know you have so very far to go today.

Robert Rorabeck

So Very Raw Motifs

Lucky juniper out on the cusp of another job:
There it goes tasting their air, rhyming towards the bulbs and
The scents of Christmas, while underneath that well
Titted hook,
All of my family is out on their walk with their dogs:
They go past the crocodiles and the rattlesnakes:
They go past so many things too well sated to move, like Professionals of the shadows,
Or the memories of so many horses that once spoke of this Earth mindlessly,
Culling up to the troughs of windmills, like the sweat on prenatal
Tattoos and having a look around the splendiferous valley:
Their ears and senses succumbing to the nature
Of the chaos
That they find so captivating: when the bees die on the flower,
The flower goes by unweeping, in its little ballroom,
As the airplanes continue the same way in the sky,
The clouds lying like fainted paramours about their silver wingspans:
All of their plans forgotten, and their oh so very raw motifs
Left absolutely unexplained.

Robert Rorabeck

So Very Very Young

Words knick knocking in tombs-
I can smell you when you are not around;
I can smell you like a bull of a god,
Like canyons of coral where cheerleaders bloom:
All of it in the pastels strung out and happy in Sprees of shoots;
And your opal birthstones why they are just as happy
As naked pearls in the sky as crisp
As an apple or a new book;
These words I've stolen from under the pressure washed
Hinge of her skirt or the carport;
And I wake up and its getting past Monday:
I know I will see you if I drive around enough.
Look at the flagpole pushing up the tent in my trousers,
Watch the matchstick lives of my dogs burning away
When I am not at home:
Feed them hamburgers in your buff:
And your eyes like the glaciers of refrigerators
Trolling for tongue;
I love you Kelly, but you are still so very, very young.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly As The Softest Pain

Rain plinks the shingles of a house
Where I'd sure like to live;
Rain engorges too the ever, ever waves
Of the sea persuading the mangroves
And the blind white birds tucked in
Where I'd sure like to live;
And rain finds a way in through the green
Grottos,
The bottle caps the ancient baseball:
Where there are virgins enraptured in pieta
And mussels, where
Noses uncork salty perfumes, where shallow
Reefs palpitate with silent green kelp;
And there are pagan footsteps reaching down
From where she left her husband stranded
With the green cannons,
And started down, all in a mess; she said
She was going to Spain, but it was only her Body that wept,
And the milky white horses watching from the Distant stones seemed not to sympathize
And she came down that way,
While I waited holding my breath for a wish
In some dark and lovely cave,
The rains kind of wondered about
Stepping softly, or happening upon her shoulders
As softly as the softest pain
Where I'd sure like to live.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly Beaten Hero

They are giving their busy colors anyway: down to sleep,
While the wolf is moaning to the sheep of his Tooth ache, and the long traveled tourists finally tuck in
In a hotel down the hill from Jack and Jill, broken crowned from sex atop all of the musty
Wildflowers:
And the sky lights up with the truancy of fireworks,
And the homosexual dragons curl atop of themselves and seem to Want to worship the sun who has gone on his chariot to do far Better women wrong:
And then I sit alone in the affluences of another carport, sipping my Own, likening myself to women who lie wounded on the high backed Slopes of a precarious mountain, their skirts so high up,
They will reveal themselves absolutely if they fall- but then I am
Not there: I am nothing- I am the trauancies of high school
In the echoless hallway, like a beauty emptied of curiosity, a drinking Fountain abandoned by lips: enjoyed by nothing until the next Softy beaten hero comes.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly Burning Nursery

Wound in my heart of Valentine;
Looking through this thicket—the sun gets Lost, won't it be mine,
Or petted down into the crepuscule of
A petted dinner,
Like wet paint rolling over and over,
The hills a river—
A sea of used cars with so many dash boards
Overlooking the sad memories
Of the pornographies of a young love:
It takes such a long time to get over her,
That by the time it is possible to Hardly remember:
Even though she still works across the sections of The earth,
In the old neighborhood, collected with chips of Paint and scars:
Hers is a church of brown eyes, and fingers
Spread in a web of effigy—
As she laughs for you in the soft firelight of A softly burning nursery.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly Downed Creche

Sharon:

I would give you my house: I would give you my soul:

Just how unhappy are you, Sharon: Sharon- If I could make you
Whole;

But your house is already too beautiful, Sharon; it is burning quietly
With the candles dripped right from the sun-

Your body is female, Sharon; and your thoughts are the institutions of Your body, and I don't know any better words for it;

But all I can do is strike out with my two very young legs for it:

I can go past all of the glowing sports of professionals:

How they made themselves to breathe like cattle in a golden summer:

How they conditioned themselves to succeed by the pound in the Market place of plausible numbers;

But I have never seen you again, after the rains came and all of this started
Out flooding,

And the animals continued as if your perfected symmetry;

And I will make you live forever, Sharon; I will give you a castanet for your Soul- And you can come in here any time to take off your bonnet

And work your hands into the malleable pleasures that I happen to Become for you; and

You can sit at your desk from across the room, and if I am brave enough

I can journey across the Mississippi of this dirty rug for you, and lie and Bask in the pleasures inherited to the vineyards of your flesh;

Sharon- you are a jewel tempting a bird in the burning sky,

And this is your softly downed creche.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly Impressed

Then here I am softly impressed- when tomorrow I will Get up and sell fireworks through the thundershowers:
I will keep on getting up and impressing from my Little house,
While the cats make love- they bundle up next to the rabbits
And their hutches of forest fires:
It is just a little ways towards the canal from their Bonfires: it just keeps getting undressed besides
The fairyland of the underground pools- and the little boys
Keep picking at their freckles: soon they will be Homeless, out of doors and panhandling: soon I will drive
Beside them in my airconditioning- and what will I give Them to take back to their bed of trash and homosexual
Love making- because they are so proud,
They are even beneath the Mexicans from their cousins
Pueblos: and I love them while looking inside
My mirrors. Getting up tomorrow, I will drive alongside Their shoulder, and give them quarters and give Them dimes with the effigies of presidents- knowing that I drive away down to Miami and again away from her-
That the road has always been theirs,
And they will travel it up to kiss her, and she will also Be theirs even though she swears that she is still her Husband's: I know that they know that she will always be Theirs.

Robert Rorabeck

Softly Through The Pines

Downed by the desires of crimes
That they know will never fit:
The airplanes and their wives sleeping low,
Gliding and making love
Just as quiet as children waiting for sugar plums
As the world reciprocates with itself,
Seeming to come out into the park
Where all of the trees are opening, seeming for Awhile to winnow the greenery of their Souls-
And my true love is there, and she is down:
Axioms of light in a carnival that can be blown by The wind,
A flag of single minded patriotism in her hair,
A cul-de-sac that can bare children
Skipping school, fluctuating amidst the allocations of Play-
For awhile make believe, as the airplanes that they Know whisper through the trees,
Before touching down, their heartbeats drumming softly
Through the pines.

Robert Rorabeck

Solicitating Doorways

Penalized for my scars,
Made to sit out and sweat off my libido
Here on the bleachers,
While the pretty girls get to go and get lectured
By Swedish young teachers: Oh,
But here the ceiling fan
Chops Susie; it is an insularly sort of Halo for my scarred and bruisey-
What do I get for human interaction today,
But a Chinese takeout menu stuffed in my door-
There are massage parlors around here,
But I wonder what for;
And literary agents; and literary agents?
Young sweet and innocent things waltzing up in
New York,
Dallying in some parks, going down somberly lit;
What will they think of my own take-out
Pamphlets stuffed in their crenellated doors;
Ostentatious unreadable birthday presents;
But then again, what do they have to think of Anything?
But close their eyes and kiss him,
Forgetting all about the solicitations stuffed in their doors.

Robert Rorabeck

Somber Haiku

If I could just die
I would just die If I
Could just die I would

Robert Rorabeck

Some Fine Acquaintances

Mommy and daddy get home, Jack- I wait for a hug,
Or a publication, or cold hamburger:
I've been watching movies as it snows, Joe:
Your son was dead so long ago, drowned in a river in Michigan. He came up blue not tan, man:
He just floated down the river, and Joe died that day,
But he is still a walking man: a blue collar man,
A man who watches basketball, who has a girlfriend in
A trailer park, and makes love to her after dark, Mark;
Who is my dad, who grows a beard: he is an entrepreneur,
And a steady horseman. His daughter is a doctor,
But that's not what I am, Sam. I am a quiet place getting Quieter. Oh, I am abstinent though I do not choose her. In A little ways, I am a publisher author, Arthur- I want
A daughter, a beautiful daughter to watch so carefully down
By the river, to see which way she goes, and how she goes
Like laughing water, and if she falls I will surely Catch her as if I were good at baseball,
And carry her up and down beside the effluent waters,
Where the sunlight streams like healthy banners, where they Catch fish, the canners and the tanners;
To hold my daughter over the cleft of the river, to show her
The forest and to introduce her to those men who are my friends,
Who have cleared away and made it easy for her,
Who will be proud, oh so proud to know her.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Insignificant Feeling Just Above

I went up to the university,
Sweaty and apoplexy and worked for hours in
A fast food supermarket:
And when I had time I smoked and watched the clouds
Deform
And my parents make love;
As I made love to a girl I did not love
In the movies as fat and as gross as the citrus
Of necrophilia tourism,
Rising their flags and listening to the mice scream:
The lions roared just as mutely as wind in the crevices of Defeated explorers;
And then you know there is a forest as pure as the flowers
That have never been seen to have thought to been cut:
There is the world beyond the gardens of pornography planted
In the beds of junk heaped into their cars;
And these days are as swell as kindergarteners out
Almost seeming to masturbate on their lawns,
All sweaty and made to trust one another, regurgitating chicken
Noodle soup like nursery songs:
And even then there were girls I love, while I made gloves of Earth in the palms of the woods;
While I follow the white dogs through the rattle snake coops,
Before all this joy I was touching myself;
And the historians can tell you the history of fireworks,
But it is just as good to know myself:
And I believe I have seen you out in those woods before I can Even remember myself;
And now the earth is melting and coming off of its love,
As the friendly strangers find each other again and again in the Rest stops and snow globes of this world,
Trying to perfect oral sex while that unperplexed god watches
Us as if a tourist enjoying his newly purchased snow globe
Some insignificant feet just above.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Kind Of Summer

I glance through the Venetian blinds,
Looking at the vegetation furtively the way a young Child looks at a beautiful woman who is not
His mother;
And it seems that some kind of summer must be coming on:
I see the splay of pine branches and the splay of their green
Needles,
And the sky is dark behind them: the echinopsis have all closed
In; the butterflies are under the skin of their bark,
Or with whoever butterflies end up in bed with, but the birds
Are singing, and the canals malaise:
The trailer park across the canal looks like resurrected graves:
And when I rise myself and enter unto the outside world,
I would look up into the cradles rocking their séances
In those boughs; and then girls will enter in and out
Through the open air market, coming like wanted hallucinations:
Then they will leave back to their washing machines and their Flower prints like all dimensions of gardens entering their rooms,
And I will say again to myself, biting my lip
Fretful of the wonderful vibrancies of the world that I want too Much for,
That some kind of summer must be coming on.

Robert Rorabeck

Some New Kind Of Baseball Game

On a wash day, the traffic streams a river.
The bears are watching from the brambles, they've Tumbled into the briar pit for fun.
They are learning to start fires,
Discarded tires and porno magazines from the '90s.

They think zoos are funny, as I watch them
Holding torches, their little ones coughing.
As I am stuck beside the road,
Held up on my way to the flea market:
A helicopter is circling and to pass the time,
I pretend that it is some old lover
High up there holding a bouquet
And swearing she'll finally pay me back for the Traffic tickets I paid for
That she got for speeding to see her husband
Who was with the horses and centaurs
And barmaids and wild cacti of Ocala.

But I have a daughter now, filled with laughter
And some few words. A flat tire and an impending tropical Storm may ruin my week financially,
But here are my few words strewn to the golden
Pigeons and ghosts who cannot see me, but feed off me:

My wants strewn like semen,
The milky tears of clowns and barmaids.

The traffic is a river with an infinity of points:
If you want to go that far you can, with birth and death
At every exit:
There are advertisements to pine over
And wild boars, and alligators and iguanas:
But the cenotaphs of conquistadors have all quickly
Sunken under the sandy deserts,
The salted stilts laying the foundation for the amusement
Parks.

I may go home busted, but at least I saw the brown bears

Eating cotton candy and cracker jacks.
I think they are inventing some new kind of baseball game.
Erstwhile, my children are waiting for me.
As I said, I have a daughter and she a little pumping heart
That crossed over five bridges christening her first birthday.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Other Man's Shore

Feeling a new flow of virtue underneath my wings
As it continues on- on,
As far away from my window as I can, counting into
The numb lips of the previous cadavers
Of my muse until it happens right here:
The meetings over bridges- the leaping into the séance
Of fires- another night finally blinded underneath
All of her windows,
And the airplanes gone through their fabulous
Ventures:
The exoskeletons so fabulously clinging through their Old departments,
As you can feel the glowing lights of her lost malls
All around you- and this is just the final thing
That you do last of all for her before you go to sleep:
After all of her flowers have been delivered,
And her chocolates, and you are so entirely sure that she doesn't Deserve you anymore- until finally the night dreams
Come like care giving dragons, like crustaceans underneath
The séances of butterflies and dragonflies- kissing their Last unlucky numbers, and finally glad that they've Stumbled upon to the lover of some other man's shore.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Soon Afternoon

The bodies burn time and time again:
All of the ancestors getting up and congratulating themselves
Until they become the unresolved constellations in the sky
Burning over the swimming pools
And unearthed oceans, touching themselves and telling themselves that They are divine,
While the poisonous mariposas and venomous butterflies flutter
High over the shoulders of my mind,
While I am getting somewhere, or maybe it is that I am not even real:
Maybe it is that I am just the body of a ship going down,
Or I am the tail end of a beautiful snake entering a wall:
Anyways, I don't know my own stanzas:
All I know that this is hardly Christmas, but it sounds like Christmas:
Doesn't it, Alma:
Because I am only trying to mimic your body, Alma:
And your body is as bright and green and vermilion as Christmas;
Navidad- Alma- your soul is my Navidad;
And you are a fairy world-
And this is how we live forever, Alma:
This is how we survive forever under the deciduous breath:
While my dogs whine and decorate early for you,
And I have a crush on you, my brownny muse:
You are my goddess, and I love your wetness- in between your fingers
Or your legs: it is all the same to me, while the candlelight flickers
And the both of us and our gods: we all wait for you:
Alma- Alma: we sing so loud as we hold the breath for our wishes,
Saving up to buy you some soon afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Things I Meant To Say

But the daylight shines through the traffic,
As you said it would,
Or as you seemed to say with your eyes so
Long ago in high school
Until you finally turned and getting into the Saddle and rode away;
And I don't know that I'm a great literary Genius,
But I am a comic book,
Suffocating like obese virgins behind the plastic
Of their puppy dog eyes:
And we are all together in the airconditioning,
And you don't know how deep our souls go,
Because you have never tried:
And this is just it:
A penny, a match, something sudden and free,
Semiprecious is obsolete:
And they also named a mountain after Abraham Lincoln.
Just so, the storm clouds linger like an expensive
Georgian frame
Around the adolescent picture that can be
So easily described where I still wait for you,
Riding your horse,
Leaping airplanes,
While I work lying in the grass. The ants are not Bothering me. The tortoise has slowed from his Race,
A champion- Your wrist reaching out in need,
Or unconscious, is perfect;
And these are just some things I meant to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Vanishing Reason

Kinetic and full of banished frenzy
With another queen in her tower, and I am only
Keen to so many words:
While the horses run as if they were the traffic
Through the forest
That doesn't exist anymore: luminescent in their Loneliness,
Each tree yet at metamorphosis, and each word
But the drunk at a various point in his Road way, panhandling, trying to outlast the death
That the sea brings to the shore:
The perfume taken away from each rose
By the legs alienists that take it to another home,
With the lighthouses and the airplanes underneath it,
As if underneath the sea,
Hopefully drowning, shining their light upwards
As if they could light up and so save
Some vanishing reason from the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Some Whiles

Loose ribbons enfolding
A shrine:
Alma's arms are fired
From throwing watermelons
Over the witch's
Chainlink
Fences, to her hungry
Siblings
With starving smiles;
And I am the wolf
Who eats her unicorn
Gladly,
While the cat makes the Feat of many stories
While we are just awakening
Like a nocturn of Flowers
In the nose bleeding
Meadow
To which it takes some whiles
To realize-

Robert Rorabeck

Some Wistful Amnesia

Lets break into houses and make love-
Lets make fun of the teachers on their way into school-
Lets wake up early and play baseball in the dying
Park as the cicadas shed;
There is no use for us in the bleachers-
So lets get drowsy eyed under them and swap spit:
You can slap me on the cheek if you don't believe me;
But I am the awakened consciousness of the universe,
And you are everything I've ever believed in.
Maybe it is not enough, because I am afraid of lightning;
And I can only stand spinning my arms around and Being romantic in the rain for so long.
I am only migratory because I have to sell fireworks;
And I will buy a home somewhere sometime and Watch television to forget you;
And you will become the fairytale banned from children,
What is hinted at in the thirty degrees of vision of the crocodiles,
Something even the stewardesses gossip over
As they serve their drinks in little plastic cups,
Showing mournful bosoms while the sun squints through
The high altitude windows to have an early morning peek, Slipstreaming, whistling even so high above where you have Become a working girl, jingling your keys, and Fetchingly stumbling through some wistful Amnesia.

Robert Rorabeck

Some With Meaning

Word of these broken phalluses has gotten nowhere.
No one cares to be wounded by Impotent soldiers.

Nevertheless, my wife's contractions are Becoming closer and closer apart
Even though I have a college degree which is meaningless—

And do not know the Mandarin world for sun; but moon I know: yule-e-lle
It isn't up yet, nor is my son,
But he knows at least two words for everything.

His little sister is being born today
And we can teach her so many things
And hide from her just as many things.

The traffic patterns of men going to work,
Underneath the celestial patterns—
Pretty pictures that come and go: some with meaning and some with not.

Robert Rorabeck

Somebody

I am seeing somebody, and she is not here:
My back hurts:
I am forgetting that I haven't learned how to spell:
Fairytale are on the swings,
And muses that I cannot bare to leave are being taken
Down from the sky like ornaments,
From the vespers that whisper her one or two names
To the hollow places on my person:
To both the places that open up to her, and to the places
That would try to close around her:
Pleading the effigies underneath the stir crazy bodies of The airplanes, turning around
Like birds singing a song over the happy though armless
Prince to which their lighter than air bodies are Meaning to crown.

Robert Rorabeck

Someone Else's Graveyard

Laughter of my child
Back in China- outside
The womb-
Boxes opened for Christmas
Or bound for her ancestors-
Footprints in sand remaining
There for eons
Along with the hoof prints of the dinosaurs
Because of the effects of Gravity
Not Jesus-
A god whose heart is here,
Bleeding in my scribbling hand-
Our nearest ancestors
Living entombed,
Wombs of gargantuan infrastructure,
Poets prostituting for
The applause of the housewives
Of the zeitgeist,
A few words lying more distant
From the road-
And a bouquet of plastic
Roses meant for someone else's
Graveyard getting dusty in A shed.

Robert Rorabeck

Someone Else's Promises

Look at here—how the vampires reflect
Like diamonds inside a kaleidoscope
Turned towards the moon in the middle of The day—a commercial airplane on the Lens like a fly—the magic is all but paid for,
As she yawns in the middle of the Yard the boys have left off from their sports.
Now, as if from some witch's spell,
The entire atmosphere seems absent,
And the puppets have turned from their Fires—busses filled with school children
Are still turning around—they seem like the jaundiced
Entrails of some disastrous menagerie,
But they are just heading into school—
And the sun is up and leaping in a widely stretched Bow across the earth—in playgrounds across Town the dogs are running—
Women are getting laid like omelets—
And the pigeons are turning towards homes which Are not theirs with someone else's promises
Clenched between their teeth.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Beautiful

All the tourists are making spectacle of your Coffin,
And even the politicians are overhead spending the Tax payers money on beautiful flowers,
Corpulent and well hung
And making even the deepest-bayed airplane in Danger of digging trenches,
But for once I don't blame them,
Though I know you aren't really dead,
But just hibernating, and getting even fairer in your season:
Soon your usual prince will be waking you up,
And cooking you dinner,
And then you might yawn light a fish nibbling between
The forest of deep stemmed orchids,
Your fingers splaying along the ribbons of your insouciant
Child,
But I should like to start a revolution for you all the same;
I could be your breakfast- I would nourish your Unconsciousness with a steaming broth of forget-me-nots;
And I would bring the paper in to you,
And dig out your car from the snow: I could fetch anything
For you I put my mind to,
But let me begin by trying to say something beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Else I Forgot To Say

They seem to be surrendering
To the monsters of their little Paper weight dungeons—
As the best women of
The presumptuous
Marriages
Turn out to be Only the Personifications—
Of the tools
The stewardesses
Jettison
Jingoistic ally for my little sister,
Janice- ,
The fraternity drinking forever
Their domestic beers over
The wishing well—Like headlights
Of the pilgrims surrendering themselves
To the Devil's paraphernalia—
And there is something Else I forgot to Say-

Robert Rorabeck

Something Else Just As Beautiful

Easy as horses without predations-
Like conquistadors laying with Their crosses;
Bearded mouths all soft spoken-
Her hands laid across beaches of yellow
Yoke-
Despoiled in the morning
By golden trumpets
Brought to yellow lips:
Fireworks sols in
New Mexico,
As something else just as beautiful
Evaporates into the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Ephemeral Or Surreal

You got lucky until they drugged you
Like a goldfish horribly fed
By preternatural angels- and they sang and Sang while the lions opened
Their mouth
Letting loose the feral heavens over
All of the thrift stores,
Releasing cartoons and the beautiful ornaments
Until all of the orphans had to go to sleep
Across the beaches of Miami,
And you were so far transplanted
That the angels hang from their tender hooks
Like the gold I bought for you
Hanging from your neck, as you sweated and Made love underneath your husband
And for awhile-
Even though I wished to tell your sister I loved her,
As our high school became all but haunted,
And I had to set out again,
Believing that I could become, forever,
Something ephemeral or surreal.

Robert Rorabeck

Something For Another Church

Juvenile espionage poking fun at the cadavers on Some midway of your old haunts, where over the shoulders
Of the fading Ferris wheels, you can hear the lions yawn—
Eating mouthfuls of mosquitos,
Enjoying icecreams of everyman's blood—
The enraptured contraptions of these elements pulling up
The oils that you hadn't felt for the longest of times
And decorating your skin—telling you that you were Pretty—just trying to set you up for school tomorrow—
It was the same with me,
Even as we were unlucky, your children fell to the ground:
You gathered them up, happy that the water moccasins and
The harpies' mouths were already filled with last Easter's rabbits—and taking no joy from my words—
Your body already brown and beautiful, knowing that Again there would be another Christmas—
Feeling that it wouldn't take you long to prepare something
For another Church.

Robert Rorabeck

Something I Can Barely Understand

Another day like this one, like the next.

I read canto IX of the third fitt of Alighieri's
Paradiso, and it makes little sense,
Little sense like the way I used to sit alone between Class, and the girl who I recognized came up and Sat next to me, and waited until I said nothing-
Thus she walked away, beautiful legs like vases
In the state of falling, and I will never see her again,
But tomorrow I will read canto X,
And hope and pray that I will reach the understanding
Of Rimbaud at age 10,
And I look at pictures of his gravestone and imagine Beneath it the one legged corpse of a sad man who Could not sell everything he took from Africa:
And perhaps Verlaine's wife will forgive him,
And weeps for him in her own grave in Paris,
I imagine, but undoubtedly wrongly....

Another day like this one, like the next.

I've read 100 pages of a Stephen King novel
But it makes little sense, just wayward characters on A train trying to pose riddles, but I've heard them all
Before and puzzle through the lines so blindly,
Because I can imagine it just as well without the help
In swells of sunlight and the lounging of my hounds;
The dirty America of popcorn and fizz, the nude lips
In the funhouse mirrors, makes you want to think she Has a thing for you, but wait, wait....
It hasn't rained for so long, but I still wait for the Solitude of her eyes,
As today I heard that my book is still at the printers,
And that I will be contacted eventually,
But I do not understand, for I do not know if I can
No longer trust the lips of faceless foreign gentlemen,
But I can endure until I can go back to the amusement rides
With someone as little as my son, and pretend that is life
For a day: A day without words, and narcissistic lines,
The unbearable sedentary muzzle of the caffeine free rivers,
The broken down swamps I could curtail by the whipping
Motions of roller-coasters, the fainting prizes, the lure

Of light and games, and to become the motion of a fingertip
As it swirls the waters of a secret pond.
Laying in the swimming pool as bright as ether in the Backyard of a schoolboy friend who will quickly grow detached
From the green grass lawns, and the daring nights of Halloween.
Going nowhere for an entire afternoon can make you
Feel important, can make you feel the same before you
Turned out as you are, as you were in kindergarten-
Still in love but mostly illiterate, as another day bends its light Around to the next, and I sit down and Read something I can barely understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Something In Those Woods

Her eyes have purposefully stalled,
Waiting breathlessly in her carriage in the middle Of the noon forest-
She was on her way to the eastern sea to surf
And groom like a cat in the crook of sands,
But what if there was something here she Might have missed,
Something along the familiar paths of woe,
Something she has always known to be here in
The gloomy woods of drunken sailors, oh!
Her powdered bosom heaves, her curls bob like Pig's corky tails as she stretches out the cab's
Perfect window:
There are dunes and dunes swimming in the trees,
And great blue ants are fiddling with the dead,
But, Oh! She must see something that she doesn't see,
For even the light performs its bawdy pirouettes;
But what was it, a boy's silhouette? An insouciant fawn?
What goes traipsing through the marrow of this wood,
Like an effluvious soldier of her dictionary of favorite words;
Now she has bit her lip until there is a ruby stain,
But what she has been feeling she hasn't yet to tell,
And the shadows are forever boxing, as if she were a present
They'd wish to slip away; So onward, onward she Must hurry, oh! And into the breaking of the shore,
The sands are ever slipping away, and there, as the sun
Scalds her rouge lips like a naughty child, she lets the Feelings go, but, Oh! There was something in those woods
Who knew her very soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Like Tears

The sound of your fellows sound very fine
On the wharf- they are holding their heads up as They swim,
And looking across the entire pueblo- They are looking For the working girl;
She is already asleep beneath the windmills,
The tangled roses- and there are no more heroes:
They have forgotten how to walk:
They come wobbling in the shoals. They lie on their Sides and say the things they can remember underneath
The sun to say to her. They will not stay very long,
If they evaporate they will become gun powder:
They will become gun powder,
And her heroes will find her and give her new children:
She will vanish with them into the town,
Away from her courageous boys- they know, as they Are going, she will vanish anyways-
And so they are like tinsel strung upon a marvelous
Runway- aware of their quick mortality,
Their scales shed and glazed upon to rocks
That seem to resemble something like tears.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Like That

My aunt showed up today and when she saw
Me she said I had matured into quite a stud
And I could have any woman I wanted:
I tried to get away and she held me and made sure
She got a good look at both of my sides,
Like walls on a crimson church,
And yet she did not change her opinion;
And she's one of my best looking aunts,
And quite insane:
She believes in Atlantis-
I tried to avoid her for the rest of the time she
Was there,
So she couldn't get a good look at me again.
While I did this I wondered why so many women
Don't have more brains,
Or at least balls,
Because I am in love with them all of them time,
And I really need something to cling on to,
Like a wave needs its wreath;
And then she came and went crazy over her two Venal brothers,
Like rainwater over a red wheelbarrow or something Like that,
But not really; it's just that I'm pretty drunk now.
And want to finish up now
And leave this truck for the swings across the tiny,
Steady street
Where I will try to feel the moon and think about Asking Diana out,
Before she disappears back into the forest and
The sea,
As Jove came riding towards her in the form of A really red bull,
Or something like that.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Mistaken For A Poem

Alone, like the juvenile plum tree
Crowned by hungry wings,
And the sun crawling through
My limbs like a drunk woman
Looking for a place to nap,
This is what I've seen
High up on the volcanic cap
Of the waitress' stung nipple:

A poem the butterfly mistook for
A flower,
And setting upon it to assist its Pollination,
Realized that it was sickly sweet,
And not a flower at all,
For all the flies,
But a poem, and not one of spring
And bottle caps,
But a poem of death leaving nothing
For the butterfly to perform.
Thus, the angels continued their Migrations down past the black
Eels and coral,
Relinquishing the poem back into
The somber yard where crickets violin
Beneath the moths and moonlights

It budded forlorn and beautiful
In the gnarled lap of cypress roots
Living just two nights
Before it was devoured by a toad
Who mistook it for a mantis,
Saying as it went,
"I go. I go. At last I go, "
For even it did not know what it was.

Robert Rorabeck

Something That Can Never

Nothing good tonight- nothing on the move,
But the emotionless traffic,
So I am ready to go to sleep and thankfully for Awhile die:
Each word a spittoon in a nature park,
Little kids smoking grass who stare like the undecided
Tide,
Who have better thoughts than me, because their Dreams are yet unreal,
Their words already young and happening at a steady
Clip,
Their professors and kindergarten teachers yet
Effective:
Feral girls so beautiful and outlawed, the unpried
Mollusks in banqueted in sorority on the basalt rock,
The yet ripe airplanes rippling on their silken stalks:
And the wind just blows softly enough to muff
Their hair,
Never daring to take away their desired wish
And hand it over to the fates;
For it is something that can never be real.

Robert Rorabeck

Something That They Cannot Understand

Then there were angels upon a stage
Before you were here
My wife and her god couldn't understand—
Sometimes I stand out overweight beneath the nocturnal
Orange groves and try to figure out just what I Cannot comprehend—
As the infant wakes up under the street lights and Looks up at the comet that is already lost—
The housewives are beginning to kiss themselves—
And the words I cannot find stand like kindergarteners
Outside a museum while the sun shines atop a Graveyard where my ancestors
Kiss the dirty knees of the earth
Hoping that she will finally give them something
That they cannot understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Something To Lie Down In Bed With Alone

I've saved up my life
To spend it all at once,
To live in poverty
In the diseased fields where
Coral snakes create patterns in the soul,
Where my aunt throws spit in my mouth
And steals my only dollar bill,
Before she runs off to get married
And then divorced:
In the crops of unrecognized fortune,
Following my grandfather's hand,
I try to find her naked in the trees
After nightfall,
Perhaps crawling up to my room
To say nothing,
To speak like a sorrowful owl
Before it lights off in the enjoyment
Of small quick shadows from the barn.
I have seen her,
Like a speckled fawn out amidst
The furrows, eating our produce,
Before my relatives scared her onward
Into the solitary line of cypress
Across the highway.
In the morning, only her footsteps
Stand still under the Old Testament's sun.
As we reap what was sown,
There is not enough time to go after,
In the mottled afternoon of meandering worth,
Across the overgrown ditches,
The unclaimed land
Of insects and weeds,
The over fertilized estuaries ripening
Where I wonder of her doings,
Free and without a language,
Eating the blooming things before
They get too persistent,
Never suspecting all that I ever saw there
When she stepped out onto the land,

And in that necessary action gave to me
Something to lie down in bed with alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Something Vacillating Just Out Of The Four Corners Of Their Sight

Broken short haired girls I have Heard
Crying their romances above tree line,
Later in the innings of the third,
Crippled birds-
Downed power lines;
And I am doing my best to approach but Not frightening,
Bringing them cheap wines,
Hoping to smell their breaths;
And everything I am doing is not Right;
Their husbands are coming home later
On with banquets
And expectations of the fulfillment of Their needs;
Maybe they fell from the wings of airplanes
Or ceiling fans;
Maybe they dusted from the Oort Cloud,
Hypothetical dance hall girls;
I have lived around them, their floors I've shined,
And carpets cleaned,
I waltzed a mean waltz in college around them,
Sometimes even fetched their eyes
With the lanky curvature of my unpossessive form;
But I am to be to them this night as
With any other,
Cavalier but esoteric, something vacillating
Just out of the four corners of their sight;
So that I might reach them before the hale storm,
Because the car pools in,
It is him who they have certainly heard,
The beefy lipped operas out amidst tilted blue cactus,
His footsteps all but knowledge fully;
The snake he enters and shakes the tree;
And they dive headily, streamlined plastics, the Curvatures of Spain- waters dimpling that porcelain,

Freckled and forgetful;
And I stand outside of their play bequeathing none of Their domestic light,
Until I tend to recede backwards though
Each blade in the matted field.

Robert Rorabeck

Somewhere

Airplanes suck the fists of my body:
They make strange stances in the air: their bodies like silver
Virgins daring the werewolves who are leaping
Like the proverbial foxes for all of them.
And now they all have their chalices, and I saw the mailman yesterday
While she was walking:
The mailman was a woman, a woman who had not a single Barrett in her hair.
And so she wasn't much good for a woman- a woman,
But I still stopped and stared,
And I remembered high school or where, where I was better off somewhere.

Robert Rorabeck

Somewhere Above The Common World

Pallbearers of bright rubrum multiplying
In the telltale estuaries—
Lunatics of flight paths of preternatural
Fables
But not a long ways off dolphins counting
The fins of their dancing,
As they sped up punctuating caesuras
Reams of them
Blue kites cerulean tail fins—and who Were they in love with, with the angel
Bones of goddesses in their Bills—They knew so many tricks
And the right ways home through the carpets
Of their muse's tears—their parents
Bringing them home what they could find
For them,
With their lunch boxes for the classrooms
Somewhere above the common world.

Robert Rorabeck

Somewhere In Orlando

O jealousy of cadavers-
Here is another one who cannot taste
The meaning, smiling because he is fully gone:
An addiction of secrets,
They place him with the clock
Above the slender passages they move
The tourists through, metered and dimed:
He laughs down pedantically calling
Out the hours of kerosene lit in his eyes,
Furtively trying come-ons to the bosoms of blonde;
How he would like to undo the abstinent,
Learn about cars;
But he is stuck in the untrustworthy world
Of automatons, and might even be plastic,
But he refuses in his perdition of prohibition,
Mastered by the talking mouse,
The laughing dog;
He gets paid in pieces of eight they scatter like Windmills in Omaha,
And down the echoing river he can hear the laughing
Sallywags in their murdersome jigs;
But his place is here, amidst the fake mica
And the Styrofoam cave,
And Tommy Sawyer and Huck Finn are cardboard,
And Jim is juke rubber,
And Rebecca is a balloon lying in the white teak of riverboats-
They are serving pizza and little kids fart
And pull the hair of their freckled sisters,
And Orientals are taking photographs;
His cramped bedroom is intestine,
And smells of stale potato chips and sweaty sneakers,
And if he could leap down now and say what he was,
If his jaw wasn't wired shut,
He'd grab the box of wine and let the vintage Spiked with earth and Italian pubis cataract his Ribs, like a tongue on a piano;
If he wasn't made up, and had a will Greater than these fools.

Somewhere Near The Apex Of The Greater And More Somnolent Onward Desert

Drunken cathedrals, this is what you do to me,
Keep me dry for a very little while
And then letting in the rains as
You hum for me;
And, oh my god, I cant believe I was just with That girl,
Younger than my little sister underneath the plane
That so very recently some trigger-happy scientist figured
Out was round;
And now we swing in ellipses; we swing and come without A sound,
And I wonder what her apartment looks like;
I think that it should look like a snow white Christmas,
With so many coats and furs of animals
That no longer exists, or that should never have existed;
Tonight, I made love to an incredible creature
Which was like a defeated fable underneath the playground
Of those fabulous inventions of man which Go forever onward over-leaping the playgrounds of this Earth,
Holding their breath, maybe experiencing harmony,
Until once or twice again their wings touch down, like Butterflies migrating through a truck stop in Texas,
Warming to their comrades and yet perceiving that their bright
And yellow death lies somewhere nearer the apex of The greater and more somnolent onward desert.

Robert Rorabeck

Sommeliers

The sad sun sunk in the south.
The miracle devils bought a new house;
Their eyes were bluish like throats of courting toads,
And at night they perambulate the dark curling roads,
Peer in the jeweled lips of tillandsia, the spears dripping
Red,
Then home again to make love in bed....
While the pines shush them like long, sturdy gentlemen,
The lions roar beneath the onyx heavens,
Cats climb the pyramid roof, tails swishing seven,

The sea lapping the docks of mussels fifteen minutes away,
The clouds billowing upon a dreary rain-day;
They lay twined in the sheets like pieces of opal yarn
Snoring on the second story where the doors sway like drooling jaws;
Out in the dewed yard, each blade of grass is kissing
The napes and the backs of the fallen angels,
Crying in the mowed sheaths, hungry again for a shunning home.

Robert Rorabeck

Song Bird

Defiantly- the little bird refuses song.
What is he now, without a master, and the spattering
Of seed: he had always had a home. The cat scarred
His beak, but still he felt a mistress who gave her charm;
Who flounced her bosom in the delicacies for every ounce of Daylight's navy, who hooked his master around the arm,
So that they passed around one another equally like
Siamese twins retreating- to this they encouraged him to warble.
What made him not hesitate to flee,
Even as the canon balls are flying?
But the greater apertures which cooked outside his windows,
The fluming clouds, the baying seas, each crest and caesura
Bares repeating:
And now he rests out on the Cliffs of Dover,
Each bone as hollow as the reeds rustling, gossiping of the wilder
Fellows,
While all the men are back in town betting on the dogs,
Shaking tickets above their heads, while their wives pour
It over, the wine from the casks, from the bottles to
The glass, the vineyards of hidden interests speculated on
By winsome's lip;
But the little bird has no more windows, the horizons are Fruitful and swaying, each leafy shadow cusped by yellow
Pools and tapered; and meaning many things, and in each direction
Turns away, or back again to the wind according;
Thus the wheat bays on the fields, like a lover in comely tassels;
But of all these things the bird will not say, for now
It is left off of its way and all this is even too much to sing of.

Robert Rorabeck

Song Bird Of A Fist

Our plants rise up like green children through
The red-haired fire:
Your body is a tender brook where the fish sweat and perspire:
And you made it all the way here
In a wander bound bus when you were merely sixteen,
And I wonder why I haven't seen you before in my dreams;
Or if I had seen you before,
I hadn't colored in the eyes of your children, practicing my Second hand romances underneath the saccharine
Zoetropes of the deep set pines:
I lay beneath you like a wind chime mouthing off to Butterflies in their glass house at the zoo:
Alma,
Your eyes have a calm fever of a Siamese pinball game,
Like helicopters flying in tandem through a cloudless storm to Some waypoint of a mirage:
And if I had a horse, I'd ride out to you and circle around,
Trying to enchant you with the roaring bouquet of my quiet
Body's sound:
I expire to that, Alma, and to become the wild hopes that you
Have never thought of before:
And I will never be resurrected again, Alma, until I feel your Song bird of a fist gently rasping on my bachelor's door.

Robert Rorabeck

Song Bird's Trill

If there was another god that you already love
And if he was not already imprinted with My shadow:
Then take the highway and already go to him,
And dim in his shadow
As the try to put out the fire that he artificially made
Just so that you would come to him
And I will live in a trailer park just as a
Fabreche office:
And you will go to him, giving to him your breakfast
Of grapefruit—
But we will already have broken all of his promises-
And I hope you will know
That I will fall back into the girls I already have happened
To love from high school—
And the administration will not love me,
But the alligators will grin in their coincide longevity—
And they will do away with the heroes who happened to Try to captivate you every time—but I've decided not to die and die either for my Grandmother or my mother:
But I will see them buried—buried—well atop of their Perpetual hills- as the forest fires echo,
As the song—song bird's trill.

Robert Rorabeck

Song Of Crackling Orchards

Song of crackling orchards—
Of a rainbow flying over my house the Same time a stray cat sharpens herself above—
Different levels of the atmosphere—
While windmills wait in their valley along the Succulent lips of a sea in which the Coral rises in all of the nepotisms of the playground
Of graveyards she gives to evaporation and Metamorphosis beneath the sun until Another day is giving all that she has—
And my father's horses are running—continuing
And enunciating themselves to a finish line,
A ribbon, a river—there deer lactate around, drizzling
To the sand lions, as the panthers hunt the conquistadors
And they themselves—until a storm calls them
All indoors—and only a unicorn remains staring for
A mile over the classrooms I keep trying to describe.

Robert Rorabeck

Song Of Cypress And Spikenard

You wronged me in a song
Of cypress and spikenard,

In the somnambulating fog of humming students
And self-medicated professors.

Always flirtatious, you made me wait outside your Dorm, as I drank in the hazy morning.

Couldn't you realize the processes of your education,
What you were going through,

When we lived together, and ever day was warm and Torrential, and we held hands in the zoetrope's carousels.

Now the spilt cherry molts on the seat of the swing,
A caterpillar never actualized, burned missing.

The failed metamorphosis in the process of those years,
You got what you wanted,

As the lips of the clock blow away molted fears,
And Hindus chant and pray on the green lawn where we passed.

Robert Rorabeck

Song, Prayer, A Ferris Wheel

Alma, you are some trick:

I bought you a cake of blue and green: we ate it all:

We who are all of your men,

Alma- we all love you: we all carry your flag, but I just Want you to remember me:

Alma, I have an empty bird cage on my coffee table,

Maybe it is waiting for you while I sweat it out,

And you ask me all day who is Sharon, Sharon;

But who is Erin, Alma: who is all of these things, and I told you

That I had written some 4,000 poems and in all of them might be found

The zygotes of resin of tears of maybe 4 or 5 girls,

Alma;

And now you are the first and foremost of all of these girls:

Your eyes as wide and brown as two moons circle, repeating and making

Love

Alma, while Anibal tells jokes and fishes:

Maybe you love Anibal, Alma: maybe you love Armando- maybe you love

Your husband too, but he is always with a machete,

While my thoughts are always with you- I sat with you in your dodge

Charger today, or whatever it was, Alma,

While you ate your whopper with cheese, and you told me your husband

Was upset and might even come looking for you,

And if he came then I should run, but I wasn't really afraid, Alma,

Because see here my gun- Alma, see here my soul fillet for you,

While all of the quietest people go preaching, Alma:

My hands connect in a prayer for you: Alma:

I am not really sure who I am- except I am no longer who I might once

Have been,

And now I only hope that I might be one day for you,

Alma:

A song,

A prayer,

A Ferris wheel.

Robert Rorabeck

Songs From Across The Oceans

The little places of our hearts' cathedrals
Kept lit by the show and tell
Of the faith of
Bon-fires—
My wife hums songs from across the Oceans,
And the words dissolve into theatres
Of metamorphosis—
I know who you are, strange girl of My Hollywood,
Silhouette still shining from the fireworks
That keep going off in the places
We've both abandoned—
And there is not one sea horse
Big enough to carry the both of
Us,
But we can make a carousel out of the Lies am telling,
And go around and around singing
To the children of the lovers
We once left behind.

Robert Rorabeck

Songs To No One Else

Besides all of these scars,
Don't I want to be popular-
Don't I want to travel by foot
And whistle in the rutted tracks,
Like any good American boy should Want to do that:
I want to lay out straight off as the sun
Turns the theatre into blue innocence
Immaculate,
Pulls back the bilious weathers, lays a
Squinting hand and coos to her
Making the stage ready for butcheries thrown Out to the hungry crowds gathered shoeless
In the invested grass:
Until soft and blue and speechless,
I can feel all of that glory just on one side
Of my face coming down;
And it is ringing in the greatest absences of Family and gossip,
Which I cherish as I set out, whistling and picking
The neighbor's apple when there is everything
Else to eat and no one else around.

Robert Rorabeck

Soon As Morning

There are so many things that can be said
To be right, that I can't remember,
And tonight might as well just be any other night:
The stars are just as bright,
And blurred over the constellations of her missing in My arms:
Alma, I wish that you were here, so I could give You back your broken charms:
You made me promise that it was just going to be this Once before I made love to you,
But now I can't remember what I said, and I have Your broken gold pooling on my coffee table,
So come back to me as soon as morning
And help me remember what it was exactly that we did.

Robert Rorabeck

Sophie Scholl

Understand that the rain stumbling through
The trees is like the resistance to the Fuehrer-
Not yet truly awakened, but even teething wolf-
Pups draw blood,
And as she licks the stamps of her rebellion she Metamorphoses, both as the elements which will Eventually defeat all cities,
And as young love; and I keep trying out for her
Regiments, trying to match my boot heel tongue
To her silky straps,
So that she'll look up and see me freckled in the poisonous
Holly and not be afraid- In fact recognize me as An old comrade, someone she fought together and rode Together bareback,
And as they turn her away to trial and the firing squad,
That she should have me somewhere in her heart to Bleed out onto the propaganda of snow,
And in the moment of her lasting exhalation, give me
Courage to ride out on my bicycle, skipping the uniform
Classes, past orange groves and green copper cannons,
Never looking again until I am past the old distinguished Forts, releasing how I saw her last into the tidy sea,
So that as some reflection she might swim away and grow
On that salty espionage which shall forever roar her name.

Robert Rorabeck

Sophomoric

Here you are
Crawling on your belly
Doing the lines of another
Man's God,

Card tricks to occupy
The Pope while you
Crap in his woods.

Trying to use the vocabulary
You stole from high school
English's lavatory
To get the cheerleaders
To do a four-letter word
To you:

To spark
A fire

To F234
Like chimneysweeps:
It is an ancient and time honored
Profession,
Especially in the Bering Sea
Between the Eskimo and the Commies
The tangled pewter coitus,
The silverware and candelabrum
Spilled like valuable sex
Stripped naked on Dead polar bears
Auditioning for
Tooth-paste commercials

There to turn on the light of Their cadmium broom closet
Clicked under the tongue,
Swallowing nitroglycerin pills:
The sudden urge to kiss the Principle
The perfect cadaver of memory

Lit up with shadowless authority

The salivary glands you test out
Under the yellow school bus
Broken down during lunch period.

Spit into the abracadabric key
Toasting new threats
That are so fertile orange
Trees grow in toy orchards
In lakes of spilled beer
Along the tabletops,

In great seas of naked abdomen
New species of dolphin flop
And squeak like
Retarded ballerinas

And little see-through men
Spill out of her brazier
After she helps you get it done.
They apologize and swim
In marathon across the canal
To safety.

While the teacher's pets scream:
"Skippers! Skippers! "
Until the sharpshooters get Them dead,
Then go off to drink Vodka and
Swing in the moony park all day.

Her iris is a fossilized creature
In an auburn trench,
She shrugs and says they Were her grandmother's keepsakes

On the concrete under the rain
For the rest of the day

Paleolithic,
The beauty only exists

In bedded strata,
So they cannot figure out
What to say.
Their unpleasured souls
Become waltzing neophytes
French-kissing
Pre-socratic philosophy,
Stuff they won't read about
Until they dropp out
Of college.

Her first husband
Was also her mathematician

But until then,
Between 5th an 7th period

Their eyelashes the straws of green brooms,
The proletariat,
Stolen from the witch's coven,
They bend down and kiss
The floor,
They cheer your name in Brilliant camaraderie.

They leave by the back door,
Very silent things cast into
The budding night,
They float up high enough
To spy from trees

And the rest of the school filters out
Like a tatter of silver pagan festivity,
For four years,
The current that somehow
Never quite existed.

Robert Rorabeck

Sorry Amusement

In my journal entries of deciduous tennis courts,
I can romance of you, and it doesn't even cost a thing:
I am so obscure an innocuous,
That you wouldn't even consider sending a better
Man to pugilist my rummaged skull:
I can sit out on the mowed yard and kiss your tawny
Neck: I can sit out with all the birds who only come Down with the octogenarian traffic,
And in winter watch the corrosive red bloom,
And hear the waves out of one year
From the booth where I can sit all alone, eyes to the side
Eating plantains and flat steak:
And the bicycles who come by sometimes in anorexic
Parades, go just as easy to her interlocking sea:
That is what she does, and she sleeps childless with Her husband very successful and mostly amused-
She doesn't have time to practice Latin, or remember
How I sat in her vicinity waiting for the batting eyes of The brunette to return from her father's quiet abuses;
And I don't really know what I am saying-
The dogs are sleeping as my fingers are playing,
Across the scars without any freshwater amusements,
Without your faith I guess I'll starve,
But it isn't really any excuse for this sorry amusement.

Robert Rorabeck

Soul Of Mexico

Daydreams of airplanes
Dredges in unison: and then while Walking up, we are all in Mexico-
Like virgins across the frontera
With blood in their skirts:
And maybe by the tenth grade
You were making love,
And holding out by the waterfronts
While the terrapins and Giant African
Tortoises were making love
Ambivalently underneath
The broken down school buses-
While the rest of your class was Having lunch
And the ruins held out ambivalently
As if starting by themselves,
Turning around in the Droughts of nothing by
My own hands, and the First muses of my love, as you wre
Returned home,
Ambivalently love struck;
Alma without a soul-
When did you first make love to him;
When did you first come home to
Me;
My Alma, and my soul of Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

Sound At The Doorsteps

They will make a sound at the doorstops of your Castles, even if you never drive this way—
This is how it will turn out:
You will get around the end of my old neighborhood,
And collapse next to the antlers of a chinaberry
Tree,
And then say to all of the forgotten woods that it not Alright to be here,
And the blue gills will burp and hiccup in the canal—
And all of the children will seem to move
Sideways in the canals of their high schools—
And their mutual bereavements will continue to Pretend to be so unreal—
And maybe you will find her past out one night while on A delivery:
Maybe she will be collapsed next to a watermelon in Her negligee:
Maybe she will have collapsed in the middle of a game of Battleship,
And in her dreams made it halfway up to State College
Where she inevitably messed around and Played with herself—until the summer came,
And all of the sororities rode white ponies and continued
To gesticulate to their continually pregnant grandmothers
Who were still luxuriating in their confederacies—
But, otherwise—the moon got out early and shone over
The hallucinations where the busses were turning around,
And you spied them like an eagle, like an osprey,
Until your true love got out of one of them—
And she touched the ground herself—and disappeared like
An angel in a sea of burning promises—
The fuses disappearing into the maelstroms that consume
All of the bones of the wayward marionettes—
As they still struggle upwards from the sea—delighting in
The nocturnal perfumes the lighthouses have bought and Sold to them, giving them the vanishing luxury
As the sea swells against the car ports and the misspelled hotels
That become so filled that only the virgins of the streets
Are allowed to enter in.

Robert Rorabeck

South Beach

Zombies and ex-presidents,
Kissing cousins, try to make friends
With little girls in bright blue bonnets
Waiting for their mothers by the bus stop
Under the banyan trees in South Miami-
They all go together unaccompanied
By the sun, to shopping malls where
They used to sell their blindfolded brothers as slaves
Who could not see the desperate Cubans
In their rafts being circled by sharks
Being circled by the Coast Guard so close to South Beach-
Here pink fellows play Russian Roulette
With the venereal diseases of their loneliness:
Its cliché, but they all have bichon frises as pets,
And sing in dresses in the cabaret on Tuesdays
And live in lonely little apartments
Overlooking parking lots, overlooking the sea
Where spotty mermaids, the part time whores,
Wash their scabby knees in the salt and sing
Melodies of lost memories, to the little girls' parade,
All done up in blue and pink ribbon,
Like packages with legs when they grow up
For the influential men, politicians and Flesh hungry zombies, the sororities, like veil,
The tiny stalls they are made to live in, and taught
To bedazzle over looking the sea,
Waiting for the bus to pick them up after shopping:
The zombies, ex-presidents, little girls, and me.

Robert Rorabeck

Souvenirs

Learning to taste the fiberglass of a reckless void,
Or that there is something beautiful in the sea
That really doesn't belong to her, but Just in the words of her high school that has blown
Long since away like so many masturbatory scripts:
That only the alligator remains,
Piecemeal but fully long in the tooth outside the cobalt
Bridal showers of carports that never have to leave:
Like the fidelity of youth that ripens all around its sorts
On into middle age and the contours awaiting a body
In death;
And homelessly, swaying like a de masted sail from the Voyage of loquacious heroes,
She goes along, muse-like but untrustworthy
Fetching the boys and the dogs to her art, calling to the male
Figures all around who are craning their necks beneath her
To give off musk and gold wishes at this wonderful dream,
Like the ending of a movie above the trees;
And she languishes, nameless and quivering, with what is left
Of her delicate hand pressed to her forehead as she Faints;
And gets stuck in the branches and as has to look for awhile at
The higher up dreams of airplanes, as we clamber up together
Like dishonorable firemen to kiss her lips as refreshment,
Or to pull her apart for souvenirs.

Robert Rorabeck

Space Is Meaningless

I listen to the old man.
He says, "Space is meaningless.
Observe." He reaches out his hand
And pulls a young girl from the air.
She looks like Goldilocks
Except her eyes are hungry and real.
She falls upon him, saying,
"Where have you been for so long,
My love? "
He tells her, "Experimenting. See.
Space is meaningless.
I have always been here."
"Whatever, " says the empirical Goldilocks. "You've always been So strange. Don't leave me again."
And then they embrace in a deep, wet kiss
For many years, proving, I guess,
That space is meaningless....

Robert Rorabeck

Space Shuttle Of Her Thigh

Going down, space shuttle of her thigh,
See what they have Recorded of her things: Barrett in her
Hair,
Celestial orchard demoting constellations
Like grapes
Above the pristine prism yards-
They are going back to school on her:
They are holding up their hands
In class: what atmosphere a ferris wheel
Makes while it is in town,
Transcendental across the soporific alligators
Who have been there for awhile.

Robert Rorabeck

Spain

I started drinking before the plane left
The rainy tarmac,
And after I lost count we were in Spain,
And the hills were busy
And the cities were filled with museums.
I got a tattoo in Madrid,
And my aunt kissed her old professors
Who had killed the dragon,
And we visited the shore where she had Made love with an actor a year ago,
But I didn't know about that then....
There were orange groves like silken armies
Under the moon,
And higher up Roman ghosts marching in
The ruins, and women I couldn't see but
For their hair flowing above the earth,
Women on bicycles going away;
I thought I almost heard the poet whispering
From beneath the olive trees somewhere
Off the way, but I was so drunk,
And the hills were so dry they dragged down
The clouds and drank until the horizon
Was indistinguishable from the mauve canvas,
And the ways went around her like ribbons
Down into the ancient sea,
Where the artists took young girls and drew
Their outlines, and filled them in with salt,
And red tears dyed from the sea;
And I thought I saw a girl I didn't know,
I still think of, but I was so drunk,
And the woman we stayed with was married
And had her art exhibited in Japan and Denmark,
Boats so sad that they warmed into the docks;
On New Years she called down with her friend
That she was in love,
But I took to the streets, and the poets whispered,
And people gathered and spoke their tongues of Marble ham,
And I fell in love with all of them, in different parts,

Until I fell back home and landed,
And sobered and eventually graduated from high school.

Robert Rorabeck

Spanish For Red

I love to put you on and do your make-up,
Spindle your hair up into a dream that grows after death:
Kiss you with curses under the race-tracks and Mountains- Watch you, aproned, serving tourists
Ice-cream cones, like cows saltlick;
And I can't write words that appreciate you enough,
But in general we've breathed the same atmosphere;
And I stamped your hand in high school with my dirty heel,
Which was some sort of absurd affection- I'm sure
You don't remember- These things that continue to play
Out as my lonely dysfunction just due south of you:
If you read other poets, you would know the great discourteously
This is- For this is just a fit of my cuckolding, and I can barely spell, anyways: Instead, enjoy men who can run
Fast, who might leap and dive in jaunty sport for you:
Anything you can be better sure of than this- This is but the Curse of a lonely sort of king or grey-haired prince, unhealthy,
Having killed all the dragons to try and sough his friends from Their weeping fangs- A curiously chivalrous orthodontist,
But otherwise an absolute novice to anything emboldened:
He who lasted twenty-nine rounds with a punchy butterfly only
To succumb in the end to the dark-eyed suppositions of an Unpublished fairy-tale: It is true, in his fits he has climbed a great Many mountains for you, and gone far above the stunted heads
Of a great many tourists, and looked around and wept for you,
And said to himself that there she is- she must be somewhere around;
And it is true that you are living in the only state that can Properly reflect your beauty, where my mother was born-
Soon the aspens will be changing for your birthday; but, otherwise,
This man is such a fool- he who can barely carry a tune, who drinks
On Sundays and on swing-sets, who looks for you everywhere he Can think of, thinking yes you must be somewhere nearest to him,
But you are never anywhere found.

Robert Rorabeck

Sparrows

Airplanes are shooting silver arrows.
I've heard them whistling from their barrels.
Some women ride on them,
And some men,
But hardly any sparrows.

Robert Rorabeck

Special And Most Secret Girl

Killing yourself by the sad blooms of eastern Exits,
And now it is because it is really here and it really exists
That it blooms,
While I have my house and no cul-de-sacs and nothing else
That can be real;
And all of the bottle rockets have shot off,
And the children are touching themselves and saying their Private names unto the school buses;
And nothing that was ever said here will ever survive:
There are only trains and the sad penumbras of whatever airplanes
Are that cannot be disproved;
And it just goes on and on, I swear it does-
And the light somehow happens onto the room;
I swear it does- but other than that there is only bliss, and school
Girls,
And the triangles that will always dissolve and disappear,
While the mountains will finally congratulate themselves,
For somewhere far hidden upon their slopes they have all
Found a special and most secret girl.

Robert Rorabeck

Species Of The Flesh

When people handle the
Species of the flesh,
They think of nothing but their Long lost childhood
Vanished into space—
At a truck stop in New Mexico, I pull over to Sleep, as the world wraps
Around and around the Pull of an insignificant
Star,
You hold your newly born
Husband close in sleep and Call his name instead of Mine,
As the sea breathes like a
Lover of your state just Off to the east,
If you cared to listen—
I cannot hear it at all
Because it will not say
My name anymore, the Same as your love;
The easy way you abandoned
The thorny garden we Grew—In the weedy underbrush
We forgot to tend, but for
You now the bloom of adult
Life has begun
And you can breathe easy
And not have to strain
To listen for the sea,
Because the same sound comes
From your lover's
Immediate lips—
I have nothing but scars
And time,
And no place to move towards,
Because all the towns of this space

Are so similar
That I forget myself.
Abandoned first by you and the
By the distance of time, a drifter,
I can only drive on,
Sleeping alone the lonely nights
In the way stations of forgotten men,
To awake in
The morning to an insignificant
Star,
And then to drive on.

Robert Rorabeck

Species Of The Yet Awakened World

The last thing the downed pilot sees
Is the octopus' inky fear;

His victor confesses, he relives the startled
Eyes of the man he killed every night;
Every night with the medal pinned to his chest,
The honorific of ace tacked to his name;
Only took him fifteen minutes in the frantic battles of Guadalcanal

His wife with him warm against his toes,
Her female heart beating staccato against his male heart,
His children down the hall in their mortgaged rooms;
The lights are out but everything is fine,
The crop grows better when the moon is full,
And the owl has his mice in the loft of the barn,
To which the cats confess they would have liked the meal

Every night he sees the man he killed,
Who would have killed him,
Now just the bones flooded by the inky fear,
Left to settle beneath the Asian mermaid's fanciful boudoir
These fifty years, his enemy of nameless song,
Of the perpetual twenty years, the eternal warrior of a dead emperor

This is his soggy psalm:
He is still there waiting for the victor's living eyes to conceal
The light, for him to wake up in the wavering afterlife;
His pinprick of existence repeating in the tracing incendiaries
Which smoked him, until he fell like a misappropriated angel
Anonymously concealed in the nameless archipelagoes
Which happened fifty-years ago,

Amidst the time-less alligators and spawning mosquitoes
Which happen there still,
Though the men and their machines have cleared out

So the dead man, he lives still,
As a tiny part of the hero's soul, who shot him down
Fifty-years ago, and will live on until

That old warrior's eyes fail to open and thus remember
The man he killed all those decades ago,
Now like a failed lover keeping time in the lightless skull;
Now like a faithful brother, keeping time until thus unawakening,
They meet each other in the slow waves of the other world
Contained in just a moment's breath,
And amber gunfire,
Like insects frozen in tree sap,
In the whitely torn clouds above the shimmering abyss,
Recovered by the species of a yet awakened world.

Robert Rorabeck

Speckled Bellies Of Leaping Aeroplanes

Tonight there are people on airplanes over
The ocean, and men who stay up all night long
In emptied shopping malls, and endless wayward traffic,
And children who will never go home:

Near the swaybacked caesuras in a little house, they kiss and Penetrate, the girl I once laid on the shore
Of the ocean where the old viaduct walked into
The teal waves musselled and worn,
Where we used to smoke exeunting 7th period
History. My oldsmobile was cherry red and leaked
Fumes out the backseat, a cheap high,
And where the waves didn't touch there were Burrows of swashbuckling crabs;

I pretended one
Was Jordan's sister, all speckled and clean the Way she used to sunbathe near the family's pool,
The collie nuzzling up to her warm breasts, like
Vanilla muffins under a turquoise bikini,
And I'd watch her after playing videogames, salivating
As if on saltwater taffy. I'd stay up on school nights
And watch anime at 4 am, hide in the Florida holly
Until the bus crawled by and made a circle around
The wildlife preserve, ride my Huffy back to the Five acres, and watch a Bruce Lee movie
Until my dreams resumed;

My father's horse
Was struck by lightning, a month after I finished selling
Fireworks with Bill Tulk, who used to ride bulls,
And now he is losing his house, and his wife is named Chris, and he was arrested and thrown in jail for A drunken evening bobbing in Gainesville while I Rode under the palms to my classes, and despised the Feminist professor for insulting Holden Caulfield;

Even after I graduated, I got drunk and passed out beside
The library and dreamed that I had written books

And were now in there like eggs in a hen house, and We cracked them open and ate them salted and with Hot sauce,
And afterwards we'd kiss, our lips like mollusks
Sticky from the undercooked yoke,

so when my mother cries while fixing
Peanut-butter and jelly sandwiches, weeping that there is nothing else to eat and my Poetry should be but the enjambment of logs spilling
Into the mouth of a vague river, mumbling, I can only say
To her to close her eyes, and at night on the roof
She can learn kung-fu and float from tree-top to tree-top,
Should she learn to scissor her legs blissfully, and Swing her arms like cranes, and from those Boughs laugh and practice her own style of martial
Arts, and look up to the speckled bellies of leaping Aeroplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

Spider-Web Octopus

My gray hair
Against your Excited chest-
Running through the pumiced
Valley,
My spider-web octopus;
My scars
- Like open red
Mouths filling
Your areolas - lapping
Like newborn cats your Corrugated and rosy
Saucers-
Whose mother are you now,
And did you leave your friends to Join me in this room,
Into this bed-
Or am I only a dream?

Robert Rorabeck

Spilling Their Philosophies Of Ladies' Magazines

Dogs in hell get boring-
Bare-chested, bruised, she is made up of The darker colors of escargot,
Where serpents coil protective of their bright
Knowledge,
Incest of shadows balled underneath the antebellum
Swings- Mailmen who defeat it all,
Estranged wives with hair-lips displaced into
The trailer parks needing new engines,
Never take down their sad Christmas Lights,
And I display these wrists for her,
Wondering if she has any tools,
Or if she might cook a hot meal for me,
Spill together several mammals-
But all these things are just images like vampires
Left out in the falling snow,
Bright red tricks of carnivorous flowers-
The things that Baudelaire had to say- A blade
In Marlow's eye,
Revealing the limited perspective of cowboys
To little girls hop scotching in Bellefontaine, Malingering curls do no good
When the finger is done with its fidgeting,
Even a vast vocabulary cannot spell the profit made
From Appalachian bootlegging-
The outlaws stripped of earth and education,
Plastic flowers stymieing entire kingdoms of apoplectic
Ants;
And I await in the dark shuttered of any number of Suburban foreplay, drinking my thing, even while knowing
That the agents who could make this happen
Have better and more endowed young things
Who are beautifully spilling their philosophies of ladies'
Magazines,
To fondle galloping on one designer suited knee, Areolas arousing like sand dollars becoming revealed in Clearwater, to waste their time on.

Spindrels Of Cornucopia

Risking the subtle night,
Kings and fish go to sleep,
Recognized or eaten by every man who Comes along,
Death stealing their gold
Or anything that might be of value.

In autumn, not far away from the shipwrecks,
On the little beach they hold class,
The girls and the clams,
Trying to sing to one another,
Trying to make some money—
Ones with lazy eyes and ones with pearls
In their mouths:

Both of their orifices are opened:
Creches for little children and jewelry:
She swings her head back in the windowless class
And her insouciant presence performs to
The little boys around her—

She is at home in her mind:
Spindrels of seashells and castles
Cornucopia the forest that no one else can see:
She is failing out, but to her each day opens
In Spruce and Fir and Evergreen:

She is her own god and mine.
She excites me in my sleep. I ride my bicycle perpetually
To find her outside of her window,
The cats on the roofs and the moon having my back;
But time proceeds to tell it tale
And now even the beautiful girls are too old to stay
Up late enough and listen.

Robert Rorabeck

Spittooned Cabinet Of Aquatic Junk And Roe

I died for you,
And the sea came over, and whispered, burnished,
That I had lied for you,
And I don't wear jewelry- and I just want a kiss
From something that isn't the forest and
Sky,
Something mammalian and quite real on roller-skates
And tinfoil.
Wear Florida holly and ask me to commit to lactating
Suicide:
I will put my gray head in the lions mouth and show
You a soda-pop decapitation;
I will show you how to assassinate crocodiles and pythons
Belly fat on rabbits and house cats;
And I will somnambulate for you for awhile,
If we both don't own bicycles, because they are better
Stuff and can take us both the blue sand dunes
At a quicker rotation;
And we can learn science and expose the pearly opulence
Of your thighs skirted geometry: Or, if you don't like
The days vocabulary of foreplay, punch me in the eye
And give me matching pare- make me darkly beautiful, Mask me for the ball, cheat me for Christmas and tie me to The tracks under the tannenbaum- just don't go out with other Boys, don't even smile for other boys; or at least don't Show me the evidence- and now I am hungry-
If you say you love me, look me straight in the eye and give me
All the attention of your indisputable horoscope,
And I will send you flowers again, and spit blood and swear
And feed my flesh to your litter- but I must go now,
Because the cops are coming, bleeding colors and sounds;
I didn't want to mention that I am a wanted man,
Hoping that you would prove it first- Now I have to Run, but it will be quite easy, now that I know your secrets, Because I am a clever boy and I have this gun.

Robert Rorabeck

Spokes Of Tangled Bicycles

And the rivers get up while
The ball bounces,
And god swings down his hand, scooping up
The jacks in the forest
As the pinwheels spin- and the cowboys and Indians take turns lying down on the Box springs between the Acetylene canyons- and if you've been
A good boy, they give you this:
And if you've been a bad boy, they give you
That,
But you go home to your trailer parks
Anyways,
And sell Christmas trees for your father,
Yawning up through the branches like the spokes
Of tangled bicycles-
Scribbling the scrimshaw that tattooed your Grandfather-
And the skeletons grin- and the kites
Take flight,
As you close your eyes and enfold around her,
Going to bed for that very night.

Robert Rorabeck

Spring-Time's Flaxen Orgy

My imperfections are stilted for the muse:
The deficient vocabularies
I am still learning to sing:
The airy duct my betters use,
To come and go bare-assed in the burning sky:
They don't even think of modesty,
For their poesy's diction excuses anything:
Their lines are without modicum of fallacy,
Even though their phalluses are still
The shriveled earthy things of mortality,
It matters not;
For the phallus of their opulent lines
Is better than equine;
And they pollinate the learned sororities
Like randy studs wild in spring-time's flaxen orgy-
Each receptive woman in studious bud,
Bare-bosomed with horn-rimmed glasses:
They fellatio the masters like bucolic maidens
Filling the wooden pails with milk
Spilt from mouth to mouth,
As if in no hurry to extinguish the blaze-
Turning the hidden stacks into a bullpen
Where I imagined the published poets go
One by one, for book signings and other
Expressions of gratitude:
Greeted in privacy by the blushing fair complexions
Of their most grateful muses,
The willing paramours of the unblemished rhyme.

Robert Rorabeck

Spying From The Distances Of My Ambiguous Library

And aren't we going where we are all going-
In weather or war,
Young men's hearts bloom, exploded
The corsages for the proms their patriotisms
Had to miss,
Bees or maggots-
Lying in a field so beautiful with tetanus,
The rusted cars filled with mottled pornography,
Young women naked in moldy bread baskets,
And far above the crooks of leaning Australian pines,
The cripples like bad teeth being pushed down by The ocean's not far off exaltations
In a green mouth: And I don't know why I am Doing this,
Trying to call up the ghosts that are still living
Pollinated in a comely field on campus,
Riding their bikes around, their mouth-honey open
Waiting for that divine epiphany, or the addiction
Of a cigarette-
I loved the way she'd walk around, bursting through
The doorways of vane-weather halls,
Never minding the great fronts being pushed through,
What the expeditious thresholds denoted of her animal:
The cereus cavalries in romantic equipage;
It was the intimate time of intelligent feeling,
And she pricked the short hairs of my inherited forearms
Like telegraphed electricity;
And by these means, these letters of unequaled dusk,
I mean to come back to her, and spy from the distances of My ambiguous library, or to smell her swimming naked in
The chlorinated ghetto when she had the time,
Because she is now vanished, extinct, and professional-
Well-suited and married, having gone off to Give birth in the urbanized strata of important destinations,
Tennis courts, and swimming pools,
Kitchens with wine racks, gym memberships,
All the other amenities satisfactorily gratified into wherever it is we all Hope to be going.

Staged In Witchcraft

I am a dime by any number:
I am alone-
My shoulders and cheeks are freckled
By the sun:
And I am alone:
I am alone, flipping like the picture books of Zoetrope's
Through the conundrums of my cathedrals:
I am alone:
I alone:
But I am bivouacked beneath Hillary's Step,
And I just plan to believe here:
And I just plan to stay here, anymore:
While any number of any number
Has been masturbating itself toward any door:
And now you know just why
I stand here, holding my Bicycle just like a sweetheart, waiting for the Door of heaven to swing,
And the ribcage of my beloved to hinge back into Me like the homecoming of
A racecar:
Waiting for her to swing back into me- as the Golden candelabrum twinkles through
The graveyards of the pigmies underneath the Chandeliers of the oh-so pitiful foyer:
As it so happens, it is all staged in witchcraft-
As the fireworks ignite warlords across
The floorboards- and another holiday happens
Upon us,
And you, three fingered- don't have to believe
In any of us anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Stain Glass

Patterns of apertures and loss.
The ship's guts spill the diamonds into the waves.
For a second,
The fish glitter unexpectedly before
They fade again into the abyssal wound.

Across the street,
The children do not play together anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

Stain-Glass Window

A sinkhole's limestone nipples
Aeroloed by fern and Evergreen—
Little rabbits nibbling off
Her jewelry—
Spiders spinning ghostly bouquets—
In the quiet reservoir—
Deaf and dumb awakens—
Waters recall the avenues
Underneath the ullulating churches—
A fox yawns—shifty eared,
Dissatisfied,
Remembering the mermaid he
Once saw swimming beneath the keyholes,
Her body a stained-glass window
Looking out to sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Stamen Of A Blind Man

Words on the lips of
A stamen of a blind man—
Rolling back and forth
In a movie theatre that
Is trying to make love
To the moonlight over a dog track—
With foam on his lips,
And airplanes in her hair—
The beautiful narcolepsy of woman
Consumed by a bee hive—
Or the beautiful if fathomable lies
Of prostitutes—
Well, you don't have to go around
Here anymore,
But I see you sometimes, fashioning
You own games,
Like glowing hooks fashioned to Bring down the grown angels from Their twenty feet of sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Starless Estuary

Personable are the rainbows over the school yards
That survived into yesterday:
But my grandmother is buried up on that hill,
Kissing the sisters in the movie theatres
Against their will:
But I suppose they were meant to be here:
And they are here,
As the waves come in to the busy traffic-
As I go to school:
It is a nightmare to go to school, but I go:
And I have show and tell:
It is a presumptuous hell, but they get it right,
Because they've got tails to tell,
As the daylight burns, as the engines turn,
And it feels alright to finally believe, that they'll Be turning home again-
As the night surmounts the stars- and the beautiful
Pageantry becomes absolutely absurd-
The Ferris Wheels enjoy the night because it is The only thing that they are made for-
And it is a beautiful, starless estuary- and it is Something that I certainly do not deserve.

Robert Rorabeck

Starting Out Anyway

I could start out any way,
But not the way the traffic moves, like
A careful tide, a faithful ebb and flow,
Depositing the silts to and from so many Houses, so many toy yards like costume
Jewelries, lustrous under the street lamps
As the moon. Rather I would start out Working, even panhandling, but calling your Name is always the procession to and from the Vicinities of your major organs, your legs and Hips and that mesmerizing sway: We are Open so late, and we sell so many things,
I don't even care who knows: Its good business
To say these things to you, to record them as they Come off the tips overactive nerve-ends like
Flumes off of mountains, like tall naked women,
Their breasts beading water above the steam.
This is how I think of you, even in Africa or on Mars, places I have never been on you, but other men
Have explored and made names for themselves because They have braved you. Even if I come after them,
Even if I have little else to say, it would be enough even to Be guided atop of you, or to bare your second or third Child, and raise them in that ilk of deltas connected by Dog parks and fat iguanas: To send our children out at Dusk after school, to shoot hoops, and to make love when They are out doing their same, to squeeze your breasts
And call you all the same things I thought of you as
As early as high school; but now I must go out into
The night and howl, and cry your name as a wounded dog
Cries for a wayward master, as the traffic flows across the Insouciant traffics of concrete: so I cry I love you yet again,
And you say so what, and go back inside and shut the door.

Robert Rorabeck

Starved On The Dreams

I wont see you now,
My eyes have cracked
On the edge of the bowl
And they run up the hill
Away from the obligations
You would give
With the strange sugars you
Would mix them in only
To die with another boy by
The moon dipping into the Mediterranean Sea
In North Eastern Spain
Where trains drive through Christmas
With stolen guitars
Made by grandfathers
When I am away;
No, I will not enjoy with your Ingredients,
All the parts you take in your Room
When you turn on and off
When even dwarves start small
Where the green ants dream
They cover the places on your Body I would like to cover,
The places you hang-up at night
And cloth in the birthing daylight
Of cliffs
My body climbs away from you
Now
My eyes go way up the cliffs
Above tree-line where the Angels hook them to the Burden of dreams
And they run up from the sky
The first remembered tears
Of a young boy caught and
Starved on the dreams.

Starving In One Afternoon's Ferality

Unequitable with practicality—abandoning the major highways,
And practice this craft in the woods—
Underneath and wetted by the lactates of mountains—
Rejoining the motherly void—habitats of lights without Tongues—
Fluted throats that call for love wildly passionate—
More unrequited than the perfect choice of words—
Clouds billowing like an imaginary fire stoked by the lust of
The gods—
Rams' skulls and arrowheads diademing and glittering
Upon the apex—
Almost leaving this world, starving in one afternoon's
Ferality—
Earning no money but needing no possessions—
Proof of which they will blind all of the others not to see.

Robert Rorabeck

State Funded Poetry

I read my own words like masturbating.
Sometimes I am disgusted with myself I
Do it so much,
And I can't spell, and I seem to repeat
Myself, especially when a spikenard is trying
Its damndest to shoot out my cheek,
And each line tends to be for one woman
So hung over and belching, that it isn't
Even funny.... In fact, if pathetic had a whim,
You could find it secreted like a condiment
In most of my words, thick and runny ruining
More subtler textures,

But sometimes, I think too how sad it will
Be, if a few of my finer words should not find a way out
From the wood chipper's maul, the fallow temperatures
Of mediocrity, the mildew and rime of disuse
Through multiplications of seasons,
Where the unpublished sit without fingerprints in
The half-eaten book stacks,

Rather, let them out as they should be,
Not the roomy flume saccharine to greeting cards,
But chiseled on the convict's tomb,
State funded poetry, or etchings on the park bench
From the work a day arsonist,
Or lovers who have long since abated, their names
Tattooed in the flesh of a scotch pine they once picnicked
Under, like in the fingernail paint and lipstick,
In the booth at the pizza parlor in Gainesville, FL,
Where we once went to down from the apartment,
Seven years ago before you were married and took a hyphenated
Last name, and your government position.

Robert Rorabeck

Stealing Everything That I Prayed To Find

Day by day this body awakens, flatulently
Renewed,
Like your body, an old friend, misplaced,
Remembered,
But somehow remembers to pick your sisters up from school,
While the oranges grow in the orchards
Underneath the hills of Spain; and you have had your breakfasts
Of lovers,
And you lie with him now, after he has done at cards and Smoking,
And his donkey ears have almost become comely enough for You to remember to love him,
Alma:
While I am still up under the copper garments of another ungodly
Warf, being persuaded by the cat or the fox
To bury what gold I have left on the Beach,
While my uncle or my father is getting filthy rich;
But if I am really lucky enough, I will spend all of my last Tuesdays
With you,
Cradling you in the obnoxious sea, because you cannot swim,
And then writing about: how you strip and wear my shirt
And we make love: why we still make love even while he calls,
While your children
Are away at school, like educating fairytales,
Until everything finally has to pull away, to pick up and uproot
From my heart,
The way my parents left me, or the way my dogs still pine in Arizona:
Because you are as brown as a gypsy, stealing everything that I prayed
To find.

Robert Rorabeck

Stealing My Beautiful Song

All of the bodies bivouacked- in fact they are a family
So many reasons above the street:
Right under the stars, a husband and a wife who do not
Love anymore,
Who spend each day together in a cloudless hope,
Losing limbs- never once speaking of love,
Their children spread out beneath them:
Roped to them in this disaster of mud and sticks:
Hanging down the cold face,
Learning how to go to school and read, and to become estranged
At recess through the fickle apertures
Of where they are placed to belong; I, loving their mother,
But so far beneath them- too far beneath them to do
Any good- too mortal, too imperfect, the wind howling
To her from the countries of her birth,
Calling her home down through the calderas of other paths:
Through new green ways where other bears and galaxies live,
Luxuriating her brownest of shoulders,
Persuading her back into her pueblos just as surely
As mountain lions eating my throat, and stealing my beautiful song.

Robert Rorabeck

Stealing Things From Kindergarten

It turned out that something happened along
The sky.
I was sweating, but not going home, but Roaming-
The fire was chasing the foals beneath me-
And the blue cats had gone to sleep underneath
The broken down school buses-
If there was a greater vision, it was a long ways
Off,
And the briars of the zoos kept me at a distance:
There was Mexico, and her brown body cajoling,
Like a different species-
A goddess of milkweeds; and I was only stealing
Things from kindergarten-
There she was across a great ocean,
Causing a sky to burn with tears.

Robert Rorabeck

Stewardess Haiku

With those legs why are'
Nt you serving drinks on Airplanes- You could fly.

Robert Rorabeck

Stewardess Of Rich Dimes; Or, Go F- Yourself

I am now a conquistador in the peat,
Chewing his lip,
Looking at feet:
And there is nothing newsworthy up in the avenues
Of sky:
I guess I loved you, but I just want to die,
A paper airplane tossed on half-course,
A rind of vermilion amusement fed to the lips
Of a horse:
And I just want to die,
Or I want to skip school,
Want to bend down the tree rings into hell-
Either I want or need more straight liquor;
Either I want or need these thoughts about her,
And the unicorns transform,
And the neighborhood is a sea all about her:
And I just want to F- her,
To write down her in junctures-
But what does it mean to be a captain of such dysfunction,
When I would have rather skipped school using her hand
Tightly to glide, to skiff in a canoe,
To go past the easements of housewives, to hold her still,
To crack shells with her,
To make her real- and really mine- to commit suicide
By inducing the homeopathic coral snake to milk my Wrist,
To finally lay down and see- the ruby sea anemones
Basking half tossed beneath the pines;
A dozen of them like a rosy sorbet,
Like the handmaidens of Hera-
A goddess of roller skates and highways,
A stewardess of rich dimes, who I'd rather not be around
To believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

Stewardess-Trapeze

Good words on hikes,
On mountains that will never see,
And storm clouds above the poet's reach:
Give me naiads tag teaming on country
Bicycles,
And a wife that is telescopic, who can be Folded up in case,
And Billy the Kid hidden in a thousand lakes,
A thousand tears of sympathetic Indians:
Give me smooth stones to Sell,
Or pretend to tell fortunes with,
Like used cars:
Give me a habit of spikenard and a plane ticket
To Spain-
Give me a decade of a worm hole,
And my life back again, better explained-
Declassify me as sad,
And the most diminutive of planets,
And a female body soft, wreathing juxtaposed
To my own body,
The coitus of the rapids, the snake and the hare
Doing battle in the rock garden....
I don't care: Give me one lock of her hair
And the keys to your car, daddy,
So I can go out hunting daydreams, on the warpath
Around the parking lots and movie theatres,
Picking my canine teeth,
Hungry with something vixen with long shaved
Stewardess-trapeze legs to eat.

Robert Rorabeck

Sticky Notes Of Toneless Dogs

Now that the fire is dead,
I kick the ash, but her lips have curled up
Long before in the coyness of a wildfire;
Even while sleeping next to me,
She floated away, and the entire forest
Burned down ugly while I slept;
I put too much diesel in the tank and it over spilled,
And she laughed,
And I was fired and could not look at myself
When I was sent to the bathroom to clean up,
And then to leave;
It is spent, and the rattlesnake has coiled over the Empty cans of an unsatisfying meal.
The venom is glowing in my blood,
And he has crept through her open window where She'd been singing for him with her blouse unlaced,
And setting down our child from its busty meal,
And asked it to go away and sink into the teal
On the back of a tearful crocodile;
I have nothing to do, but to gather up what dreams
I steal into a kit and tied it to the lesser end of a
Walking stick, like a praying mantis in a traveler's plaid;
I have laid myself into the depression of the wave,
Where the cuckolded men work and slave entirely
In the molecule of a single wave;
Or this is what I write, insouciantly, in the vocabularies
That I overuse in my delusional malaise;
I give myself words of luckless praise, as I write
Only for an hour in a month of days. I finish entire books
Which aren't true, and she makes love to men I've Never met in person, and the crocodile has yet to come Home with our child, but that is only the infant of my Misconception; I read obituaries of writers I stole
From my elementary school's library. I outwitted
Sherlock Homes; I ate Twain's Huckleberry, and never did Return Encyclopedia Brown or Frank and Joe Hardy,
But in two more days I will be entirely finished with my New novel's entire body; but what would it make for real,
If I laid it like sticky notes of toneless dogs around her

Navel,
Would she read it and make me real,
Or, rather likely, leave it uneaten at the table,
And gone out instead into the chirping beds of
The university's bawdy estuary, and there fawned
For some days in her lipstick malaise, choosing from
The empirical mates who fawn and graze shirtless and Muscled on the green palate of her sightless gaze,
And my book should lay rather unread on the table long
Before and long after they have dressed me up fine,
And my mother has wept, sincerely, as they lowered me
Into my wakeless bed, and pulled up the covers of Earth and grass, and crowned with a stony epitaph,
The only thing remaining of me which is said,
Like a candle doused from flaming head,
Like the barren hillside after the fire has sped,
And eaten the words I would have said;
Better off, and senseless, muted in stone, I lay down
My pen, leaving the branches wholly unshaken; Thus,
They kiss goodnight, embracing so tightly,
While the industrious worms turn my flesh's poem
Into bacon; then, bodiless, without either sense
Or pen, I rest without thinking, while their coitus coils Tighter, and moans most nights, like cats leaping from Fences, and over graves.

Robert Rorabeck

Still In Love

Pitiful desire for the retention of art;
It is better to do day labor,
And forget yourself like the other creatures,
And I do
So all day long the advertisements sale like banners
Off the road for hungry countries-
There are girls all up and down Military trail
And their species of their mildewy hunger;
And there are no mountains around here,
No beautiful girls.
I eat lunch with Romero- I eat what he eats and the Airplanes go like marvels, like lugging superheros,
And it makes me so sad that I will never be
One of those things
To have stewardesses inside me walking back and forth
Down my spikenard aisle,
Serving me overpriced drinks, their eyes the lugs of Painted sloughs,
Like engorged cunts beaten in rainy baseball games;
And then afterwards,
Of course, we move around like broken snakes,
Our tail ends making beautiful patterns under the sun,
And I don't know anyone,
But I am still in love.

Robert Rorabeck

Still Keeps A Beating Heart All Night For Me

Sorely scarred and alone- Sorely scarred,
With my dogs- The mountain a somnolent tomb,
And repeating this skullduggery, knowing no science,
But practicing insouciant witchcraft by Waving around better poets' spikenard:
I keep doing this,
I keep doing this so sorely scarred and alone-
Far past the time when there are no more school buses,
When all the pretty and worthwhile girls have taken Hyphened last names and sugar-daddies or
Time traveled back the 1920s
Or are strange UFOs in Gainesville, FL serving liquor-
Saint Nicholas knows,
That I come with the paper snows and the first prints of Morning-
Doing this, garlanding my soul, waiting to be picked up
And pressed to the bosom of a pretty soul,
Later to be discarded- I just want one of two things,
And only one of those is pretty and still keeps a beating heart
All night for me....

Robert Rorabeck

Still Very Beautiful

Numb wounds on the quiet playground,
While she is waiting for her purchased snow;
And grandmother is no where around;
There isn't even a flag this way,
There is no immortality in patriotism,
Though I would still fight for her, if I could Have my way,
And I still find my way onto those things,
The silent wounds that I collect in special flight,
The way I try to collect her sorority every night,
As she nods,
Like a neighbor or a salmon along its way,
Until the mountains are out of beer,
The horses are dying in the pasture,
And I am revealed for the harmless murderer
Of paper,
So the airplanes fly low, and they are not real:
They don't even have real things to say,
But this is how they go,
And even dreaming, dreaming back and forth,
Almost Herculean,
Aren't their dreams imperfect,
But they are still very beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Still Waiting For Me

The night is so sad and unmysterious:
Mother does the wash, of course,
And the old folks sit out in front of their porch,
Dreaming and sweating that they Still had the capacity
Or the balls for suicide:
And I want to get to the gun just any way I can-
Then when I am dead,
Or at the exact frantic millennium when the Hereditary bullet is ruining my already hereditary Ruined skull and its
Really messed up amusements,
I can dream, oh yes I can that she must have loved me,
At least a pinprick full of unwholesome love,
And that after I was gone they could play rusting
Trumpets for me
While one or two homeless men let off oral sex with Alligators long enough to read something I
Had written and to declare that I had beaten the Ever loving sh%t out of Shakespeare,
To become occult in my death,
Esoteric in the sky, while the swing still sweated out
For me, creaking its kind of howl
Like a dog, like a woman,
Still waiting for me to come home.

Robert Rorabeck

Still Waiting For Something That Never Does

Charging out once more into the superfluous
Garden of thorns and sun birds, with my childhood
Knocked out beside the carport,
Where it is useless to use anymore lances,
And perhaps my cousins are sun bathing nudely pressed Against the slanted shadows of the very cab we came Down from Michigan in;
And all the familiar tricks are doing it in the sandy
Sunshine; and the road is made of seashells
From creatures tossed off her gown which is so Richly overabundant that she doesn't mind if half of
It is lost- While those who have retired drink any kind of Domestic beer, and the neighborhood has all gone quiet
Expecting fireworks that very evening,
And all the husbands of married couples have done fixing
The washing machines down the street,
And are back at home sleeping with their wives, so close
But never touching;
And I have stolen so many things from kindergarten not for Other kids with their good behaviors, but for me- kept atop
The refrigerator;
And my jaw was broken but wired shut and gathered up off
The interstate making me think that is why I write some many Things twenty five or six years later waiting for the pornographies
In the woods, waiting for the literary agency to give a signal
To land, waiting for her to call or kiss like a butterfly,
Still waiting for something that never does.

Robert Rorabeck

Stillborn Of An Echo

Now I am wrong with you—
And the fairytales—
If that is what it means to be the End of this thing—
Even as you are coalescing and making a
Small news of yourself—
Simple jellyfish whose graveyard is
At the verge of the sea:
Doesn't this seem that it has to be Enough
Sprawled out in the parlor beneath all of
The tiny crystals—
The diamond promises of the
The chandelier—
Until, finally, you come home—underneath all
Of the nose bleeds of the mountains
And you undress
As the best of the world bleeds,
And I am reaching across the table to find
The most modern form of your love—
Until I am alone in my house,
And the ocean, or the storm starts over—
The world trying to find some reason
To survive—
And this is the stillborn of an echo—
Something I have just realized that you always knew.

Robert Rorabeck

Still-Life In The Cement Lagoon

Now going into the tossing rum,
Kitty corned by all three of these dogs—
In a loci of rest under a roof when it monsoons:
Snails go slower when asleep,
And I can feel them humping their hollow stones
Across my beautiful mess;
And outside, and far down from here,
There is nothing trapped in the waves,
And she goes there entirely free and lucid,
Maybe a girl I knew from high school brilliantly metamorphosed,
Maybe something else, giving off her swift illusion,
Pretending to dance while standing perfectly still
And smoking a cigarette, gossiping with the first
Hints of morning when there is so many people to ring up,
And all of them in a trance watching her
Like a piece of legged art out on the curb on
The parking lot while the world changes all about her
And doesn't mean a thing;
And the cars drive by more steadily,
Until everything is in its place, and there is peace on earth,
And finally, with everything fully awakened and looking Around, she is gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Still-Life On The Verge Of Suburbia

Every morning seven a.m.
And all those people getting up and
Starting to make love,
The professors down by the watercress
Imagining each drying uncertainty where the
The boreal slit merges with the asphalt-
Somewhere close to here, they are opening
Most doors, they are beginning to swing wide,
And they are even rehearsing for a play
Involving a girl who dated me for two weeks.
Each car is a terrapin chewing the tar of the Road like cooled taffy,
And all the girls are married and train their names
Together like Mexicans or Pharaohs.
I wish I could say there was something unquestionably Beautiful about all of this-
That you and he are in love and going to work,
Beginning to lay into each other heavy like two Industrious infants learning to walk by shifts;
But I have found my change down the sandbur easement
Where the last of the alligators strum,
After you are home and heliotrope orchids have opened
Their throats lighting up like prehistoric ideas.
Already too late, god has found a better child,
And I don't know where I am.

Robert Rorabeck

Stolen Bicycles Of That Week's Soap Operas

Opening the curtains upon
A play no one cares for—the classroom
Is discontent
Or falling asleep—
The cars glide by the house that misses
The housewife,
The fox opens its mouth toward
The unobtainable grapes—
And there are fishes in the sea as there
Are stewardesses in the sky—
But none of them has ever noticed me—
They are all sleeping where they lay—
Siamese candles,
Star crossed lovers on their birthdays—
Stolen bicycles of that week's Soap Operas,
Library books fallen from their satchels
And soaking up some morning's dews—
Words that never crossed your mind,
Words you never knew.

Robert Rorabeck

Stolen Expressions Of Yellow

Stolen expressions of yellow
Given as Indian gifts from the moon—
Say to your window, &quot;Oh—Now
I know who you are.&quot; After you have Gone away,
And the farm has grown over,
But all of the limbs of the forest over
It are naked—
Even with the cars moving, it is a kind of
A graveyard where the ants carry the coffins
Down to their queen—
And she sits there, sanctified in her gravity—
And the book reads something about her eyes
In the vortex,
The stewardesses who have already passed
Beyond the Event Horizon,
That lies sated like an over-fed mountain lion
Reclining in the bosom of the sinking stars—

Robert Rorabeck

Stolen Lights Of The Moon

Tom, Dick, or Harry went up to Kiss Mary
But her ball gown was much more
A balloon-
She pinned her last corsage
On rich
And floated straight to the moon.

Vagabonds get shown cars
Like passing keys
All afternoon
Over the limestone cricks
That seep underneath the Stolen lights of the Moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Stones

They leave their queens laying
In the ships,
And they go to the mountains. Looking up,
They believe they are swans,
And in her
Metamorphic dress, she kisses them,
Coming down in minuets-
The lake in which they swim in is stones-
A glacial ballroom;
In that they surcease- becoming forms
Of air,
Nested in her clutches- watch until
The stars turn down-
Trumpets douse, and their boys turn up
In a land they left so long ago,
With their queens slumbering like dousing
Embers with the other soft animals
In the arks they could no longer Attend.

Robert Rorabeck

Stones Of An Entire Earth

Butterflies and rainbows of death over
The skulls of Mexico: my god, this is how you sing
To me in your rainbows and fieldtrips of
Death
Stamped in your epitaphs still pretending to be Beautiful while the sun curses itself—
And your aunts and uncles sell everything of
The venomous snakes that grow head over heal
In your backyard as the volcanos scoff—
And the helicopters give your roofs their own
Shadows where I seldom sleep anymore,
Drunken with my love for your star-crossed lovers:
But now I have a wife, and you are almost gone,
But the sea keeps singing to herself waiting
For her next man to arrive as she carries on in her
Sororities of make-believe mermaids while,
Above, the stewardesses keep on crossing themselves,
Skipping as they do over the wetted stones of An entire earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Storefronts That Will Never Open

I've been belly up and kissing prehistoria:
I have been failing math and reading children's novels:
And I haven't been tasting the tits of her mountains:
I have been keeping lists for canoes and Pegasus,
That she should call me by seven tomorrow,
So I can press my tongue to her wet butterfly and make her moan
All the entrees of her menu:
And feel the ribs that a few other men have felt, while her
Heidi climbs the mountains of her grandfather's out of work
Alps;
And it all seems to come together, even though I have not,
And the otters slip into a salty knot:
And even though it rhymes, it comes together better than we thought:
This girl I love, Alma- she can never be a housewife:
She is a conqueror herself: she is a bottle rocket and firecracker
And a song bird all rolled together; and I have failed her
By singing these sings out loud and drinking, drinking,
While the airplanes shutter like feral airplanes
Or love letters that she has never needed to open:
This girl I love, while the airplanes sing from the lists of entrepreneurs
Of storefronts that will never open.

Robert Rorabeck

Stormcloud Halo Over Scabby Knees

I love you, but tonight I will be riding horses,
Each one a glorious wave, a lapping crowd about your opal knees,
And it will be snowing the sepia ash of your disinterest,
And your cigarettes,
So that the cloudbanks billow the gothic shrouds,
And the swings arc unoccupied toward the belly of the leafless
Oaks, and the power lines bow swaybacked like hanging ropes
Where the crows perceive like winged men waiting in line
The disinterest of your glorious eyes in the bath
Of the failing light where they lay like sated predators,
Cleanly licked and insouciant after a melodramatic wash.

Robert Rorabeck

Straight Into The Simile

Becoming bologna, this is not my god:
This is just another
Comic book left
Outside to understand the elements of The usual bird:
There she is, cleaning herself through
The usual elements
Of her available estuaries:
There she is just doing as she's told.
Whilst the average Christmas trees
Are sold and sold.
And sold:
Oh, old bold wound; oh, old gold wound:
Same natural element happenstance
Through the preternatural heavens:
Just as same old grave song,
As seems to be happening through same
Old natural grave song:
Presupposing through the same old
Elements of the rose:
Seems to be grossing this way:
Seems to be crossing anyway, as anyway,
I suppose: just as the laments,
I supposed, anyway, held between the teeth of Anyway- elements, anyway,
Straight into the smile that happened to have Held the rose.

Robert Rorabeck

Stranded On The Somnolent Sea

Stranded in this truck like
A boat on a teaming
Sea,
A concrete aquarium where
All are turbid;
I pee in a cup,
Watering the plants as I drive-
If I get out the apathetic zoetrope
Will see,
And I will have to say hello to My uncle-
Rather it was a battleship to Blast away until the Ice-cream man came around
Like the Pied Piper this afternoon,
And pollinate all the pretty
Flowers on Pompeii-
Scatter my pretty ashes over fast food
Restaurants,
And blow out my candles with her
Coital farts-
And so I drive on, drive on
For days and nights of hard packed
Somnolent sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Strange Buoyancy Of Their Artificial World

Echoing and echoing until Christmas comes
And the housewives recline in their living rooms,
And the sailors come on home
After hand feeding the dolphins in the immensity of Sunlight
And, after it seems all of my beautiful words have been Stolen,
Someone else forgives me, and the wimples of Stewardesses lay across my body,
Serving me from the challises of their armpits and Bosoms
In the strange buoyancy of their artificial world-
In flashy lures which tantalize the gods above the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

Strangely Failing Satellites Fall

Strangely failing satellites fall,
They fall like f*ck'n snow.
Strangely failing satellites fall,
She disappears down the hall so far;
She is out back there in the snow.
She has climbed so far for just to sell
Semi-preciously to the tourists in Colorado.
Her children will never know to believe
How her eyes once fell upon alligators sleeping
Torpidly on the humid banks so far below.
Strange failing satellites fall,
My eyes are made of dreams and all
Splintered up and cut and shook so they swim up
From themselves come morning from those Drooling scenarios which play out all about her;
And she doesn't even know.
Strangely failing satellites fall-
They fall like f*ck'n snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Stranger

So who is calling you now in the tangled
Tinfoil trees?

¶ one,

Amidst the red enjambment of junked cars,
Along the wheel less highway of dead pine needles,
Passengers of pornography,

¶ one,

Who is painting your house with expensive joy,
As mothers hold you up at gunpoint
For grocery money,

¶ one,

Who is checking on grandmother's tombstone,
On the windiest hill in dirty America?

¶ one,

Who is feeding the dogs?

¶ one,

Or riding beside you to see your parts,
The briars of certain meanings left alone for too long,
Now emotionless,

¶ one,

The ghosts in their doorless hills,

¶ one,

The blue tongues of Spanish cl! ts,

¶ one,

The cities of cadaver horses on the mountain of fire,

¶ one,

Who sits beside the guitar on the train to France,
Or touches its strings, wishing to sing,

¶ one,

Or touches your hand at the joy of the river,
No one,

Nor seen the summits with you in their particular light,
No one,

Who will remember the childhood of youthful canyons,
Or hear the hungry calls of birds newly hatched in the quivering
Burdocks,
No one,

Or see the swishing lights of lovers in their bedroomed glow,
No one,

Upon the sea's strident waves,
No one,

In the cusps of the tearless basin,
No one,

Amidst the tall tambourining aspens,
No one,

No one.

Robert Rorabeck

Stranger To Each Other

Looking up through the jungle outside of my

New window:

I can hear the airplanes roaring, the women on them as

Silent as snakes through the reeds;

And I remember a child hood of classrooms on cinderblocks:

I remember coming across her own childhood once in awhile,

And moving through it,

And speaking softly and reverently like a mouse in a hurricane

In a library;

And maybe her eyes lit upon my childhood, as she sat down on

The floor held up by the cinderblocks too,

And turned her eyes towards the teacher as our two childhoods

Separated, going away, becoming stranger and stranger to

Each other.

Robert Rorabeck

Strangers In My Memory

Strange women are in their photographs,
Smiling far away,
Hoping for more attentions and the eyes of Hands to light upon them warmly,
But they do not see my useless foreplays:
Some are as thin as in high school,
Others grow finer with the rectitude of scraped
Elbows,
Others do not appear but in my dreams
Where we share the same classroom, her daughter's
Name, a Macintosh apple,
And the happiness of clothed flesh if unsheathed Might conjoin and procreate like insects on
The powder mouths in the fine and high meadows;
But they do not see me,
Even if I am asleep, I am forever trekking up the Disinfected draw, a wire sewn in my cenotaph,
A centaur with the body of an elk clicking between
The lightning scarred oaks carrying a toolbox
To the summit,
Where I can see all of them as if destinations on a Map, when swimming, and they do not read me,
But lie me down and say now that this is enough,
And they congregate back into their professions,
And when at home they scoop ice-cream with fiancés
Because they know it is convenient,
And when they look at them they feel mostly pleased
With their choices,
And when they are in the mirror, their bodies wearied,
Soon to birth children, and become mothers I will Never meet, they think they look like photographs
Out in the wilderness of girls so far away,
Like echoes down in the canyon's pit,
They are not sure what they mean, or who it is Before them.

Robert Rorabeck

Strangers Of Science

The same streets patter
With younger feet- The light bulbs
Changed,
Strangers of science fly overhead-
She lays her educated head down
Upon an alike pillow of a fresh bed,
Her name something like an orchard
Some months after the frost of My touch,
Bearing the novel mister's fruit:

I like to believe that each line is like
Blown glass cooled by the lips
Which still scar me
Underneath the sun reflecting all the Washers and dryers in the world,
Doesn't see a need to understand-

It too readily proceeds beneath
The Mississippi,
Where souls like old mother's sheets
Are blowing
In the anonymous, open throated mass,

Save for the eyes of the better
Saviors who yet proceed overhead like
The lips of signs and fresh-painted billboards,
Curled in the hand,
Hatching coos down the runway's mind.

Robert Rorabeck

Stratifying The Old Masters

The male and female skeletons are not identical-
They both smile, but they have little difference:
They don't listen to answering machines,
Their natural abundance is with earthworms swimmingly
Kept lined in the grass like unimposing teams,
Kept distilled like pioneers hemmed in by the barbaric
Earth: Yes, defeated, but not given up- Whole towers
Of dead over spilling sometimes into the banks of Over-greedy rivers- This horizontal cavalcade distilled
OF their flowers of evil, their pugnacious needs,
Their thirsts to abbreviate their territory, to manhandle
Their thirst- They are more identical this way than they Are now, driving to their cars, looking for show.
Somehow more distinguished with less on,
Unaffected by the lights off the evenings glow of the television.
They still don't go out to much, or sit down to read the news.
They don't listen to the lions roaring nocturnally somewhere
Escaped around the over-weedy cul-de-sacs of the old
Neighborhood- But in an inanimate nation they set up
Their parliament, their arts unto them, their monoliths most Contentedly unobstructed by the dazed old masters; and now
This- Supposing it has found them out, they will be pacifist
To the delineation of their natures- Man and wife alike now,
Sexes hard to distinguish, ripe and pale along a beach of polished stones,
Fishwives who don't care any longer how much sturgeon goes unsold.

Robert Rorabeck

Stream Of Perfumed Sentiment

Tonight a rum fetish putting rivers in my ears,
Cataracts and girls in streamline dresses enjoying the Barrel rolls;
And tonight is nothing useful, only movies in black
And white of other nights:
The girls line up for the birth-rights and the airplanes
Slow:
So slow that I can count their revolutions by ear;
And their colors fall off of them like clothes on a line.
The sky is a valley in which they pine:
And it is beautiful to think of them over the heads of the Girls.
I do not know which is more beautiful, the girls or
The airplanes, but they are all married and they smell like Popcorn, or the greater devices of the simulacrum which Still can only draw one or two things:
My two muses must be amongst them, tonight or another.
I remember her eyes swimming over wet clay:
I remember her lips on my neck on the way to the bookstore;
And all of it was a horrible dream in a rush hour
Of slow moving action returning from a church,
Returning from a graveyard smelling like popcorn,
In a stream of perfumed sentiment I wished I never had time to Awaken from.

Robert Rorabeck

Streets Of My Adolescents

Sun of an obnoxious quarry as we seem
To be laughing—
Open throated frog princes all of the way
Up to the chandeliers—
While my mother waits in some awful
Mockery of a Pieta—
And the lamps bloom in the gold dusts of
The mines—
Another song mimics the song bird's,
As the traffic becomes utterly confused—
Losing itself into the darkness—
The mailman apexes, but he is no excuse
To me—
Lamp posts lining the streets of my adolescents,
As wicked men travel home after
The fireworks' pageantry—
Licking their stolen wives' bodies of An adulterous
Apiary.

Robert Rorabeck

Strip Tennis

With the daylight dancing invisible truth in tiny heated segments of God being played out through the day's household, eons of shadows falling through the window's generations, many parts of her are laid out through my mind.
For example, just last night while I was jogging in the valley on the fertile dirt track my father ploughed to train his horses on,
I thought for the first time that I'd like to play strip tennis with her on some rich court in Palm Beach Gardens; and I had never thought of her in conjunction With strip tennis before, though I am sure I did not invent the game.
And I think of her in any part of the day with God falling on me like the spent atoms of the solar system;
Forgetting to shave, the sun looks like Jesus
when, driving back from the valley, thinking of her, my belly full and lazy from fast food, gorged, I'm ready for a nap, though I just woke up this afternoon,
I think what it would be like to lay down beside her,
the natural juxtaposition of sexes on a healthy bed, to never use protection when making love with her,
a full exchange at any time of the day,
complete, promises of her children.

Robert Rorabeck

Striped Socks To The Grave

I love you with your hand that way upon
Your shoulder,
And your eyes indescribable except that they might Be just the same as the final stare sailors give Given up to the sea;
See how I keep doing this, trying to call you out
To play with me, giving up entire houses to your pensive
Lips;
And you are lost, too good for words,
With your eyes the expression of deeply ghostly worlds:
What more impotent words for love than these,
Tossed like unnoticed bouquets at your feet, like crumbs for Strangely sated pigeons: and what are you,
And who are the men you love:
I want to stand for every minute I have breathing in the same
Storefront as you sell wine to breast feed your child,
And I don't care if it is raining, or if I have fallen on the Hard times of four legs tonight; all I can do is say those Trite expressions and listen to the rivers overflow,
And your eyes give away nothing,
Everything else spinning, spinning, with entire fairytales hitting Hard on the witches, motionless echoed- all they are given
Is a free lunch and striped socks to the grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Stutters To The Substitute

Silver stutters spark the Third-grader's nervous lips
Like an impotent lighter
Trying to socialize with
The invitation of a Waiting cigarette

In response to the Substitute's petite and Alluring question,
The knowledge of which
He does not possess,
Though the intoxication of her
Experience encourages
A response

She is waiting at the Head of temporary authority
Wagging her cross-stitched hips,
Looking like his mother
Curious as to what he will say
A syllabic fulcrum upon which
Her love must hinge,

But he can only produce
The noise of his underage intoxication,
The fumbled mumbling in green vines,
Sitting in a puddle of lukewarm piss,
Until she draws back from him
In a classroom of laughter,
The unutterable bouquet
Of her stymied interest.

Robert Rorabeck

Subtracting Joy

Subtracting joy,
Your eyes fall away
Like a pendulum let loose
And with them your thoughts
Cascade,
Like two children untwined
From their whirling game,
Called off by the whippoorwill
From the apex of a red roof,
Bright geometry against the night—
So one falls in the river and goes down
Trapped in the whirlpools
Of unanswered memories,
Until all that is left is
The deep serenity of Your most secretive thoughts,
Those sapphires and emeralds in your soul
That gleam like precious children
Under an inch thick blanket of water,
Bedded in your secret grottos;
Here, you pick up the finest things
Knowing that you can not choose
Who you love,
But he is very close to here in those Deltas where rivers nest and taper like Thinning dancers down into the sea;
Then in the ancient city
Where you go surfing
And bronze men come up from the waves
To hold you by your abdomen and call you miss,
Flirtatiously,
And they take you down streets
You almost recognize,
Wreathing coral streets
They make you dizzy with love
And the wavering undersea lights,
Like a highschool dance
Until you don't know who you are,
Except that you are almost floating;

Going back to him he is gone as the place
You have seen is taken off by a wave
Swept up by the sea,
There you are trying to breathe
As the voices of ordinary thought
Begin to echo like heavy footsteps on stone,
So soon you forget who you are,
How God made you,
The tiniest child lost in a river
You played too close to—
As, from the top of the darkening hill,
From the apex of the red roof
The whippoorwill trills...
Subtracting joy,
Your eyes fall away
And with them your thoughts
Cascade.

Robert Rorabeck

Suburban Personifications

I am in a house 8,000 feet above the ocean
Where I ponder the many souls inside the turn-about
Of cities,
The languid streets who lay shivering after a rain:
That is when they are most beautiful,
And when virgins go out on long bike-rides.
Then each blade of grass in the dewy yard is a jewel,
Each yard in suburbia a square in a laconic chess-game,
Each lonely cypress in each yard dripping tearfully
But unperturbed to be alone, and even with the faintest
Wind has things to say longingly to its brothers grown
Up beside the glossy sports vehicles with state university
Decals;
Perhaps, if I were to move there, I might watch nocturnal
Mistresses step out of their front yards and drink Chablis
In silken negligees, unafraid of the trespassing raccoons.
There the lights meant to define their landscaping,
Define them just the same, so that they become Innocuous post-modern personifications which drive
Around in the bright sunlight and across the long curling
Tresses of concrete byways whose underbellies are salted
Like pretzels by the exchanges of the sea. Again, at night,
The crickets serenade in the damp crooks of windowsills,
And they sleep as peacefully as dolls, their kitchens
In perfect order, their families parceled out into their Purposeful rooms, their mortgage's finish-line in sight.
I blow them a kiss from my hidden mountain,
Turn off the lights, and then step down to the cellar's
Limbo. I sleep for months, and as I dream of them,
These faceless women living in their unending cul-de-sacs,
Like hares in peaceful gardens along long, bucolic shoulder-blades.
They turn about me, and are like shell-fish cracked open,
Brought to my steaming lips,
Wafting their mortal perfumes,
So I become heady from no other reason than because Somewhere far out there they actually do exist.

Robert Rorabeck

Suburbia

Now all the roads are empty,
All the ghosts have turned to salt:
I am only scarred on Fridays, but I wake up
Bright and clean for the weekend,
And all the domestic fights are like fireworks only
For holidays; and all the kids are groomed,
And only a few dogs have flees,
And lovers lie down like missionaries beside each other and they Say forever after, surely, forever;
And he buys flowers for her from the local florist
To put into a vase,
And all the alligators are lethargic and harmless
And every home is almost 2,000 square feet;
And there is only one author and she writes romance
And there are three flight attendants.
The rest are all orthodontists or dermatologists;
And the are polite neighbors and just about everyone is Asleep by ten,
But it is not affluent enough for lawyers,
But everyone is all-right- And the older children get drunk
And practice tramping instead of seventh period,
And some cheer leaders make love to football stars in Their schoolgirl rooms that are as pink as the inside of a conch,
But not many;
And I want to move in here and live behind the white gate,
And bare children here and make it new and easy and right
For them. Maybe I will teach fifth grade, or at the worst
Work at Wal-mart, for it is the beginning of another Great depression, but here is should be easiest and Just as bright as Florida gets- And I will meet a pleasant girl,
And make love to her, and marry her. Maybe I will even fall
In love and buy her flowers. I will only be scarred on Fridays, but will wake up bright and clean
And warmly suited in the lanai room- even if we are not Affluent enough for our own pool;
It should be alright for my children and good enough to call home.

Robert Rorabeck

Such A Day

The day gives me swell light for my mind to Fumble through the highest basins of these well-burnished
Meadows,
Above the cars and waves alike,
Above her auburn cascade,
Droop of lip and eye-contemplative, then the uphill curves
Of approving body language pressed to the gas,
Circling like thorny eagles some slick cul-de-sac and the places she

Has chosen to forget, like a drooling infant
I skim across the field, like the dragonfly newly budded
Yet without much scorn or excuses to try its barb:
Propelled by some close at hand divine retinue yet exposed but Done fishing and putting my hands up stone.
I could love her from here, if I could remember
The song I was singing to her this morning as I did my Best to lather away my narcoleptic scars which hibernate
Like beastly marks cloving my hooded body,
Trying to whistle but debating,
Like darker and darker rings the fretful doodles of a
Mortal sinner talking haplessly to the solicitor on the phone;
Turning his key in the ignition, leaving his home

Too old to get married but still batting;
But now on this unsure avenue both widely and lost
I give a pause and
Watch airplanes and thinking of far away stewardesses serving
Their expensive liquors not unlike her, like candles' flames
Thrown in a vase,
Their shell-pink engines skipping,
The winged exhibit silk streamed, bosomy and also perfumed;
Yet even above my head their legs are echoing
Along the slick avenues of their flying chassis,
The uproarious sorority paid to visit relatives-

Beneath all that,
The waves make a teal castanet, beautiful but of no
Consequence for every which way it is going, it might be going wrong;

It is certainly turning around again, recognizing itself at a loss
And I must continue down to the next exit and decide Should I get off heady from the lure of the citrus pistil and bloom,
The day laborers singing the darker man's song,
Put orbs into baskets trailing ash and rum,
Down again to where the leathery vendors are dancing in their Appointed apertures of supermarkets and salons.

To buy a house here and to recede,
To get out of the way, and hold her neck at the Right moment and pull her towards me so that They should say in her old dorms there is no more partings:
to make love to her
And brave my song first placed into her ear,
A pearl of tongued calm relinquished by the end of the line to The next available teller trained to smile.
Would that she were nearer to be certain that she was,
The reason for a little amusement, but instead

The great uncertainty
Of the surface level groves give me pause;
Even though they are swaying in freckled pageantry and the only Excuse I have to feather the trembling heart is that
All my ancestors now dead have walked here before and held her
Hand for me until I could come;
They have gossiped about me and painted her eyes with
The places through which I have traveled,
And held her back from the natural inclination to steam
To the docks and greet the soldiers returning for the war
With a bend of the knee and slip of the skirt- They have done their best
To remove her liquor,
To gently seed and tuck in well-furrowed, giving me a direction
To begin to work my unfamiliar charms,
To cast my nets over her in rutted whispers,
To pull her towards me like a ribbon or eel from
The tangles of rustling mangroves or saw grass swamps-

To lie down here atop the Spinning old world, hopefully in the oldest town in America
To mingle with the tourists and their youthfully foolish exchanges,
To spume far beneath the highest basins catching clouds,
Gathering them up and holding them until they turn green

And envious but provide shade and conversation,
To hear those galloping waves so close to our door that by Next morning they have come in like oil workers tromping about,
Wanting breakfast,
And her to get busy for us all under the shadow less sprigs
Of the confounded sun,
Turning to each other framed by a cerulean window
Showing us where we have settled, and that such a day has come.

Robert Rorabeck

Such A Quietly Incandescent Bloom

They say that horses running are so beautiful,
The way they get stopped up in the haunted Appalachians like Liquors corked into bottles,
Like pretty girls walking together to home after school,
Cocking their heads and listening to the Lions roar and to airplanes:
They have sweet slumber parties where they make their beds out
On the floor,
Underneath the airplanes they listen to the lions roar:
The sky seems to sail above them like an everlasting heirloom,
Rising just like the promises of sweet college all the way up above them,
Like highways with so much room,
With the pilots in the cathedrals and their ever burnished lofts:
The boys who talk to one another and who run their fingers through
The skies
So soft; and I dream of Alma while the sun makes love in the sky:
Her young brown body conducting through a room pulls everything
Indescribably nearer to her:
Such a quietly incandescent bloom.

Robert Rorabeck

Such A Virtuous House

If a serpent lives in my house with me
Let him live,
But take from him no fruit or gift that he might offer
To you,
But if Alma would come into my house
Then let her live
And accept anything that she might wish to bestow upon
You
Even if it is only for three nights; it cannot hurt and
Who knows what it might allow you to defeat further along
The slumbering paths
Of permanent stone where so many other heroes like you
Like petrified and sterile just because they didn't have the proper
Talismans
Cut cleanly like fruit in an orchard from Alma's gaze, while her Children lay weaned of suckling on the couch and watching
Television
Through a tremendous rainstorm which ushered you in Invitingly;
And I have promised her not to drink just so long as she gives her
Gifts to no one but me
And my guests; and if you are here tonight, then heed my words
And accept what wishes she might have for you,
Because you will have to set out again tomorrow, and it is such A dangerous world outside the soft green loci
And the peaceful resuscitations where Alma keeps such a virtuous house.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Glory That You Can Never Believe

The clairvoyance of well shot and well
Hung words steals away my breath;
And they turn all of the sky and earth green under the Parasols of comely hurricanes:
It does for me what beautiful people do in movies,
But it is only a representation of what you do for me,
Alma:
Now the earth of my country can grow anything:
Elephants sprout of blowing trumpets over the soft beds
Of new kittens,
And the softest metals of angels spring up from the Laughing spigots of the sky where
Not a single housewife has yet thought to move:
And you can drive your car all the way up to Ocala reading
Borges while your little sister laughs at you and says
You are in love;
And you can find a new house far removed from the yellow
Beds of yawning lions and the chartreuse dragonflies
Like laces of tears on their vests,
But I will find you: and I will always find you to make love
Or kill myself,
But never to harm you; but to hold your hand, while the Angels play cards in the sky until they put their hands down
And slip away into the boudoirs whose make-believe doors
Hide such glory that you can never believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Marvelous And Unfettered Wisdoms

Sustaining the angels' sleeping sounds,
Bodies clap the way they used to- and I am making love,
But not while sleeping in My father's house anymore: I am all alone out in the Prairie or in the darkened cradles of the cypress swamps;
And I am not dreaming of anyone
Save Alma, even if she doesn't believe me,
And is going back to her house again tonight:
It will be okay, because I remember the little pool in her belly Button milky with the sweat of the oysters and their Tongues,
The lucky glues we strung together too early to be remembered
By Christmas- but there,
As sure as forest fires pushing reindeer under the habituating
Clouds and further beneath the make believe loins
Of such marvelous and unfettered wisdoms.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Pretty Things

When she says
Such pretty things

It makes me want
To plant a garden in her mouth.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Proof

How can you see me weeping through the mountains-
The airplanes don't care that I've been doing this Hard mining for so long;
They are quick silver; they are almost superheroes surfed
By leggy courtesans;
But I don't see why you shouldn't care:
I've been lighting off these dysfunctional fireworks for So long, I've blown off both my thumbs but Still haven't scared off any of the eager young crocodiles;
And green copper canons long necked out on the terraplain
Are not a good cure for boredom;
And I should have buried you underneath the sneaky rose
Bushes when I had the chance,
Before your eyes could steal away my soul- haunting,
Sad that they had to go and kill the caterpillar today;
And I can almost smell you, you are so real to me, Sharon;
And, of course you don't care; you say, you'd smell the same
For any eager young man all sweaty having just done gone and Left the graveyard and water-skiing-
And the literary agents agree, that there are no mangroves in Saint Augustine, but it was a good try; but your beauty is just As anachronistic to my studded scars, so how could
It every be possible to open up an new store together and exist
On the same forbidden atmosphere as the very same invisible
Monsters whose footprints swallow entire clothing styles,
Who themselves are not very real;
And tonight another man's finger falls like a stricken canary
Poisoned first in the infected mine, such proof.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Tiny And Determined Things

I've been open for so long, that I am
Mapped by the elements, this furrowed brow.
I have noticed verifiable patterns when the ants parade,
Or in the steps they take to go underground once
The rain descends, as it does, especially
In the middle of the year; and above me
There are caves a blind man explores,
And above that the infrequent airplanes on Certain routes, and then the nimbus, usually like Sparse cauliflower flowering on blue table; and below me
Is the town, the whore house, and the gold mine;
And there are twins, one good and one evil,
A ferrier who is eventually drunk, but does good work;
And a woman who is so beautiful they use her to light
The streets, and she does steady business when the bowed Panners put down their tin saucers and look into her eyes;
She keeps the karats of gold tucked in her bosom;
Even now I can see her radiance, and its noon time,
And my cousin weeps because she is now with child,
But her husband has left on the train for Sacramento,
And I can do nothing about it, because I am out here,
Keeping for buzzards, ready to sound the alarm;
And yet the woman glows from such resilience I don't Know where it comes from, and she is singing, and Glory be to her, the hymns of children, and my cousin is singing along beside,
When soon her baby shall be out and tugging her;
Then there will be a new name in town, I can see down towards,
And I am so grateful that I would like to descend, and Become a part of that blossoming atmosphere, but what am I to do,
For to leave this place who put them at a vulnerability
That I should remain and wait out in vigilance,
And yet my burden seems shared, and even when I look away,
This Madame burns like the sun in my vision; so at night,
As I watch the ants proceed, the light she gives swaths them,
Like kerosene burning up on a stage, and they move in such Opulence, such tiny and determined things.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Troubling Things

I drink so much liquor that I find that I can Only climax with my special someone; but she is at home
In bed right now:
Who is she dreaming about, the purple flowers in my Green restaurants wonder:
And what is on the television: as the waves come, dying to make Peace,
As the ends of the earth are taken off into their lips
As if in a great amusement underneath where the bellies of the Airplanes bask,
And the dreams of the little boys, like grapes from her loins,
Reach up so far, uttering fabulous prayers of the richest sorts:
And words that I fear that I cannot even describe;
As the sisters of my muse bundle again to school: as I prepare to Leave her to sell other things,
And the nights get further on, even undressing the clothes that They don't have; and the only consolation is that
The soul of my muse- My Alma- doesn't have to worry about
Such troubling things.

Robert Rorabeck

Such Wolves And Perfect Gentlemen

And I will sit alongside the deep
Shelter of my apartment,
After that occasion where my parents
Have died,
On the mowed grass where it meets
Up with the quiet wall,
Where there is no better sport
Or other boys there to play,
Sit with my dog, my lucky dog,
In the anonymous shadows beside
The world,
Still sit writing about how I pack
Up and lie down and go fishing for her,
Even if she is already the ever ready
Seed fornicating in the wind, off
The lips of school buses,
And she is doing all the stuff
Healthy young women are being paid
To do by such wolves and perfect gentlemen.

Robert Rorabeck

Sucreased From Their Lovely Game

Every ornament in carport of the heavens, looking good
And flirting with the oceans that know
Our echoes- the push of our graveyards, and sometimes How swing sets still leap over the culling of their Mulling weddings:
It is there that their hearts drip, like irrigations for a vineyard
So far beneath the tufts of lilies,
Where alligators float like airplanes, and five year old
Princesses fly when they learn to swim,
As from the yard of a perfect white house they go down,
Causing stains and blood, and little chips in their once perfections
That will not go away;
But it only makes them more precious, as some lights go out
Absolutely far away- and I hurt myself again,
Kneeling in prayer through the dime sized caskets in the infinity
Sucreased from their lovely game.

Robert Rorabeck

Sudden And Violent Apparitions Of Love

Now is not the time for us
To remain motionless
In our beds so far away—
Let the spider bite your
Wrist,
Get in your green car and Drive toward me. Meet me
Out in my front yard. Draw
Your orange gun and riddle
Me with bullets.
Drop me with your love—
Let your eyes bore into me
Like a machine the first time
You've seen me in 10 years—
Then lay back and smoke.
Watch my dogs, my Best friends
Pull me apart, to draw out
And lap the vermillion
Pallette,
Until the sun is in the Branches,
And the moon pulls out the Colorlessness in my bones—
Then I can get up
And kiss you full-bore,
Like a machine myself—
We will dance under the spotty orchestra
As the blonde stars gyrate like gypsies
All night until the Sun rises to the surface
Again,
Summiting
And drawing back in the Colors
Which overflow the lake
Of sky,
Spilling upon the earth.
Then you drive away

And I die.

Robert Rorabeck

Suicidal Munchkin

Watching the Wizard of Oz,
I dream of Tyco Brahe's nose, and serious Fights between scientists and their Dwarfs;
And map paintings of stars and their hills;
And sadly, ever so sadly,
Erin- of dryads who have no love for mortal men:
Her busts are a ballad of a perfectly nipples
Power plant;
Her perfume the rich streams of auburn kelp
The gold fish show off through until they Are scooped out and made for prizes
Of redneck lovers at the fair;
But she does not need to worry, because I am
Too uneasy for Occam's Razor, Erin:
For easy love:
I am not beautiful Erin, and whoever you are loving
Right now,
It is a better love than I could return to you, if My face was a mirror for your vanity-
Tesla never made love to a woman, but he lived in Fancy hotels in Colorado Springs;
And he invented electricity until it was stolen away,
And I am left hanging;
And I only went away from you to find new inventions of Tender muses,
Of other high school valleys too beautiful to ever have Stopped romancing about, I suppose; Erin,
But do not feel uneasy; these are your dreams the laboratory
Mice are spinning,
And maybe I will buy a house under my imperfect
Angle underneath the distant Pleiades;
But please, please don't ever come to visit me.

Robert Rorabeck

Summer Dreams

Enjoy the dreams of this summer
For the flowers which grow here
Don't live long at all.
In the cathedral of giants,
Each one its own beautiful species,
If flawed,
Vicariously touching
By the workmen who flit
Here and there passing around the Feelings tattooed on their legs.
We grow together in the same valley.
Though we never meet,
We spend this daylight's eternity
Unbuttoned in welcome,
The grandeur of inescapable distance,
The sun and the moon our parents
Attending us through the hours,
Though far too distant to be understood.
Their same light lays upon us
Miles apart here and now,
I open my door and step outside Expectantly.

Robert Rorabeck

Summer Full Of Ferris Wheels

Empty baskets filling with sunlight,
Like girls enjoying the secrets of an uncompromising love—
The flowers laying with the hummingbirds in the Tin estuaries of a high school's drinking fountains—
Hours of a day spilling with adolescent bodies in shadowless
Rooms: here, I know where I've found you,
Finding you so many times, where eyes hardly meet,
Where wild animals do not exist—
Courts of stallions while she lays dreaming upon her desk,
And what desires she has in her
Dancing alive outside of these pantomimes—
She doesn't belong in a cage, but she is here—
And the sun rolls upon us equally, a summer full of Ferris Wheels.

Robert Rorabeck

Sun And Moon

Outside the glass panels smeared by
The persistent dogs,
There is another early afternoon where the Sunlight is bright and angling the shadows
Away, but giving them good definition
In compensation.
Up here is a long ways, as if she were Stretching to hang on to him, even so
In a few hours he will be leaving the valleys
Of her budded room, and though she may Weep with the sap and pollen, excreting fertility
As was her design, by morning he Will be back atop her again, and they will make Love for another rutting day, cooking the declivities
And blushing ridges of her earth,
Moaning on up to him that she is forever
Faithfully longing, even though every time he sees
Her there are new shoots of chlorophylled grass,
The slender blades of infants blue and green,
And absently budded organs filigreeing the humming
Stamens down beneath her, and elk in straggling herds
Down from the mountains, and geese away in the Overfilling waters and silt of the springtime meadow;
And stray hands of some amateur archaeologist have Turned up another mauve arrowhead,
And some heavy hoof has broken open a crystalline
Geode under her lip,
And another mountain lion has disappeared across the Mogion Rim,
As another barbed-wire fence is mended down on the flat
To the orchestra of flies through the sound-caves of
The old cow's skull,
So that he can never be sure of her promises,
Nor does he call her by name, but glides there upon her
Like a fat and ambitious philosopher, overly confident
And exhausted from his sojourns into the west,
Though never once does he question her, as he bights
Her lips of photo genesis, and her leaves roll like eyes.
Bending up to him, as if on the tips of her toes,

She calls his name and nibbles his shining chin,
But never does she think to mention her quieter yearnings
For the opulent clam-shell lights of her coyer gentleman,
The softer stranger of the cooling nights, whom the sun
Has yet suspected.

Robert Rorabeck

Sun And Night

And sun, and sun, and sun, and sun,
And night, and night, and night, and night.
We get up and revolve, eat, make love:
Some of us go down to the park and swing,
Some of us cry her name in sleep-
The beauty we do all of this for,
The opposite body we do not know,
But wish to handle with devilish alacrities-
I've climbed a tall mountain in Colorado when
It was past my bedtime, and the little boy coming down
With his parents told me it was too late;
But I climbed it anyway, the rolling back of false summits,
To see the hidden threshold the sun runs through after her.
The plaque placed near the end by a weeping mother
For the dead skier,
The marble aspens at her shivering throat,
All the dark things which come into this world,
And are twisted up and confused, and utterly beautiful.
And she is confused, when she takes his hand and draws him to bed.
Made-up but hesitant, her legs open another time
As dusk transcends and flint sparks her moans in the dimmed room:
All of this I've never seen, as I've never touched the inner course of Her thigh, never seen the things she shows him time and again,
The nocturnal budding of mammalian rosaries,
The clanging together of fleshed bones, the rights to lips
And bights of teeth, and tongues everywhere in the throws:
Somehow becomes mundane, the chalice sipped every evening,
And thus unappreciated, but not for me:
The unfamiliar lake where the women swim unabashedly nude,
Each of their fingers playing in their sorority's gay ring:
If she welcomed me with a coy nod, seeing where I
Have summited, seeing only me against the dozing clouds
Atop the drowsing world, the thin air I cut myself into for her,
And she called me down into the confusion of trees,
Where the light dwindles like a dying stream,
I would make a bed with her in the nettles and birds,
And coil into her unwinding through the apertures of surrender.
And sun, and sun, and sun, and sun,
And night, and night, and night, and night.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunbathing

Smells of delight and smells of genies: I have only so many Wishes-
The petting zoo is in the back of my neighborhood: My Alma,
My soul is slight enough to fit into a bag,
But she already has two children: I want to sing to her, and coax
Her into my house: I want to learn better Spanish to woo her,
To make her my chicana spouse;
And the ways are all entranced up again today, swallowing the Losing species down beside the meters of a parade:
I park my car and stand as tall as I can stand, and hold my vampired
Neck straight up to heal by the salted endives birthed from her,
Exhumed from the sun: For here is the most ancient tombs of Our species, still wreathing and broiling upwards, showing to our Forbearing angels the offspring of her green weddings:
She holds them up for a little while, spilled like wetted chandeliers from Her caesuras, and then they are lunged back down again
And disappear into the gowns of her eternal wedding, as she swims
Around in a dance that will last as long as a marble swirling in an Uncountable pool, lost by the nascent fingers of a child
As he plays a game, as his topless mother is sunbathing.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunday's Churchgoers

There are dead horses underground,
And there are people underground,
Some you know and
Some who know you.
When she walks by your crypt,
She looks so pretty-
Her lips pout the chartreuse
Eloquence of damp butterflies
On the battlefield,
All the sleeping men with open minds,
Their stomachs' new orgasms
Pollinate the field in many ways;
Their spores fly to glitter her eyelashes,
When she comes walking
Working after midnight,
All the dirty boys buried next to you
Wake up and offer her the worthless
Confederacy,
Everyone's spilled dreams
Licked up by the cats leaping out of the gutter.
Her fishnet stocking have her trapped
All night under the big willow.
Where you sit on the old marble
Facing eastwards, waiting redemption.
She's says over and over again
The you love her,
But those are just whispers in the Empty spaces between where cars move-
Maybe as she moans with unevolved hunger,
She makes the knife move
Spreading her wrists with Strawberry jam. The crows gather
All morning
Gossiping like churchgoers on Sunday.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunken Into The Lake

Lancelot of the green heart and other
Immature words—
Had an illegitimate son as pure as many gods—
Who sat with the bangle tigers
As he ate his lunch of peanut butter and Jelly at the zoo—
Galahad was the boy of Timbuktu—
Chosen by the angels to tie his shoe,
And quest for the Holy Grail:
It's what he did,
And this much is true—
He found it he, did,
But I don't know where—oh if—
Oh if I only knew—

I wouldn't have to bet on the races
Or go to work in the zoo—
But I've lost my habit of knowing what I'm doing and my wife
Run away with my shoe.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunlight In A Field Of Grass

I cut a honeydew into today, as the horses ran and played;
And then I stood for awhile beneath a red trailer
As maroon as a luxuriating sea; and then it didn't have to go
For awhile,
But it went- and the sun sailed its bravery as our last bit of Money was spent;
And Alma caressed our yards for awhile: she awakened and Spilled and there was the life of the seashore in her
Eyes:
Small change and anemones in her pocket: and I thought of Her as I was scarred:
How she has umbilical hernia: of how she cannot swim:
We made love on Friday- months ago, I held her up
And kissed her in the waves:
I cannot believe it: we made love yesterday, but it feels like another World, as she slips away with the unlucky bottles I have spilled-
A few footsteps: a thousand miles,
As she waits with her children beside the bus stops in the early Mornings of another school day: while the baseball diamonds rust,
And the ghosts of my adolescents keep catching
Sunlight in a field of grass that is no longer there.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunny Day's Fairy-Tale

I have the idea I can give anything over to you;
Or I can make you real, sung into the estuaries torpid
Over stones fumbling;
Here, your eyes are on the brink of little foxes,
And in the house at your lip my little boy is sailing airplanes
Made of creased paper to sleep atop ceiling fans:

They will burn. We will burn it all down for you, given Turns in the parks after all our peers have run away to Beautiful colleges where they learn: I will burn this whole
Town down for you, on Halloween or tomorrow:
I will ride my bicycles while they burn sugar-cane,
You will echo in the hallway of my penultimate scars.
I get new ones to avoid you, but it is impossible when you
Waif, when you slip naked amidst the shallows
And turn stiles.

I masturbate onto green carpet, or with the hall pass into empty
Lockers. Jason Schwartzbaum chews tobacco and we buzz
Through math. The little Jew, or the tiny architect:

Now how you've flown like a schooner with preternatural
Sails, how you smell like Dr. Pepper and shampoo,
And I molest this fairy-tale.
Even when I get up at 8,000 feet to feed the horses.
Even when my life is gone, and with my new scars I Am evolving, or I am a monster who has torn it all away from Me: You come, and the forest becomes a green hallway with Doors off to science or biology, and inside like a prism,
So many visions of you turned away, hung upon him,
Draped like dew on grass French-kissing, a hero;

if I come

For you we will both be defeated, but from the tops of mountains
Light suicides like daydreams, and little girls fall like Rain showers; and so I come, and the sugar-cane burns in the west,
And the marching band plays its drums in a thunderstorm;
Nakedly, she makes you out of clay with her barren hands to wait
For my breath to awaken, to kiss him in interludes thrumming, so I come: a fingerprint touching you under the broken down bus;

We skip class over the canal, and all this while I am
A machine whose purpose it is to hide and seek,
To awaken you from an oil slick chrysalis and watch you drive
Away humming to the instruments of fireworks and sad bonfires,
Your jawbone an opal cup magnetized over the steering-wheel,
Directing you to that great water; but there you see

Just the embers of rum and waves,
As your tune recedes in forgotten memory
How you wanted me to come out and play, and the Lions roared entrenched in their habitat; My heart but A tourist yours devoured, and then went along its sunny day.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunny Winter Sundays

The cross is missing her arms, so make love to her
As she rises in stilettos,
From the lake where she'd wish to play alone,
Even if the conquistadors, sunken in their metals,
Are forever grinning at her,
And the strong men who used to piss their pants
As whipping boys,
Do pushups on her concrete banks,
Wink and diminish the bullies and knife throwers;
And little boys, the evening's thoughts dive into Her womb, and clean her of the little hooks their fathers
Left behind; While their mothers are gossiping,
Doing their wash in her, and the water house sits
On her shoulder, spindling, weeping as it uses her
To crush the wheat;
Eventually, a family takes her name before they migrate,
The sound she made as she fell down the stairs,
And spreads out, forgetting how the rivulets fumbled
Down her green belly from her tits, spilling the lucky fish
And tadpoles lactated, and how I might once have dreamed
Floating beneath her chin in leafy axioms, that I was purring,
And she could hold me all at once in her dress and in Her eyes, that she might collect all of us, bathing in her
Until we understood, and paid her from our fields,
And gifted her with our dead grandfathers, weighted down
And mutely romanced into her bosom,
Where she kept our secrets with an enclave of eels,
Amputated, over spilling like a toilet when it rained, weeping
Out of her mouth and eyes that we should be so kind,
And not like the tourists who only baptized into her when There was ice-cream on sunny winter Sundays.

Robert Rorabeck

Sunset

Now the sun is on the lip of the canyon and
She is utterly biting him to keep him there
And outline her long body to the strange settlers in her;
But he will not tarry, for he is tired too,
And soon to sink into the dawns of China men,
Ladies in the atolls waiting for him with glasses of sweaty cherry,
Women with unlaced bikinis on the prows of long ships,
Knowing that he will soon enfold them with the blindness of a foreign language,
So he is eager to leave,
And I am watching his inevitable departure unpronounced through
The smeared glass. Ironically, not thinking of him,
But a woman five states over swimming in the humidity of two seas,
And wondering now if in any of these downcast motes,
Bits of her might have traveled subconsciously,
In the spores of the great valley, her legs open trying to seduce this king:
But he will hear no more of it, for now he is tired of her and
He weighs too much for this hemisphere, his hands
Pushing her back in the weeping shadows.
I try to distinguish her out of the spores of her fair city,
All the tardy and negligent children in their classes having Almost turned 30; and I am sure she is here, just as I'm Sure she could give a damn.

Robert Rorabeck

Superfluous Immodesty

Here is another one
Without a reason for you to give time to it;
A pinprick of blood arranged in an indecipherable
Letter of damaged love,
The last of the baby-teeth to dropp onto the white linen,
A pomegranate's edible jewel the crow picks
Like a ruby eye from the pocket of a prince;
An origami swan stuck in the photosynthesis
High up in the orange trees down the second row,
Being rained on by the busy noon:
A foible for the ghost in the parking garage:
Twist up me now like spindles in the sea,
The odd breath she takes amidst the rocks and shoals,
Where the ominous roses grow out of her lips,
The virgin gardens of her pallid thighs,
And let me curl up into you like high velocity DNA-
Unrecognize yourself in the window of crying fear,
And lay down on your cantaloupe breasts,
And let my fingers list the back road of spine,
The stem of your flower, the titanic hull of opal chests,
The dusty trundling down past the weeds where the canal murks;
Where the dragon-flies string jade in the columns' shadows,
Which marks you like a butterfly migrating and torn Over the Senora Desert,
Like a prism in a jewel of spit in the cup of blue bell
Hidden in the high flaxen grasses of Tool Box Draw,
Up past her knobby laughing knees with no skirt,
And nothing even, except for my words in hidden parts,
Like the drool of bees, like the sleep in the corner
Of the moon's squinting eye through the bowers of the witching glade;
All the brightness skipping up her back and lunching
There between her shoulder blades
While the aspens jingle like street performers,
The art of high altitude's necessity, and hunger's hallucinations,
And my lips like young birds chirping at the vase of your sultry neck,
Climbing over in little pecks, hungry for your lips
And the dimple of your chin,
Until your eyes reveal in the turning horizon of face, like perfect
Blue islands of shimmering grottos beneath the ceiling fan,

And there to speak once more the trophy inconsequential,
Indecencies I pull up by their thirsty roots with clumps of heady earth,
And offer to you once more, standing like a gloomy artist,
Who has postmarked all his reason to the arbitrary muse,
Thoughtless and indecent, someone you can barely remember,
Knocking too quietly on your door for you to recall,
Or to get up from the average kiss you give your every man.

Robert Rorabeck

Superfluous Screams

All these words are twirling waste
Down the toilet,
Dripping down the wet ears of
The sink hole's verdant ferns,
Sitting on the head of a sleeping monarch,
Being drowned in the salty undertow
Far away from the woman's ear,
The wishing well these little Silver worthless things were meant
To be received by
Like children shattered in a shallow cave—
I cannot see what I am doing anymore.
Driving in the rain, I close my eyes
And when I look again
I expect to see her standing naked
And suppliant, being caressed by
The storm and my headlights
As I run into her and watch
The old car make some kind
Of love for a second or less
Before the world starts spinning again,
The average everyday screams nobody
Hears because it is going on ceaselessly
In the cryptorchid bedrooms of Blue-collar kings and their azure bitches.
The sound that became when God
Got drunk and went to town,
Fertilized the Universe's womb,
And refused responsibility for life.
The background noise we make love
And die to. The song of her life
She is too busy dancing for
To care to hear the superfluous screams,
The organ grinder plays as his pet monkey
Tips his doll-sized hat to collect her change,
The priceless rhythm which seems to listen
To my very soul
Whenever her eyes pour down upon me.

Supernatural Uneasiness

Sometimes they will try to hide the heavens
While the trailer parks gleam with
Christmas trees
And the bicycles sleep alone next to the super markets
Closed
Beneath the preternatural mountains:
And I will say to myself, as the rivers are filled
With garden snakes-
After the rains have flooded the hibiscus,
Making them nude and pregnant:
That this was just a song I knew in color,
And they are probably making love right now,
And the Zephyrs are filled with ornaments-
Even though they are not making love,
Because she pleads for me alone in her bedroom as
Her heart makes similar perpetrations,
And she reaches towards me with supernatural
Uneasiness,
Even while she kisses her children driving them home
From school.

Robert Rorabeck

Supertramp

Christopher McCandless is Dead
But he was more alive
Than you have ever been.

Robert Rorabeck

Supposing It Will Not Rain

Early morning and
I've put down the narcissistic poem,
And all around the campus, like high school,
The students are finally going to sleep:
The sun is coming up,
And their stomachs are emptied on the Graffitied sidewalks,
And someone has written in wet concrete
In Old English: the moon,
Where it has been so long since I tasted wine
In the orange groves of Spain,
My aunt a mermaid fondled in the whiteness
Of Roman ruins,
Embedded and hyperventilating
From the sea's recessions,
And yet out on the ways of campus the flood lights
Glow like modern wombs,
And there are professors sleeping in the Foliage with new publications pressed to the Tweed over the purplish hearts,
Like badges,
Their glasses askance as they snore,
A grasshopper on their lip stuck by one leg,
Farting transcendently, a shedding jewel:
When they wake up, the Buddhists will be chanting,
And blond girls will be sunbathing,
And the preachers will have their say,
Shaking their firsts in the unbelievable sunlight
Cut in twain by the clock tower's slender phallus,
And the clouds will begin to move, redefining shade,
And the students will move in and out of that pattern,
Their eyes blinking rapidly,
As their legs exercise conditioned to the terrorisms
Of the routine;
And then she will yawn sleepily in his arms,
And watch a hummingbird float like an illusion
Outside the window, and the spider in the corner
Waiting to dance;
She will wipe away the drool and fondle his eyelashes

Until he notices her,
And this is when she will smile, not thinking
Of me, but supposing it will not rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Surceases

So you cried that you'd said
You'd thought that I'd been untrue:
Well,
Maybe your eyes were the overpowering
In the venal pestilence of aphrodisiacs
Of armpits,
And now I can hardly move:
And I've finished the bottle, and I'm breaking out
While the traffic moves;
And you are the soft, nose-pierced
Hypocrite with brown
Flowing eyes:
Who are you, with brown flowing eyes
But a woman for every man,
And I cannot move: and I refuse to move for Just anyone, and you are you but just Anyone,
While the traffic flows,
And I wait while the tied, ever ready,
Surceases.

Robert Rorabeck

Sure To Die

I never look you in the eye-
And what if that is the cause of the only loneliness
That I know:
That I can't be in charge of your tawny body,
Your winsome soul-
Places over the dilapidated fields that hold your Breath and take your weedy yield-
Why I didn't mow them for you,
Because I am afraid of sharks, and really afraid of lightning:
And my bad habits;
And not a single girl raises her head out of her walled Holes, to
Sniff the breeze of these words I sow;
But that is not what I am afraid of- I am afraid that I Must be going soon:
Suicide by cop or coon:
I loved you on the backside of the roller coaster,
On the dark side of the moon,
But the strange traffic just kept pausing to stare at my Strangely unsatisfied murder;
But that is not what I am afraid of- that these happenstances
Have been my folly,
That I should have been aroused, have been more jolly,
But I just kept shooting for you in the dark,
Censuring my swing sets, flatulating reveille in the airplaned
Twilight:
That fact is, Erin, you have a great set of eyes, and didn't
I mention those tits,
But your amber milk breastfeeds so many nitwits:
I know you said you read most all of this,
But I think you lie-
You just want another pool boy to feed you amber grapes
Before you die,
And you thought it might sad when it seemed that I might Crawl away to Colorado under another's flooded
Though just as insouciant banner- blue eyed;
But now you see where I lay, gut shot on the clay-
And either way, like my great great grandfather of civil war
History,

I hold my guts in moaning like toy soldiers
In plastic pails:
Either way- rich and swell,
For this or for the other,
I am sure to die.

Robert Rorabeck

Surely If They Are Real

Gods pledge their songs to girls,
And I want my liver damage to pass beneath the Tunnels
And the wind tunnels or Christmas, but all of this Isn't even real.

Alma:

That I have said I loved you, and I felt myself working beside
You all day,

And then I spun up all of these words for which there
Is no counter,

And now I am forever starving even though I have
So much meat:

And the letters come like the plagiarisms of classrooms
In the immense sunlight:

And I washed up after I made love to her, Alma:

I hope you might forgive me:

Maybe she will become my room mate, or maybe I will Starve with your name on my lips.

The last vestige of anything that believed or lived
Longer than Disney World,

And now this: and now this- the airplanes touching down
And grazing,

And all of my secret thoughts happening down upon the Low Lancelot grottos that aren't even real,

But have some time for teaching to themselves, while Heidi suckles, or feels the need to repeat the savage and Indian things unto which I am sure that you aren't Even sure if they are real.

Robert Rorabeck

Survival

Eager young repartees in the sand;
In the surf up to her ankles
Counting what the angels should have Skipped across the bay-
No more sangria, no more friends
My aunt is dead for maybe seven years a
Tourist in limbo,
Watching all the pretty colors and the Dwarfs,
Believe even while fainting that I could Defeat them all maybe by myself
Or with a paper sack of Dried seahorses;
But no one calls my bluff, no one calls
At all,
The voices echo the valentines spent on lovers
With sweet faces many high school ago
Who were not likewise infatuated;
This is how it must feel to know survival,
The kind generosity of dumb horses peppering
The fallow valley with steaming stuff,
And all the other words that are allusions
To the desire of her warm candidacy:
I know if I could hold her hand forever and feed
Her strawberries than all these other deaths
Would turn small
And amusing; and all of our children would Follow after our ceremonies, like echoes filling up
For awhile a glass, a bay,
A high school hallway shouting for the joy
Of every heart's needs for survival.

Robert Rorabeck

Swan At Some Distance

Bannered and awaiting the snows, don't
You sit and wait under your mountain of all things-
Like a dark eyed jewel:
Alone, on a dark road near sea level,
So far beneath you, I have sexual dreams of taking you
Along Southern Blvd,
And you are so needy and pressed
Like something god has been kind enough to Return; and you don't know how to play
Soccer; and I am a dream myself in roller-skates
In the crepuscule of soft dinners,
Your eyes engorging on the fictionalized ice-creams
Of that wild satellite that isn't even real.
A mollusk travels across the dog hair on my pillow,
Gets caught in the sharp tinsel of my scars;
And I awaken and moan. Even before I awaken, I sense
That it is the barren establishment the sun's strings are returning Me into- the silver fish blue lipped on the prow of his Apathetic ship- and here I've never been able to achieve
The rights of beauty. For there you are all done up
With your man, and I am left to strive alone in perpetually
Venal motions- freckled by a consumption of green
Scars, the vermilion decrepitude that used to make you think
From across the room that I might be a swan.

Robert Rorabeck

Swann's Way

I don't think I know you,
But the land is plentiful if unreal.
I really shouldn't be trying to be doing this anymore:
To turn your head from quite far away-
To take your hand when you are not looking,
And kiss each pruned knuckle for a start:
But I can't shake the feeling that I might be doing some good,
Or at least I am holding off the droughts of loneliness,
Remembering that I walk alone with you under the same sky,
Each of us singing songs only we can hear.
And there are people out there who I cannot remember,
But who remember me, though they may be very few,
And it is how I understand you in relationship to myself:
Unreasonably, I think of you ever day:
When my thoughts come in to the word upon awakening,
And when they drift away in the solitary bed at night,
And there sail through the courses of all the various Actions I would like to put in place with you,
As if I were the great entrepreneur and you my enterprise:
But I know I cannot fully understand this,
Just as when I read a novel too fully realized for me to grasp
In totality- Something by Proust, whose pages
Are full of the strange viaducts of another language,
Even though translated cannot come clearly to my tongue,
So I am left with a hazy recollection of the places and people
Spoken of, as if an impression of life blurred by the rains and mist
Out upon the open greens and picnics where people try their Best to meet; but I do understand the notion of love through you,
Be it a distant and infertile emotion, it is still one I wish to conclude,
And only through you, however unreasonable that may be;
I know such an unrequited venture may be perilous,
And in almost all certainty ill-advised, as even now you
Are letting the organs of your being sound out toward your more Reasonable loves, those males who occupy your proximity
And habit, but it is not my appetite to dine like ordinary people,
But to be a sad and reclusive thing hunkered down for all durations,
Thus writing to you again with unreserved sincerity through my flawed
But prodigious pen, that you might look up some dawn and Cast your thoughts far out in the gray and upset waves,

And thus risk the chance of drowning in the deepest furrows,
Only to be rewarded by a love that asks no quarter,
And will never surrender to the practical declivities,
But hopes for you the way a mountain rises unto the sky,
Thus piercing the greater meanings which surround us, ignoring
The masses' caprice, and thus we find ourselves lying down upon
The unmalleable table between the terra ferma and ether.

Robert Rorabeck

Swathing Synthetics

Bruised lips on a mannequin,
I can write of nothing more. There are houses
On the shore of the river, and her eyes
Are the gray green of a gothic romance.
I stare at them in pictures and lithographs,
And the shifty brail of sandpaper.
This is the girl I wanted to kiss, whose direction
I turned to when I performed my poetry on The stage of high school I was infamous for;
Because of her I asked my parents about marriage,
But what could they say,
For at my age they were too busy picking lettuce
In the sun chalked fields to fall in love,
The bitter romance of one of Hardy's novels,
And she remains as beautiful as Tess of the d'Urbervilles,
This girl; if I went back to college I could find
Her ghost, gray and whispering, whispering
Even words she should not recall, the red bricked
Halls of knowledgeable earth, the silky dreams
Awaken in hazarding light upon the soccer field's Pestilence; we have all slipped away, and to Return would only make us disappear in untrustworthy
Looks, but judging from what I can tell, her lips
Could still fill a well, and she is married
And busily entrepreneurial, and knows all about My swill. I should have stayed in the wrecked train cars
In California; I should not have left junior college,
Or listened to the guidance councilor, but I have Already written her a book filled with open wounds,
I wrote from the high basins and summits where looking Down her city was a swarm of sombulent fireflies,
Hibernating in the blanketing snows,
Burning glacial pools to clean their bodies,
And her husband is a good man, and she is a good woman
For him, and they will make money and children,
And fill the quiet spaces with the tide and undulations;
For this I know, her picture careworn from high school,
Her hands on the clay wheel where pottery spindles
Like little girls, and everything else that has grown up,

Gone away, is no longer real.

Robert Rorabeck

Swearing That The Pies Can Bake Another Day

Caveats in a panorama- A silly thrill,
A full room velvet blushing view for all of these Tourists standing up,
All ready to applaud, the rocketships being pulled Around and around again
By little boys on taught strings, like red nosed birds
Seeming to try and make love to the moon:
These easy words are like supermarket bouquets
Purchased without reason except for the high school
Crush who in high fever will pass for a day,
As a life passes for a day-
A young boy leaping over all of these flames,
The thorn-lipped coffins; and if you know me, I was Born in Michigan and that was where I ran away:
My first word was goat bare feet happily naked in
The wet clay where the Dutch were farming celery
As white as ghosts as white as kitchen sheets,
Belly-sick on dreams covered in a sheen of moths,
Like the paper throats of girls who have flown or swam
Away
To find their sailors, crinkling all the tinfoil in their Hand to make kissing balls,
Swearing that the pies can bake another day.

Robert Rorabeck

Swearing To My Abscent Steed

If I try again, as if taking myself to the graveyard,
Skipping the schools of light, to read here with the witches
Who never looked more beautiful,
The clouds gurgling a spell in the sky, and all of the little boys
Home in their castanets hunting for cartoons;
It is because I want your lips whispering in my whispering room;
And it feels right now as if the moon has the power to bring You straight over all of these streets that its luminance
Caretakes over,
And resurrects the call girls like weeds, and calls the alligators
To emerge from their aquatic seeds;
And it feels alright now even though the street lamps are Without a church, as I am without your brown body,
Alma:
It almost feels alright, while tomorrow you will do you laundry
And clean your room, in the house that your father promised to you:
Maybe it will almost be yours, as your family extends into the bright
Yard into which your clothes are drying their secrets
As the world spins,
And the graveyards speak like windmills, gossiping of I on My quixotic quest, imbibing the amber ness of your eyes,
And swearing to my absent steed that it should never have to end.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweet Commercials

Soft peat where golden monkeys sleep-
So like little men, with little thoughts of men,
And young mothers drive around when
They cannot sleep;
And I cannot sleep, thinking of young mothers
Wanting to buy them bicycles and take them around
Then- see all the neighborhoods of young men:
Want to see by the young vermilion neighborhoods
That I would like to take her in,
To put her in-
And stop doing this- stop wandering off into traffic,
Stop pushing ghostly and indigo trams,
Or looking for girls cut into narrow gauge railroads
In the deep wounded wildflower basins between mount-Ains-
Want to reciprocate more truthfully with her,
Wanting nothing but to work like a dog then for her,
And end up waking up looking into her far off eyes-
Everything on her wonderful and healing,
Beginning to sound like water un crystallizing,
And kiss and suckle her flesh and begin to really know her
Flesh,
The way our children should know it as well,
After school in rain showers before dinner, and during Sweet commercials.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweet Places On Her

Wishing wells so shallow they can't Hold a dollar's
Change,
Her eyes wonderfully obscure,
Disinterested by disasters of traffics and Tourisms,
By my comely midway where I've set
Up games for her,
Named after household pets I'd hope to drop
Into her under that Cerulean cathedral we've been swimming in
For all time:
I was the last holdout after all the buses had Gone home, caracoling their lost
Boys,
The gap-toothed causes of the fruitfully
Multiplied:
And she came after chorus, after pottery spinning,
Origami zoo-life threshed in her hair;
I told her I was a nocturnal time traveler
Out of my comfortable elements,
Out of liquor;
I wanted to know upon the places on her to put
My lips and suckling, imbibe;
But she just flaunted her ass like a laconic songbird
As she put on her skates,
And slid easily past me along the concrete
Tributaries under the steamy sun,
And I had gambled all my wishes in to her, but She shed them with her oily coat, every one.
The alligators followed her home with their insatiable
Thoughts,
But I couldn't even stand to walk out:
She had me done.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweet Safety Of Your Third Base

They make friends well before
Crepuscule
On the swing-sets the day before
Thanksgiving;
And they make their slight penumbra over
The lake
That you have forgotten,
The lake that will never be yours again because You lived too close to it
To be mindful of how important it was,
Even though men had dug:
Like bouquets they sold in the aisle of your Check out line,
Like the celebrities grinning there,
What I have always tried to become, digging up Pretty things from the roots of Suburban yards whose traffics aren't at home,
And the sky is a rosy bowl
Of drying flowers where the airplanes hover
Like the condiments of many-windowed wasps,
Silver and husked,
Just as diminutive as you were to me
All through college
Until you rose to the surface again and I saw your Eyes and thus without another thought
Gathered up in the background queue of Your bull pen and waited for those Men who superceded me in your heart to Prove unfaithful,
To swing empty love so that I might have a chance
Of hitting a grand slam through your house of Areolas and cards,
Or at least burning my legs into the loci of sweet
Safety of your third base.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweet Young Aeroplanes

Whiskey is good in the bare-assed parks of Absolute blindness,
And if you were here with me right now
You would be so tall and beautiful
It would take several men just to deliver your Mail,
But I would try to give you every gift ever made
With your birthstone,
While the waves set out and licked the feet of Early crosses
Where strange young pedestrians had to die
Out walking underneath the Spanish forts
Forever,
Or for a very long time, and I only know so many words,
And the bicycles are so lonely. They sit forever
Right in the sad and lonely garages of high school
English teachers,
Just like I sit out underneath the prayer flags and ghosts
Of sweet citrus
And dream of pressing my hips up against girls name
S-, but if she was really there she would absolutely
Destroy me,
So I continue walking alone, zigzagging down and then
Straight up again:
I've been to the Colorado river in the grand and juicy cut
At least three times,
And each time it is like bringing all of my senses up against Your wrist
And asking for sweet tips from your insouciant cloisters,
Like punches and pedals of stars
Who don't really know how beautiful they are
So far and high do they bloom their sorority that they even Rest their bare heads at night underneath the Moist and transitory tips of the wings of Sweet young aeroplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweet, Sweet Honey Beast

I am on my third beer,
And the world is still real,
And eyes are the easy illusions,
But the tricks are real-
And I am not Sylvia Plath,
I am not even her currying son:
And the sky is a waterslide of a slit throat,
And the sweet girls have so much fun
With the butchers,
With their bayoneted guns:
And there are still places in the word where
The ivory billed woodpeckers live,
But wherever they are it is haunted,
And my sisters are real and
They skin dive,
And cars are real and bee hives;
And Stephen King coughs up ghosts-
Ghosts with
C$nts and video games;
And her eyes are like the wings of paper airplanes,
Molting to the steady pecking of minnows underneath the Red holly on the other side of the canal;
And in the first and the last of every crepuscule I
Fashion myself the sweet smells
She puts off in her bedrooms far over my head;
And I almost thought the traffic was finally done
With its chromed surcease,
But down here it is never done, far to the eat
Of her sweet, sweet honey beast.

Robert Rorabeck

Sweeter Than The Orchards

Unicorn, you are not in my heart,
Because I've fallen across the canal and away from here-
Where will I end up,
Since I am not a wish in your well,
And the thunderbirds have lavished my throat but Not taught me how to sing-
And I wake up to the spectacle of a pretty world
Where the foxes and
The housewives go leaping- all of the pretty sort,
Given to words by themselves-
And if you study through the night, it is nothing for My knowledge- for the prettiest bridge is made
Of your shoulders,
And your skin is an apiary sweeter than the orchards
Of the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Swimming For Their Very Own Occupation

And I took her to her first volleyball game
At my high school-
There she was,
Apiary- and brown honey at my arm:
And I wrote for her,
And swayed into her, like the moon's sickle
From my front
Porch swing- until it didn't have to Pretend to be forever,
And yet it was beautiful- and from a long
Ways off threw up its arms
And headdresses and gave over all of its nations:
Into the sound of racecars
And adulterous housewives in the scrimshaw
And corrugations of the heavy metal of Another trailer park-
While their pink breasted and younger cousins
Sunbathed and swam in the chlorine
Which attracted to them
With some small change at the bottom,
Correlating them to some form of giant goldfish
Swimming for their very own occupation
In the strangely shadow less moats of another's
State fair.

Robert Rorabeck

Swimming My Tomorrows

The ocean is so close to me,
As if this overpass were a cradle:
The earliest stars are like her eyes to me,
And her lips an offering ladle;

The waves, they leap so far towards me,
As if they were women standing feverishly from a bath,
And the clouds the curtains half torn down,
From the sky's impassioned aftermath,

And in the mangrove where the turtles slow,
The roots of trees her knees at rest,
The fallen leaves her scattered memory,
Flowing waywardly in the torpid currents over spilling
In the sea,

Where she goes, the rivers lead,
Where she seeps, the current swallows,
In my eyes the closest memory, through jetsam's intercostals,

The sands are moribund and slipping along her neck,
Her breasts the dunes and hillocks,
Seabirds flight upon her breasts, and bury thistles
In her navel,

I could listen to her all day, wantonly breathing beneath
The humid skyways,
But she would not lay her eyes to me, for they are lain
Upon the vessel which strokes full steam along her memory,
And the men who walk it are white and capital;

She foams as she wreathes, pushing the porpoises
Along their bow and stern, just like little children playing
In the tub, squeaking and clean,
I guess she'll never learn,

That when I looked upon her so long ago,
I swallowed her most entirely, and now when she leaps
Away, naked and ephemeral, I am drowning naked in her

Swaying caesuras,
Hypnotized by the epiphany of her unclothed torso,

Which flips just like a dream in an underwater midway,
First in the thirsty sky, then in the salty stream,
Jaunting fast and shallow,
She can hardly remember who I was, but she is forever
Swimming my tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

Swinging From God's Smoky Chain

Best place to leave this earth,
Or any city men contrive,
Is around god's neck,
Just off the bridge his opals divide,
Down the river from where they Hang the prisoners, the spies:
And Benedict Arnold;

And ask him how you swing:
"You are semiprecious, and so I will Wear you when I am shopping,
And for the lesser pantheistic holidays,
But at home while I am entertaining
Dear friends,
I will wear better men than you-
Especially for Christmas and Easter,
Or at least truer, more precious criminals: "

"And where will you put me then? "

"In some graveyard laid out long ways
For a very long time-
There will be no more time for swimming pools
Or country clubs.
For adolescent, prepubescent friends:
Likely beside your family,
The very ones who killed you and put you
In the graveyard,

But I will keep your chains well oiled and Untangled,
Because I am very careful about all of my creatures Great or small"

"And you will not love me anymore?
And will I be forgotten, and endeavors given
Up to the typical contrivances of elementary school,
Forgotten and cannibalized on Declassified planets? "

"I say this, because you are semiprecious,
And you either wrote in a language everyone well understood
But never read;
Or you sold used cars. In any case,
I told you I would wear you while out
Shopping, because this has become such a dangerous
Neighborhood;
And I do not think that people should be glad or Desperate enough to force such a corpse from me,
Though that should be enough."

And I swung intermittently from god's bosom
The semiprecious stuff as if the sperm from any common
Whale, harpooned and taken from the sea with no loss
Of man or angels,
Though I was given to understand that it was enough."

Robert Rorabeck

Swinging In Her Tomorrow

It seems to be keeping things together:
The fox in the eyes of the girl who isn't even here:
In the playground before the sea:
The only thing that is hiding all of it from her is
The manmade dune that seems to Say, "I will protect you." Well then the sun
Smiled—and the lights came out
That had previously been selling off of the Ferris Wheels:
This was the most beautiful joy in the world
And it wasn't even his—
And as she swam in the shallow abysses—feeling
All of a brevity that wasn't even joy—
I remembered the echoes of another's knuckles
Rasping upon the thresh holds—
And whatever joy that may have once been—Left as if it was a clouded airplane from
Her eyes—and set off for those parts
That were barren and without swing-sets:
And whatever joy there remained, swinging in her tomorrow—
Happened to listen without her,
And kept talking to itself—as if she was already home.

Robert Rorabeck

Swings Of Iron Pyrite

I love you but I live alone in my park,
And my dogs get so scared they never bark;
And late at night I masturbate:
I hate that I do it,
On the swings of iron pyrite,
But its all I do:
I can barely spell it, but I do it,
And you are not here anymore:
You are gone into the common tourisms of Colorado:
Colorado; it is a beautiful place to be,
And I can hear another beer being opened:
My uncle Robert lives in Colorado;
Isn't he your unpublished hero living in the trailer parks
Of a never mind of never land.
Maybe you went to college in his backyard,
Maybe you unknowingly held is hand:
I can hardly communicate,
But I have made love to mountains.
They have taken your place:
I really wanted to make love to you,
When you said you wanted to be real,
Real;
But you are the center of the universe, inescapable;
That is place I want to lie into,
Like a terrapin down deep into the center of the crenulated
Bus;
Like ants marching away into their queen:
And, Dear S-,
I wish I was more beautiful so that I might fully configure to your Bloom;
But aren't you something now, with your daughter,
S-, and fully formed, and A-:
You will go on forever, I think:
I think you will go on forever,
Even after the rivers have refused to speak,
While I cant really know what I am doing:
I just want to make love to something good,
While even now all the Christmas trees are up and fully decorated,

Like the mothers of ancient times,
And maybe I will find my love again and banish her Again back into the kindergarten of your Open mouths,
Sweating, filled, and yet they still cannot speak.

Robert Rorabeck

Swing-Sets Above The Clouds

Pretty girls with bared brown
Shoulders
And prettier girls from Mexico
Slinging apples
In the fruiteria in the land of
Metamorphosis:
See how things change before the Wooden eyes of the marionettes
Hung on their wooden pegs
Beside the coat racks
Beneath the aurora borealis
In the middle of the night—
The cat and the fox
Making love and stealing all of their Gold,
The dolphins getting lost amidst
The washing machines—
And the daylight and the moonlight
Spinning,
Spinning like princesses up on
The screen in a movie theatre
Whose
Machinations never see conclusion:
Like the serpent hanging in a pitchfork of Orange trees,
Looks up through the bleeding clouds
To see the hidden steps of glory he Has fallen down from,
His beautiful sisters flying up there
In their perpetual swing-sets above the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

S-X With Ghosts

A dour search for houses haunts me
If I go into new places where the tourists are All sleeping,
And admire the green copper cannons crowning
The fort, which I've written of but never polished-
I say, give me a shot from liquor or a gun,
Or good friends who will never tell, but Always smile,
Give me a good girl with just two good legs that Could run a record mile,
And the anonymity of the perfect form fluttering like Storm clouds of sun birds from each of my Masturbating fingers, a grandmother who doesn't Judge me who is always looking up in the blue canopy
Of a southern shroud,
And a place for me to rest and bowl between classes,
Void of the human life of this era,
Of Mexicans who jeer me because I drink green beer
By the pool after midnight, weeping; and they jeer,
And give me good constant labor,
A mother and a father who almost understand me,
And the gumption of two faithful dogs- Then, without Anymore conjunctions or spells from the lips of conjugations
Of ancient languages I'm not good enough to understand,
Give me paranormal extracurricular activities upon the White satin sheets of an underage virgin while she is fetching
The eyes of boys so far away who will forever be too young
To die.

Robert Rorabeck

Sympathetic Revelries

No one's reading Sylvia Plathe,
But maybe its because the oven's baked the pie,
As outside the twins swing upside down
From each bough on the starfruit tree;
Once inside, the house will get up and walk
Away fulfilled, for at night its windows
Saw the folklore tangled around the rock garden
The rabbits died in by the disease of the pet werewolf;
That was before the sun came up and reformed
The boldness on the dunes, where soldiers
Practiced with the tortoise who got lost
When her lover blindfolded her and asked her
To get out of the bath; That day was the end
Of my grandparents, for she saw him kissing
The teller at the bank, and she bought an inflatable Raft and slept near the hair-lip of the canal, in
The ditch she dug; The alligators came to her
With boxes of chocolates and Robert Frost poetry, but she decided to be a spider-webbed ingénue,
And I built her a theatre from the fox-destroyed
Chicken-coop, and cut snowflakes to hang as I died, Shot through by arrows slung off-stage by my Little sister in a blond-wig chewing bubble gum;
My grandmother applauded, and I leaked
Ketchup. Afterwards, we made a cairn on a steamboat
And turned the canal into the Mississippi for the Evening, and set grandmother out while even then
He was laying a busty new woman like a cat on
A fence; thus another line bled into the next, and grandmother
Set out above the debutants and manatees; I am
Certain if she saw a mermaid on her way to the Atlantic,
She would have wept, as we rose from the dead and saw
Her off, applauding her with our sympathetic revelries.

Robert Rorabeck

Symphonies

If I choose to read my poems today,
And shirk the duties out beneath the sun,
Then I will surely come to you again,
Where you might be filling your car with gas,
Your eyes flirting with the day, leaping like
Little birds over the roving avenues,
Or you might be so hung over you can't even stand,
But lie down deeply breathing the luxuries of your man;
So rather than to think these shy thoughts,
And of the possibilities too ready to exist,
How your lips blister from the heat of a devil's kiss,
I shall rather finish up this little snack and walk outside
Again,
Let my faithful hounds leap and snip at the hair on my Chin, For I can believe the wounds of hurricanes go
Far away, and your lap dimpled by your navel flapped
Over while driving in your car,
Or your hair tucked over from the flirting breeze,
As you watch the surf slap the shore, uproariously epiphanied;
I should not come down your way again, for
The sunlight's legion of spears shines protectively,
And I should become a shadow less man,
Hypnotized by your forgetful symphony; Rather, let me
Roam outside and move upon my duty,
And let the day stretch far and wide, singing its own
Glorious symphony.

Robert Rorabeck

Tables Of Midnight

Some charm in the amusements of
A surreal peninsula-
Some uncton the dragon has drunken beneath
The conifers,
As the trucks are slowly toiling up the mountain,
As I sit at the porch
Of a lonely church,
Never forgetting how I've loved you,
Even after you've born one child after another-
And I am back here,
And you are in your little shop in the bosoms
Of those mountains-
In the cloisters that lay peppered from the Freckled heavens:
And I remain, contentedly trapped in the essences
Of your forgotten memory-
A marionette forever dancing, you've abandoned
To go see the fireworks
He lays out on the street for you- your child
Clapping,
And song birds up in their trees, silent for all the Space laid out in the tables of midnight.

Robert Rorabeck

Taboo Cousin

I want another sip of my cheap rum,
I want to make friends and stay for awhile
After recess,
Fondling her, pretending that she is real,
As the sky goes ever upwards, warbling,
A not for profit opera I heard not too long ago
In New Mexico north of Sante Fe when Evan stopped the car so I could take a leak:
I want to look out my trailer's window and see
A dowry of virgins manhandling my name,
Stretching far up to hang it in the lights
So that steady stream of traffic can study me;
And I want, of course, to be entirely different than These chubby tourists smiling fool-toothed,
Sated of their adolescent pornography, on cakes
And sugary professions: I want to slip barefooted
Into the sea and feel her caressing me,
Understanding my inalienable needs for possessing her,
For buying her gifts even though I am already married,
For sleeping in the darkness across from her porch and
With my eyes caressing her:
I want to make love to her quietly in the shadows,
Alone in the bathroom, my eyes closed, impregnated by Her face, painting flesh, making her become the unavoidable pleasures,
To publish myself inside of her,
And then to get out of her way as she goes down the Safe path to grandmother's, her baskets swinging like her
Hips the decadents sweets she gives for free to woodcutters
And firefighters and lost men down at the dog track,
Whom she snaps her fingers to make them come her way,
Her body smiling to the fishermen in the river,
Her senses she has never thought to gift for me,
Even though I hang out all night and howl for her quietly in My way, making a religion of insolent things,
Making her my taboo cousin, indifferent though by right unquestionably Beautiful, the unrequited recipient of my gift of nothing,
Of many things.

Tail Fins Of Vanished Day

Leading beauty by the hand around my place
Mausoleums of sure imprisonment-
Seems like every marble slab holds traces of her
Elusive element:
Look at how she flames and dies in a smorgass
Board of rich decay-
The pretty legged road kill squashed into the Roadside tundra of rich foray-
And I told her I loved her, and she tossed her head
And she flamed and died,
And her body rose up a fountain of emollition,
Or I suppose she got into the truck with the other,
Sweeter toothed man,
And I just couldn't look off as the yellows faded
Into the grave- and crepuscule bitterly licked the Tail fins of vanished day.

Robert Rorabeck

Take Me Away

My farts smell like the paramours of death,
And I no longer rhyme-
I'll only climb mountains if they reside under Rain clouds.
All the paraphernalia of dead Indians I've Already dug up and sold to the Grocery store-
She has a child, and the day is long-
If taking on the bus, the fieldtrip is infinite and Filled with the troubling reflections
Ricocheting from the tinted windows of Social banishment;
And I have to dogs, and a poem now and then,
Whistled to the woodpile chipped from
The green;
And I have no clothes to wear, as I am about to go Into debt, or maybe I'll break into the Castillo de San Marcos and light of green cannons
And fireworks for the tourists-
Maybe I'll kill one donkey, like in the movie you
Don't know,
But no one will ever read a thing about me,
For these are the babblings of a shunt,
Triaged in a muscled viaduct, waiting out the war,
Listening the trundle of the tourists prattle,
My mother is making love upstairs, or coming down
From the shower; I've almost saved up enough money to Buy someone else love
While she cleans her plate, the crabs legs like the Armor of a knight eaten by a witch;
And as she gets up to leave, cradling new life from
The crinoline and poisonous holy of her flesh,
She never suspects that I've been sleeping underneath
The pylons this whole time, waiting for her to finish
So that the tide mighty hurry up
And take me away.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking Away Grandfathers

Fat as rainbows belching into the city
And in the suburban yards one or two city cypress
As new as truant children skipping from school;
And if you look into the mouths where lions yawn,
Whole kaleidoscopes filled with city school
Buses,
And the long, young yards cut up by palmettos:
When it rains tender hooks- the alligators snore,
And you spend a long, young time
Passing smoke between the mouths- and Roman Candles send up hopeless flares to the Finnish bellies of the airplanes who go and then leave
Like holidays,
Spreading their arms like superheroes- and then Taking away grandfathers or whoever once existed
Before your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking From Our Open Hands

The passersby who saws us said of us that whoever
Made us do not live here anymore,
Because our house was humbled without a roof, letting in the elements
A bed of many seasons leaves,
And sometimes wolves- a tenement of witches for when they were
On their way,
But sometimes feral strawberries, and boys with birthmarks:
And it was a beautiful place to be torn down with you, like wall of Tumbled stanzas
Beneath the soft green witchcraft of those forgotten plates:
The dragons who'd lived there defeated as beautiful decorations for Girls who still never could belong to those princess:
And you and I both suffering our final metamorphosis some time ago,
Not even forget-me-nots anymore, as the river as superficial
As unspoken lace crept through the green tufts and then away:
And the little footprints who gathered there in thirst séances,
With the little brown souls, the offspring of forgotten creatures who we Once fed our love to, their hungry mouths taking from our open hands.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking It Nice And Slow

Seahorses in carriages of kelp don't Have so long to go for the day;
They just sway and sway and say their peace;
They are very penitent,
These doppelgangers of the sea too diminutive
To be useful to men;
And the mermaids are not real anyway,
Fish can hardly dream,
So who do they have to love; and they laugh
When they think this way,
For they are free; and yet they float there, in Musk clouds of equine roe;
Curling in the nimble designs of Obscure phobias,
They seem to sway forever, but they don't;
And the airy traffic rolls across their beds, taking
It nice and slow.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking My Place In His Grave

I start over- I start over and believe in guardian angels:
That's who I was in kindergarten,
Yet molested by the long hungry drive-
Still entertained by the trees hung-over the tin
And plastic grief of the pet cemetery:
All houses were enormous- All cars were divine:
I'd never drunken liquor, but she'd already shown me her
Thing:
The agelessness of shells is everywhere, in the road
Where the puppies play,
In the pornographies hidden in the cars underneath the Australian pines;
How I had my first troubling kiss under or around the Hibiscus by a girl I didn't mind- Maybe she was much older
Than me; Maybe she was an aunt with brown,
Brown eyes:
Now I've sipped airplanes and my first beer;
And I'm really trying to do well-
Trying to do better, but I can barely get a grasp on it:
I can barely sing, and the kidnappers are prowling the streets
And my corn bushel can hold only so many fireworks;
And I wouldn't so much like to wake up the world,
As I would one single girl- One single good girl;
It doesn't matter her colors, or her songs-
But that she should strike across me like a match run across
The apex of the first house I can remember, to strike a fire in me
That does away with all the other fires, the fires of liquor and Grief, the boom slang, necrotic fires that her careless Disney World Struck into me even as she got in the car and sped off to Her hideous wedding with the body who would become
Her husband while I took his place in the grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking Shelter In The Rain

Marmoset underneath the mountain,
Taking shelter in the rain- how pretty you look
When no one else is at home,
Underneath the empty house- the evergreens
Dripping- the cat well fed and indoors:
The lights of the town in a cul-de-sac at the Basin's armpit nearly out: an entire town sleeping, Almost filled with ghosts, because the Tourists have leapt back near the sea- as if the
The fields in between were lighted by candles:
And the entire country was some kind of mass,
While I fitted all alone and weeping like a crocodile
Beside the canal- and thought of you,
All warm and dry, with your winter's store buried
Close- and her children cooing in a cradle
That sang beneath the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Taking Their Own Turns

Tired eyes of daydreams: and I think it is going to rain,
As the cars eventually stop as we have to stop making love:
And the armadas cool plasticine in the toy oceans of their hobbies
And then it gets okay to believe:
Especially in the Appalachians, the bodies moving in the organized
Masses like the sororities of feathers in the chief's headdress:
Even while everything else that never had to be, doesn't have to move:
And we drink our glasses until there are ghosts:
And I have to admit that there never actually was roses outlining
The beauties bicycling to and from the university:
And this is why you hired me this way: to be your own private eye
As the rains came over the limestone that were digging their own
Graves:
The sinkholes who liked the idea of discovering something, leaving
Their whitewashed girlfriends behind in their restaurants,
And practicing, and practicing like their favorite baseball teams:
Even while the cannibal and the bluest of the jays ate their own
Song, flattering their wings like the blowing out of candles
Across and through the erudite passes lining
The cadmiums and velvets of their very own graves:
Like lovers who left love notes of their open throats: for themselves,
Alma- in which you are likened to me:
And we sing this way, passing our breaths through the singsongs and Wishes of awake and sleep: loving you openly through the brashness of Classrooms that glow their own ways, like casinos of souls who Open themselves up on Sundays, and then turn around like school busses
In a honey sweet apiary, taking their own turns at kissing themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

Tales In A Poem

Tales in a poem in a womb
Of death—
I saw you there, standing above
The goldfish and holding your Last breathe—
Wishes given to the stolen bicycles
Sunken beneath the fields—
And other wishes that come in time—
The airplanes taking off in warm
Streaks upon the sky—
The house cats bending down
To lick the canals
Where the alligators have been
Crying
And old muses have been sending
Their curses of loud music
Towards me—
Even after the fairgrounds
Have melted away,
And my first child is bound to be Born come tomorrow—
In the April showers of those fields.

Robert Rorabeck

Talking Turkey

They say my poetry is to be taught in Turkey,
So I don't see a need to make much of money,
As I am already fully invested
In the enterprises of the lavish poor,

But I still like to look good for my honey.
I am a dandelion in full spore.
Yes, I am ripe and fat for my honey,
And my children are keen to explore;

But my sister has already won the turney,
So my other sweet sister, who I adore,
I'll gladly settle for second if you'll Go sweet for thirds,

Or we can just sit by and watch the ambling traffic,
And show these pin suited commuters our birds.

Robert Rorabeck

Tapered Across The Salty Grave

Now we have especially fond windmills that play
Cards over our houses:
The house if filled with cats, the field with mice;
And the silent joys of rum burn upon my lips,
As my mother finally gets up from counting the bills
And goes into the bathroom to look at herself:
My mother is very beautiful: She is probably while I am still Searching for beauty,
Why I am still unmarried: I get mistaken every day for her Brother or her boyfriend, and I count myself lucky:
She still looks so young standing next to the candles of her
Unlucky wedding,
But I no longer want to marry a white woman: My mother is Beautiful, but she is incredulous and republican:
The manipulation of the migrant worker under the penumbras
Of our Disney World continues to murder the unicorns;
And I love Alma now, my very soul:
She will never love me, but there are other Mexican women to love:
You have to get them while they are very, very young if you don't Want to raise another vato's children, but I don't Mind the extra work, because it is just a little more to love
Before I fall down forever more like a hoary raven, an angel
Turned to ash by revenging lighting to kiss the proverbial lips
And the carbuncles tapered across the salty grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Tarantula

As a religion, you should be holy.
When you look out your window, the sea should Shine her enchanted motes off the roofs of Chevys,
Like signals from a mirror from the underwater angels.
I can take a long walk in the woods to meet you,
But all you'll give me is your cat to watch as you go away.
The students are flowing to their classrooms like currents,
Some graduate like dying, and others keep on sleeping.
You like it best when you can serve them, teases for which They tip you when you should already be another,
All your friends just want to hurt you- You are in the movies,
In the reams of extra footage they cut out to keep the budget,
But I stay long afterwards; all night I sleep in you, and You speak outward with lips as large as black and white water buffalo.
We may have different viewpoints, but we share the same constellation,
But you sound like you don't wish to know me,
But I don't know if you have a choice not to. It is raining
Outside your castle, and if you peer out your window, you
Will see the man of your dreams slaying dragons and cop cars
For you, but if you chance to look behind him, you might see me
Nodding in the shadows, typing the continuations of the plot.
This is the denouement arisen from the struggle, where I climb up
And cup you, and kiss your lips like watering with enthusiasm,
And you cant help but not to kiss me back with all your poison;
Withering, I am falling, and all of your night is laid out like a peninsula
For coffin, with shaved legs so that I couldn't look at your nature, How pretty it felt to be done in by a princess, but
- As a religion, you should be holy.

Robert Rorabeck

Tattoos Of Your Essential Heavens

Now the fire dies here because you cannot come:
This Friday of October:
Alma- and you cannot call me, only when your children
Are entranced by cartoons,
And your husband is smoking cartons in his cousin's
Land;
And you are brightened by tears- you make cenotaphs wet,
And my dreams come:
The excellent angels cut their wings on the letters I can Never send,
Because you have muted their throats with your brown undecided ness;
And this life is short, and the traffics long, drying out
Like the unused lamentations of spells spilled far away from
The orange grove's where your in law lives,
And chastises you for now knowing how to hold a broom:
But now you will lay down with him:
He doesn't respect you, but he has your children,
And a big chunk of your important flesh,
Like an apple in your throat:
I don't think you can ever swim away; but listen as I get Drunk, and swim around your firehouses,
Burning my paper airplanes around your doused soul:
Just waiting for one to hit,
And flambé the love letters of my dessert all over the fabulous
Tattoos of your essential heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Taxing Reality

If the light camps like touring angels,
Overweight and bowing the ply wall;
Then you know it is good, and dinner is ready;
As all out in the yard the miniature icebergs
Are parked underneath the streetlights some Famished scientist invented to fulfill his Dysfunctional love, and I know that all the horses are gone,
And all the pretty girls roller-skated home so many Decades ago; and like morning, all of the housewives
Are very fine, if they should ever come and show Themselves again to the comely crowns crowing at their windows;
And then they just might know the world is real,
With so many fine knives in the kitchen, and the yards
Are mowed.
If the pools are glistening like the sad introductions of Busted holidays; and all the cars are repossessed haughtily from their
And their bonded sisters' driveways; then they too will know
That it is another world that is just as sure of its Taxing reality.

Robert Rorabeck

Tearless

Oh what a wound, and now all of this prancing through
The sea:
All of the bright and yellow bits that are soon to dying:
I lived right here,
And all of my life, in the prancing yellows, smiling
Looking too good for my presupposed wife:
While my all of nothing
Reads not a thing- and it all keeps to happening, through the Brilliant dance of death and all of this rain:
And, yes, it all goes down- down the drain:
All of my spelling wishes, and all of my hapless tears: they bring Nothing to my wishes: the rocks are barren,
Moonlit swept,
As if answering to the nothing that lives here: the airplanes flying
Ever constantly, carelessly and tearless
While moonlit monsters spin their arms, stationary,
And ever fearless:
And the hapless knights ride out ever jubilant, and tearless,
The moon abiding by them, glowing across the hedgerows
And the vermilion sororities of housewives,
Tearless.

Robert Rorabeck

Tearless Joys

Recoiled into a grotto and sleeping away its Productive hours:
The way they say that he slipped away from her,
And made a love to her in another way in his own
Flowers;
As the storms rose up from the horns of sunken
Reindeer,
Just as from the armpits of the undercurrents of conquistadors:
Boiling like ants,
Fireworks for their unadulterated queen:
Meaning to mean something- acne in the grass, under the Sun-
The pretty disfigurement of paper snowflakes, the games of Plastic boys,
And the shallow graves of cowboys- rehearsing to the Silly girls they love and love again,
Showing off to the heartbroken crocodiles, their make-believe
And tearless joys.

Robert Rorabeck

Tears From Prison

I grab the crystal doorknob of your navel;
Now you are a sea-witch,
A selky, in each of your eyes inland seas;
Your body is made of deep coral or coquina,
The same stuff as the Castillo del San Marco;
And I enter you illegally and sleep in the powder magazine
Of your throat- Osceola comes in your tears and thunderstorms,
And my greatest ambition is to build a house by you
On the artificial sands piled above mangroves,
From my backdoor see through the amber shoots and the crooks
Where fisherman sleep floating on green skiffs,
Amidst drinking tubers where the dancing girl floats
With wavering eyes, now dolly of the tide, sashaying in the Fermentations of languid immortality: John D. McDonald
Wrote about her too, just off the dirt road where you skip Down to school- And all your things buried there up to The neck like a hypnotized chicken in the dune: It is a buyers market-
I have on my face the imprint of sand dollars, like dark areolas
Pressed in the drool, like tears from prison;
And where I would lay down I would like to hear the sea,
Which is only a promise of you, not a contract of privateers
Or the immolations of rum: though, certainly, I hope for that as A wind fall.
I write novels for that and send them out in symbolic bottles,
Hoping they will come back to me published for your eyes,
Gems of the enraptured senses give me metamorphosis and ride;
I could love you from pictures take of your grandparents,
I knew- And even if the world should never known my name,
In happenstance or echo, I have known yours and whispered it from Afar, after tourism has receded like the tide, and the fort of so many Eons lays empty except for shadows
Which sprawl like your naked body on my mind.

Robert Rorabeck

Tears Of Its Canal

Ribbons threaded in the tumbleweeds happening again
Into the forests beside the highway:
Coming again into her, and remembering all of their Catholic Prayers,
Like starting up the mountain while falling down into the Shadowless cave,
Striking up the preserves in a majesty as it evaporates:
Perloined into the recesses of automobiles,
Giving all of its love like glass pennies up into a river-
Feverish, haunting
Convenient stores where you can get gas and blow- jobs;
And the other things that sing to the haunts of the human senses:
Singing like the recordings of the ancestors played
To the jungle
As it thumps its throat, laying down its throbbing cadaver,
Like a murderous rose, like an insatiable mouse on the Lottery of a luckless elephant,
And does away with her ballerina dreams, as it dries up the make Believe tears of its canal:
As it eats itself.

Robert Rorabeck

Teenage Coffins

Scar of a nightingale, sing to me of gunfighters,
And lets make a movie in the hollow of a tree.
When I was seventeen and ran my fingers down your throat,
I waited out the window, and you opened- I cleaned your boat;
And other men after me, going down the week;
Smoking Chinese dragons coming through your window,
A parade of men haunting underneath bed sheets-

What needed you from me took only a day or two,
We smoked in the sunken grotto beneath the hem of the sea-wall;
I got drunk for seventh period History; George Washington
Was crossing the Delaware in a pink wig, pointing ostentatiously,
Floating on my rum; the ice melted from bad poetry,
The lady shook it in the lake; we all went down to meet her,
And baptized for badness' sake- I wanted to love you like
A dog, and lick you like a frogs' backside: You showed me how to get there:

Or you keyed my cherry red car. They had parades in the red hearted
Court, and rides that turned around flipping spitted sin up to the heavens;
I watched him drawing blood from your neck, his teeth a regular syringe:

Then, and on and on, the alligators fornicated on the lawn.
The little girl in her training bra hanging like tinsel down from the Cypress' arm; To cut it short, I drank the port and f-ed your mom
In the jubilant shade of suburbia's teal tennis court, and hydrangeas-
I failed the report; but the nights remain so long and humid, drawn Out like a cancerous divorce, I followed the trained otters up the easement where

The sisters in law are Siamese twins, you've never met them.
They let me in, I bump both of their chins on a gold knobbed four Post bed while we watch the weather forecast, and their professional Jewish husbands
Drive confusedly around the landscaped cul-de-sac. You want it Back, you want it back? But I won't let you in. My opera is far away
In the canopy of the savage Amazon, where the cannibals exclaim that
The white man he taste just like chicken-

I wanted to cup your breast and pop your hymen,

To lay you down and ornament the mowed and dewy yard, but you kept me waiting
In the pews while perusing your jockeys and greasers under the bleachers in seizures of Epileptic sin: Now the day is dust and the school is a graveyard full
Of rusting teenage coffins, squealing Amen!

Robert Rorabeck

Tell Alma

I tell Alma to tell me she loves me:
She tells me she loves me,
And then she has to go away: She's already driving on Cherry,
And soon she will be home: she just wants to sleep-
The airplanes are touching down.
She wears my gold, and eats my cake-
All of my wishes are for her- and I have felt her brown
Skin across mine,
The way an otter might make love to an eel, but I wont talk to her again
Until morning- and I wont see her for a week:
My muse- I once bought a bicycle for her
That I only had to return,
But I kissed her in the waves, even though she could Not swim-
I took her into the sea, and I will take her back in again.

Robert Rorabeck

Telluride

Paleolithic telluride you show your new teeth,
Uninhabited by modern man: no one skis:
Tourism of glistening caves, the bravery of no modern Beast,
Or the populations of the equality of franchise:
Telluride, telluride: what features grew in the valley of Your bosom:
What lizards did you know, or what seas stroked you:
Gleaming altogether atop another place on this earth:
Floating here like a hobo and looking so white:
Telluride, Telluride, oh the depth of your primordial night,
Now diademed by insular poles,
And the big trucks float atop of your rind when almost Yesterday you were nameless and unbound and the snowflakes
That covered your pullulating body were truly gargantuan:
Telluride, uncut chariot of the powerful divide,
The roots of your monolith are truly more barbaric than ancient Rome: you use to be a wilderness unto your self,
But now sororities can ride right through you screaming breathlessly,
Telluride, and there are lifts up to your pinnacles pulled
By the moon's tide: Telluride, what preternatural gifts do you Still bare inside?

Robert Rorabeck

Temporary

Another day upon which the distance cannot be Speculated,
The beautiful dance of boys and girls in their own worlds,
The slightly less effective gravitations of limbed bodies,
Grandmothers warm in summertime caskets atop the hills,
The conductors chimney smoking near the devil's rock,
Calling out the hours of arrivals and departures,
And dad upstairs sweeping:
I dream, I dream of little things, of fresh mowed grass
And how a manned dragonfly happens upon a woman's pungently shampooed hair;
Or a marriage bed and children, flitting there:
a daughter to name
Temporary, a bright spot in the yard and dogs
Leaping cheeky. I could go to work right now, forget my dreams, Put on a fine gentlemanly outfit and Take a woman's hand that brushes next to mine by our Shared happenstance- Waitresses do it all the time. They Fall so sublimely for what lies next to them,
Salivating over what is served instead of what might be Searched for- In the morning the sky will clear, and my fingers
Will yawn- They will winnow like sailors stretching a tawny Sail. The entire world will be opening, comely and Well stated, and I will wonder where all the beautiful women
Have gone, enchanted by their happenstance- I will Buy a little house beside their rivers and wait for them handily in my verdant yard:
That will be my job until one notices me,
Perhaps a sommelier with blue eyes, and stops along her way
To wherever she was being taken,
Disentangling her garments from the course,
And vowing in time to know the fair weather which blows
About my head the way a young mountain may sometimes Attract the curious clouds,
And perambulating with her towards the various rooms,
I will ask her what she thinks of the name Temporary,
For a girl, a daughter,
And if there is any work she needs doing.

Ten Dollar Wine

I bend and swig:
Bend and swing—
Like some monolithic contraption
That still has to go to school
Tomorrow—
And I realize that I had other muses,
Positively delightful
Both before and After you—
And I have been to China—
It is where I got my wife.
She is in the other room
Humming,
And in another month we Will have a child—
While I drink ten dollar wine
And try not to disrupt her happiness
As I get to my penny-ante art for
A little while—reading lines
I thought for you, the one who stole
My heart, before realizing that they Were the woman who Stole my heart beforehand.

Robert Rorabeck

Tender Box For Banshees

Brown as a tender box for banshees:
And the ageless alligators resting beside the firehouse
With grins as old as death,
The housewives took their stark white children to to Learn how to become tourists;
And it all felt like a dream on the television,
The snow an unequaled sorority over the vespers of Her shoulder blades,
While in the dead center of night the wolf who'd learned How to walk like a gentleman came to knock just
As structured as a fable:
But this is how our story ends, with nothing more to be Said that details of how he might or might not have Been let in to vanquish her.

Robert Rorabeck

Terrors Of Another Midnight

Habitation of the playgrounds while
I am asleep,
And the waves come, like ants over the Glowing cupboards underneath the moonlight
Where the unhealthy ships dock,
And all of this becomes unsettlingly routine—
And we buy a house in a cul-de-sac north or South of Disney World—
The buzzards are left to fight and settle over
The detritus—
The muses disrobe and make love to the Absolute midnight,
While we are forced to sleep with our wives,
Who are berthing the candles of our souls
As the sailors drink rum
And try to make it through the deadliest
Terrors of another midnight.

Robert Rorabeck

Than That

I love you and I just want to be Near you before I die,
As I give up and flutter to the stinking worms.
I know you cant ever love me:
I am not your amusement, your parkland, estuary,
Of consequent geyser;
But I just want to rest under your shadow like a pink
Tombstone:
I just want to know your math before my last Breath,
Before I give up and burnish the ghastly stones
Of my forbearers,
My green army men and all that gas the neighbors
Have been gossiping about,
Sharon- that's all I want to do. I don't know what Happened. I am a good man, but I have never been Able to give up on a woman, as They just get better and better and more higher up,
As they are taking away more of my breath
And ever constant exertions,
S- I love E- like a plague of locusts,
But she didn't return, she didn't circulate underneath the Chandeliers of my easy parasols:
I want to be loved by someone I love,
As the grapes glow like holy vestibules, like prayers
Of light bulbs to the blue and milky moon
Who suppose she can be every color to every man,
And just doesn't care anymore than that.

Robert Rorabeck

Than What You Do To Me

Discovering just what I need to do rightly
By you:
Discovering nothing at all of where you sleep,
What fabulous lingerie and whose boy has Cradled you;
But it must be a joyful word too transcendental
Saddled up next to nature:
You can step outside and smoke and pee;
You never have to go inside for shelter, or when You are wounded and are in need of healing,
Or you are thinking of your mother
And trying to wish for her. Maybe the stars gallop
Over your blond forehead,
Over the medley of broken hibiscus and wilting palms
In that yard,
The overgrown smorgasbord of banana spiders;
All I know is that you were kicked out of high school,
And never had to see the flame dying in my eyes,
The buses turning away:
You had your own hope and kisses given away to others
Boys even more delinquent than eye;
But now what is most beautiful about you
Is that you could never be any more professional than What you do to me.

Robert Rorabeck

That Absent Minded Kiss That You Done

I see you running with your coffins every day,
Like the paleness in the throat of a cottonmouth
Come up to bask in the sunlight of Lascivious housewives topless on the easement,
And I've been driving my canoe instead
Of attending math and history,
And you light upon my hand just as happy as some Kind of pestilent and morbid flower,
And kiss me for a very long throw,
And giving your venoms into my blood like a backwards
Bank robbery,
So slowly I lie down and moan your name forever
Even after you have slipped your tail back in the Water to eat the folklore of white rats in the Reeds,
And Eve get fat and naked off her cherry red apple
By various degrees,
While I lie down in the wooden slit like a sliver under the Skin of the sun,
And my heartbeats like an asthmatic devil from
That absent minded kiss that you done.

Robert Rorabeck

That Absolutely None Of It Is Real

This world is in the pitiful eye of Satan:
This world who turns around and flaunts and shows its cards
To showgirls:
This world where I love un erringly, where inside nothing
Else that lives loves me:
And I have seen my mother coming down and coming unglued in
The carport
Of spits and shocks,
While the elks and the toads make their moon glows right beside
The carports with the re-bars:
And, Alma- I grew up right here, right beside the ghosts of where
You were bound to live,
But now I don't live anywhere: Alma:
The world is bound to fail, and the night plumes the sky, and I remember touching your lips right next to the last albino
Alligator that was yet alive,
But then again at night alone and alone, you touch his lips
Like tattoos of aphrodisiacs and other night blooming
Thugs;
And I try to kill myself to prove that this is not real;
And Alma, Alma: I cannot survive against the pallid ness of your
Away:
I don't know which ribbon is bound to the censer of your furthest
Planet;
And even the water fountains distend like nubile petraglphys
Who only made the night to obscure intruders;
And now I hear airplanes and cars- but oh, Alma, Alma:
I hope and I swear that absolutely none of it is real.

Robert Rorabeck

That Age Old Poetic Sky

The noise of this bouquet I have
Has no feeling; it has been out on the shelves of
The shopping mall too long-
Now how is it to sell. Thinking of great cheese
Makes me hungry and horny,
So I want to mouth off and masturbate: Now that I've seen all five of Kelly's children
And her breasts,
The guns of the settlers who will start the revolution:
The guns and the cannons,
And the men buried in the great dunes of everyday Tourism.
I just want to sleep. I don't want to keep calling out
Girls from their shells,
Girls from their shells when I cannot, when it
Is impossible to pry a mollusk from its swarthy comb
Without first killing it and then digesting it between Your buggered lips:
When she has a family and a daughter or men she Meets and slaps every night like a religious flag
Does the country over the graveyard:
When she is fully grown and useless otherwise,
And I am not beautiful,
And was only made for working long hours anyways.
I cant put anymore of this liquor in my body without becoming Falsely religious and plagiarize.
I'd rather just go to sleep and let someone else
More weary than I bleed their guts tonight into that age old Poetic sky.

Robert Rorabeck

That Always Need

Give me wine and give me
Trinkets of gold.
Leap airplanes around me,
And sing to me songs that will Never weep-
I will climb mountains.
I will shear the golden sleep,
And look into your eyes as they swim,
And eventually drown into Those dreams-
I am not a beautiful man,
But I still will run my winsome fingers
Across your tracks and Seems-
I will glide across you like a paper airplane,
And I will nest inside you like
The crèche of a tremulous plum tree,
Or a star fruit tree,
Bitter sweet from all the things
That always need.

Robert Rorabeck

That Apiary Of Sunlight

What of another vision saying nothing—
Walking to and from school—always the hardest time,
When the housewives are always out,
Stinging their lips upon that apiary of sunlight—
The fireworks not out yet,
And the only thing being changed is the drying of
The grasses in a merry-go-round or a gauntlet
Of the seasons—
And you are already in the playground, encapsulated
With your better man, until you fall down into the woods
Kissing him—looking up as the airplanes
Try to make it to the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

That Awful Bird

Washed and even enough to go to Church,
But not shaven nor thinking of my dogs;
And it is Monday and I get distracted by
The empty swings-
It seems that ecstatic words have motion like motor
Sports,
Like my honey's legs:
Carefully reckless words dance and jeer at Death,
And he swoops down and collects their lips like Sports; yes, of course, to Decorate his nest.
This time though everyone is waking up in Somnolent chorus and they're dancing words
Until their feet are hoarse-
Then if we must go down together like Dorothy,
Then I suppose we must,
But at least we sang some songs before that awful
Bird got the best of us.

Robert Rorabeck

That Awful Equation Of Occam's Easy Razor

Warm and becoming a darling in the sink,
The more beautiful houses rises above me, the sea curling
Her lashes; and I think that I would like to be alone
To finish my drink;
And I would like to shower alone, and to be cursed alone:
I would like to raise my sword alone for my enemies;
And Sharon,
I would like super powerful spells for you and your daughter,
Sharon: How were you able to capture this life out amongst The cornfields and the apple orchards
Before the goblins came and stolen away your little daughter
For her little adventure- and it was all a little fun,
And more than a little noteworthy, and in the morning I will Love Diana, and she can take the form of a forest or of a Tree, and I will still really love her, because she is a contacerous
Vixen: Diana is a muse killer, she is the vociferous black hole Growing up like seventh grade science experiment in the Middle of the spells of my garden;
And I said that I should live forever, but I shouldn't really live Forever; it is just that I should just buy a house and become the Cadaver of a little boy in blue stockings, whose feet rise up in
The average rigamortis of songbirds;
And my mother may scold me, like the wife of bath leaving to Make love the second knight along my wayward path,
But the days go along for a long, long ways;
The days go along, and my fingers are like the intelligent ballerinas
Of spiders, loving in their ways:
Sharon- You are more beautiful than Jodie Foster, and I can Never speak Latin; but what are you doing now,
Sharon- Whatever it is, it has nothing at all to do with this poem,
But you are far more important than this poem, Sharon;
You are all of my hidden heart pieces, Sharon; and see how I survive,
And how I water by your misplaced elements,
And see how I get along through the awful wind tunnels of this Cyborg world for you, muse, if only because I couldn't ever
Figure out that awful equation of Occam's easy razor.

Robert Rorabeck

That Bit Of Mexico

Soon you won't have to remember—how your children Left off from the movie theatre of your Umbilical cord—while you were still alive
Knowing nothing of me,
As I sold fireworks for my father across the unbusied
Deserts we stole from your Father's country: already pregnant, you took a bus
To this sweltering peninsula—maybe you
Love with somebody else—then you fell in love
For a little while with me,
But always found your way back to him—that bit of Mexico transplanted in America I had already stolen away
From you.

Robert Rorabeck

That Bleeding Room

My lips failed in their acting skills many years
Ago, Sharon:
When they parted, they just said nothing:
They preferred to look down like dribbling flowers while
I fornicated on my desk in my far corner of your class:
I sat as far away from you as I could,
Like an astronaut trying to avoid the sun while he fixed
Something,
And you popped your gum; and look how perfectly it has done me
In that you came and moved next to me in an adolescent Garden;
I knowing that I could never help to grow you as you willed,
And after you knew this and removed yourself from me,
I was as vacant as the newly purchased cemetery up on My grandmother's quilting hill:
And you moved away from me with the last kicks of breath
Of a wild Shetland pony moving inland and disappearing for Breakfast across the ditches and into the orange groves
To grow your daughter amidst the tadpoles and nematodes:
To grow your daughter big and strong and teach her how the world
Can spin,
And dress her in bleeding dresses, and put her in the new classes
Where they teach all the bleeding muses how to do us in.
I still remember you spinning diademed on your axis across that Bleeding room that they put us in.

Robert Rorabeck

That Blinding Cathedral

Baseball is a poem
In the classroom, graffiti on an Anonymous desk
But a poem
In a world of harsh light the bodies
Filter through like goldfish on Their last breath
Coming to the cannibalisms of
Robbins and blue gills
Coming to the last supper in the jungle
Showing their teeth for nude
Breasts: and the days
Carried out rising through the highways
That make believe they are Beautiful, as if jewelry for Colorado- as if Wolf Creek Pass diademed
Just her throat or just her navel
And the evergreens gossiped in the deep
Deep snows
And she with her traveling family
Worshipped underneath that blinding cathedral

Robert Rorabeck

That Burn In The Day And Bask In The Night

Perfected coolness of shade even on dinted skin
Feels fine,
While all the girls I've had a fine time thinking of are Going back to Georgia,
Rolling back the curtains of their eyes, and flooding
There:
Overcoming themselves in nocturnal whispers,
And they finally get over their shifts at the bars,
Which allow them to case through the sanctified joints and Hubs of the state university the children have been flooding
Into all of this time
Like bright eyed driftwood clutching themselves for want
Of fire: collecting into all the dorm rooms underneath all of The copper wire;
And I think of lion cups in a limestone cave, and spear tips
In the change jar that we would like to save;
And words that are the whispers of a second light,
That burn in the day and bask in the night.

Robert Rorabeck

That By Her You Should Carry On

And what troubles you are these things
That make you real, and hungry- The things that Can never be fulfilled:
How you looked at her out the window, after
The bus was leaving;
And there must have been some birds in the eaves,
In the cypress and the slash pines-
You didn't even know then how you would Lose your virginity,
Though you hoped it would be by her, the one time
There was that fire drill and you sat alone
As the children frolicked,
But she left her boyfriend and came over and Sat and talked with you before your face got old-
Inevitably, there will be lost children,
And bodies left even in the greenest spaces; and She has forgotten of those times that you can't Ever possibly forget, that you will take down with you
Six feet beneath the earth to share your plot with;
And that is what keeps you carrying on this way,
Even after she has long since left off the road,
Settling in a little house beside a river of melting snow,
But maybe sometime upon this same earth you
Will be able to settle down and explain underneath her
Curious eyes, all that she has meant to you,
That by her you should carry on.

Robert Rorabeck

That Can Never Be Found By All That Tourism

Each line a memory:

A truancy across the canal, a feeling in my bones of Carnavalesque sparrows who don't mind eating the meat
Of their same species,
Of lying in bed in the deep rituals of rainy some days
And kissing the dirt of their aunts;
And I have heard the hobos' fugue; and I have slept out
On the granite palate of the graveyard
And watched the violet sky grow more distressed:
I have laid atop my ancestors and wished them all of the Best,
And what of you- and your plans, kissing your men with
A smoking gun in your hands:
How are you riddled now, driving in your tangled means
Getting lost playing cops and robbers as it begins to snow
Through all the emptied trees:
The blushing buildings of your town crushing back into
The mountain,
But only going so far: and have you explored her
By bicycle or by foot: have you gone back into her emptiness
And espied a flower that I have grown for you with my Mental powers;
One flower that can never be found by all that tourism which Inhabits you; and I wonder if you have found her,
And found out who she was.

Robert Rorabeck

That Cannot Be This

Cars who pattern a rush of galvanized needs-
Every bouquet has a patina,
And sound recedes; and I look sad and gone
Along the winter walks of Spain,
My eyes in the penumbra of a dead and dying poet's
Olive tree,
Even though I am quite happy- In the somnolent
Opulence of my anonymity:
Each word spilled out from the backwardly winnowing
Loom,
Each word a rerun cartoon,
Doing its best to amuse itself by the memory of your Eyes,
Trying to dance awake the little kittens of your narcoleptic
Soul,
And pretend that you need us to make you whole,
When you are already over spilling, when you already have So many friends who've already begun to show you all the Best that is in the world,
While we are just in our little corner in art class,
Little fingers doodling, and it does us no good to matter in
The lines, no matter how good we do:
Each word is wrong, a fumbled match the unwavering waves
Can have, crashing against the seawall where they would Have nothing grow,
And rather un resilient catastrophe no one notices like a latchkey
Storm cloud bivouacked underneath a street light,
Not even Rudyard Kipling,
Breathing around it all the atmospheres replete with the beauty
That cannot be his.

Robert Rorabeck

That Clearing Between The Pines

Days in your town gloriously are shopping.
New students come in late in the summer, but now they Are so cold- The wind is blowing its magnum opus over
The sun,
But all of you are too busy to listen: Even you are too busy,
A venal muse high strung on her own sweet musings.
You've got a new car, and that's really something:
High over the rivers of the earth you drive in your new car,
And every day there is a new love with roses as blue as Velvet cut and horny in the younger boy's arms;
It is something his parents have paid for (they were so Happy considering his charms) and the world comes out
Between that clearing between the pines,
And sweeps you clean,
And blows your minds.

Robert Rorabeck

That Could Not Be So Easily Sold

You I've coined this kind of joy for:
Look out, the sun is going down; it almost caught your Head;
See how the snakes slither up from the snags to taste
The last of it,
As the trucks leave, as even the Mexicans pack up to Jaunt.
Crepuscule will come soon, you know, and then the Mailboxes will cool, as all the roofs of the houses cool,
As the tar and shingles finish;
And the little girls commingle with the shadows, while Their greater daddies drink;
And you are there, winnowed, spun out in séance,
Somehow flustered but still eager for your wedding,
Never taking into account of how your fanciful shadow has Gone in with the others,
When I would have held out my hand with all my gold,
To catch you before the sun went away, to bask with the last of
It in your yard where your imprint rippled like something
That could not be so easily sold.

Robert Rorabeck

That Crowded Home

Entire truckloads of rabbits eating endives
On the truckload cliffs
Overlooking the Kennedy Space Center:
And now you say how is that possible
That I would have known that I
Was not the right man
For you;
But I am full of anticipation and the loam of
The suns energy,
So do not worry that I should harm you,
But I will continue onward,
Alone in the happiest journey somewhere far a field
To the truckload cliffs where you sit in the Middle of emptied boxes,
Buxomly in his boxer fists,
Ranging with my dogs, well-tongued,
And still looking for that crowded home.

Robert Rorabeck

That For A Little While

Now they are talking smoke:
And all around them the chaos rides up trees:
They seem to be getting to the coney
Pinnacle
Where they are caressing angel knees:
And down beneath them- so far from there, the ribbons
Circle saplings lost from her-
And drowning anyways- the good witchcraft of her Haircut:
And I said I loved her weather front: and the band proceeded
The football players of false gold:
I told her all of the stories that I was ever told:
And then I burned away at the edges of a silent sea:
Rhymes that slipped away spoken of by
Mermaids who never slept let alone spoke to me:
And my world curled at the edges,
And it looked so fine- and it seemed as I for awhile that My soul- my Alma would be mine,
But like a kidnapped child, I separated from myself:
The paint left the pony- it left the house-
And the sea engorged so far as to slip into another sea;
Drowned in the light of a luckless elephant,
It seemed as if I supposed that for a little while she would Be returned again to me.

Robert Rorabeck

That Griefless Cause

I try my best, girl,
And perhaps have succeeded in the lesser elements,
All those materials known to man
The things we walk on and inhale:
The stuff put before our eyes only to move away,
Like fine women in a dream of where she lives,

But the places of greater poets I'll never know,
The lines they put down without learning to breath,
Leaping travelers of the celestial spheres,
Consume the spikenards of outer space,
And return the world to the bulbous carriage of
The rainy park,
The river of power lines up the pined ridges, the game of stones in reckless collisions
Between a red lover and his greater mistress,

The lonely planets they exhume and propagate,
Whiffed in the cantankerous bellies of chartreuse gas giants,
Young boys living in the trailer parks of an otherworldly flume,
Drunken beyond the red visages of the living dolls;
I could not go to them, because they are already gone,
Spaced out in the unreachable bang,
A gunfight of tears and bight marks,
Though I've tried my best, girl,
I have tried, and you the motivation of that griefless cause.

Robert Rorabeck

That He Took And Never Gave

Pleasance reposes on the push handle of the star channels.
And the little things that fail are just cut off in the rocks
Of unsure protuberances,
And they sleep forever without any dreams of princesses;
And when you are close, or when you are far,
The bodies move so rapidly, like the hyperboles of insects
Masticating into the garden,
Like rabbits really jacking off until all of the traffic finally parks,
And the magic tricks turn into girls with tan lines,
And all the men lie down and have their satin opal fix,
And the hats come off and the nooses tighten,
And then the trees remember the witchcraft of their early lives,
As the ponies saddle and the guns heartbeat into their buck hide
Holsters,
And I can almost here my first muse laugh, heavily bossomed
Beside the high cathedrals of the catholic church which gathers
All the ghosts of tourists across the street from the University Where so many of us young fools attended almost Categorically,
Even though Beowulf was dead and making a birthday cake for
The dragon after he had eaten the village where everything I once
Had loved had before fell asleep,
While Alma stroked her hair a thousand times and glittered her face
For the man who would come to taste her life with every beefy
Puff that he took and never gave.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Already Knew

Uneven developments except for the pigments of her
Brown body:

She will go home to him now, and enjoy him as she Enjoys her family, in the hemisphere that is their World

That I cannot enjoy: she will envelop with him in Coitus, and will soothe upon his belly:

She is sunburned, and has forgotten of me:

It is an easy way to live, through pueblos of her
Species, as angels ride with her in her car

All the way to work: but she couldn't care,

As sometimes icicles hang from the pine trees, and the

Rabbits have to go outside and do all of the work

Before I even knew her: an angel who flew away

Providing to me all that I already knew.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Already Know

I have poems now for you, Alma,
While I am killing my body in so many ways:
I saw you in the evening until the sun did graze
Into crepuscule;
And we could hear the airplanes and cars together:
Maybe they were trying to make some kind of stand that I couldn't understand;
Nor did it matter- It was like I was being kidnapped by your Eyes;
And all you could say is, oh really, and that it was so expensive
To become a citizen of the United States:
I hardly even think that you know what you are doing to me?
I told you that you had beautiful skin, and you said you
Had to go,
But when you left you came back to me and we had one more throw,
In my eighty-five year old foyer, but we did not take off our clothes;
And I told you I loved you: I loved you so many times;
And you told me that you had something you wanted to tell me,
But you changed your mind:
Alma, and now I am in a perfect darkness, but the airplanes and Cars still come,
And maybe what it was you were going to tell me- that I already Know.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Am

If I became ant, wouldn't you turn into a knife
And cut me to pieces,
As afterwards you helped Charlie divide the sandias
For the wilting glaciers disguised as old ladies
Who hold in their bad vision all the versions of my unluckyness
After the last of your rabbits died in the rock garden
Of my childhood,
Alma- After my mother was electrocuted beside the washing machine
In the rainy carport,
And I saw Federico Garcia Lorca kissing an otter or a
Unicorn;
And maybe Walkeen was deported tonight,
Alma, but I still got you to tell me that you loved me today,
With my back up against the royal palm
Near the fireworks tent, with impending fears of tidal waves,
And so many words misspelled or not even resurrected;
And maybe I cannot touch you right now;
And maybe I can never touch your, or maybe I will hold you in The morning and turn your mouth back like my favorite
Wishing well who is beginning to moan my name;
And I think that I will: And I think that I am.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Can Never Have This

The greatest generalization of Your myth
Spoke to me without Any shoes;
And the morning lay as if
In a torpid bowl,
As if in a glade of Christmas;
As I loved the girl who Brought me breakfast
Any girl, while just last night
I felt the nickel of
The little boy's gun on the Small of my Back,
On the back of the head:
All he wanted was Money;
Funny that he shouldn't
Know
He couldn't have this:
All I want is you
And the time needed to Smell your blossoms,
To ring you up in sorcery;
Funny that I shouldn't know
That I can never have this.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Don'T Suppose

Alma,

I have spent all of my tinfoil like a plug into the

Saw grass:

Alma, I have sold so many things, but now the tents that

I sold them underneath are deflating:

They wish to change for you:

Alma, they wish to know the residue of your soul,

And the cars are not pretty- Alma, these things that we think we need,

That your children will once more think that they need,

And the dreams will finally come on under the soft bellies of airplanes,

And you will never Know me, Alma, because I am too needy and too strange:

I will hide out in the woods of your old,

Mexico, I will hide out in the quiet and immobile bodies, because that is Just what I am, and I want to use my arms to shelter your

Children,

Alma, because I get my resurrection just from your eyes,

Alma,

And I get my wealth from everything that I don't suppose you will ever

Give to me.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Know Why

I hate you my turtle dove: I don't know who you
Are,
So I just keep sniffing more beefier flowers, and getting Drunk into bars:
But I am improving: I am buying a house, yellow
Yellow and eighty-five years old,
And I can live it until I at least get that old, and I fold up
Like the creased poison of the Monarch butterfly
Underneath the Spanish word for rainbow: el arco iris;
And it is the completely crimson arrow that Ripped straight through my thought consciousness,
Because tonight I made love to a creature who claimed to Be Melody: but who is Melody but that thing with
The five pointed star red and black in the depths of her
Olive-skinned thigh:
She let me kiss her, and I am afraid that I know why.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Still Want You For A Bride

I can smell you down here even if you don't Really exist,
Children in boxcars- runts in shoeboxes;
And my head has a great apoplexy and it has been half
My life since I've really broken into a house;
And then I didn't do anything but piss in anonymous rooms
And steal quarters and hide pieces of Cake up and down the stairs; and I got whippings and I masturbated
And leapt many feet over the canal;
And I huffed clouds painted up like working girls that knew how To dance for so many shapes;
And the world took form, and became foremost of all of these planets;
And its brother Mars was jealous and set off to make great Science-fiction, but it was all disproved,
So even the greatest authors happened to disappear up the ski lifts
Going into the whiteouts of Telluride and the fact that every snowflake
Is just as unique as man's finger prints was never disproved,
But it helped to solve crime
While it remains quite plain that I still want you for a bride.

Robert Rorabeck

That I Was Even Gone

Old girlfriends burn good in a drinking mind:
Girls in chariots with cottage cheese behinds:
And oh well, it was never a great loss-
I don't suppose she's ever re-entered a playground
After our separation,
Never felt the black paganism which I tried to Transplant her in, through those cold
High school lakes not so far away,
But back enough a bit to call them really done:
I suppose now she's stuck to her air-condition
And restaurants,
All of her casual and usual and typical haunts,
And that is just as I had planned,
That she could go her own way with her not so different man;
Or, it is the same way as her family plan,
While I am in the green with sea-green iguanas,
Trying to breathe while thinking of atypical mommas:
Girls who don't get up in the traffic of her junk,
Girls of sky and girls who can not be caught;
And it makes me as celibate as a great inventor,
But a great inventor who can never fall down,
Who walks through ice, and breaks into houses just to fall Asleep;
And I'll sleep in her mowed yard one day, a grin to the Typical moon while I pet her purring cat,
And make it my cat, and by the morning I'll be gone,
And she'll be so unworried that she'll have never known
That I was even gone.

Robert Rorabeck

That Illusion

The night weeps its sentiment to us all, but oh how Many lines have begun like that:
And I wish I could be more original for you;
And now I want to walk to your house again:
I want to be a flag on your body rippling and casting for gold,
Because now haven't I seen you captivated high up in the clouds
In a house of giants:
Isn't it a white man's house: even further, isn't it my house,
Alma:
I want to find you and stretch you out and ask your where your beautiful
Belt has gone,
And to which knight you gave it to, to save his neck:
I know you gave it to one knight on his lunch break, but to which
One I am uncertain,
But I want to be your king just so I can have the authority to find these Things out,
And to feed my life-giving poultry to your children:
Alma, I dream of you walking your children to the bus stop,
And I dream of you walking through cut out snowflakes and paper airplanes:
I dream of you always on the move, Alma, because your body gives off
That illusion while it smokes and sweats my dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

That It Was Mine

The rains are finally coming:

I can hear them coming so softly like a mute and polite sorority:

Listen to them footstep through the leaves,

And cast their little sadness atop the roof of cars,

But once they get here it won't seem to matter

That I don't have any airconditioning,

For it will be as if my entire house was flooded with their cheer:

And Alma's house some streets over,

Why didn't I some nights ago walk over there and sleep on Alma's neighbor's

Roof, while I tried to listen to Alma's love making so that I could Pretend that it was mine.

Robert Rorabeck

That It Will Be Nice

Oh, its hard to thing of things that can make it above
The planes,
Above the trees, and bivouac in what I know you cannot Believe:
These words try to become the censers of my feat:
They try to leap and leap and leap without some much as One single foot:
Your two eyes is what makes them strut, your sunny sunburned
Eyes, leaving tracks upon the beach;
Your eyes are bottle rockets: your eyes are messages for Men on Mercury waiting for their eyelashed vibrancy;
You eyes are the reason that I have no need for a bedroom set;
And the reason for why my dogs are so hungry and alone,
Because I have forgotten them,
And that is why I am writing this, waiting for your eyes to open
Like sunrise:
Waiting for your eyes to say anything without saying anything,
Because I am so sure that it will be nice.

Robert Rorabeck

That I've Had To Say

Mirrors in recreational vehicles deep in the middle
Of the day:
Alligators touching themselves: and I am starving,
Starving:
The fish is on the hook, the rivers are giving all of Their money into the sea:
And all I've wished is what I've had to say to
Be beautiful:
Beautiful:
But it is as forgotten as a wagon by hungry children;
As my dog in Arizona,
As the red fields turn to custard as the sun looks
Away:
As the bodies paint themselves across the recreations
Of the bomb shelters,
And the families separate- as the knights leave their Table,
As the sororities separate into the immaculate mirages
Of housewives:
And I only know three or five words; but I've used
Them with the best intent:
It is my recipe- paper snowflakes and paper airplanes
Over the scars of perpetually adolescent bicycles:
It is all that I've had to say.

Robert Rorabeck

That Makes A Perfect Symmetry Of Her Silver Shoulders

Yellow day how you shed like serpent skin
In the brush tantalizing a wildfire yet to come Sparked off the wheels of Some fleeing mother; but how pale you are in Comparison to the chartreuse of
A butterfly who gets lost inside you,
And tangled at your mouth in a graveyard of bicycles-
All through the school day, she must lay there
Panting brainless- a little thing painted above
The vast pornography, while just off in the Corner the yards with their pools glint their Reasons to her, like faberche mirages- and they Dance in a blind zoetrope, and the things lighter
Than air weigh her down like a boulder in the breasts
Of a wildflower- while the airplanes
Fly above, the little boys being ticketed by a very Important man who walks down the row
That makes a perfect symmetry of her silver shoulders.

Robert Rorabeck

That Milk Through The Clouds

I am a pessimist as sunlight spurs underneath the gallop:
And the waves spear like Siamese angels up against
The shore:
The fort of our wedding rises to the herons,
Leering with green copper heads for many months
Across the ambivalent plot of the dead
Prostitute,
As I bight my lip and wonder where the windmills are:
As the children sing softly on the busses-
Going home from school,
Their ice-cream melting, and a new art in their eyes
They will forget by the time they get home-
When they close their eyes, they will sleep
Underneath the heavens,
Like a saturnalia of jupiters sleeping underneath the overpasses
That scribble the angels across the highways
That milk through the clouds forever wondering when You will be home.

Robert Rorabeck

That Mountain

I loved that mountain and
All she taught me. Until I went home
And ejaculated,
Had an affair with a Mexican woman,
And got married to a Chinese woman.
And I forgot about her—
The mountain,
Muse and mistress of my loneliness—
The midnight jaunts up her naked back on Easter with the horses snorting before the rainstorms—
The galvanized bears and flesh eating dinosaurs
Disappearing as cenotaphs upon her open pastures—
Forgot about the gold rushes up her meadows
And the creeks that wept her blood tainted
With the perfumes of mummified wild flowers—
And my lost aunt lost within her wild summers:
I had children
And sold myself into the smallest amphitheaters
Of capitalism—
It got warmer when I drank but my wife so far
Has refused to leave me,
And so I continue on after my dog has died
And the amusements have shut down forever.
Maybe I will see her again. Maybe I will pass her way—
Tomorrow, the sun will come up over all of the Beautiful women who will never know my name
And all of the airplanes will fly farther away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

That No Man Can Touch

We need to talk now and then lie down to
Rest,
While the shells in the road lie there like cenotaphs
Brushed by the cars:
After the fireworks have died, and the conquistadors,
And the brushes are stilled and away,
While the oranges globe the trees with the cats,
And other states proceed along the Atlantic;
And the forts in them hide their shows- if there are anymore
Conquistadors near here they no longer move,
Nor the blue cats across them.
Just the palm trees in their imperfect rows, implored by the Remarks of the tide-
The gold buried in the nape of her neck after she was stolen
Away from me. Even though she was never even mine-
Resting in his bed and closing her eyes
And dreaming of summer in another country that my forefathers
Defeated,
That I have let so easily defeat me; and it comes to me in The illusions of a movie theatre, as I send her flowers
And she has her lunch alone on the patio-
And the sun resounds in its basins that no man can touch.

Robert Rorabeck

That Nothing Could Be Real Forever

Unhealing wound, this me underneath your shadow,
Making my rounds in the city that was my cradle, and is proving
To be my tomb,
Friendless, but with necessity: I drive the truck to pay the bills,
And by night I sleep with my dog while I play
At masturbating and drinking from your fountains, Alma:
As I have done before,
And will do again until you are stolen from the sky, and my fort
Remains beaten, numberless, all of the hopes of my men taken Down and laid out in the soft green fields
Where I always knew that nothing could be real forever.

Robert Rorabeck

That Nothing Happened

Almost time for a Reason spoken to Midnight
Of men with
Their hands in
The air—
Whose time is
Up—
The dyslexic haunts
Of fire flies
Outside the Grottos of
The housewife's
Kitchens—
Better words I
Don't know to Save myself—
I can only remember
The diminutive ferris wheels
Of my prepubescent existence—
And the time we launched a Thousand ships only to find
That nothing happened.

Robert Rorabeck

That One Time

If I go to the zoo
And remember where we kissed,
In the hidden cave of
The white alligator,
Like the ghost of the one
Who took the hand of old Captain Hook—
If I kiss my wife there now
Every weekend,
On the mouth like the one
Time I kissed
You, will it create a spell
That will return me to That day—
That one time
When I kissed you.

Robert Rorabeck

That Only Has Eyes For You

Wine on the couch- wine like blood tears
While the lights are popping on and off like stoplights of
Christmas trees,
One for each ghost coming on in this house of eighty five years:
You can hear them, Alma,
They are all burying their frightened heads into the apple orchard
Of your soul,
Alma:
I didn't see you while I was in Spain with my aunt halfway
Through high school, where I got this old fashioned tattoo:
Then you were already joining the gangs,
And getting Nelson's initial tattooed to the web of your hand:
Today I watched you walking through the beautiful yard,
And multiplying its beauty in your tight blue jeans:
Smiling your auburn beams,
And making all of our customers like tourists hiking toward you
Alma;
And it is almost midnight, and I haven't changed:
I will be drinking an entire bottle toasting you,
While your throat lies next to his throat like two quieted song birds
In a bed,
While the rabbits hutch warmly in their cage, purring softly-
The newborn little, hairless and shivering:
Like me, an entire way born family that only has eyes for you.

Robert Rorabeck

That Other World

It doesn't feel good to be without A truck,
A means to get to Christmas and line the hills
All ready filigreed with Spanish horsemen or the Legions of Mexico
Passing through the turnstiles of the frontera;
But it feels okay if I cannot teach,
Or make it around the recalcitrance so far out of Reach,
For the beauty goes unnoticed out of eye,
Growing under the march of the adolescent
Fanfare,
Until all of that sudden she unfurls her head all broached
With silver-green emblems,
And smiling seems to remember her grandmother from
That other world.

Robert Rorabeck

That Rides Like Angels

And I am in love but not in my prime:
Looking down through the Substrate like sifting through a wishing well:
Words that are forked,
Trying to find the hidden clefts of reindeer
Sniffing their fox gloves:
Prettily eating babies breath, as the sky cries
And, she, the river floods:
In beautiful fantasy- where areoled nipples
Rise:
This hidden goddess, brown as the streams
Underneath of airplanes
That ride like angels: she forever came from Mexico, but I think that she will never be
My love.

Robert Rorabeck

That Same Old Rhyme

Metronomes of heavy eyes
Of fun and games underneath leaden skies,
The stewardesses and unicorns first perused out of the Toy chests of puppets bruised;
And it was a park that grew the fruit trees too,
All in the straightest lines their passions knew: and it was A funny thing to see,
The headlights of the horizon through the ochre of Bellefontaine Cemetery;
And it was a funny sight: I suppose it always was:
God waking up with his turtledoves,
And all of the sparks on his feet and smiles, a palindrome
For crocodiles;
And the bicycle's spinning wheels, Like Queen Anne's
Wheels telling ferry tails of billy goats over bridges,
Who listened to their oldest brothers' wishes;
And wanting more they took their time,
And rhymed their rhyme to goblins, who finished the very Bones of that same old rhyme.

Robert Rorabeck

That She Almost Thought Was Really Swell

Dime store reservoirs in her eyes:
She looks across the sea and gives it quiet things,
Gives it time:
She has so much lost that she would have to say to
Me;
And I am unperfected, divided and ready for the fall,
Ready for the crawl of giant ants over my Toppled hall:
I didn't even work today, though I knew that I should;
But I thought of her,
Knowing that she must be up to no good- Her faith
Crawling along her ankle, taking its
Time,
Her body as hot as a tortoise on a rock;
And she was twisted and lost before she even got
To kindergarten,
Thrown out of the nursery of her garden, she took care
Of her siblings in a chicken coop,
And I watched her from across the canal of torpid Noncommittance; and she seemed to see me there for A moment like a dream
Of something cheap but amusing that she almost Thought was really swell.

Robert Rorabeck

That She Does

Go to bed you
Ghosts
While you still have
Your places
To live
And I have this Tiny
Liquor bottle as Light as a commuter airplane
In transit
As light as Fully paid off cars
And lunches,

While Diana is Out in the Woods
Making love to All her
Bon fires,
Elongating her shadows
And her bangs-
Oh,
How she moves,
Doing the Things
That she does.

Robert Rorabeck

That So Few Worthwhile Men Have Ever Seen

Soft and imperfect dreams starting this way
In the concentric circles of a solitary unison: I guess I miss My dogs, and the Secret dales of the mountains, the ways up them like the fire hydrants
And oral sex of your legs:
Alma- and this is my pledge, that wants to be your flag,
That even all the while is dying,
Like beautiful flowers in the islands of a highway-
And I know that you love your family, and to separate from their Cherished hearts would be like an instrument trying to play
Without the efforts of its master's lips;
But now my dragon has touched down like a heavily angry airplane,
And it is wanting some condolence;
Like a fitful child it hides its soul in the hollows of a tree before
The autumn's holidays, and it prays for you,
While the winds get all the time heavier and more in descript;
And it seems to keep up its delusions that you will finally arrive,
Stepping down from your chariots of immortal rainbows,
And kissing its brow if you could,
Like a night spent together throughout all the naked bodies of the silver Trees gathering together all of their Silken promises into the gaudy pastures of the mountain's nape
That so few worthwhile men have ever seen.

Robert Rorabeck

That Sweet Little Aphrodisiac

Children playing outside the broken fences
Of guitar strings;
And we have lions, but I cannot find anyone here:
There are beautiful singers too, and poet laureates
Fawning with the penumbras of mermaids
Down deep into the crepuscule of this zoo: Oh, but oh:
That is just what they do,
And when I get down and low, I talk to myself,
And in these words is the way I go:
I have never met your daughter: I would like to meet her,
And be a man for her that I never knew;
And take her up the basins to the sky where we can watch
The virgin in her grotto of the evaporated cry:
And then I can sing to her of you, her mother, while you Lie down beneath the Shakespeares who have all been Weeping for you, underneath the school buses,
Breaking most every rule: and come to think of it,
I'm just one of them too; and I only wish to have your Hand to hold and kiss, that sweet little aphrodisiac of you Know who.

Robert Rorabeck

That There Are Still Green Promises

Now if there are cops underneath the airplanes
Who look as if they are wearing their mothers' jewelry far into The night,
Why let them come in their magic cloaks, as long as I get
To skip my way through art class
And reach my hands about your throat:
That brown vase that stokes your eyes, the pillages the ladders
Of your chest,
That keeps on pumping blood like a fire-engine:
That is unreal and lays counting beside the man who is your husband:
He has come again,
But he is also going away: as far as to another underworld where He will be reprimanded for saying that he can find another woman as Good as you in the next street corner as you drive:
And now I do this: I write bad poetry in the heat of my inebriate
Passion,
Because I cannot teach, and I do not have a boat, but I have too much Money,
But nothing to loan my poor, beautiful and finally wayward father:
He is lost in the desert of the stars, underneath the shadows of the Horses,
While last Tuesday I manipulated you in the bed that was previously
Owned by a homosexual and an artist of seashells:
The bed that has held four women so far for me, and your goddess;
And you asked me if you were my toy as I turned you around,
And then you asked me if I wasn't going to do you like a dog,
But I assured you that you are my vida perfecta: and that you are my Linda perfecta; and after we were done you made me feel like a Super hero all week,
And when your man goes away, I want to take you to the sea and make Love to you in the bedrooms of the caesuras,
Because I think I know who you are, Alma, for you are my only reason
For know that there are still green promises in this life.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Didn'T Know The Word For

This really shouldn't be your job:

The world has struck you down and made you as Beautiful as broken glass;

And it is the other girls who can fly and goof off for their

Captains:

Just as it is the other waves that come with crushes for the

Other starlets,

And I am just about to have a little home with a coquina fireplace,

And I will think of you in the madness of that twilight

While I make love to working girls who are even Better looking than you are:

Working girls whose dreams are untamed that go on forever

Cursing over the hills of that suburbia they tore down:

Like a baker's dozen of Melodies, like olive-skinned girls

Lost in an orchard far into the darkness after picking time,

And looking up remember the stars and maybe

Point to the exact aspect that they fell from:

That they never had to compare themselves to the fox leaping for

The other woman's grapes,

And that was so beautiful, and so pure, and maybe something else,

Except that they didn't know the word for.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Even Are

I have written of the passions of the emptied hills,
As the blue sky vomits and seems to develop
Over the pubescent cathedrals,
So all of the fairytales are only have written:
They are like dead girls galloping on my leg in extracurricular Activities;
As it has been forever so long that I have found myself to
Be beautiful;
And now I get drunk as close as I can to the eastern sea,
As I hear the clouds cleaning their rooms, hoping for Tips,
As the fireworks happen to bloom all ready and as sudden
Over the heads of working girls who never Have the time to wake up; so now I pick roses for
Alma,
And hold my guns to my lips, hoping for romance, while
The bones of her busy ancestors tell her the secrets
To their doors who turn out all red
And happen into the sun, who is also bright and macho,
Who spindles all of his legs down
To the sea
To be caressed by the mermaids who aren't even any longer
Assured that they even are.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Share

Finally filled up with all of the Beautiful sounds of the winds,
Angels rest beneath the Christmas trees,
Knuckles entwined like
Amber hearts:
They are waiting there as presents
For the children of newly wedded gods:
They float above the carpets
Where the dogs and kittens sleep—
Levitating in their own special notes
While banshees no one hears about
Remember other dreams
From the hallucinations of the kitchens
That they share

Robert Rorabeck

That They Too Believed

I told her I would be quiet, and I have slept in phone booths
When the rains stormed down from the higher tenements, and then
We kissed and it was all surreal:
There really wasn't enough to go around, all the Saints in green valleys
Of unicorns and beavers: All the trees and plants growing up
Into the professions of their glades,
Where the bodies fit just right and baptized near the reedy estuaries
Of her long legs, but I couldn't give up, and I sang to her to open
Her lips like bottles of liquor; and it was a feverish passion,
And a bottle rocket romance right out in the dense middle of high school:
Her legs repeating the strokes until through the air she swam,
As if in epilepsy, the angels kissing and flexing for her, the rainbows
Bowing: and then she was over all the carports and lymph nodes
Of suburbia, so when the housewives looked up open shirted, soft lipped
Their eyes remorsefully dazzled; but they sang that they too believed.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Were Not Mine

Rained as fat as pregnant cats who'd sated on our Mice,
And I stood and flirted with a little Mexican girl with eyes
As dark as thunderclouds over the parts of the sea
Forever estranged from humanity;
And she was only playing, and I took the knife and cleaved
The cabbage from its groves, the scuppernongs
From the vine:
And I looked into her Guerra conceived eyes, and didn't Look away so that she would believe me when I Gave her flowers, and promised her that they were not mine.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Were Wrong

You're playing with him, and the daydreams come
And make faces under the moon, like adolescent lovers mouthing
Off in the baths of the boys' bathroom in between classes:
And yes, it hurts, like the menstruations of bottle rockets croaking Themselves over
Disney World; but it is all we have: and when I am with you,
Alma, I feel safe: like in an air conditioned cabin, and I just want To go home and park my wonder lusting bike after a dance in The middle schools of Disney World,
Like wishes coming down now, and the scientists congratulating Themselves, shaking hands and finally admitting through the blue
Palms of the starving landscaping upon the many ways that They discovered that they were wrong.

Robert Rorabeck

That They Would Be Waiting There

Red envelopes of make believe
Rainbows while everyone else is turning around
In this carnival of their gospel
Looking up,
Counting the pinecones of the lips of all of The stout young Christmas tress,
And expectant throughout all of those burnished
Holidays:
Waiting down on the raptures of puppies
And kittens:
The sky a quilt that our grandmother made,
And all of it made up and counting down
Throughout the maelstrom of another afternoon:
Bighting its lip
And trying to decide at what our to head out of Doors,
While all of it happens out of this,
And the young virgins sing out of their pillows
As the snow piles up through the savage greenness of Whatever houses that they have found;
And it all feels all right, burning through the thorough fairs,
Burning into the twice brilliant lamplights of the angels
Waiting beside the road: or twice over,
The angels that already swore that they would be waiting there.

Robert Rorabeck

That Tomorrow The Day

Nourishing the void of sweet, sweet hobos:
The rimy bliss down by the crocodiles- overusing the Feral, speechless steps:
And passing the bottle, ringing in the candle lights
Of ambulances passing insouciantly by:
Tiny Mexican hands of my beloved: my alma, cleaning all of The strawberries,
And the blueberries, and doing all of her good work while
The sun goes around:
Being visited by her bad man today who soon exited:
And I was there, rhyming down, rhyming down
Like concrete shedding tears-
Pulling myself up again, forgetting myself in the liaisons
Of missing affairs,
And then trying to do good work for her before the midnight
Of my day off:
Getting the word out to nobody in luckless symphony
Resting assured that tomorrow the day will whiny blindingly
And my beloved will rise with them and Charge, and charge, and charge.

Robert Rorabeck

That Very Afternoon

How strange the reanimated legionaries must
Be going as they fell up into your Pleiades
Which aren't even real constellations,
Just sisterhoods somewhere in the hallucinations of The jungle-
Or like not dressing out for gym,
And getting to stare quite contentedly at her jiggling,
And not having to do anything about it:
And this sun is a constant good sport,
And we drink vodka before class and quack farts
Right alongside the toads in the premeditated algebra
Of the sweet young campus' landscaping.
Right before us the sky is like the pink rose I passed
Over to give her for the Red, red roses, to hear her mouthing off and laughing
With her friends,
And then having to watch her up on the lacquered stage
Kissing the leading man,
But never believing it was real, absolutely;
And then all of the days receding into the migrations of Wolverines and school buses,
The mailboxes opening up clear throated at our cul-de-sacs
And turn abouts, coming homes into the Laps of middle-class huckstery, the sugar-cone estuaries
I'm sure you know about:
Watching Jordan's sister Abigail digress into her nudity
Beside the best of all pools,
And the clouds cottoning to their own pace,
Having now reminiscence for who I might love that Very afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

That Very Thing

They seem to be made of me—the clouds floating above
The theaters of coquina until there is nothing to Complain about—
And your breasts no longer lactate for your children—
And it is only I who sits here in this poor excuse of a theatre—
A long while after the Navajos and other Indians have Paid for their liquor and gone home—
And in that same time, my father's dreams were nearly Realized in these mountains—
As he kept holding his head up nearly bravely closer and Closer and further away from the sun—
Until some wicked—wicked thing got him—
And the windmills turned—turned in their hypnosis—
And that was how that very thing got done.

Robert Rorabeck

That Was All You Needed To See

You don't care,
You are so far deep into the beautiful,
And these a just words;
And you've never blown glass,
Because it is too dangerous,
And you didn't grow up
In northern Europe,
And I would have like to compare these Words to the exotic
Dangerous of those sports,
But they are more like suburban parks,
With swings to go on with your lonely,
To become the summertime bird,
A bird of time repeating in its
Arch: And I remember you from high school, Sharon, and you even let me sit next to you during A pep rally one day when I
Was beautiful,
And you told your bullying friends with the pink
Switch blade,
That I was your friend,
And I even think that you got into creative writing because Of me,
But now you are married and know so much
About wine:
And I am so alone and no good at any sport,
And this is more like a clown selling balloons in a bulldozed
Jungle than anything else,
Like that one summer halfway through all the early stuff
When you looked up into my eyes
And that was all you needed to see....

Robert Rorabeck

That Was Made By The Rain

The rains start again; it feels good to fill up this Little world:
To be connected to the other who does not know me
By the cold;
It seems even now we are into the reservoir of all things,
The oubliette of our cell
Nearing the very root of the sea;
And I can sit here in a constellation of myself and look
At her across the class in crepuscule,
And see her fully fashioned out walking in the overgrown
Glade,
Neither now classical or fancy, but crass and crudely made,
Because I made her a meal for myself:
Made her immortal like the dart of a bird too swift to see
And so fanciful;
She smoked and chirruped and laughed at me
Because this was no longer Arizona and she had seen me face
To face and so knew that I could be defeated,
And so she was just that, the weapon to strike down an early god,
So I didn't have to get out of bed,
But could lie here for hours languorous in pain, listening to the Music that was made by the rain.

Robert Rorabeck

That Was Valentines

They have this, and this is real:
As real as the concrete rivers that the cars drive- while,
Words are not real,
Even placed at their fingertips they are ghosts:
And she has beauty, but so does the cut flower, and everyone
Knows how swift they can change:
The way grandfathers nod and die in an apiary even while Their youngsters are busily singing-
Making that fine melody out of their trumpets- storefronts
In their combs,
And all the world caracoling around them, like a great Ferris Wheel who has found its home,
No longer wishing for migration nor metamorphosis-
And who will see her then, her children marbled,
Her parents something out of a funeral:
The world trumpeting, but the elephants in it evaporated:
The fans who once showered her with the fortuitous captivations
Of symmetry, gone down
To their hallucinatory easements- and the school of her adulations
Abandoned:
All the gaudy clothing raped off the Bosque- who will float
Down to her then to lick her withering armpits like kites to Saltlick- and give her the ephemeral beauty
Of jigsaw stones such as this: and yet I am here, remembering,
Cleaved by the cutlass of my young bones-
Wanting to live with her for eighty years and forever-
Heartbroken, crying for more of her young leftovers,
Even though we made love three days ago, and that was Valentines.

Robert Rorabeck

That We Ought To Be

Pulling their joyous scars far away:
Where will her sisters go, across the dirty roads
Overblown with minnows and the color blue
Diminishing into the occultish forest where the dragons
Roll the dice;
And there are little holes who widen where children
Are always disappearing into the exponential dungeons,
Growing muscles and beards:
There are continents down there, and volcanoes,
And I carry dozens of roses barefooted and right over
Their graves,
While my great uncles water ski; and I can feel her blowing out
The wishes on the back of my neck-
And she makes it so that I feel like I don't have to rob banks
Anymore:
My, Alma- my savage balm: and very soon it will be Christmas: she will be my tannebaum, and the trailer barks will Sway their corrugations underneath the winter sun,
Just as the waves go and the windmills. And the new immigrants
Arrive gun weary from Mexico:
They are no longer conquistadors, but they are returning
Our continent again to the brown aridness which grew so many Quixotic mirages
Who from which the rockets are always shooting off in gold mines
Of heroic clouds
Who many or may not be pregnant, but I hope that she still loves
Me anyways,
As the families hold hands underneath the roller coasters, becoming More and more anemic, kissing and embracing,
So very soon even their pictures will disappear and we won't Have to look at anymore movie pictures of their holidays in the Day-laboring orchards to have to make guesses upon who we Are, or at least who we have decided that we ought to be.

Robert Rorabeck

That Which I Always Was

Hang up your hardships
On my shoulder,
And come through the apartment's
Blue door;
And I will take them up from
The grasses of many-legged murder,
And weave them into a vest
I can proudly wear-
It has been many years since I've seen you,
But I am still here, where you remember
The starvations, the second story, and the things
We failed in,
But do not shed another tear,
For it will not matter,
But only punctuate the unpronounced
Awakening of twilight:
And cause another imperfection-
She will come through the window
And own us here,
And it is not for us to say a thing,
For I recognize that I am a lonely man,
As I was meant to be,
After you came to your decision,
And I cannot forgive you or ask you to change,
For all of this has past,
And we have both taken our permanent names:
But you can sit with me, if you wish,
In the desolate room you long ago left,
And see with me what I am in uncomplicated silence:
For I will only look at you
And say here, with closed lips,
My eyes the only orators of this light-
What you were never for sure,
That which I always was....

Robert Rorabeck

That Will Never Be Sold

Swamp of midgets and garden snakes-
I am not well:
I send folded paper over to you as a pointed Hullabaloo-
I am the kind of feral you wouldn't know too
Well,
I live my life charging the pin wheeling shadows
When no one else is home,
And none of it will sell: I jack off onto the Green carpet of prehistory-
I used to climb mountains, but now they are Silent with expeditious snowfall all through their Cramped dells:
And you sell your wine, and you charm the Insatiable fraternities: I listen to the crickets repeating
In séance the vastness of my night,
All that will never be sold.

Robert Rorabeck

That Wonderful Old English Summer

Parks of rum and the stars and Nothing to do all weekend
But eat hotdogs and look at houses and Think of girls,
Hair curling around their ears like waves around
Their wharfs,
All strung out in their lovely homeless beds,
In their homeless rooms so unlike the unnecessary
Fairytale in the ballparks of your forgetful children,
And not a one of them really aflame with witchcraft:
Not a one of them homeless, or nameless,
Or jumping trains;
And so my words are perfect for them, bred and Grown around the segues of the earthy suburbia;
And the night really isn't asleep,
And so nothing will really be waking up in the morning:
And my words really aren't anything special-
They aren't even beautiful: they may be ducks in a pond,
Mindless of the airplanes perpetually leaping overhead,
Who themselves are unaware of the greater tundra
And the Aurora Borealis that I can't even spell,
Which squats there like a maiden metamorphosed from A may pole on a way to Chaucer's hometown in the middle
Of that wonderful Old English summer or somewhere
Even more beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

That Wonderous Religion That I Name After You

I have been up and down the trail
In all seasons, hoping for you as the aspens
Change:
There can be nothing more beautiful than
Your absence along my misspelled
Highways-
Alone in the suburbia's after crepuscule, all the Mailboxes down,
The power lines singing in swaybacked choruses,
Erin in her heirlooms really caring nothing
For me;
In Saint Louis or Colorado, and further up;
And in those mountains of lightning storms and Torn presents where the topiaries of Giants sing,
Where the hermits guzzle and the ghosts tank;
Then I have seen you there- a muse of my nourishments,
And I have let every sort of weather drench me
In the milky bath of stars, in the cloistered perfumes
Of wild rosaries,
I have said my prayers while the antlers jounced like Courtesans,
And you laid in your absent beds with your more precious
Men,
The ceiling fans caracoling your sepias features;
Never knowing that my feet continuously beat as hotly as Unconditional candles
For that wondrous religion that I name after you.

Robert Rorabeck

That You Ever Were

So I've been to high school and even while Trying to write in between the lines drunk liquor, drunk
Liquor and pulled back far too late to be something truly
Beautiful,
While I was up like fireworks on that roof far past midnight,
Trying to make love to pretty legionaries even while they Were marching off to serve
Their country: to serve their men with fine legs and even finer
Gin:
Well, I don't know that I've had all but three wishes, and in the Dynamos of Colorado, Haven't I already used
Them to conjure up what my body could not move:
I've summit mountains from the basins of my patriotism,
And the bosoms of those glacial lakes, I've wished that you would Have letters to give to me to send to your less ambiguous men
Those steaming fine young men who were just climbing down
From your Cleopatra-ian neck, from your chimney, because that Was just how easy it was for them.
While you were selling wine or making clay portraits; while I was A sick and dying animal in the zoo; and then I moved into the butterfly-
House, and pretended my name was mariposa while I awaited
Out the hours, awaiting for you: Sharon, you are my sick muse,
And you will go on continuously through the traffic:
You will be blue and bruised, but otherwise you will continue on Forever, because I have made a motion to the country into which you Cannot be disproved:
I have made that motion, and you are now that thing that goes still suckling your First born child, still whiffing the bouquets of your firstborn boudoir:
Sharon, Sharon: I am not a superstar, but you remain yet the first Hour of my sumptuous presumptions, Sharon:
Bruised of eye; you are yet all that I am, or, of course, all that you ever were.

Robert Rorabeck

That You Loved Me

Silly whispers from the backsides of trucks
Echoing all of the way up the canyons like the bouquets
Of throats opened to lovers;
And all of it a dream of fireworks in emollition to
The heavens,
Sweating pinwheels, and doing time for the nudity of Angels;
And if I held you here in my palm, like a kitten sweating,
You would look up to me with those deep brown
Eyes all the way from another country
That I found and stole right here- and you said my Name,
Like weather speaking through the lips of a windmill;
Well, then you had my soul,
And your name illustrated my body- and I reverberated
As if I was some creature trying to breathe my love
For you through a glass, through an atmosphere-
Shedding in metamorphosis through so many illustrious Classrooms,
Trying to pretend without a doubt, Alma- Alma, that you
Loved me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hypnotic Memories Of Her Goods

Are you still spilling Cimarron
After the peddlers have gushed
Amidst the stones
And tufts of grass:
Pullulated halfway through by
The territorial savages
Who streamed down the red cliffs
Which have no shores;
The gypsies of her concourse
Who showed you her open eyes,
And pawned her teeth on strings of filament,
Now the tatters of Lincoln's plan,
Their wares her legs pillaged
From their sacks,
Put together and raped
Behind the orange caravanserai,
Now bastards spill out like tadpoles
With last names:
Croaking the fatherless weather,
They dry into husks beside their Vivisected fosterers
Scattered in the murderer's crop
Banners of clothing hung in the briars
Where her nape still glistens
The hypnotic memories of her goods.

Robert Rorabeck

The 4th Of July

There's my girl
With somebody else's guy
In her witch's costume
On the 4th of July.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abandoned Amusement

The scoundrel should pay that off for you.
He gave you that perfect teathed smile,
His alibi,
And then left you in the dreary parking lot
Of superhero mice,
And spiraled down like one of those
Airplanes which lost in the sky,
The communism of bad dream;
Now, the open spaces like a bricked wall,
The growling lights attracting the moth people,
And the moon the mouth of the well.
Standing there in the chilly mortgage,
You soon realized that you had never loved him;
But you don't cry out,
As he comes around again and apologizes,
Takes you away through the secret passage;
Holds your hand like precious ribbon and bone,
Kisses one three hundredth of you,
But you never lived in his room again,
Though your eyes refer to it at dinner,
And soon you had slipped away into a warmer marriage.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abandoned Court

Pigeons high above the honking streams,
Smoke stacks in the cold chapped air,
Leaves as dead as the love I've never felt,
The bread trucks unloading stale loaves at
The derelict supermarkets,

Shakespeare is in a tidal pool where the river
Has thrown up the flat tires,
Marlowe is down on his knees, his eye poked
Out from a vengeful branch,

Her lips are tired from their taste tests,
But his neck is still hungry, and his chest warm-
He is a refugee from Nigeria, with a faux gold watch,
That keeps calling her eyes to it,
Like willful sparrows stealing time, lining a gaudy nest,

I do not wear enough clothing for this unfaithful weather,
And my lips expel the fume of a rimy heart,
Like the heavy exhaust geysers up from the silver bumpers,
In long congested trails of mechanical asses,
Chassis of tremendous strength, lost and grazing in the Deeply rutted spheres, and the empty windows like the poached
Nests of wrens,

Stolen in the urban sprawl, the bodies move like willful mannequins,
I am in love with my girlfriend from another world,
Sometimes her name is meaningful though in a savage park,
Laid down in the homeless newspapers of vandalized wood;
I try to cry to her once again, but the buildings raise soundless tombs;
Thus my meanings end up lost in the abandoned court.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abandoned Horns Of Kings

Revealed like the strange regresses of a crowd
After the baseball game is over:
The heavens fluctuating over the life in the sea:
Schoolyards in Colorado
Metamorphosing as they cry tantalizingly.
The cemeteries creak like old
Swing sets
The older and new lovers have abandoned,
Leaving only the penumbra of the moon
That sways over everything,
Positioning the crickets over the wildflowers,
And causing the moss to grow over the abandoned
Horns of kings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abandoning Natures Of Their Own Front Yards

Now you've ridden your horse victoriously from the battle
And shouted something in mestizo—
Made a tomb out of what once must have been my summer—
Blinding my eyes before I could see you wandering somewhere Aimlessly through the portables outside of Art class—you were either skipping history or social studies—
In a state of southern Mexico—
And in the night, the lamps fell upon the laughter of the Children of the skulls—and you turned your eyes
To the delights of dead theatres
In the alleys that were as stunted as dwarfs—even then,
Your skin was perfect—and you became pregnant with your First child as you lost your virginity in a classroom of
The frontera—while the airplanes were always creating espionage
Above you—I don't even know that they ever believed In what they were doing—or if they were supposed to—
And when I somehow found you, wasn't it already too late:
You would make love to me, but I was already defeated—
And you run on forever, victoriously whooping—
And hypnotizing chickens as you found them—
Swinging them in your arms and calling your children to Come and see them—like real life miracles happening
Out in the abandoning natures of their own front yards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abominable Metal Of This Unrequited Winter

I suffer alone, like a premature baby in an incubator,
And the pitch-fork pines lumber straight up
Outside my yellow house:
The few rooms are filled with the ghosts that other people
Let in,
While she is soft and warm in a movie theatre tucked
Into the chest of the man who used to beat her,
Who she loves,
And the doors swing wide and sound hollow like good
Watermelons,
And the young bodies enjoy their young times like Fieldtrips to water parks in the summer:
My soul blisters on the abominable metal of this unrequited
Winter,
As if housewives who have no children to call home to dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arboreal Gymnasiums Of Alma's Forever Brown Eyes

Dying in the midday courts for awhile
We share ourselves as
We look up into the open and sunny mouths
Of feral gods,
Like the luckily living grandchildren of Titans,
Caged up with the ceiling fans over the oceans;
And when the winds blow like kisses
Over the resorts of her brown ears,
I can lay low and pretend to be mortally wounded,
Over an adolescent carpet crawling with blue millipedes,
With the horseflies rattling at the doors,
And the summer storms cutting across the fields
Just like overly eager young boys stripping off all of their Clothes to finally fall down into the prenatal
Ballrooms of the blessed light that just so happens to fall
Before the arboreal gymnasiums of Alma's forever brown eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Abscent Minded Heart

Gas tanks spill over with rum—Oh bright muse,
Bright starlight—
And lighthouses—if cars could only run on liquor:
Well then,
This is the body of your pledge—that he will becoming a home
To you again tomorrow—
And it doesn't matter how much money you owe me—
You will attribute to him again and again for so many tomorrows
Even if he never takes you to another amusement ride
In all of your life—and you equate him to all of the Pestilent spheres of all of your cousins—
I plan to make of a study out of my garage—and if I cannot sleep,
I want you to buy me virulent if plastic roses:
And I want to die in the cathedrals where there are no fanfares:
I do not wish for any gilded coins—because this is the place
Where I tend to believe in or to inherent,
And you are forgetting me and growing further and further
Away from me—
The ocean next to your elbow is throwing up,
Trying so hard so that you will mention him: the bats fly down
And kiss the unicorns, and that becomes the most absolute
Abhorrence, or the closest thing you ever knew of love,
While my dogs echo me in what once were my bachelor's Cathedrals- and then there becomes a time for this and
A time for that—
In the morning: bodies, cathedrals—and the absentminded
Heart of a feral cat.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absolute Belief

Distances are gone as the paper airplanes
Are folded and the Ferris Wheels
Yawn up to the lesser gods in the clouds,
And elephants remember the sound of the phone
Ringing,
And I have touched myself to the sound of her voice
Which brought in the weather
Fronts
And the spikenards of dear boys, while the horses
Ran, collecting
Patinas around the copper fences:
The conquistadors slept all kittycornered up to their Stone crosses in the shallow knees of the mangroves,
And then we said our blessings
Under the stamp of traffic lights, and when the song
Finally came it blessed us
And the reasons for our existence ran like the unstymied
Blood from a wound that open in
All of us the absolute belief that we were really there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absolute Delusions Of Love

Here, I want to fall in love,
Right in the passions of the singing garden,
Rich with insects and serpents,
The very few reasons meandering through the Grass and up to her display,
That the world was first found and then blazed in the Fullness of an immaculate kiln,
Found sport with werewolves and the fording knights
Who were too brave and overzealous and aloud
Their feral enemies to meet them halfway,
Which was their failure,
Like most languages who enter into their species
After bedtime and a few measly dinners of grubs
Until the hardnosed call girls of vampires beat them to The bleachers,
And called up a brutal symphony which snapped every neck
In the hillside of windmills, as if stringing up horse thieves
Before a picnic of wildflowers,
And killed at the absolute delusions of love I'd been at having.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absolute Jealousness Of The Sun

If you feel like a sliver in my side, Alma,
Where am I now,
But out of church and school, trying to put together
Better words to fool you out of his bed;
But you are in a pretty house, and all alone with your Family,
Though I desire your love, as I have watched you spreading
Rose pedals with your breath;
And when I told you that it was you who would kill me,
You only laughed:
And now I am dancing for you, doing this again in my Friendly darkness,
The bottle to my lips as if I were a child instead of a ghost,
As if this were the floor of the sea,
Instead the jagged hook of a mountain who was catching
All the gods to show you the way
The silver and gold flowers wriggle the perfume of their Deity for you in the absolute jealousy of the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absolute Queen Of Beasts

Nothing returns from this inky rejoin:
The cradles going to sleep in her mountains,
The airplanes and
Traffic too: all going to sleep, inebriated
And burped off of her,
And she considers it to be good, as she pats
The sheet metal backs,
As her eyes roll cookie dough for tomorrows
Lunch.
She has stopped by early sometime before
Noon just to sell some gambits to me,
And I walked out and followed her around like
A friendly rabbit after a puppy dog,
And she led me like a wolf leading its lamb,
Smacking its jaws and dusting its chaps.
Now that tomorrow is over she isn't even sure that
I live,
While into her soft bed of long legged mountains
Her steadily melting stream of patrons gives
And gives,
And never seem to wear out their admiration for
The absolute queen of beasts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absolute Runways Of Your Favorite Color

In the morning if your child is healed
Then I will see you:
As a brave night, I will caracole the brown kilns of
Your womb,
And whisper that our children will have a twenty five percent
Of blue eyes
If you can believe me, if you really love the flag I have Spun from the cocoons of this loneliness:
Of course I will dance for you, and pop my guns:
And I will buy you lunch, Alma,
And dream of farmlands with you, and fields rich with Sparkling red fruit that we are not allowed
To eat but we always do
With pits of rubies that can fit across your fingers which would Otherwise become the venomous gazes of a serpent in his Genius of envy;
And I will whisper into your ear of bravery, and the cool
Zoetropes of movie theatres, and the aloe beside the carports
Where we shouldn't be allowed to move,
Except to kiss soft,
And if you have ever seen snow, and ask you to differentiate Between the different shades of green to figure out and Pinpoint the absolute runways of your favorite color.

Robert Rorabeck

The Absoluteness Of An Unrequited Shore

Cold as the spaces of a new sinner's void,
How could you travel so far away from me without Breathing:
You were my birthday wish since thirteen,
And now see how brightly my eldest candles are Burning:
A forest fire torn from the horizon of your back-turned Away and blazing,
Swimming to the graveyard washed by all that yesterday,
And my loneliest dreams left starving and oh
So beautiful as your gowns pulled away revealing
The absoluteness of an unrequited shore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Accords Of Our Hollowed Earth

Juvenile roses in my throat as always,
Feet kicking as they swing over a graveyard of paramours:
The light douse as if in a funeral of Merry go rounds, and there is no need to save
My little sister, for she has bested me:
She has sewn her own wedding gown in her sleep,
While the lighthouse twinkled the brail of its crippled though
Fairyland deep;
And I meant to spill all of my wishes into your at once,
Alma:
I meant to give you all of the gifts that sleep in my body
Waiting for you,
But I get as nervous as something feral waiting for you to Abandon its meal;
I want to love you by so many ways, even though the sun
Hurts my eyes,
And I am not making enough money for you to Truly remember me; but I have bought you bouquets and I
Have eaten lunch with you in your car;
And I have made you say to me that you love me, which is like
Leaping up to caress an impossible star:
But now your children need you again: your children are waking
Up again,
And I love them as I love you, as their bones stretch like ribbons
Underneath the hungry billboards which mouthlessly speak
To the accords of our hollowed earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Aces' Element

In the middle of the mechanic's summer,
Defeated by the upper presumptions,
I wait for snow;
No longer liberal, I get drunk at air shows,
Have hallucinations of her eyes
Through the thorny cornfields;
The floraline cactus prick the plane propellers;
The Japanese zeros fishing in the cornucopias;
The blistered space I see full of prime letters,
The little tricks she plays to escape her impressive father,
To sneak away to the debtors prison,
And marry the Christian author there who Self published before the arid blizzard, the great depression
Of tin-can squatters, the early death
Hungry in the gas tank of the bank robbers' Hudson,
Sleeping on the concrete riverbanks beneath
The buzzing overpasses;

The squash and orchids vibrate with the Hesitant rain shower's full presumption;
Then she steps out of the passenger's door and stands up-
She is always seven in the staggering hills of brambly windmills,
A gift from France,
Turning heads like rubbernecked gawkers;
The factory workers winnowing this invisible commodity,

As her lips do, breathing-
Her heart the thumping propeller turning towards the Scorch and burn, as Sherman's army marched to the sea;
The snowbirds migrate towards the trailer parks at the lips of Kind waves,
The silver birds turn and gyre in inevitable majesty above
Our uninhibited brow;
We are the proletariat watching the rehearsal of better angels' wow;

The staged dogfights we pay to see,
Her legs scissor like the aces' element,
The streamlined accompaniments of bombshell evolution,
The sexy companion to lucky though lesser men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Adolescent Epiphany

Show us how to see the colorings your dreams wear,
When you travel far away
Across the silent land your eyes hide when resting.
Find a way so that we can come with you,
And be the man you hold hands with when sleepwalking.
For if you go across the Mississippi
Barefoot tracks the muddy banks
In a heavy down pour,
Far away from where the cars' headlights
Are a blurry procession conjoining cities,
Let us meet you halfway on the flooding delta
To whisper as raindrops caressing
To kiss the foolish brow to become so lost
To not even see us when we pull up
And open this door offering a dry land
Where you could spend awhile
With the naiads and paramours
We have collected on the other side of the canal
Since our child-hood.
This is where your lost brother lives,
To where your toys have gone missing.
There is a meaning to this menagerie of truancy,
As we are coming now in a patchwork melody
All the things you haven't thought of before
For so long, reappearing like the adolescent epiphany
And this is true that we never knew you,
Though we have gone around and around
As best we could trying to figure you out.
When you eyes are closed is the best time to see you,
For you appear to us a lost child
On the wind swept hill looking upwards
As the futile zephyrs attempts to motivate the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Adulations Of Her Tactile Ballrooms

I see the weathervanes rippling like old women
Over the top mast of a house I've never lived
In,
And it occurs to me my words are flowers I've never Smelled.
Reoccurring, amputated from a forest where
The rich sororities sing;
And I am just a runaway, like a sailor who keeps
On wanting to drown just so he can see one last time
The vibrant, off-giving light of Whatever lighthouse is nearest his busy hand;
And the dogs are on the road.
The rattlesnakes pullulate in the ditches with the magician's Rabbits
Who dream even while they are being eaten of making love
With his dwarfish assistant,
And rubbing up against her snow white skin,
While she makes the tender eyes of a used car salesmen-
Until everything that I have never done quite right
Really gets blown out of proportion,
And they gain tails as they fireball over birthday parties,
Becoming more and more real as they quickly disappear over
The adulations of her tactile ballrooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Adulations Of My Senses

Guts of languid piñatas: soft birthdays of quieting holidays:
Lighted in the birthdays of Alma's little Boy:
And now this, and now this, a toy boat lost in the last
Real sea,
Peppered by the stars, like a hickey on my shoulders she left
Me to travel on home to him:
Sure to fade,
While the pregnant snake suns its belly in the grasses
That are whispering,
Gossiping with each blade- and what does the sunlight do
But go on a fieldtrip:
It doesn't even fall in love with anything; it is just stepping
Through,
While high above it in every morning of everyday:
You lavish your brown shoulders underneath the softball sun:
Turn on your perfumes,
And puckering in the declivities and the come ons of Your overpriced dollhouse, drive into
To work underneath the water coolers of the adulations of My senses.

Robert Rorabeck

The Adventures Of Cadavers

I have a new magic such as Ajax.
Look at me shouldering the words of playboys-
I am not struggling-
I get along better when I am not breathing, when the playboys that I knew for awhile have come down from either of their clouds and are looking soft and ethereal in the movie theatres abandoned of their clouds-it is a planet, affixed in wax-the better children huffing their better ethers paying their better taxes-but I still have to look up and into your eyes-

Fox, vixen, who are not real, turning the tomboy into the jack rabbits of your brambles-

Families that grow up kidnapped, the apex of our love letters only awaken for a brevity of an awhile, and then it is done:
the fireworks are spent,
the tents are taken down, and the lovers are left to remember the remnants of their families-

cenotaphs of days taken off at the elbows, unemployed at the apertures of ever wave-

and I am spent without a thought-and even the living neighborhoods are made to haunt-beautiful for awhile, the words in their mothy wardrobes are left the take on the adventures of cadavers-but the underbellies of airplanes are soft and waxenand even as I have fallen, they are leaping, and leaping forever.

The Afore Mentioned Ever-Loving Sky

If I am going to die tomorrow: I am going to die,
Without any shade of mountains,
Like a naked army marching in without any shadows:
Then this is my chicken-sh%t denouement or something else
In which cannot be believed in:
If I had any guts I would have strung myself like a piñata over
The abolitionist crick tonight,
But none of this is real anyways, Alma: and if I am going today,
I rather that it would be in the arms of your smoking car,
Because otherwise you should know that my ghost
Is going to live forever,
Like a hungry child with your name in his lips, that you loved
Me but it was for little more than a moment,
While the ever loving sun and the ever loving moon played
Their ever loving game of cards
In the afore mentioned ever-loving sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Afternoon Goddess

Laughing as they could in their rooms of the groomless
Proud:
The way they looked up on their brooms sweeping up in the Sky far away from how I felt:
Glistening from the school yard, making a marmalade sweep of My tomb;
And I thought that it looked so pretty, and the lions could Almost be heard yawning-
Like the alligators- like the pyramids: and Alma got up in the sleek
Sunshine and arose:
Her armpits glossy with sweat and primrose: and the coral
Snakes watched her from the windowsill as she dressed:
And the otters played- and then they regressed:
And the bicycles all looked sloppy beneath the slopes of Turpentine:
And I got on one of the seats on the bus as it drove down the Street and I bit my lip;
I bit my tongue- and then it returned us from School to our home,
Like children pursuing ants on a baseball diamond:
All I could think of was to make her mine- as the clouds shed
Their illusions in the sky:
But waiting for us at home was only lonely cartoons:
As it happened- the muse, the afternoon goddess was nowhere
Around;
But the paper airplanes folded up upon themselves, and the aircondition
Cursed the stewardesses who were also nowhere around.

Robert Rorabeck

The Afternoon's Royal Sky

Awakened into the morning of your

Echo:

I can hear the lawnmower purring beneath the Dragonflies:

The dragonflies are cerulean,

But they do not know your name, as the airplants

Blush in the armpits of the cypress

And my little sister comes outdoors,

Blond and satanic:

She at first kisses a crocodile,

And then a coral snake before going back indoors:

And I wait for you amidst the

Mortified litters beneath the papered trees

As cicadas disrobe on the bark,

Like knights becoming naked for

Witches,

And the airplanes bath in the yawning and leonine

Throats of the afternoon's royal sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Afternoon's Swimming Pool

With your spyglass,
Burn the hyper-active
Centipede-
Create the leaping
Energy that
Makes words disappear.
Roll up the tinfoil
Into a crude bowl
And smoke your Mother's weed
While masturbating
In the afternoon's
Swimming pool,
In the tall green
Grass
Whispering beside
The blue canal;
There prehistoric
Alligators swimming,
The hazy shadows
Which last forever
Eating the neighborhood's
Dogs,
Obscure reflections
Of a girl you once
Knew
Casually, ten years
Ago,
Staring up at you....

Robert Rorabeck

The Afternoon's Thunder

Yellowness in the hoods of butterflies
As I sleep underneath of the School busses
And another day turns around exchanging sunlight
For rain across the oilslicks from
The oil pans-
And the otters play in the forensics of canals
And I cannot believe that you cannot see them:
Maybe it is because you are looking at me
As the zoo has fallen down around itself
And the waves culminate in the haywire
Of a trapeze of so many mouths
With the lions yawning in the basins
The echoes of which bring the spoils of
The afternoon's thunder.

Robert Rorabeck

The Age Old Terrapin

Wordless Calliope- what are you,
Standing there
As a blue monument: what do you mean
After so much tragedy;
The Roman Candles are only shooting forth
A jealous blue,
And another night is ruined into the world:
The monuments float unstructured:
The witches curse the baseball diamonds,
And the schoolyards aren't even fully formed:
The air-conditioning escapes outdoors
And all of the football teams lose, lose:
And I lye weeping underneath the school bus
Even as it rains and the age old terrapin
Eats my muse-
My muse.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ages Of The Sea

If I passed away in
The ages of the sea,
Would you come
To remember me in
The trailer parks of
Your eyes-
As if I'd been sleeping,
Kissed by the rattlesnakes
Who've crawled on their Bellies
Across
The mowed yards of
The retirement homes-
Because even if I do
Not exit now,
I am coming home to
Where once you lived.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes And The Castles Too

You seem to have told me that I could see
A thousand things from your windowsill—
But so tomorrow all of those promises will be burning
And the airplanes and your castle too—
My ears will be engulfed by all of the echoes of The sea shells from your pretty seas—
And then we will go home tomorrow without Holding hands—and some other man will have Scaled the mountain that was always meant for Me—

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Are Almost Gone

This is the landscaped
Theatre I've been working in;
The girls prance through like
The stock of beef stew;
I've seen them up in the Gallery; I've heard them
Gossiping like
Faeries in the hollow trees
Planted in perfect rows
Down the streets of the University;
Perfect graveyards lit blue
By the transoms of Churchyards,
Girls living here I never knew,
Like princesses at Disney World.
Now the rush hour's traffic sounds
And the airplanes are almost gone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Are Touching Down

Turned out, burning through the Elephantine joy: on another plain, stuck between Where the airplanes fly:
And all of the windows looking out into the world,
Looking across the canals that the little Girls skip to see the comets,
Or to ring in the new year: words on a patio with Green things all around.
The night is an orchestra. The fruits globe
Her ankles perfumed in jasmine and rich geraniums-
They seem to be whispering,
And foxes:
And the airplanes are touching down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Brush The Meadows

In crooked time in school,
Butterflies chewed up by the shoulder blades of lawnmowers,
Perfumes of the substitutes wayfaring out of the open
Windows
Like the armpits of geniis, as we go like this swimming over
The crocodiles and away from the lilies of the school:
Go across the canal, and far into the pines-
And deep into the meandering suburbias and into never minds-
There the shadows freckle and dapple our imaginations
Of girls,
