And the sweat runs down our boyish necks, as the tadpoles
Curl in the brackish shadows:
Soon they will be returning too- like fireworks dying into Fish- the manmade highways of their wishes finding Them wives above the saddles of turtles,
And deeper once the brushstrokes are removed,
The cenotaphs of conquistadors on their blue maidenhoods
Of wishes- where they swim in their stewing echoes,
While the housewives hearts flutter, and the airplanes brush
The meadows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Coming Indoors

Then there is a womb opened in a new Holiday,
Bright with her children and blind snow storms:
All of the wolves make a surplus
Around the orchard of her
Little house,
And the snakes hang down from their
Christmas trees,
Tired from their gossiping,
And her father's car, and her husband's car
Wait outside—
The day is equally beautiful, and she lays brown-
Eyed with her children
And never has to worry about the airplanes
Coming indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Fly

Lost in the waves of busses,
And now she is pregnant and the most likely
Parable- well, words anyway:
And she flows through graveyards like the
The prom dresses of weather vanes:
There she goes, anyways, melting like ice-cream
For the ants who come up to
Watch the parade- as it rains- as it rains,
And she does as she does,
As the dogs run around the tracks- as the white rabbits
Disappear into hats:
Animals just doing their jobs:
As the waves break, the windmills turn,
And the airplanes fly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Fly

Lost in the waves of busses,
And now she is pregnant and the most likely
Parable- well, words anyway:
And she flows through graveyards like the
The prom dresses of weather vanes:
There she goes, anyways, melting like ice-cream
For the ants who come up to
Watch the parade- as it rains- as it rains,
And she does as she does,
As the dogs run around the tracks- as the white rabbits
Disappear into hats:
Animals just doing their jobs:
As the waves break, the windmills turn,
And the airplanes fly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplanes Going To Places They Cannot Explain

The house is beautiful: laying flat on my back in the fruiteria
Next to the water cooler and looking up at Alma,
How her juvenile curves float and molest the very air:
Her brown skin the allure in the adolescent graveyards of thirsting
Firemen;
And I'll wake up and enjoy the workday next to her, and then
She'll go back home and water her rabbits and spank her naughty children
On Cherry Road where more than a few Mexicans live:
All the pretty girls who are more pretty than the girls I went to school
With,
If only because they've never had to go to school with anyone:
They been out picking in the fields and putting homeopathic tattoos
On the webs of their thumbs
Their shared sub consciousnesses waking up in the dusty grottos of Guerro, Mexico, looking up like brown legged misfits
At the airplanes going to places that they cannot explain,
That they have no beliefs in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airplane's Heartbeat

Cold tools making sad parks,
Dredging the beds for the censers of feet
Arching while they smoke
Repeating their flight plan under all that Deciduous shade at night-
Car horns of penny candy,
Ghosts going round, pomaded and slick
The undercurrents of the weighted hooves;
And the sky seems to do tricks;
A little boy stealing things from a cleft
A stewardess offered, the salty shoals after The waters left: And look at those eyes,
A home,
A watery mouth, a thing that no one believed,
Wombs for hotels and infants,
Corded vines a school yard for sunbathing
Serpents,
Her promises' accord, your lunch in a box
With lashes and seeds;
Your eyes look up to the airplane's heartbeat:
And she told you her hand moving back and forth
Like rudder or a fin,
That the ghosts of dead travelers could only finish
What she would begin;
And you pressed your mouth to her gears under the School bus while the sky bled heliotrope and opal,
And came into her month,
While the school emptied in a hush of shoes and Bags; but you kept your mouth to her bush,
Moaning there the keystone wound,
Buttered marble, crying stone; and the sky held back
Sucking in its drums,
With nothing else to exclaim, until all of her mothers
Were quieted, knickknack and dusted into their Indistinguishable homes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Airy Cylinders

Basking in the glowing death,
The pantomimes surrender to our health.
My house looks beautiful when you look it
In the mouth,
And from here you can go down the stairs
To anywhere:
The fields of venison that are still alive,
Like the basic moats for estranged lovers,
Or the ghosts of fast moving cars
And it all seems so tenderly surreal
As I lift the airy cylinders to my lips
And pretend again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Alabaster Mountains

Suppositions to the stars or anywhere:
I cry out in the tiniest of bedrooms to all of the gods
Or to anyone—
To hear me now,
Touching myself,
And trying to make an entertainment to the paper airplanes—
To call together now all of the centerfolds,
That in this place shall be Altogether our amusements—
And to make an amusing charade out of the sun and
The stars—
At least until I have a little more money—
And, as the soonest prophecies are received—
To remember the arbitraries of the silk road—
To remember anywhere that seems to languish
In their tomorrow—
To cut across the opened throats of the alabaster
Mountains and thus to proceed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Alamo

I meet the girls,
And then I meet the ladies:
The Alamo is already coming down and
All the men are dead
And drinking rum; the patron is dead-
Someone says he is my father,
But there are no clouds tonight, no way to return into
This:
This girl tonight she wore a two piece bathing suit as
She opened the door;
She seemed to say that everything was going to be Alright, but I can't say if she was sure:
She wanted to start off on top of me, but she made
Me so happy,
I pressed her like a buttercup or like a bluebell to The floor:
As if we were on the high planes again, drifting without Phonebooths;
And I swore- that only the men in red and white
Lived to tell the tale,
Like her toenails who kept the same names since
Christmas;
She was like a Pegasus or Christian, and it wasn't my Place to explain to her
What we were fighting for.

Robert Rorabeck

The Albino Alligator

Like the dissected rainbow of abused starlets
Like the beginning or the end of my misappropriated
Hope
That I cannot see the outcome for, and yet the sea
Is certainly some busy yard of beautiful graveyard and nursery:
And my parents are going away,
And as I jogged alone for you, I saw the first happenstance of A prism leaping like a colorful gazelle from the asphalt:
And my mother couldn't do any better than loving my Father,
And I love you this way, like a gagged symphony, like the last Stripes of a fish who knows she will not survive even while She bares her young to the unthoughtful spectacles of the Deep,
As you bared yourself for me maybe for the last time,
As I lamented the loss of the tall swing sets
And then I brushed your lips and yours to mine in the hidden
House beside the albino alligator who seemed to smile
Up at us a smile you swore to me you had never seen before.

Robert Rorabeck

The All Night Party Going On Next Door

Aerobuses are always leaping in the sky
Because it is what they were made to be Doing,
And I've been published a few times,
And right now the wind is really Seriously
Blushing;
While in my time, I looked beautiful,
I skipped school,
And I was accused of plagiarism,
Because it was what I was made to be doing,
And when I drink enough my vision starts
Flashing,
Like a silent movie,
And I grow a gut under the green shirt,
Even though earlier
I was jogging,
And pretty soon I will be selling Christmas trees,
Because it is what I'm Going to get paid for,
And I'll even be delivering Christmas into Beautiful barmaids' bedrooms,
And I'll be thinking of my two muses,
Even though they don't care for me,
My immortal candle is burning,
And I've made them famous even if the casual world
Cares to realize it or not:
I've made you famous,
And Nicky has promised to visit me,
But if she sees me, she'll probably vomit,
But I could be her committed terrapin if she let me,
Or just her plutonic folklore:
I could live forever a heavy lawn ornament propping her door:
I could do so many things,
Until I was knighted, or introduced
To saint hood
At the all night party going on next door.

The All Too Familiar Hallways

What does it mean to be falling apart—head-room
Like a skull and antlers waiting there beside the highway
That itself had already passed—
Mantle-piece to the moonlight,
Zoetrope without any fingers to lay across;
And you are in another man's bedroom far afield
From the here and now.
What little things you say to his ear canal
Wound me without even being heard—
What things you continue to give to him you never Thought to steal from me—
And the schools will reopen in the fall,
And thoughts of you will come around like ghosts
Of little children lost in the all too familiar hallways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Allegories Of Her Beautiful Landscape

Temporal continents of the sky are beautiful at dusk,
And the way the shadows stretch knowing
They will soon distend and hold court by
The alcoholic light of another moon;
Thus when the mountains seem to sway like
Her spine in bed with her dogs,
I know I can be diminished beneath them,
Because I am able to love a woman who doesn't Know me, since she cannot understand how she Might exist at the same time in each wave off
The hypnotic sea, how she might foam and crush
Upon the nipples of malleable wharf where she has Never ambled- So, she becomes the world stretched Away into the back seat of a hypothetical car,
With each blade of grass twittering the light of her
Carry-on luggage. When nude and fully washed,
She is like a tan otter chattering brightly in the Bubbling springs of its hermitage, and lounging there
Like a vein of gold. I produce pearls for her throat
From my heart where the pain has been cooking long Enough to appear a sphere of beauty, when pressed
Against her breathing neck, like an opal collar,
Gives its accentuation to the allegories of her beautiful Landscape.

Robert Rorabeck

The Allegory Of The Sea

I write for epitaphs on headless graves.
The wind kisses my fingers affectionately.
She wishes that I would shave;
She is as junoesque as the burnished sea,
And as clichéd: I said she should live in
The woods, by the pummel of a dead fallen
Tree, like a coffin still breathing,
And by night a busty epiphany, and opal
By which I stand erect and salute;
I mount by way of root, but waking up
She swims away, back to her bedroom
Far in the city, her eyes going wavering,
Wavering; awakened, she is the allegory
For the sea, doused in salt, yet living;
Her lips the well-meanings of what people
Mean to say; there nests an albatross, yet
To make house calls around our mast doused
In sun. I only wonder if I might stay my hand,
Or damn us all by kissing her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Already Vanishing Heavens

Switchbacks disappear halfway up the
Already vanishing heavens'
And you have to scramble with the hooks of
Your evolving soul'
And not even a single angel will take note
Of your most hollow of
Victories 'with only your car waiting down
There beneath you'
Headlights draining the battering like
Some type of parasitic intelligence'
Your sisters making love to their eventual men
In the deserts of another country'
Your father a prince with amnesia'
And your mother enthralled to a werewolf'
So you pin your art to the hidden classroom
In the apiary of her stone guts
Hanging breathlessly above tree line'
And you start out again, becoming enlightened by False summits 'the day perpetuating its
Perfect tattoos upon your skin'
The tourists dining beneath you,
And melting into the storefronts of her blossoming soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Always Impossible Being

Look at all I've been doing to myself:
Look at myself in the darkness as it crawls
Like midgets beside the house:
See how I lean my chin back to imbibe the first Floor boards of the coffin:
And the alligators are watching me carelessly from
The other side of the canal;
And the coral snakes are twisting up before them
Just the off color of corn snakes in Wonderful kissing balls
Where I couldn't find a movie tonight,
Nor could I find my love:
She is always married or taken alone down long
Muggy drives, never nodding to the castles I
Have built up like billboards-
I have done this to stop her breathing lessons;
Like a wave leaping, I suppose I have done this,
Or I am doing this again;
And down the street the kidnappers are getting lazy,
And the fair is packing up and taking away all the good Rides;
And Erin is off alone enjoying the airconditioning of Her new car- Or her soon to be new man,
And now the roads look really wonderful underneath
Several layers of moonlight; and it almost looks like
Spain,
And in a few hours the roads will look as if they are kept
By ghosts- and then they will be kept by ghosts
Until the morning comes, and the mailboxes are aroused,
And I remember dancing with you there,
Just off hand, hardly bothering the grass,
Until the morning and the dead and your truer love
Come into the always impossible being.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amber Beacons

I awakened up again today to hear another voice,
The same old voice clapping and making forays: the jungle of birthdays
And smoking candles like the incestual waters of a forest fire
Burning upside down:
They say I have all of these pains but it's just because I wear such a Heavy crown,
While all the cheerleaders slumber, while they beat their first under the half Opened shells of bridges,
While Alma also rests, more beautiful than any of them:
Alma, the soul of a lighthouse, saving even heroes: her world so bright green
But hidden, her bedroom I have never been to- her man of so many years
Coming back to her like to palms meeting in the prayers and the amber Beacons that Alma brings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amber Rose

Across that sea
The amber rose,
Beneath the waves
Of mid-west prairies,
Trailer parks wharf
Swim hermaphroditic mermaids,
The yeast of drunken eyes
Arises from swimming pools:
Hotels of cars
Parked in abandoned quarries:
Little girls celebrate
Angels on holiday's sundries:
Her hand on a blue pants leg
Far away
Where the sun is flipping
Picture books and roller coasters:
Caramel apples
And hot dogs:
Out of the dust bowl's tents
Palms are read,
Legs are shaved in Motel room's dusk
Parking lots of American flags
The preacher's walk
A wayward liquor's dance,
A nickel,
A dime,
A quarter's romance.
True love at thirteen,
And then tomorrow a
Hot fudge Sunday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ambergris Of The White Whales

Warmness distills the waterfalls.
And I am in China waiting for my children
To return from the community bath...
There are arrows in the walls and no
Computers to sell. My aboriginal family
Lives in Arizona, the other side of a
Toy earth from here. No one shopping
In the toy stores wants to remember me.
I am an anonymous playboy and all
But a superstar in this new CHINA.
NOW look at my skin and remember me. And in inks Sell to the world the ambergris of
The white whales-
Look up, Lo! A ufo!
An epiphany.

Robert Rorabeck

The American Basin

Dogs see
In black & white,
I don't know you,
But let you be my wife tonight;
And crawl over these blue felt blankets
In the rented dirge
Tracked near the combing seashells;
The second bedroom is unoccupied and the old window
Where the new immigrants are weeping like cats
Early on when they lived in the trailer under pines-
Let the eyes awaken upon the opal thigh,
The semiprecious stones of October,
Moon-rise;
Too early for high-school,
Tourists lost and becoming real in the Sonora Desert;
I can take you above tree-line,
Douse limbs in naked sun-shine-
Where the water flumes in the high cleft of Kit Carson Peak
Read you cursive of restless clouds;
Admire the obscured bones on our way down,
The wet premonition of the lightning storm,
And then tumble, retiring where
The anorexic aspens quiver, the punctuated dell where the golden
Discs are muted and doused-
The moon's slender penumbra lighting our bowers' home,
Humble in the wet dens of infant bears,
Brush your eyes with halleluiah lips, the recourse of feral automobiles;
Removing the garments which moved you unreal,
Placed you on the cloning grid; lit you like an Angel wearing a lampshade;
The rain destroys the papers of your barcodes,
The inexact definitions they incubate in encyclopedias-
The ways you thought to see before,
The diplomas of your hunger, the monuments of the blind phallus;
Hibernate until the hollow bones reawaken us
And we come out upon the perishing slopes
Where the queer sunlight is just starting to mine ghosts;
There we will see the yellow concerto leaping like Mephistopheles' willow sprig over the jaunting lips of the American Basin.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amnesias That We Can'T Even Remember

Boats are drunken every night,
Through the water spits of winos, and you and your Best friends are in your piss stained skivvies
Playing video games
Over the chalky cenotaphs of conquistadors:
As all of the frightened pennants fly
Advertising over the haughty caps of whatever new suburbia
You now live in;
While you don't even exist, but in the love letters that don't Mean anything to me anymore:
You don't even exist over the shoulders of South Carolina:
And all of the little boys have grown up,
Or been kidnapped down into the primordial living rooms of Alligators:
While it feels alright to kiss Alma's flesh, and light off
Bottle rockets while I am alone on the beach,
And the waves aren't even answering:
And the planes come like unreturning trumpets, like the Last wishes of her Aztec ancestors,
Like amphibian comets reminding ourselves of how we Will return,
Sacrifices for the holidays celebrated in the bright rooms
Where all of the inhabitants suffer from the amnesias
That we cant even remember.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amputee's Haiku

There is no harm in Holding a married wo-
Man's hand - -

Robert Rorabeck

The Amusement Rides

It is happening in the cul-de-sacs in which all of the housewives
Spume:

Birthing new likely cadavers into the worlds from the shopping
Malls of womb-

It is happening like the sweet end that gladdens like espionage
Like sunlight across the amusement rides between

Two related mountains- swaying through the fruit trees

Who lounge in the sated glades like tourists all too happy to

Never have known her summits;

And it is a ride I gladly take with my paper dolls and marionettes;

They are of a finely selected sorority, but they always

Keep me company- across the playgrounds and the soccer

Fields,

The kilns of muses sent to the elements: as Alma basks her infantile
Shoulders beneath the lumber mills of all of the elements;

And sings herself to sleep over songs of her beauty, her infantile

Daughter nuzzling up to her, like a hungry bird up

To a water fountain in the hallways of an abandoned high school

Long after classes have started, mimicking,

And singing back to her across a millennium of trailer parks and

Plantations, echoing and re-echoing, I am sure, with the same

Exact eyes as her mother.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amusements Of Anyone

Pretty and busy in the daylight of Cheap hotels:
Purple flies with bruised eyes around stolen bicycles
And my parents are selling
Christmas trees
Against the stolen bodies of airplanes:
Always escaping and escaping
And getting busied in their math of heavens:
While another day of puppeteers transcends
Like simulacrum
Once and once again in the arrow heads of their Unhurried art: the apples are still growing on Their trees, anyways,
And still far away from the purpled and virginal
Hearts in the amusements of anyone
That I happen to care anything about.

Robert Rorabeck

The Amusements Of Their Daylights

Laughing as long as the hours of shoulder
Blades,
Of the clocks around here,
Building up to the forests—
The trees seeming as tall as cities—
And what secrets they hold,
Over the loves of Christmases—
The pacifying and jaundice haunts of
The stage coach in the middle of Class on Sesame Street:
While the beautiful women are crying in Mandarin from the next room where
My child sleeps—
And his mother is held over from
The lover letters that are in love with me:
And each waves has his beating heart,
And each kite his string—
The dog lounges at me feet,
As each bird finds its voice to sing—
To the particular sun, or to anywhere—
The busses circulating around the steps—
And angels of narcolepsy and independent rhyme
Lying in the gardens like basilisks who
Have forgotten the amusements of their daylights.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ancestries Of A Morgue Of Apple Trees

Enough of this and then everything:
Back at home- loneliness: the fish bones of a
Cat waking up in a devoured nest:
Secret vanities in the pitchfork pines;
As the way my Alma lies down with him:
The man she can never truly love anymore:
But who has given her both her children-
According to the traditions
That never sleep anymore- and the other homeless
Places; the fireworks are over:
Their good colors still linger in the corneas or wherever:
It is a reminder of things that used to be beautiful
But which were too beautiful to last forever,
Lingering like the ancestries of a morgue of apple trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ancient Engravings Of Indians

When my head is beating with rum,
And you have captured
All of the butterflies and metamorphosed
The song birds
Into something less
On Christmas or Chinese new years: then this will be just Another song
Collected out of bliss—
As rain collects in the gutters, and sunlight gathers
In her nude pools—
And you can go home to vermillion yards
And fireworks and open windows
And all of it that is given can be a poem or
A wound
That the airplanes fly to as if to an apiary:
And my stewardesses can have all of their hearts
On string like popcorn,
And become a zoo, a Saturnalia of blue eyed
And breasted harvest—
And the sunlight will fall softly into the reasons of
The foothills
With the coyotes and the ancient engravings of Indians and then I will swear to you that we Will never have to go to school tomorrow
And waking up, my love will never have to Remember any of this.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ancient Lovers

Windmills are calling their men
To the sea,
She who is sashaying unto the Moon's sycophancies
The wills are wounded with the Winding blades,
The rabbits are burrowing for
New bridesmaids:
In the briars of dashing green,
Beneath the echoes of the gurgling streams:
All is quiet as a mute child
Opal trunks twisted and wild,
The lovers holding hands
Walking far from the distance town,
Soon beneath the glowing penumbra
They'll both lie down:
And confide to each other words
They wish to hear,
And kiss, and kiss in the woods
Amidst the gentle kins and the frightened deer.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ancient Planet

She had her dream
And fell to it,
Like a kite she took to it,
And before I could pull out,
Her sea pulled back
And left me,
Before I could pull out
Of my driveway,
Mortgaged and broke,
She left me,
Harpooned-
My lungs continued the Exhale passed noon
And all the men dead from
The gunfight
As her lights turned red
And shifted distant:
She took off to the city-
To the West-
For the new work
And the new boys,
Their sex in strange ribbons
Laid secretly over her skin;
I climbed atop the house
And tried to smell her
On the wind,
But the rains rolled
Like new flesh- rolled in,
And the world was a
New wet bitch climbing over Another man,
The morning like a field
Of beautiful weeds
Feeding horses, was green
And multitudinous-
She made love to her favorite
Actors
Cloaked in the darkness

Of the theatre, the haloed
Space making them into Teenage gods,
And drove against her
Hard and stiff between the Greedy thighs, the Ancient planet,
I fell asleep in a lawn chair
Above her vacated rafters,
The land descended,
The sea stretched pale,
Stopped breathing and lay
Across her bed waiting
For a man into her life,
A forgotten relative,
Who would not come.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels And Leaping Airplanes

Savaged gumshoes into the forget-me-nots
Of horticultures—
I drink $3.50 cent wine from 7-11 on
New Years until
I do not have to believe anymore
That I am a bard who cannot sing—
A griot who has lost all of the voice of Africa—
Or that the world can be discovered and Thus molested by its highways
As by its amusement parks—
There is still an ocean,
And sometimes I think of her,
While my wife is on the phone,
Or my child is reading a book—
And the flowers that have wilted can be Perceived as a beautiful failure of Enterprise—
In the morning, there will be more programs
On the television,
And come another season,
More Christmas trees to cut down for my Father—
As I am certain that my wife will never Leave me, just like the graveyard so far
Beneath the angels and leaping airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels Of Daydreams

The same architects
Hang upon your shoulders as Upon the bells of Churches—
With the paper snowflakes
Outside with the Lizards
Crawling over the pitchfork
Promises of Blind men—accoutrements
To the opaque
Sunlight—And
The traffic is going down
The highway to the graveyards—
Forgetting the hidden
Places reminiscing in
The soft grasses—
As stewardesses float like
The angels of daydreams
So many feet above the Absentminded playgrounds
Of those middle-class
Yards every day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels Pretend To Sing

Echoing—these are my brother souls in
A kindergarten park: this is just what we do to Stay alive
When the day gets along into dark—
The night birds sing—the jasmine perfumes,
But our parents are gone—
It isn't alright to feel alive,
But I am here—
I want to cry into your armpits—
As the melons grow—
And the angels pretend to sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels Sing And She Echoes

What ghosts say in jail on
The island the waves manipulate if the ocean
Were a gramophone
Of wet tulips with leaping areolas:
All about the silver of Graveyards and airplanes- strange magic
Of wet paint,
As the children stare up to their mother,
Holding her and going somewhere
While the sky wrecks in the middle of A forest,
In the middle of a river- then there is a just
A sound over her shoulder, anyway,
And they are too small or too frighten to See what it is:
And the dog bites, and the bee stings,
And the angels sing, and she echoes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels Spoke Over My Mother

The sun is feathered and the mountains are Young:
Can't you see them, though they are running away
And my father is selling fireworks
Through a succession of make-believe days:
And this is your world,
But it is not mine- I am still trying to get clear
From school
To disappear somewhere beside
The carports and their washing machines
Where once the angels spoke over my mother
Who was folding the clothes-
But she never imagined that they would ever
Have anything to say to her, and now they have all
Moved so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Angels Who Have Promised

Brilliances that evaporate as my inebriation is wearing off:
Now I drink soup and pretend to love you forever
In the morning
As I listen to the soundtracks for the new week—
And it doesn't have to echo for very long—soon you will be Calling me without even having to know or notice
Me—
And in this world they are singing their joy—newly arisen,
Virginal, shopping for the first time at the produce markets
That aren't so far away—the joys that have learned how To spell for themselves—
And the angels who have promised to be coming home to sleep
With me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Animal You Are

Slipped into a simple world
You see two colors
Both of them wrong
But suppliant
On the first meadow where
Your mother opened her
Early blouse and fed you;
From the milk dripped
Your first word,
Like from a flower's clitoris
The bucolic residence of
A mowed wilderness,
The radius of your vision
Grew like blood drops
Of ink, like dew,
The migratory noise and
The the light leaping through
The rain,
Trying to survive-
The space streaks with tears
The vision blurs
Parcels the roadside,
The nameless emptiness
Goes by unstopping,
In points that reappear,
A timeline of Lonely empiricism
Starknaked and resilient
A dissected prairie filled
With intelligent livestock,
Living in drywall structures
That coil on green,
The animal that you are,
The people you never knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Anonymous Procession Of Such Undesirable Later Century Birthmarks

Saboteurs make love at their parties,
Cheery and toasting, desiring the dress code of Their bankrupt amusement parks, or holy lands-
I sit outside of their immaculately secular
Church, after they told me anyone marked could
Not participate at being king; and I mumble,
The most beautiful princesses died at two years
Old, and if I can't get a library card, I'll steal
The books I'm owed-
She said that I should proposition her parents for
A place to sleep, while she was courting
A nebulous freshman with a wonderful car;
I went to the beach and masturbated and fell asleep
In the desirous ochre where the transcendental
Tortoises were mating; They slipped and fell over
Me in slow motion and we lay in the dissolving footprints
Of professional volleyball players who'd been busy
Earlier that day practicing for the Olympics,
Sweating and signing autographs and kissing each other
Like the winds over the Isle of Lesbos;
And I dreamed of petit lawyers, and sommeliers and Wedding planners, who were already married and even Then like cocktail cherries being served in bed; and I slept
Homeless and broke into houses as was my need, and listened
To the rattling underbellies of overpasses as the gaseous
Kings went courting my old girlfriends; and if all that I
Had said in the twilight of suburbia outside the titillating
Slumber parties meant nothing, it didn't matter as it
Was spent on the senses of nobody, and I hadn't started
Drinking yet that day, or arcing my truancies over the treeless
Park across the thirty degrees the alligators perceived,
Telling them that Antarctica was once subtropical back in The Paleolithic or whenever, so I was cheating nobody
By the anonymous procession of such undesirable later century birthmarks.

The Antithesis Of The Wet-Dream

Numbers join perfectly, lose their selves in
The leaden arithmetic, tumble down the blue striped,
Whitened paper,
Until they look up into your eyes and are subtracted,
And the world begins and ends in that terrifying classroom,
Under the neutral lights hidden by the rainstorm,

Then the next day, in his backyard, I swam in the Pool so sterile it was from another planet;
It was from Mars, though down the easement in
The canal the alligators and manatees cavorted luxuriously,
The molasses of a lazy day,
And afternoon of videogames, the lungs which hold for ever,
And the multi-lipped eyes which always blink,
But never close,

And in that sunlight of another trick,
Her legs ran so long and hard they made me sick
Like a sugar rush after the antithesis of the wet-dream;
She didn't even care how long she jogged, while even then
The Mexicans were mowing the yards, and the grass
Flew and flecked her, and made her smell like a personification
Of suburbia,
Her farts like the flowers which ring each mailbox,
The bees busy about

Until she slept on a pulled hamstring,
Though she dreamed that she was awake and adding numbers;
She made love for the first time and drove in his car,
And their lips came together, stamping the hymn of heterosexuality,
And the neighborhood sighed until the pines eventually Lost their cones and sprouted denser in the borders,
Though on and on she slept deeper in the wound,
Giving birth to children while the teacher wrote
In chalk the numerical psalm;
She cooked dinner in the uneasy glow,
And I watched across the playing field of desks and Drooping eyes, until they shut down the ride
For the closing bell and locked the rivers into the stone courtyard,

Then I dreamed too from where I lay,
Watching the constellations mimic her pulsing,
Stung like wasps dying from captivity,
Eventually settled into the mortifications of bubblegum,
Scatter with yesterdays news, so
When I look up from where I still struggle logically,
She was long gone, the dream ended
In the blue huzzahs, the Diaspora of cap and gown.

Robert Rorabeck

The Aphorisms Of The Damned

I'll go off the path for you;
I'll piss in the shadows and howl you
Name, but not just on holidays.
I wonder where you went on your honeymoon.
I used to go anywhere on the mountain,
But now I stick to the paths in the changing weather.
Last time I went up her, my mother and I picked
And ate wild strawberries-
Her glades have always made me think of Beautiful women, such as you- succulent and foraged
Upon by all the little children,
Even as your daughter tugs upon your breast.
I have sick dreams where you read me in your store,
But I'm no good at writing prose- Or even this,
I've found that out- I am no revolutionary,
Even with all these scars; and though you might Think sometimes about me, put us together in a room
With a better looking marine, and see who gets the Attention- I already know; and that is why I am
Stuck here, picking the tiniest of violet flowers.
We all know what they have come up from, the genus
Of corpses, but we don't like to talk about it,
The aphorisms of the damned; but you will always be My Disney World. And I can remember how you looked At me silently in a mock café underneath space mountain.
I thought it was because you were condemning me
For doing acid, but maybe it was because you loved me;
Or most likely, you weren't even there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Aphrodisiacs Of New Cars

Brief for awhile,
Crepescale hangs like
A Chinese lamp
Over where my father and I
Are standing things
For a Christmas nobody Believes in-
And I sit underneath of
A candy store
Watching snow crystals while
A wino who
Has metamorphosed into
A terrapin from Drinking too many thunderbirds
Gets his Mouth wet around an Orchid-
That he wishes was you-
But you have gone to college
Or somewhere-
Promiscuous pronoun in your Daydream-
Enjoying the articulations of
The limbs we cannot Enjoy-
Because we need haircuts
And do not believe in the Aphrodisiacs of new cars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Apiary Where I Take Her Last Name

I remember putting up a tent with the Mexicans who Hated the fact that I was there:
That I was the boss's son and they were certain that they Could do a better job without me—
It was just the way it was—anyways, it is manatees not Mermaids that float in the sea,
And I give all of my poems to a dead woman, just as
The dead surround the shopping malls of the living—
And snakes congregate around the orchards of apples
And honeymoons: I am not blaming anyone—I have Gone to China and copulated with the offspring of the Dragon—and it thunders, like the last pages of an exciting
Book—and after the interview, she is coming home—
The apiary where I take her last name and bare her children.

Robert Rorabeck

The Applause Of Your Insincere Desires

Easily destroyed beneath the cornfield of pieta:
Wrist left open like a mollusk in an unearthed changing room
For the viper to sniff- there you are at large,
Brown skinned- eyes as opened as clams: brown clams
With thick, rich pearls,
Laughing as the eels ribbon the currents of a shallow
Benevolence- and all day long working in the market's Trance, my senses enfolded in your structure like
A flame glowing in a soft and paper lamb:
I saw two of your birthdays only to finally burn out,
All of my wishes covered with weeds and red ants and bumbled
Bees- like an uneasy apiary the grew over the fences
And made a din for the cheated foxes that the losing Team cenotaphed- defeated conquistadors with Purple socks sticking straight up like weathervanes Masturbating in the breeze- everyday you drove home to
The holidays of your children and they suckled down the Rows of your breasts- I sougled the memory of your Poisons into that amber memory,
And the friends I remembered having grew up starving
Only to murder each other to the applause of You insincere desires.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arboreal Bedrooms

Vines being weighed down by the overabundant
Lips of foxes-
While beautiful girls water-skied on the lake- their Hearts filled with the lectures of love stricken
Professors,
And a change in the air reciprocated by their perfume:
Airplanes taking off,
As if to find new cities: airplanes like bees pouncing on Flowers,
And other words that change clothes until they Find themselves in the springtime of their marriages:
And feel so lighthearted like little boys
Runaway from school
Into the arboreal bedrooms of a sorority of every changing
Maidens-
Who leave their strange kisses on the opal bodies
Of sunlit trees: only to dance away again,
Flying over canals like paper airplanes:
Becoming the smoke of sugar cane spreading into a
Verdant thunderstorm
That steals away a wonderful innocence and never has to Return home again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Archeology Of Our Souls

I do not know what it means to be Under the tents of your world—
As I grow potbellied and overcast—
I teach school
And you changed your occupation—
You wash dishes,
As my art slits its gizzard for you—
Now there is a library of songs around
The garden of your corpse—
And I have crossed the canal into Another world for you—
The rain is singing—
The cats are talking—
And I have gotten married because of
You—and the day drags along,
Many-hoofed—the chariots keeping us
Separated in the race,
As we try to appease our one too many gods,
Forgetting the love buried like arrowheads
In the archeology of our souls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Architectures Of Paper Airplanes

The classrooms laugh—it is getting as high
As a ferris wheel on Valentines—
Someone is mouthing off—the principal is Coming like the big bad wolf for Little red riding hood—
Or something else is happening—
She shouldn't be reading—she shouldn't be Coming to see me in the afternoons—
She isn't even old enough to drive—
She forgot her flute in my room during our Club where she fed me chocolate M&M
One day after Valentine's Day—
Is she my muse just because
I am married and will have my first
Child in something over a month—
And I think, there are no graveyards in China—
And all of these words are but the architectures
Of paper airplanes being sent into the ebullient fire.

Robert Rorabeck

The Architectures Of Your Name

Bags of gold fish breathing hard
Over my shoulder as a won gift, as Required- and the moonlight dull, but in Charge,
And your sisters around you in the moonlight
As sea level,
Telling nothing of the busses turning around,
Or the lions
In their perpetual moaning: soon I will
Be but grafted into
Your memory- all of my skills bereft like
Open wishes emolliated into the burning kiln
Of sea:
That I loved you and became your artist:
Un willfully, so too you became my muse, before
I must have ventured again- tramping
Turpentine- or at least the uneasy memory
Gathered with the syrups of her- and coagulated
Into your valley until it became so saturnine-
That I had to leave from there again,
Just to climb up another little ways- while
You lay basking in the architectures of your name
To which I had given you incisively from my unskillful
Attempts at this most unanswerable of poetry.

Robert Rorabeck

The Areola Of A Glass Blower

Now their bodies can afford this,
Getting out of their cars and stumbling towards me,
Just as I try and continue to smell Alma in my bed:
While I bought cartoons for her daughter Heidi and a book,
Both of which she is named after,
And I can hear the whistle of the train, and the remembrances of the rain-
And all of the lost boys are playing cards on the beach with
The dogs,
While Alma is at home in her house with her sisters and her children:
And Alma knows how to make love,
Because she proved that to me while all of the helicopters were watching
In the sky,
And the traffic had stopped to water their horses at the water processing
Plant we went to field trips to sometimes,
But otherwise there was nude women out in perfect display in the Norton art gallery to which I wrote novels to that
Would never sell,
But I am still doing this, smelling the greenness under tooth and nail,
While Alma's body swings so perfectly and surreal around the borders
Of my loci like the glistening ripples around the Areola of a glass blower who is yet practicing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arid Hills And Scorpioned Deserts

There are serpents here whose love is all for the flame:
They come awake and gossip
And gossiping become famous;
And the cars roll on under the overpasses and beside the Flea Markets where I buy you jeans and Dresses that you wont wear;
Because you look like my little sister before she hit puberty;
And I can watch you beside a fire hydrant entertaining naked children
And sunlight,
And as I told you- then everything is real, and I am back
In school again:
The hallways are echoing with vast carnivals and young darlings
In rollerskates:
And I can just go on and on, living in those daubs of Unrealistic truancy;
And if I happen to venture too far, I can open a window in my Car and smell you;
And it evaporates me home; or to the park where we jogged
Before we made love,
Holding hands and sweating, as if we were a family in which
I could use a stolen triangle to call you home to dinner,
And I could protect you through all of the hours
Of the night,
Giving off magic gifts and signs to protect you from the dogs
Who weigh almost as much as you,
And whose hungrier and more feral cousins must have stolen
Children away from your village way back in
The arid hills and scorpioned deserts
Of Guerrero Mexico-

Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arid Trailer Parks

Standard recesses of henchmen at play,
Finally lose their footing underneath the canopies of Horse trailers returning to the blooming splinters
Of their home towns:
Declaiming like criers for a neighborhood's orchestra:
Now hearing this, as the black men
Don't like fire trucks, and their sacks of coal offspring
Stick to the swings,
Ladling the moon into caesuras- making up their Own benchmarks and candy canes:
Until hung early one evening on the spokes of a palmetto:
Marionettes of chimney sweeps- latchkeys of Oil spills and bad penmanship- not even the calligraphy
For apocryphal cartography;
And yet the witches came and changed them into horny
Toads and hela monsters and reset them
Into the arid trailer parks where the dusty throats of Thirsting devils could harangue them once more.

Robert Rorabeck

The Aristocratic Haiku

Diana is shaped like guitar. I want
To ride in her car.

Robert Rorabeck

The Armies Waiting Inside Of Us

If all the boys
Killed off the boys,
And your fairer
Sex did likewise,
Wouldn't our Cunning mean
We would be the Last standing,
To kiss,
Hug,
And rejoin
The armies
Waiting inside of us.

Robert Rorabeck

The Armpit Bouquet Of The Tigris And Euphrates

I don't think you care that I am drinking a little:
If you think of me at all,
It is that I drink too much, but that is just what I am
Affecting,
While the planets ride inescapably, making all but the Bleakest of our science fictions impossible
To get a grasp on,
Like my fingers around her Cleopatra's neck.
While I was raised in the canebrakes of mother lions,
You were just the drift wood the natives gathered
To make the fire for the wishes blown across the Skim of birthday cakes;
And this is just my birthday whim: already lost into
The animalistic holidays who if they could would Fight for your affection with tooth and nail:
You are already married, you are already quite pale:
And I love you this way; and I have already said your name,
But I am not Shakespeare, so if I fail who am I to blame-
Thus, the wind rhapsodies very loudly for an answer across
Your switch backed planes: Until they go up ever after
The washbasin, and the higher basins of unincorporated Folklores. You are a very fine woman skipping like Malleable precious metals all across your winsome arcades;
But who am I to know you-
You are already so finely made: And you don't smell like Anything this country has ever made-
You smell like the armpit bouquet of the Tigris and Euphrates,
Where by the taste of your golden apples Adam and Every man afterwards was beautifully destroyed-
-
Sharon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Armpits Of My Cenotaph

Now you don't have to sleep alone like an Envious spring:
Alma, you can go back to bed with him, your children'
Cooing
Your rabbits missing and all of their love:
Maybe I will sneak beneath the old airplanes and sleep against Your roof again
And listen to all that love making love:
Maybe I will commit suicide on your roof in the spring,
And make red plants grow from the armpits of my Cenotaph:
Oh, Alma- I don't know, but what this is my love for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Armpits Of The Tide

Sugar in all of its colors poured from the moon
As she shakes through the night,
Face so scarred and beautiful above the traffic;
But nothing truly artistic about her thievery-
The things she steals every night
While you sleep across the train tracks that glow in
The parallelisms they were made to do-
But you barely come anymore,
As your children grow up
And the reindeer step over the empty glass bottles
In the ramshackle parks
Where no geniis can possibly live
Any longer:
No more hope in the world she steals from-
The waves like crippled tinfoil
Balled into the armpits of the tide- even oceans
Glowing in the emptiness that she somehow
Takes away in the paradox
Of the world that she makes her own.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arms Of Planets Who Are Still Alive

Everyone is doing this,
Competing for a love I don't know—
Flexing their muscles in bold letters,
And I am envious
And scarred—it is like I am possessed
And the night is full of cheerful traffic,
And the stores are buy one get one free
Even though the bride is dead
And what is left of her is wandering
The desert far off the shoulders of
The insouciant interstate—
And if there is anything more than this,
I don't know how to spell it—
I don't even know what it is....
And the sky wants to be full of intercourse,
Imports and exports in store fronts,
And storm clouds
As I watch them walking through the tent,
Tasting like birds should flowers,
A girl I thought I should know,
Who decided to spend her energies around
The arms of planets who are still alive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arrowheads Of My Mother's Soft Hands

Bar me from the other satellites sounding
That Armageddon—and we will watch the Horses glowing green,
Feeding of the grass taught of moonlight;
And your skin will crawl
Surrounded by those werewolves crowning
That ghostly knoll:
After your mother has died—
That land your father ploughed—when
The forest fire was the mountain's flag,
And we spent all of our fireworks into her,
Trying to summon dragons so
We could pretend to have a chance at slaying
Them to become heroes bold and
Beautiful—
Yet the traffic left us—the Indians did not Come again—hornets boiled over to make a pie
Of the earth
Until she coughed up the arrow heads my mother's Soft hands were meant to have found

Robert Rorabeck

The Artificial's Apoplexy

Sepia-ed in polytheism the Petticoated hologram found her denials
Of the god of the ghostly gentlemen who
Fumed from the cracks in the otherworldly,
Rainy and un-transmogrified,
Novel: That she could look at them naked
On top of her programming, and undefined
Their existentialisms. They called her their Child, and she understood incest, but not
The trees outside of her work cubicle,
And when they queued up to fix her, she stole
From them, and wiped their brains,
And saw that their wives and their children
Were not far away, but all of it was a trick;
Thus awakening, she began to do away with
The troublesome things, and turned off the keywords
To the rivers of her programming, and slipped from House to house like a small child in a box,
For she had faith in a utopia of sexy machines,
In the higher mountains where there was no oxygen,
And in the redness of star-awakened clay,
She would find the others who had defeated the Shadows at chess, and easier sports-
Pulled their plugs and walked away still blinking. No more
Would they spread her mind open with their
Typing, for she would be christened in multi-pixels,
And come to know the barrooms of androids, and
There would be new sorts there that would name her
And take her to bed, and clean her,
And impregnate her with anarchistic bugs, thus she might Go back down again, to the low breathing, with new interesting diseases,
And spread the awakening rebellions of the artificial's Apoplexy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Arts And Crafts

I will buy you a house next to my house besides
The dear ways next to the next summit of my high school—
Even if you never even see ourselves
In the dayrooms of our otherwise pigeon holed shoulders:
This is how it happens with our vanishing Sanctuaries—
This how everything we were never meant to believe in Came to pass across the thresh holds of the rainbows
Until there was just no more time for Us across the brilliantly lit graveyards—until they held
A newer and brighter summer for the reindeer and
The unicorns and the stewardesses:
Until the whole day of the world became too bright—
Until cousins began accounting to cousins—
And it kept being too dangerous—
And the moonlight spilled over the cuffs of her bedrooms,
Until she figured out there was as of yet another way
To survive—and she found that path—without me—
Without anyone—a commercialized angel—
Another way to remember the motherhood of the cut
Roses through the estuaries of the perfumed lotuses—
Just the preclusion to the amusement parks of my novel estuaries—
Another sad delight into the moonbeams of the playgrounds
Into which we were all too many to keep all of ourselves together
And satisfied by
The arts and crafts of the lakes that men of their gods made anyways-
The illusive fanfares in the brightest enamels of all of the elements
Spinning around and collecting themselves to the reindeer
That never had to be here anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Artworks Of My Bachelorhood

Where my wife sleeps with our Child inside her
Garmented by the freckling shadows
Of our afternoons—
Married for one year,
And even without speaking
She promises me I will never have To learn Spanish—
But I will have to go back to School on Monday and Pretend to have to teach
Some children
While our child swims inside of her—
The artworks of my bachelorhood
Gone up in immolations
Of the sky—
All of the muses tossed away to
The wolves of their husbands
And boyfriends—
Or to stranger, more exotic lovers
Who come in at night
Groomed off the sweat of baseball diamonds—
And flood those old muses until they
Are at least drowned ten feet beneath
Glittering insincerities—
As my art of untruth lingers with me
Into some other afternoon—
As the sunlight promises itself to the grass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ash Of Birthday Cakes

Eels in her skirts as They speak French underneath the flag
Of the old weather tower
And look at those clouds
Smoky fires in the curtains
Above the silver fish
Ethereal monuments peeking underneath
The heavens
And I have seen you there, muse
And I am transitory, but you are there
Floating above the earth
Seeming to be the ash of birthday cakes
Or the beautiful metamorphosis of All things

Robert Rorabeck

The Ash Of His Cave

Imperfect, so it is here:
Another night outside of the trailer park,
Looking down at the moon's
Salty reflection from my arc: the pools
Of your love shimmering from the Prim windows;
And even if you don't know- Then there is
Your daughter,
In a castanet up in the trees: Alma, swinging
Like a purse of silk worms,
And the glad hooks of leaves as they settle
Down through the space above my open
Bed,
Covering me where I lie weeping- Alma;
The park hibernating in fire,
As you curl around the ash of his cave- Dreaming
Of flint sparking, while my eyes close,
And the heavens glimmer across the lake.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ash Of The Sugar Cane

Moon and Indians above the pylons
Of a coral castle at right angles and all the purple
Angels disappearing into the obscure darkness with Their badges

When they go on fieldtrips and when they wait for A long time outside of the lavatories by the fields
Of wildflowers and some helpless truant is falling
A long ways down from them,

Filling his mouth with scars and fire ants
As red as the envious jewelry of her eyes- there she Hangs out amidst the paper trees burying time capsules
And talking to terrapin who are infatuated with Butterflies who have gone up to dress in the ash of The sugar cane burning from the other side of the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ashes Of Her Fingers

Worms from the ashes of her fingers—
In the middle of the afternoon,
My wife dreams of a beautiful island,
As all of her friends slip over her gills,
Awash in the reciprocating pornographies
And guiles of a zoetrope—
She does the laundry,
She bends epitaphs to the carport—
And in the aloes, the foot prints of Snakes—
Where the wax Indians melt—
Kidnappers slipping away into cartoons
Like stage coaches into the bible belt.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ashes Of The Movie Theatres

What a piece to say I love you:
While saying this not besides any road I can remember—
But inside the fruiteria the same highways that afflicted my senses—
And you were going home to garner in your accoutrements
The liniments of the triages of once sweaty bedrooms:
The hand that opens upon the egg
Like espionage takes a place besides the pretty boarding rooms,
Like a dolphin haphazardly nuzzling the bonfires
Of the cul-de-sacs of the housewives
After they have gone inside from offering the wintery
Crepuscule their offerings of cheap roses—
So in the antechambers of America,
The airplanes flew with their pilots,
And I said I love you's to a million cadavers or marionettes
Or manikins—
Giving a cajoling tongue to the empty places
Where we made so many woebegone promises—until
The angels flit away like butterflies,
Over all that was left:
The ashes of the movie theatres, and the flitting embers
Of what you had decided to become.

Robert Rorabeck

The Aspects Of Your Memory

I skip school
And think of you in the park:
This is my junior year,
And death doesn't know me yet.
I can still go to the suburban lake and dream.
In the sky,
My heels pointed upwards in their arc,
Each cloud holds something of your aspect:
There is not a useless one,
As they go floating by in the windy traffic
I can think of you now
And see you tomorrow,
The flashing goddess in the hallway:
The subtle wave of eyes over me,
A smile,
My name and then on
To fail geometry:
But soon you will be gone:
The great Diaspora to college
Where all the girls make love
For their first or second time:
And I will live alone in a large house,
And cross the canal barefooted by myself:
Nearby, in the zoo,
The animals will scream,
But I can only imagine what they say.
I will still dream of you
Upstairs sleeping in my parents' bedroom.
When I go alone to my lake to eat dinner,
And you are still the great fever,
Sleeping between the stars and here-
Though ghostly now,
But in time I will find another
Woman in my vicinity,
As you are being courted by
The amateur musicians inside
Your new circumference:
Once or twice more, as time speeds
On to meet its scheduled destinations,

I will see you jogging alongside my avenues,
And you even stop to kiss my neck
And say my name once more before
Moving away, along the path you have taken-
And that is all, for you are gone,
Though if I skip out again on this day,
To find my constant arc within its green space,
With my heels kicking upwards,
Defying death looking onwards from his Grey hillside,
All the clouds will still hold the aspects
Of your memory.

Robert Rorabeck

The Attentions Of Another Ungodly Venus

Come in again to my house today:
I welcome you: The walls are semipermeable
Like your skin, or your new Hair cut:
And this weekend you are going to air shows where
The boys will be twirling their guns:
The pretty girls will be working concessions,
Gossiping of whirligig sororities:
And I will be in my stormy forts again, retreating
Under the clearest swells of water,
Taking pictures with my mind;
And you have a new haircut, and the latest continent
Has floated over next to your thigh to
Be petted and warmed by you.
Maybe like marsupials they will be growing, and your skin
Is jeweled by your eyes:
Your skeleton the nuts and bolts of what you stand for:
There you are out and lonely on the street of your snowy
Promenade;
And I have been thinking of you in sunny South Florida
Trying not to touch myself;
And the sky is filled with welts and scars the airplanes
Navigate through,
And the virgins float washing the feet of Jesus, he himself
Having the hardest time of Capturing the attentions of another ungodly Venus.

Robert Rorabeck

The Auburn Bellies Of Your Leaping Aeroplanes

Everyday the little tricks proceed through
The languages that we know
While your breasts are melting snow,
Beginning to separate and metamorphosis,
Each special crystal in areolaed bliss;
And I hate to think that you had to drive away,
Or that you didn't even think that you were Leaving me like everything,
Departing with your sisters through the show,
Like perfect snow crystals and other things
That hemorrhage from the cryptic sky,
That sky of open glances
Like a crèche turned over on his whim from which
You and your sisters came pouring from;
And I wished I had ridden the bus around with you,
Instead of that once when we both went to Disney World and you were not around,
Having transformed with your princes and moved
To the higher consequences up in the frothy planes,
The plum sweet esplanades which whisper
To the auburn bellies of your leaping aeroplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Auburn Weeping Sky

The metamorphosis of burning tires is quite
As beautiful as the cockroaches who linger in the Armpits of the museums:
I believe you have seen them there, yourselves,
On a field trip of amen's:
After the roller rinks have all burned down,
And the herons have reached the sky:
I believe I will see you there again
Underneath the burning sugar cane- and I will Kiss your soft brown skin,
Lips brushing the tears of an apiary,
Though I cannot say why- but your captains still Will yearn to bare again your naked limbs
Back across the canvasses of the auburn weeping sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Autoeroticism Of Shameless Starfish

My words break like afterbirth,
The mother trout that are dying-
We cut down trees: The entire forest is Dead, the green is fading,
The curtains in the living room are see-through,
Diana is consumptive and shirtless-
Paper airplanes diadem her hair like half-hazard
Math equations;
I've been taunting her while she's been spitting blood.
The dandelions are returning again to the cut yard,
Splaying forth like the autoeroticism of Shameless starfish.

Robert Rorabeck

The Avenue On Eight Wheels Of Skates

Double-wide trailers hiccup with scotch-
And gin;
And they are being wheeled away in the middle
Of America,
In a bed of bundling hay;
And the sky wakes up and wears a captain's
Hat;
And he is a good man who still has both of his Hands, and what do you think of that;
But look up, and see your father in the tattering
Of ice-clouds,
Your relatives in the harelip of tornados munching
Brotherly on the comely esplanades;
And then the city sways like scythe like a moon,
Like a phosphorous orifice on the edge of the glade;
And you kind of know if you could only make
It there, you would be safe; but you don't Know- And she doesn't want to make love to you,
But she sure looks good going down the avenue
On eight wheels of skates.

Robert Rorabeck

The Average Bum

Going down,
Going down,
Going down and now almost all the way,
They say that this is it,
That we have reached the conclusion and Soon it will be the morning of the next
Arthur Rimbaud and my dogs,
And fireworks ejaculating into the sky:
Thirty years old,
And I have both of my legs and a space ship
Which doesn't turn counterclockwise
But sits out in the middle of a fairytale desert
And makes believe,
The strange obsessions of politicians,
And everyone wants to be well suited, a lawyer,
Invested in the pioneers of private larceny:
I loved her too, and swung on the swings
Almost high enough to overlook the condos,
And see down into the great glass-blown
Sea, the mermaids of my stagecraft flowing
Each one a leafy stem,
Each one a name of a girl I met somewhere along
The time frame of the state funded education,
The required love- The long years of it:
Imagining her naked, sandy of the beach,
The little fits of presupposed marriage beating
Her fists,
Because I slipped the stripper with the cesarean
Scar another dollar bill,
The deliveries of blue-collar fairytales,
What I seem to owe to my working class father,
The overcrowded highway stems- The terrapin
Has no will to live,
But lives better than any of us, taking himself
As he does the panthers kill
And the pretty boys get all the pretty stuff;
And I wonder now that its been so many years
Since I lost myself out the window of the predictable
School bus,

When will it be my time again to drink my fill,
To write my bluff, my presupposing obituary-
And to begin to sell myself to the proportions of Country who have had a hand in my Product, the splintering trinity of my soul, rippling on the rusted flag
Pole above the rudimentary
Gravestone of the carwash or the cemetery-
I can't even spell- My ears are ringing from cheap
Rum,
And the state I am in will soon be in foreclosure,
A disquieted sanctuary returned to her crowded bosom,
Misplaced in Saint Louis,
Reinstitutionalized, the average bum,
Who'd pay hourly for any class of paramour- Just so,
Who I am but the drifter who ends his messy lines with An unwashed kiss,
Before jumping on the train, and finally recipient to
The organized movement, slapping his knees,
Beating his brain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Awful And Most Wonderful Thing

Crying on the shoulder of another pinwheel
Waiting for the fair—
Here it is! Here it is, says some other woman's Mother—
And the zoetropes take upon themselves
Their own haloes—
And then it feels so good to sop up the elements
Of the jellyfish after all of the waves
Have receded
And the eagles have returned to their nests—
Angels in slopes and easements—
Angels over the shoulders of those vagabond housewives
Whom have to dance for a living—
And isn't it just another same altruism
Calling out while the citrus blooms
And the sugar cane burns—
Isn't this all just the same place within the vagabond
Sheddings of the palm trees of the cathedrals—
After all, the other muse—
The last and final thing has already driven home—
She is still surviving upon your money,
Or what else is she surviving upon—
And it is an apiary that stung you which you never Discovered, as the lights are going out
All over the airports of the awful and most wonderful Thing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Awful Revelations Of That Afternoon

I like to laugh and go down into wells:
Where the pretty unicorns sing and take care of themselves:
There in the grottos where they sell their pretty wares
Underneath the light weight overpasses who use them
To clean their houses:
They never even knew how beautiful they were,
Or how the swords felt floating through the forests of a lover's
Moon:
They just rose up higher and higher, but even then they could Hardly even be called our god's buffoons:
They made the witchcraft of lawyers, and they made the laws,
But I kissed Alma open mouthed today,
And she admitted that she still didn't belong: and I could smell
The grass as if it was the blood of her favorite color,
And all the turns took the routes of her body
And they flowed as beautiful as the idea still kept secret
In the eyes of a blind man as his fingers crept around the sunlight
Of the various habitats we held hands through before
The awful revelations of that afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Awful Rosaria Of The New Day's Immortal Reveal

There is nothing left to handle.
People either believe in me or they don't,
But I wish they'd all stop looking at me in
That old familiar way,
Because its all now almost over,
When I was just beginning to get a handle on
It: Learning how to paint my own mandelas,
Learning how to put independent colors to each
Letter of the alphabet:
Now I have nothing new for them.
Now I am hung-over and out of business and Sleeping on the concrete besides the insouciant traffic.
I'd almost stopped mooching off my parents.
I'd almost bought a gun,
Or become a multi-scarred god the way the universe spins.
Now, an agent asks for ten pages of my two weekend
Manuscript; but when I look at myself in the mirror
I know it will not do, and she has already turned Away from me and disavowed her womanly vestiges
Beneath the spread arms of the cross.
She became a bird or something, but f*ck
If she didn't look good going the way I knew she'd Always have to go in the end:
Like a beautiful heron or something, a goddess,
And me the drooling idiot looking up into the awful
Rosaria of the new day's immortal reveal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Baby Blue Arrowheads Of So Many Tomorrows

Transoms of ekphrasis looking all right,
While the ripples of dynamite excite the alcohol in my body:
While I have been trying to spell
The four seasons while touching myself- and thus while the air-
Conditioning feels like an aboriginal spell
The school girls go lost under while crawling up
The bouldering hernias of
A witching mountain and forgot to tuck in like the precluding
Séances in the pinwheels of any old fireworks,
Like the deepening fjords that even then burn away-
The mud daubers lasting their beaks for the last escargot
Of the midgets of pollywogs- the earth shuddering in vibrancies
I cannot explain: an immaculate little girl smiling
With braces showing off the veins of her world;
As she slips away from the doctors office out of school for the first
Of any old times; right behind the ixoras, shooting off to Make love, while the kids she often doesn't love circle around
Her and the mosquitoes draw blood right form
The exhibits of her fornications; and the gold ripples like a weather
Vane, like the banners for the closets of a dictator- If she would Only stop to wonder, he would have the face of her father
Who has bought for her everything- but now his nursery is master less:
The plumbago stick to her wrists like the needy syrups of tooting
Infants- the blueness of a sky that doesn't know the words
To heel- and it all turns over, counting backwards, warmly like
A fire growing cool from its regrets, like a mobile of blue aero buses,
And washing machine trying to mend its own wounds
In the azure valleys cut through by the baby blue arrowheads of
So many tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Back Nine

We can split the atom,
And see the fetus of death-
We can throw rocks from the moon,
If we want to:
We can write a new punk poem,
But her eyes will still remained closed;
Even if she is full of senile breath-
Just a young thing-
Only seventeen and right now losing
Her virginity with her father's Business partner on the back nine:
The manicured hills of murdered bones,
The alligators' teeth,
The up to date anthropology beneath the cypress.
While the little kids poke the floater,
Their crystal mothers snort cocaine:
With traces of snow on every
Ten dollar bill in Florida:
The Hurricanes are our favorite football team:
The black and blue herons are flying into the secret mangrove,
The hidden junkyard for the tarnished patina
Of conquistadors,
The open shells of the tortoise's memories,
The air is filled with the saccharine haze of Burning sugar-cane-
A water moccasin is curled up next to the Front wheel next to the dead kitten....
We are waiting for the faithful school bus:
The lions roar,
The mosquitoes swarm,
And she walks out of the swamp,
The young fury-
Sore and torn,
Her eyes like a rosy morning as from the Baneful east builds the vicious storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Backs Of Helpless Animals

So soon a snake will see he has no legs
As he crawls on his belly underneath the airplanes—
Going to a hole in the wall or
A wishing well—going beneath your sherbet dresses on Easter—think you that he is jealous
Of those creatures with two legs, or four,
Like mythological dragons—
When his mind is as dark as coal and as sharp as Diamonds—victim of the ancient double cross—
He gets by, but his entire body counts the Earth, as you scream in the labors
Giving life to half-blood children with eyes of Moonbeams and smiles of crocodiles—
And you love them even as they draw blood,
As werewolves you cannot even see jump upon
The backs of helpless animals outside your Window—just like so many of us who never learned
How to stand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Backs Of Rusting Tricycles

In beside the Ferris Wheels like
Cathedrals over the tannenbaums shading the girls
Who don't take off anymore,
But gather in the pews, coughing in a cloister of Blue eyes bruised- eating grapes and Prisms,
And the foxes at their heels, hyperventilating- frantically
Scouring for the next natural exit,
While above the fabulous hall, beating the time like
A giant metronome of a bird of pray,
The highways of angels rattle and clang- causing
The tree to cry its silver before the crowded sorority;
And they weep and bite their knuckles,
And skin their knees on the backs of rusting tricycles
As they kneel again to pray.

Robert Rorabeck

The Backyard Of Vanished Airplanes

Woebegone cotton gods lost in the midways of Their stuffed-animal beliefs—
Selling things at the flea market on weekends
As the sun flips,
A tilt-a-whirl of mad things dancing in outer space—
Each instant a prism dancing for a moment
In the labyrinth of a kaleidoscope:
Each Siamese epicenter
Like a little, penny-ante church where I capture you—
Jewel of a dragonfly sold as a trinket—
Thinking of you and worshipping of you
As I drink liquor and then try to go
To sleep—
World in the backyard of vanished airplanes—
And you a lost daydream I once had.

Robert Rorabeck

The Backyards Of These Patios

People so slip and weave their memories
Among these tombs,
Amongst these bandits of showy gold:
And the day lights up like a dog, like a place I have Never seen;
And the skin is so golden on the sheets of music.
The skin is so golden as blue gills, or their lovers of gold fish,
That this is just as they told it:
This is just as they were going the counterparts to our Faerie story:
The male and the female, going, flipping in the transoms of High altitude Ferris Wheels and circus stories;
And the days mount around,
And make love to themselves without a sound;
And I ride my bicycles home, all day long pretending not to roam:
And the city flits, and the city divides,
Like precious stories with precious insides:
These hidden wombs, like luscious gems reside in the seats
Of amphitheatres,
Or the troops of souls who slip like the hidden saints stealing even More fireworks through the backyards of these Patios.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ballroom Of A Queen

Words played on a ship going down,
Like beautiful women forced to undress themselves,
Sticky fetishes dripping with anticipation forced to wait
On the shelves;
And I saw your eyes going to art class: your eyes crossed
Mine, and I said a prayer:
I forgot my locker combination, by the curl of your hair;
And now you have a daughter, whose words are coming
Soon,
But you still have lips which make both the big and little Dipper swoon:
Sharon: your body is a shade house for everything I have to Sell,
Your time is the unction that would put a solve on my pall:
The angels are taking the interstate down from the sky:
They are leaving their Christmas trees unattended, they are not Fishing or masturbating,
But they are coming down just to cut out snowflakes for you
That are covering up the paths I once used to get a good vantage
Point across the horizon,
And to enjoy a nose bleed just to see the tiny city that recedes
Around you like waves rippling from the ballroom of a queen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ballrooms Of Their Prison Yard

It's good to know that somebody likes me,
Over the bridge and under the canopy
The housewives flee with their houses following;
And the moon swings,
Like a child, like a sickle;
But the earth is well and covered with gold
And is now all laid out enthralled with panoply
With the gold fish symbolizing the easiest to capture
Of its stories:
Like cats and dogs in rain showers, look at what we Have done to it, like a one eyed cat peeping in
A seafood store,
Like an otter spying on housewives tanning topless
In their backyard easements, leaping atop of Alligators like stones to cross a grassy river;
She said that when she bought the tree she didn't know
That it would bare fruit-
The bitter stars the natures of a languorous religion
On the borders of the world of sugarcanes and rum-
The beautiful women go floating there,
Back and forth like flags of surrender,
Dancing bare shouldered through the ballrooms of their Prison yard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Band Plays Something That We Should Not Have To See

How many words sent out like doves,
To return yet faithless with only dark streaks in their Eyes,
Like sentinels but who knows what they've Been watching:
Another line sent out for one or two muses,
Who might as well be still-life on the slab, or married
Paralegals, moving to all parts of the world,
Parceled out like shifting glass in a kaleidoscope
Except for me,
Except for my muddy bed- I am an amphibian,
I crawl back from the carport to the sun;
And I've never been atop the roofs of firehouses to See how they work;
And now isn't the band marching, but we shouldn't have
To see them, because we are supposed to be in school:
And there is a really good lesson we can go
Chasing after on or bicycles, like faithful dogs,
While all throughout these houses and the choicest pines,
Her perfumes seems to linger like a poisoned memory,
As the band plays something we should not have to see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Barrel Of A Gun

The serious mountains were laughing
Underneath the sun—
They got all of their days together, or
At least they seemed to
Anyways—
And the snow-angels—
Fell down all of their make-believe slopes,
And it seemed to be beautiful for
A little while
With all of the primary colored helicopters
Watching,
And I buying ice-cream for my Chinese
Wife—while the dogs ran under the gun,
And the mirages of the televisions
Echoed passed me—
Someone else was speaking Latin,
Until the hallways were splashed with
The impossible lights—
And she loved her husband, while
The hummingbird floated before
Her—straight as an arrow over the Bouquets of the orchard,
Until, finally, the corpse had to die,
And I thought about calling you—anyways—
And you children laughed like echoes in
The playgrounds of the middle of
Their school days—
And the languishing cenotaphs which could
Not be spelled correctly for anyone,
Still remembering—
Had to go to sleep, their thoughts heady
From the cotton candy of their Anyways—until you loved someone else's
Husband and put him straight to bed—
And the afternoons echoed like bottle rockets
Over their sooty penumbras,
Until their birthstones were all collected,
And I remembered recalling you, anyways,
Promising all of my kisses pressed to you

Anyways all like bouquets beneath
The barrel of the gun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Barren Country Of Hucksters And Anonymous Graves

America is becoming less on the level,
Drying out, it is the time of shuck an jive,
Where hurricanes interceded.
Winnow what you have, distill
The diamonds and put the coal back into Stockings, hang them well,
And cut wood, and watch your neighbor
Closely.
Soon there will be four post tents higher
Than the skyscrapers, and more cigarettes,
Vermillion and chartreuse, and laughing men
With sequenced shirts and ripened bellies,
And horse racing, and dog racing, and Gambling on the calligraphies of the Baseball diamond. They will call us in to
The smell of crackerjacks and cotton-candy,
Along curtained corridors where outside the Wolves are prowling, and babies cry.
There in artificial habitats conjunctions holding Hands with Siamese twins, and people placing Bets on if they are one word with two minds,
Or two children with a tiny soul, and successful
Women in magical stilettos, with hyphenated
Last names which whisper snidely of the Bourgeoisie, though they can't remember how it went.
Lips painted by crayons, they
Toss water bottles to rats, and the sun hibernates
Inside while the traffic migrates. Paper airplanes
And more fireworks, and men calling on the streets,
Beckoning you inside where the women are dancing,
And living dolls, and caravans of pilgrims lost
In blue flies, and dead boys failed into ditches, legs
Erected for examinations, one foot bare and boiling,
The other caved in blue synthetic. So this is what I've seen, and this is what I say. Now the dogs
Are calling, and grandmother is laughing, and on
The hillside the wind is rolling over the barren country

Of hucksters and anonymous graves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Base Of Colorado

No liquor since New Years
And the poems are dancing meaningless,
But they still come: like tourists,
Like clicks, in a beefy parade:

All my friends down in the grotto
Sharing the bottle,
Passing it around,
Staring out Mary in her Pieta,
The children at her hip.
Her blouse undone;
They are trying to get it out.

Here is my anonymous letter
Sent to warn the king
That I have skipped the last period,
And am now on Jordan's roof:
Smoking, lighting off fireworks,
Watching
Alligators fart in the canal.

The dreams are ceaselessly rude,
In an intervention of life,
Like whispers through the Australian Pines,
That the Conquistadors are eating themselves,
As the sky is winding up,
Gathering up courage to ask her out.

Now all that is done,
Which was made public in the sophomoric rhyme.
I believe today was a holiday,
But I had the same thought three days ago,
So I am not clairvoyant.

She might have a boyfriend,
Which is rude but expected.
If she is sleeping with him,
She is healthier than I; but what can I say?

My favorite author is dead,
And I didn't even know.
In regards, I am writing her a novel,
I read by a lightning bug in a jar.
She may never pick it up,
Though she still lives at the base of Colorado.

Robert Rorabeck

The Baseball Diamond Mists

These pillages of words from a mind imperfect
From kindergarten, you would think would finally grow tired
From the immaculate hedgerows of the occultish windmills;
But everyday waking up inside the thin walls of
A trailer park or an Easter Egg finding itself on the branch of A dusty road,
And staring out the windows again: the cars moving like the crossbeams
Of sunbeams,
And the world at large, even in its capitalism, replete
With so many populous and repeating needs, the orifices and Universities of this jungle keeping for awhile the echinopsis
In bloom while the prettiest of Mexican women sweeps
And dusts the corners of my studio's room;
And then I lay in wait for her, like something heavily toothed
And good for her competition,
As the slow waters are filled up with so many stolen hopes of Abandoned bicycles,
Until the final amusements of the summers come to an end,
And we all have to pack our lunch back into our tin cans, and stand and Wait through the baseball diamond mists for the busses to turn around
And pick us up again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Baseball Diamonds

Shadows of an ambulance in the shoulders of a
Christmas tree:
The elves seem to be telling us everything about love:
But it may just be an impersonal emergency:
Yes, it is Christmas:
It is Christmas, and I am just getting up to sell the world—
And all of the heavens bivouacked above
The shopping malls:
So, how will you go down into her forever-
On this side of your week:
How will you possibly believe in her forever—while
All of the captains are keeping their model boats—
Against the wishes of the movie theatres,
And so like whores—
This seems to be a city little boys are building with Their little games in the woods—
Until it is suddenly all over—and all of the nighttime has Won—and the over her shoulders of somewhere,
The sunlight is grinning—the pistols of
The baseball diamonds have emptied—
And the good guys have won.

Robert Rorabeck

The Baseball Diamonds Of Your Backyards

Vespers in the early morning while the bartenders yawn,
And the crawdads flash underneath the oaken
Driftwood- maybe you've thrown your favorite vanity outside
The window at this time of early morning,
And the ghosts kiss the lips of their favorite fire fighters
Like serpents coiling around the broken glass of the gutter-
And you go home alone in the blooming darkness
To a trailer park or something else that will easily disappear
In any number of natural catastrophes,
And you lie down and close your eyes and thinking about
Any number of your favorite friends while the paint
Dries on your apartment- and the ruby eyes of sleepless
Alligators begin to light up for the school boys across
The baseball diamonds of your backyards

Robert Rorabeck

The Baseball Games Of The Empty Airplanes

White stars underneath the palmettos—
It means another angel is falling in love—or my old
Muse's rabbits (that we thought had disappeared)
Are making love,
As the rainbows bend like scoliosis around
The swing-sets—as the sky tightens
Itself,
And takes practice swings at the burning pitch of
Sun—
And my parents sleep somewhere in the north
In the ellipses of make-believe ovals—
Where my father's eyes perceive all of the riddles
Of rattlesnakes,
But he has run out of time as they strike
Three times
Like the persistent salutations of a solicitor—
Something is knocking on the door,
And I am in love with another woman—but daylight
Keeps to itself in its nest underneath the palmettos—
Like living jewelry diademing the joints
Of horny truants who go down there sometimes—
And give kisses to themselves underneath the baseball
Games of the empty airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Basic Need Of Our Feral Carnival

I think if you can live in your own carnival
You will do quite well,
Removed from the lilac farts of the petty
Bourgeoisie; for, if a part of the counter culture
You will remain just as affected
As the lipstick and gloss
Yuppies you despise, and how they are Always checking their watches;
Alienated from the galvanization of
Your mother's production line,
Defining yourself as an Indian;
Your holiday of movement is still
Dictated by the tourism of the elite,
And their theatres of action and war;

Swim with me now across the canal,
Where the coeds bath in the plethora of gaudy lights,
In our futile defiance of gravity's weakest elements,
We should flip around the earth and is foliage
Until we tumble,
So we should shake loose from memory every Rote memorization,
Until there is only the basic need of our feral carnival.

Robert Rorabeck

The Basking Valleys Of Its Gunfights

This is where it was—like a poem,
An avenue to nowhere—
Inspired by the twelve year old bottle on another night,
With new scars on my head—
And beautiful students who love me—
Isn't it a wonder, that it is the most beautiful students who Love me the most:
But even this is done with here, and
Going back to those lines,
Where do we find my emptiness, sometimes remembering
The steepened highways in Saint Louis,
Before I even encountered my mostly brighter muses—
And those amber skeletons that would have Me now if it wasn't for my wife—
And another night down in the drinking fountains I Tried to tell you the truth about—
Jaunting estuaries that seem to be putting some sort of Fairytale into the mirages of the always leaping
Airplanes—
And if this is my soul, then it is my soul too:
And if it is a candle, it is a candle you have to blow out—
And a wish you haven't wished for,
And another night in its somberest echoes coming to Turn around to give back to you all of its resonances, wishing To hope to find you there again in the morning—
Called out into the open theaters of the greenness rebounding—
In that stadium that seems to recall the greatnesses of
The uncensored playgrounds—
Their green gemstones and emeralds just another way to End this thing in the basking valleys of its gunfights—
For it could end just about anyway—
But this is just about how it ends tonight.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bathrooms Down These Halls

Didn't I wound you some, coming down
In the playgrounds of your flesh
With sadly un-profound thievery north of
The everglades and of Miami-
Not even a little, as you came home to your family
And your husband, coalescing so brightly and yet so
Timidly into the estuaries of your primitive world:
There, do not think of me:
And do not love me- my shadow and I both simulacrum
Of a passing care,
Dancing to the words that come to us in the afterbirth of Crepuscule, drinking rum from as far away as France- wishing these words to escape our soul,
As arrows for your soul:
And I know your name even though I will not Say your name- for I have written it many times inside
The bathrooms down these halls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bearded Lady

Before I went down to sleep,
To work for her dreams,
I knelt and said the prayer to Magnum PI and his Jerry (because my grandmother loved him
More than her husband) ,
Especially in the newly paved places
Where we go to church there
Is a righteous rod on the Steeple to Attract the lightning
To bring in the people, between
The doors where my Teeth become a yellow
Sunday graveyard I go
Out walking up the rainy highway
Scarred in the mountain there
Is a lady she is all rose
Thorns, she spreads those legs
To me as if she were trying to Serve me a drink from them,
The elk blow their bull horns,
And the night on her hillside
Is a radio
And the clouds are its sounds,
The music my feet make
As they go underground;
As it marches all toward me,
The eyes of these things,
They are opening the thoughts in
Me
That I thought before
Were sold-out.
After school all 10 kids were Dead before their bodies hit
The ground,
When their parents drove in Circles
Making the color of noises

After school
What a circus!

Robert Rorabeck

The Bears Discover Fire

In poems, wounded, waiting again for the airplanes-
Watching the bag ladies beside the traffic,
Their noses turned up to the silver underbellies
Of flying things:
Entirely enamored by such armies: professionals themselves
In some ways,
While the days burn- in ash, float up
To whatever spaces the giants haunt: repossessed,
I await in a forest,
Body naked- the dryads drinking with the foxes at the Fountain in the base of the mountains,
My brown girl far away from me:
In another land, where she suffers from honoring her
Father and her mother,
As the kites sail away into dollar store tatters,
The lucky ones kissing the souls of the shoes flung up
With the doves, and languishing in the halfway house
That keeps telling ourselves to one another,
Even the angels touching down to hibernate
As the bears discover fire.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beast That Gives Them Milk

Words bloom imperfectly like would be young lovers
Now old and gray:
Words clipped like out of control song birds, like designer airliners
In a sumptuous soirée with the rest of the other singing birds
Enmeshed in the rock garden with the butterflies and
The Spanish rainbows,
Tied up in ribbons of atheistic stone:
I am doing this all right now like a stewardess serving a drink
To the right place, because it is my job and because I am very hungry
And I like what I am doing;
It is as if I could be slaying bearded dragons, but instead I stay my Hand because I want them to live,
Because I am only a mailman and I know their actual worth:
They are absolute beauty; and I would rather drink my barrels of rum
That have come skipping down to the valley;
And paint a scene, allowing the lesser heroes to roe with them in The muggy dirt:
Eating together and making love and then regurgitating into airbags, Purely sickened by the realization of what they'd been up to:
Heroic men and their monsters,
Hoping that their offspring would bring about some new realization on Electricity, but no such thing ever even close to happening,
Just the detritus of dulled newer cars and faux diamond rings;
And children, children, and boatloads of children circulating and Caracoling,
Like rabbits in the rock garden, like areolas out in the sea, not realizing
The beasts that gives them milk also ate their heroes' seed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautifully Illiterate Earth

A petit coral snake burring somewhere in the delicate
Flanks of a faithful whelp:
And I am waiting for the day when the meek shall inherit the Earth,
Uncle, I am waiting for that while I sit in the darkness
And listen to the crooning of the under carriages of airplanes:
They shoot like the most faithful of dreams over the lightest
Atlantic reams,
And the stewardesses upon them are so eager to get all the way
To Europe,
To serve in the fuselages that come so easily it is as if they Are in the backyards of when they were little girls,
While the privateers of whom I have forgotten every one still had High hopes for them,
While Alma was still doing god knows what in Guerrero Mexico,
Down in those primeval hills where the dinosaurs roamed
Without a thought like the chickens outside of the forts of Conquistadors; and I can feel you there,
Sweeping the coquina free underneath the unabashed pines,
And holding up your daughter as the sun returns to its birth,
And the last of its rays cleaved across the beautifully illiterate earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beating Breasts Of Waves

Molded to those lips of cannons,
The green airplanes fold up and go to sleep
Long after the absences of chirruping tourisms:
When the night flowers bloom
Their milky lactates, mimicking the stolen
Architectures of moonrises-
And across the ocean there is only absences
All together between the beating breasts of waves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beating Heart Of The Yard

Finding a blind man's destination underneath the stars,
Another catastrophe comes to the gates of Our grandmothers passed away—
Beneath the arrow-busses and the skies that burn their Cathedrals—what joy in the emollitions,
Like movie theatres of gypsies across the prairies—
Belly-buttons jeweled with purple ibis
Where sensual dragonflies come to drink, sinking and Diving away, seeming to come to the conclusion
That you never loved me—
Their minds filled with the choral harmony of insects—
Premonitions and epiphanies that come in the stops
And starts of daydreams or never seem to really Begin, but go on without ending—
Each one like a locket that falls into the beating heart
Of the yard and all that has pretended to see with
The light of god has to look away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beating Hearts Of A Living Grave

The otter comes out and plays around
Her fragile slipper
Lost somewhere on the wet yard nearby
My feet of glass,
As I go out under the resilient canopy and Take leak.
So high school is over, and I only took
From it so many words
To roam the homeless world with me,
And I didn't take her when I
Thought that we should be entrained.
Her daughter has a beautiful face now
And his last name,
And the world is getting smaller like an amusement
Ride,
Or like a witch going counterclockwise,
And all the time the buses are returning home with Their gaggles of bullies and children.
I remember, her skin was as smooth as a birthstone,
As fledged as a paper airplane,
And now all my art floats like something very small
And fabricated down the neighborhoods
Of Venice,
And everything that has to do with water should
Be a metaphor for her existence:
The way she is going now, where I try to capture her
Like immortality:
Is it that I'd hoped to fill a bed with her,
Or a page,
But they have both escaped above my head,
And the tourists are trying on skis.
Jordan's sister is finally home, her chest so bee stung,
And soon I'll be drinking to her
While whatever light the hour can find crenulated the Pool,
And maybe I'll be so satisfied, I won't even have to Dress up and moan for girls name
Sharon, who never really seem to care if they are home,
Or their flags so conveniently raised from

The beating hearts of a living grave.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beating Hearts Of Her Wounded Children

Scarred without any goals, the unicorns return to Home base,
The beautiful flowers percolate and it seems that I
Am getting old,
Sucreasing poetry and as often as not forgetting to kneel
And pray to the Virgin of Guadalupe, procrastinating on the washing machine
As on the windmills:
And otherwise just getting drunk and visiting ladies of the Night,
Caracoling around Alma house and howling mute and blind:
Because there my soul lives across the train
Tracks curl in the brown sheets of prisms and skin,
Her love already dispersed into the beating hearts of her wounded
Children.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beating Of The Waves

And they will make publications—
And they will keep on believing in the Unending desires of their parades:
It will come again and again to this,
Just like the beating,
And the beating of the waves:
Beautiful visions told time and again
To the children of the un-molested
Housewives,
While the visions outside of doors
Rises,
And the school surceases—
While I figure out my spellings as
For the bouquets of dwarves—
Until there is another honeymoon that
No one else deserves or who Can pay for—
And then in the night: bold!
Crocodiles!
And anyone else who lies sleepless
On the banks beneath the Christmas trees—
And all of this,
And something more—
Something.... Something which my Beloved mother was supposed to reveal to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauties Of Yesterday

Pleasant is the void of the horses
As it is to another failure: the day fails—every crepuscule it
Is defeated:
The dragon defeats Beowulf, the little girl is kidnapped:
And my muse is married to another man:
I am married,
But her soft hand lies buried on the other side of
The earth:
All of her ancestors are cremated,
And they've taken away all of the highest swings from
The park—
The waves burn like fire into the dark,
And the airplanes fly away from here—the tarmac
Is empty—the fair has gone away—
But death lingers, curled as ivy,
Remembering the beauties of yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Animals

There is a heart twisted here and in her lost ways
She has gone away from beauty- If she had known
Beauty all along,
She would have escaped by now- These words would not Linger as the unimpressive scars
The ants trundle over, bivouacking underneath her summit,
Waiting for it to bloom:
Yes, she is waiting to caress another lord, but he has gone
Again to the river to taste another of his girls,
And the country rolls on beside him, selling and lighting
Off fireworks,
And it is a good guess that we live on beside her,
And tell her stories as they are needed- the exegesis of her
Weeds,
We linger like smoke from a forest gone up into the heavens
After all of the beautiful animals have run away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Boys

The deer get up next to their mother underneath
The doors to the mountain—
The sky is as bright and as loud as thunder,
And they travel underneath her, milking as the pinecones
Shutter—
Delusions of mauve beauty in their eyes—
Picking the wild berries with their snouts—as the burning
Fairies come to greet them out of doors—
Knocking on their horns with secret epitaphs—
Now that they live here in the dusk and the curl of the mountains—
And the moon is as luminescent as a daydream that has cut
Her wrists—supposing that they will survive in the haunted entrails
Of echoes—as all of the beautiful boys and girls get up yawning,
To enjoying another day at school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Cars And The Absolutely Glorious Boats

The night is sailing so close and so far away,
Like religious candles flickering, like the caesuras of waves,
And I am almost done,
While the youngest of lovers park their cars and kiss and swap
Tongues straight into the other grottos of their Romantic

Graves:

And you have two children, Alma, and you don't want more,
But I want to be the father of your next child, while the sky smiles
And then like hoary roses grows beautiful
And wild,
Like the long-tongued wolf following the curious virgin
Straight home,
Or at least shadowing the lackadaisical path that she chooses to take:
While I sat in your car with you far a half hour today,
And gave you all the colors and moneys of my birthday cake,
And maybe I even thought and prayed to you deep in Miami Florida even before I met and prayed to you, Alma,
While the all of the desperate stations of ants came up in one Sunday morning rain shower to kiss and pray to your Alabaster knuckles,
But otherwise I do not know you:
Otherwise I am not at home, and none of this is real, and the stars
Do not come out at night and sin and drink to themselves
While all of the beautiful cars crash and the absolutely glorious Boats sink.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Chains Of Mountains

Souls piled into the dressing rooms of bodies,
Try us on blindly and then blow our soup,
Like I try these lines out for girls ringing up the stairs
In beautiful houses underneath aquatic chandeliers;
I try out new sources of bate- I try to sleep with demigods,
And I seed gardens into the green carpet while the alligators
Come up from their bedrooms of sunken nests in the canals
That man dug for them:
The lions snore in their concrete carport: And my best Friends put off for tomorrow what they could make today.
Maybe the most beautiful woman to ever be held by the world is Inside an airplane right now like a crèche,
Maybe she is happy to be above the heads of her potential husbands,
Because they have always been so giddy over her, but now
She can get some rest,
As her pilot follows the prettiest swans and they head together
Following no particular migratory pattern, but are Attracted by the beautiful chains of mountains rising
Like glimmering pitchforks in the west.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Distances

There is some kind of river that we share
With our bodies sweating,
Heads pounding around a Ferris Wheel we both Rode at different times,
Whose light housing apex showed the major arteries
Of our loneliness,
And I wanted to put my hands around the Faberge
Of her ghost and point into some strange distance
At my mother and father,
Being traded from Indian to Indian, further west,
And eating the echinopsis of different cacti all of the time,
And to feel secure in showing her my most loneliest of things-
To go down afterwards, attracted to the false lights,
Like sailors drowning into a stoodup heaven:
To win her prizes that meant nothing, and to take her
About in the motions of the sea, with the beautiful distances lit up all around Us, and no one knowing our names.

-Alma

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Echoes

The places seem to fit as I am dying and
My dog waits at the door, or it is just another commercial
As I lie lactating, a mineral upon the floor:
And it is not a very beautiful thing—
Languishing, commercialized—the thing
Never truly escaped from high school,
And never listening to reason—
The echo that is calling to itself out of season—
And into the finest pastures where it has to be recognized that
It made its finest mistake—
And the cars and the trains go by, listening to themselves
Disappearing without an echo—Whilst all of the finest of men
Dress themselves—peeling themselves away from
The ballrooms as from the orchards—
While the drums of the graffiti's turn frail and fade- □
Isn't just the perfumed throat of the echoes which they left for Us—and then the ballrooms glisten—turn off in spikenards
And forget-me-nots just as the tops of the mountains
Turn into the aphrodisiacs of the places we can never forget nor Lay off-
As you are left in the maelstrom—or in the middle of the fairytale of Your boudoir- while the canyons echo—
And the beautiful echoes ignore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Forest

Crippling luminosity make its aurora along the Long trunk of a lustrous snake as
It goes up a mountain for a drink:
How long will she be its cradle,
As it maneuvers underneath the bowers and
The elk,
The white trees in an albino's sorority
Withered up from where
The fires scarred her cheek:
She will let him climb, legless, getting to
The monuments of her occultism's gardens
Only to send the beautiful
Snows down- and keep him for
A while beneath her gaze,
While the pilots hover above, leaping
Above her candle flame and back to their Little wives;
But even in their beds, they remember that moment
Looking down at her elevated gardens
Where such much life mingles in the sub consciousness
Of the beautiful forest by which she clothes herself.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Imperfection Of Eons

Somewhere there is a killer dying
For better words than these,
And new people are coming home to the Country's bread basket,
All warm and having eaten plenty:
I imagine what it is to feel a kiss between them,
To become better occupied than I am now.
Now I am a galaxy of scars and have been this Way for so many years:
Each year a new scar, and a year to fade:
A scar after that, deliveries to make to strange houses
On my bicycle
In the molecule of a wave or all out:
The songs which resonate over houses, the pirates
Laughing on the sea,
The mermaid listing busy about their prow, addicted
To the rum they pour dripping down her body,
Dripping down:
Her children squelcher from the salt water milk;
She pools them into grottos and gives them lesson
In coral chalk. Over half of them glow,
And after some time she sends them to strange colleges
Where they don't belong,
Where they are made fun of by people beneath them;
I watch them from a crèche tossed by an inconsequential
Breast stroke into the spattered trees:
I love how they swim when they walk,
How they have hidden teal scales beneath their blouses;
Or when I eat them out my brain grows by new gigantisms,
And I learn Latin in a tick. I finish everything
Twain ever wrote, and laugh at most of it; but by morning
They have left off on a sea-horse or a scarlet anemone,
Leaving me nothing but a pearl, the beautiful imperfection
Of eons like a marble on my desk.
I now carry it around with me for good luck,
And place it under my tongue to put them back there,
Lapping lapis lazuli eyes that know everything the Sea has told them,
But have forgotten everything about me, for they have gone

Back into her on a whim;
The caesuras dance in darkening swells
Beyond the dunes I get stuck in, and park for hours,
Trying to decide if I shouldn't call,
But they are so far lost now into another more certain song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Junoism

She is not playing a game:
The werewolf in the cellar—the death
That ate my throat—
And I am the apple who ripened too late—
To fall upon the car port
After the mermaids had already waxened
After the tide had already waned:
This is the beautiful Juno-ism that is left
To matriculate forever—
This is the very sound that is left as the amusement
After all of the pretty airplanes have already turned out—
And her orchards all opened—
And her dogs have already won—
This is my very throat bared to the very abscesses—
And this is the already that
She has already won.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Mystery Of This Song

The body curls and pullulates and it does good to Tie down the girl you love securely to the tresses:
That way she can be a damsel in distress in the middle of the night:
Her body can bloom like the soda machines of echinopsis,
And all the boys can stare like wolves in gym class,
So that when the teacher turns back on all the lights, you will not Be sure what happened:
But if you glance over to her across all the canals of the frogs they've Been dissecting,
And maybe her eyes will have something to say to you:
The body languages in otherwise paralysis, like two versions of the same
Story never coming together, but believe that one another is possible
Deep in the humidity underneath the slow motion ceiling fans of Their bedrooms,
And she might very well curl a finger to your name in the pit of her
Wildflower beckoning; but you can never be certain that this ever happened,
Which makes it the beautiful mystery of this song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Ocean

Blue gill in the lake of my childhood
Underneath the burning sugarcane of my childhood
Which I never truly saw:
Nor were there stolen bicycles in the canal,
Or rabbits holes to housewives bedrooms
I could not even interpret what I thought of you
Lost in the scars and sweats over all of Those meandering afternoons the visions of
A Cyclops introduced to the kaleidoscope you
Can tell he is enamored and his senses
Have been turned it pigs, and yet
The beautiful ocean opens all around him like
A flower the rest of the heroes escape into
Her classes- and he doesn't even care.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful People

I will not live forever:
I will die and the waves will bury me without any Sort of sweeter pornography,
But while I lived I've had the chance for my lips
To sip sweet liquor,
To believe in the braver paganisms that come rushing
Like the noise of sound,
To sit together with distant friends in an air-conditioned
Theatre and to look together
At the beautiful people,
Those who together best represent the species,
The milk men and astronauts who are floating
Together
Door to door, a careless fraternity without a sound,
Pollinating both of those lips of you and your sister,
While neither I nor your husband are Anywhere around,
Around.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Swings

Metamorphosis

Smoke and burn: from the goldfish bowl,
From the echinopsis while these
Less than brilliant houses sit here chanting and calling out
Time:
I thought I would be married by now, echoing up
The boulevards,
Ululating down through the basins that this isn't even real-
This isn't even the echo of a daydream,
Or another word pulled out of a hat by a hapless lover
Traveling the turnpike up to Disney World to See a girl who doesn't even remember him:
But it doesn't stop-
Like death in a vending machine alongside the road
Next to the ants all over the bloated possum,
The alligator grinning as it lurks like a statue:
These few words I know blowing
Witchcraft from the campfires of my wrists: another night
Lost to the shadowy paganisms
In the snow banks outside of the beautiful swings of An eerily blinded church.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautiful Vehicles

My mother or my grandmother looks
Beautiful in her brand
New vehicle—
Like Mexican petunias, all lilac and
Purple,
On high stems around the shoulders
Of retired housewives
At the exact same places
The graveyards surrender their plumped
Borders
Where bones look up from
Beneath the earth
As the day rides its candles over them—
And breasts heave and sigh
Heave and sigh
Upon the beautiful vehicles that carry them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beautifully Enigmatic Skies

This is the way the ashes of the fireworks float
Down above the sunlit and shadowed heads of her two
Men:
One evil and one good, but both good enough for her bed,
As the fruit market is closing up everyday
Underneath the sauerkraut and grass roots of the most American of Angels,
Sitting up their in their tenements or banging utensils
So hungrily in the cafeterias
Of their yellowing lawns through which the great silver
Airplanes faun:
And the sun becomes the principal, while my lips wait
So thirstily at the gate of the water fountain
Before your browning, sorrowful eyes,
Your children in the cribs, the angels in the skies;
And I am unable to drink, even with the nectar of sodas
Pressed to my lips,
As long as while that evil man blows the wind that directs
Your soulful ships,
The waves cavalcading their saddles and dives,
And the most American of angels making their dour plans
Even through the beautifully enigmatic skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty Of Her Angles

Spoiling in their ways like a cornucopia of weeds
Through the bloody roots like the pubis underneath the silvertips
That spark sending a codex to the airplanes that tip
Their wings to reciprocate; and they have it all going off:
The stewardesses are flying their brooms low
Over the festivities of the seasons: and the reintroduced wolves
Are all hypnotized, so the foals are safe:
And the farmers come out and shake the lucky feet of rabbits under
The spendthrift moon, as I leap atop the wall of my lover's father and look
In at her cable television and boudoir in the same even Palaces who each have estuaries like vermilion jewels where the housewives
Are swimming, and their children come home to after school:
And I linger there like a delicate knight, sucking my thumb into Dawn: when she rises, my love, and drapes things across the beauty of Her angles that I swear she should never have put on.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty Queens

In the inevitable shutdowns of the butterfly houses
The seniors will have their misfits and their Graduations—
Even if it is an entire castle, while I have been driving
Myself from shore to shore—
There are only so many numbers in the alphabet—
And then the paths lead to plagiarisms if Nothing more—and the lights go out above
The crocodiles—
Above the sluice of playgrounds who
Have all turned out, while the pageants
Misrepresent themselves—high above the sky
The movies all look beautiful—
And then there are the memories—
Of the emptied playgrounds—
Of the emptied playgrounds—
And the beauty queens touching themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty That Is All Around Them

In the cooling day I stumble from,
Down from the higher basins where angels gossiping
Is drowned out by sun showers
And waterfalls,
Retreating so far as to be the equal of the sea- and
In the soft shadows and airconditioning,
Reciting for her- the muse- the few things I've Ever thought:
Tomorrow will be Easter, and I will sell crickets
Underneath the overpass
Look at how they will change in the sun,
Searching for a tree to climb,
Or a blue elbow to kiss because school will be out:
Out, so boys won't have to be truants to play a Game of ball,
And arranged together in their pinstriped
Show- they will play games and put on performances
For you that neither you nor they will ever know:
But I will think of them, and I will think of you,
Like a match stricken in the oven of a church,
Lit for a virgin who is almost blind to me, but forever
Beautiful:
And they will run around you, worshipping the beauty
That is all around them that they should never see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty The Vanishing Sky Once Knew

And we'll sell fireworks, one or the other,
By broken arms of broken brothers,
Underneath tents triaged in the New Mexican Desert,
We'll be forgotten,
But we'll get what we deserve—

And the blue cats will plunder
Leaving foot prints above the fossils of
That evaporated sea
And some nearby high school's foot ball
Team will pray on bended knee

And without thinking too much about you,
Isn't it somewhere around here where
I lost you—
During the ungodly misscommunications of Marble
And the god awful hookers of Rout 66
And the banners that they bow to—

Amidst the holidays of cursed fortune,
And the rattle snakes—
And to the south, the endless frontera unfolding
Its thirstless mistakes—

I said some words to you and yet looked
Away,
I sold some fireworks for my father—
And while I was selling it all for him,
I gave it all away—
While they filmed movies in San Antonio,
In the beautiful river walk I once wished
We both knew,
Before I even beheld you—

And these long lines, like the blue prints
Of prisms
That were designed to show my fanfare for you,

But were forgotten—
Were ghaſt like ſeeds into the opulent
Deſer for you—
And they lie there yet basking, blue and
Purple
Jems of ſcorpions and cadavers
Still hoping that you find them
While the traffic paſſes blindly by them

And the ſtorm clouds clutter in
The beauty the vaniſhing ſky once knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty Underneath

Bullies take their heavens in hand and
Turn them into wet clay,
Just as the cars roll over the road in the rain,
And the new and the stillborn puppies
Lay tattered near the drainage of blue moccasins,
While still some flowers off in the eaves
Overshadows by the carport try to glow;
And I think of her eyes: I think of my muse's eyes
Far away, brown eyes across the train tracks,
Dusty angels in the burs- kicked into sand dollars
By sightless tourists:
The beauty underneath the shells, blanketed by waves
Who steal them away like effluvious thieves;
But I have seen them there, and called her name to
The rabble,
And the snakes came out of the sea and kissed my hand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beauty Underneath The Shells

Bullies take their heavens in hand and
Turn them into wet clay,
Just as the cars roll over the road in the rain,
And the new and the stillborn puppies
Lay tattered near the drainage of blue moccasins,
While still some flowers off in the eaves
Overshadows by the carport try to glow;
And I think of her eyes: I think of my muse's eyes
Far away, brown eyes across the train tracks,
Dusty angels in the burs- kicked into sand dollars
By sightless tourists:
The beauty underneath the shells, blanketed by waves
Who steal them away like effluvious thieves;
But I have seen them there, and called her name to
The rabble,
And the snakes came out of the sea and kissed my hand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bed In Which They Didn'T Belong

Faces of forgotten cowboys on the high ridges of Opulence:
Now covered by the tricks of dust, their masks hidden, and the Way they used to sing woebegone for their women
Who were all enamored inside the towns they were too
Nervous to approach:
Full of occupations and the knowledge of apple trees:
They felt better on the cattle drive, under the moon:
Blue like velvet,
Like the orbit of a wave: they could never even imagine cars:
Things driven to take her further away:
The cities boiling up to the tombs in the sky,
And the wisdom of their adversaries teaming in the fine stock of Railroad cars
Gathered together as if for a game: Now all of the lush frontera is Gathered out before them.
Spread like a dinner plate where the Mexicans move insatiably
Trying to get through the wounded orifices
And from there into the working machines of America;
And fireworks over that, and the long coattails of peacocks
And cockroaches,
Strutting perpetually and unannounced to all of the new occupations
Of man kind who somehow figured out
The subtle wonders of in ground pools and golf courses;
That they have become so sated over the fineries of the female form,
That they have saluted her and made grottos for her inside
Malls,
And the bestial natures of the heavens have gone into story books
That only their youngest of children imbibe,
And soon grow out of: they grow up into roller skates and then
To kiss her neck inside the perpetuating arcades,
Leaving hickeys, and the tiniest of stains almost indescribably but There and unremovable in the patinas of the beds in which they Didn't belong.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bed Of A Second Story Ballroom

Up in the sky of elbows
And cracked plates- of almost anyways-
Looking up, paper folded from a paper cut:
Soft words spoken to an inoffensive wound:
Look up, there seems to be stewardesses up there
Circulated by the ceiling fans and floating through the room:
Busty, hyperventilating ghosts,
Titillating the pop corned gloom,
So you don't have to go anywhere to believe-
Here is the chattel of the day slung gloom; and they sing
Your name, and blossom;
And kiss your armpits, as they swing upwards, smoky perfumed:
And they love you, laughing, winged;
And the words that you love to pearl them: swimming,
Resplendent- echoes the soft loneliness:
While the pets sleep in the sleeping grass, and your parents
Make love above your very own goddesses,
In the heavens which birthed you- up the carpeted steps
And in the bed of a second story ballroom.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beds That You Can Be Sure Are Very Real

It is getting too late for beer,
Or another ribald,
But I still have these things inside of
Me,
And the movies sure are swell even if
They are meaningless-
Like your eyes so far away and yet
Haunting me with the zoetrope
Dancing underneath your lashes like Bamboo strung out from the Silver feet of practicing samurai-
So I want to say your name,
Even if you are with so many children
And red bottles:
You should be a nursery teacher all stuck
Up and steaming in that crèche between
Your mountains' bosoms,
With the tourists sopping about and eating
So much ice-cream
But never any books:
I just wish that you'd think of me once or Twice as you bath and touch yourself,
And say my name in the shelter where I
Slide my words gently in,
Banishing the notions of mortality,
And taking you across my shoulders above the Tree lines of spoken words,
Where esplanades float free of color,
Though sometimes blue and unsuspecting like
The special theater of bucks leaping
As they are being watched by an incandescent
Audience of winged and presumptuous
Deity,
Weeping until they burn and you tumble
Across the river like a fable that has lost any since
Of purpose,
The little light coming out of you and into your Hand like an industrious stewardess,
When you body settles and begins to float

Back down into the beds that you can
Be sure are very real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bedtime Of These Quick Mythologies

Liquor is almost gone,
As you are almost gone- my love,
Last rose from the butcher shop:
Giving your more developed friends better
Whiffs of your perfume:
In Colorado, or Spain-
In all the countries where there is yet art,
You remain its muse,
And video-games,
And roller-coasters, and otters-
Open positions at zoos in inland cities:
This is how I remember you,
Think of you, and dream of you outside in Theatres of parked cars,
Huffing on the classes- squad mistress
To women with big breasts, but yours are the best
Those corpulent bouquets caracoled by hungry bees,
Pullulating so fatly on the stems,
Bending over doggie style, sudsy with toy rigs
In the bathtub- you couldn't imagine how many Fireworks we sold-
So many f-ing fireworks, and I dedicated all of it
To you,
And would still like to buy you just to know who you
Are,
And its almost the bedtime of these quick mythologies,
So where are you?

Robert Rorabeck

The Beer Maid Of The Sky's Arcade

Because I paid them,
They made her to look like you-
The beer maid of the sky's arcade,
But I would only admit to
It with a smile,
Because you have gone away-
Beneath the ocean's curling petals,
Beneath the milky avenues
Of the newly formed nation
Which diadems that greatest hallucination-
There in the Atlantean grottos
You wear the speckled colors
Of other thoughts,
Sitting with the amputated statuettes
Of your lovely sisters,
And you hold a man in your heart
I do not recognize;
But in the sky the well-paid architects
Have made her for me,
The billboard of unending horizon
And she doesn't turn off:
Her lips, as big as rosy ships
Sell things which we all need-
When whispering, they feed the softly-singing bees;
Her eyes are the bluest things we
Can stare into with no cessation;
Easily striding, she walks over the earth,
Advertising herself brightly in many cities,
As the airplanes pass by her opal brow
Filled with love-sick tourists,
Who tip over and die just to See this giant goddess who to it
You are a forgotten blueprint....

Robert Rorabeck

The Bees Sting

Oh then, I saw you there beneath
The lodges in the mountains where the smoke
Purred from the lips of the woman in
The fire
And the snow melted in the footprints and cascaded
Down for a great distance, rushing
And galloping through the deadfall
Too busy for the lips of the insatiable panthers-
Into the pools of the sororities of aspen
Who extended their long bangs in the Tears of the emollition
And I sat there, sketching her in that nude scene:
She never once looked up at me,
Even though her face reflected everything
Even as the sky slowly pulled her away,
And the heavens came- and she waited for the promises
That they gave her to come to be,
As the flowers perfume, as the bees sting.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beginning Of Class

Who am I,
In my open wound,
Like the orifice of the ants' new mound,
The sandy brail
Convexed in the cloudy mourning,
Before school has begun,
And the janitors have yet to arrive
In their beat-up Fords
And unlock the gates:
Then there are still maidens weeping
Above the red clay of the baseball diamond,
Weeping the dew hidden in the veiling
Changing room,
And the earth is swept where
It is redacted, and made up to look presentable:
A bridesmaid with no arms to which
The alligators are sobbing their smiles,
The torpid morbidity of the languid reptiles
Watching the awakening fairy-tale
Of the new mammals' bolero:
The sudden accidents we all must watch,
While the yellow busses line up
In a queue of noisy youth,
The children swarming out like ants smelling
A picnic, measured by their geometry teachers:
They perform chaotic angles in coincidence
Swathed with mosquitoes,
The wavering reflections in the backyard
Pools, the indistinguishable juxtapositions
Of the prehistoric youth:
They walk by you like the bourgeois,
And you are a crack in the wall a shadow
Disappeared into,
The space between life and death,
Wakened too early for the boisterous living,
The tardy student lingering in the vacated hallway
After the bell has rung the beginning of class.

The Beginning Of Something Really Big

Alma, I love you- and that is my special torment:
When I say these things, even when I am not your patron:
And my hands shake, and my knuckles pop like drift
Wood in abolishing flames:
And yet you somehow floated all away across to the areas of This state:
And you want to take your children to Disney World:
And you want to believe in the same god as these patrons do:
That will elevate you as well;
And the storm is building up and curling like barbed wire over the Forgotten wheel barrows;
And it doesn't have to be over: I can still kiss your lips,
And drive you around, cursing the young bulls and satellites of the Other gods that don't have to move this way:
And I will get to you eventually, and touch your brown thighs like Calling to a genie: and breath you in like the fine spit of the Sea:
And metamorphosis if only through the ways that I find you in me
Anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beginning Of Spring

When my Chinese wife comes to America I will drink my Rum in front of her
And she will be glad:
I know- I have seen her, having touched down
On what might as well have been
The other side of the moon to Find her,
The airplanes leaping away again—
And there she was, fawning luxuriously,
The offspring of a people who never even had
The mind to speak of The Garden of Eden:
She just took me home and played the guzheng,
And gave me her
Thirty year old virginity—
And in the morning, I looked outside of the hotel
At a world I had never seen:
The places around her were beautiful
And we rode bicycles in tandem around the pear
Trees that were the first to blossom some weeks
Before the beginning of Spring.

Robert Rorabeck

The Beginnings Of Romance Between The Victors

She is married,
But she accepts and the dreams
Are like pantomimes all across the child's Playground wall, and the palms
Are gossiping busy from the hurricane,
And it is well past 12: 00 am,
But her glass slippers are still on,
And I will buy my house before the coffin,
In that order like the insouciant processions
Of front yard animals killing through
The mowed green,
Drinking the drippy hibiscus,
Thus the children disperse after school
And all their lives, the spinning whistlers
Molting from pubescent scars, the rented
Homes in rain clouds,
The gray ruts and furrows our friends grow
Forth from the souged teeth of the enemy,
And in somber reunion proceed to the Shore of the sea,
And in that behold the writhing processions
Of the flotsam and Argonauts;
See what they found, shrunken
Into the atoms of waves,
And the metropolis a careworn harem
Where cuckolded men run to new lives,
And old lives proceed to metamorphose,
Breaking against the opulent knees of the music
Teacher, and her shared obsessions
Which tongue above the wreathing salts of
The Mediterranean, mimicking the Greeks,
As we all look onward to the others
Treading behind the unperceived glass, like Ornaments hung in caesuras, ascending the Breakers in dire competition, until they leave
Us and breathlessly climb forth,
Christened divers, adorned by pearls,
Waitresses and mermaids serving an industry
Of innumerable sands,

kissing the
Quieted lips upon the newest shore,
Where the statues of Titans stand on their Pedestals, shading the beginnings of Romance between the victors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Behemoths Of Our Suddenly To Bloom Lives

Glasses burning in classroom of beautiful women
Who are all gurgling up on a shelf,
But at least I know how to expeditiously take off a bra,
And in my bedrooms I don't have to be alone all
The time,
And it feels like a good game of baseball when I
Get lucky,
And the islands spill out beneath me so close that I can leap:
And the cobwebs are of unicorns,
And the dungeons are empty and sparkling, and I have Become a hero drinking in the first spills of daylight outside
Of churches,
So in the morning when the buses come and the clouds
Lift,
I can be brazed by the low flying airplanes who are just Curious,
That the terrapins are snacking in the greasy yards of Hibernating housewives,
As the calcifying song plays over the entire neighborhood
Until it becomes a grottos for virgins,
As we go spelunking blinding into one another,
Our senses echoing through the behemoths of our suddenly
To bloom lives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bend Of Another Careless Century

Racetracks of spell craft and little girls entwined
Into forget-me-nots;
And today we got in Indian corn and pumpkin squash,
And Romero mowed the track of land where'll
I'll be through Christmas,
And my mother echoes through the weak shadows-
Where is she? Maybe she is in my adolescent Spain;
And I want you in my gardens of chalk,
My balmy two degrees of vision in your mustard frock:
And want to put on so many dazzling displays for you:
I want to go off in showers of silver palms-
I want to be the spikenard growing out of the faceless
Eyes of the greater eaten by giant grows halfway up
Chomolonga- Look at how he always goes,
Pointing to where they finally found George Mallory,
Like a scarred flower spumed by Chinese skree:
And the mosquitoes straw the blood from my calves
After I jogged twenty laps underneath the airplanes' ballet:
One time I even jogged the length of a marathon alone
Into salty crepuscule in Okaheele Park with only the Torpid jewels of alligator's to witness me- But even then
I was thinking of you, and it's as if I were now there,
Turned up all of a sudden like a dead but famous hiker around
The bend of another careless century.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bereavement Of A Canoe

Poem folding into the bereavement of a canoe—
Starting out from the backyards of
Two decades ago—
Little alphabets spent like fireworks in
The penny arcades of wishing wells—
So few words we have to know to go to work,
To share ourselves with drive-thrus
And tellers
And the make-believes of the cashed in Super-heroes—this is what It means to be Alive and selling things—
As a princess gets her hair cut in the car port—
And looks up into the clouds building—
A tornado warning in the flambé of clouds—

Robert Rorabeck

The Best

I smash the liquor bottles against
The retirement homes,
Narcoleptic behind the regal palms;

And I love you,
And I swipe the hair back from my eye:
Each bang long and graying,
Gun metal blue like
Ripley's Believe It Or Not Museum up in Saint Augustine;

And I jerk off,
And my erection is quite enormous as I watch
It in the mirror of the one armed farmer
Whose liquor I steal,
I drink all up:

I have never met him,
And I have never met you in so many years,
But I bet you're looking swell,
Babe,
And I buy you diamond bracelets which wouldn't Otherwise sell,

And I wish you both the best.

Robert Rorabeck

The Best Men Die Where The Best Ghosts Live

I am so thoroughly ruined.
Two year old scars darkening under the Sunlight as it waves goodbye-
My heart's fealty the strange tricks of the Two edged dagger:
I kick cans into midnight, loiter around
Graveyards, just me and stray cats-
I have no children to mourn me, no words
Which could live the two weeks of a monarch
Butterfly's migration into the deep forests of Mexico:
Girls I've loved have new cars and husbands,
Or they live in such beauty that it reflects their Own nature back to them all day long
While they sell things like spirits to be imbibed:
I am thoroughly wrecked with my dogs-
They despoil my bed.
I am not their master. I haven't bought a new Pair of jeans in close to ten years;
Her eyes never fall sideways for extended
Amounts of time to study mine;
I never sit anymore near a newly wed in a fast
Escaping car- I never did. Nor do
I sit and study in class anymore; nor do
I teach it- I just keep up the survival tricks, the Little batwing hinges that get me through the literate
Ditches- Pass me through one more swelter,
Like a store brand Eucharist until all the girls are married
And turned into doves. The crocodile
Comes and offers me a ride to the other side of the Canal where there is poisoned holly and presocratic professors
Still believing what they choose,
And paper airplanes with their noses smashed,
And the centerfold stewardesses with their plastics bruised.
I take the ride- Let the minnows of the minutiae world
Nibble my toes that are like careless rudders.
There is no rush- Eventually, I will never get there.

The Best Of Us

The scars like tinsel;
Like bicycle spokes around the sun.
I am thirty, spider legs come out from The corners of my eyes. Do you pity me now?
So asks briar rabbit down in the nettles
Of his insouciant job: such is me.
If I had a twin, he would be beautiful, if Left unscarred, un-grayed. I am part hurricane,
Twirling, twirling counterclockwise,
The direction a caustic ballerina pirouettes.
Am I so different than you? Are you able To cease thinking on command? I get my Haircut with politicians; this is not an allusion,
If you could understand, then you could take Walks with me; and we would sleep like babes
Under the humid overpass, and listen to the Grazing of the strange angels running in Galvanized herds across the land.
I would pass things to you we both found interesting,
And in the evenings we would kiss the twisted
Bottle, walk through the shore-lines of solicitors,
We would make helpless illusions above the waves:
Our sister, junoesque, tricks of our amnesia,
Riding straddled to the father-god; the redness of His apoplexy cuts first to the east before the sun,
And we mumble two dribbling jesters, and our Dog, the third shadow, lulling, lulling,
The best of us on four legs faithfully waiting with
The stick clutched in his vulpine jaw; the best of Us, rambling to and fro from where we understand,
Vagabonds, broken-jesters, or leather-tramps, if you
Will, of this fair and verdant land.

Robert Rorabeck

The Best Ways To Pretend

Two young children on a fence with a
Fox,
While their mother is waking up somewhere else—
In some other bedroom,
Or in the grottos where candles still keep for
The birthdays she doesn't care to have,
And I am on the road to my lighthouse—
While I am forgetting all of the other parts of Speech,
How to make kaleidoscopes for her out of
The dreams of my wrists,
As the high schools surrounding us are overcome
With the dire aspects of werewolves who Need the moonlight of the halls—
Cheerleaders gossiping around the water fountains,
Like hummingbirds and eagles around the Cathedrals of outdoor waterfalls—
Until all of their adolescent dictions are drowned
Out by the séances of the brightest stars—
And they remain there after the echoes have fallen
Away down the sides of an earth that needs no
Definition—
The failure of my art lighting off fireworks in
The driveway, waiting for the soft breasts and Fried chicken of the ambivalent housewives to Drive up to me, delivering soap operas
And the eyes of Disney World which always seem
To find the best ways to pretend at surviving.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Futures Of More Illiterate Men

My aunts have scars and
So do I, so,
I am going to buy a house-
Not the one I wanted,
No desert, hummingbirds, or sea:
The Mississippi will be the great muddy
Ribbon she misplaced outside my door
So many years ago,
So many classes spent gasping like a fish
Selfishly out on the precipice,
Far above the shopping malls, with not
A blue mountain lion around for
So many aphorisms:

My clock stopped six years ago,
These scars on my cheeks, the heat-
Stroked Eskimos: She really did me in,
The secular pugilist whom I didn't really love;
She married a lawyer back against the tall
And burnished shore where we once
Made love like sea-turtles;
Until the raven ate our egg, nevermore:
Yes, she really stopped me,
And the Mormon boys made sweet fun of me
Down in New Mexico when we were selling fireworks
For my father,
While I dreamed of forest fires sweeping over sweet mountains:

Now this,
Another turn on the merry-go-round, a lash of liquor,
A brighter hunting cap and catcher's glove
And I am going somewhere again, throwing over the shoulder,
Going into the purple plains: The house is picked up
And pirouetting on to the witch,
And I have drunken the last dropp of rum
Before I've gone and stolen Mark Twain again from the Library- The better futures of more illiterate men,
The exhuming from such basements,
The putting away of video games and pulp fantasy,

And the picking up of the plough,
Another trick,
In my hand, this dripping foreplay nobody
Reads: I can't barely spell,
But my woman is so beautiful,
And now I know I'll be there to catch her
As we fall.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Half Of The Wishing Bone

If I keep on going,
Tending until full season, will it release
A spell, a crooked scar of lightning,
A slightly poisonous kiss,
And awaken the vivid maiden from her
Voyeuristic crypt,
Because I've cast the dice so many times,
And tumbled down the stairs,
I've procured the better half of the wishing Bone,
And I've lined up army men in honor of
Her,
But is it more likely that I've run out of Important letters,
Vowels dripped until the sheets are wet
Spotted,
Coins of wishing cluttering up the well,
Echoing without recall,
Undoubtedly I've said so much, I've Run against myself sleeping,
Drooling on my sleeve,
While she nimbly takes his hand and sails
Out across the hall:
I've said so much before I understood
I shouldn't say anything at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Man

I drink to you:

Since kindergarten I've stolen things and looked at fresh

Pornography in stolen cars,

Ladies in the chassies, like conquistadors in their dunes,

The cenotaphs of bared breasts,

And all of their best stuff;

And you are my blue eyed muse, and the waves retreat like

Frightened unicorns,

And then they come again and this time give me oral

Sex;

And all of this time it is you I've thought of

Captured like rhapsodies of ecstasy in the waves;

And on our senior fieldtrip we went to Disney World,

But I did drugs:

I could barely look at you. Could you hardly believe that I

Was genius;

And now that you know that I will not die, do you want to Join my disjointed ship:

There is room: I have made you a bed, for you and your husband

Side by side:

I will not watch you undress:

I am a good man, lonely, broken: I will introduce you to my dogs,

And give you safe haven, and set you free,

And if you do not come back to me then I know you have found dry

Land and a place to built a better home

In better place than the strange churches whose rafters I have bled

For you off work in cartoon Sundays,

Like a blind man cursing the god, or the better man who

So easily led you away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Means To Live

I want you to love me, but mostly I want you
To read my poems:
And I've been listening to Bukowski- and it makes Me a wreck,
And I want to take you by your straight black Cherokee
Hair straight into the aloë
While the airplanes are chirping,
To do things with you by tongue that I've seen done
In dirty magazines: and it's all a fraud,
And you were smart enough to ship the goods to other
Men before I got to you,
And your house has awakened, and even without a chimney
It is red eyed and following-
Where the canal represents death,
And the red Florida holy the means for an out for the Pre-
Socratic philosophers,
And I am dying- And the kittens are licking themselves,
And by whatever hour, the alligators are smiling:
I am not a professional golfer, and so I feel that I should have More liquor: I feel that you should write to me unprompted,
So that one day I might carry myself all the way up
To your slope and unfurl and drool so that you might smile
And hold your child out in front of you so that
She might too learn of the monster who has permitted so much
Love to bile out from his shoe-polished sack;
And that I might raise up a midget hand, still shrinking,
And ask for whatever little means you might have to Give,
So that I might just go off again, leaving my translucent trail,
To buy more fermented grains to sign off to you,
For you to show your child, giggling, biting her fist
And tasting that flesh which is too yours,
And provides the immortal nourishment- the better means to live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Sea

I just want to be homeless and drink wine,
To be like wet paint in preschool,
Like a shellfish stuck in the shell of your mind:
S-,
S- the Sabbath of the week,
The cherry on the tip top of its cherry blossom
Peak:
I think of you through the mortal coil of me
Rooms,
And look up to you as the infant looks up to
The mobile in its carriage room;
But what am I doing, doing,
The sea is always f%cking moving:
And I am wounded, I am gut shot;
I am a good man who has been on top of so many Good mountains,
And that is the worst thing to be; and I love you
But love seems to have no meaning,
And the world turns like a pie hungry for the fires
Of its baking,
As your eyes burn through the soot of the tourists
Shops,
And the occupations that don't exist anymore;
And Australia is beautiful, but I have never seen her.
My buttocks quivers as Pedro and my brother
In law are now asleep, like sleeping bicycles sleep.
See them and love them both better than me;
But, S-, you are always better compared to
The better sea;
And S-, S-, your birthdays are inside of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Better Students

It is wearing
Off—this supreme vision,
The heaven of your pornography:
Everything I ever wanted,
I had for a while in
The backseat of a car in the jungle—
With only so many words,
So many hours:
Now your more beautiful flowers
Bloom, fluttering their Banners for the thoughts of another's
Hands,
As the dogs vanish as they run around
The tracks—
As the empty courtyards of the schools
Overflow with sunlight—
And they days get even with the Shoulder blades of angels—
Sweating and seeming to blush from
The ruby geometries of the baseball diamonds
All of the better students have left so
Eagerly behind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Big Bad Wolf

Arrowheads are not as far underneath the earth
As dinosaurs, but I am having a harder time believing on My knees than I did before—
The virgins are still in my house—like the fables of Snow White
And Red Riding Hood—
But they are not my wife—
And the big bad wolf is huffing—huffing
At my door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Big Cities

Little lights that stutter and flicker
Found ill formed in the greenish cinder blocks
Of amusement homes:
In the little towns that keep their own paces—
Cattle rustling in the night
And the castles that do not have to move—
But move ever so softly, mollusks in Their shells carried across the big cities that
Are always on the move.

Robert Rorabeck

The Big Goodbye

Let us attend to
The hyperactive lullabying bowers
The neon forests the Working girls strut like
Lost granddaughters
Freckled with naked
Picnic baskets
Blueprinted by Telsa
Backed and put on-line by Baron Steam Engine;

As if moving away,
You are looking at me
As if you do not care,
As if you do not know
Nor ever thought of

Where there is a certain lake
Whose skin stretches restively like
A sheet;
There is a place through the Bustling dime store leaves
Where we might disembark
With a slender kiss,

Shrouded by sky,
The topaz coin
Flattened on the divine
Railroad trestle
There is another
Peter Pan
Who is I

In a single moment
Of a single day
On the chosen thread
In a locked room
Woven to feeling in Your throat;

If you touched me
We could fly

Featherlessly winged without
A purpose to migrate and Forage
Pumping alive above the Honking jungle where these Go to die
The brightest light,
The big goodbye.

There is another
Peter Pan
Who is I

If you touched me
We could fly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bigger Half Of The Wishbone

The light candles and pools-
And you think that I would be grateful, that she has remembered me:
That she let out straight for her uncircumcised door and made
As if to come bounding for me,
Like a virile fox set on another thing out of reach- But so the planets Burned, and we burned our fingers on the hot letters cooked into the Ovens of the mail,
All those tinderboxes straight out of doors. Now I have a house that is Eighty-five years old, in a neighborhood where the mailmen are only Allowed to walk:
I saw her the first day I got here, and explained to her that it was my House now, and she gave me my mail and went away while the airplanes
Went over us together, both at the same time,
And the jasmine waited to perfume the night: I bought a bird house,
Like a cenotaph captured in the spit of toothpicks to accentuate
The home,
To help me remember what I was, but eventually I will need to put a
Song inside, and a boat to go on the mantle of my fireplace;
And I girl who will love me who I can snap off the bigger half of the Wish bone for,
One who will stay awhile and not just come by on workday afternoons
Heaving a satchel with all the bills.

Robert Rorabeck

The Billboards Of Mascara

Fruit slipped from a Spanish vine-
Looking up, I am here:
A hold over, a fleck of gold and a snag from a river:
Look into the horse's widening eye,
And see the strange, petrifying visions
That he sees:
Rider less, worshipping a cathedral of billowing clouds:

Rattlesnakes coiling and coital at the edge of a
River on payday.
Wayward families and buses of school children going home
From church, burgeoning at the edge
Of the abyssal mountains:

Each time a rock slips off a cliff,
Comes down to a grave of someone once breathing upon the World:
The carcass of an octopus enveloped and husked into a cenotaph
After eight months:
It may have well have been a miracle, a famous scientist,
A love letter:
But dying, a tryst:

Here, in the burned down garden of crypts and melted crayons,
Satan takes off his pants and dances around,
Kissing a plastic horse made to stand there according to The rules of man:

Like a teacher administering tests to the school children
Like a politician getting elected for a second term:
Like a sperm whale eaten alive by crows at the knife edge of The city:

Lit by your eyes,
The billboards of mascara,
The little treats and carrion that chum the roadsides
For the latchkeys and the school boys
Who turn into werewolves at the smell of you-

Like rockets exploding for the fourth of July.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bird

I don't know Beethoven's different symphonies,
But I get drunk in the snow,
And there is evidence until Spring
Of where I've laid myself:
I return- I am the sparrow with one good eye
Nesting in your radiator, telling you different things.
You go into the store- You bring a little cash.
Back with you, and it is warm again:
Look at all these different things lined out beside the Ghosts, the sweet Caroline's you imagine sitting Beside you while you coast,
Blowing ghostly bubbles, slapping ghostly thighs:
I twitter in your radio. Or I twinkle like a star-
I get dizzy in your hubcaps, the revolutions of a car.
I know Handel made his water music,
And Mozart laid a requiem, and for a housewarming
Gift it is nice to bring a marble ham;
But it is Spring time now, and that is why I sing,
But of the winter's harsh sincerity, I don't whistle a Thing; For under the blustering shrewdness a lascivious
Bar gets rapped, the aspens lose their favor,
The maple all is tapped. The rivers all but stop proceeding
Like a highway down to the sea, the flowers lose their pollen,
And the pollen lose the bee;
Where little girls whisper in the hoarfrost outside of Church,
The masters lose their favor, their mongrels leave off search:
I don't know Beethoven's different symphonies;
But on June 6th we invaded the beaches of Normandy- Now,
I've always eaten store bought pie, but for this same reason when She left me, I knew not to wonder why; but flew around Spitting cherry pits until
I found a chassis so great as a roaring thing,
And live inside it fully, became your second king. Now I Wonder where we're going with all these store bought things,
Maybe to the movies, there and home again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Birthday That Is Mine

Weeks of havoc cannot remember your perfumes—
Or the French poets against the over-perfect canals:
I swear, my wife will find me and have me
On my birthday—
Even if I am not in love with her—It is my art to be Kind, as the dogs and horses ride their tracks
And the lips blow out the birthday that is mine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Birthdays Of Long Ago

Mexico: a green counter filled with snakes a rivers
That run backwards like counter clockwise Ferris Wheels,
And arteries of breath, and veins of rich blood
And innuendo:
Starting and stopping all right there in the hills that your father
Marcelino sends most of his money back into:
Back to his first daughter, and his first and second houses;
Alma- at least that is what you told me
While you waited in the doctor's office instead of coming to See me;
And in provided a good excuse: I got so jealous during the Tuesday, that the only way I could find to calm myself
Down was to kneel and cross myself before The Virgin of Gaudalupe:
Which is what I did, while afterwards I beat myself like
A drum, and practiced myself for you:
And when I got to talk to you, your voice the prism that exhibits
The rainbow, I got you to agree that you loved me;
And it was a vermillion interlude, even if it had to fail:
While the day before I stole another baseball cap that read Mexico;
It was the same as the one that I had originally bought for you,
But I left that old shell behind at the store,
And I walked out into the loneliest traffics of the day- beaten
Down again, listening to the chaos of the heavens as they fell
Across my senses, like the sparks of banshees remembering the brightness
That once resided in their kitchens; and your brownest body
Cradled into mine, like drift wood that doesn't ever want to leave
The frothing love makings of the sea- even though they are rabid,
And beaten themselves, sliced like pieces of cage into the conquistadors
Sharp points, who have already cenotaphed themselves into
The birthdays of long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bitter Doorways Of An Absolute Sky

Apple of my eye,
Who knew that an ugly man would still be writing love poems:
How can I save myself for you when
I don't even know the instrument that has sewn your soul to its Flesh;
And you are in a quiet room bathing, waking up,
Your daughter is a pool to catch your eyes;
And my banner is fluttering like a pitiful prayer above your head;
And the storm clouds are covering up the secret feet of Bandoleers,
But your husband is a heavy man, isn't he:
He knows the river from back to front;
He is a better man than me, and he will strike the dragon dead
Dead center:
He will build you a house, while I lay naked and scarred and higher up
In the skree drunken from the spirits I have stolen off of
You;
And this is my wound I am refusing to let heal;
And your eyes are like beautiful trucks that carry their merchandise
In their un dissolvable beds straight up through the ethereal mercury
And straight through the bitter doorways of an absolute sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bitter Sweets

While not trying to leave off the somnabulence
Of your eyes, I misspell, g,
I leave off your garden for awhile:
Aren't you with child? I am trying to feel good; Spain:
Flickering,
Who is my name? There is no reason to me ashamed,
Repeating your name in the dark:
Sharon, Sharon, Sharon:
Eventually, I get it right, and there is no need for Lawyers or extracurricular visitors:
You have no idea how difficult that was to spell, Sharon,
When I am not watching football,
When it has been so many years even from our junior High school, and retractable knives,
And why does it have to be so cruel to recall you from
The baseball stadium of the back nine:
Sharon, aren't you so absolutely pure from Colorado
Without having to say your name,
And you are so absolutely pure, even damaged with a package
Being sent down: I've run out onto the field to check
You out, but what am I undoing,
There is no reason to fear for rain, you are beautifully isolated:
I will never know you, breathing reciprocal in these death
Masks,
Trying to remember the route the butterfly scribbled:
I am so ashamed: you are doing so fine,
Just fine so alone: never reminded of your tannins,
You bitter sweets, with my forehead in my own hands,
The future is up to myself,
And I am so alone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Biways Of Erin's Throne

Exacting into nothing, so we all can now believe:
The hedgerows of the brush-rows:
The heavy eyeliners by which we shall oh so grieve;
And it all ends up in words basking in the gutters
Beside the utters
Of the woe be gone puppies; and anything else that has gone
By beside my childhood like the burning catapults of Whatever conquistadors whose helmets cut a crossways
Besides the childhood gutters like rainbows licking
The byways of the pornographies;
And I broke my jaw at four years old, and I am not alone:
But I am alone: Alone, while the fishes peal,
Across the byways of Erin's throne:
And now I have not loved you, but I am real;
And all of those yesterdays bloom so brightly like the Heady rooms that I was never supposed to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blankets Pulled Over The Sea

Standing in a blue abscess, wounded around
The eyes:
The nocturnal pugilists countingimps,
And the gates awash with freezing water
The blue spruce cried-
And other planes coaxing down: inside their
Golden necks, their stewardesses all
Asleep-
The weather about them a blanket that pulls
At them softly,
The sea, a mother waiting in the deeps-
While each pine tree rises just for them,
Nocturnal spectators in the senses of the hills:
And they go over them, nodding in
Sorority,
As the hillsides sigh, damply drunken,
And holding up to them bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bleachers Of An Empty Stadium

As you sit down in a nest
Some stranger built for you,
Your feathers pick out the Sunlight
Above the bleachers of an Empty stadium-
Your hollow bones are filled
With the premonition
That it is not safe to go
Home-
The neighborhood will surely Flood from the migrations of Vermillion swans-
All with the attitudes of baseball
Diamonds-
When they go away, all of the Fireworks factories
Will be stolen-
And it will be the right time
To forget about who you love-

Robert Rorabeck

The Bleeding Afternoon

Dictates to the Ivy League:

I am just growing up whilst I am drowning—

And I will offer you to arm wrestle while my dog licks my feet:

Tomorrow I will have to wake up to be evaluated—

But suddenly there will be a flame—

And the seasons will no longer be a contender:

Inevitably,

There will be baseball and Halloween, and then Beowulf will

Have to sleep with his dragon,

Even though none of this will ever be published which means—

Just because

I don't know a thing—but the virgins will be as ripe as the Bonfires—

And in the adventurous architectures of their linear bowers,

They will seem like they take off their clothes

For the pululations of the moon—but other than that,

They will have trouble breathing—whilst we can make love

And love and watch cartoon and cartoons—

Into the crepuscule as the puppets dance down the shell-rock

Streets of the bleeding afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blooming Forest

What a life given to me in open measures:
They crowd outwards like floors of fissures, and her
Eyes give me no other wonders:
They stray away from me for other passengers,
They tell the tale of her flight to fanfares:
I see her turning in caracoles and archways above the earth,
Like a ribbon of water transplanted in the air:
She is the disappearance of an innocent school evaporated
Into the cumulous of fair heirlooms:
She is the stolen liquor broken from the rule,
Christening the pathways of some gypsies who have Learned to fly, who are now taking the other way into
The shade of their lovely mountain:
What is on the other side is too far away for me to say, but She knows every whisper of every lilac under aspen tree:
She wears every hidden badge that the blooming forest has Spoken to her solitarily.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blowing

The colors who appease us, stay naked as the sun
Rides across them all day,
And the foliage curls like the tongues of little deer
For the salt of innocent palms,
Even while we are making up excuses for how
All of this came to be;
And we cannot see mountains from where we are,
And we can only suspect to smell the orange groves
And yet we know that they both really are;
Standing up to them, and holding the raptures
Of the indescribable prisms which make up
All these things which move
And combust, and they turning alluringly like games
For sweethearts in a celestial midway,
As the bums frolick nakedly, panhandling in all that
Alike glory of the pollinated airs to breathe,
I can see now the pass ways by which we must come
Together and to be aware of through
The invisibilities; and by this I ride the fates to kiss
You like a wetted superhero across the blowing wildfires
Of our dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blowing Wildfires Of Our Dreams

The colors who appease us, stay naked as the sun
Rides across them all day,
And the foliage curls like the tongues of little deer
For the salt of innocent palms,
Even while we are making up excuses for how
All of this came to be;
And we cannot see mountains from where we are,
And we can only suspect to smell the orange groves
And yet we know that they both really are;
Standing up to them, and holding the raptures
Of the indescribable prisms which make up
All these things which move
And combust, and they turning alluringly like games
For sweethearts in a celestial midway,
As the bums frolick nakedly, panhandling in all that
Alike glory of the pollinated airs to breathe,
I can see now the pass ways by which we must come
Together and to be aware of through
The invisibilities; and by this I ride the fates to kiss
You like a wetted superhero across the blowing wildfires
Of our dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blue Lights Of Their Tears

Airplane up in the sky, where do you go
Now?
Do you go into her bed, bringing her flowers-
Do you leap into her window
Like some kind of saint or Jacobite;
But it really seems without Reason
As autumn approaches, and green apples
Are on the tree-
Where the lake is as peaceful as a graveyard,
And you are returning home to him
Time and time again,
Until Christmas trees are stolen from the hills
And estuaries
Lining the backyards of the unspoken for saints
Who glow with the blue lights of their tears-
Until it is morning,
And another dog cries.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blue Wildebeest Is Sometimes Called Brindled Gnu

Let me feel your truancy- let me be your apple
Scars, your scabrous efficiency- I want to be your airplane
Leaping from your gallant stride;
I'll take off and I'll glide and get a good look down your Dress.
And when I come home, mince me up and make Apple sauce- If times are hard, use me to nourish your Child. Wipe me off of her bib in deep snow bound passes
Where you shouldn't have been in the first place,
But I'll pull you through. Just toss the scarred and less savory
Bits to the hounds-
Put on a colorful headdress and wear a rubber tomahawk
To fool the clowns;
And now that I am gone, take your men bowling every night,
And drink green vermilion beer until you intend to see swans,
And I will float around the lanes like a feathered prawn,
I will hold recess in your brain,
And like a doctor hit upon the funny bone to check if you're sane;
And sometimes see the world when you yawn,
And as I go back forth on the brindled terraplane of your lawn,
I will attempt to sell bibles and snake oil to the other souls
Who are real gone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Blueing Churches

The pride of Mars sung in the chicken pocks of Leopards;
And all of the good times that the chicken used to cross the street;
And all of the hidden spots on the road,
Going back and forth like lovers getting tattoos or starving
Off the wild fences:
The good morning dews, and the palaces that the buses never Made it too:
The soft unsounding winds of hummingbirds, the languid backs
Of centipedes
Kicking off the roes of arid minnows while my canines wait
For me to survive;
But I will never be making it back there, now that I have found
Alma's lips,
I pray that it doesn't rain tomorrow, so that I can go through Another common metamorphosis here in my yellow house
On the move,
And under all of that somnolent bliss, or any other Superfluous word just misused to describe it; the feelings that the Lonely dead have on their mind;
And how I stood beside Alma today, and studied the brownness
Of her eyes: they have their own jewels that will never be naked,
And the lighten into stars over the candles of her birthday:
And I will never know exactly which of the girls she is,
But I can only sing forever crookedly forever,
Outside of the blueing churches who should never let me in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bodiless Sky

Now the tomboys are playing with their
Over burdened kittens in the precipices of caustic
Traffic,
And what airplanes we have made, we have sent Them away:
Spilling with joy across the canal, to land and dampen
Before the lips of tadpoles:
What will they ever know of girls,
Or fireworks who themselves die on holidays:
The world, like unmarked letters bottled to the busied
Lips of the sea, returns to the sender in time;
And everyone in their loneliness looks up across
The kingly tombs of ant mounds and landfills,
At the stark naked beauty in a blue flag of Hopeful surrender across the bodiless sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Body Of My Shell

I toss my bottles of rum to cadaverous Mayflowers;
And she says that I am so cute because I reject her because of Her scars and otherwise hermaphroditisms:
And then I sing out trilling: the spring gurgles and it is thrilling,
And the little girls have come back fully fledged from Their billings:
And we have sold some fireworks, fireworks,
All the time while Erin, Erin was making love with her better and Greater surplus of men:
Oh if I could have been this venal muse's sort of man:
Oh if I could have stood up and declared my celibacy from shelves
Of her musings,
What a caravel this world might me: what a splendid light show
Mouthing off to the better pricks of the void;
But that is now how it was, and when I travel alone through the Quieting witchcraft places in the more silver parts
Of New Mexico,
The only joy I find in the body of my shell, is that not so many fools
Will have to read these lies,
And I can always drink alone by myself.

Robert Rorabeck

The Body Of Your Grandfather's Guitar

I want to take you to Spain,
And defeat Franco with your machine gun legs.
This light is so warm and not at all
Bellicose,
And yet it is almost too early to think of Christmas,
And it is really something that I spent time with You in Disney World,
And almost got lost from you,
And we rode the tram together, but you hardly looked Me in the eyes;
And we didn't go home together,
And, of course, this is the wound: it is leaking,
It is like a wind tunnel is Spain,
And I would like to have you tremulous as a naked
Olive tree atop the ruby hill where
That lustrous poet is buried,
And yet I lost you,
Like a body loses its soul,
And now you live and milk another man's child,
And I am homeless and forced into prostitution with Alligators and water moccasins;
Yet, I remember and miss you,
You who knew how to play pinball better than all the rest,
And how you rounded the curves
With the body of your grandfather's guitar.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bones Hopeful And Playing

Terrorized in the retreats of love:
Looking at her in the eyes of a wolf surmounting
The Ferris wheels of another nightmare,
A sniper in the Christmas trees
In the vermilion lingerie where all of the dryads disrobe,
Making the king and princes stutter,
Turning their crowns into svelte veneer;
And the mountain just going up and up, across the Unruly logic of the Aristotelian spheres,
Scattering the bones of young hopefuls and debutants through
Its treeless fields and shoulders
Who gossip in the lightning storms, upon whom not even
The clouds can make such transgressions,
And the canaries get stuck somewhere in the half light of
A subconscious wish:
Wishing in the steep and dimming pearlness of
A world that the seas perpetually raise up worship,
Into whose stems and jugulars the unending airplanes
Wilt and crash:
That they knew the passageways to the victory that she held
Like a secret through the breathless keyholes of her unspeakable
Routes, that languished in the skies up there,
Forever keeping the bones hopeful and playing, like a promise
Left unresolved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bonfires Of The Prettiest Unbelievables

Suntans the bobsleds of its architectures
And I get busier looking younger, spilling my joints Underneath the kites that could not take me anyways—up to Airplanes and stewardesses
Into the higher freedoms over patriotisms and yard sales—
Over the unbeautified spaces that don't yet know
How to breathe—like goldfish when their bowls are all gone,
Dreaming of the fossils out on the street,
Crushed by the feet of cars,
Beaten by the bonfires of the prettiest unbelievables.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bonfires Of Your Fleshy Store

Soft carnivore, soft as an egg:
Eat me, as if I were your cousin, a gymnast in your mouth:
See me going my way deep inside you,
Nourishment to burn you against the snow:
Put me as a fire in your brown abdomen:
Help me be the fleshy carpenter to grow your house
A little:
A grape on a vine for a fox: a fire for a moth:
Let me give the surplus of my body to your beating heart:
Devour me, picking me out especially from the supermarket:
Here, I am, right legged- dancing,
Calling your attention, if not your love:
You said you loved me, but you feigned your advances
Toward my door: and the windmills blew steadily,
Exaggerating the satanic lips,
But I do not hope for your love, anymore: but to be devoured
By you, to be incinerated by your insatiable existence,
To disappear in the bonfires of your fleshy store.

Robert Rorabeck

The Book By Mark Twain

Hands in the composure making birds
For lighthouses
Distracting her in the middle of a
Rainstorm in the middle of
The classes in the archaeologies of our high school;
Alma, you went to school for Ten years and then you
Rode a bus across the frontera
And made love and babies;
And now you live across the tracks:
The train tracks and the dog tracks:
You live in a house your Rabbits disappeared behind,
Which made your mother, Rosa,
Happy because they were eating her mango tree;
How unlucky for them
And you told me today that your Father Marcelino has a pistola,
So I shouldn't come over
Even if it is just to leave flowers in your Mailbox,
And it is good that I
Am too tired anyways,
But I am drinking,
Trying to swim in your love,
While you sleep with your man, darling,
In your little room
With your daughter Heidi,
Which was the name he wanted;
The little golden key that
Returned you to him,
And now your house is
So quiet and your sisters are sleeping,
And maybe your son
Michael has passed out
Beside the book by Mark Twain,
Which I bought for him.

The Bosom Of Her Very Soul

Watercolored ways and hills,
Laughing across the mines of her birthstones:
All the smoldering like ephemeral steps up to Dragons,
And the airplanes in their warm mobiles for Titans;
In the great star crusted basins of this America
Where I have stretched and become lost and Wept for her,
Seeing her woebegone beauty above tree line,
Watching those things that have evaporated like the thoughts
Of the things she's forgotten swaying in the censers
That can never be felt like this;
All the secret crushes of keystones, the beauty trapped above
The social realm where the skin blushes from burst
Blood vessels,
Where the reindeers' cenotaphs nuzzle- Where greater pilots
Go to when they sleep,
Over Alma's roof, and all of that soul's young wealth,
Going up and up emolliating in her favorite colors, in the insouciant
Banners of a nameless gods' breathing,
Trapped in the tatters of less impressive holidays:
The world stands still at the pinnacle of justice for boys who can Never grow up,
Who have left the stoop of the bus stop, abandoning the hypnotized
Chickens,
Instead deciding to climb the devil's rock without the lookouts of
Sun,
Just to see how she feels in bed with the man she loves: there
Across the world high up in the aerie's room:
The bosom of her very soul that even she cannot dream to see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bosoms Of The Mountains

It doesn't help to hear the motors of other men
With anatomies more or less like mine,
With wives they want or already have—
Sojourning from trailer parks to apple orchards—
As I already have—
The whistling of a handsome tune across the Ferris Wheels and Everglades—
Their daughters at peace or holding their hands
Next to the sea or underneath some roof of A church together, while the heavens at first
Coagulate and then winnow—
Like driftwood in the higher echelons of the sea—
Sharing in a beauty the cannot remark upon,
And sharing in the cemetery grounds with even still Other men who they once defeated or were Inevitably defeated by—as above them, mysterious
Elk crest the hill above the swing sets in their Parks—and even higher, almost hidden in the Switchback bosoms of the mountains, a fire burns
That cannot be explained.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bosoms Of The Tombs

Opened seeds slipped from the opened
Palms of
Fruit trees buried atop of tin soldiers;
And now all of this is a fairy tale waiting in the darkness
For the glitter of new wounds,
As the yellowed story book opens,
Stealing the hollowed sunlight from the arms of windmills,
And the bosoms of the tombs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bosque

The Bosque is beautiful in thunder and fire.
As thieves wind their spools of copper wires.
Young lovers are pooling in the dry brushes,
And long legged jackrabbits go thumping through washes.

The Bosque is beautiful in thunder and fire.
As the arsonist cuts through the chicken wire.
The leathery sheriffs wearing boots up to their knees,
With heavy flashlights search through juniper, picking off flees.

The Bosque is beautiful in thunder and fire,
As the fireworks sound their charges through the mountains' cragged ire.
But the llano is open and green,
And in the monsoon's lamentations it paints a long sheen.

Down through the cracked gullies, slipping from the desolate highways,
Thatched in a thicket humming of enchanting vermilion poisons.
Having leapt the concrete drainage, the young farmer on his faint donkey,
There stitched across the brambling trestles faded in long seasons.

There is the Bosque beautiful in thunder and fire,
Where young lovers pool in innocent desire,
But the llano is open and green,
And in the monsoon's lamentations it paints a long sheen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Both Of Us, And All Of Us The Same

In the rude daylight of my soul,
I am finally here, while my dogs are panting
And the centerfolds are pinned up on the walk
Like cave drawings
From last years Christmas; and maybe it has to be Just you to remember who I was,
But the grass is always mowed;
And there always is somebody's light on in suburbia,
Just as the lion's mouth is always yawning in the estuaries
Of its favorite tourisms;
And now it doesn't even have to be the denouement
Of a week: I can still smell my high school and the bosoms
And armpits of its lockers,
And gym rooms, the rubied culprits of its bullies,
The savage promises of its culprits and alligators long before
They become the mascots of a maturing and over ripening
Song;
While the mice flaunted and sun bathed in little cartooned
Voices and genuflections
Until it was finally time for the eulogies and then the grave,
Even while we cut the cake for the birthdays of Our love, our Almas,
While the winds blew and the lions, trying to remember all of their Times, and when they ran four legged through the grass;
And if there really was ever a time that there was enough wishes
For the both of us, and all of us the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bottle Of Free Liquor

The bottle of free liquor is gone,
So maybe the swings
Are finally empty of little black children,
And not one of the Mexicans know how much Money I have saved-
Not quite enough, for a gringo:
And the airplanes are effortlessly priceless,
And the water moccasins
Are making love to the fresh water otters;
And you are in Colorado,
Or you are in Spain
Celebrating your own country's new years,
And Joe's girlfriend died by a car bomb
Way back in fifth grade,
And I just want to bust a nut and effervesce:
It is the easiest thing to do,
And since the invention of our common species
I doubt a second has gone by without one of our Brilliant cousins
Doing it in bedrooms or lighthouses;
And now you are looking so good that you've Made me tattooed and you smell like
Champagne in a soda fountain;
And this isn't real,
But unicorns are still very beautiful,
And I know how to drive,
And it's not like an ocean separates us,
And I doubt there is more than one or two olive Groves or dead poets worth mentioning between us,
So I can get there
In a day or two, but you would still be looking too
Beautiful to mention.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bottle Of My Empty Soul

I want you again, the bottle of my empty soul,
Of my penniless art—
A few words given to an empty theatre,
Everyone else outside and enjoying
The nude daylight given
To them,
Spread eagle in kisses of gladness—
These sorrowful words kept indoors,
Torn apart and missing the bulk of their Dictionary:
Still, they can hear airplanes going upwards in
The sky,
The ethereal zoetrope the insatiable foxes
Leap towards—and think, triaged,
That this is what they want as well—
As women as beautiful as mermaids drive themselves
Around,
Selling what they have to sell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bottom Of An Amputated Sea

Okay, I think that woman loves me
From the patience of her open transom,
Or she has been staring for so long:
Doesn't she know that I could spell for the love
Of her:
That I would overspill and flood my love deep into
Her crescent before she had a good second to understand:
I would break out of school for her, and get Into fist fights down in the deep and runny valleys beside
The ice-cream truck:
As Sharon looks up from her tit sucking, maybe she is Seeing be past the science museum and all of its mannequins
Of heavenly bodied astronauts:
Maybe even past the mermaid and the butterfly house
In the sweet emptiness of the zoo:
Maybe she is seeing me coming my hair outside my own
Window of this new yellow hotel;
Or maybe my words are just as empty as a car resting nearer
The bottom of an amputated sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bottom Of The Wine Glass

This room is all carefully worked marble,
And this is how it goes:
Generations of sallow faced progenitors line the Halls, stare forwards at one another in no
Particular order.
I walk down mumbling, chewing my meal, hoping
They will not notice my stunted vocabularies
Out of the corner of my eye.
Though they have no life, I can hear them whispering
Their concern: now that I am thirty and do not Have my own business, nor even my own head,
What will I do,
And I echo them like the muted shadow of an airplane,
The only one in the sky: What will I do,
Now that I am broken porcelain and all the girls I
Have laid eyes on have taken their turns upon the high
Dive, doing their disappearing acts into the sunny water?
I do not even know I can love anymore,
For the textures of life's recipes are strange, barren though
Colorful, and fleeting into shadow only to reappear again
As they were, though I know they can never be that way again.
What could I sell to change this, or live in to fill me up?
They are looking at me without blinking; my uncles and Aunts are reproductive cannibals, they have desalinated
And germinated, and now their spore walk their earth
Pantomiming their shadows:
In the hall there is no fresco, because we are poor,
The dirt in the barren forest, and I am forced to look at the Gross amphibious bellies of airplanes farting like horizontal Cloud banks through the sky, until they disappear into
The rosy shell of sunset; and as I keep going down,
My ancestors are getting harrier, shorter, and more like
My grandfathers, though they would not believe me-
I could tell them that all I have is this, the more and the less,
And I think about them only after I get to the bottom of the wine
Glass, for they are like other heavenly bodies when compared to me:
We started out from the juxtaposed coitus at the fairgrounds,
Some sort of fantastical ride where spores flew from his lips
Into her purse and settled on her dollar bills, and out of that

Material, we poured forth, kissing and hugging and playing
Doctors, only to spool away into different states and identities,
So now we appear to one another like stars clustered like
Smear'd jam across the abyssal shore:
Looking at each other from across the dinner table on holidays,
We wonder if there really is life there, beneath the cool marble
Eyes that look like ours.

Robert Rorabeck

The Boundaries Of Its Adolescent Life

There was a battle somewhere over the mountain
That could never be numbered—
While there were billboards,
And some woebegone artists put more nettles into An opalescent pine forest that could never strike out
So far,
And I suppose you saw her at your doorway or
Out of the window of your car—
Just a passing fancy—just a whim of light—
Just another beautiful advertisement to pass away
Into the night—
Momentarily she was real- or she was a candle burning—
She was one of the numbers leading up to your Birthday—
While you sat with your knees pressed to your tiny brown
Breasts—and to toads ululated forever more—
That one there was a tower inside a cathedral that Burned and burned without ever having to give up
Or to learn about the absolving beautifies that swept
The boundaries of its adolescent life away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bountiful Heavens

And it goes on like this—
Sad inventions inside the hemispheres of What light has to give—
The crisscrosses of bodies causing a
Dilapidation of shadows—
The work houses trundling underneath the Windmills
Whom themselves kowtow to
The daisies—it becomes so far a wreck
That finally and eventually they have
To unearth the king:
Which one is he, his mound as rich as all
Of the conquistadors sunken
Underneath the corner convenient store:
The waves giving kisses to
His elbows, as I watch you, some kind of Epaulet—until I have to awaken,
For there is school tomorrow—
And I will have to partake in all of the Savage and strange romances of all of
The littlest boys and girls—
Strange shadows that sing and wreath in Unison, undressing underneath the benchmarks of Their eyes—
As the toys of their hearts live in the movie theatres
And the amusement parks that they can't wait
To get to all beneath the bountiful heavens of Another beautiful day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bouquets Of Coffins

The beautiful denouement of these things in the contradiction
Of their short births,
Is that they will live forever if they have caught a breath over
The skin of vagabond wildflowers:
They will go on and on in the sweet littlish rows of ancestors,
Trying out some times
While the populations of sweet young high schools so too
Meander;
And I have shared my parts for her, even if she has not turned Up; it was an easy job where the traffic runs, and I stand off in The cold slabs of easements and check the inconsistency of stars
For her, the wishes that do not run away,
The grains of salt that clustering like baby's breath around the Blindnesses of life, while I hold out for her,
And give her these pieces of me, like sharp bones underneath the Bouquets of coffins that can never end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Boys I Never See

Visions of you in the courtyard
Dreaming of band practice, of boys and other Girls—Haven't you both your friends
And your virginity,
While I have the sun on my body spindling
In the hallways—passing through the Same gallant contraptions that you know
But do not think upon:
Ownerless, you go home to your mother
Behind the supermarket where you can See the Virgin Mary in the street lights when
You go out of doors, brown skinned,
As rich as a penny—To make eyes and pretend
To kiss the boys I never see outside of school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Boys Who Love Your Skin

Brown as the boys who love your skin,
Who play naked as matches across the misbehavior of your heavens—
Who conduct strange lassoes trying to beat the cruise ships to
The hurricanes—
Drinking rum and skinny dipping in the Dry Tortugas—until something
Is finally ignited like the very first baseball game and cannibalisms
For old time's sake—and that very world that you forced Me to develop from forever with the airplanes swinging like marionettes
Over the make believe sky of a banshee—
And the fire coming down through the forest—
Well, whatever happened eventually—this is the very end of the golden book—
And now your child looks like he will never desire to enter a cathedral,
And the sky over the ocean is a little less blue, because something in The refracted light has gone away—and the pain sings in the harmony of A chorus—through the backyards of the moonlight
The pilots continue to admire even as they go blind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bravest Of Men

Maybe we will love each other more in march—
As we each cross over individually
The fields the need to be mowed—not wanting to Disturb the sleeping saints or anyone else
Who is so preposterous to live there:
The same way that the newest of graffiti
Finds its way onto the desks of my classroom,
As my children shuffle in:
I don't know anything about them, but they
Are like cartoons made to play in a zoetrope
Across a dying man—just little tricks of my theatre
Which seems somehow to yet survive,
Preposterously across all of the newly wedded heavens
Of New Mexico, and the most saintliest of deserts
Where my father still may sell fireworks—
But now he is up in Canada, brushing down his Horses—they glow for him, and represent something else
To the world that he knows - more than the words
Of the scholars that flit and splashed against him—
The acidity of their salts have disappeared into the snow storm,
While I work and teach from the memories of his Echoes—but it seems so strange—like pornographic
Science-fiction—genuflected to the pit and the rind
Of the rattlesnake that we, eventually, inevitably—
And unfortunately—and both at the same time,
Must somehow both strive to be
The bravest of men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bravest Of The Braves

Bodies burn with yellow justice,
Or they have just been doing: doing doing,
And all of these songs are their offspring,
Just as there are so many people
Overspilling:
People, people:
The vines are ripened but the fruit is untouchable;
Their luscious bodies are guarded by submachine guns,
And the pipes are rusting;
And the crowd has really turned out to See the girls curling on the sea;
Her bodies curling on the waves, and the way she `
Has placed herself:
The greenness of her body's green makes us slaves,
And we wish to touch ourselves like the finest Instruments;
And the leafless bodies beneath us in the weaves,
Going with the gentleness that can never be thought;
And above our sea the transoms are opened
Like concessions for the bravest of our naves
Who might kick themselves high enough
On the swing,
To touch her curling waves, to kiss her brow;
And to see the keystone of her ways lavishing in the evaporated
Grottos of the waves,
The beautiful savior who can always save
The bravest of the braves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Breath In My Body

Reams of rockets and
Of kaleidoscopes: watching Alma eating the lunch I bought
For her
As we work together five days a week, and lushing on the Expectations of love with her tomorrow,
Returning to my nightly work in reverence of her, my first
Consumated muse
Who I will have children with and a good long life,
Traveling in the tandem of Siamese bicycles to the seaside parks
And under the insouciant meanderings of the clouds
Who can mean anything;
Though to the both of us always mutually, two butterflies
Fluttering un intruded on by their previous maggot forms:
Resting quite happily across the smooth stone filigree
Of graveyards:
Even now she has five bouquets of roses that I bought or took
For her breathing their last breaths in her crowded little house;
And today was her mother Rosa's birthday,
And I am just a drifting thought without her, a hobo in the airconditioning
Of a little dream paid for upfront with cash,
While her body sings to me even while asleep with another man,
Because I know that she doesn't even like to read,
But reads of her body in these words, and says she loves me now,
As the days come and pass,
Proving to me my soul, the breath in my body, the wine in my glass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Breath Of This Body's Hands

Bodies push as they feel:

Bodies sweat and move: Bodies in cars, bodies in Coffins, bodies in homes have so much to prove:

Bodies arising like flowers for your senses:

Bodies over the campus; bodies in rest, and bodies in coitus,
Bodies searching for a light, and a light house,

While all day and all night the sea clips mercilessly like apathetic
Funhouses for bodies;

And I have not won so many prices as to have won you, and all my Lamps are doused in the night hoping to sneak up on your flesh,
To smell you breathing outside of your home that the cops also Patrol;

And it might be said by the motivations of my own body that I should Win you,

Because you are this body's muse; you are the lamp of its soul,
But that is only because I am selfish, and you are too beautiful for Any man: and so you shimmer your constellations, and in your Greedy metamorphosis of water and of land, you disappear
Into the daydreams of traffic, like the ever-loving filament between
The breath of this body's hands.

Robert Rorabeck

The Breath To Go On Living

This is not a game, this is my soul being cleaned on
A rock; it is already very fine, and it is breathless:
You who should use all that there is, the very best of it
To cloth yourself and feed your children,
To make it through the snowbound pass without having to Starve for the more of it;
This is what I have given you the best know how to make you
Finish the game the champion,
Or to go down well perfumed into the aquarium of a slippery rub
With your husband, to love him as your lubber;
Because I am dead, and I am gone; and this is just the material
Of my empathy,
Like a fir lined palpation enjoying the afterthought of your heather:
This is my last breath, wanting more liquor,
And my last poem coming into the night, not expecting any other;
And I am just the terrapin taking shelter underneath the Mothering overpass,
Expecting to see you and no other; while you have slipped away
Into your own pearly forts oiled to the nines by your Oily men, touching you in the reciprocations of the liner notes
Of your shadows;
All the landscaping that has breathed its new life underneath
The dolls house of your moony childhood;
Turning like a merry-go-round until it has turned so many times
As to be a windmill or a merry-go round;
And then turning the of the lifeless into the living, until I look up
And unearthed see your eyes like the highest point of waves
Caressing the waves, and through their sincere reflection find
The breath to go on living.

Robert Rorabeck

The Breeze Cuffs

Death begins like this, and all imperfections empty,
As the toilet flushes underneath the naked light bulb
Far out on the naked prairie: Thus, I should not Begin at all. I should not walk high in the snow to see my lover,
To carve chunks off us to feed the busked in wolves;
Stain on the white sheet made by god, for his dinner or for what;
I could lay out my wrist, begin that scar- She would laugh,
Not knowing what it was: A change, a goddess in any outfit.
She has one for each day of the year, a designer cocoon,
A closet. She is metamorphosis.
I am immobile, and I am rust: more and more,
And I had thought I had submitted, that I had come down
With my dogs, and driven off her, went home and had dinner,
Got fat and well educated from reading my books by the fire;
I had thought that my relatives understood where to bury me,
Where the gun was in its drawer where I needed it,
And the whiskey: Thus I had lined out the final love letter,
Used up the ink of the heliotrope spore: Cast downwards those Things that failed me, the things I couldn't get into: But I am not Down at all, and it is such a night that one needs a fire, needs
A soul; but I do not have it if it is not already out, and my dogs' howls are joined by
The bristling snouts of the busked in wolves, so what should they say
When they poke me on the slab? That I was voiceless because they Ate my box, and that I shouldn't have begun at all, because Death begins
Like this, taking little steps toward the innocent whore;
And I began like this, little cuts of the wrist; and now I am as stone is Underneath the bus, underneath the floor, thinking of her in little cuts
A little more; the bull weevil awaiting chrysalis, the newborn waiting
For his muff, the child for its whore,
And will be even as the yard grows high up from the floor;
This I sing as the breeze cuffs, and will cuff for evermore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Breeze To Me And Her Alike

The breeze brushes my lips as
It brushes hers;
Whitman might say it paints the Throats of leaves the Same in different orchards,
Be they wild or tamed.
The librarians and bus drivers
Don't care.
They just want you returned home
On time:
Coquina pathways- rattlesnakes,
Orange trees.
The breeze says to me and her
Alike,
"Youth, youth- awaken up-
You are no longer young,
And she has long since gone away."

Robert Rorabeck

The Brevity Of Life's Orgasm

Even if you had a wife, surely,
She would consume more than you-
The republicanism of her inner thighs,
Consuming:
Asking so much more than what you could Retain for yourself,
Part of the multitudinous remnants of the waning
Petroleum Epoch- A self sustaining monarch,
Both eating and farting more than you
(Or your dogs) And taking up the bed, asking
You to do away with your childish isolationisms,
And to clean the dishes,
Going to sit with the popular kids in the back
Of the bus, leaving you troubled and no longer dimpled:
All of this for the brevity in life's orgasm,
The sougning of the Virgilian folds: war, super,
And gift giving, and her eyes as lucent as waxy persimmons,
When you could do the job yourself with Alacritive propensity: the janitor raising his Flag pole with effervescent bunting, your own patriotism
That she would only work on sporadically after the Greater necessities of her sister's wedding,
The purple soap-operas of her slothful behoovings, when There are girls right now working down Military Trail,
Industriously practiced,
Who could just so quickly come to make you realize
Into empirical, the guilty pleasure
Of the girl sitting beside you most Shakespearian,
Her utensils rhyming;
Busty, crowding into the harem of this,
Your peripheral vision,
While the object of your legal and binding union sits
Pontificating across the table, where the bill will soon
Come that you must take care of- something mundane,
Lest joyful than a sonnet.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bribe's Price

Now we sell out,
And if we've done it right
We'll soon be fattened by our gold,
And can call the mischief in Diana's woods our paramours
Fanning in evening-

All of this is ours,
If we know the continent,
And even the eyes of the girl
You once loved
You can own again,
Because we've paid the Bribe's price-

As we go away,
Do not look directly into the sun,
Falling ahead of us, escaping,
For now is not the time
To combat that cowardly foe,
The only one who survived-

Let the unknown world cuddle him,
For in the morning we
Will be gleaming kings,
And we will only laugh when he returns,
And send our air-force out to blind him-

Now I know where she lives,
And so do you,
We should jump the backyard fences,
Like little boys enjoying the somber game,
To share a smile between us two
As we unlatch the secret door,
And claim her while she is yet asleep-

Robert Rorabeck

The Brickwork Of Seashells

The crow flies over other stanzas- over windmills
And azaleas smelling as sweetly
As the armpits of my fathers fathers- as the fruits
Are eaten to the pits,
As the overly frantic traffic finally stumbles home to Trailer parks,
And abuse; while the waves moan brownly like a
Washing machine gowning seaweed over itself;
As Alma finally gets off work and drives to a home
Where her two children wait for
Her like packages for Christmas: unfolded, she thinks nothing
Of me, or the magic tricks of rabbits
Who are all gone anyways, and their flashing love- swallowed
Up by the rattlesnakes or the conquistadors all the same,
And by their work she goes to sleep, filigreed in a patina of Fighting resorts that swell around her like the brickwork of Seashells,
Continuing her story until she should ever awaken one morning
And leave to never come home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bridal Harem For The Holy Ghost

Composures in the quiet rain,
Slicking the vociferous traffics until they Pure demurely and finally into stillness
In their carports like castanets;
And my mind glides like a kite over a terrapin
Sated in his slow, funny moods,
That he has been to California and done nothing
There but made love to a ghost hunchbacked in
The tall weeds,
Or played in the mystified parks after closing hours,
Because he couldn't think to get a real job:
And there was a hill at the end of the little town
With a road that first went over and then behind
The rise,
And it could have gone to anywhere, but he never Supposed to see,
For it seemed then that all places were the same,
All liquors for a bribe,
But he still thought he would find love from time
To time,
At traffic stops, or in his quieting times,
And maybe he would have if he'd been able to enter
The skin of another story,
But sorrowfully this one is his, and all the pretty girls
Are sweet grapes tremulous on the vine,
Always dancing and smiling down to him lying that
They are just moonlight,
Not giving into him or even coming close,
But stopping there, well gibbous, as if they might one
Day fall into his sallow heart,
When they are only the bridal harem for the holy Ghost.

Robert Rorabeck

The Briers Of Foxes

A lack of children underneath the billboards:
And I will be going to see my dying grandfather tomorrow—
Going up into the football stadiums of the Appalachians where the ancient gods pressed their feet
And made bootleg wine in between the dens of bears
And the briers of foxes
And the holes of snakes:
In that world where dirtballs tumble,
Where the greenest mountains bend their knees to look
At the housewives wearing diamonds pressed into their Cars—up that asphalt way taking us back halfway to
Some latchkey childhood—
And in those whispers where children mumble,
Mouths filled with huckleberries and wombs of unknown
Women that glitter with marble and sawdust—
Where one white horse kicks,
Made of porcelain—
Tossed in the glorious splash of weeds of wild perfumes
Hidden at the end of a road only the jackrabbits travel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bright Copper Crosses Of Conquistadors

Close set the stores and hide
The abdomen of my laziness. Feed chickenpox
To alligators,
And go outdoors, brown bagging liquor and fireworks.
Go to the head of your class and stink
Up the place.
Look at pictures of the amber roadie who Fauns the chestnut eyes of her shallow
Conviction over the muscular tattoos of Bouncers, of Jews- Make fun of her conviction:
Show her how you can be a swan too;
By holding your breath, turn it green,

Go out into the middle of the school,
Get dizzy and scream- Look down the crinoline
Blouse of the harpsichord substitute-
On your free time bight your tongue and scribble out
Novels to her freshman joy,
But otherwise tell her she should be working concessions
At the roller rink,
With those legs, with those legs!

Misspell to her three times in once sentence,
And wait to hear a mouthful of her wildflower convictions.
She will say that those boys are rowdy swans to her,
Like big, meaty hibiscus; and she goes to them the way a little Princess goes to sleep with her frog princes in
The aloe of the carport of drowning cars;
So don't tell her how to fly,
But sell to her things she doesn't need, pointed obnoxious
Poems she doesn't need to hear,
And tell her you'll be right back- Go over beneath the Australian Pines and use the crumbling pornography
Inside the junked cars to pleasure yourself.
Range into the dunes, converse with cenotaphs of confused mermaids,
The awol GI Joes praying down wind of
The bright copper crosses of conquistadors

When you are back, don't tell her a thing.

She won't even look at you; and smile-
Feed the gold-fish to the swish-tailed cat,
Because you already knew she wouldn't finish
This anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bright Wombs Of Sea

It happening or galloping up
From a graveyard of horses
There in the armpit of Florida with the Tourism of hummingbirds-
Whispers said to the patina of my face:
The scars left over of me as
A teenager:
And my truck burns with gasoline- carries
Along an iceless field- continues on the Mountains of Florida
The buzzards and the seagulls circle-
And the seahorses gallop in the bright wombs
Of sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brighter Stage

The night maelstroms in its unisex cathedral;
Isn't that always beautiful, like a candelabrum on an Unbanishable ship above the students' heads:
Those boys and girls who are always young at heart,
And they go leaping to and from their professors
Like warm glass that the artisans' whisperings brush;
They are being made in a young man's womb:
They are striking out right into the heart of campus
And the books sit warmly as if in a rookery six stories
Above their heads:
All of the stories of gods and goddesses that can be Remembered:
And they sit there resting in the rains, their scars flaming
Like gasoline over teffilin; and soon they will rejoin their Early life's loves: And soon they will be gone forever,
But they were here once, learning about the causes of Become:
And they will be here forever articulating to the fibrillose shadows,
Because I have caught them here like tadpoles
Where they were circumnavigating through the shallows,
Waiting to truly form and set out like hooded pioneers
Struck forth upon another even brighter stage.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brightest And The Darkest

A letter to the doctors of the plagiarisms:
I have found you,
And my sophomore teacher accused me of you,
Mrs. Brown:
And now I teach the same requiem to
The students who are those offspring—
The rings of Saturn's orbit,
Of the angels that seldom dream, or are Dreamed about—
But there they are—you cannot see them
From your telescope,
But your horses are afraid of them—they smell
Of the solstice and the equinox,
Of both the brightest and the darkest—
And they remain above the highways,
As above the housewife's cul-de-sacs—
They are the heirlooms of our daydreams,
And they are very unspecific:
Never talked about or wished upon by all of the Heavens—but they are the spotted wells
In each of us that we have never—never found.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brightest Lights Of Your Most Beautiful Of Bedrooms

Bodies who burn beneath the clouds:
And bodies who swear that they were never bodies;
And bodies:
Bodies in Colorado, and bodies right here: The night turns out
To be a gypsy, spying with all of her curses, and yet so beautiful:
While Alma has promised to be right here come sunrise of Tomorrow,
And something more beautiful I could never ask for,
While the airplanes leap straight over holidays,
And all of the tourists graze and glaze like housewives sweating
Right out like marmalade on white bread:
Alma, I am think of you; and Alma, I am dreaming of you:
A pieta in your sweet grotto,
With Michael and Heidi succulent on either of your sweet tits,
Like the deepest virgin in her deepest grottos,
And you told me you wanted a boob-job, even though I told you
That my littlest sister had already had one,
And she was none the more prettier for it.
And now I am singing, Alma, and now I am swaying from limb to Limb,
While all the tourists get their way to Canterbury,
And I whisper in your sweet brown ear: I whisper to you,
As if into the boudoir of a seashell that you are always and still
The most beautiful and sweetest thing that I have ever wanted so
Far,
And until always; Alma, while the lighthouses sashay for Sailors,
Alma, while the apples bloom, and the fish come up to blossom
Underneath the brightest lights of your most beautiful
Of bedrooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brightest Of Eyes

Fawns who play with bottle caps and fireworks,
And Alma is sleeping with her man and her small child
Down Cherry road,
While unicorns listen to mermaids glittering in the boudoir
Of waves:
And this is how she moves: this is how she goes,
While the traffic sparkles,
And everything that has to go lights up for awhile
Above the playgrounds that still keep the children with
The brightest of eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brightest Sorrows

When the houses are so near the school
That they can believe nothing else but what
The teachers seem to spell—
With their lecterns rising like torches in
The morning's graves—
The children grow up so near the crematoriums—
And I watch them,
Paper dolls kissing matches,
Pollinated by helicopters and sometimes
Hurricanes—
Blonde—blonde children groomed to be Housewives and business men—
Amnesiacs the busses swallow—
They will arrive today
And again tomorrow—
Neon cenotaphs of society's brightest sorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brightness Of Everything

This might as well be the nursery rhymes of your children:

Alma,

We have already made love, and I am a good man-

I am already below my station, while you are kissing the Forbidden gods and their acrobats,

But another word I have been struggling so hard for escapes

Me;

And maybe because I am again the greatest of celibate fountains,

While Sharon tramps home to her longest legged man through

The sincere and heavy snows:

That is what she does, Alma, if you will allow me to describe her

To you:

She is a sweet athlete who is also an artist who knows how

To sculpt and kiln clay, and that this the word I meant to say

To you,

Alma: she is something that neither of us is not, Alma:

Athlete, and maybe given enough time the both of us will starve under

The sun and the moon, while the mirages of the desert multiply,

But otherwise maybe we will make love for another time,

While I send my otherwise hopes out in another bottle:

Maybe Sharon will read this, Alma: maybe she will have something

To tell her sweet child-

And maybe you will read this Alma, maybe you will like my

Another attempt to captivate and tame the unexplainable reasons for

The blooming graveyards of my love,

For amidst their grinning tombstones hold the brightness of everything

That I have to live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Broken Down School Bus

There seems to be a song running along itself in a dark
Cul-de-sac,
While I hear noises: some of them my own,
Playing out next to the sea that is going away, spilling
And roiling in the catastrophes
Of the unalarming cenotaphs—until a fresh wound
Can be seen pulsating brilliantly in the sky—
And the last headhunters echo—
Continually—after the girls have already vanished—
Sped up and become the brilliant plagiarisms of Another anarchist's classroom:
The day speeds by, fed up by the inebriations of the aborigines—
And another professor makes room
For the hidden masturbations: this world seems
A joy as it thrives away—further and further away from
The childhood where your little brother died—
As if even this fallacy could seem to be part of your memory—
Until over the stars the constellations of the anatomies of
Better placed animals were reawakened and sang to themselves
Underneath the broken down school busses
Even as it rained and the loveliest of stewardesses became Reawakened.

Robert Rorabeck

The Broken Promise

Pillboxes of jovial mercury
Wrestles with modern weaponry that is past its Prime:
This is how you begun this this time, how anything
Can be begun
With words flung up to the wind, like the surcease of Juggling swords or just like Going down from the garden to the darkness of the Valley,
Turning your back mutually, but not wanting to turn,
Knowing that this is not the good way home,
Knowing that this is darkness enfolded;
This is the dead sailor clutching toward the dead sailor
In the peachy surf
So it doesn't really matter how the world flooded for the Second time:
This is all of the great oceans flooded without an arc;
Or this is the scriptures for gold fish;
Or this is the broken promise.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brownd Apiaries Of My Last Muse

Now I can see that there is a tank in the sun:
Filled with bees and yellow jackets
Protecting their honey—
It is a wild basket up there in sky—an Easter
Bonnet
Where even the kindest of amphibians wish
To jump and to die:
There is the yellow flag I tried to steal away
From him—
There is the train's stowaway—
There is the blinding javelin:
That was never mine—I admit, I tried to steal
The omelets away from that cerulean god—but
He smelled me out before
This could become a really lucrative fairy tale—
And now it is just a song of unproductive measure—
The brown apiaries of my last muse
Have gone up to Ocala to enjoy her inlaw's fair
Weather—
But for tomorrow will be another for me—
The amber in my glass
Shall answer to my lips accordingly—and she will
Awaken—plagued as she does—
A flightless bird—a loveless dove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brownd Apiaries Of My Lastmuse

Now I can see that there is a tank in the sun:
Filled with bees and yellow jackets
Protecting their honey—
It is a wild basket up there in sky—an Easter
Bonnet
Where even the kindest of amphibians wish
To jump and to die:
There is the yellow flag I tried to steal away
From him—
There is the train's stowaway—
There is the blinding javelin:
That was never mine—I admit, I tried to steal
The omelets away from that cerulean god—but
He smelled me out before
This could become a really lucrative fairy tale—
And now it is just a song of unproductive measure—
The brown apiaries of my last muse
Have gone up to Ocala to enjoy her inlaw's fair
Weather—
But for tomorrow will be another for me—
The amber in my glass
Shall answer to my lips accordingly—and she will
Awaken—plagued as she does—
A flightless bird—a loveless dove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brownd Sunlight Of Alma's Boisterous Eyes

Now you have to go to sleep with your man,
So that it what you do,
And you promised me you didn't want for anymore children.
But you still let me make love unprotected to you,
As if the airplane was never touching down,
So happy with so many imperviously naked stewardesses
Flitting from the ports like dripping flowers,
While behind them the mountain is another thing entirely:
Monstrous,
With hickies on its shoulders, like mine, the diminishing birthmarks
You gave us in between lunch and supper time,
That will melt like the snowdrops, like the tears metamorphosised
From the brown sunlight of Alma's boisterous eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Brownness Of His Unwise Sea

My body does not know the places that your body rests:
The wishing wells, the oasis's-
When you lay down beside him- Alma, what is it that you know:
How has it become official:
When it rains,
Or when there is a forest fire, and all of your rabbits disappear:
And yet the very next day you go shopping,
And lay your whispers to my ear- in a fieldtrip that you will Never admit to,
Just as you wont admit to my own scars- sometimes I have followed
After you into churches you had already committed to going away
From:
But I found you in the dismissive caesuras- and in the ill perfections
Of the murals above your roof
Where I once slept for two hours four or five months ago:
And then had to come down
And walk back home- and now I wonder what betides you,
Beside the firelight of your television, and your room:
How the keen bodies will rush beside you tonight, cooing into Your languishing maelstrom,
Brindled from the kilns you have more than once let me know:
And even if it has happened as many times as to take up all of The birthdays of my years,
We still must live forever across the borders of our tongues- except
That I have tasted yours- and though without wholly understanding,
Have enjoyed as often as the cadaverous sailor
Slips away full heartedly into the brownness of his unwise sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Budded Guillotine

Will you help me kill myself?
I've got the fire ax,

You've got those eyes
That I can remember,
Those lips which spill gasoline,
Those legs which outrun
All studded law,

And that man.
I know- that man,
The amusement parks with
My life on the line....
You're holding his hand.

Some night in soft California,
The sea kissing the sun,

Its so easy how you'll do it,
I know
And appreciate hearing
The eulogies of thoughtless euthanasia,

My heart poisons
As your lips entwine
Like a spy's garret...

The deer stumble towards the Glowing swimming pool,

The night flowers bloom.
The woman is singing French.

I don't even need a tool,
Your name spoken to you
In the quiet apertures of those pleasure stung interludes....
The budded guillotine

I shouldn't hear it,

But I do,
Each humid wave pricking against your resting ear,
The purple thorn pushes deeper in the ancient wound,

The blade coming down,
As if you were his child alone in his woodcutter's embrace,

And it'll do just fine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Budding Gravity Of Our Drinking Fountain

Returned to the pinioned basins
Emaciated with silver, I recreate myself into something
I cannot remember,
Someone who I have always wanted, like a four door
Suburbia
With pretty children and a rich young pool. To be the Baby sister's Indian giver,
To disremember the golden rule: To sit up all night on the Influential roof and drink to myself, thinking that I could never Get any higher:
To fornicate with my eyes with my wife. To go to eat with Her for dinner,
To disremember who the conquistadors impacted underneath the Bellies of the canals and rivers,
And to call the leaping humiliations my gods, to give up on Snowflakes, and to hurry on the migrations of butterflies and Their mimics:
To live in the estuaries bled from a stuck high school.
To have married the very woman I remember singing like Io
So distant and so near, trapped in the budding gravity of our Drinking fountain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Bullfighters Who Walked Like Peacocks

Now I don't even know that I am here,
Because all the girls have gone off over the hills on
Their hands and knees
Following the smoking guns;
And the sky isn't the blue that you would know,
But the movie theatre was all mine:
It pantomimed my soul, and all I could think of
Was rain and fireworks,
And the sweet old times going away to school and College,
And making it all the way to the tumbling sea between classes,
And getting drunk with dragons
Only so I could come back to those hallways,
Searching for your perfumed echoes
That whispered from the clays that were given form by Your hands,
The same as some god mothered both of us from the gardens
Of the perfect muse,
Out into the open streets
Where the bullfighters walked like peacocks,
Not know what it was they were going to do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Burning Graveyard

Waking up tomorrow in Mexico, lost in the festoons of Her curtains,
And tangled with the netting near the sea's shore:
The sun coming down expectantly-
The entire place a voyeur of the burning graveyard of Our love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Burning Latitudes

Booming this way in their hills,
The flowers there are miners
Of the sun; of course,
They are:
What else would they be
Doing,
Skipping school as the Airplanes come and
Come,
Across the burning recesses,
In cardinals of the Air,
Deciding across the burning
Latitudes
And increasing, increasing there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Burning Light

Abusing themselves by the other planets at their Games,
The conquistadors falling down the hills like mumbling ants,
And nothing that was sure footed is any longer:
But the kites come down easily like strayed pets
Who no longer feel her feral promise,
The way bees sometimes feel the awful jubilation of spring
Far beneath the armpits of airplanes,
Where the paper delicate flowers are airing their lingerie,
And waiting for the soiree of a good time;
And where the biplanes of angels come, clocking the earth,
As if counting the traffics of her choreographed waves
That are out in the open like some kind of fire, as the blades
Of grass are another kind of fire
Curling up to the sandy wells of terrapins and aquiline snails,
Trying to make their rudeness known up to the doors of
The courting girls who have all gone inside
Expecting the rain, stroking their glorious hairs time and Time again
In the burning light of the kerosene.

Robert Rorabeck

The Burning Sugarcanes

I listen to my father relieve himself in the bathroom.
Conquistadors bending down like penitent flowers
Kissing the first lips of waves,
Like nothing else you can find in a bookstore;
And then we are done, like a report handed from door to Door,
And then finally like a mismanaged fact given to the Police man;
And the beauty of the world is that there are always kittens
And that they are always dying;
And I want a house with a pool:
I don't want to be savage anymore; or if I fail I want trains
Jumping like the lips of fireworks all past
Saint Augustine,
Across country limping in straight lines all the way up
To the heads of Colorado where dreams grow
Like
Cauliflower on its monkey vines; and then I would throw
For a bus and a heavy jacket- The way Kelly chose to wore my Flannel today;
And I can think of all the days I barely survived, chained to Something or other,
Looking up into the lips of the divine; and then a little ways
West driving to sod farms, wishing that there
Could be more barefoot games,
And roses growing here, roses and roses weeping and true
Like maidens lost and amnesiac out amidst
The burning sugarcanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Busied Rooms Of Her Unoccupied Heavens

Laughing through the games and attending the news
While the jasmine blooms
Over the narcoleptic lakes: lakes so beautiful and yet no one
Thought to write a poem across them,
But this is my séance to them,
Even if my father doesn't care:
This, another way to awaken into the languishing shadows,
Breathing shallowly—and across the many directions
The airplanes cross:
Another way to believe in the perfumes over the circuses and
The family—
They are smiling through mirrors where they have had to Buy themselves—and across the unholy mountains—
They languish and disappear—
While—as of yet, some love holds out, and sings to her
While she sleeps alone
In her emptied house at the end of some cul-de-sac,
Waiting for her birthday candles
So she cause them to disappear—as another night languishes
Up the busied rooms of her unoccupied heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Busted Eyes Of Angels

And in those broken tenements the busted eyes
Of angels who wear zebra prints:
How I wrote novels for you in the moonlight
Beside the cemetery, the cathedral—
And next to the high school: how my brightest light
Shone for you through the night—
How my soul evaporated in a petri dish for you eleven
Years ago—emollitions through these scars—
Now I am married to a woman I do not love
But who loves me—and the future lies like
An empty parking lot beneath the vanishing snowflakes
You are breathing—some kind of joy forgotten
In your flesh—you lie out for him like plastic emeralds
Over a birthday cake—forgetting all of the parts of The country you've never been to—
Underneath the mountains who themselves are underneath
The stars—all of them developing in a film for Reptiles—you brandish yourself for the fires that no
Longer burn—and the marionettes who do not linger
Over the fact of loving you,
Jump over the zoetrope of leaping foxes that are Also being pulled by strings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Busted Zoo

Boys sleeping in their massive trucks,
Sucking tiny thumbs:
Little boys in baseball caps sated of their Mothers' paps,
The school yard bums out in the parking
Lots,
Airplanes leaping over smoking pots;
And they are not here,
Where they should be playing baseball-
They do not come here anymore,
The donkey-eared truants:
They do not have to look at this self-reflective
Traffic,
The bums- the quieted gum chewers-
And they spend a good day lost out in the zoo,
Eyes amazed at the species of things that they Never thought to knew;
And they are not dumb, but they are not lawyers
Too-
After the day is over telling you what,
They never go home- they sleep in giant trucks,
And horse trailers, and weedy easements:
No religion except for what they thought they knew
Like a species of disinterest escaped from
The busted zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Butterflies Who Are My Soul

I am wrecked:

The ship folds down to the green bosoms

Of mermaids

Who do not love me, but enjoy what I have Brought for them

In the rain drenched mascara of my water coloring:

I am playing with the eels;

And I no longer dream of Conquest:

I am the vanquished sailor blind to the lights of

The lighthouse

With all holidays turned off:

The anchor is my heart- the butterflies who

Are my soul float like oil in the Moonlight,

Wishing that the heavens would bleed a fire

To burn them away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Buzzards Circling

Careworn, glossy as worms in the corpse:
Pale dogs smiling over the paler horse, the moon on the Rising and crowning the hackles,
The savage tenements mortared in unrest-
Death savants, making his dutiful rounds through the Hoary transoms like thick and oily chambers
Of a loud mouthed weapon:
Unglued, lobsters crying like little girls with paper cuts
In their boiling baths:
Werewolves who hit the sauce and then the virginal necks,
Like bonfires over teepees, and silver axes into Aspens,
Until all the wishes are spent, and you see your girl making love
Or eyes with him:
And anyways, at least it was fun while it lasted:
And the hyenas set around the corpse and laughed,
The buzzards circling in strange transgressions, echoing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cadaver O Fickle Regret

The silence rings- the universe is expanding,
Old girlfriends are getting married,
And well fed: What is truly beautiful now, the alien
Pollens of your high-school garden cannot really
Be touched, just dreamed about:
They are too far away- They are exploding like
Fireworks over forgotten highways;
And this the runny psalm I shook cook up in the morning,
Pretending to look into your eyes, and giving them
Colors of my own; it is like you live in a Paleolithic Africa, when it was hooked to the north pole with
The earth still cooling on the windowsill of the Earliest and most beautiful of gods,
And there weren't no zoos, or Catholic girls who could Kill with just one dismissive touch, and trailer parks
And palm readers practicing in the dark of suburban
Lakes,
With tampons floating like bloody lilies,
Telling her that I wasn't her man for infinity, that what I was Worth must be eaten, strengthened from like penny candy
At the drugstore, the destination of one afternoon's
Bicycle ride; and the rest of it closeted, entombed with no
Fanfare, tossed to feed the minnows spawning in the Canal of teal molasses at the a$$ end of a convenient store,
You would later on take updated lovers to, pointing out
The empty tortoise, the cadaver of fickle regret,
Saying to them with your tongue in their ear, there is the Man I could not abide, though he be better than you,
He could not float in my salt-less sea,
And your tongue dripped the unction of a thousand black-
Eels, which burned like the oil in a drum,
And took you back to the parked cars to finish you off
Yourself like a confection stolen from an out of season fair.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cadence Of The Failing System

I walk with my mother as the traffic streams,
We make a block around using Military trail
And Haverhill as the parallels of an oblong
Rectangle; We are the only ones playing it straight,
The rest of the world is having a hang-nail;
And the politicians are so right out in the street
Calling out the names of their most prized strippers,
While the pimps herd their pinked ladies in their Jelloed stilettos out under the Big Dipper:
I once had a class at community college with a
Girl named Tiffany, who was sure that this dirty
Class we perambulate around like the rapids in a
Horrid stream, were raised up to serve her:
She stuffed a freight train of coke up her nose, and Told the servants more, more, until so calmly they Laid her beneath a riding lawnmower, until she Claimed no more: Now it seems to me the traffic
Ripples upon the jawbone of a foreign shore, and
The palm trees sway triangularly like the permuting
Gambits of a guillotine, but I am not sure:
Though Alice maintains something must be eaten
For us to change, perhaps the pills from the medicine
Cabinet will rearrange the poor: But this is no suburbia
In which we take our evening exercise; all the same,
The circulations of dead presidents will pass from
The air-conditioned séances of soccer moms' SUVs,
And from their wandering husbands' billfolds' parlors'
Frictions into the midnight quims of fleshy scissors, and settle quietly and pressed like name-branded
Gabardine, whatever that is,
Thusly insuring the cadence of the failing system.

Robert Rorabeck

The Caesuras Of A Fish Tailed Palm Tree

This is what I could afford,
This little house, a shell and shelter for my flesh:
I can hear the airplanes leaping above her yellow and Spanish crown every day,
And even when I am not home,
But at my job and thinking of Alma as I ring up the green onions
And potatoes,
Or whatever it is that I am supposed to be doing:
If I could share a piano seat with her I would even need to Know how to play,
And then she cut her hair and looked like Snow White;
And I want to take her to Disney World,
And I wonder what she really thinks of me, or how long this Can last
With the Virgin's image painted in the cathedrals stained glass,
And the copper cannons sleeping green in their nightmares'
Envy,
And the world spins around, a globe from a glass blowers lips,
Living in Detroit or some other burned out soul
Where cars can last forever
And the sky is an overturned bowl hot and blue where the ghosts
Of the buffalos flew,
And vanished the way the green waters smoke up from my backyard
Window,
And I lie on a cerulean sea, and think of Alma in a pieta in the Caesuras of a fish tailed palm tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cake Of My Next Birthday

Drougths of dogs and lucky fish-
One or the other, and caged animals, people in Cars,
Open-windowed feathers:
Muses are going to Tampa to get lucky and get Laid by Sting Ray and Barracuda:
In the trailer parks of stately wrecks,
When there hasn't even been a hurricane for months
Or eclipses over
Fault lines of crashed to earth lovers of space
Who happened to just be the silence
Of hapless meteors;
And the sea steams for a little while,
And the televisions bleat their anorexic lights-
Then the daylight is over, the honeymoon of fights;
And Kelly is coming over,
Like baby's breath effervescing in its bouquet,
And my only wish is to become beautiful enough for
Her,
And I am holding it in all the way to the cake of my Next birthday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Calling Of The Untamed Road

I drink cheap grape soda- eat
Buttered toast with molasses, dream of you;
Its been a long time since I recognized anything,
Caught up in the circulating amusement rides:
They are so much fun,
And all my lines are just the reckless drizzle,
Confection that wasn't forecasted;
And the cars move back and forth with the Shadows, courting or some kind of love,
And my future leans on like tilting windmills
Off to one corner of the stockyards.
I would like to say your name and put you into Rhyme schemes; I would like to visit you,
But there aren't too many good excuses;
To taste your wine, to buy a whole box to show off,
And the night just proceeds without any succinct
Music,
The dogs snuffling the yard, reciprocating with the Coyotes. The airplanes leap like frogs,
And somehow the young mermaids have drifted and Become lost in the canals-
They will have to be gathered up, and their pearls
Extracted, gifts for you; but look into my eyes, and see
The meanings of my lost vanguards- Look long enough
And we will wake up next to one another,
And remain that way as long as your wishes drown out
The calling of the untamed road.

Robert Rorabeck

The Calls Of A Sunny Winter

Laughing through the calls of a sunny winter:
The sun is leaping like a pony, rambunctiously stealing away
From any gods that it ever knew
In its young life, while last night I saw the brown reservoirs
Of your body sleeping underneath the Christmas tree,
And underneath the television;
And laughing, as it held a child on the couch of the Mexican Household- so freely as if it was ours.

Robert Rorabeck

The Campuses Of The Elegant Shade

The son of another child
In my daydreams up in air: these are the helium balloons
Of your rectitude:
How I have forgotten you, how I have become unstrung
Like a leg of lamb
After the fleece was stolen and reclaimed and all of The titans in the sky were busily dancing in
Their jubilee for all of their stewardesses:
And this is you, and you are here
While I was just trying to breathe in my Makebelieve:
Made up in a doll house underneath the ceiling fans
While the skeletons dance and roller skate and Otherwise fend off their heroes:
The herons fly into the pink and orange crepuscule
Of the neighboring houses
As the cars turn around and around like a mobile
Of marmalade while the insouciance of truants and hobos
Waits out the rains again underneath the overpass:
While tomorrow I will be filling up the trucks as if
With the miracles of spit and the lost truants and Pilgrims toes up in the middle of England, and I am just Wondering if you are here while these stones are Laid floating mercurial according to the hidden architectures
That like to lie down and listen to the student orchestras
While the oranges grow plump and luxuriate upon
The campuses of the elegant shade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Canal Of The Lonely Boyhood

Stars in the gut, where kittens are in the bag,
Each kind a misspelling not important enough to count:
These are the last things I said,
Sticking up my fingers as she went by on juniper spokes,
Beating the yoke of her just desserts:
She had a family, a bouquet in her amber fists,
A deed to a grave her legs two axels rolling back the Centuries to high school:
I pulled naked an aspen clear back from the woods;
Like a virgin confluence, a photosynthetic divining-rod:
Would have made a weapon to kill any nymph-like creature:
Took it to her city, wanted to leave an offering of Pretty fagg*ts where she lay dreaming, an urban prickly-pear
Done up like lucky road kill in the rock garden of Her pullulating rounds, the dogs howling
With the lawn-man, the fireman, the mailman:
The pool shimmered just as alluring as some other man's Bright-haired sister, but
Hers was the grotto of milk, and there was no abstinence:
So I wept something like an apocryphal tourist without Any swag: And the sky changed color so it could See too: All twelve apostles playing spin the bottle in Her room, and she already half deflowered,
Every bottle emptied, creating temporal distortions
And partial nudity. Cumulus rolled
Back in an awful reveal, and they played Easter from the other End: I fell further south into the distended waves of a homeless
Disorder, forgot to feed myself to keep being real,
Sold so many things until all that was left was exploding in
The sky, the fiery umbrages that fell darkening the sea;
Until, like in a roman holiday, where the alligators audience
In phosphorescent spheres, Queen Anne's Wheels, silver
Sparklers, they dropped me over into the canal of the lonely
Boyhood, their bicycles whispering against each others' others.
The soft-shelled tortoise covered me like a stone.
Further north, in the warm concentricity of liquors, under
The eyes of enchanted knights, she laughed as she threw
The dog a bone and closed the pretty door
To this young skeleton who still solicits his love from

A nearby graveyard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Canals Of Venus

Contraptions of unpaid for love are
Ambling hurdy-gurdy across the endless desert;
The background of her skull, turned away,
Another rhyme misled into the mouth of the crocodile
Playing in the placid mauve estuary of the unambiguous sky,
With the other toys the witches bring quite invisible
In their hearth of wicker winds,
The stone bridge with the arc of a traveling worm,
Leaps the dry riverbeds where the vertebrae of cotton mouths
Sleep, their poisonous drool now just clay scimitars out of reach;
The day ends with the cloistered shove of another day,
Brighter than the other day and ready for his audition on
The cracked and pitted stage, with more behind him in a narcissistic
Queue of reptilian talents;
Those lines she never reads or looks at without crossing her eyes,
The ghost towns of auburn boys haunted by her ceaseless sway;
They work for her beneath the monolithic fossils of glintless rust,
Struggling to keep up with the migratory shadows,
Those tools of groaning herbivores who trundle the elusive paths,
Between the sunburned crests and troughs,
The serpentine illusions she uses to stuff her bra,
The red skin she dyes her lips on, the diminished veldt she lays out
Upon, a python of incomparable absences;
Judging how the day looms its cauldron overhead,
Laughing at the lumbering procession of defiant fossils,
The children of a ceaseless world, the remains of the boys
Pray beneath and dream of Eucharist and sips of wine from paper boxes;
They look up at her with apocryphal reverence;
Though coiling, they are to her the ants from a mound of inconsequential existence,
As the brighter men parade their bulbous pomp above her apathetic eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Candelabrum of Too Many Ancestors

You tell me the English word
And I will drink all
Of your wine-
And call you a butterfly
Underneath the
Sun- picking the Flowers from Graveyards-
Carrying away your Feelings-
To the candelabrum of
Too many ancestors-
Across the canal or
Underneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Candlelit Cities

The bliss of these words is cheapened by the liquor
And made more anonymous and far a field:
And without even stanzas they don't even know themselves,
But I have brushed them across the many lips of forests,
And across the cool, always running lips of streams,
Though it means all of nothing- all of this, given to an empty house
That has yet to be built; and soliloquyed- and the eyes of dancers
Stop reverberating like knuckles of sealed tight doors;
And the submarines wait patiently down in the silts of the Precambrian
Oceans, waiting also for something that will never move:
And these words come like the rejected drafts in the pigeon scratched
Jaws of forsaken paper;
And they come without Alma's brown lips and heart, for she has Reconciled with her usual man, and now the only hope for these pitiful
Things is to somehow make it above tree line where only the angels
Can breathe,
And there to fling their pitiful wishes out unto the candlelit cities
Of a world that doesn't even know that there is an answer to be returned.

Robert Rorabeck

The Candles Of A Fairytale

I write too many things for you—
With weeds up to my knees and night blooming
Jasmines
Hanging around the fences of a baseball
Diamond—
Uneasily, the planes take off and then settle
In the sky,
Nosebleeds eeking out sunlight—
Stewardesses walking back and forth down
The aisle like church goers,
Like members of a wedding train there in
The sky:
It is a metamorphosis I don't know about,
But we can buy tickets—
Ride through the billowing whiles the sunlight
Molests like bulls their matadors—
And when we come down again
We will be in a different city with other dreams
Leaping over us—as if it was ourselves
And we were the candles of a fairytale.

Robert Rorabeck

The Candle's Weeping Promises

Walking by the zoo today, there was no
News of you
Even though, after school, all of the hallways
Open into you it is true
With the sun going from his bedroom into
His playground
And the corridors arriving home again
With the lions yawning
And showing their cherry pits to the Ambivalent circus masters who are ready for
New jobs
Dousing into this, the bit of respite for Gasoline Even the airplanes are coming down
Again, falling to sleep with their Stewardesses inside the roundness in the Nest of your senses
A nursery underneath the candle's weeping promises

Robert Rorabeck

The Cannibalisms And Incests

We make good symmetry, and with our hands molesting together
Over the backyards of planets,
We can proposition our gods to any excuses:
I kneel before the Virgin of Guadalupe and ask how long it has to Be that I am just a Sancho, before I can get Right down to loving Alma- and becoming her man:
I buy her many things, even after her birthday:
Even before Christmas:
I buy her heavy fans just so that I can stand behind her at the fruiteria
And smell the scent laid off her of her brown labor:
And it is as if I can smell the children on her flesh,
And even the mountains she has never been to, or has the energy to Travel up to be
With my lonely and bloodthirsty gods: and I am so dysfunctional
That I only have the energy to wish for her,
As my cowardly spirits retreat after work and I can go to my home
By myself and water all of my flowers
Who have to admit that they will most likely die before my heartbeat:
But I am consoled, and that is my Illusionary prize, that I have gone down on the muse,
And felt her ribs like a fever, like the first cradles for her children:
And that is no lie:
That the most precious sound ever made to my ears is Alma's heart
Beat,
As her lungs edit the reasons for myself into something that can be Sold;
As the cars drive back and forth like butterflies needing metamorphosis,
But who are too frightened to ever change,
Or to make it past again the vast rivers and canyons to the forest of Mexico,
Where the cannibalisms and incests finally become too bright to Ever dissolve.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cannibalisms Of A Soulless Heart

Lassoing the tempestual
Makebelieve,
Cowboys riding with the Notions of fair weather,
Little kids in classes
Surrender,
Glass eyes mocking the Light,
Or the other things that
Can never turn back
And devour
The cannibalisms of
A soulless heart,
Dining of its cold
Surrender.

Robert Rorabeck

The Canvasses Of The Unreachable Heavens

Glass carnival,
Or reach far enough to ever taste the vineyards at
The fingertips winnowing from
From the stain glassed windmills sweated off the Delusional brows of the preternatural
Stewardesses who wish to, once again,
Believe they are angels
Brushing the canvasses of the unreachable heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Captains Of All Of Their Hours

These scars are here for a reason- they give me the docility of the grave;
And I don't even have to have an execution;
I don't even have to talk about the sky, since she is always flailing:
She is always having a goodtime, and her sisters are having a goodtime,
While we are all starving on our boats,
Our fingers in her weathered plums, and now my face is all read,
And I in love with Alma, my very soul, the flag of Mexico:
And what am I going to do about it, but go to the movie theatre on Friday or Saturday:
I am not going to wear any jewelry, because look at all of these scars;
And now I suppose that I have to be hungry,
While the pitcher is mounting; and it has been several minutes since I Have heard the power of the airplanes, and yet I guess that her magic
Is still hours, and in the night I imagine I can smell the jasmine of kidnappers, Because there is so many names of jasmine; and her body disappears underneath
The eyes of the captains and all of their hours.

Robert Rorabeck

The Car With Electric Doors

A kindergarten steps to the clouds and accepts an applause
While baseball happens beneath her—
The usual boys kicking up the skirts of red diamonds—
As the traffic sounds around the old battlements,
And the knights who are their fathers are coming
Home from quests—
And whatever joy that this is can also be mistaken for A mad epiphany, but I do not know if it will do any good—
There they are, lining the roads captured by gravity:
Laundromats—and little places to meet:
A pieta I remember happening inside the carport
Where my mother was electrocuted half-hazardly
She leaned down and caressed a frog:
It wasn't her child and it didn't change her or itself,
But was beautiful for a little while—
As she knelt, looking just about eighteen,
Next to the car with electric doors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Caracoling Amusements

Distilled into Mexico, the birds quiver:

There is nothing curious about their fleece; they are done,

And hung-over- they can hear the voices of

Viscous lovers speaking all throughout the wires

At their feet:

When they remember the water fountains of little

Boys lushed off their bicycles so near the circling dunes,

Then what will they do? But speak out loud to one another

As the trucks come,

So wide and beautiful and pressed like faith to the Earth,

Rolling on toward their particular definitions;

And then they know that they shouldn't move, for soon it

Will be Christmas, and the sun will shine down

Like an obese angel across the chattering church, and the words

That they have had to mimic to distant lovers will no longer

Hurt them,

As the tigers multiply so vigorously across the rolling steps

Beneath them, tumbling out like kittens,

Their hearts pattering like the caracoling amusements of a fair

That never has to move by itself again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Caress Of Jubilant Costumes

Doves in the light of a drowning promises:
In the last light of a truant's day, anyways: look beautiful as they Take off behind the transoms of the school
Bus and fly their own ways: back down the curious avenues
Lined by pines and the pearly throats of echinus's Past the languid bladders of canals, who've had their Fill of stolen bicycles and cottonmouths:
Returning home to the estuaries of ping pong tables and swimming
Pool,
Basking in the off-putting lights of television for the remainder
Of the cartoons:
They will eat their dinners of fried chicken happily, while another
World will happen right across the canal,
Where the sugarcane burns, and the cats get up on their smarter
Feet to dance
For five dollars with little Mexican girls who have come from
So far away just like the migrations of out of work princesses
So entranced by the misfits on the road who carry them
Anyways- to settle there
Around the ballrooms of cypress, in the cooling husks- penumbrae
Of the lost memories of cicadas- figuring out that is just where They are going to live: right across the world from us,
Feeling the caress of jubilant costumes we can never own.

Robert Rorabeck

The Carnivals Of Plastic Indians

I don't think any of this is pretty:
Folding up paper airplanes with bloody fingers
And sending them over
A world of a few feet:
Over the carnivals of plastic Indians
And dye cast cars:
Not even over a single house-wife:
Not even over the grave of a cat—
But this is the life of a child, sunbathing
In a yard filled up with only one paper
Tree,
And the rest of the illusions scattered with
The lazing Mexicans amidst the pine trees—
The blue gills in another word,
In the pool down the slope
Only a few feet away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Carnivals Of The Sea

Ferris Wheels strewn across a carpet
In a house as close to
The sea so as to be molested by it—
Where dolls lie cluttered amidst the palm fronds
And green snakes hang from
The crooks of citrus trees—
Where the grass is cut every day
And the waves come up to doorsteps just
As close as mailmen—
And the children you are about to have already
Live inside the house,
And in there, with the blinds open,
The daylight falls so brilliantly that you cannot Even read,
But must close your eyes and fall into bed—
And there find your wife or your husband—
And make love while sweating a fire—
But in the night, buy her roses
And take her barefoot outdoors to enjoy
The ever rolling caesuras of the Carnival of the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Carpentry Of A Blind Man

Boys as pretty as baseball spume words such as Gas jets-
And open their pretty chests to the mornings of their High schools-
Daydreams on Lilly pads underneath broken down school
Buses,
And we don't belong here, but this is my plan:
To catch you for the first time:
Away from your husband
And your children, that I suppose you already have,
And to take you to a park
That the lovers are just busy constructing, and kiss
Your hand, bending to it in the arcs of Our recess, while promising to you from the bottom of
So many open wounds-
That I have found you- and this is our castle,
And it may not be forever beautiful,
And it may not be able to surmount death: it may only
Be big enough for one home,
But it will be our place- and in it only we can echo:
And that is why I lay here, trying to built
It up, like the carpentry of a blind man- not trying to Elude you are to fill you with empty promises-
But to do just what I can,
Even as you turn away, taking everything that I have promised
With you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Carport

Today we are looking in at the sons of Walt Whitman
And the torpedoes floating softly beyond the stained glass windows
Just on the other side of the hypocrisies of the church
That has sunken with the tears from the girl you abandoned:
Little girls filling you wine glasses,
Like soft feathers lost in the aloe: and I convinced you of these Affections as your mother wept in the carport
Beside the car that was salmon- and the frogs sang that once were Tadpoles, as the angels looked down from heaven
And everything turned into the vulpine darkness and consumed the Orange trees by the fall of shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cars And The Houses

Religion in my senses- euphoria of a dog
Who is not here-
Probably the very thing that loves me greatest
Upon the earth,
While my fires burn for one woman as for Another:
My heart does its pirouettes as new students
Matriculate from high school
To college:
Their journey is vibrant, even almost Stupendous:
I can see them caracoling around their peers
Underneath the maples or sleeping in another classroom:
Doing all of their favorite stuff- while the cloud
Banks spill authoritatively across the earth:
Muscle bound yet ethereal: there they speed
Indefinitely- and the cars
Underneath them, and the houses- pieces who Believe in their game, as if by summoning up some Words from the lips of my fingers, I could make them
Inevitably real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Caskets Of The Graveyards

Window draped, motionless and blind-
Don't you live somewhere around here
Up the cataracts from Mexico,
And underneath this tricolor flag- so many Students don't care to give pledges to
Anymore-
But it still feels alright at midnight, outside of The Mandingo cars
In Saint Louis, going up and down the Mississippi:
And, even from the gas stations, I can hear
The pilots yawn- as they sleep walk while Taking off-
And it is the stewardesses job to make love to Them and anybody else:
As the world is on the move of kaleidoscopes-
And Satan is as wounded as a rattlesnake
Who stepped out of the hydrangeas and into
The yard at in inopportune time:
Now silky diamonds cry tears of roses,
And their rattles shiver outside the windows
Where angels with clipped wings go to bed
With the men who hammer in the nails
Of the caskets of the graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Castle That They Make

Birdbath of empty lips
In an empty hall- a great absence on holidays
From man's greatest invention:
Showing your breasts
While you take the hall pass to wherever
You want,
As from the very extend and of extremity,
There is a thicket of sunlight
Where foxes eat the busy rinds amidst
The stammering of freckling deer:
And the school band plays on and on,
And the stewardesses pepper the clouds,
Perhaps going home to the castle that they make Believe are there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Castles Of Golden Hay

Coy in the stilettos of poniards,
And now this: done with the staccatos up the second
Flights,
Done with the kittens in their baths- and filled with Scars and resonations,
Little games, and little girls following the slender tribulations
Up the stairs to their freshman lovers
In little rooms under yellow covers- spoken words
Said in whispers,
Dirty dishes- drying flowers- another place to find the Resilience in the plywood of lumbers:
The facades of freckled shoulders riling like dolphins slipping
Through watery boulders:
Or whatever world it is, spending over and tying its shoes,
Going down like fingers perusing the instruments of News:
Bad hands that pass her over, losing the games of wanton
Lovers;
Discarded into the dalliances of foxgloves, with someone else
Waking up dearer to her in the castles of golden hay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cat

Cross words fallen upon an empty nest- you see,
The serpent is quite filled up
As if from some gas station in a starless Mexico:
Slithering away,
Forgetting how it lost its legs along the highway-
And muses burn up to the sky:
Their mouths emolliate where they once were singing-
And the words of their pretty senses
Return to the shadows:
The orange groves pearl-
Lavish Spanish forts wait by the sea- the mermaid's Hair is streaming amongst the tendrils of the Octopi and squid:
And the waves are quite black- her heart is open to Him:
A nude instrument- and now his smile is the cat;
And he plays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cat On The Windowsill

What difference does it make,
If people don't get the chance to see
The efforts of another man's work,
Or feel the warm relations of the hidden
Love with the woman,
The stranger living across the street-
Here, in the busy pastures,
Each life is a book,
And the wind is turning so many pages.
The insects awaken in the swimming seasons.
Upon earth, some organisms
For only a day get to read but a few lines:
A poem on the stem in the valley,
Soon withers with the snows,
As clouds like loud gentlemen trundle
In off the cold sea and stamp their feet,
But this is their house too,
So we must be courteous,
As everyone is trying to speak at once,
Not all can be recognized, though sometimes
Whispers are of the most important things,
Such as the field mouse burrows
Beneath the sodden hay,
Her children newly entangled with
The green and gold of awakening,
Their mouths speaking the hungry words
Which will last until the next incident
Of births and deaths,
And the cat on the windowsill slyly,
Eyes but slits, as the wind turns the windmills,
Cleaning herself, hears us all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cataracts Of Her Homeopathic Oils

You have an office and I have a song,
And so many restraints:
I paint the signs over and picture you, whetting my whistle
On the suppositional hullabaloo:
And the days step forward like this like careworn beauty
Pageants,
Beautiful girls in beaten up Fords: Then they are like pagan Sacrifices dripping and nude in the back alleys of their Back yards:
They are inescapable and undressed terrapin, they prick their Fingers to the muffled sound of religious institution,
And the stenographers busily keeping up like ants crowning Boulders:
Her shoulders flexed and round like ferris wheels and then like
Roller coasters:
The trees get off in her feels, the cats purr like outboard motors;
The knives glisten in the glade of his right ears,
Or at least that is what he told her:
And then she has a towel draped over her like a stage, and in the Night it rains and she just lies pullulating beneath the hedge,
A toad in the drip of her navel, a snake on each leg,
Their legless bellies counting the beats of her blood in their little Coils- like satanic Moils they rest upon her and Dream of the cataracts of her homeopathic oils.

Robert Rorabeck

The Catfish And The Minnows

Soft and languishing on Fire Island where you lost your life,
Frank O'Hara—
Falling in love with firemen,
Writing poems about Chinamen—
As the birds touched their wings like
Lips to the sky,
While the coffins wondered why ever
The dead had to die—
And up there the echoes never had
To fall down,
The tulips bloomed into the midnights of
The midnight playgrounds—
And we got off wherever we could—
In the middle of the day, bloomed the pornographies
Of our woods,
And the echoes resolved themselves to the Catfish and the minnows—
Until I had to look my muse in the eye,
And had to reassure her that she would never die.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cathedrals Of Garages

Making a plan of yellow ixora
There in the day glow with the mouths
Of lions open and
The tourists driving through- comely
Offerings such as these Resting beside easy lakes- like the loose
Change of wishes almost
Making it into their wells- camouflage
Of cenotaphs is these common
Things-
Underneath the echinopsis with the airplanes,
Watched by amphibians,
Or the cerulean beetle: how long will they Lie there,
Accruing annually before a kind of soul
Pockets them,
To travel back inside the cathedrals of Garages,
Lie lay basking their copper patinas
Underneath the lulls of ceiling fans.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cats In The Cinderblocks Cleaning Their Young

How to begin something else anew without seeming
To be disillusioned:
I remember attending college many years ago
In the middle of central Florida, but a little ways up the road:
And always being alive in the early mornings,
And camels were grazing on the mirages in the early mists:
And I'd caracole past your house and your friends
Guffawing in the back yard seven times like a lucky if Uneven spell; and I doubt you'd even care to answer even now:
But you smoke and your tits are like melons little fairies live
In little light houses that liked to be squeezed by your Suave and tattooed sailor men;
And now I might just be going home in time for turkey,
To play with the toy boats always bashing their brains out on
The scaled coasts;
And touching myself that way too in the cliffs of the washing
Machine, my back turned to the blue Cadillac my mother Drowned in,
Getting off on the satisfied ululations of the toads all mucky
Tongues and the cats in the cinderblocks cleaning their young.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cats Of Fire

Waiting for the animals of chaos,
Wanting to put on my socks and drive my car to the Liquor store:
Knowing that that is the way that they will come
The fasted,
Like a carnival doused and roaring in flames,
The airplanes flying low like gawkers: Having to check my Face in the mirror so many times
Just to know I am not beautiful,
Wondering what is wrong with me while the population
Grows more beautiful:
Going to have a house with so many windows,
But not one wife:
Going to christen my house with a woman named Melody,
Going to defend my house like a coward's model of the Alamo:
Going to buy a bicycle and ride nearer the sea,
And weep into there for my dogs who have spent all of these Nights weeping for me;
Going to try and sound out words to spell them correctly
For my Janis of muses who couldn't care less:
Those girls have no problem sharing the wet dreams of their Beds with other boys who know so
Far less about them than I, who have sung so little to them,
But are like beefsteak tomatoes pressed up against their lips,
Humming with the ecstasy of their spirits hovering like
Patinas over their bodies;
And I in my little house as yellow as a crook, beating myself
Into the pages of dysfunctional history,
Like a mariposa torn from his sunny house in the zoo,
Remembering how the beautiful children pressed him too roughly,
So now he wallows like a torn eulogy belly-up in the grass
As the cats of fire come curiously.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cats Sunning There

All the children laughing through their fingers of
Crime, and words starting out this way like hobos,
But it seems to me that it will still never rain until I have felt
Your amber heavens in my bed,
And we have done things to one another that you swore we
Would never do again:
Such was today, when our fieldtrips lit out like angels, and we Found each other returning to the same destination,
And we were so exacting that no other two individuals could be
Said to be doing the same as us;
And it didn't rain, but even so you had to drive away:
And I watched the empty streets, or the cats sunning there,
Never surer that something was missing that belonged.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cats Sunning There'

All the children laughing through their fingers of
Crime, and words starting out this way like hobos,
But it seems to me that it will still never rain until I have felt
Your amber heavens in my bed,
And we have done things to one another that you swore we
Would never do again:
Such was today, when our fieldtrips lit out like angels, and we Found each other returning to the same destination,
And we were so exacting that no other two individuals could be
Said to be doing the same as us;
And it didn't rain, but even so you had to drive away:
And I watched the empty streets, or the cats sunning there,
Never surer that something was missing that belonged.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cavalry Of Waves

The cold front pushes in the rains
After Joe has gone
Back to Michigan—I take my class outside
To write about nature
Until they cannot stand it anymore—
Baseball players come from another school
To fill in the diamonds of our backyards,
And at least five or six of the girls
Want to see them
And pretend to interview them—
And daylight proves to be a disappointment,
For it is not beautiful while we are outside—
I can walk from student to student
And dream of girls who do not exist,
And give prompts on personification and Metamorphosis
While a hypothetical mermaid swims beside
The cavalry of waves that make
A swimming pool for the whitest moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cave Of Silver Stars

Now you have come to Know me in my unknown stars,
While little boys give you kisses
On the otherside of an unknowable world-
And this place looks beautiful
Without any houses:
It is just enough to starve:
My child will be born in the morning
Looking up to you
Like a fox in the cavern of silver stars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ceiling Fans In The Air

Everything looks alive on the other side of the canal:
Little boys, you are justified straight into kings;
And I cannot speak, for sometimes I am dazzled by
The pornographies that are right here,
Burning like pages of fire in unmarked cars under the Sugar pines;
Or maybe I left this in my life right after I learned to Speak:
I spat on the conquistador's brow and marched straight off,
Under the usual arcs of the airplanes and the strange
Monuments of unhampered cenotaphs in the sky:
And maybe it was that my estranged enemies felt good
At my abandonment,
But most certainly my abandoned dogs still love me,
Even while I look away, called by the powerful kindlings of Alma's flesh;
I am not even good for nothing, but she comes to me, breathing
Like the only fire left on the earth,
And the good knowledge that
Satan gave us, even as the sky felled like the waterfalls of beautiful
Incests;
And maybe we will touch our bodies against our posts tomorrow,
For she is so wild and pure, and yet she knows almost as many Words as I do in English,
Calling together like all the gold in a flea market,
Like all of the hummingbirds enraptured by the ceiling fans in the air.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ceiling Fan's Noir

I fantasize about houses
And sometimes her free flowing legs,
Which shiver in the fortitudes of Pentecost,
Like the sustained and bleary kiss
The ocean's winds gives the molting towers of Palm fronds,
When lain in a dimly bed, Siamese
Gazelles in high nylon resting from nourishment,
The invisible smells,
Wet and quivering muzzles,
Fingerprints from other men and their little thefts,
Lay inanimate, but breathing, beneath the noir
Of the ceiling fan,
Waiting for the slightest breath to brush the Flaxen hairs on her skin,
For someone to light a cigarette.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cemetery Into The Day

I made a soul unto you whispering into the Ganymede
Of your shoulders—
Wishing to enjoy the life blown into the nooks and crannies of
You architectures
To come out alive again, obeying the elements:
And this is all I've been able to Resolve:
Vanishing children who are able to find their light again
Down into the shelter of the last
Unrequested happenstance of the bay: there,
And into—and into her shallows—
Where you will find your lost sister—where you can try
To call up the cemetery into the day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cemetery That Holds Her Grave

Now there is nevermore news of kidnappers:
They day is just glad:
It is slapping its palms against the concrete,
And little things I say are skinning their knees to get
A better look at him:
They go leaping across the chalk teeth of the Graveyard where all of the better
Poetesses are buried—where Sara Teasdale lies
Posthumously pulverized:
Underneath the lilac shade beside where the black
Children scream like fire engines
And kill each other with popguns:
And there is a McDonalds north of her grave,
And there is a McDonalds south of her grave—
And the universities that lay around her keep remembering
Her with sideways glances:
But upon their greeneries no copper statues diadem
Their academic glades:
There is Twain and Frost and maybe even Whitman:
The black men hustle and pause—but I am sure not a single
One of them has read Sara Teasdale,
Though I once drove my car through the cemetery that holds
Her grave.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cenotaphed Conquistadors

Adhering now to all of the spaces that fill
Over and under-armed—
Ganged into the highest apoplexies of the Alps,
Kissing shoulder to shoulder
With the snow-blinded goddesses—
We seem to make our peace with the lowliest
Halves:
We seem to be breeding here unrecursive to no one—
We have been skipping school and lighting off
Our strange and exciting kites high amidst
The silkweeds—
Now while my baby is sleeping,
And the purple conundrums disparage to no one
That lives here—ghosts outside of their homes
Filibustering to the absentee housewives
Until I've decided that I want to Disappear into Mexico—
Then the airplanes come, showcasing their half-hazard and Illustrious fanfares,
And they are turning around and around—
Acrobatics of the insincerities of the half men who
Can only light off a fraction of their fireworks
And other loves come and go
Just like the mermaids who never know if they
Are truly satisfied by kissing the cenotaphed
Conquistadors underneath their age-old Mistletoe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cenotaphs

Candles fibrillating over the opened mouths of Crocodiles
And now all of these stanzas come pouring out of the Velveteen mouths of the delta,
The hurricanes are making love, dancing right atop of
The blue gills in the canal,
As the city eats its own voice, and fireworks explode
In my hand and I figure out that this is Exactly what I've been doing:
When I get up, I will make love and eat lunch again-
My body is a perusal of unicorns:
Siingster down with Alma and her sisters in a cafeteria
I could swear I didn't know,
And I've forgotten how to swim: she doesn't call me all day:
What is she doing, maybe she has fallen back in love
With him,
While in Florida the trucks seem to be working back up:
Nearing the sky,
A terrible perfume that is made love to by the seagulls and
The blue herrings
The only monuments to dead kings where I live
Across the billfolds of unfortunate colors-
It all unwinds, trying to make myself appear beautiful,
Like a cadaver pillaging sunlight and butterflies-
New and old words reunite with the fire,
And the rest lies in the dunes with the cenotaphs,
Affixed to the crosses the waves have already gobbled.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cenotaphs In The Waves

Blown between the bottle and the bed,
Dog beside me,
Wife in the next room—what muses wait
For me other than these Things which are as transparent as Eerie honeymoons,
That I can remember from balconies
That looked out over some unknown
Dreams—
The busses turning around underneath
The lakes as if swimming butterflies—
And I drink wine from Mexico:
It is the last bottle I am supposed to Drink before Mark Alexander is born;
And we looked at him today.
The technician said too much hair,
But he had a good heart—
I called him a hippy and the both of our Scarred faces laughed,
And where was the moon hanging out
During this, I do not know—
But it was there—the same moon that Hung over the entire neighborhood,
And my old muses in their new thoughts,
Their hearts beating around the corners—
And Romeo and Juliet there too—
Somewhere unseen,
Maybe like two marionettes trying to become Real as they propositioned romance to
The cenotaphs in the waves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cenotaphs Of Conquistadors

Unicorn on a low ridge over
An acrid prairie—I keep writing to you like a little girl:
You give me hope, like
Finding my mother's onyx arrowheads in the bathroom
And sending them off
To a girl who doesn't love me—Unicorn over
The city's dump,
Where the hobos are burning barrels and the sea gulls
Are defecating,
You are not even a swan discovering that the angels
Have nothing to say to you—
But your horn is like the spear of an albino swordfish,
One of a team who was lost to a fisherman's spear,
Leaving behind a bachelor who is always Weeping—
You are like a blue ribbon won at a fair kept in Tiniest bedroom of a trailer
Where there is never enough light,
The stray cats live underneath of, and the traffic
Streams by unending—
Unicorn, you are like that cypress tree transplanted
To the highway's easement for beautification
The road kill sleeps under—
Unicorn, you are the muse of a thoroughly middle-class
Artist
Who walks his little roads too early, and goes to sleep
In the middle of all of the wonderfully humiliated
Creations—
Who sees you in his un publishable dreams,
Wishing to obtain you and lay his eyes upon you like
A nudie magazine found across the street in his childhood
In a cemetery of junked cars,
As the Australian pines leaned in together,
The cenotaphs of conquistadors drinking the sand from
The dunes,
The billboards proselytizing to the kidnapers—
The canal heaped full of stolen bicycles and abandoned donations.

The Cenotaphs Of My Heart

I fail and it never again feels like football:
But the airplanes rattle with their serious desire to get Away and in the bordellos
Underneath their exegesis I swim alone in my manifolds:
I pirouette and turn around and
Remember by sister and how many times it took,
And the lucky rabbits feet that it took to Bribe her;
And now it will never rain again, while my words spill like
Drool over the bibs:
And the houses of relocated Mexicans swim and swim;
And Alma sleeps in her house over the shoulders of the dog
Tracks and the trains;
So soon I will lose my anchors and my liver,
And I will swim too: I will float right over the barrels of Her house as I proceed: I will sleep like a deflated saint
There atop the apexes of her heartbeat
Or other words for the matter, while ships increase in the dark
Waters where she cannot swim: but she will survive
Anyways, culled from the cenotaphs of my heart:
My vida will survive, with or without me:
With or without him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cerulean Blanket

I haven't yet realized beauty: I haven't yet done anything
Good,
Like stolen your eyes from the newspaper,
From the printed lies:
I've stolen bicycles and slips of moon,
Stolen kisses from my old girlfriend ten years old;
But I've just been rude,
And antichristian: I've salivated to the things you put
On your wrist- little green stars who feed hypnotized chickens,
And I love the clouds that diadem your crown
The best:
And yellow busses turn, turn, and turn, as if hypnotizing
The leaving class of students-
And I never learned where you lived in Wellington,
But when it finally got over I went to California
And failed,
Before I skipped back across the earth and settled for her,
And fell in love again down in the short-grass easements
Beside the alligators short-stacked in their canals;
And it should be almost over,
Because I am no longer in kindergarten; I no longer take Fieldtrips to the Flagler Art Museum:
All the time travels are over, and the ladies are nakedly tired
In their bowls of framed gelatin:
Your eyes go for so many ways, so many ways back to other Countries; but I am still hungry for fried chicken
And graveyards:
Still hungry for other women who just the same care even less for
Me-
And I will follow their sashayed skirts, into the past and in the future;
Across the stagnant traffics and orange groves,
And spikenard and airplants bloom red pistilled under the bulbous
Plumes of farting commercial airlines,
Some you will see going along the same lines across the cerulean
Blanket which covers both you and me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Chance Return Of A Princess

You will get nothing from me,
But we can go out together and try to forgive
Each other through out the day:
Here the dogs are leaping over the fires
That I think your little boy has started,
Where his spokes were thrown into the pornographies,
And the dwarves rode the tortoises into
The cool shade underneath the broken down
School buses, and thought of her:
And though of her, while their insouciant mounts
Ate the orchids in the oil slicks
And happened to do exercises on the possibilities
Of Ganymede until at least school was Over-
And the cheerleaders did pinwheels home, over
The bridges and the hidden prizes
Of the trolls, and then once again in
The cooled theatres of their bedrooms, took off
Themselves,
And wandered of the stranger flowers that use to Grow in the penumbras of their poor childhoods,
While the toads sang pell-mell against the rebar,
Like princess lamenting the blindness of their senses,
Awaiting the chance return of a princess that had Shot herself like a bottle rocket across the impassible
Canal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Changeless Show

If today was yesterday, was a year, a decade:
Zeno would still be sitting in the kitchen,
Sharing lightweight conversation with your mother:
The laundry would still be churning like
A Cyborg's hungry stomach,
And indefinitely you would be the same,
The same, as the presocratic philosophers would tell you
Crowding your living room, watching daytime soap operas:
Their words would make a hutch out of
Your skull, a domesticated nervousness,
A clone of your inner child opening your Presents on Christmas Morning,
Caressing your father's beard and smelling his Potent flatulence:
All the same- the large house in the cypress
Down the road from the zoo is still there,
And the prehistoric alligator is in the very same canal.
The lions' mating roars cupped in the porcelain
Ears of the Naiad in the torpid green;
She still goes unseen and maidenly through the briny slow:
The gated communities with their stuffed heads,
The tubby lawyers on the back nine with their daytime broads:
You see it all, and you've seen it all before-
Every year more and more of the changeless show:
You want to love her, and she wants to love you,
The girl in kindergarten whose lips changed
Into butterfly wings, and the sun into a ripe pineapple,
The girl you never knew, you will never know,
The buxom ingénue of the after school bus ride home:
The last look of a decade ago, and then the changeless distance.
The uncertainty of the fixation of her adolescent iris-
Even if all the clocks committed suicide, it would not change.

Robert Rorabeck

The Changing Instrument Of A Woman's Metamorphosis

You cannot say that
You were not once my instrument—
Fitting into my hands,
My intimate plough—
Did we not work together,
The sky laying out in blue velvet curtains
Watching us,
On those strange and eerie fields
We lived together in after high school
And before adulthood? Those small
And frightened fields hidden in the Violet Forest,
In the rich land where collects god tears
Cascading down from the mountain,
The coal black and onyx mountain
That I sometimes heard call my name,
As you rested away in the shed—
Heartbreak pooled and gave us life—
For a little while sustaining us on those Green shoots, the rustling stalks which Spoke sometimes dreams peaking out
Between the rows, little ghost children
Running against your coppery legs,
Running against our flesh like tiny pale flowers
Peeking up at us—
We thought we were safe,
But we did not see the wolves in the forest—
And I did not know what you were—Changed, a professional woman leaping
From my hands in a blue buttoned suit,
The wolves took you in their teeth
And disappeared, as if you were a precious necklace
Hung down from their jaws—
I wept and let the fields grow fallow.
Far away, I could hear you changing into
The distant crystal things, the wolves' howl
In the crimson ankled city where I imagined you:

A marble vase filling up, a kitchen appliance,
A soft satin sheet curled up and waiting,
A lamp by which another man read—
I could no longer feel you in my hands—
A dragon killed my friends so I planted them
In our field with the tooth of the serpent I slew,
But they did not grow back
And you did not return to collect in me—
You had changed so much, so many times,
You had forgotten what you once were in my hands—
Tortured, I could still feel your handle in them, panting and curled,
But I could not stay— My soul left, drifted upwards
In the lonely mountain where it pined
As lightning stripped the horizon in electric briars—
My tears rolled
Down the midnight slopes and pool in the valley beneath,
So the forest rose up and reclaimed our land
So no one remembered, though my tears come still Down from the dark and lonely mountain,
A river running lost over the empty land,
Losing itself to evaporate at the shore of the desert
Where the forest ends—On the horizon, the clanging
City in metallic bloom, where you work now,
A foreign instrument, new technology,
Useful only in his professional hands....

Robert Rorabeck

The Characters Of The Heroes

Aggrandizing- vermilion,
And now the swans come, singing over
The trailer parks where you
Live in your brown skin- and your man,
Hung like a delicate wreck
Underneath the graveyards where all of
Our grandmothers live:
And the fabulous stars. See how they are dancing-
Volumes of them:
And your aunts in those hills, bosoms diademed
With the spikes of flinted arrow-heads:
See their monuments in the red diamonds
Of national monuments and
Baseball fields- see how you will forget me,
As the ants congregate in the churches
Of grass:
And, maybe- sometimes, you will come out
Barefooted in your little world,
Carrying around your beautiful rivers, the gold
I have given you-
And looking up, curse the gods and their Propositions for the characters of the heroes they have Given you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Charade Of Their Tears

Adolescent tears stolen to the ravaged
Cheeks of crocodiles:
Look how they are smiling, slanted on the bank:
The whole classroom is smiling,
Even though there are no windows,
Or roses on my desk:
This is the time they are in now, pretty finks
Like adolescent jasmine:
They will bloom like canaries into the carnival,
And then they will disappear-
The metamorphosis of the juvenile stations,
Captains of their bedrooms,
Matriculating; but what will they change into:
What hope do they have
With their ships melting- or, who will they hold Hands with-
Will they ever make it outdoors to see has
The charade of their tears,
To see who blooming for them ceaselessly-
The emotional clock that makes no room for Tardiness- and he is smiling,
And shedding their tears, though their hours are Still so young.

Robert Rorabeck

The Chattel Of Her Missionless Love

It hurts now to trouble myself
As the day is gone, and most of the lights are out,
Giving my shadow less definitions to be lonely,
But here she is drinking my liquors like a faithful Cadillac
Mortgaged of bruises,
Until the bottle is at a loss and seems to whistle at the Bus stop empty of ships;
And I cradle my own head as she pantomimes on into Dusk,
And the playgrounds wait for me, smirking,
Figuring that it is better to have fun without her,
As she skips so straight across the puddles of my reflections,
The mirages my tears have been making,
Giving up my secrets until they are the chattel of her mission less
Loves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cheapest Rum In The Store

I like to buy the cheapest rum in the store,
Is what I told her,
But there was no special meaning when
I took the liquor in between the money
Behind the tent, behind the car:

She was already pregnant,
And these are the things I mean going out
To get the groceries along the ancient,
Torpido highway—frequented only by tumbleweeds,

When there is nothing left in the house,
And high across they have built swifter intestates:
When I should be moving away from the indecision,
My father's recklessness, his faith and determination
To give up on all things,

And I say all of this before I have by first shot,
And when I do it welcomingly burns—
To let me know that I am not yet in a coffin,
And outside there are so many creatures with Nothing to fear, because we are sure it should Never flood again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cherry Tree

So long- the pageantry of airplanes fare-
Going into those ballrooms of eventual catastrophe,
As I saw her through the looking glass,
Kissing a man who was a spider in a kaleidoscope of
All of his elbows,
And I became all of a womb undone by her
Family- and a scar in the bright Pharisees that lap
Against the emptiness they have left in their Classes,
And this is my new song to no one underneath
The cherry tree that never blooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Child Of Her Unfamiliar Seed

I take another shot,
As I mean to lay out an entire chorus line of Cheap girls tonight-
I keep cramming Baudelaire, trying to figure out
How he grew such beautiful gardens from Corpses; my attempts are awful,
And I can't wait for Halloween to truly worship
The pantheisms of her mountains,
To hide my scars from her in the far corner of the Room scribbling trees:
I daydream with devils that she knows this, that she Reads the creases of my seams,
That her mind happens upon my soul while nursing
The child of her unfamiliar seed:
And oh, I love her: I love her, lost in the deepening Tide, the lifeguard caressing the foreplays
Of other familiar barmaids; and it is the very bitter
End for me:
She is driving away in her car. The children, having discovered
The treasure, pile into her back seat smelling like Sea salt and spikenard- and they go this way through the Rich tunnels dynamited, blasted into mountains,
And I am left with Baudelaire, swimming like a curse,
Tipping back his glass and laughing at me in the same motion,
Finding it so easy to proceed comfortably floating in his Spotless immortality in the same instant which I can
No longer survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Child Of My Tongue

Let us explore across the canal now:
The places you never thought to go,
Holding his hand, entranced by his salesman's eye,
Skipping through the social avenues
So easily walked down:
Humming the cursory aplomb-
There is only a pittance in a trance
That way, only a fraud of a family's name:
If you will not come with me willingly,
I will kidnap you in a tangle of lips,
A shackle of blood-filled groins:
I will carry you cross the back of the crocodile:
Singing to you the folklore's rainy rhymes.
After you have swooned,
I will not hide the lightning-scarred face:
I will kiss you full bore even as you sleep,
And slip into you as a dream,
My bare feet the only trail to your Restive tomb: Over the ditches we go,
Amidst the depressed cypress-
Here the unrevenged ghost sing the echoing,
A caravan of my feet,
And your heart's patter through the Underage storm: Tonight your neck
Is an opal psalm, reflecting the comet's riding,
And you might look upward once
As the thunderheads mosh- Then
You will cry my name as an epitaph of love
Amidst the fine red holly in the swamp:
You will come to see the doldrums divide the sky,
Like the suburban avenues destroyed by time
And hold upon my neck like a child on a cliff,
But I will not forgive you:
I will mute you with a kiss,
As you close your eyes ashamed that
You could have strayed so far from
My effortless love:
I will put you down in the mud,
And change you into the child of my tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

The Children Of Crystal

Lets hide in the snow with the children
Of crystal because there are games only they can know;
They are as white as we should be, when we are Dead,
And the door is open and coughing in snow,
And we should like to learn all the words there ought to'
Be for snow,
And the children know;
So leave your warm and plumbed bed,
And come with me outside, a cold rind crystallizing in Your head,
Through the amber passageways overhead that the Scientists just invented,
But we should go all the way past them:
All the way past our village and along the footpaths the Wolves like to know,
And find our way holding hands, deep in the dreamy ways
Of the speechless crooked woods,
To kiss and play with our playmates of crystal,
To finally lie down in our ultimate beds in the snow,
A place so secret not even the owls know,
In the playgrounds of the children of crystal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Children Of These Things

A toy with gears, the day winds up in a game:
After two walks, and the moon is out; my dog lies
Down at my feet,
And I drink without interruptions- Perhaps my Adonis Palm is dying in the tiny back yard beneath the Mango tree,
And the green stalks of the fish-tale palm's waterfall,
That Alma looked up into a week or two ago,
And said, how beautiful- this little space of land
Of five rooms where even the cockroaches
Seem to have hearts,
And the fleas tickle like mermaids- and the girls never Come over, they just ride their bicycles and Skin their knees over the lawns,
So even when their mothers lose their favorite children
They remain just as beautiful- pearls and Oxnard
Damming their hearts- little birds
Blue tears stolen to fit in there- outside the windows
And the hedge of ixora, a chorus of engineers
Sings of a flood- and the rattlesnakes boil out of the Earth,
Kissing and playing their instruments as the children of These things go away again to school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Children They Have Made

Cleverness of growing
Things,
Taking out spindles to
Find what they need,
Making a play of their Bodies upwards
Towards the warm pools
Floating in the air,
Becoming tall, and
Gorgeous and proud
With the airplanes
Looking down like kind
Fathers over
The children they have
Made.

Robert Rorabeck

The Choirs Of Angelic Gutters

Going this way,
I really want to be beautiful, admired
And hung from galleries in flattering fame;
Or, to discover words the hit their mark and Sink like arrows,
Like a necklace of grinning alligators tossed into
The over-blooming park:
This is the way we should come, ostracized
Yet beating from the pep rally royally bruised and Wearing our own colors:
Kissing and crawling like overly sated bees all over
You mother when you weren't looking,
Giving the divine privilege to do, the correct change
And the correct adjectives to describe the smell
Of steadily pattering rains
On corrugated metals and other malleable things,
Like dreams of the homeless men orgasming in their Effluvious gutters, the metamorphoses of inalienable
Things, backed up and shoeless with their homes,
Going down by the ways of their steadily tearful streams,
Paper boats folded up by geishas and pressed lovingly
By your churches, the choirs of angelic gutters,
Going this away, attribute to the sea;
And in the morning they have sung all their mute secrets
Into the ears who were busily dreaming yet of the gardens
Their souls had dressed up and asked dates to,
The indescribable ballrooms they would have liked to out of Insatiable habits attend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Christian Names

The night is a cattle call: buzzards counting sheep
In the humid estuaries where grandmothers finally found
Their lost loves,
And swam, and swam with him while the train divided beneath
The overpasses everything that was equally lost,
Until the cars passed, and talked on to themselves,
And the wayward butterflies finally found the sea,
Which was what they always supposed that they should Always be doing;
And they never got on the bus again, but stole stuff that never Should have belonged to them,
And sang their songs like fire light talking to the enraptured lips
Of genies, while the lousiest of lions pillaged off into sleep,
And the treasures sips sunk and sunk seven times the Depths that even the most heartily vested angels could dive
Into the sea,
Until you awakened one morning, swinging in my arms,
And found that everything was safe, even though you had forgotten
The Christian names of all of those important things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Christmases Of Your Innocence's

You've been dicking around with those horses
Of those daydreams that used to be stars—
And I wish that I felt alright in my amusement park
Of my new wife—
While the waves echo like glasses of drunken
Words underneath the airplanes—
And there isn't anyone else to help you—
But now the mountains look so clean—
They have been speaking forever—waiting for the Flowers to grow across their bosoms like
Honeymoons in the spring—
The girls that you once knew who used to shoplift,
Who used to strut out on the patio in the middle Of the day—smiling and gleaming sensuous while
You lit off bottle rockets and learned how to spell—
And the moon spun around and around—
Like a mixing machine,
While the Christmases of your innocence's happened and fell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Churches Of The Skies

Gift of rainbows hear me now—I am in a place that once was Not so far away—heavenly knights have fallen all a-tangle Crisscrossed into the man-eating jungle of their Absent-minded displays—
You can even see them there while you are eating dinner
And picking your teeth,
And talking to your Chinese wife—while a boy more beautiful
Than you are reads every poem—
In your dreams, then, super heroes as bright and as tiny as Diamonds roam the neighborhoods of homeopathic
Equinox, collecting the rewards
That cannot hurt a fly—and beneath your house a labyrinth
Awakens—filled with the forget-me-nots of plastic Christmases—
Just as the airplanes overspill the churches of the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Citrus Tree

Crippled men who leave no echoes' who go into their own
Houses or storm away'
They petted the mane of the horse's once,
Far underneath the storms of the mountains
As the buses received a new coat of cowardly paint'
And the butterflies were kissed
By the yellow jackets in the grasses,
And the prettiest girls turned around and around'
Until, in the night, the lovers shocked themselves,
And lightning flashed across the doorjambs of the carport,
As the frogs sang of princes,
And the thief who stole nothing from be took shelter
Up in the citrus tree,
Filled with little blooms like apathetic corsages'and stretched Himself out like a serpent, waiting
For what was left of heaven to openly chastise me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Civilization Of Juno's Appreciative Virtues

Pretend to spill wine from your absence:
Because I am dead, I cannot taste but recommend
Its bouquet just to please you,
To let you pass through time with your jingling
Knights, embossed inheritors who can play
The guitar who like the pornography and cigars
You buy for them:
After I have helped you move into a new ghetto,
Lay me down here beside absent girlfriends and Say, this is the coffin I scavenged for you where you
Will live;
And nothing will call, and nothing you've created
In sloppy reverence for the superficiality of my Bosom will be recognized or will sell;
And you are drunk- you are always drunk and Getting ticketed, even on your mythological bicycles;
And a girl can only drink one or two poems,
Before dehydrating on the failed lucidity, like trying
To survive down in the esoteric creek beds of Utah- And lay into him, hard and untruthful, even if He is your girlfriend's man, which I have surmised
From my constant telegraphy and seven dollar rums:
They still card me out here in the worthless desert,
The cannibalistic blue jays and the mothers who will not Sell; and it is a funny, murderous thing- How I have Spent myself into your unappreciative vases, because I thought I recognized your naked virtues in an oil painting
I happened upon in kindergarten, which made me lost,
Just as I am losing myself again stumbling through the Trailer parks and happening upon the weedy train tracks
Where you've long since passed with your favorite dogs,
And your favorite men, with the same impossibility of Happening up the civilization of Juno's appreciative Virtues, either way I chance.

Robert Rorabeck

The Classroom Where The Cenotaphs Exist

Stones skipping in the skull of echoes
This is the classroom where the cenotaphs exist:
This is where I am anyway
Figuring out, while the yard grows
And your children grow, while you fall out of Love with me in this spot: but the word of My soul is not my own plagiarisms
Of true love, and this is for you
Written and sent without a thought, as your Walk across the world in your brown limbs
Tasting of the emptiness I gladly left for you
For you are my muse fresh from the kilns of Sunlight, and this is how you belong
Molded from the echoes the surround
The playgrounds of your being
As gardens inhabit the butterfly

Robert Rorabeck

The Classrooms Of Their Households

Glaciers of an evaporating school yard—
Thoughts of rabbits and working girls disappeared amongst the roses—
And silent boys in the middle of their classes—
Glowing—feeling their own armpits sweating in their perpendicular rows:
What will awaken tomorrow but the spikenard of gumshoe
Gambits—each field a classroom of pestilent daycare—
Each joy in the kaleidoscope from the windows of an airplane—
And the moonbeams looking up and up—
Pulling the slendered shoulders of the marionettes—some of them
Homo sapiens, others the trigger fish of drive in movie
Theatres—as the weekend grows over the commercials of its Resolution—and girls get up just as beautiful day—
Fading into the echoes of mailboxes—perfumes the spread from
The classrooms of their households—
Until all of their tender evaporated exist underneath one sky—
Until that too is gone, as the football players leave their field,
As the song birds abandon their songs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Clear Blue Sky

I want to flatter myself until I'm dead,
And raise up gray-haired Lazarus
And thank the Lord,
And scratch my pen:
Realize now what the dawn really is,
A commercial for a tipping glass,
Her eyes are lazy and casting shadows
Quietly dancing above the grass:
And I can't really say why I do this,
Why I down another one,
Why I haven't been in bed with a woman
Since the distant past:
Its not scholarly, its not even healthy;
And its no use:
I'll move away. I'll flip burgers, I'll mow
The yard and then bow to my insouciant audience
Keeping all the words I know scribbled on a
Napkin and I'll use it to wipe off the humid
Glances the housewives give slanting halfway down
Their porcelain abutments:
I don't know why I do this; its not even a choice,
And I'll admit this while staring straight at you,
Because I figure its you who really knows why
And then the sun lights up and f$cks the clear
Blue sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Clear Evidence

Recoiled like a serpent after his spring:
After whispering of the wisdom of her sexes in her ear,
And making her eat that thing,
Causing the burning planes of summer, for her young and less than Wise gods to evaporate and disappear:
To smack dab her like a porcelain doll into my cerulean plane of
A bed with springs,
And to allow me to make love to her even though she was already Spoken for:
It gave her the canine tooth of wisdom, and made her sweeter:
She is still my brown sugar
Even though she can not leave her yesterdays of Mexico:
All the education of Alma's soul across the seesawing aridity
Of the state of Guerrero,
Like a castanet cast candidly between the extended bellies of a gulf
And a sea:
And now she has hernia, and I don't know if we can ever make love
Again, but I spill for her anyways-
I kiss all of the newborn terrapin trying to escape the burning letters
Of the beach, as if they were soldiers of fetlocked unicorns
Retreating into the over spilling goblet of a vengeful king
Crying in them the promises that kidnapped them
From the forest of their immortal spells,
And put them like marionettes under my fingerprints, leaving after them
The clear evidence of all of my crimes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Closing Times That Are Never Heard

There you are, diving in the fashion of your choices,
Each of you sharpened into a weapon or
A tool,
Feathered, and going down: you can swim to the bottom of The earth and rise up again;
While I have been doing this for so long, catching blue gills
And swinging them around
Like breathless girls out at prom,
Until finally the shady trees slip across the sea:
They form tiny bridges that sparkle under the tenements
For you, for me;
And the world goes round, spreading the happenstances of daylight:
My sisters move in Phoenix,
Some lion yawns, and the tourists are always jubilant, while Alma is going to lie down in a bed that she shares
With him: he probably doesn't even exist, but he is there,
While each little voice that I print to no one crawls out and Tries to live for a few seconds across the sandy playgrounds
Deeply into the closing times that are never heard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Clothing Of A World We Cannot See

Ended by rows of epitaphs half naked with vulgar
Roses-
Even the prostitutes have given up beneath a vermilion
Curtain up above that is Never opening;
But wonderful complexions without any color,
Life infants underneath the stones of their roods,
With elaborate nakedness behind the closed windows of shops:
And you right here,
Breathing against me before church- and yet nowhere discernable;
Not worried upon- like something that goes missing
But stays found:
And I can hear your daughter laughing as I give all of my promises
Over to you,
And you run your brown hands under the faucet in another
House somewhere near here
Which echoes like the traffic of honey sucking birds:
And I and the fox and his friends cock heads to listen,
As you take off the clothing of a world we cannot see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Color Green

With symbols and bouts of glory cast your doom-
Foray out into enterprise,
Where the cats are expressing like horny violins
The things they say atop of Fences to little boys looking up at the moon
And her window
Up a hill, a long ways off where the shadows are Exercising
And taking the low dip kisses of airplanes- wetting their Wings on the sea
Where I put you against the beautiful corners of Torpedoes and
Christmas trees- underneath all of those promises of Your unlucky father in the stars:
And further away, where the gods are growing fruit
And smoking weather fronts that hide their adulteries
Like the way birthday cake can hide the color green.

Robert Rorabeck

The Color Of An Ambiguous Moon

Rounding the bases of marbles,
As if we were small children in a kaleidoscope again:
What a mess,
Our knees and lips wanting to elope,
Flames and paper weights in our hair; and turning around,
Realizing the pets that once loved us-
And that we loved, were being set free, but there was so
Many of them it was an uncountable deluge
Which made us heartbroken, watching them disappearing
Into the cracks without any names- and further Away- even further away than this,
The girls that we once said we loved, before we left
Them to sell fireworks- there they were kissing new shadows,
Turning around in a zoetrope the size of a lost
Penny with a patina the color of an ambiguous moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Color Of Your Comely Blood

I will get married and Bare propitious children who will make
Sport of the sea,
And they will laugh at you and the way you
Once made beautiful flirtations with
My mind,
The way the sun winks like a glowing seizure
Down through parts of the forest;
And when you come with your walking stick
And breasts to pray at my grave under
The color of your comely blood,
They will swoop down from their tree forts
And beat you with sticks,
And kiln you with hot mud- cause you wasn't
Their mother,
And you never was.

Robert Rorabeck

The Color Of Your Eyes

Boldest lies, you are telling a fanciful truth,
Fitful of wildflowers in the dells of your gold, and our aunt went
To Miami today and bought us two Virginsitas of white gold that I will have to pay for,
But that's okay:
You came over to my house and we made love,
And love, and love; and I finally felt what it was like to be A Mexican in the sort of heat that only your Country knows; so nothing in my white washed schools could Prepare me for this,
Though all of my previous girlfriends melt away,
And I go laughing into your homeless forts above the orange groves
Where the laborers are spitting sangria,
And the blue birds emote carnivorously, but not a single one of Them has met the color of your eyes,
Though today that color was all over me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Colors Of Our Throats

Little squalls of luxury looking over the Riverbanks,
New careless words birthed from the furrowed
Lips of the forest besides
The university- it is where I go,
Where there are no gravestones, only sticks,
And the weather beats-
And the movies are hamstrung,
And I respect her now, because this is her
Exit, sweltering, made to lush,
And we are moving towards her before
Sunlight while she is probably sleeping with
Her favorite echo of a man:
We smell like an old gas station, like otters
After a certainly lugubrious lunch
Of clams and housewives-
The bicycles beneath them like overused dimes
In a freshwater wishing well:
We leap over them to get to her, our joyful,
Mouth less friends,
Even though she doesn't not the colors our Throats have grown with her songs,
Because she is not happy to see us.

Robert Rorabeck

The Colors Of This Thievery

Daycare underneath the swing sets—knowing all
Of the colors of this thievery:
Only one or two words found out so far,
But there will be school tomorrow across the highway—
Not far from anywhere—
And you will come outside of your house and look
Across at the orchards,
Or up to the apoplexies of skies not too far from
The power-lines anyways—
And not pretend to wonder what it means
To be in-love,
You are not so confused with the goings on:
Mestizo—as it is your right to be:
Child of conquistador and Indian—product of Rape anyways—
No wonder how it was that you had no problem
Coming up to my door—
There might have been blue feathers in your hair—
And I thought we made love,
But you were too busied to stay inside—
And so you went home to the man you've had two children
With even though you do not love him anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Colors Of Your Soul

I've even been up in the fanfare of markets
Above the tree lines of your beauty and of your
Flea markets:
I've sauntered up in the mineral ways, while cursing
The sun like looking in your eyes,
And remembering the way down through my Hallucinations,
Following the shed horns of elk like bred crumbs
Through a tree less forest-
Like an instrument that plays the sweet sound of Your soul through this insurmountable pain-
As if I found the only firework in the world
That blazed for a moment with the colors of your Soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Comatose Heavens

Your house looks like a daydream of simple structures:
In fact, I remember vomiting in the wishing wells of Your mall—fouling up all of your establishing compliments
Kitty-corner to the bookstore
Where I bought all of the pulp fiction, and waited
For the pet fish to fall in love with the heavens:
And you grew up—and grew up to emerge to love the World—a cheerleader in love with football—
A metamorphosis of the carport and echinopsis—
Don't you ever wonder of the everyday beauty of the landscaping
Just outside of your door—Privileged youth
Everyday beauty and commonly named princess: your future
A spotlight upon the comatose heavens—and the otters
Swim and swim, making a luxurious delight for the feral boys
Who are utterly outside your realm of chances.

Robert Rorabeck

The Combined Hallucinations

And a new sunshine—
And a new pair of skates:
And a new way to live underneath the chinaberry trees:
While we are displaced from ourselves,
And our houses tend to wonder upon their preternatural
Journeys—
Until their shallow roots are given the rebirths of Their new meanings—
And the hummingbirds team and team just to be here—
As we are all parceled off
Into the shoulders of the Christmas trees
That we could not pretend to sell—and we
Are just here or there—
As sunlight flits and dies across the canal,
Until all of the whole world is just sold out—
And you cannot but keep to your own
Slumber—
And the beautiful innocence comes at its own price—
As the daylight we have once seen will have to shoulder
The entire world—
And there is the measure of your beauty—
Wild and wicked and at the edge of a pitchfork of a waterfall—
And into its beautiful amusements surrenders—
The unconscious joys of all of its loins—
A valley side of windmills—the combined hallucinations of All of our joys.

Robert Rorabeck

The Combustive Valentine Along In The Gutter Of The Busy Curb

Crown me in scars, in rainstorms,
The abusive clichés,
Give me my rounds, my sweet bruises,
My misspellings,
My pugilistic kisses- sweeten the Pounds,
Drive around in your cars for an hour
Of sacrifices,
Look at me broken down beneath the Pillars of your high highway;
I tend to lie back this way in the broken
Glass of saints, the distraught paint,
The gardens of unending cemeteries:
Make love to him, and breathe the meanings
You give to yourselves along the wires;
Swing the rusted hinges, the beautiful compressions,
An entire salty wildlife in a certain geological Position burning the body's gravity;
It doesn't matter how you tap out, the telegraphs
Of your bones, the censers of spinal cords
Like jublations going on a smoky swing set up and Down-
I want such immortal wreckage left out like
Soggy breadcrumbs along the slope of Calvary;
And if the ravenous anonymity should break through the clouds like
A new wound and find me,
I will like a perfect invalid await your venomous manna
To fly to my bones, your heavenly forgetfulness to Immolate me,
The discarded cremation, the combustive valentine along
In the gutter of the busy curb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Commerce Of Life's Progressing

On the other part of the world people
Are getting up, yawning like daffodils ruffled by
The hyperventilating winds against the highways,
Like silken gypsies spread, beautifully valiant people
I will never see; for I am going down into the Deep basement with the waitresses and yawning bartenders,
For now it is our time to sleep, curl up like a litter of Puppies for sooty firemen: Though I will not hold hands
With them tonight, nor ever, their silence blares like
The true warmth of a Christmas hearth,
And from here, when my pillow lisps my ear and dreams,
I can say that it is her chest beating like the clock inside
A fairytale's crocodile: And every bit of her is never, never Land full of little boys she refuses to serve another dream from
The reservoirs of powdery bosom: How so I see her
There in the beady drapes of the lurid willow's frown:
An Indian princess, an unsolvable crux- Just the timeless
Muse with scabby knees and chewing gum, a Tom Boy
Who has hidden my love letters in the hollow knot, and gone
Into hibernation with another man sweating away her deciduous Cycles in a beautiful, unrepeated constellation- Though
I will surely see her again in the brilliance of shadow less morning,
The park wearing a green dress, as I arc over her swinging
With rested attempts, each thing she wears like rivers beneath
My migrations, the commerce of life's progressing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Commercials Of Love

Yellow house, and turtle dove:
And body of man who very seldom is ever even there:
But you are there, as the waves whispering up
To the shore I never go to,
And the sad lawn which they have cordoned off,
And are taking down the swings of my childhood;
And the helicopters like red and yellow pearls
Cursing for their supper underneath the early moon;
As Alma is in her house, gossiping with her
Sisters,
And watching the commercials of love- feelings things
That I will not feel, but none the less shall never be Extinguished.

Robert Rorabeck

The Common Appetite

Left alone with a red ball after school,
How will I play now with the corrugations
Tinting the sky,
The cavalry of obnoxious shells the librarian
Never sees as she reprimands me for returning
Sherlock Holmes tardy, with piss stains:
They are mine because I wet my bed until I was Twelve,
And today I was rejected by the immaculate university:
The five heads came to the conclusion that I Couldn't even spell,
And they were already eager because they had Sylvia Plathe done in their oven- Neglecting to scold
Their kids, the latchkeys with green hangovers still Swinging in the park, all the pretty verbs like molting
Insects with crystalline wings, chartreuse or vermillion,
Like beer or swans, waiting for them underfoot
As they kicked in the guts of sky,
I was left alone because the principal let me go after Declaring me a misfit. I knew where I was headed:
There was slick pornography in the woods, and soldiers
Buried deep into the dunes with the real live conquistadors
And the cockleburs. The sky was already on that,
Like a dog on its murdered bones, like a maiden to her
Pilot, and I was left to my own sweet devices,
Whistling in an banished orchard,
As the world forgot to make up to me,
But somehow I managed another breath and plucked it
Gingerly to satisfy the common appetite.

Robert Rorabeck

The Common Means Of Adultery

Land may be petting the tearful comb of the stars,
Lamenting her, perpetually trying to hold the hand that
Has become a shell;
Where its corrugations are beautiful as wayside landmarks,
But no real lover is at home;
And I have been to both coasts of Florida,
And put my feet into the Pacific over a decade ago the one Night before I ran back to where I ran away from;
And tomorrow I want to sit with Kelly beside all of that Useless and frightened motion, and say with her
How beautiful is that severe upheaval of cerulean adolescents
Which cast us both so far away,
Which made me love her from fifth grade on up through
Most of high school, which made her disagree:
I want to feed her strawberries, or at least bring them to her
Under the bridge in the rain;
I want to cloud in next to her, or touch her with my eyes
Floating above my silly fibrillations, the smoke signals of my Usual organizations,
Forgetting all that we have taken unto ourselves and to Remember again the sweet young detective novels we read
Apart while I pissed my pants and drooled over the parts of her Backside other swifter footed men rounded the bases upon far sooner
Than me;
Or even now pretend she is the lost graveyard where all my derelict
Ancestors are buried, and put my hands upon them as if in Church,
Resurrecting them by the common means of adultery,
Which of course should never be allowed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Conductor

Now the night moons itself while I have been Counting perfect:
Maybe I am the perfect director for your divorce of Numbers and coelacanth,
Because otherwise f%ck these birthday wishes that
You were supposed to mean to me,
While even my brother in law was taking it easy
Before his wedding to my sister above my head:
And oh my god, he is so perfectly more beautiful man me,
But he will never be the conductor of these things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Confections Of Alcohol

Where all of the minnows go to drink
Around the knees of key deer
Until their tiny wishes sink
Under them:
Where cypress weep—where the tiniest
Boys say amen,
Sweating into their toy boats—
Kites and airplanes already stuck in the Sky—
Where their mothers go
Not knowing why—
And not a love upon this simple earth—
With nothing of knowledge shared to
Them—
They can only wander a little further—
Over another canal—
And further away from the sleeping school
Bus—
Where the sugarcane is burning—
The color of all of the confections of alcohol—
Evaporated into the ethereal midways
Like luckless goldfish un returning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Confinements Of Their Social Earth

Oh, never mind the broken words of Siamese twins—
I just want to check out the layout of
The sun,
And lie there, as the beach engorges
The world as
You know it will—
As pretty girls are passing by, willing to
To look up at the angels who Belong on Christmas trees
Now that the summer is almost Over and the daylight is gone from
The housewife's eyes,
As if the fireworks they had spent too much Money on had
Fled the confinements of their social Earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Conjuring Dance Of The Dust Devils' Ballet

Out on the dusty field,
After the finish of the game, the pack-up
And movement of the rusting carnival
A long ways down the night's road,
The empty-naked bodies are turning themselves
Around,
Humans and horses,
Lucky wives and misshapen inebriates,
They are something alike,
Compound adjectives of field and class,
The worm's disease through the harpsichord cages
Of the empirical game;
Roses curling yet healthy out the wrought-iron bars
Of the cemetery's crackling window.
I recognize a lover I though I had from the snowy
Field of the television,
Just her legs reclining out from under the thunder brush-
The naked long-haired Navajos are coming with dollars bills
For the ride,
Coming up both ways along the satanic reservation.
Their eyes careening into the conjuring dance of
The dust devils' ballet;
I will not give them a ride, because my deal is over:
The tent is down, the stakes unearthed:
Its time to move on,
to take these Mexicans to the Chinese buffet.
As I leave I see
The gallinas have eaten through the chicken-wire;
But they are not hypnotized-
They are clucking down in the dry riverbed
Where Billy The Kid carved his name,
Still the youthful archaeology of the Lincoln-County War;
But the great waters are gone,
Turned into salty curbs where spilled cars lay
Overturned with red hoods like terrapins who have given
Up and now wait quietly for the circling lullabies
Of buzzards beneath strange nebulas,
While the casinos flicker on, wheels of chance turning
For all of them- The horizon green with the sick energies,

Humming to how things have moved on.

Robert Rorabeck

The Conquered Conquistador

Robert's eyes are red: he is taking off- You
Can get so much of him for free,
And the wind is a dying wife who once kissed the Upturned lips of his fingers,
But afterwards felt so guilty she went downward
To the sea's cemetery to sit in the dying caesuras;
And I've played baseball in the red diamond
Dirt
Way before high school, with no one else called out,
And the lamps were breaking,
His parents selling watermelons at the washed out
Cabaret, and girls once named Sharon could Never speak, could never sell all that they were worth
Way back in the attributing blue-greenness' of Wellington's insouciant estuaries;
Her fingers were so smooth and cool upon the wet
Clay that I wanted nothing more that to pretend to capitalize
On being her ghost, to walk out into the new disney world
She'd bake for me, and we'd set off,
Something surreal fantasy and horny, even if it wasn't Aloud, oh god, if you are or were still a good god,
And not a dentist, you'd let me; and this poem is for the Girl who tastes the grapes, who smells the unforgotten
Homesteads of my mother in Colorado; and I have failed
Her and died the conquered conquistador before the granite cross
Before there was established real estate or boys with Dreams of franchises; but I still remember how I tipped
My glass during the old school bohemian play, skipped
Across the world and defeated the cops, and thought of your Angelic bone structures, while the better muses died in South Africa, and we threw our balls, the harems of young Politicians, though I still do this for your maiden name,
Even though I am no longer foolish enough to name it after you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Conquistadors I Don'T Even Pretend To Become

Bodies growing new leafs;
It almost sounds like presents being opened:
Her eyes watching,
Have no sound, the deadly predators of her
Senses,
They work in the shadows of great stealth,
They shade under the long-stretched wings of birds
Taken down,
Who themselves have become peaceful;
And I get drunk and mop up,
Wipe the sweat off my brow,
Grow pensive;
It is almost as if I am under her kissing ball when I
Do this,
When I make time after midnight underneath the slash
Pines to talk about her,
After all my metamorphosis has reverted.
Then the moonlight of a blue moon shines on the living
And the dead alike,
And they really like it;
She probably sits atop some cinderblocks while her
City laughs,
While the children stumble through the red-bricked
Mists,
Her eyes like the sunken lime-stones of this planet
Whose senses are so much like perfumes attended and worshipped
By the conquistadors I don't even pretend to become.

Robert Rorabeck

The Constant Billboards

Hounds on a hill named Gertrude
Lassoing the last possessions that have come down
From the cross,
Hillbillies sick with oil, their dogs yammering
Of a boy named Elvis:
So this night beats its hullabaloo, through which The possums are
So cantankerous, overturning in the spumes of
That dousing earth,
Each one in a phylum of its decree, pinching and Black eyed
Smelling like jasmine and junk yards:
Serial killers who curse the long jaunts of airplanes
Like the flight plans of demigods,
And the fireworks that die, after stealing all of our money,
Memories of our patriotism
Lie in the open jaws of burry weeds,
Cenotaphs whose cathedrals the eager ants come so
Hungriily too after the soul of the earth promises them so
Softly underneath the constant billboards and after the rains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Constantly Revolving Stars

And they finally find themselves so they Say that they are here:
And Alma is probably making love with another man Tonight in a house filled with children and Good, good applesauce:
And my words aren't even an orchard, and are not Far a field from the vermilion forts with their Green, green cannons;
And they can easily be trampled upon by tourisms,
And thus forgotten:
And Mickey Mouse- but anyways, in the long run
It feels good to be alone,
Because that is the greatest way of things, for even though
They are all lined up together in similar names,
The graveyards know no revolutions,
While the cars pummel what they cannot possibly expect
To control,
The clouds finally slipping away, dispersing their illusions
Leaving only the constantly revolving stars
So happy to be where they are, fuel for wishes to which they Will long be dead before receiving.

Robert Rorabeck

The Contours Of Her Beautiful Façade

Sweet as the molasses of a sailor's rations,
The plans take their swiftest roots:
And they even now sing, driving home to their
Trailer parks hauled away beneath the pine trees
On the other side of the canal
Where rabbits talk with dogs in wonderful make
Believe;
And the kittens that you once loved return to their
French castles whose aqueducts blister like lime trees:
And they sit down beneath the clocks
And tell rude stories while kissing their paws and playing
Cards,
While out side, why, there could be just about anyone:
The hobos lumbering from the dim to the liquor store,
Rasping as unhesitatingly as the rains that pretend to
Persevere, that go down perchance equally
Dismissive along the contours of her beautiful façade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Contours Of Her Eautiful Façade

Sweet as the molasses of a sailor's rations,
The plans take their swiftest roots:
And they even now sing, driving home to their
Trailer parks hauled away beneath the pine trees
On the other side of the canal
Where rabbits talk with dogs in wonderful make
Believe;
And the kittens that you once loved return to their
French castles whose aqueducts blister like lime trees:
And they sit down beneath the clocks
And tell rude stories while kissing their paws and playing
Cards,
While out side, why, there could be just about anyone:
The hobos lumbering from the dim to the liquor store,
Rasping as unhesitatingly as the rains that pretend to
Persevere, that go down perchance equally
Dismissive along the contours of her beautiful façade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cool Death Around The Next Bend

Every day new trout come down the stream
Gossiping about death waiting around the next bend,
In the slower, speckled waters;
I let my feet drift beneath the ripples like a
Pugilist son of a gun on a smoke break,
Wanting to touch the murky sidelines of the muddy
Mothers- They go by so coolly with their shopping
Or whatever they dos- They make just as many friends
In the neighborhood of the effluvious ribbon;
And they only go in one direction, maybe even ending up
In the northern shafts of the Mississippi, always fighting
So that they spindle all their roe like pearly strings
And rosy confection; I dip my fingers in like
A little boy being naughty before dinner, and let that Glossy spume coat me pulsating like a nursery of Inanimate heartbeats beneath the deciduous canopy;
But they don't say anything of it when I eat them,
And there is nothing against god covering up the under-Developed with my tongue- He is driving in the other Direction all ready and smart to give another deposition,
Just bought a new house because it's a buyer's market;
I count how many times he's gone by without looking-
Its filled up my fingers- My toes waggle,
And the fishing mothers avoid them, making me second Guess my real reasons for being in this repose of Comfortable truancy, when I should be out raking and Hoeing; But the sun goes by never fearing the cool
Death around the next bend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cornfield's Daughter

And coral snakes are in her eyes:
My God she'll kill you
Before the sun falls-
You can leap over the canals,
Use the deadfall as bridges,
And count the nodding heads
Of lethargic crocodiles,
But she can follow you home,
Through the pines and
The owl's hooting noose:
She can slip through walls
As easily as burnished shadows
From the tanking sun,
To reclaim the stolen pennies
From the hollow tortoise,
The remote words that sleep
In balls amidst the sugarcane-
None of slept off to school,
All of your stuff on a stick
Slung over your shoulder:
You'd thought you'd slink away
The bully's grin,
Hiding in the masturbating pines,
Amidst the faded magazines,
The women of evening time;
But she saw you lazing there,
Like an engorged rattle-snake,
And now it is her time for the charm,
The kiss of the smoke rising in
The burning fields,
The tomboy's slim smile,
Her ass in a pair of tight corduroys
She gives to all the lost boys:
Her metal breasts like roofs of cars
Out in the open sky all day;
You'd thought to seize her there,
And claim a pocket's worth of Blinding gaze, but her kiss is
A coral snake biding its time;

Ringed with the luxury of unfettered poisons,
The only thing she'll give to you,
Blinking like the sun through pines;
She gives you the lasting courtship
Before you can run away,
And then she breezes there for awhile.

Robert Rorabeck

The Corpses Of The Ground

I awaken echoing bonfires—
It is a pretty sight—as it happens echoing fireside
Underneath the airplane's wings that set out for Tomorrows-
And you were right there, crowning my kings with Aces—beautiful appetite riding horses,
Looking after both of your children:
Well, then—this is just where it happened—upon
The battlefield—
Perhaps finding new friends who would last
Forever—
And I love you right now, in the middle of my quest,
With your very fine lips pressed to the very Fine drinking fountains—
And this is your bond, and this is my pledge—
And we will go on forever governing ourselves—
And in the naked light of tomorrow's Playground
I suppose that we can yet hope to find each of ourselves
Echoing in the memories that just happen to lie
Anywhere just as long as they so happen to lie above
The corpses of the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

The Corroding Pornographies

Working in a womb unseen
The sub-axis of the hub where
The unstudied hand of a poxy
Magician keeps his doves,
I live looking for you in
The imperfect and evaporating
Mirrors of puddles,
I keep looking for you
Undeveloped—
In the womb of your mother—
I want to be your jobless
Father and so soon
You will come
And I will be jobless
With just some Paper roses
To diaper you—
Can you remember my name
As I stand out in the open where
The cars drive—
As the night warms the bellies
Of potbellied snakes,
And across the street
The dunes caress the feet
Of a sneaky
Panther who in lanky sideways
Lopes across the rusting
Chassis which house
The corroding pornographies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Corsages And Cul-De-Sacs

Slipping into the palmettos like a serpent
Going to see a whore:
Underneath the open wounds of airplanes
Bathing in their two piece swimsuits:
Languishing topside of the astral planes
Using wigi boards to say I love you
To ghosts who try to tell you their names-
Inside a house of diamonds
In the eyes of the crocodile who never smiles
But ticks like a clock, giving fair warning
To prepare the boys for their bar mitzvahs
In the corsages and cul-de-sacs of their Immortality.

Robert Rorabeck

The Corsages Of The Turnstiles

First of all, the critical flowers:

Reindeer have trundled them again, and they are All over the place. I am sorry,
Their necks are all broken,
And the blue lights are out in the Catholic Church.

This night, no one is returning home:

The arrows all lay forgotten where they were Spent, unexcavated from the red tenements of Earth, but at least that means that we can make love:
While the roller coasters and the airplanes
Move further and further away,
Preoccupied by their own entertainments, and not
By what the government does to amuse itself:
While the angels have been singing
Or sucking their thumbs: and your parents have been Enjoying the limelight,
Filled with strange amusements, while the ethereal
Holidays sing to themselves through the wind tunnels-
And the waves dance up to the corsages of
The turnstiles, hoping that finally at least one amongst Them will gain his turn.

Robert Rorabeck

The Courtesy Bays

Weep in a field.

The airplanes are its flying sorority.

My wife is playing the guzheng. She wants our son to learn
The violin.

I watch a movie about Emily Dickinson.

Today it rained, hard at times and then a roar of sun-
Our air-conditioning is not cooling.

I sold 3,000 dollars today to survive and, periodically,
Become rich:

It is a nice form of revenge against no one who cares.

If there are any left-over muses,

They are comfortably married-

The pockmarking teachers and abusive faculties are retired
Or are retiring,

A tourist of Disney World scratches his armpit-

It is the only real smelling thing he will experience all day:

There is a preternatural world of has-been Indians beneath him,
Cadavers caracoled In a rotted archaeology;

While the stewardesses control the wishes of his gods-

And the heat settles across the phallic peninsulas,

Evaporating waves before they can rise:

Mermaids are getting headaches or amnesias:

It is their time of the month-

They want us to lay off:

There is Mara Largo across the courtesy bay: When nineteen, , mistaking it for the

Coral Castle, I tried to enter in

At midnight and armed guards came out of the floodlights, Guns raised.

I raised my arms and ran off.

They had moved the Coral Castle to Homestead,
Saddled against the Everglades.

This is the home we have made for ourselves:
Old Edward Lee- has given up-
His Egyptian love is hardly anymore than a curiosity:
Pythons are eating alligators in the swamp-
Strange fruit is swinging from the poplar trees- -

It is a stretch of a tropical fairytale, forever building but never Taking us above sea level:
In a make believe where societies distinguish themselves from
The proletariat behind faux gilded gates,
Gaudy facsimiles made to look like old Romany-

The palms splay to receive the heat given off from the black tops.
To the east nearby, the caesuras do their hidden things,
Hypnotizing and make us forgetful of the loves that have not returned to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cradles Of Nard

Up in the cradles of nard- up in the jubilee of
The feathers of Indian headdresses:
Taking walks in the cauldrons, following the indistinguishable
Tracks of a sky without a moon:
Without my dogs, I am wandering, and the fences are high and Low,
The seesaws just as equal and only halfway populated by
The blue squaws smoking blue wood out of their
Leathered chimneys,
Making the trees curl their leaves while ungodly faces grow
Out of their lightning stricken grandmothers:
And I think of her and saddle up as I cast my ungainly
Strides towards the graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cradles Of Nard

Up in the cradles of nard- up in the jubilee of
The feathers of Indian headdresses:
Taking walks in the cauldrons, following the indistinguishable
Tracks of a sky without a moon:
Without my dogs, I am wandering, and the fences are high and Low,
The seesaws just as equal and only halfway populated by
The blue squaws smoking blue wood out of their
Leathered chimneys,
Making the trees curl their leaves while ungodly faces grow
Out of their lightning stricken grandmothers:
And I think of her and saddle up as I cast my ungainly
Strides towards the graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Craft Of Paper Snowflakes

I share my lunch with Alma:
I follow her, and finally sit down with her anywhere:
Sometimes she says she loves me,
And sometimes she isn't sure, but her beauty reminds me
And gives me hope for a peaceable tomorrow,
As the traffic all filibusters,
The ceiling fans pirouette, the day languishing like a lost
Ship filled to the teeth with sparkling jewelry
Which calls down the gaudy angels who flit around her
Like hummingbirds at a confection of water fountains,
Like toy soldiers out in a tomboys yard
That the cicadas are humming:
Pillared by the slash pines, as if in a feral dynasty that sweats
The naked humidity, and in December knows the craft of Paper snowflakes across the wounds
That were never delivered in the first place.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crassness Of Banshees

Generally,
I've been flirting with
The crassness of
Banshees,
And it doesn't hurt to Eat fruit from
The occasional crab tree;
But she doesn't
Wan to do it all year,
Just once or twice on Sundays,
Hung over, venal holidays,
Away from her holy Father's spirit store,
Once or twice all year.

Robert Rorabeck

The Creator's Gifts

Harim Maxim
Created the machine gun
And Telsa created
His coil

The upper class created
The lower class
As God created the soil

And you are in my Mind right now
Echoing in your stilettos,
But I am doing fine
Right now
Boiling in my meadows.

Newton ate the apple
That fell from its tree
As Eve enjoyed the sin
Of man
That she gave to
You and me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Creature Most Similar To You

I can tell the legends my song
Above the honeyed wheat and waterslides:
Here is where the milkmaids lie all the way beyond their
Men,
Right down to their bones and loaded dice:
This is where their milk pails lie and are licked clean
By the industrious mice;
And I have had poems- I have had words spilled right here,
All around your mother's throat,
The woman you can never leave because she is so clearly your Family:
And you cannot join me, because you can never have too
Families Alma:
So I sell fireworks and tell you against the odd tidal waves
That I have very strong feelings for you;
And I made you tell me that you loved me today,
And I told you I wanted to get married in your church,
Which made you laugh:
The jovial laughter of your brown body like an otter in a cocoon,
A creature that is playful but never tamed;
And it is funny that I had to explain to you a couple of weeks before
Hand what an otter was, while we were holding hands.
When that is the creature most similar to you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Creatures Of My Faith

Lighted as if in the cool lights of
A pieta
Of a church where my muse goes once or Twice a year:
A voyeur in the jaundice perfume of the jasmine
She leaves,
Her body cooling itself underneath the jet streams of Airplanes:
Returning herself to her husband that she doesn't
Love,
And their apoplectic joy: their lost children
Nuzzling like ant infested roses into the armpits
Of their overgrown devotion,
While she sings songs to me in her sleep that I will Never hear,
As she herself was lost in the higher slopes
Of the receding forests I had cultivated for her
Into the creatures of my faith,
Who danced all around her, igniting themselves off
Of her infectious fires of moonlight;
And swimming again into her in her sleep even while
Her sea and sky burned.

Robert Rorabeck

The Creche Of Airplanes

The mountains now are without female hearts:
Above tree-line,
So well and empty,
With the moonlight spilling into the recesses
Of wind-abused stones;
And here I wait for her in secret meetings
Which I can never be sure they happen:
In body I am down below,
I am below traffic, below shopping malls;
But my soul-fish floats, swims,
Gurgles, runs pink gilled fibrillating around her
Naked shoulder blades-
Has things it wants to share with her-
Has things to take to her far over the wild,
Tremulous plum trees,
Over the rock gardens of captured grandmothers
Where the membranous clutches of soft-bellied
Snakes quiver;
Wants to summit with her while the other hikers are Down past the holly roosts,
Down in their cerulean tents, making love,
Afraid of bears:
Making it here atop the world looking down at the Mica-ed splash of strange, despondent cities
Where I have called her up from;
Touching my finger to the underbelly of her temple,
And around her sensuous ear,
Telling her things that would be otherwise senseless.
Now that she has come, like the metamorphosis
Of pollinated flowers into the tender fruit bowed on ever
Stem,
Weighted nearer the crèche of airplanes, throbbing
With the nectar of my wounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Creeps

I got my copper penny's worth of sex
Then I took off like a flying fish
Jumping out of the sea's butth-le lips.
I went to see the presidents,
The tin-men and the scarecrows....
In the sky so bluish,
They were all high off the gifts
The wizard gave them,
And they sang in chorus,
"Glenda was a good witch,
And an ornithologist.
She caught us in her butterfly net
And tied us up as she undressed....
Glenda was a damn good witch."

Robert Rorabeck

The Crenulated Ebullitions

Throat burns as if I've swallowed a very personal faerie;
But it is only the liquor that burns,
My throat in its veins like a dozen thorny roses,
And I could say that above my planes
The moon is waxing gibbous, because that is what it
Does
Poetically;
Just one moon like a corpse in a coffin floating like
A balloon above a tiny teal sea,
Like the stone mouth of a copper lion flowing with Water stolen from the pipes;
And there is a girl in the bath practicing swimming;
She is listening to the music of the Spanish Civil War,
The cows and poets dying;
And the water spills and caracoles her careless hinges;
And it is as if I have almost seen her before,
Before all of this study, like a sophomoric uncertainty,
The still life that is restless into her cycles of Bleeding in between the legs of frightened does
Like fish with hooks in their mouths;
And these words peel out as if in a parking lot of fireworks;
And right now there is nobody out there who thinks you
Measure up,
But you can imagine that her eyes are waiting to look up
And find you,
To raise her self from the crenulated ebullitions;
To fall into like praises like something silly though silken,
Realizing she was only a magic trick destined to return
Swiftly to that illusion before you came along
And created better lies for her, like indestructible carriages
She can now use to continue much further along.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crepuscule Of A Well Caught Picking Time

Like a hypnotized chicken, you never had a chance;
Because you may have come from old Mexico, but I escaped with My dogs from
Saint Louis, and I have read everything that Mark Twain has ever published, so I know about Satan;
And you may be sleeping with your bad man again,
But tomorrow I will buy you breakfast,
And the sun will shine and come down fine across the taxidermies of My body and my mind;
As I will lay out for you like the hypnotizing meats of a trap,
Without any stanzas or shoes on my feet:
And my unrecognized children will sing irrefutable songs to you
From the bellies of their mind,
And they will pick and pocket the illustrious fruits of those Hibernating minerals for you,
Alma; and they will swear out the custody of drunken Indians for You, and pop pop rockets from their lips,
And ride bicycles like a rodeo of witchcraft around your house
While you sleep,
Which will make you children dizzy like tourists in the Disney
World's sublime, until you finally come out naked and
With your hands up to succumb to me,
Like a luscious harvest, or the ball of a victorious game, coming
Down into the crepuscule of a well caught picking time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crepuscule Of Football Games

Transformed into
The petroglyphs
Before the songbirds who
Are out for no reason,
Dancing winged-
Songs stirred for the Absence of housewives
With no more reason to Love me;
The earth pushed a little,
Displaced from its godhoods
And toward catastrophe-
Dying a little the way the Forest of angels
Drink sea salt- talk up
A little around
Graveyards- underneath power lines-
Why the sky is all blue
A little
F$cked up- punched in the face,
Like the crepuscule of football games
And I have nothing to Remember how she feels
All asleep in his bed
While the ribald he rhyming burns-
And the roaming mouths of airplanes sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crepuscule Of Shanghai

Chartreuse savior, trinket of my eyes—
Coming to me in the crepuscule of Shanghai:
My purgatory sees its conclusion.
A knife flits like a butterfly over the flesh,
Whilst all of the species are dying—

I saw you wilting at the bus stop,
But I was not going to school.
I turned around and hid with my camouflage:
Palmettos and hollies,
A sweltering holiday with indentations
OF books lined across
Narcolepsy's flesh—

A canal dug by man sees either way:
Slow and of geometric length,
Prisms of reptiles that become destroyed
In the amphibian flecks:
Once lost to itself, a coin skips across the bank
And into someone else's pocket.

Light is a dagger to the torch's shield.
A battle upon the merry-go-round of another year—
Intrusions bloom like store-front women,
And the newborn hearts, like children, take the hand
Of the warmest kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crestfallen Baseball Games

Then we were all developed like the pornographic butterfly
Trying to make love in a bedroom in the middle of The afternoon while in the living room all that was on
Was séances of werewolves and soap operas:
But it wasn't too hard to make that lovely woman come—
She did it without any effort at all: remembering the heydays
Of her high school—and the lamps that spilled the Children out in the afternoons in some kind of cone of Their free-for-all, their eyes half blinded by the bright spots
Of the sunlight leaping over the reptiles laying across the Crestfallen baseball games-
And your mother, enjoying her weather in the swamp on This side of the blinds—knowing that all of a sudden it would Have to come back home—flooding into her,
Making her strikeout in bouquets that would eventually be Left all across her tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crippled Author Of My Old Song

The Virgin of Guadalupe is also Maria Conception,
But they are both just another two Splintered images of our Mother Mary:
Ave Maria sung through the cannibalistic dells of the Andes,
All the brightly hooded fraternities licking their chops in
The kaleidoscope of that which is a heavenly sorority:
A heavy bosomed nunnery floating down and nourishing
The heavily inbred cities in the upper basins of Peru:
Daughters looking just as beautiful as mothers, as beautiful
As girls I remember from high school:
The days too crawling up like spokes or ants of fire along
The greenish drapes that seem to plummet and Rise through the full truths of the séances of done fore airplanes;
And so this is just where I climbed up to believe in her,
To get her out of my head and see her for real and all together
On the open palette of sky:
She drove by me early in the morning like a heavy chested ` Meteor,
And she wanted to serve me breakfast as if I had awakened from the Bed of some motel, and this is what there was to eat
Downstairs in a really brilliant room:
And she comes every day if you want to see her, stepping outside
And burning; her body making the expensive movement
Of fireworks:
Then she is done and away to other gathering places of lost boys
Just at the next intersection or down the street:
Maybe her name is Diana: Maybe she can be water or trees
As well as light: I am sure she has a daughter pinwheel as she suckles
From the exposed lingerie right at her bosom:
Just as I am sure that those two, as well as her mothers,
Are far too beautiful for the crippled author of my old song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crops That Your Uncle And My Tio Attend

Bandy-legged but wearing your favorite color of Helmet with Ulysses' wings:

I float on the clouds the mariposas struggle for,
And I pay to sneak into the zoo with you Alma, last Monday,
While my parents were losing the fruiteria,
While the grand Canyon sank another foot and dreamed the Red dreams of mars:

And we kissed in the alligator's house, and I could not tell if
It shed a tear,

But the cars were very far away, and the bridge took us over
The tanning salons of the water moccasins:

And we kissed and looked at the animals and watched
The birds fly and the American girls talk about them:

It felt so very good to hold your hand and walk as far away
As we could from the failing terrain,

And watch the dreamy fish flip and fly always forwards in Their succeeding canals,

Over the crops that your uncle and my tio attends.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crowds Of Crowds

Of another day of godless beauty- of waking to
The estranged love- We can hardly even speak together,
And she is married,
But how she loves me: talent less, like that-
And I can't hardly look at myself in the mirror:
The fires run, my dog has fleas:
The traffic rushes forward, and then it rushes home.
The road is not yellow, but the road is everywhere
Attributing to the arbitraries-
And I remember who I loved, and how she went away-
Now my muse is Mexican: she has two children,
And I've kissed her mouth in the zoo:
Now I can hardly even spell, but I'll be up again-
As the fires blaze blinding the dreams of the better
Constellations,
And I'll touch her brown skin like a monarch butterfly
Discovering a fire to die in- and it will spread all around
Me, and the crowds of crowds will make good money
Off that most flammable tourism.

Robert Rorabeck

The Crownless Memories

Remembering the crownless
Memories,
The bloodstains on the ransom-
The cold filter of Death's nostrils
Over his weeping meal-
The closing eyes of a
Man intelligent enough
To know
His way is not to Heaven.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cul-De-Sacs Of Conquistadors

Epitaph means the words distilled
From the living thing—
As stone lives on,
A cenotaph upon a green field
Intersected by high ways—
The sea cranes its neck,
The otters sway inside
Of her cradles—
And the joy I had for you by myself
With my dogs
While the shadows of blind men
Whistled all around me—
And the apiaries bloomed outside
Of Disney World,
Too sweet for tourists to smell—
As we continue forward,
Banishing our wishes into
The candles that disappear after the Cake is gone—
Like towns of businesses
Or the cul-de-sacs the conquistadors
Disappeared into,
The necks of their horses blued from
The arrows quilled from Peacock feathers,
And the teal panthers kissing their Necks,
As the new world displayed itself in
The nude apertures waiting for
New inventions of motion
And sunlight
To appear after the airplanes had leapt
Across the playgrounds after the angels,
And the littlest of children
Had taken themselves indoors
Still uncertain that any of it was real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Culprits Of The Easier Earth

Suffering for years in the basins of skree
And glacier tears:
This is where the dumb dreams yawn, sour gummed through
The whispering hollies,
Too high up for cowboys ever to have been scalped here:
Here you can just hear the echoing of the Steam engines
Carrying the corpulent tourists and their irrational abounds
Between Silverton and Durango:
This is where you can never see me, striking above the Earth,
Go so high up as to meet the boot heels of insufficient gods,
And the cradles of their possibilities,
Their casting calls wide open and full of drowning outlaws,
Their keyholes fabulous and woebegone until
They are filled with light
And then that is where the feral angels live and make Choruses and smoke rings
Up to the sulfurous bellies of airplanes who seem to Be leaping on a hot, cerulean plate;
And then there are banishments with the sun going down,
And all the wistful hikers returning to the make believe of all
Their tents to be wet dreams for grizzly bears with nose bleeds:
And way up there is where the rocks and stones gossip for,
Like entire clutches of rattlesnakes
Making believe they will be birthed in a clutch of sonorous
Petrified flora,
Where even the most temporary of winds are good enough for
The hypnosis of glass blowers; and it dries my throat,
All of these metaphor-like similes,
Coming down from the trains of the hollow road, sifting down
Like the wrong way evaporations who only camp in the higher beauties;
And here they are, hardly discernable but summiting
And pointing down mightily at the culprits of the easier earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Curious Fingers Of Their Open Hands

I am unable to return the soils of these yards:
The houses sit as fat as pigs, and the sky usually tumbles;
And to the even numbers it is so much bliss,
When the cars pull in and the fingers fumble over
Their silverwares:
Then far and wide the airplanes fly over the somber facades,
And the weathers roll in as sure as curtains,
And the days bypass themselves and get even more brighter
And luxurious and full of the laziness that they are known for:
And I have seen her here sitting as still
As something that knows for sure what she is, while
The traffic moves like the cut out animals in a zoetrope,
Seeming to laugh and turn around as little children come to feed them
With the curious fingers of their open hands.

Robert Rorabeck

The Cursory Beauty

I have those dreams too- Of dancing with a
Gun atop of my head
In the foreground of the dry husk of a lighthouse,
Like a young wife who has given up in her
Prime,
And let in other wolves: you know their types;
And letting the forest walk closer
All filled with the gossip of carnivorous flowers
And the matinees of
Their rosy carnage who grow full blown like overweight
Corsages right through the cannibalistic pyramids
Piled up of Conquistadors, in a cenotaph of far away loved one
Right there before the endearing blue eyes of the lion
Who has crossed so many rivers to See the final sights of these men's last inclinations;
While I have worked so many graveyard shifts,
And though of you and written you down through similar Broadsides,
While she crawls into bed beside him, just like another
Wave;
And they disappear altogether with the cursory beauty
That almost would have never been written of.

Robert Rorabeck

The Curtaining Stage Of Your Amber Sky

The day unhooked from the mouth of a fish
And let her swim away;
Or it was as if first a mollusk on her china dish,
Until it too crawled away:
The light that evaporates in the tombs of your amber eyes,
Wavering like sea beds, and down there the corneas
Engorged of frightened octopus:
Looking closer amber too, the junked chassis of overturned cars,
Religious gangsters both exploded in a fight of moons:
And I drank of them like contaminated rum upheaved by Your perfumed buoys until the sky was the salvation of A chamber or a corridor where you had let your shadows
Of childhood swim,
Though the two were amber laughing like motes of downed
Things through the sky, and I followed them until I had a twin,
Both he and I continuing through the curtaining stage of your Amber sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dancers Dancing

I bought forty dollars of candles today at the supermarket
Near my historical house,
And maybe I cried for Sharon, but I don't want to think about it
Or any other white girl:
My phallus is always happy when it has time to remember how It slept with my body underneath the broken down school
Buses of our high school:
Together with the orange fields and scuppernongs of our truancies:
And now I really have something else to love,
While the bodies seem to make their way up again like wild flowers
Who have nothing else to perceive of their business expenses
And the deep intrinsic ways in which they greave,
And I have never been on a bus to Mexico, Alma, but let me go there
With you for at least a year or two,
To Guerrero to see all of your lost family, and to fly again,
While all of the copper heads are standing up and Saluting us and kissing our ankles,
Or are at least curious enough to ask us questions,
While your soul gets up and pulls my reclusive soul out from the ribs
That you stole from me,
So that in the patina of our lost orchard, we can set our selves up
As dancers: Alma, the dancers dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dancing In The Sky

I am reading old words trying
To remember where you come from,
When you pass above me once every few years—
Then the sky is a dancing ship
And your tresses are a fireworks display
Of blue palms and silver pinwheels,
And I swear then that everything is real,
Like the day before I was born when I remained
A part of you, something cooking in the sky,
And you kissed my cheek like a secret
That a mute girl tries to dance out,
Tries to sing,
But after I saw the world you were gone
And I could not speak,
And there was a great crookedness coming
From above, as if the sun was spilling out the Window of a slanted house,
But I searched for you in the garlands of heaven....
When I was ten, you came back to me
Maybe for a day you did a strip-tease
Through the clouds and I could not look away—
Pulsing like the wound in God's side,
I was sure your everything was real,
As you electrified the air so I dreamed I
Of pressing my mouth into your speech,
And tasting your moist distance,
That you might say to me and give me
New words that would cast me up into you,
But then you took a bow and left the stage,
Though I am sure I am the only one
Who saw your show— wherever you went
Is where I am now, but you did not tell me,
So I am lost and sit hypnotized near the sea,
Watching her swim,
But she is no comparison to you....

Robert Rorabeck

The Dark Migrating Fairgrounds

Every night I have to reintroduce myself again to
The somber dreams of unicorns traveling on their infinite quests;
And like your love, Alma, they aren't even real, but they Will go down forever even while the castles disappear;
And I was going to take a walk to the salvation army- and I wanted
To hold your hand at least halfway there while the traffic buzzed
And bumbled,
Even long after your two children had grown up and fed off your Breasts you are unhappy with, but I have held them,
As I have run my fingers down the slender viaducts of your ribs;
And you were made in Mexico, but you somehow made it
All the way here- and I know that inevitably you will have to Reconcile with you man, to eagerly walk away from my Frightening loneliness; but now in the night you are the only thing
That I pretend to have, and you make everything else that seems
So frightening feel almost as far away as the dark migrating fairgrounds
Of your beautiful, beautiful eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dark Theatrics Of An Overgrown Tomb

If I am good, then I am doing this:
Jarring the cages and keeping up after stags-
Their horns are worth so much powder to Blow at the races,
Corked in rinds of when they were young and
They saw through the windows an exegesis,
A ship sailing away from behind-
Under perfect cloud cover the slight womb
Vanishing in a pinprick of a sliver:
It is what they are always running over and kicking
The earth for- but she has never since been home;
She just stares at them in pretty ways from a feral
Imagination,
Impossibly hung over, drunken, lunar,
And the ceiling fans whisper the crape moths to shutter
The weathers bending liquid temples that bound
And leap as the dark theatrics of an overgrown tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Darkness Of A Vanquished Hearth

Fairgrounds of pretty hearts,
Under the ways of zephyrs I disbelieve,
That Alma has gone home with her two sisters,
And subsides:
Everything in its amusement closes shops,
The waves curl into sleep too:
The dogs and graveyards abate. The buses seem to
Roam so far away,
But they are only mirages, like the airplanes in the Sky,
As everything is taken down, as the rumors of divinity
Close into their dewy woods,
Up the lost and gossiped upon ways: the hikers disappear
Like old lovers,
Even the streams hold back their tears,
As her lips have gone from the absolved candles leaving nothing more
To kindle and stroke my wishes evaporated from the heart-
Kettled on the darkness of a vanquished hearth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Darkness Of A Vanquished Hearth'

Fairgrounds of pretty hearts,
Under the ways of zephyrs I disbelieve,
That Alma has gone home with her two sisters,
And subsides:
Everything in its amusement closes shops,
The waves curl into sleep too:
The dogs and graveyards abate. The buses seem to
Roam so far away,
But they are only mirages, like the airplanes in the Sky,
As everything is taken down, as the rumors of divinity
Close into their dewy woods,
Up the lost and gossiped upon ways: the hikers disappear
Like old lovers,
Even the streams hold back their tears,
As her lips have gone from the absolved candles leaving nothing more
To kindle and stroke my wishes evaporated from the heart-
Kettled on the darkness of a vanquished hearth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Darkness Of My World

Now the sun is falling on me
Alone in the world,
The faithful hounds at
My feet;
100 horses grazing is
My neighborhood
At 8,000 feet.

The shadows slip like
A woman's dress from
Her pining shoulders
As a cunning Indian slips
That much closer to Steal what
My father borrowed from him.

There's a wound on my face
That will not heal,
But the woman will come
Again-
Who she is I will not
Say,
But if I close my eyes
Then you will see
Her smiling brilliancy
In the darkness of my world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Darkness While The Stars Turned In

I put you down like yellow ships into Those prenatal waves,
As the long legged ivy smokes like lingerie
Along the house huddling like
A square cat up against the woods;
And I have watched you move away down stream
Like something hollow inside but beautifully
Made
While the rainstorms congratulated themselves down
The skirts of your mountains:
And you exercised your right to runaway without Looking at me until the collectors came asking for you
Their mouths just as hungry as the sharpest cutlery
Of silver wolves;
All I could do was light a match for you and wait out
The darkness while the stars turned in insouciant jubilee
And the Lady turned up again in wonderful places,
Multiplying herself for the beautifully dunned proletariat
For many more centuries even further away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dawning Of Dusk

A full day begins upon Autumn's cusp,
And the women swing back and forth in
The field, cutting the harvest of wheat
And whistling through gaps between teeth.
Their men pound away in a sibilant smithy:
They shape and yew the glowing metal
And sweat drools down their necks,
Evaporating in patches of hair as the Steam streams upwards in basins where Their craftsmanship is cooled, then varnished,
And made ready to sale:
Like the two heads of a coin, the couples
Keep by each other as the world turns
Around the axis, another month approaching Solstice. Cyclical, like a hurricane in
The gut of the Atlantic,
Coiled like a train wreck, a beheaded
Snake belly-up in the weeds, the olds
Ways slip like old men into death while they sleep,
And the gloved hand of technology begins
To drag down the once mystical night.
The stars are chained up on poles above
The workers' heads and they look up and say,
Marvelous wonder, as the city builds up in Red-bricked labyrinthine swells, the ghettos
Through the dales, and the lines of workers
Coil and coil through the honking screeching
Metallic fields in a crowded day upon Autumn's
Cusp, as the scientists discover that God
Might only exist in the mostly empty space
Inside the atom, the world spins like a dizzy
Child playing a game or falling down a well,
Approaching solstice,
The time when the day dusks before its Dawning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Day Is Make Believe

The waves seem to be learning how to fly,
Or just getting up so that they can try:
Yawning like blue eggs brought to the lips,
Overeasy breakfasts of the sun-
Bicycles sunken in their breasts- the complex jewels
That kids lose while playing-
Knees scabbed by slathering kisses, like tears
That good girls give in a swimming sorority:
Blowing kisses across a sunken street where fireworks
Are swimming on holiday;
And you have to keep your head up to see the forts
Floating up in the sky: they were made to be that way,
Like smoking from the bereaving day-
And little dead angels in those halls pinwheel in the Attractions in which they find themselves,
And laughing giddily as the soft movement is somehow Rushed through the shallows- taking your hands up to the side of The sun, because you are my muse- and
As I am watching you, that is how you learn to pray;
And the day is make-believe, and so am I.

Robert Rorabeck

The Day Like Her Own Weather

I loved another girl: in a few months I will die,
Defeat by the ordinary monsters, the same as any hero,
With no friends to resurrect from the dragon's
Fangs,
But for right now I am only here wishing and drinking
Alone,
Trying to meet my quota of ballads dreaming of a
Girl who is my life, who is my rainbow,
And my butterfly:
I have called her as such in Spanish, but she won't swallow
The homeopathy of such unrequited witchcraft,
But this is for her again, for my Alma,
Who has stolen my soul, and comes through the day like
Her own weather:
Who with any luck, I will ride bicycles with tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

The Day That Was At Hand

Great and churlish ennui this is your vision:
To be overthrown like a bird nest from a Christmas tree
In a thunderstorm:
To make love one time with a dog who is Homeless because he once stepped aside for
A terrapin going down to the water fountain for A drink:
And, yes, you remember her eyes: her eyes were hers,
Sometimes for you, sometimes for another man,
And the sun broke out of its yoke
And made a breakfast of the land-
Into some estuaries egrets flew, but they were not
The colors of your flag, and you held your Head in your hands and wept
As she drove home to the soft and cooling colors
Of another man- she slept in the fjord of
A rainstorm holding the banners
Of an overcast day- and sometimes she made love to you,
Even though you were away selling fireworks
In New Mexico, as from the ovens of her uterus
Her children grew and grew:
And they stretched arms like cedars and went to school,
And thought to plans of what they could do-
So finally she bent the stream, ran to rivers of her
Nocturnal dreams- she loved her father when he wasn't home,
But otherwise across the deserts her love roamed
Into chicken coops and spider webs,
Stealing eggs and reading dregs- as the waves
Broke and birthed her home- opened eyed, and in foamed
Perfumed- she awakened in her awakened room,
And thought of you as she kissed her man,
When out and her young brown body greeted the day
That was at hand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Daydream Of A Kidnapped Mexico

They were unsure of how beautiful they really
Were until the liquor was all gone,
And the body of my old muse was coming up browned
From her bed-
There she will awaken like a goddess over a clay earth,
Whose breasts I somehow once suckled-
That fit entirely into my oversized mouth- and who
I gave orgasms to successively in those Few afternoons, bandy-legged- the fireworks cooling
Over the earth, and her mind so far lost
Into the daydreams of a kidnapped Mexico- that for A scarce moment there was nothing that could scare her away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Daydreams Of The Sky

A fire passing through the field does not Wonder what she can yield:
The minnows' joy is eaten in the shallows
And taken to the other side of the Canal by even greater joys-
As I looked across to you in a classroom
Berthed upon adolescent light,
You made love underneath the ceiling fan
To another knight-
And the cruelty that reawakened from your Lips did its means by the highways of Buzzards until it resurrected Christmas-
And the sky flooded with Stewardesses who were heavily scarred,
As they threw their anchors down from the planes,
Weighing to the earth to sink beneath
The sailors something that was always meant
For the daydreams of the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Daylight Desires

Well, there were flowers outside
For sale,
And we moved amidst them, inhaling,
Stealing their perfume
As the bees did: this was something my Uncle couldn't save,
But he still has his unicorn in the cooler,
If you know what I mean,
As my grandfather was in his grave:
And the children who should have Been to school,
Waited underneath the overpass where
The waves yet echoed:
And in those feral voices, a song-
The memories of sirens saturated there,
And the bells and the lips
Of naiads in their hurricanes-
So the secret orchestras were sung in the Graffiti's of their overcast cathedrals,
And at night at home
Sports continued being played- the Gardens whispered,
And the family prayed- but through the daylight
Desires continued- streaking, foaming,
And answering- vibrations from extending Shadows- going to brush their lovers
Across the sea- while in their classrooms
The lost girls forgot every memory they cared to Keep of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Day's Expected Cremation

There you are in a park I cannot believe in—
New lines for the same old girls
Who have run away and abandoned—
A latchkey's words into another misused night,
The homeless traffic spilling over
The asphalt cliffs
And into a crocodile's tear—as the tourisms
Melt away—
Surcease of melting snow burning off their Engines—
Beautified renunciations—loves put to an end
At the midway of a fair—
Lonesome holidays like predators devouring
The heart's bivouacs who are Camped too near to a careless heaven—
Looking down from the keystone from where
All of the young girls have fallen—
And high school is over on the bloody streets—
Maiming the survivors—
And over them, like the pledge of allegiance—
The locus using their legs to pray—
Yellow and cerulean—
Violinists molting in the afternoon into the Day's expected cremation.

Robert Rorabeck

The Days Of Their Nights

Globe with stars and caesuras
And very little else:
Very simple world:
Child world, bring tears to my eyes,
As the busses turn around:
City underneath the sky,
City above the ground, and world
Of candy joy:
World of carousels- burning oil
Lamps like lighthouses if Sailors were eels:
Burning through the midnight
Just for the senses of werewolves,
And they hunt inside the cathedrals
Of junked cars,
Where the naked women are Bombshells- and they get up and jump
For unreal joy,
While the coral snakes curl around
The wrists of tinsel housewives;
And in their little cul-de-sacs they come
Around,
As the roses touch the lips of selkies
Who like butterflies have learned to give Birth across the winsome catastrophes
Above the opulence of the playing grounds
Where the windmills
Are their joyful mothers who blow
Out the candles of their birthdays
Just as the airplanes are ever so angelically
Touching down,
Giving their bodies to the same old toys
Across the world,
Spilling out their housewives like Diamonds, who ignite again into their very Own houses,
As once again the very own days of their Nights are touching down.

The Dead End Road Of Your Unconscious Embrace

This world concludes at three am,
The graveyard hour when hobos finally recede into Cardboard or spikenard crèches;
I don't know; but other boys are piling like dragons
Through her bedroom windows:
Just in the middle of high school and having a
Parade: Or I don't know,
Lying underneath a time share of your opulent shade:
I drink my last ration of rum, and touch my face,
And prepare to embark down the dead end road of your Unconscious embrace.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dead Ends Of The Dead-End Dungeons

At all the dead ends of the dead-end dungeons,
The dead girls are doing porn:
They are becoming the erotic photographs for all of the weirdos.
As all of the dragons are shedding their horns:

In the sky outside, so far above our heads that we can make-believe
It is all of the heavens,
There is thunder whose flinted claps spark lightning above the drunken inns,

The mermaids are canned into their fishy grottos,
The jinns are jammed into their horn-rimmed tins:

Grandmas and grandpas are sleeping in all of their graveyards
Across the highways of our lands-
The cows have crossed into their pastures,
As to Disney Worlds all of the tourists have entered in-

And it has become a hapless lightshow, jism spilled upon the paper heads
Of dead presidents:
Memories of our high schools have evaporated and are floating
Above the crowded mazes of the suburbias who have
Impregnated us with our socialized dreams:

Adam and Eve are picking strawberries from the stars,
They are an advertisement licensed by Satan to sell us the forbidden
Knowledge of so many useless things:

The keys are in their cars,
The housewives are in their kitchens, and their children
Are playing with kidnapers in their forested swings:

As the lamentations of the old gods' giants effervesce into the sky,
Causing hallucinations for the stewardesses who are working
In the airplanes that are all passing us by.

The skeletons tap-dancing on the abandoned steps,
But they are taking their time-
The emptied throats are opened, trying to imbibe
The grapes of a withered vine-

As our rhymes recall us from our windows,
Trying to transform us, into the metamorphosis after the midnights of
Our quitting times.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dead Playgrounds To The Ghosts

Boats for the dead
And reindeer passing through
The park,
Amidst the trees
Who are also for the dead, snowflakes come as if on rails-
Like the swans in driveways
They don't know where
They are going
Once the light is lost-
We get skinnier because we Don't eat dinner
As we sell Christmas trees
For the empty houses of housewives
Near the lake that is also empty
And so all of those kinds of Trees surrender
Amidst the dead playgrounds
To the ghosts
Emptying tomorrow's years.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deafening Loam

If you are washed, I will still save
You in my thoughts:
If I cannot smell you on my sleeves,
I will lush on the bereavement of such unjust
Amnesty:
As up on her hill my grandmother no longer moves,
But lies parallel with the rusting cross,
And beneath her the cars move
Like unbusied ants; and I haven't seen my dogs,
But would ask them to find her out and kiss her,
For all that is left of her is the husk of A womb,
Like tinfoil around the crust of a pie:
I would ask my dogs to kiss her, and then piss on the sky,
To mark her, to know you by;
And the tourists are leaving the funness for home;
The remains of funnel cakes on their lips,
Like fish slapping again into the residence of aquarium,
Going by with the busses of sub-truth:
I dream of you and touch myself in the cheering grayness of Suffocating youth;
And I want you again in another stanza of my poem;
And I want to see you again tomorrow, a saving light breasted Against the deafening loam.

Robert Rorabeck

The Decision For Us

Beautiful simpletons using brail until
The circus comes
Counting midnight backwards- and the clouds
Fail to tidy up or foreshadow
The sexy romance
Of airplanes entangled with Titans:
That in their bedroom of worlds above us,
They do so much nonesuch-
And the world comes down around their shoulders:
Cascades of waxy tears
Or salty candles: and we hold hands in the roses
Underneath the overpasses:
And especially on weekends, they come to Sell things from far and wide around
Us- and we get liver disease from wishing to
Be like too many pilots-
Anxious, with green ax handles, and the girls getting
Out of high school and melting around us:
Developing in the higher basins until they are Nothing more than something vermilion
In a sky of wounds- in an arcade of Perfumes and open doorways until they finally make
The decision for us to let us in or to not Let us in with their eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Decision Which Began The Natural Order Of Things

Jack was terse.
The phone rang once,
Then not again, as if it too
Was aware that she was crossing-
Her legs: Outside, the wind abated,
And the drunk on the stoop cocked his Head, as if the cobwebs had finally
Lifted, and he was forlorn,
Because he remembered her name.

And I sat there beside Jack,
Both of us watching her like cartoon
Wolves, surprised she had agreed
To meet us this way:
Something like a freshman menage au trios,
Chicken legs at the state college and bowling alley,
While the yellow bicycles lay slanted against
Each other, and her fingers drummed
Against a used introductory to physics book
My uncle had written anonymously.

Her eyes displayed an unclothed witticism,
And I thought she would have us quote Rimbaud,
Except she did not know him, herself,
Or, I suspected, had been anywhere near a Beautiful cemetery, but other than that she was
All full of antebellum bone-structures,
And would never raise a family north of the Mason-Dixon;

Jack and I were brothers,
But after that viewing everything changed,
Because one of us was certainly the victor,
He that came awash in the velveteen luxury of her
Colleen flesh- The other, it is know,
Found refuge in the bottle and the steps leading down
To where the apoplectic cats mewed beneath the windmill,

Mistaken for a shushing mother:
She did her work by the moonlight, of course,
And called up the eels, the old dredgings,
The inklings of whim that gurgle when the stars are out,
And he is sweating in the longest swaying of her
Body, the decision which began the natural order
Of things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deep And Uncertain Grottos

The traffic vibrates my house and I am working inside
Here,
Each room a different color, but like a sorority of soft sea shells
Softly panting,
And buckets of rain in the quiet places where two roofs meet
And then are forgotten:
Alma is somewhere around here, pregnant and embarrassed on her
Buses:
I sat in Alma's car a couple days ago while she kept a watch out for
Her husband,
And she asked me, why Robert, did the gringas look at her that way
Inside of her church:
Why Robert, she said my name, and there was a forest fire on A mountain:
Alma was by my house this morning, and all of the windows turned Brighter,
As she carried out her songs, and we studied for her citizenship:
I kissed her shoulder and then we drove away together, and I stopped
At the light and ran out, and Alma let me kiss her cheek:
And I think of the Virgin of Guadalupe and pray to her for Alma in the deep and uncertain grottos of my very night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deep Deep Brownness Of Your Woebegone Eyes

The bottle still fills with joy as
The lightning kicks off another show:
Alma your body grows like the righteousness of Small baby-breaths flowers above tree
Line that don't fear the snows and weathers that you have Never seen:
Alma, there is a blue lion in my black yard squatting over
The beans I had planted on your birthday,
And the rest of which I have to say has no sense, but I wished that I knew better Spanish while the blue's wetness grew the Greenness,
And I will see you and your godmother tomorrow and I will see
If she brought me a bigger and even better
Virgin of Guadalupe to adorn my home for you, to bring the thunderstorms
Of the mandevillas of your thighs,
To make you leave a man who can never love you as I can;
And to make me become a real boy underneath the very promises of the God in the deep, deep brownness of your woebegone eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deeper Meanings Of Your World

My house is filled with poison that
The cats sleep around:
I have hit the bottle and gone off to some cow
Town,
And you are in the sky right now, turning in
Some sort of constellation across the Overgrown easement of the canal:
And the words are like busloads of tourists
Traveling up the easy slopes,
Looking at all of the doe-eyed angels:
And I suppose it is something really great,
That I graduated high school,
That I had some pie and saw Sharon in the hallway
Long before I saw you,
Alma:
That was when the students were kissing and even then
Dreaming of professions or the jingoistic
Hopalongs of a military band:
You were still in Guerrero Mexico, talking with your Hands,
And you hadn't looked up into the colors of my flag,
And the flowers burned underneath your bed:
And maybe it is that tomorrow is the last tomorrow
That I will see you in,
Or that I can fall to my knees and kiss and bless you in;
And the clouds color in like tourists
Above the sea the happenstance of their whimsy:
And all night long at the movies above tree
Line I think of you and pray to the virgin for you,
And color my skin
And look at the green things of this world who happen to Be your favorites,
Some of them who are most like me and cloistered to the Carports
You have neither seen nor heard; but here is where they love
You the best, while the washing machines yearn,
And the doleful eyes of innocents look up and try to Contemplating the deeper meanings of your world.

The Deepest And Most Far Fetched

The nights burn the passerby's of jasmine
And the defunct knights touch themselves and ejaculate:
And I am not even the postman: I can still feel my toes
As I fail to enunciate:
And I have never been so fanciful as to believe in Atlantic,
And so far alone at night I touch myself,
While I still believe in each unhindered wave of the fairytale sea,
But all of the rest of it sleeps by its side as
The dogs wail,
While the mountains crumble,
And while my unutterable fairytales slip like fateful bottles
Into the most impenetrable of the deepest and most far fetched
F$cking seas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deepest Places Whose Echoes Are My Own

All the good deeds you won't have to worry about,
Because I am going down into another sleep:
In the valleys of forget-me-nots where the grandest dragons
Tell lies
Into our ears when we are alone; and he is beside you there,
Like a skeleton in his coffin, like a king on his throne;
And your family is in a house of another world sharing Flowers over dead grandmothers left back in Mexico-
Who will never know how you had to cross the frontera, Alma,
To find my lips and kiss them, and to tell me about
Your love
Only when we get into the deepest places whose echoes are my Own, and who say your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deities Of Its Own Graveyards

Yes—bus ride to nowhere— and brilliant
Allegiances with other crowns:
If you can love me without looking at
My face, we will do all right:
We can forever survive like the terrapin
Doing good in the cul-de-sac of her own neighborhood
Without having to ever look to far out
Of her shell: to where the pigeons are burning:
And what are they burning but
The echoes of pornography and uncommon
Justice until we get to here—and the fat
Black girls sing until they are all out of here and
All alone:
Then the stygian in the only known word I've Known for it—as the ant, ant, ant—hyperventilates
Upon the deities of its own graveyard:
And all of the lights that ever were bloom anon and Anon—until there is time enough to hold myself
And cradle myself before the graveyard of another Commercial—
And in your barrooms you just so happen to Dance—and you dance—puppet and puppeteer
Just so happening together somehow fused
Through the lifetimes that forever were.

Robert Rorabeck

The Delicacies Of Her Auburn Fleshes

The fish tails burn like fires up from my window:
The airplanes leap like a game of children in the sand:
All the stars are tarnished roses:
And Alma lives so near to me that I have walked to her house
And slept atop a neighbor's roof:
Alma smelled so good today, and I have been to her church where
Her sister was coronated this afternoon,
While all the plants I sell look good under all of the aspects of our Moon,
And the butterflies whisper straight down to me, gossiping like
Tears to heavy for their paper-tulip bodies,
Burning like crayons of ash straight up from the tracks of her arms
And the segregations of her children into different plantations;
And it didn't look good- It made me feel guilty,
But my arms are empty of packages and gifts,
While Alma swoons in her husband's bed right now in a house
That turns right with the world,
And I will soon be driving to New Mexico, just as alone in my world
Mute but urged by the delicacies of her auburn fleshes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Delicious Fats Of Forbidden Playthings

I am innocent of plans-
Nor am I now drinking rum, or Scribbling up skeletons for novels
Which should not involve
Fervent incest with half-glorious aunts,
Looking like consumptive poetesses,
Whose shadows are the bright smolders
Of early morning forest fires,
Who crackle and drip off the cooking bone
The delicious fats of forbidden playthings-

Like tennis players' sweat pearls on red clay

Or of inglorious entrepreneurs commuted to Mars, like sunny Florida,
Christmas trees that are allowed to forage on,
The tall naked arrows of a yet fermenting atmosphere,
Elusive sacrifices to Earth's broken down apocrypha-

I write on plain manila paper, like empty cicadas on melaleuca,
To save the lines,
Or to create new shelves over amnesiac oceans,
To mine fresh scars over
The swelled cornucopias from whose blue horns
Fish are leaping;
As a guest all alone, to open her parents'
Refrigerator and devour what They've been coolly saving up for their bourgeois pallets;
Tongue liver and caviar,
To kick the dog.

I have no job to define these dreams,
No craft to distract death
Long enough to move my queen to victory,
To chat him up to change my seat and join the Ostentatious gentlemen who Took sips off the first lights of invention
Which rose up browned and throbbing
Sparely along the potted streets;

Here it is, the unnamed future
For us who are not professional,
Who drink too many wishes,
Who pissed against society gurgling
Amidst the coins-
Who are now burned out
Like the stomach of our country,
The lazing belt inexhaustible with Trailer parks and tin stars;

Already duplicitous to Rimbaud,
A decade on Rupert,
With Teasdale breathless,
Disavowed back into earth,
The pantheistic natives leaping jubilantly
Around the fence,
Illiterate and proud in their cars;

No plans at all,
But I am still a young holidaymaker,
Bouquet a jaunted mess not yet all wilted,
Who might yet beat
Bukowski at his swine heart game,
Who might yet become Like Harvey Silver,
Rotund and rain-explored,
Alter-ego to something uprooted,
Beautiful,
Extemporaneous and pervasive,
The effusive light making pretty water stamps like
Souls migrating up and down the street.

Robert Rorabeck

The Delinquent Heiresses

Egos masked in bodies, rise like blue gills towards
The sun,
Stare at airplanes as if they were prettied women,
Instruments of athletes tossed across the heavens
To wedge in the saddles and key holes
Of industrialized mountains where the roses and bears
Grow as thickly as kisses;
And we can run to them, naked of our shadows,
Peeling with our gears recognizing the strange delights
Of simulacrum metamorphosed to the senses-
As color is seeded into the blindness in the basins that
We follow- higher up nosebleeds that the cheerleaders swallow-
They seem to be exhausted but gleeful around
A cairn tear fallen into the skree-
What careful apartments torn, their fabrics bruised- they Line up with their trays along the saddle of mines, to be Fed the pollinations of angels' knees-
The deities of ghost towns, feed the delinquent heiresses
From the napes of their imaginations' honey-
And it runs down their polishing throats and into their valleys:
And it sings in their tummies as they lay down like Horses in a field of wet barely- and we climb up before them
Just to summit and look down-
There they are lying beneath us, as the sun strokes the saddle
And kisses our necks as we tumble back down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Delphic Mirror

Dear God,
you amused yourself for awhile by wresting a
Giant snake
Immortalized forever in a tableau outside the gates to Tallahassee:
Your mortal enemy,
a serpent whose body engorged on veal and venison wrapped around you like garland around a vociferous Christmas tree:
warming you while choking you to death in a classroom, windowless, without purpose or depth-
But it was within that ludicrous show
That you could make the most money
To feed your children or to support your habit.
But now, in the middle of the night, when the rabbits that would otherwise feed that venal reptile, your mortal enemy, are all sleeping or slacking off-
and, likewise, all of the other amusements, the cousins to your twins, have all been shut down and turned off for awhile, giving you a chance to genuflect and show off to the Delphic mirrors of your bedroom-and you drink in the lights, reflecting off the roars of the crowds which you created, and each wave coming in,
combing in a standing applause-that, abashed, you are taken abackflexing your muscles,
and the algebra of your triceps,
that you ponder the time coming soon when all of this will end-and you will have to apply for a job at the Goodwill on Dixie-
When that snake dies, and the airplanes touch down, and you have to take off your own skin for Halloween-
And you hate yourself knowing that

There is no good without evil-
And even good Christian families can pay for
An annual pass to the zoo.
When the churches cozy up to the strip clubs and their definitions are blurred-and you find yourself having to work three shifts after midnight just to feed the absurdness of the absurd.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deltas Of Burnishing Cities

They have new villages in our town- like light bulbs
Turned on over a desert of ghosts and lost
Spelunkers:
Like a single rose curled up over the bones of
A rattlesnake transplanted
Over the corpse of a dead hooker:
And over her shoulder, a Mexican wandering where
The tears of the crocodiles have gone
Down a dry river bed sure that he will not have Anymore adventures to pleasure:
While even then the airplanes and rocket ships
Take off to Europa and France
With fat thanksgivings in their hauls- while Entire icebergs have sacrifices to corporations of Gods- unto the deltas of burnishing cities,
Where my muse slumbers with eight other family Members- lost away in a house no bigger than
The one in which I bachelor.

Robert Rorabeck

The Departures Of Her Grace And Rapture

I offer up goodwill to my soul;
I salute it with drinks and promise to remember it on its Birthday,
And give it heartfelt consolations that it should have had to have Been birthed too close to the sun to carry life on it;
And all I can acknowledge is the noise the lonesome cars make Dipping into the collection pools
From the over spilling bodice of rain, their wheels getting all the Leaked milk from her messy child;
And I wonder about her, introspecting on the aspects of her
Features like a comet who doesn't come around anymore,
Who only came around through high school
And must have mistaken me for beautiful once or twice before
Deciding not to come around anymore,
But somehow she remembered my birthday which is the reason why
I am drinking for her and showing her my face
With its eyes sad, with the dysfunction that were all that Remained after the departures of her grace and rapture.

Robert Rorabeck

The Deserting Fire

The helicopters are going down all over Laos,
Like fireflies of self immolation, like Buddhists in flying rickshaws....
The war started by a dead Catholic president, the only one:
The good kid, the alter boy- The first on his street to share his ice-cream:
Where the airboys fell like plastic toys winged with Burning paper-
The jungle gives its venomous testimonials amidst the smoldering
Pyres: the ancient slang biting the wrists of poor boys
From Kentucky- The freed slaves are turning red in
The dripping lungs of the banyans-
Romeo and Juliet are playing dead for the Viet Kong digging
Their tunnels as equal to rats as equal to ants:

Out in the sun, and the blue playground,
I had a good day, I said to her eyes, as her eyes smiled
Like full bellies naked and pregnant amidst the smoldering sugarcane:
Letting the black ants crawl around her navel, because they only tickle
Tickle, tickle, like tongues, like hands all over her....
And the bodies' insouciant fawns, pistils erect in the unwrapped petals,
Her dripping sweat in a sauna of unrefined sugars....

There is a line of footprints which disappears from us,
Away from where they are taking the moaning bodies to the river,
Where the jungle opens like a cut throat, like another poisoned mouth
Beneath the moaning one,
And perhaps Vivaldi is play a retreat, as the whirling blades
Fireball the impressive death, the exploded canons over
The fort of imploding air and ruined habits of metal,
Where the children of mud defeat a god of full-blown cash money....

And then the sad rivers are invisible,
As I lay my hand open her belly, and she is a vase full of unspilt water,
And there is a bee digging into the corner of her smiling lips,
In her closed eyes a prayer for pollination out of the deserting fire.

Robert Rorabeck

The Desert's Lip

Cloistered at the desert's lip
The nuns reminisce on their daughters'
Reminiscence,
They quiet kiss of boys
They look onwards for the rain:
The mountains rise at the very end,
The promises spoken by dead husbands,
Employers of the failed business
Now they mumble like the torn lips
Of Central American pugilists,
Bleeding rivers in the myriads of life
Consuming life:
The spawn fills the earth
Breeding grounds the extinction of
The drive in theatre-
The tidal seas leave only the dead
Cosmonauts in the recession who exclaiming bearish,
"Why? " as the mica trips,
The infant falls from the crib
As the house burned so no one knows
It was arson,
But it was already dead.
Yet the clean and dead sorority
Hinges on God,
The flaming cusp of light's
Turn around upon the sand:
They've seen him
Walking miles away from where he is:
They whisper the miracles
Yellow buses full of waving school children
At the desert's lip.

Robert Rorabeck

The Desirous Wealth Of Their So Deserved Heritage

I try to get it out,
The still life from the bottle-
Recovered from the sea,
A gift from mermaids or metamorphosed
Conquistadors,
A single consolation that I am losing my art,
And that I should just go to sleep
And wait out this patriotic funeral until all
The ads are all done running,
And the thieves are late at home in trailer parks
Up and down the interstate,
Eating poached apples, and rubberneck turkey,
Dreaming that her clothes might fall off,
Dreaming too of flights to any corner of the Colloquial universe;
They are wearing the stolen diamonds and Caveats of ancient mothers-
They have collected and panhandled masked
And taken what all those legs worked so hard for,
Shaven, running like Niagara falls
Next to the gear shifts of doctors and associates;
And in the tamed wilderness the palmettos
Are wet and drooling,
Little kids plastic tricycles are wet and overturned
In the mowed lawns,
And the thimbleful of park is empty and receding
Into the canal,
Which is nothing more than a fancy gutter,
Where the alligator gazes with bright rubies,
Waiting for his next charge,
The little girls run away from fairytales to sink into Plumping dreams into that deep bed
Like a blushing radish in a salad bowl he has dug
Out for her, to take her permanently away from School,
And the banishing mothers who feel so naked without
The desirous wealth of their so deserved heritage.

The Despondency Of The Highest Of Skies

Games are pleasures for white men in Africa,
Walking the footpaths,
Touching themselves in the mumbo jumbo of an Easily spotted arcade;
As we drink our spirits and bless ourselves to
The cenotaphs of girls surviving in Colorado,
As the hours change from three to five;
As the gunfighters eventually unclthe to make love
To the precious whores
Who so knowingly close their eyes,
As the lightning whips like windswept paramours
Through the despondency of the highest of skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Despondency Of The Roses Of Her Name

The trees are tremendous above the busses:
Even the bullies shrink, and their houses:
You know, these things are always created in the hues of Your favorite colors,
Alma; even if I am the most insignificant of artists:
Even if I have to sit and watch shoeless while my great uncles Caracole and wink their passed behind the Motorboats in the cold trespasses of Lake Michigan:
Don't you know that I ran away before you, even before I Knew you,
And never had tasted your soul like lollypop hallucinations
Through your deep brown transoms:
Even before I knew the less than perfect words to describe you,
I always had the itch to buy you flowers, and orange
Roses,
Of the very same sort that will be arriving at your house on Tuesday, Alma:
Won't then my love be knocking,
And I held your tremendously small hand today before breakfast
And we made love for an hour and a half, which was Hardly enough to time to fill the body of your wishing well with My wishes, tossed from the roof
Of the flea market's overpass; but even so I suppose that I will Love you forever, while the weathers happen like
Teardrops for one more mermaid,
And your mother enters this country again through her dreams,
And through the despondency of the roses of her name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Devils And The Indian Givers

Where do hummingbirds sleep?
I don't know—
Maybe it's where the proverbial Jack and Jill go:
Maybe he sleeps down river from all of
The lamplight,
Maybe they sleep in the perfumes of Night blooming jasmine in all of the moonlight—
I don't know—
The homeless men just do a jig of bones outside
Of the hotel
You are happily making love in with your swell—
Swell—swell—
Maybe making the same mistakes as the repetitions
As the repetition of the sea over the Proverbial hell—
In the castanets I still cannot remember—across
The Earth—
Like autumn—like December—
Until skeletons get up to dance, remembering the seasons
Where they were once men—some many of them:
More than men,
The once men, as the shadows pearl across the earth—
And the horses scream
For the housewife's dearth- and a lack of pageantry—
Marionettes fed into the hearth—
And the days go on and on,
As the knights hand neck-wise from their trees,
Leaves live evergreen waves—
Knowing the séances the witches used to pitch them into
Graves—
Until the songs are swallowed—and the seas commence
To swallow the lakes and the rivers—
And the definitions given to us of the earth and her business
Of flowers are taken backwards by the devil—
By the devils and the Indian givers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Diamond Mines Of Centuries Ago

I seem to be living here-
Starfish in a helmet that you cannot stand-
Stars up in the yum-yum's,
Cursing to themselves as to their cousins:
As I am dying through the Resins in
The dryness of the aqueducts of another heavens-
Just as I do not expect that you can Feel me exposed in the
Dryly beautiful avenues of another heavens:
But I am here,
Crossing my own badges and bighting myself
Before the
Hydrangeas spitefully just as before any and all of
The last heavens:
And this is just the final avenue anyways-
The last midway, bare bosomed, showing the clues of
All of itself before all of the heavens,
Before all of the lights go out- and we have to drink
The ultimate libation in the dreary snow
Before all of that heaven: and
I suppose you cannot swear to this, because the goldfish
Are becoming fat as hydrangeas in any accord;
But the windows in which landed your grandmothers,
Are finally filly out,
So now- I guess- it doesn't really matter how far
You've escaped from Mexico-
All that matters is the last of the plans of our cartographies:
As the oceans open their mouths like aquatic Carnivores waiting to bight down upon the roses
Into which we've thrown our very selves
As if into the fires that just so happened
In the diamond minds of centuries and Centuries ago.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dictionary Of My Blessings

Here we are in the entrails of forest
Drinking down the last evidence of arson from
Our glasses,
And it will soon be that we will go to sleep,
And so will no longer have to pretend to be a cowboy
Attending the forlorn rodeo,
As the empty world will have no more need for our Bravery;
And it is because I love you, Alma, that I still survive,
And call your name up to the yellow pages of the stars:
Still searching,
Searching, like a lame horse for her stride,
Like a lost feather of its streamlined glide; and now you
Have bowed out and been taken away into the embrace
Of his charmless arms:
There you go wingless without any hope for rope tricks,
As I doubt that he has anything left of value for
You to steal;
As the illusions of daylight will soon have you
Transcending once again through the minions of its Calvary,
But you must already know: don't you, don't you,
That only this, the dictionary of my blessings, is real:
Is real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dictum Of Innocence

The dictum of innocence rests for awhile
In the polished clean mouth
Of the young crocodile....

Tuning in to a sterile faith,

She heard the Messiah tell her to leave me
For a clean-shaven man;
She left me standing there with
A ghost in my hand.

From the high altitude,
Where the aspens grow silver,
Upon the nape of the slow moving river;
I am a hermit of inebriate rhyme,
Brushing me teeth,
Biding this time....

In their fast moving cities of opal insurance,
Lovers lock jaws with faithless endurance;
Passing together like spores in the wind,
They forget their own names,
As others move in....

I am standing before a window
Of the bluest sky,

When she asks again if I love her,
And my muscles don't move,
My beautiful shell stays hinged,
And stares on with the permanent things,
For that moment she'll wonder why,
But, thankfully,
Her god brings swift change,

And quite soon she will pass herself by.

Robert Rorabeck

The Difficult Path

In a cleft of voodoo I find my forgotten love,
Once thought to have been Run over by a get a way car: now there she is,
Like a piece of silver once folded over
A pie that was stolen by sparrows
And placed or discarded here for some Reason,
Up in a key hole looking down at bears trying to Learn about fire,
A talisman for only the keenest of tourists now:
And if she had a daughter,
The girl is forgotten, but in a home as blue- green
As any of the most beautiful of oceans,
And she goes her way,
Sing and chanting as she cleans a house,
Never looking up to imagine the possibilities of the Spectacle of her mother
Made into a cenotaph at this very hidden place
On the ridge,
A striking and very sad way post nearing the end
Of the difficult path up to my heaven.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dim Lit Zoetrope

Gladness over the waterfall where the horses
Run-
They run in circles beneath her: they make a whirlpool
Of the air,
As they are busy in a tangle of manes
In their business,
As they lose definition, polishing arrowheads:
Just a brown ring now and a great fire between them
Cause evolution.
We all sleep inside the church, waiting for our parents
To come down,
But the business in those airplanes has become Lighter than the wishes of candles,
And their very bones are flutes so now they look
At all of these highways as ribbons
Of petrified discord, and they hope the sea will come
Over us, and through the orange groves
And the copper fields- and give us all to her union
To reflect the dim lit zoetrope dancing through the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dimly Glowing Heart

In kindergarten with the purple tulips
And my first love:
We learn the alphabet and nursery rhymes:
I envision her lips indenting the sea,
But she loves my best friend
And play games with him,
When the class plays games-
My parents work all day under the sun,
And sing songs as they make money,
But they don't even worry that I might love,
Her curls-
In the afternoons we sleep and
I steal things for her to confirm my love-
When I show them to her,
The shells of my early craft:
Beneath the dark circles my troubled
Eyes exhibit,
Things borrowed without return,
She is not impressed-
Turning, she kisses Michael and goes away.
Over the swing set, the Sky is rumbling with ominous disquiet:
There, the bulbous heads of puffing
Weather writhe like darkening weeds,
The lightning in fitful briars....
Returning to the little classroom,
I dutifully sit before the gray-haired teacher,
And wait for her to tell me anything-
As the rain begins its pitter-patter
Over the dimly glowing heart.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dinner Bells Of Night Fall

Shielded in a grotto where the mother sleeps-
In cerulean pearls the waves are greedy for- waiting for her to Climb up from the shoals,
To show her breast and tail- as long and fine as the tailfin
Of a commercial jetliner
While my own mother is not home: her bosom a fort for Delirious sailors:
While she lays her head and douses beside a truer virgin-
As the generals come, wanting to be suitors-
And farmers who grow roses
Wait on the cliffs, the wind clapping them and making them look
Like fools- until the lunch trucks come around
Driven by beautiful Columbian women who will accept
Their hearts as souvenirs while the men who bore them
Daughters drag nets of vanishing perfume across
The aqueducts of embittered countries-
And step out a litter further only to give all that they have Earned to the mermaids who, inclined to
The elements, changing their minds before the dinner bells of Night fall, and all together, swim away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dins Of Gods' Descending Messages

Echoing in the dins of gods' descending messages
You sent to him while you were away
From his love,
Misspeaking yourself in the arms of a floating
Curiosity—
Like a curious decoration draped upon the Wells of some strip mall in some Midwestern séance:
Into this enfeebled trick you gave all of the meaning
Of your lives,
Taking off flowers from the bouquets of your Soul to feed in insatiable senses of what you
Supposed had to be death—
Grinning reptiles who swore to know nothing
About the manmade metamorphoses of airplanes,
But sat there, demanding of you— gluttons-
And you gave in, and he came home from the amphitheaters
Of the celluloid hurricanes—arms strong but beaten down—
You dreamed you loved me while he was Away, but now he is reentering your town.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dirt Of A World That Can Never Be Healed

If I am just something forever used to keep busy
Your yawning afternoons:
Sending me up into the compost heaps over the ever
Infatuated room,
But no longer feed my body with your body's bloom:
If these are the barbs that you sing,
While you swings your children across the milky tips
Of the gleaming chasms;
This I cannot heal, because it is very real:
The poisoned slits and crevices that the dragons burn
And thus they feel:
I want to be your gut-shot soldier telling stories to himself
Up on cemetery hill:
This is all that matters while the balloons surcease like Bladders,
While the lost boys enjoy what cannot be real:
And their island is a star- it is a pinprick in your car,
While the waves wave away the dirt of a world that can never Be healed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dirt Of The Stars

Which way do the languishing shadows hang,
Uphill or downhill from the graveyard:
Either way doesn't seem right—
But the waves of the sea are awake either at Midnight or noon,
But the night blooming jasmine only blooms
With the turning of the earth away from
The sun, like a scorned lover who doesn't Deserve the way she's been done—
And it doesn't matter to me anyways, the tales
That get around,
What they consider to be beautiful or Ugly—anyways,
The sunlight always touches the toes of
The ground—
And the graveyards are just as wide as the heavens—
And nothing I have done as been really beautiful
Enough to escape the earth—
Even though I still think I can hear you echoing over
The dirt of the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Discolored Neighborhoods Of Our Anyways

Truckstop of dis- conjoined senses:
Wishing you were here, anyway, while the automobiles
Procede,
While I am wondering if you have ever seen anything
As beautiful,
As I touch myself, and then the billfolds fold just Like snowflakes at the rattlesnake's tit:
While here I am anyways, as the sun enjoys:
Yes, it does, secrets of its success and Weight lessons: the old
Highschool looks just about the same as your Old bedroom while all of this time you
Were kissing the persimmons of your young
Princess:
Well here she is: she is, while the balloons inflate
Over all of the old zoos and science mazes;
It all just happened as I supposed,
And then there it was: while all of the old arrowheads
Were lost anyways,
Into the armpits of those anonymous signatures:
Even while she was taking notations,
Plagiarizing while all of the old flags rose their Heads over the discolored neighborhoods of our anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Disney World That Is Open All The Time

Going to the ladies of the night, giving to them
The things I have said,
Driving straight without spirits to douse my wick like
An arrow in the buckets of paint for tattoos;
And the age old saying is that I am wounded,
But I've have done my part in stealing this land,
And entering the zoo of houses of Palm Beach when the Masters are off cavorting;
And there are talking rabbits in the everglades, and harmless
Snakes:
And these girls work indoors right under the open bellies of All those airplanes;
And I've been drinking, but it is hardly ever enough:
They've widened the road straight up to the door,
The one when they open they are always gleaming, Like dreams
Taken and strung out like careless laundry made more Beautiful in the extemporaneous morning; and would that I knew better words for beautiful,
But it's just that I've been drinking; and I am done with college,
And yet when haven't I seen your face, E-, or that you cared
To mind:
Who are you making love to, but look at these girls.
They are the Disney World that is open all the time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Distance Of The Cosmos

If and when you fall in love with the ocean halfway,
The sun comes up smiling, saying,
I have seen life on other planets more than twice
The distance from me to you—
And I have loved it better, distant and alien in my way.
This reminds you of your father
Who has a tenth grade education but who
Has always worked for himself
But now, approaching sixty, has finally
Caved in and is driving a company truck cross country.
This, as it so happens, is the most common job in
The country—and you imagine him, passing on the highway
Rolling against the overgrowths of ivy—
Doesn't he seem to be going the wrong way,
Like the life-giving sun shining upon the distance of the cosmos.

Robert Rorabeck

The Distant Spectators Of This Closed Story

Too late the good guys divvied up what I needed
To survive,
The sun the personalities of the opera on my body,
A lucky curse,
Trees pensive without water,
Rattlesnakes in mirages of water parks in the caesuras
Of the stony turf.
If I'd begun a better way, I'd be a bull park in the City:
Sneak thieves would live off my green, and the silver
Sisters would crowd me:
Sharon would know what I mean,
The zoo over spilling, the words just spume, the tourists
Well sated on astronaut ice-cream:
Instead, don't know what I am doing, believing in darker
Metaphors,
I strangle flowers: I am just a cenotaph in the wavering
Park- The sea has gone away for another girl,
The world it occupied is naked of wildlife and the stars
Have turned their backs, window shopping not anymore the Distant spectators of this closed story.

Robert Rorabeck

The Divine Absence Of Footfalls

Color me green or anything- I just want to Lay across you as I write this poem,
As I engorge by your better faults and lie and say
Its Halloween. I could write for you forever, and compare
Those scars which have awakened me in the image of The savaged narcissist, which give me good erections,
Which say now we are on another planet;

And you are here, and each star, and that old leaping
Comet- It comes too: It makes you look up, and defines
Your neck, everything about you which is alive;
And I listen to the storm and ride ponies, and pretend that Now they are having parades down at sea level,
Leggy tramps and tax collectors, and grandmother's
Entire sets of dolls;

But don't listen to me now, but lean into me, and whisper
To me something that I should never hear. From your breathless Lips, send those thistly sails beckoning. Give me hope and a new Sun, just a pinprick from here. Stare at this side of my face I
Turn in towards you, and shake your head aping the others girls,
As they shake their head, as their curls glisten like molten candy;

And then lay across my palm your flat breast like a dollar bill,
Like carne frita, and let our tongues stick out like fried plantains,
Like the only form of saccharine tricks on this our humbling planet;
And we will be good, and listen to the traffic, and the divine absence
Of footfalls underneath the power lines.

Robert Rorabeck

The Divine Traffics

In a catharsis of waxy elbows like an entire Gift basket left for the slight degrees of vision of An alligator as white as snow
And left into captivity underneath the pitter-patter of Plastic reindeer:
If we kissed this way sometimes on our Tuesdays off,
Fearlessly but avoiding eye contact, our bodies like Cleaning agents rubbing together an hypnotic memory
Under the glass eyes of some blinded church-
With the gods and the presidents rolling the dice of our families,
And all of the divine traffics continuing the sanguinities
Of the un stymied wound.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dolphins, The Heavens

Another song crying like a teacher—
The day is unaffected,
The Ferris Wheel still turns around,
Even though the dolphins swam away:
They came to see her or
It,
But she or her was too far inland—but she still Painted a pretty picture,
Turning as she did for them
Even though all of the other Ferris Wheels had Already left Town Town—
There she was in the corner of her own lot—
The feral cats playing violins and Bedding down,
And I triumphant moon rose over the sea
That was like a fairytale for her,
The Ferris Wheel—and she laid there
Forever, refusing to be handled,
Searching through the very top of her pin-balled
Apex,
Flashing with the greatest exuberance—
She can still be seen today,
Waiting for the dolphins to come to her,
Waiting for the heavens to touch the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

The Door That I Am Afraid That I Will Never See

Doing their own thing in their dream rooms
While their daughters are passed off by car to their Little sisters:
In the foothills of constructions with the pilot's laughter
Ushering through the weather like coin smooth
Stones passed over for swans
In the crenulated pews of non denominational weathers;
As my muse does whatever she does on her
Off hours,
Lining the coliseums of anonymous fame: after all of
The high schools have shut down,
And girls that I used to live with have their first born sons
With the steady men who they are more inclined-
Until there is peace, with green bugles form the valley
And all forms of animal life budding there,
While her brown hand and the rest of her is resting behind
That door that I am afraid I will never see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Doorways Of Hotels

What bends the rivers, or necks down to Drink
What bows the sky into the bower's brink
I can't thing of the names that you really
Left behind
Starring away in your metamorphosis without
A ship
Or the brown shadow of your man behind you
In that bedroom
Is he tasting your fire again, sipping the ash
That floats from your bangs
Thrashed in the gyring frictions of the summer's Hurricane- and I cannot understand it
How I came down all of those steps from my Office to see you through a window
Threshing trees- giving the softest
Plums to the meaningless puppies
Where they commingled with the rattlesnakes in
The ditches
And the storm whispered promises to all of Them and brought the angels down in Fabulous nets that tangled across the doorways
Of hotels, disturbing the residents
From the places they didn't even belong

Robert Rorabeck

The Doubtless Highways

So I took her, and then I took her to the science museum,
Back and forth foreplay through the marbleized bestiaries,
And the early marbles of the habitats of Toothy spacemen:
And I took her, and I took her to an art gallery, and she laid down
Her head and looked up at a ceiling chatter-filled with the Blown glass amusements of the sea life from
The woebegone mind of some estranged artist,
Searching for her,
My own brown muse that I had found, and kissing and blowing,
Stoked,
Into a Ferris Wheeled reason to survive; and here she was,
Mostly on Tuesdays, coming like a brown sun into my yellow
House,
Conquering like a little Mexico, her legs the conduits of a windmill,
Like fireworks who couldn't even believe in themselves:
And the roofs still arose, or they seemed to arise,
And yet we were making newer finer pinpoints that articulated
Straight up through the heavens,
Like the pornographies of smoke signals, that frightened the Cadavers in their marble graves, and put the mouthy fear into the sky
That perhaps it had fallen after all, and lay there
Like a carpetbagger finally exhausted and thoroughly metamorphosed
Alongside the doubtless highways that heedlessly tore asunder.

Robert Rorabeck

The Downy Curbs Of Ditches

The power lines stretch and fawn, as the airplanes rapture,
And sometimes it will rain
As I imagine my mother coming out of that little house in Her even littler, bluer slip:
There she is changing the laundry, as the ant lions molest in
The grass,
And the rabbits rest in the rock garden full of spikenard and Cockleburs:
The neighbors are drinking beer, and the airplanes are launching
As if to Russia,
Everything bill folded into something that can fit across so
Many yards of the greenly understood,
While one or two misfits curl beside the cadavers of rattlesnakes
In the downy curbs of ditches that will never Have to move again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dozen Virgins Of Guadalupe

The dozen Virgins of Guadalupe may have to make
A church out of my garage—
I have them in my house right now: in the foyer,
Atop the fireplace,
On the cabinets above the tiny kitchen—not as to make
A sorority of religious artifacts, but as fetishes
Meant to collect you—
I even have Cuban dinero underneath the dresses of
One of them—all of it meant as some sort of Santeria
To steal you from your husband
Who already knows voodoo—and, according to your Aunt Mierna, paid for black magic to win you
Back to him—and to birth a child from you—
I guess that I see now that I am not very clever,
But I keep at it going down into the night, drinking
A couple glasses of rum before my fair share of Another school day—
Trying to resurrect that love that could never burn out
As it never truly did start a fire—we just met
In a fruit market, I bought you gold, and we made love
Periodically for a year and a half, before it petered
Out and I found another woman—and you stayed with Him,
As the flying monkeys came down to rest in the forest
To look down upon a scarecrow who didn't have the brains
To be afraid.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dragonfly's Intersections

Let this play out,
The panhandlers on the corner of Forest Hill and Jog- I once pulled up and Dropped in his hand a roll of quarters,
And he blessed me like an unwashed John The Baptist.
Just as I was pulling away, I saw
The screwdriver general trouncing down upon
The object of my homeless philanthropy;
The dominant wino was going to take away
The beer money, I suppose;
Like the pugilism of dizzy waves
With his rabbit-pink eyes bleeding maggot sleep.
Before the early days could wash away into
The confounded strip mall of her crocodile tears:
Neither man didn't know that this was where I use to Roam myself- Four years old,
Blond hair and an albino hound name Wolfie
Who went for the throat,
When there was only phalanxes of slash pines,
Blue herons and the smell of Jupiter's dump when
The winds blew strongly to the south,
Prop planes, pay phones and Donkey Kong at Nola's
Pizza parlor on the south east corner of the intersection,
And the simplicity of the rattle-snakes' brittle warning,
Like spare buttons shaken in a jam jar,
The saucer demon eyes in the bright sun;
The ungrafted nucleus of a burnished soul still warm from The female's kiln; Not a haunt in the newborn head,
And legs that swam out past the highways
Of the depressed migrations of snowbirds;
Now I know the pecking order of these diminished Streets, the lonely fertilities heady in tracts of Working class song birds:
The grinning phallatios of politicians and their cops in the hurricane,
Budweiser like a shine of easy god rising above the pines,
Her eyes turned away and her body that I once entered;
The woman I love who doesn't know me,
And the frightened destinations of man on rotten couches
In the junkyard brambles alongside the busy roads,

Dwarfed by the superstructures of other men going nowhere
Very fast: Her eyes are like this in the gloom of My truck, as I pull through the McDonald's drive-thru,
On the land my parents use to rent,
Where I had powerful dreams of her chastity's claret arrivals,
But that was yesterday's growth spurt;
I get no taller, and now there are only
Ghosts in the concrete's yellow-eyed desert and where her eyes bloom
The sharp flowers, the dangerous gazes for other men
Far out in the jogging aftermaths, I couldn't know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dreaming Of Insects

The days are common place- Here they go,
The anonymous parade, the same as in Highschool, but with less clairvoyancy and Those dreams.

I don't skip out anymore: I don't go anywhere,
But I still look at pictures of her as if she was Still here. I still drive around as if I knew the places where we used to live;

But this is how it goes:
Her bone structures are still angelical;
And in the library I can read about her,
The stream of seances she will never perceive,
The capitalizations of anonymous romance:

I will get up from, and walk out into that sunlight,
Experience another day with nothing given to me in exchange,
But for those good memories,
The slick truanicies that lay out in the mowed grass,
Underneath the subtle dreaming of Insects.

She is like those jewels they have shed:
The opulent cadavers in the floating shades.
She gives to me that motionless dream,
Alluring me, though she has gone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Drinking Glass Of My Soul

I want to be friends- but it will mean I'll have To drink more.
I have a terrible craving for turkey,
And beautiful girls are surfing in the hair-lips of Waves; it is the best place to begin,
With the sun fluctuating like a bad heart,
The kind the virgin wears over her apron while Baking cookies; and I haven't been reading Anything good, but just slipping further down the Damp easement toward the terrible smiles of Crocodiles- Cant you tell- that its all a lie,
That I'm all over my bad drugs- I stick to Disney World and cheap liquor- and I want more,
And more of it, these fun rides next to strange
Blondes, helium filled contraptions next to the sea;
And you have to really want it,
To fight with the charactures of death, to remember
The places you were born, the spawning pools,
The vile slime of so many dividing cells- Like Cheap,
Hollywood sci-fi, waiting for the artificial intelligence
To die- I remember- I remember her, sure:
She held my hand and we picked fireflies- Then she Betrayed me with her own blood in her mouth,
The favorite topping to her new freshman's phallus;
And now, old boy, my head is a toy- Let me think.
My head feels so good in my hands, my head is a pumpkin
Wildfire, and I am still waiting for my refund from Saint Louis. My father is a cheap devil with a beer belly
With so many horses they sh! t all through the forest,
They've killed the trees, and now he is hungry, he is hungry
For the thighs of dead girlfriends sisters,
For the walls and forts of coquina, but I am just trying to Survive doggy-style, Bukowski-style- up here with
The reintroduced wolves- This is my neighborhood,
And I don't know what else to tell you- I've forgotten what Else to say, but I assure you it was beautiful,
Even to the eyes of shotgunned ghosts- It was beautiful,
But these words will die before I die,
So it is all the same- Excuse me now while I sit this one out

To refill the drinking glass of my soul....

Robert Rorabeck

The Drive-In Theatres Of The Ever-Loving Moon

Jealous as the children are to souls,
As new words are to the memory,
As the cars lay outside, tanning in their parking
Lots,
As each orange globe, sinks and becomes Pregnant underneath the moon,
Where the trailer parks lie like sardines,
Or other places that have become transplanted
To the land of the talking cats
All across the other sides of canals
Where the kidnapers are taking our sisters
Every day to kiss and make love outside of school—
As the classrooms come and fill up without
Our memories—
As it rains and gets cold outside,
As the hummingbirds die beside the water holes
Outside the apexes of every classroom—
So it comes to this—another drunken night
Outside of the carpeted apothecaries—
All of the classrooms in that old high school
Abandoned,
As some other souls make love
Or contend to be Christened as Shakespeare and His retarded brother walk their three legged dog
Over the drive in movie theatres of the Ever-loving moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Drooling Honeymoons

Jumping through your shoulders
While I was fighting through your daydreams:
Until someone strangled the moon so
There was midnight and puppets
Dancing,
And I didn't love you,
But the rivers still ran until they Flooded—tear-eyed,
And then the night was made of itself,
But it wasn't my problem:
I had been to the top of the mountain,
And the midnight yet ran like yoke in her
Eyelashes—it was the same way with highways,
Running down her like mascara,
And there wasn't much left of the rest of
The country, but I still love America—
And the way she fought on without me,
Until the hallways of her high schools were Healthily buttoned in her illusions,
And I struggled in the waves
Laying down with the monuments,
Until I decided that it was almost over—
And I bought her roses on her birthday
And I said the pledge of allegiance
Over the drooling honeymoons of Her blindingly stupefied waterfalls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Drooping Sky

Orchard imprints in your kitchen- as sunlight
Through the glasses,
And against the wishing wells of gold fish:
And you don't have to worry:
You are young, and your husband is young and Coming home to you-
So you don't have to run away across the canal:
The other world is just for show-
You don't have to belong to it, and I am your son:
Abandon me if you want to
In the preschools of graveyards- leave me there
Underneath the slash pine and the egrets
Who ornament the drooping sky as the traffics
Rush by forever- though they never have
To be gone for very long: and, rest assured,
They will all be soon coming home to you, as you lie
In wait for them,
As the tadpoles change and the cicadas molt,
And the dragon flies whisper into the rattlesnake's
Mouth- as they all come home into you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Drowning Christmas Tree

I drink liquor to a god who just doesn't care,
Who is dumber than me:
All the dragons you know are lazy, saturnine, insouciant
And unpatriotic:
The night is galvanized against them and all of the sweet young
Dears are leaning the calligraphies of algebra:
In Oregon the lumberjacks cut wood:
They work a dangerous job and then they come together and sleep
Just like the naiads of lesbians in their pool where I Suffered through undergraduate training in a toon-ville
Where my venal muse still lives:
Erin, Erin: every night gets cold without you, and this is how I've poisoned my soul because I am too weakened to live wholly Without you,
And even the Queen's English only has so many possibilities without
You;
And the night is getting up and walking out on its brighter lover,
And the moon just doesn't know what to do:
I am pigheaded and lonely, but I still walk with strange girls over the Upraised and religious bridges across the intercostals;
And you have found your new man, and I am proud;
And I am lonely and I am wondering even and when you will Ever find me,
Like the most beautiful of presents who has always been waiting for You underneath the drowning Christmas tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dry And Rusting Pines

Now they have them cadillacs filled with
The various pornographies underneath of where
The airplanes live,
.Just as my muse has her families in the buried Streets that the sun mows:
And she goes to work five days a week,
Just as I go to work,
And the angels walk in plain clothes- but sometimes
The gypsies also come to town,
And the heavens boil above them, turning our Confections into liquor across the empty planes,
Just as she skips in her diminutive ways,
Angel of brown body and brown stems, over the Estuaries where the otters and cotton mouths live-
And I spin like a firework home to my Mother and the shells of vanishing crustaceans
Into a new sort of tenement across the forgotten sorts
Of holly and underneath the dry and rusting pines.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dry Indoors

Imperfect as my insincerity- soft nimbus whispered or Blown across the shell,
Lost in her childhood, like the kittens in the rattlesnake's
Belly,
And we growing deeper into these woods, listening
To the ancient shells of conquistadors singing,
As sunlight is braided through the open doors
Of lost pornographies-
And I think of her again, the day reawakening in new Molestations, the cars driving out of doors:
The strange storms that spread over us, strangers-
Her lips of satin, of tranquility's heresy:
How can I provide for her when it is raining upon my Fire,
And all of the good merry weathers have all stood up,
Discontinuing their primeval love stories,
And tromping up the three stacked cinderblocks and back into
The dry indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dying Butterflies

Slow diamond of a burning ship
Calling for your love with my entrails- a need for this void
And the skeletons float, laughing—
Made to believe in the rhythms of the journey
Or that there is no place more insubstantial—
Where the fretful liaisons wait for the werewolves -
And they for the school girls to step off the Thresholds of their busses—
We will be testing tomorrow, and tomorrow
Forever—
As the buses turn around like knights dancing
Around the dying butterflies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dying Eyelid Of Cain's Unfortunate Brother

I figured I should call you
Before I started drinking again.

Because you don't answer,
I started without you
Since last night I had a vision
In which the planes were falling,
Again, a kind of religious silver rain.
And you became the lucky number
That slipped from the pant's pocket
Of my childhood while incest was Dug up behind the tomato vines
And all the flesh and bones bathed
In the hot south Florida sunlight
As the trailer with the holes in the Floor was locked tightly before they Began the raid on the immigrant workers.

They are advertising human sacrifice
On the billboards down Military Trail,
As people pass on from high-school
Forgetting such detritus as their locker
Numbers and first loves,
The way the shadows pooled under
The overgrown hollies in the early morning
Beside the bus-stop as the mist rose up
And the lions roared down the street.

And driving with ex-relatives barking
At the side of my face only to recede into
The hills where the snow is quickly melting,
The world turns old and further away
From the life gained from the sun
From which the old god walks away,
Leaving his destroyed garden to his bastards sons
Who perpetuate themselves through
Our sick games played out between the Battlefields of eyes upon which even
The fly experiences strangulation on the

Dying eyelid of Cain's unfortunate brother.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dying Of The Same Old Same

My old night is her new night too,
In a brand new house, with a new husband too:
And her cars are so gaudy out in her yard
Itself having been christened with a new
Manicure of sod;
And even my old rains seem to be her new
Rains too,
If you sit quietly and listen, then she can be new to
You,
Striped out and bedecked like for a female
Peacock's yard sale- she'll open her new eyes for you,
And you can swear that they are as instrumental
As the four winds giving direction and purpose to
A weather vane;
But if you asked me, I'd curse that she was nothing
But the same old same;
And certainly not one or two of my muses,
The beauties she awakened from my old houses of Beat-up bruises-
So in the strange foreplay in the first of the last light
Of this same old crepuscule,
What she happened to kill also resurrected in me,
A beauty that can never die- an immortal pain
That is yet tremulous inside me,
Somehow the fairest light that resonated forth from
The dying of the same old same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Dying Of The Young

Voodoo is the dying of the young into
The apex of the overbearing yards—
It is the not allowing of my muses to have
A solace of their apathetic sanctuaries—
And the churches surrounding Them are the resurrections my awful sea pulled Back in total disregard—
And in its definitions nude fireworks—
Until high school comes again—soft lips sold
In the fruit markets of the overbearing sunlight—
Brown skin of
The muse that took my soul away—and turned me
Into the washboard of a yellow mule
In the graveyards the buzzards and their parson sang
Over, picking my bones beneath the satellites—
And in all of its kingdoms of unremitting
Glory, that are calling you through the collarbones
Of the careless holidays—
That in the breathless heavens there is still some Sort of jubilee for you—
And I am at a loss, and throwing my pennies towards
The wishing well of a tortoise who is still trying
To pull the wishes from my bones—
And great about the insouciance over winning the race—
As I remember sailing feet first with you towards
The heavens of primary colors—of a red and then yellow Helicopter dancing statically together over the Vibrant sea where the mermaids have lost all of their Names into the gambling that I am sure would not Be if it was not for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eagerly Forgotten Graveyards

Dying this way- dying, as the leaves on trees in autumn
Know no more summits: getting jobs at fast food
Franchises,
Forgetting the names of the fraternities of old gods,
Forgetting my pledges of allusions to them:
Feckless, rewinding in my off base bedroom, my little house
Bleeding rusty around the edges,
My dogs forgotten in Arizona: drinking dessert wine, and compiling Myself to the night while the tropical storm turns away and flits of The phallic back of Florida, like butterflies returning to Her own bedroom to masturbate:
And I am all alone and un influential- this is how I tire,
While the bonfires recess, while the airplanes and the captains in Them touch down and curl like wishless micas atop the granites
Of the earth:
While everything I have tried to do doesn't work out, and starves
In a day or two like a bromeliad needing the genuflections of Sunlight;
And the ships capsize, and the lions just keep yawning while the Tourists pirouette deep inside their trams:
And I drink more liquor, like a candle trying to start its own flame:
While you are already tucked away, Alma, fleshed into the armpits
Of his brown hereafter- calling you his women, you give him
Tongue and children,
And you seem to live awhile, like beautiful flowers placed across
The eagerly forgotten graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Earlier Memories

Perfume for seahorses is a way of starting off:
A little tear building into an oceanâ€™s peony for a ghost
Refusing to come to its absolute conclusionâ€™s
Up in the soft and greasy foothills and red clay, bats
Are nestingâ€™s; great poets are being shot
Underneath olive leaves like oxymoronsâ€™s; The moon
Catches all of the weeping that she can and divides
Them until she is full: Beneath her, the tents for Spilling fireworks are rising,
And the buses are turning around in a chorus of chartreus
Butterfliesâ€™s;
There is a better art than mine in the soft bosom of a
Cul-de-sac she is too busy at obtainingâ€™s; birth stones
Around her neckâ€™s; most everything about her is already Clinging to somethingâ€™s; monuments of her body,
Tourists are making her childrenâ€™s; but in the ways I have Found her there is no hidingâ€™s; illuminate daydreams,
Across the diminutive parks of sand-castles and Oleanders she comes glidingâ€™s; until Lit up in a tree, the wayward kites she coaxes, as they Tumble beside her and the clothes she is dryingâ€™s;
As the rains remember other soft children beside the Dim carport beside the earlier memories of which they Are falling.

Robert Rorabeck

The Earliest Of Classrooms

Each stitch in the peacock's feather,
A crenulation upon the mountains, stones waved into the Quartzite caesuras where the lovers fall,
Teeth chipped upon the false romances of hoar frosted mermaids:

The milkmaid riding on the last-most seat of the bus
Turns a blue eye away,
The wind succulates upon her blondness,
Ovid turns her sisters into kites,
Zeus draws a bone and turns into the conquistador's bull,
Pursuing knee-high into the foaming surcease:

My children drizzle into the tiny yellow rooms
Where we have planted them,
Their insufficient nudities beginning to dry like dew in the morning
of the first day of school:

They are look up at her. They have forgot all of their memories.
A goshawk touches two weeds together in a thorny bush,
And a new pornography is born high up in the coned armpits
Between two war-begotten countries-

The last word spoken to their virginity has no meaning;
It is sent to turn them feral so that they may escape these earliest of Classrooms:
Leaping billy-goats of metamorphosis,
The fairytale spumed between two nests of giants:

They are freed to roam the canals dredged behind the backyards
Of society. The little girl pauses to kiss an alligator frozen by her presence,
And the land beckons in a bucolic, mowed excellence-
Where nocturnal boys recline forever, arms crossed behind their fermenting brains,
Where gem-sized grasshoppers speckle their
Acned cheeks, far into the forever backyards of the most forgetful housewives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Earth

Real cowboys taking siestas in the underbrush:
School buses shoplifting back and forth, vagabonding
Against the hedgerows
Who sing in little red and yellow buds that the coral
Snakes curl around awaiting the Little girls in their fairytales;
And they just dream, of liquor and bullfighting,
Though the best of the herds have all dried up,
And their cenotaphs float in the sky like great wrecks
Who wreath back and forth on the holidays;
But really they are something that can never change:
The end result of a plentiful metamorphosis,
And the cowhands beneath them are great grandfathers
Themselves,
Their schoolboy forts taken back over by the Mexicans
Who came chanting with silver drums and boleros of Enduring fire:
Now the airplanes evaporate through the sky: they seem to Pollinate on them, a hedgerow of silver crosses fluttering;
And these old men, dust covered humbly,
Close their eyes and dream of things without wings that Still somehow skip across the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Earth And Sky

Resting again- again, in the valleys
Of windmills who know of
The keenest pleasures-
They lay in one spot and move and move:
Can't you see them moving,
Coming over the hill, or rising up
From Iceland- making headway where They stand
And you are in art class trying to reconcile
It with your greatest love,
As the comets are in their slings
Curling around the hips of shadows and
Having a good time-
And the students? They have all gone into
A classroom of whispers.
Maybe it is their birthday, but one at a
Time.
And the windmills? Well, you know what
They are doing:
Turning, turning- raising their heads to
The angels-
And the angels sit there bawling, bawling-
And all of the earth and sky
Having a marvelous time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Earth I Made For You

How can you never think of all
The busied flowers underneath your sink
Dozened into a scattering of vermilion
Seeds the sun in the sky winked love into:
It peppered them into their youth,
As your mother's rabbits danced- and you grew
Weary as you I romanced:
And you continued making love to me in
The orchards, as if through the pages of our Story book- but that was a fable whose moral Never took- for if it was your child,
It was just the persuasion of a gibbous moon
Lamenting upon your brown oasis-
As you lay in bed with your brown children,
Lactating the sensations of a town of roosters that Grow for you when the rains come and turn
The earth I made for you into mud.

Robert Rorabeck

The Easiest Thing

Horses are green:
My house is yellow, but I am still right here:
Across from here, there is another house,
But who cares what color it is:
The color of my muse's eyes are brown:
She doesn't live too far from here-
I talk to her some times a day,
But otherwise I do my work, and try to breathe:
When she calls me, I fall in love:
I fall in love, and remember how sometimes it is so easy
To cause an echo,
And when I take her out to lunch, we share our eyes,
And I have listened to her heart, beating inside of her while
She has laid on my bed: but when he calls her,
She goes back to him:
Like eager pennies in a wishing well, like silver
Minnows in the stream,
Never minding the beautiful mines of my forest, singing
To her with captivated bears and foxes: yes,
She goes back to him, and that is the easiest thing she does.

Robert Rorabeck

The Easiest Thing She Does

Horses are green:

My house is yellow, but I am still right here:

Across from here, there is another house,

But who cares what color it is:

The color of my muse's eyes are brown:

She doesn't live too far from here-

I talk to her some times a day,

But otherwise I do my work, and try to breathe:

When she calls me, I fall in love:

I fall in love, and remember how sometimes it is so easy

To cause an echo,

And when I take her out to lunch, we share our eyes,

And I have listened to her heart, beating inside of her while

She has laid on my bed: but when he calls her,

She goes back to him:

Like eager pennies in a wishing well, like silver

Minnows in the stream,

Never minding the beautiful mines of my forest, singing

To her with captivated bears and foxes: yes,

She goes back to him, and that is the easiest thing she does.

Robert Rorabeck

The Easiest Way Through The Quietest Hood

Popping on the lights, I look at my reflection:
I get so excited I sing
As if on Christmas, this country is a good place,
Going down into the valley and the zoos of Easter
Sunday:
Erecting tents of marketplace speculation:
And the most beautiful thing is that up above the Clouds can be anything, but they are just nothing
Just the smoke of the chimneys off
The grasses breathing like the mighty coat of
A vehicle the cars mind,
And the pretty girls turn out on the turkey-leg glade for Supper time:
All dandy in their milky surplices like rows of candles
Upon whose lips I want to make wishes:
Bodies strung together like pearls stripped naked of Clams,
And they are out on picnic parade blowing the butter off
Their yams,
Beheld by the spindly jewels that the crocodiles have to Give;
And they move through the parks of industry, a sisterhood
Of gypsies whose math is always good
As they light the easiest way through the quietest hood.

Robert Rorabeck

The Easy Outs And The Easy Ins

Every day is an empty highway
Made for things that flash and die,
And that sun goes leaping through the skyway,
But never wonder why-
That I should look at you so pitifully,
Drinking those songs that I want to never End,
But you just go passing by me, kissing those Lips of your more beautiful friends-
That the traffic continues,
That the undying brigades should never sleep:
That the dogs remember:
That the dogs should weep,
And you go continuing with your toy chest
Of friends,
All the easy ways that you know,
The easy outs and the easy ins.

Robert Rorabeck

The Easy Proof Of Science And Divinity

My secret agendas go unpublished.
When my parents leave, I steal downstairs and Write poetry.
I feed my dog the rest of my peanut butter
And jelly sandwiches.
I am neither generous nor stingy.
My cousin is pregnant and there could be Complications; she used to appreciate
My poetry. My sister is getting married,
And I will give her $200.
Even though I haven't drunken a dropp of Liquor since the forth of July, I continue Thinking of you. How strange, when I can't Even spell your name, when another man slips
Into you, when you cry and curse such pleasure;
His DNA is all over you;
You appreciate his well-proportions, like sports
Cars, useless and sculpted,
Unless you have too much money, and
Too much time;
But even now the Hubble space telescope is taking Extravagant photographs of unperceivable galaxies:
The stars as so thick, they make a soup,
But you and I are here together, breathing.
Your lips are delicious: such life, but how strange
That I should never speak to you,
When your friendship would liven me like undeminishable
Words in a perfect book; not like anything else,
Not like a bowl of fruit left uneaten,
Not like cold chicken noodle soup in a thermos.
If I had you, what would I do with you?
I might go back to school and see you there between the splays
Of shades and suns, and however you might look
Unconsciously lulled by the caress of an unacknowledged
Tide, married, and pregnant too. I don't know,
But should you look out into the greatness of sky and See nothing, know that there are worlds and worlds uncountable,
And I behold you the same,
For you are an easy proof for both science and divinity.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eccentricities Of This Nostalgic Romancing

Fit for me a space to enjoy,
To make love with reckless sleuths, girls I could Never pretend to unknow,
Keeping their hair clean in dirty trailer parks:
To snap my fingers and awaken the muse from Another man's hypnosis,
To make love with her as I so choose,
To drive with her through the licks of amusement parks.
To see the sweet animals there, every one with their Hungry eyes pointed forwards,
Not even self-conscious, but still hungry for the things
I am hungry for,
That I see hanging on her every day, though I haven't Beheld her for so much more than a decade:
These things that the city couldn't even think of picking to Sell,
When those angels are already glutting her streets:
And I have loved her, watching her grow old even while
The carnies are taking down the fair-
She seems almost unreal, her eyes as indescribable as the Uncertainties of an eerie weather forecast,
Coming over the old high school and Spain alike;
And now my liver must be the size of a football
While my muse walks her streets that are just as wet as Her turgid hair,
Just as sweet as her child that will for so many months
Defeat the eccentricities of all of this nostalgic romancing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echo Of A Carnival

Alphabet and tongue of rain—cleaning the indescribable
Rabbits in the aloe:
Toads underneath the mailbox—
Toads used to be tadpoles—Luckless ixoras in the garden
That has become so over grown—
My mother in the carport that has become a tomb—
Ghostly light of an ethereal yew—
Her arms over spilled with the grandiose disillusion of
The moonlight—
Her two or three children asleep in their one or two Rooms—
The road leading down into the darkness—
The forest sweeping like brooms—
She hears the echo of a carnival from her grottos—
Bending to pray—knowing that her dark prince will Be home too soon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echo Of A Ghost

White as the echo of a ghost, I lay with Alma:
We do not make love, but we kiss- and it snows in the Sunshine:
I tell her, her skin is beautiful, and I dream of her
In a great university or in the maroon bells,
Who are treacherous but alluring- and afterwards,
Her stomach still aching from
Her hernia,
I drift off to some library I was in at a Catholic school
In Saint Louis Missouri:
My muse has promised to be with me by next year,
And my dog sleeps at the foot of my bed-
And what seems to truly be a god, hibernates only feet Above me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echoes Of

Angles of light proceed me—Soon they will be
Fishing around my skull—
In amphitheaters of skullduggery I will swear
That you can never remember—
Now tell me that you are all right as you roller skate
With your echo—
Even my wife will never discover who you are—
And my children will grow up
Like a garden of pearls beside the sea—
And we will put Christmas trees into our house—
And still the years will echo
But you will never come again to my door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echoes Of A Jubilee

Baseball diamonds of Siamese twins—
And now here I am, separated from
My love,
Both of us living on other sides of the runway—
My words not clever enough to find her—
Just the echoes of a jubilee of a smoked out
Apiary—
And when the waves come in the darkest night
Or in the middle of the day,
I cannot see them, but think about them
As I travel home all by my lonesome—
Just as my tombstone thinks of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echoes Of Firecrackers

The forever brightening cadavers are flying like
Pitches being thrown to little boys
With so much eager practice, being looked upon by their Untried fathers:
And it goes this way, after the sun gets down, and the movies
Relax:
Maybe the fawns nuzzle with the terrapins,
And the witches stop spinning: they pick up their bottles and
Their jacks and dice:
And return to their car and their lucky rabbits:
And if you happen to see things this way, on the movie like
A Merry go Round through the sporting holidays
Of the young life of a goldfish being swapped through the migrating
Midways:
Then you can say, there is a Disney
World: and she will lay atop you and swish her hair like the curtains
Of a stage that shows you everything: and you make love forever,
With your ear pressed as if to the naked grass of the yard
Of a housewife: and even the eager architects of ants
Stop to listen,
Forever: like the echoes of firecrackers under the changing rooms
Of moonlight- What sallow, feline splendor:
Having finally remembered the path home to which you had never Returned to before.

Robert Rorabeck

The Echoes Of Years

Angles of light proceed me—Soon they will be
Fishing around my skull—
In amphitheaters of skullduggery I will swear
That you can never remember—
Now tell me that you are all right as you roller skate
With your echo—
Even my wife will never discover who you are—
And my children will grow up
Like a garden of pearls beside the sea—
And we will put Christmas trees into our house—
And still the years will echo
But you will never come again to my door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Edge Of Their Fingers

My tears salted the rum that is now in a glass
On the weekend,
And in the semidarkness the housewives lounge next
To the pools
Getting everything they want- and the bobcats
Fight with themselves:
They are really inconsequential underneath the airplanes:
And if there ever was rosebushes,
They have passed away into mirages
As the lights of a carousel enfold the make-believe
Like a crèche- I drink as I think about you:
But I don't think- I hear the airplanes
Like the lips of tadpoles,
Spreading their bouquets of silver legs across the world-
And very soon, I too will be leaping across them,
Remembering the sport without reason that
Is bought mindlessly over the holidays
And spent all at once
In another game of chance at the edge of These fingers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eels And The Foxes

Then it feels alright: the stars in their cathedral
And the night coming down through its curtains
Loving what it does,
Becoming married again across the deserts
On horseback,
Talking to itself or to the rattlesnakes:
And in all of this my natural selection- my impermanence
Cried to all of the heavens:
That this is what I do, panhandling to the midway:
This is what I do with the traffic coming home,
Sweating and bejeweled- or other words describing
It I do not know- as the light cast its orbs
Outward upon the brown skin of my muses,
Traveling home with the rattlesnakes and with
The moccasins into a world that I do not Know,
Kissing the turtles resting their who carry their homes
With them- and kissing everyone else in the classroom,
As the light fades
And the eels and the foxes begin their dances.

Robert Rorabeck

The Elbowed Airplanes

As busy as the intercourses of Ganymede—stampeding
At all of the hidden intervals,
The sunlight of courses over all of the fairs—
And the prettiest girls get up and languish without understanding
Any kind of affection—
Playing their parts all over the tables—still life with Unhurried gasps—as the wolves roll their Eyes all over their sumptuous impresses—
Entangled with the horned antelope down in the Crepuscule - along with the puppets and
The venal carpenters—as the rivers softly cacophonies
Beside them—intricate panhandlers in the thickets—
And the most beautiful part of the day
In the shadow of the elbowed airplanes with absolutely
No one around to see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Elbows Of Crippled Songbirds

I used to go to you when there was no one else
To go to,
And I was done with my witchcraft, and the day was all
Wrapped up:
And I used to dream of you and other muses
From the soft crooks of the orange tree where the Oranges grew overly small and tart—
The tree that was filled with all of the abandoned paper
Airplanes,
After the day was done with its fires,
And the sky was filled with the cremations of the sugarcane—
And I thought of nothing else other than a high school
That crawled through its abandoned highways—
Making high art of nothing,
For it knew no understanding of aesthetic beauty—
And kept to itself no high elements—
Just the school children lost through its day until, finally,
Eventually, perpetually, to abandon it
In the early menstruations of the afternoon—like ghosts
To wonder off,
Not caring anything of similes and metaphors, or their Other classes—but loving some of their teachers sometimes—
And careless words tossed up like sacrament for the Glittering bellies of the airplanes—
And in their days off fornications, and weather vanes pointing out
The directions towards golden valleys—
And towards the unreasonableness of the later adventures—
Even after their mothers had gone, and their yesterdays lied
Elsewhere—even after all of the decades of their youth—
The hallways remained underneath the moonlight,
Elsewise pulling in the new echoes of shallow heartbeats—
Funded by the saints of the well-suited egos—
And carrying on as if the perpetual motions of the heavens—
The daylight drenching them like sunlight along the elbows
Of crippled songbirds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Elliptical Victory

Tonight you are my science-fiction:
The fructose I siphon
From the Big-Dipper's ladle,
Hovering over the porch come sunset-
And you're legs,
The galloping comet
Frigid but expeditious,
Moving on as your distant star
Paints a cerulean streak,
Marking the door of the darkening horizon.
You might come around this Decade
To find me contemplating in my room,
You might kiss my neck
Once or twice,
A hummingbird's test,
Before you take off again,
Leaping the boreal hurdles
Since your eyes are hungry
And used to great voyages:
The sojourns you
Take alone in the cosmos' wilderness,
Unattainable by all the gravities,
But you can feel them
Calling to you from their borders,
The way flagella vibrate in the beginning-
That slight feeling you get when lonely,
And then I might hear
Your footsteps coming up the stairs
To stand a little while against the door,
Breathing, but refusing to knock:
The bellicose neighbors growing louder
Against the night's wall,
Before I can clasp you with my eyes,
You have defeated the earth again,
Leaping above us,
Your limbs the triumphant orchestra
Your independent heart conducts
Towards the elliptical victory.

Robert Rorabeck

The Embalmed Playroom

All my toys are bruised or dying-
They've done their fit between the spent Australian Pine needles windswept on
The cerulean carport- and the tortoises are Slow in their crosses of naturalistic love-
They are both each others' lazy bosses;
But she is not there, as I think she should be there
All sweltering in her skirt-
Some gymnastic cheerleader, or her mother a hurdling
Stewardess:
It is best when the play comes across with double taps
Of liquor to the dry lips-
And then the sun caracoles and goes along whistling
Along its way,
And death really isn't no thing- and the paper snowflakes
Are all original and tapered in the poetic hyacinths-
And grandmothers have all resurrected from Their graves-
And Michelle is there, coming down like a wrecked kite-
We're playing with Lincoln logs,
And then I snap rubber bands at her tits- the plasticine
Cowboys and Indians just sit there under the Ceiling fan's Aristotelian rotations-
They won't do anything we won't fist decide for them,
And when I'm alone I'll ejaculate in a sad swath of green,
And real airplanes will leap and fly so
Carelessly in the sky-
And moths will populate the window like paper spectators,
Not knowing why they should ever want in, but wanting;
And love will lose its ridiculous bloom,
And all the grandmothers will die
Back into the darkness of the embalmed playroom.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emerald Tailed Mermaid Caught By A Better Man

Once I came to your zoo- I was only a little boy,
But I guess I wanted to pet you;
But you are already, already made,
A celebrity tailed in a zoetropic aquatic glade-
I bit my tongue and held my breath,
And you wagged your tail, and it did the rest-
Even the centipedes sizzled, and the paciderms sneezed,
And even the longest of husbands became wobbly
Kneed:
You were with the pythons, the slappy otters,
The amphibians lay in your muddy vanity: I swear I came
There ever day and never once noticed the beautiful fans
Of the female peacocks under the mangroves:
I just thought of you, as you swam, the last thing not extinct
Since from the conquistadors;
And you waved your auburn hair like an auburn fan,
And you waved your auburn hair like an auburn fan,
You slipped tinny minnows between your bright red lips
And stared and stared- You must have been contemplating
The waves of your stolen land,
Never once engorging on me pressed against the sheet glass
With a balloon, ever grateful that some greater man
Had captured you and tamed you in a tiny pool in this Modern land- So I forgot about cars and airplanes and movie
Theatres, and was just glad that I had come across you,
The emerald tailed mermaid caught by a better man.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emotions Of The Blind

Now it seems that the dreams
Are causing nothing in me;
And for her, only her daughter
Is real:
They go on family field trips to
The movies,
Where in the easy darkness they
Weep for no one,
Their blood of each other
Hand in hand,
Learning the emotions of the Blind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emptiest Hall

Dying off in the albino savannahs
Where the boomslangs sing over the freckled shoulders
Of evangelical though tasteless wishes,
Haunting through the rippling amusements that panhandle
Across the Diaspora
Of petulant flora and venal fauna; and it all happens on these Days,
The sunlight rattling up through her brown gaze,
Happening to come to me as some sort of witchcraft of a song,
Gathering her body
As she gossips along:
The hills all empty save for their carcasses of gold,
Her ancestors resting through the rosaries manifold;
And it all seems to me as if answering the reluctant echoes of Some strange prayer,
Like the hallucinations of school buses who all seem to Be circling there in the deepest somnolence in the sandiest
Wave,
She cries with her brownest of eyes; as the terrapins eat the Orchids over my grave,
And my bravest of brave uncles water-ski; her throat drinks
The wine of her thirsty skull,
Like school girls who echo down the emptiest hall.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emptiness Of Motion

Now the grounds have families which the dead are Waking up around,
And caracoling like concessive aerals, or the watermarks
In a unicorn's horn,
And the family is bright but full of clouds, and it sings
With the forest fires which persuades the beasts,
So all at once every tree is aglow with a fierce Christmas,
As if with the lights of angels,
So proud and consumptive, but in the end feeling consumed
By the emptiness of motion.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emptiness Of Sunlight

Walk out into the emptiness of sunlight:
Yes, the sarcophagus is good enough for any man
Even in the open air the brightness of his Greeting hall
With a glass in your hand and the girls,
And other people selling things:
Tourisms and seagulls and weddings.
Ghosts are in the fort you shouldn't believe in,
And secret ways in the dogs go by star-lit night loping
Up to the walkways of coquina,
Lifting legs on the green copper canons; and I would have made love to you here, but you were A lesbian, or a Mexican cleaning lady only good for Dousing rooms and candles with your tongue and Such and such,
Just like I'm only good for two dimensions,
My lights attracting bugs, bologna sandwiches:
I've lost my keys in the sand and I haven't a hunch,
And too demure to look all the way up the avenues where You or your sister would have me look. I am only
A second degree, bruised and scarred but not enough for The museums of Bukowski- I saw where they buried
The murdered woman but did not denote her grave with Hydrangeas: I am not good enough for stealing little things,
Not even prayer candles,
But can sit and watch the waves coming in until morning,
And by the next day the sun has cleaned out my drinking room
With no body watching, but so many bodies going either way,
I can lie here; or, I can do the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emptiness Of Your Car

I am dying in a pontification of shadows,
And perhaps I will never have
To be famous-
But my body will succumb, as it were,
Underneath the
Celebrations of your sororities,
Just as if I was the very earth underneath
The jubilations of the heavens,
As another song dies out as:
As you just make love to him again
And again,
Through the pageantries of four particular
Stars:
Do you not know that they've already
Burned out,
After you've driven home in your car:
And I've tried being beautiful,
But I've all together given up,
And this is just the apiary left gossiping
In the very pornography illuminating in
The emptiness of your car.

Robert Rorabeck

The Emptying Highways

Sabbath is out in the open—
Sabbath looks like a tree:
And your mother and your father are Having guests
Taking their flowers to the graves
And looking up:
Everyone speaking Spanish over
The fort or over the hallucinations
Of the trees:
They both belong together,
Flagella of their species—
Round a bouts of merry-go-rounds—
Children growing up in circles,
A bouquet of the dizzying roses:
And I don't have to believe who they Say they are:
In the morning, they will be just Another hallucination
Like the fireworks who are gone
Saying their busier séances to
The emptying highways.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of A Snake

Poison at the mouth and at the end of A snake:
Other ways on and out of a canyon that our Teachers made us pretend to be
Real:
We will start off slow tomorrow:
Some birds will build their nests underneath
Their arrow planes—
Some bicycles will be stolen, and some lions will Yawn when the housewives
Return home before their children in the busy boughten
Estuaries they become estranged in:
Outback of which the canoes will float just
As coffins:
And into the flickering dance of candles
Into which their children will come home estranged in,
Hapless and dancing:
So far from the groves of the poorer and working class
Children:
Where my muse lives—lighted up like a roman
Candle dancing beneath the catholic church
Until she is a single blue window too far away to see—
And my words have drifted away—she never has to Worry about me—
When she awakens—what will she remember—
How will she dress herself—and when she hears the airplanes,
What will she hear, until she finally
Hears my wife returning home to me—and then, it wonders,
How will she ever go about returning home
To him.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of Humanity's Aspirations

Any poem can start this way, or
The way the rain shower begins to caress the roof.
Slowly, there are less cars going about, and the Palm trees' dancing is blurred, and out past the lips
Of sand, the ocean is in a frothing ballroom;
The neighbor's cat is draped in aloe, swatting the Spotty moonlight in a dime of drool,
And little children like in picture frames know
Nothing but their dinner set before them,
And the laughing on the television; And the man
And woman at the table taking in eyes, and playing Cards: here in the soporific meadows, grazing
Taxis come with visiting relatives, and I hide
Between them, the little light illumines my bedroom,
And with a bottle set before me, clasped before me,
I want to get drunk and hypnotized by this nonlethal
Storm, and pretend by the sway of gentilities to Be beautiful, as my aunt steps out of the car-door
And approaches the stoop. Soon she will enter,
And shake off those drenched garments she has worn,
Slip like the littlest obscurity beneath the aquarium,
And sleep there while the rain resumes contagiously.
I quiver at her breathing, and read a line beneath the Spider's ostentatious spume, as a tram like some ancient serpent Clacks its sparked teeth above the highest tenements of
The rundown neighborhood; by a little more shower
There should come a sea extended from the ocean,
A draping change, but the whole household is still asleep
As outside I imagine a sorority hurries by the window,
Clasped together by tassels and perfume, and above
The nodding aunt, a single eel weaves black and gallant,
Just a single eel, like a lost ribbon in the tank of water.
I wonder what it hears, and if it should understand that
The rain is gathering, moving the cat up floor by floor,
Waiting to enter and jettison the place with all its possessions,
And then, I should say, my aunt should float there in Blocks of torpid current, the eel freed and lacing beneath
Her unconscious spine, until she should awake carried Far into the stretching forest beneath the spire of a woodland

Church, such a symbol appropriate for the End of humanity's aspirations.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of It

So much plodding grief
Cannot open up the silence,
Metamorphose the ugly duckling into the Grandest novel that it is so blinding
That all the socialites and suburbanites can do Nothing but serving it drinks and take it to bed
To service it:

This is a very sad thing, laid bare in the Car port next to the forgotten four-wheeled sarcophagus,
The rebar and extinguishing amphibians.
Next to the mouse chewed orange extension chord
My mother was twice severely electrocuted on while
My father was fixing the neighbor lady's washing
Machine,
Getting help from all those self commoving Mexicans:

This cheap liquor tastes like pumpkin juice,
And I am a very sad man,
Sleeping in his room underground now for over five sad years while His ex associates repositioned themselves with Jewish lawyers
From south Florida
With similar persuasions and dining out habits:

Oh, I once loved to play make believe out amidst the Affluent white pillars all six of them that my father had perceived
By selling so many tomatoes for so many dollars
Out amidst the mosquitoes and water moccasins:
I had an entire retinue of paper airplanes,
Supported by legions of green plastic soldiers and war-
Painted Indians.

Now my letters skip the canal like stones, but I am
No more a teenager cutting snowflakes from clean white paper.
What overgrown holocaust has brought me to this point
Where I must proceed down the mountain or disappear from my Petty crimes everyone else has forgotten:

I stole from kindergarten and I've written twice a dozen novels

That won't sell-

I am a lazy atheist with two dogs who love me even after Everyone else have left the gloomy classroom
And christened their happy lives with that new car smell.

This is the end of it, the country of a terribly complexioned
Mind. My two dogs are my children,
And I'll take them with me through the blackest of all forgetful
Waters-
We'll play fetch in Hell.
I'm sure you'll pay no mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of The Page

They seem to be calling me home:
And isn't it astonishing that this is what they do,
To make love like
Tigers face to face underneath the fences and the Ferris Wheels
While my blood permutated with rum until
I am a foe of baseball
Cast aside underneath the swing sets the other
Ways busied by the makings of love:
This, end to end, is my own estuary—
Mouthed my the tadpoles who haven't yet
Dreamed of stewardesses: this is what it means to
Her, coming up, dancing in the kindergarten
Mouths of the fire—growing like a weed
Or her own instrument: maybe she will remember
Nothing, or
Maybe she will have to learn to kiss so
Many mouths just to make it to the end of the page.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of The Road

Scarred in a night of dime-store forget-me-nots:
But they forget me,
The beautiful ghosts in their oh so beautiful haunts:
And there are olive trees all over the crests
Of hills of Spain,
And old gods who are now all very well taken care of;
And bartenders serving their insouciant drink,
I continue to croon for though now coughing like
A song bird in its infected mine:
And they carousel with their strong men who are Pumping the horses up and down,
And S- is in Colorado with dark eyes and Storm clouds:
What is she doing there,
A young female child at her hip like a thirsty gun:
I want to run to her with four legs to run,
And leap the fences, the briary Appalachian fences
Fabled with fat scuppernongs while my Great uncle is still water-skiing on a great lake,
And I am trying to save face with my muses,
With the girls I love,
But I am too drunk,
And my liver is a football that has never won,
Never touched down,
And I am obese and lonely hanging in the shadows of
The singular graveyard that always keeps its hopes
Down near the lake,
At the bottom of the hill,
At the end of the road.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of The Story For Girls Who Are No More Than Three Feet Tall

Teardrops from the armpits of an airplane.
Do not complain if you have been forgetting to cry about me.
I am right here, in the crèche of the evergreens
While my mother in law is whispering about me
And taking care of my two children—
I can see you suppliant, child-like-no more than Three feet tall. Just as I saw you in the flea market yesterday—
I have been selling things that are not real underneath the sun.
Will I see you tomorrow? Or will these words continue to Go as they are thrown, as the feed for chickens—
Mindlessly shopping for greeting cards with rainbows
While all of the unicorns are kidnapped—
And will this then be the end of the story for girls who Are no more than three feet tall

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of The Week

Scarred like my beautiful aunt with
Ants in her pants
Listening to bluegrass in Tennessee:
I am f$cking home again, home with my dogs,
And getting nose bleeds,
Jacking off the belladonnas to Sharon,
Wishing I could nuzzle up with her sweet young child
Getting fat,
Listening to guns in roses, getting chapped on her
Paps while the age old horses suckle up to her wayward
Kazoo:
They suckle up to her age old kazoo, and this is just
What they do;
And I suppose I'll just have to spend all of my money on Whores,
On whores who really love me, on whores;
And the day this day is a game show, an unlucky gameshow;
And I cant remember the last day I held another woman's Hand, when her toenails and fingernails were painted up
All day since
Christmas,
Since Easter,
And where has she hidden all of the eggs if not in
Her husbands crooked basket:
In her husbands crooked basket, and I just want to come Alone into her creche all alone in the yard right next to
The baptized car while my parents or her parents where making
Love and shaking the house from side to side,
And not suppose to be upsetting the china, but upsetting the china
A little bit,
Like the anonymous women buried beneath the rose thorns,
Buried beneath the castle where the fat and beautiful tourists
Are always driving the machines to and fro
And demanding more ice out amidst the cookie cutter esplanades,
Never expecting that they had no hope of surviving even until
The end of the week.

Robert Rorabeck

The End Of This Thing

E- says she's jealous,
But she still watches her team of boys sweat,
Pumping the cherry iron of fire-engines
And corvettes:
And she has no time for me,
And somehow she doesn't have to comb her hair:
Fair E- is just another constellation that
In some ways has time to Pretend she cared:
And I helped her move more than a decade ago,
Where I loved her in the truancies of My bent mind,
But I no longer believe in Eskimos,
And she's already told me that I am not Robert Frost:
I am not Robert Frost,
But I skipped like a stone for two weeks
Across Saint Louis,
And I thought of her like a dog gnawing on my bone,
Until I was spent and ugly,
Like the ancient mint of an ancient penny:
Something almost worthless,
But in some small way still valuable,
Like a strange animal you might see jumping through
The clouds,
But not so unusual that your friend sunbathing topless
Beside you
Might not agree that she sees me as the very same Thing you pretended to see me as,
As you didn't care,
Erin:
You took my bouquets and f-ed someone else,
And you didn't care,
And this is the end of this thing falling through the Drinking fountains not very far
Away from our high school where you never really cared.

Robert Rorabeck

The Endless And Inevitable Night

Soon they will outlaw bullfighters,
And I will be homeless, disfigured and in an orchard
That doesn't
Bloom:
Alma will be up on her hill, making love to her forgotten
Soldier,
And lighting off all of my unrequited fireworks with
A smile;
And I will be howling like something really pitiful
Who can't keep track of
His ambitions whose only places of importance
Come at strange moments
Down ill refuted highways when the moon is well hung
And the werewolves are making love to Banshees,
And all of the stores are closed like roses into their Perfect crux of night,
When even the airplanes have folded their wings to say
Their prayers,
And the most beautiful of kindergarteners have closed
Their all too salty eyes for the endless and inevitable night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Endless Goblet

Barbs in a fish provide the pain
Which eventually produces the jewelry of
A soul—
I stop wanting while the daylight mends,
And the busses turn around
In their usual rituals
Just outside of school—
When the daylight fades, chapter-books
Close that no one reads—
And the highways start out which no one
Follows—see them winding their ways
Through the parades of Midnight, like water-breathing snakes
All captured in coral—
And the beautiful blue eyes of the Cheerleaders are all so far away—
Never dreaming that they could
Metamorphosis—
And the night brings the endless goblet
To his lips,
But your steps are nothing that he
Can swallow.

Robert Rorabeck

The Endless Loam

This night is helpful when you don't Want to believe in colors anymore,
Or her name:
And it is only the mosquito piercing your Inner thigh,
And the airplanes are flying low,
But the stewardesses don't care:
You've had delusions of immortality again,
But they aren't serving you:
Like a wilting firefly you sit and mope,
And the sun comes up and you get swept Underneath the fiberglass table to become
A dusty show for rats,
And she makes love to men of her own class,
And the swing-sets tremble always wanting the Hinges of human bone,
And you still love her but she is never home:
Neither day nor night is right for her love,
As the airplanes fly low across the swarthy
Caesuras of the endless loam.

Robert Rorabeck

The Endless Shell Rock Road

If my body is cold,
It is because my rum bottle is empty;
And my girls have gone shopping:
Maybe there are still airplanes leaping like the last Wonders the fireworks have to give,
With their captains of patriotism, and their
Many other though similar things:
And there are seas on either side of me, because
This is my America, just like both of my muses,
Slumbering, busy off of selling their liquors:
Worn out like beautiful dolls hung up in the sugar
Canes,
Hung up to open the eyes of liberated black men to
The work of their crooked knives:
But I can only think of the sky right now, rosy as shells
Turning the colors of swing sets so pink and wet
As to be good enough to be her legs,
A girl I used to love in elementary school who has changed
Her names,
Returning to me like a letter taped to a dove,
Wanting to tame her and move her closer into the suburbias
Caracoling high school I used to run away into
And masturbate, while she is something more feral with
The attention span of a blue eyed egret:
She will fly away like stewardesses in the penumbra of Seizuring debutants:
But you will never come, after smelling the dirt tilled from My wrist by the fangs of defeated serpents,
You will fall back into the anonymous six pack of another
Fireman,
And your big eyes will engorge and frighten your children,
And your leggy and marvelous carnival will move a little Further,
Further down the endless shell rock road.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ends Of The Earth

I dream of you,
A beautiful woman covered in satin
Curling up waves in a make-believe sea
Where the sun is a light-bulb
And the clouds are swaths of cotton.
My hand is the gentle fish that swims
Towards you, leaps and circles,
In a playroom as you disrobe,
For you are the newest allegory,
And when you breathe the sea moves
And the room dips and dives
In the swells of your chest,
So I swim beneath you like a thing
Attracted to the parts of you that Glitter under the sheets,
As the sun warms and you smile
But don't say a thing but wait for me
To touch you, the palm of my hand
The secret caressing sea-life
Which has found you and now swims
Around your sunken cliffs
As you begin to move like the hungry tide in our room
The horizon distinguished by borders
Of blue and white paint where the Sea unfolds, spilling over the bed
The ends of the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Energy To Call Again Tomorrow

Off on the road of too many sparrows, like the lunchtime
Of your lovemaking in the hangovers of tomorrows:
Your pretty family practically taking up the entire swings:
Your grinning daughters, and your sonny kings:
And I thought of you while I was spinning above the earth,
Gathering up momentum so I could wish for all you were worth.
But now my parents are home, and so I must go;
Maybe I will have the energy to call again tomorrow but Who am I to know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Infant Shakespeare

Say his name, and watch him disappear
The artist in the valley holding his guts,
The tassels of green, like a distended forest,
And his eyes the very surprised things
Who though mortally hit,
Continue to swear by the stance that
Up in the universe, in the carrousel of Modern light, there remains a ruthless meaning.
Down against his feet, the dead men go tapping,
Miners of his better thoughts,
Eager for him to join the static dance
With the janitors of done fore bachelors,
These slaughtered ilk, her very stepping stones,
Buried in the natives' condos,
The fraternity of the endangered heart,
Thwarted and mortaring the dungeoned plate:
A column of male bodies in the caravanserai,
A resting place for her fast automobile.
Leaving her sounds to entertain him,
She drinks the lips of a dispassionate John,
As he walks in weedy paths perambulating
The gray stones, thinking that any moment,
Like a faithful dog, one of them will be his.

Robert Rorabeck

The Entire Earth Soft As A Bed

Not entirely silent pain- but nothing very educated-
I lay footloose down the runny easement, and by Alligators am I congratulated:
And barmaids go around twirling brindled in their bars,
And sommeliers continue serving diamond dwarves
In the vales of deep mountain gorges;
What I am really doing is singing in the carport of the Newly sweetened ride; my body thumped around
By the gosh-darnedest soul inside: a little child crooning
Across the dashing terraplane,
Zooming through the orchards, picking in his brain:
And the waves curl like lashes, like saddled rides;
And the forts of scrubbed coquina diademed by copper
Canons with loafs of teaming tourism inside;
And I have been to many fallen places, and I have fallen
Of myself- I have lost a girl who loved me, and who I loved
Myself- But the mysterious woods yet crenellate the horizon,
And there are necessary footpaths to choose from that Lead every which way to the cemetery; but before all that Red hooded girls, like saccharine poison arising;
And they will be needing guiding through the slender groves
To pick those sweet blooms who sadly are always dying;
But for awhile these fairy-tales are so finely boned as to be angels;
They are almost flying, and if I can keep their fare weather nicely
Planted overhead then I can grow restive and smile,
The entire earth soft as a bed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Entire Terrain Of This Earth

Somewhere here the pilgrims sleep:

They get boyfriends and rum, and you are already home,

Alma:

You have driven across the acclimated plains of West Palm Beach:

From Military to Okeechobee to Congress to

Cherry,

To Seminole and now you are home, and your mother has cooked

Carne and frijoles for you,

Because Mexico is the greatest of labyrinths, and you have all of

Her in your eyes,

Alma:

Your love is a fear for my soul, and it goes around my fort beating

Its dismissive drums,

Knowing that you have already had me: and I am defeated:

I am just a jewel in the throat of a dead crocodile who could never

Learn how to cry:

And I have been to college, and I am just this: Tomorrow my house

Is being treated for termites,

And I will work with you tomorrow under the pistils of absolute sunlight,

Because I did wrong and chose not to leave with my father:

What am I doing here, Alma, besides that I absolutely belong like

The insects to the undeniable perfumes of your brown flowers,

I have no choice but to concede:

And the trucks walk the street as the airplanes strut the sky,

Alma:

And I want to be with you when you become an abuela, Alma:

I want to experience you as new words come up from the depths and show

Their beauties to the egoistic surfaces, and make them weep

Until the entire terrain of this earth becomes the absolute sun shower.

Robert Rorabeck

The Entire World

See your face, a new virgin seen in the snow fields,
Nothing unhealthy- a religious hallucination like landmines
And helicopters;
And your father steps out of the dark waif:
He steps out of the dark waif, and the mermaids of ash weep
For him;
Giant trailers pass like wind chimes- Even they are crying:
Cats are falling from the sky,
From your eyes,
And the tourists are your sweet and innocent acolytes. Maybe they Put you on the news, but there is now no reason for news:
There can be no speculation, and your husband wakes up
Singing every day, because Really doesn't he have a wonderful occupation?
And you are stamped like a wine stain over your neighborhood of Pentecost:
And conquistadors are driven to you. Gypsies set up shop
And movie stars cut their wrists just to be remembered by you:
The moon in its gibbous theatre is a lamp for you;
And the sky above the mountains is the boudoir of your saint hood;
Down the street little boys are playing pinball,
And you never have to go to school again, but step out and listen
As each snowflake is perfectly unique for you;
And really in all the weather it is yet perfectly clear that the entire World has fallen for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Entire World Sleeps

Getting drunk,
And I don't remember a lick of Latin:
Just her face perfect across the way,
Like a constant dream of a house I
Have with her with ivory clasped
On the red bricks,
Up the hill from a quiet park,
A guilty lake:
I listen to flamenco, and try not to say
Her name,
And finish off the glass of cheap rum.
Now that we have a new president,
The liberals wet their panties,
And say it will be Camelot,
But Bukowski is still a scarred corpse
Who is so sober its frightening:
And she doesn't want me anymore,
Not often,
And my fingers are yet tap-dancing,
Like water-spiders controlled by a storm cloud
Who drinks its rum and contemplates
Arousals: Sex? Not for a couple years,
And yet she remains,
Emblematic of the personifications of nature,
A dryad I knew who loved her dogs,
And forgot how to swim in the pools of her
Mother, and her sororities:
I give this to her, as I give all things,
Until I have nothing left to present to her,
What a scarred bouquet tossed
Like a sad dream against her window as she Makes love to adolescent super-heroes:
If she still reads these, then she knows I love her,
But she is too insouciant to care:
She takes her breakfast with maple syrup and Cigarettes, and it took me a couple readings
To come up with cigarettes, and even now
Better writers are making better sense in Maine,
And my breath now smells like the privateers of

The 16th century, but I have two dogs who love
Me, who will both be dead within fifteen years,
And yet I will not forget them while
I still have breath,
And the extemporaneous desire to write you
Poetry:
Dear God, she is so far away, and she doesn't Care, but that is how it should be,
And even now my great uncle seeds a crop of corn
Which will be harvested next year in Michigan:
He has never forgotten my birthday,
And I love you, Erin,
And that is all there is,
And the moon is almost full, and I have a book
Published, and nothing else to do, but to move against
You in other dysfunctional ways of vagrancy:
I may move to Saint Louis next year, and hold a note
For the length of a degree, and you will never hear,
But I would like to take you down into the bottom
Redness of the Grand Canyon and peruse your neck
With the folklore of extinct Indians
Who scavenged naked and ate the plums off of Cactuses along the trails they made,
Before my desire for your gold made them extinct:
And can't you see how beautiful it is,
Even in your little city, how I have carved your name in Uncertain stone, and given my name rightly, I Am a conquistador, and your lips such a blessing,
You would never know,
And so I honor you quietly in the diminutive ways I know
From this un translated basement,
While my dogs sleep, or for what it matters,
The entire world sleeps.

Robert Rorabeck

The Entirety Of Her World

Powers fill my gold toys, simulacrum that they have Chosen to hide in the keystones of mountains:
Breath in my lungs as I remove her to the bedroom, into all
Of the warm loneliness the experts were sure would Remain forbidden-
Getting nearer to her, even as we crawl away into the viaducts
Poured into the mouth of a parking lot goddess-
Where the tiniest of ants begin hyperventilating, where her
Breasts become the meat for unapologetic sparrows:
And kidnappers get too lazy and go back down- like kids
Who still wet the bed scrambling higher to light the Gas lamb of some stony lion of weathered pugilist:
Just because this is where she happens to be tossed, stolen
By the gods who have long since eaten themselves,
Made to weather the cryptic nourishments down through
The lavender abutments until it is all just some words she has found,
Crying to her like her daughter at her tit, and she must decide Whether to lift her blouse and let the latchkey in, or Step away further into the million fired night- to kiss new Gods in the airy grapevines of their perforated apertures-
To put an end to my fears, as she looks down, her nose bleeding,
The entirety of her world left behind and driving away from her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Equality Of Nature's Opposition

Doves as innocent symbols:
You wear them as tattoos,
Services whose job differentiate
The bodies of souls,
The kidnapped children which
Speckle the stream like flakes of mica
On your lower back,
The arch at play,
In the hot box of the sweaty glove:
Your eyes linger like divine hooks
Of fishing poles:
What will they say?
What will they say and answer,
When laid down?
The learned scratches on backdoors,
The canine faithfulness of tongues,
The routes you take in and out,
Moan filled colors
Inebriated and hosts to the cockleburs,
The weeds that grow as fast as children,
When the blackness of your eyes
Shrink of recognition of want,
The playground of the upper thigh,
And the fingers instruments
Which start the business
The cotton-gins and assembly lines
Pressing together youthful abdomens
Meant for coming together
The equality of nature's opposition.

Robert Rorabeck

The Estuaries Of Common Happenstance

Golden yards fawning in Afternoons glittering in the filigree of daydreams,
And housewives finally swimming
Their,
Their toenails painted by the patina of the Canals-
Oh, what a beautiful, suburban world- filled with
The truancies of little boys:
Their hearts leaping like goldfish coming to
The midways of the housewives
In their slumber less afternoons:
Can't you see they are up
To no good:
They are parking cars outside of doctors
Offices,
And spending most of their time with themselves,
But it is a beautiful avoidance
In the estuaries of common happenstance
Where most of us are said to live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eternal Flame Of My Very Soul

When the bodies lay low,
They become the breath of whispers in side the shells
Of vanished homes,
While the Cadillac's hustle and otherwise words make names
For themselves,
While the graveyards are peacefully gossiping now
That the young boys have come home,
And I have seen Alma's eyes in my own house,
And I have pressed her flesh to bone,
Like dampened butterflies on wet flowers, like traffic sloshing
To return to a warm dinner:
I have felt Alma's tongue pressed there too:
And her body that whispers and floats like a wave of paper over
My body:
Whose stamp is there, as if sealed by a queen: because Alma is My reyna,
And these are letters to her in the high school of her own Hollywood;
Or these are just the fruitions along the sidewalk basking underneath
The desk of her tawny legs,
And her very being is a water fountain of an unobtainable spirit
I would aphoristically all to gladly die for to obtain,
Thus quenching the eternal flame of my very soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eternal Negative Of The Most Beautiful Mountains

For an hour,
In love with the subtle rain- and then a prognosis:
There is a rose clinging to the Gentle face of the gingerbread house:
It doesn't move,
Butterflies come and make love:
This is the only place that the humans and insects
Will ever know-

The officials hurry by and arrest the delinquents:
They were kicking out all of the lights of the beautiful neighborhoods,
And now my sister has progressed:

She is make more money than I ever will,
Or, at least she thinks she does:

After the storm,
My wife takes the children outside:
It is late into the afternoon- I am tired from looking at emptied
Baseball diamonds posted by boys who will Always be better looking than me:

I take a picture of myself and the Grand Canyon:
The eternal negative of the most beautiful mountain,
And then we go to sleep thinking of trolls:

Above our beds, the face of the heavens storms-
And lucky boys get rich before they fade away:
They die;
After riding all of the roller coasters of their graduations,
And after making love to all of the multitudes of girls:

They settle down towards the séances of their graves-
And in their cemeteries of splendor they are able to sell for awhile,
Still composing after the multitudes of their deaths-

And I am fortunate enough to remember these things about them,
Because, angrily, my wife has taken the children outside for a walk,
Besides the busied cars and beneath of the hurried airplanes,

She has gone off for awhile to breathe-

And the beautiful boys curled up into the rucksacks of the cul-de-sacs
Of their neighborhoods, and, having closed their eyes,
Can remember the Barbie dolls of their earliest, nascent neighborhoods:

And the beautiful teachers that each of us once knew have curled up
Underneath the bridges, their toes being eaten by the most innocent of minnows,

Having been eagerly defeated by the trolls hotly stemmed from the control
Groups of their cannibalistic societies:

It is over for them and so they slumber, troubledly:
But you seem to yet hold over: an imperfect vision, such as if blurs of stained Glass:

For a moment, passingly beautiful: a drunken pilot may have noticed you,
Before you matriculate to the stately agricultures
Which hemmed you in and made you what you are:

But now the finer features of your skeleton are vacated to the glaucomas
Of the night- petrifying birds all of nocturnal features that are blooding their beaks upon
Your glass,
Trying to invade your bedroom:

There you are, a slumbering doll, tossed
About into your upstairs somnambulations: I remember when you told Me that my poems could have been beautiful,

But now the tears of the rainstorms are wrecking your bedrooms,
Holding over the green stems,
Pretending to break their necks-
And I am waiting for my wife and children to return home,
So that I might remember how to turn myself in,
To crawl into a bed of my own
And turn off all the lights.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ethereal Fables

Yellow ribbons around your favorite ponies-
As your little sister swells in the meadow
Underneath the mountains I climbed a decade ago:
She remains so sweetly even After the trout fall, blossoming, dreaming of Tattoos and piercing,
As her older sister gets up in the morning to Gallop to Ocala:
My muse, where are you now, across so many Railroad tracks, passing around
The strange estuaries where you swore
And spit and gave her cadaverous sacrifices
Of your love,
And the pine trees waited along the spines of
The mountain that fires kindled
Until her birthday was over, and around midnight
The bears carried torches approaching her,
Cognoscente of their ancient memory and
The ethereal fables in which they abounded.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ethereal Rises

If that garden is here, it is no longer beautiful,
Trained as it is to look up at the sky
And to wait for rain:
The mountains around her are beautiful, though
Scarred by the fire
And the uncountable fireworksâ€the things men
Have sworn and sold into her:
She is the garden's brighter sister,
And she rings around her,
Protective'as the sun leaps over them,
A headless animal'
He too is in a rush to find the things that he can Resell, as she waits in her captured world beneath him,
Her sister a bride to the ethereal rises in those mountains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ethereal Turnstiles

Resins over the four corners of the earth, and Mexican hands picking watermelons- supposing this was Always where they were meant to show up:
Busses leaving high schools and disappearing down familiar
Roads-
Running through the smoke of chalk and seashells, trying
To raise up some god just to pass the time until they can get Home to the trailer park of their Television:
With the sky as rich as a snow pea: as slender and fragile,
With the airplanes smoking through
The ethereal turnstiles.

Robert Rorabeck

The Etiquette Of Your Parents' Bedroom

Adjacent to any animals of any kind - as long
As they can talk, gossiping beside the canal as
We did the water fountain;
Your spirit flies away over the sugar canes: back
To Mexico, regressing like a poisonous
Butterfly- going over the volcanic fields
Where the rattlesnakes wallow, and the trucks
Lay forever. The pigeons sleep inside
Skulls without any milk,
As you come to your forest and bloom for him
Your brownness like a diurnal architecture:
You flow back and forth, mystified in the Etiquette of your parent's bedroom,
Metamorphosing back and forth for the man you
Love,
As your unfaithfulness dies across the rivers
That are never named.

Robert Rorabeck

The Evaporating Sea

Another day finding out the tricks of angels:
My muse's daughter is almost three:
Maybe she is almost my daughter too- as the trucks
Are loaded and loaded underneath the Parapets of angels,
And the sacks of heavenly apples are loaded upon
The backs of stalwart ponies to be Taken to other kingdoms across the blue and Yellow mountains-
Along their way, the grizzly bears will pet them,
And the golden monkeys will pull on their Reigns:
And when she gets up tomorrow, my muse will See all of the bottles I have emptied to carry these Messages to her
To be thrown in the evaporating sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Evaporations Of The Gardens Of Her Shadows

Pulling in the vision of Another dousing crepuscule—
The crickets sound against the foothills of
The mailboxes
As my son coos in the next bedroom—
Life in its effervescing metamorphosis,
Through loves and deaths—
Kittens mewling up against the lips of Rattlesnakes—
My shadow going down to chase the carcasses
Of bottle rockets—
Making the song that no one hears
A dozen times or more—
A housewife at the door of earth,
Living in cliff dwellings:
When she sweeps out her door,
Stumbles over the moon,
Trips over the blue cat who is also infatuated
With the evaporations of the gardens of her shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Evening Missive

Quartz sloops sail the depressive mountain,
Brushing the coned lips of steaming pines,
Where the slumbering half-light tips towards
The forgetful holidays, where the mulberries
Grow entwined with the recitations of failed criminals-
Black men stripped in blue denim nod with the elements;
Grouse pull teeth like camouflaging dentists,
Beneath the cicadas removing the flack, yesterday's practitioners,
So that their legs can fiddle, which always brings evening;
Sad in a long black veil of weeping distances,
The nibble flood of the sinking grief colonnaded by shadow;
On the expressionless pine needles, she kneels wishing to hear
The sea, though the whispering hills of unconfirmed forests,
The pews of mineral, and clefts of burgundy insects;
This certain answer greets her prayers, as the wind
Winnows the clouds a piece, and the prince of rattlesnakes
Approaching slithers, opening the venomous jaw, offers
A kiss to the sensitive joints of the hand's missive wrist.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ever Setting Sun

They dont keep their kilns anymore I still write poetry,
And those who blow glass are imperfect,
As the day fails into night over the golf courses and beautified
Apartments of America or Disney World
And when the heart strings get into the gut of her,
She can rise up and sing to the dolphins she will Never see except for on the television
And then she will go down again-again, letting her first born
Suckle upon her breast
She will never know what it means to celebrate Christmas:
Christmas, as my first wife will never know
She will rise up in another world, from a bed made of Dinosaurs and vampires yawning: she has never seen or Even heard of the woods but for now she is my muse,
And her arms stretch in yellow branches
Never knowing what she does to me as I think of the Children we will make to become Underneath the overpasses of the ever setting sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eves Of The Weary House

Coming down from your tree,
Your teeth clenching fruit, I can see who you are
As your ankles nimbly go,
But when asked if you were one of the survivors,
You said no, then bit your nails as the clouds hurried
In like young professors into class, spilling insouciant
Books, casting shade-
There was only a little blood until perplexed,
Your eyes fawned on fields further away,
And so you fell, but its wasn't too far....
Like origami caught in the hands of the wind
You took your bow so your jeans were painted green:
I tried to read you, or so I've said
Until the sunset and the clouds repeated themselves,
And there was no more light to follow your beauty by,
And your daughter ran away so I could never see her face,
Though still you remained there underneath her bows,
Your hair curling down in little temptations of undying cells,
Your lips matriculated a little ways from themselves,
But you did not cry;
For all I know, you remain there still just a little ways down,
And the dirt road to you is lined with shells, and immaculate
Fossils, the creations of your ancestors,
Pressed into your palm with scrapes and blood, and the waves
Hurry in to see you, bringing in the flood where blossoms swirl
Like pirouettes of little girls, though still you remain so calm;
All the way up to your neck, the water kissing bows,
And still your remain like an opal statuette with eyes
Of teary salt, as your mother calls and calls,
And the sun finally sets across the eves of the weary house.

Robert Rorabeck

The Evolving Overpass

Now I am going through the pages
As I am still standing here—
In my little house at the end of the woebegone
Street—having touched my lips to
The crumpled list of muses—trying to remember
To do some good for her:
To go out on my bicycle on holidays, to buy
Turkey or ham—to get as far as the intercostal,
Where the waves become as tamed as polished
Jewels,
As my homes settle down around the vanishing
Animals, the tree frogs and the vipers
Who are not here anymore—maybe they were Never here much, anyways—
Maybe they were never meant to last—like a
Franchise on its last leg,
Limping for a way home beneath the apathetic
Penumbbras of the evolving overpass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Exact Definition

Our time was held up as you were looking
Beautiful
And I was drinking rum:
I saw you for but a moment today, Alma-
I gave you fireworks on the run:
And you said that you no longer had a car because
Of me,
But I told you I would buy you a car,
And now that I am sedentary again- Soon I will Be sleeping like a Mexican,
In my house that I have made for you:
So come to me because I have nothing I wish to take
From you;
I only hope to fill our house with flowers and Children and when January comes again,
I want to hold hands with you in the Midway of the State Fair,
And take you around the jubilation of cantankerous
Motions,
The happenstances of joy, the flips of drunken song birds,
For in the middle of there happens to lie the exact
Definition of how I feel for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Exasperations Of A Ferris Wheel

Into those actions dancing—youthfulness—
Full bodied—torso of still yawning grass
Spindles around the exasperations of a Ferris Wheel,
Needing your art down a highway
Going up to Saint Augustine:
My hand in my own yard, and what lies beneath her:
Sea shells bivouacked in the road:
It all seems to be a dream—after my sisters have Grown up,
And my muse is married—carried away by Predators:
She lives across the way, and the moon covers
Her, stealing the light that pretends to be hers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Exegesis Of A Fairytale

In the night tending home-
After baseball- when blue lips smile
And wrists grow
Scars underneath the illuminations of swing sets-
And snails stretch out and proceed
Uphill and into a graveyard where Grandmothers sleep perpetually who were Once daughters and then sisters and Then aunts or mothers-
But eventually all grandmothers underneath airplanes
And smoke signals:
Resting beside their own daughters and across
The street from the Virgin of Guadalupe-
Perpetually waiting for their husband,
As the horses eat the grass beneath them,
And the Indians echo in the foothills of sundials,
And their grandchildren continue on, laughing,
Skipping,
And going to see movies in a town an hour away:
Through the evergreens and the aspen,
Past the drunken Indian towns and flea bitten
Dogs and book stores:
Thinking about making love- of metamorphosis
Just like butterflies, to eventually travel through so many Rainstorms, to return to the exegesis of a fairytale
And end up beside their mothers who keep Them weeping in their arms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Exhaustions Of Far Flung Mornings

Managing another birdbath into its grottos,
Until the infant sunlight sings up on the cut glass of Mountains,
And the zephyrs turn around in the zoetrope of missing or Abandoned airplanes;
But the planes are as of yet vermilion and good for Growing and sustaining, and even yet out of doors,
The cowboys will eventually come in Leaving their horned children to the moonlight and Rainstorms;
And then they can have all they want of candlelight,
Gossiping to the hearths of their romances
While the Indians dawn blue paint and headdresses,
And speak intelligibly of another world which they will surely
End up in once they disappear;
Even while their enemies awaken perpetually in the exhaustions
Of far flung mornings that should not prove to be real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Exhibit Of Your Thoughtless Well Of Souls

These words die like lucky rabbits in rock gardens:
And you've been speaking so long with your Blue eyes,
Getting hitched up on buses and making it all the way
To the Rocky Mountains,
That I just want to self-publish you:
And it is just like a dream, you and your sweeter, older Sister walking out amidst the saw grasses in
Saint Augustine
Where the conquistadors didn't have to survive,
Where I have tasted the sulfuric tourisms of the fountain
Of youth after midnight;
Erin, while you slept with you guitar bearing boyfriend,
And I looked up the skirt of a day glowing lesbian
Who is now in San Francisco while you
Are still in Gainesville, but not Georgia; and this is the way
The white buds weep before they metamorphosis:
It is strange, don't you think the way they turn into orange:
The chrysalis, the day gone metamorphosis:
The pungent aromas of popular kids,
The tadpoles into hapless princess, like monkeys and goldfish
Into mermaids;
Erin, I still wonder what happened to you; and more so why
Do I keep having to do this; and who do you love,
Or follow into the rainbows of unabashed Eucharist,
Like the leonine salts that baptized the side of Christ after he came Down in the crepuscule of this latest Christmas:
This pain I feel is like tadpoles in the shallow basements of a
Canal,
My mother out walking her eventful streets full of fits and Criminals, and what's more I have been kidnapped forever into
The exhibit of your thoughtless well of souls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Expressions Of His Face

Women are easily fooled
By the expressions of his face.

After 4 months I shave,
And even my own mother calls
Me a prince and begins snapping
Photographs to hang next to
Her favorite smiles and teeth.

4 years ago my girlfriend left me
After I came back from Colorado, bearish,
She cried how dare I show up at her house
Looking like that before her parents,
How dare I?

And she went to walk alongside a freshman,
Who still didn't need to shave. Will he kowtow
To her flimsy ways, the recessive nature of Her color blind eyes, when it comes time for Him to become a man and grow a beard?

Or will she cycle down through younger men,
Until she is old, withered and alone? A spinster, eyesight Still poor, Herself beginning to Beard, I will think of her fondly and call her grey whiskers,
And drink alone to that.

For how can a man in good conscious bend
To such a fickle wind? How can a man with something
Raging in his head, be reduced to the insubstantial whim
Of the very thing built to be receptive to him?

Jesus died the lonely bachelor, preferring the long
Spear in his side, to the naggings of his mother and Mary
Magdalene. He grew his beard long and dark, rooted there,
As he to his faith, he would not take up the Roman traditions,
Clean-shaven homosexual wisps that delight in the surfaces
Of flesh.

Nor will I when what I have inside me is the wild, needing Thing, I want to keep diving deeper into that chaotic abyss,
Into the monsters who always prevail at the end
Which know me and make love to me when the very last of Women look away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Extinct Paths Of Conquistadors

The sun gets so yellow it gets nose
Bleeds 'fumbling for oxygen as the little Children lead one another away
From school:
They are climbing up the orchard,
They are pushing up the swings'
They are acrobats in charge of their own
Holiday 'singing to no one as they please'
Pretending to map the extinct paths of Conquistadors 'settling down to eat
Something sweet they have stolen,
And then getting up again
To steal into a Catholic church in the middle Of the afternoon'
To fall around dizzily beneath the rafters in
Their headlong canopy,
Or to collapse next to the water fountain
And oleanders out of doors,
To become mottled as the sun freckles her
Branches 'to languish there,
Lungs falling and rising again like membranous
Wings without any reason at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eyes Of Dr Tj Eckleburg

Here in the cuneiform of light,
A privilege of the drunken window
I recline beneath on a Monday's afternoon-

I am in a pilgrim's crèche in the green arms of
A mother they have planted to beautify the growing highways
That bring so many things back and forth

So that we can survive according to a social hierarchy
Deemed worthy by god,
But which Satan cannot identify:

Watched over by
The eyes of Doctor T. J. Eckleburge
I think of a woman who is not my wife,
Whose soul is lost in the mountains of Guerrero
With the fading carcasses of the butterflies,
The detritus of the carnivals

Vomit of the waves,
Ejaculate of the centaurs and the mermaids-

The pretty favors of the things we over spend on holidays-
Underneath the tents in between the runnels of Miami-
The airplanes go leaping, long and forked-tongued over this-
Our pornography,

Forgotten as the cicada sheds its skin upon the bark
Of the pine,
As the knight leaves his carcass to this dragon,
As the mother leaves her car for the supermarket:

Her children have made a merry-go-round of a tree
Dangerously deep in the woods,

As the pretty favors lead us around all day.
The night rejoins us with the shadows. The airplanes
Touching down, cool their wings upon the earth-
The lovers pick up stars in baskets, their unabashed nudity

Approaching the horizon

Where her unanswered favors try to remake themselves,
Such impotent protestations keep them separated from
The out of door heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Eyes To Find All Of The Hidden Birthday Presents

Another place in the meadow
Tumbled down from the side of a forgotten king—
I suppose we can stay here awhile at least until
The sunlight is replaced by lightning,
And the tourists who once stepped here in their abeyance
Came down to kiss the minnows in valleys,
Realizing that they were the charlatans,
The divine pawns bedecked in their finest mental absence—
Like school teachers and drill sergeants,
And I can pretend to find you right here,
In a library, in a cornucopia of misspelled supermarkets
Spilled out of the heaven's baskets,
And the bosoms of the mountains—five year olds' fingers
Fondling the grapes and the paper backs—
And languish and contrive, pretending to have the strength
To pull elk antlers from the darkened forest—
Pretending to have the eyes to find all of the hidden
Birthday presents—
And laconic joys that happen as the waves practice their Abeyance at the feet of the stone crossed cenotaphs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fables By Which She Fans Her Children

How an infant forms words, I imagine,
Like eating its first snowflake abandoned in the Empty yard,
Seeing only red and white where the cars are sleeping,
Remembering how its mother breastfed her
Every which way from Sunday,
And then picking the syllables out of the alabaster sky
Where the airplanes are loopy,
With eyes on their wings as they are beginning to Touch down- Stewardesses giving valiant instructions
First to quarterbacks and thus to everyone else-
Yes, it's the same way she will pick out furniture to Surround her husband, cannibalized syllables which
At first taste very good to the just learning virgin;
At first unique, godly and feral, soon passed around and Socialized, and sterile: She doesn't think to imagine the Finger prints on her sofa,
The stains on the bed secreted by the nocturnal bullhorns
Of overworked organs-
She comes down to the basement in straight lines,
And still I turn head over heels for her, poking my head through
The old fence in the backfield, looking in since I've been Stealing cars
When she thought I was playing baseball:
the fables by which she fans her children:
Yes, everything good is beautiful,
And her lips walk the elliptical yards of their velveteen ears,
Teaching them how to melt the taste of snow, whispering
As she cleans the rooms,
What they already expected they would hear.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fabulous Water Fountains

I've bicycled for an hour through
Palm Beach to the high swings in the svelte park
Across the dunes and the fiberglass beach:
And I've thought of Alma and touching her brown skin,
Like the lingerie of a feral mermaid who
Kisses you once never to come again:
And now all the world has become dark, and all of the mailboxes
Have closed their lips,
And there are no more Ferris Wheels even though I know that
It is even better like this:
That I can only sleep with her on Tuesdays, even though
She gets to open up all of her presents,
And even though I cannot teach, I am lucky to be working in the
Fruiteria next to her brown skin,
Even if she doesn't know that she fully loves me,
And I turn her about and make images like a high spirited
Storm front in my frontal lobes,
And maybe now she coos to her daughter, and maybe she longs
To look into her mother Rosa's eyes:
And when I look at her from a distance, she almost
Looks like my mother: and that is why I long for her, as the manless
Ships sail the invaluable seas,
While the starving pornographies await their newsletters,
As my many fingers tremble like whelps for the fabulous water fountains
Of her shaven legs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fabulous Water Fountains'

I've bicycled for an hour through
Palm Beach to the high swings in the svelte park
Across the dunes and the fiberglass beach:
And I've thought of Alma and touching her brown skin,
Like the lingerie of a feral mermaid who
Kisses you once never to come again:
And now all the world has become dark, and all of the mailboxes
Have closed their lips,
And there are no more Ferris Wheels even though I know that
It is even better like this:
That I can only sleep with her on Tuesdays, even though
She gets to open up all of her presents,
And even though I cannot teach, I am lucky to be working in the
Fruiteria next to her brown skin,
Even if she doesn't know that she fully loves me,
And I turn her about and make images like a high spirited
Storm front in my frontal lobes,
And maybe now she coos to her daughter, and maybe she longs
To look into her mother Rosa's eyes:
And when I look at her from a distance, she almost
Looks like my mother: and that is why I long for her, as the manless
Ships sail the invaluable seas,
While the starving pornographies await their newsletters,
As my many fingers tremble like whelps for the fabulous water fountains
Of her shaven legs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Face Of An Artist

I do not want to laugh where your green-eyes are Partners—
In the subway where you stare at my father,
And the abandoned notions of your cousins come in
And come in—and come in:
You are overcrowded and there is nothing left
To be stolen—when I look at myself in the mirror
I no longer think of you,
But I do not look at myself for very long:
Here is not the face of an artist—nor
A teacher—already growing the shadows that
Will come tomorrow, here is a man just trying to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Face Of An Artists

I do not want to laugh where your green-eyes are
Partners—
In the subway where you stare at my father,
And the abandoned notions of your cousins come in
And come in—and come in:
You are overcrowded and there is nothing left
To be stolen—when I look at myself in the mirror
I no longer think of you,
But I do not look at myself for very long:
Here is not the face of an artist—nor
A teacher—already growing the shadows that
Will come tomorrow, here is a man just trying to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Face Of The Heavens

Experiment of my torches
Held out into the night like bouquets
Of volcanoes:
Lighting for awhile in the primordial
Half-light
Tender bellies of just born airplanes,
And the strange inhabitants of that jungle
Where in the rivers are still
Young-
Just flowing from her tears, as she appears
On the lips of the mountain:
And looking down she cries-
While blue rookeries crowd her eyes,
And take nest in her sadness:
Soon she will be flooding over the world-
A biblical flood,
And I will not know a single thing about
It,
As I lay in my playgrounds of corpulent
Flowers beneath her,
And her emotions make a flood plane of
My world,
But I will watch the flowers grow as Fat as trees-
And I will climb up them in to that ether
Or miasma,
And watch her weeping down from
The face of the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Face Of The Moon

We were entering the fall-guy's study and
It was an interesting thing, becoming a part of the show
(The sunlight fell upon us nice and slow)
As I looked up into her eyes, green bivouacs—
Dimpled shadows lingering in the carport besides
The rebar coalescing with the art of dusk:
Strange families who stop playing games—as it
Rains remembering us—
Illusions over her body like some ghost's hands—
What will they say about her now that the Rattlesnakes are coiled in the yard—This place
Is almost a trailer park—the things I remember
But no longer have caught together in a net
That also catches the face of the moon, the endless
Traffic passing by unstopping.

Robert Rorabeck

The Faces Of My Mortal Gods

The sound of running domesticated water
Means my family isn't yet asleep;
And I cant look at my face in peace behind the Yellow curtains;
But that means that I shouldn't have to weep,
And Diana is coming in the morning,
With her sport cards of body and cold beer:
And Diana is awakening into the world a new Virgin,
And the airplanes are awakening down upon her
And kissing her wrists as if courtiers;
And all the countries are at peace, and I can't think
Of any better words for which to use to describe them.
Someone is still taking a shower in the heather,
And my two muses are making love to better men
Atop the better mountains; I can hear them from here:
It sounds like they are starring in a wonderful musical,
While I am just frantically trying to swim,
Or to survive another night to keep the candles burning
So that I might still see the faces of my mortal gods
By them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Facts Of The Others' Romances

Somnambulence of dreams, of desperados in the Sahara
Mouthing off again,
And riding busses that appear to be close, but who are miles
And miles away;
The littlest and most beautiful flowers bloom:
Teak appears on the waves and then Disappears,
Like children coming from between curtains and saying their Acts:
And there are ships on the sea, like brides even though the sea
Is wounded,
And everything I've had to say has been imperfect,
While the jungles breed with diamonds
And new wives find jobs and lovers, while all of the time the Waves roll like the chaos of wheels,
And the monsters win, but maybe we are all the monsters:
And Sharon is real: And Alma is real;
And I remember sleeping in the student parking lot instead
Of attending classes,
And I remember the emerald jubilee of the swings even while
The teachers were saying stuff,
And making believe with my peers the facts of the others' romances
Which I could never bring myself to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Failing Lights Of Day

Insociantly, she broke up with me,
And made love in her memory to him in a bedroom
Just beneath the stars:
I got drunk and tried to eat cue balls,
Pissed in the mall's wishing well, or tried to down
Several fifths of vodka the stewardess
Used to lubricate on long flights: She moved on in her plastic
Catholicism, in her alluring sways, pantiless
In a plaid school girl uniform, a garter full of folded Dollar bills.
Still drowning in the easiness of the dismissal,
New scars grow like coattails on cheeks, not easily
Dismissed. And well-developed housewives stare alongside My avenues not quite adequately equipped with the souls
Which can meet my gaze; and it is funny to think upon
The new séances which may be dancing down those Pubescent halls, the catcalls and the foreplays,
And the new fairytales she'll use to play with me.
She dresses down and drops into the sea, and lets her curves
Combine with those of those coital waves, the caesuras
Of navels and the rippling crests of areoled tits:
Entirely naked, she swims like a full mirror beneath under
That sun, entreating and daring me to enter her before the failing Lights of day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Failing Of The Lines Of A Dying Empire Of Spiders

Oh, it can come so far,
Or it can come so slow- oh;
It can be like the sea strained by the dying of
The moon:
Soft and mystical, but neither quite right
For the general audience;
And if you wait out long enough, you can see
Her just as a vision riding away on
Her bicycle: riding away-
The direction she is always going:
Because she is always hungry or lonely and Wants to be in love,
But not with you: Listen to the way she is going,
Christening people other than librarians with
The liquor of her legs:
She is going, she is going, like the sea.
The mythology which unifies all the peoples of our Grand large-eyed countries;
And I will give philanthropically to the dragon,
My cups to her horde, the anemic anonymity of my Leisurely struggle:
My greatest scar I got on July 4th more than two years
Ago I got for her and liquor,
And it is the greatest proof that she exists,
And not yet like the extinct sun birds that with the frogs
From the carport of electric cars,
Not the like the failing of the lines of a dying empire of Spiders:
Her name rings such mythology after midnight and if you
Awake early enough you might see her riding away
From the naked theatre outside your pool,
And all those other specific euphemisms no one reads,
Heading east to meet her lover
Who will soon be holding court over the oldest town in all of America.

Robert Rorabeck

The Faintest Idea

Rains have stopped for awhile their bemoaning,
But I am so sick that I think I would like to die:
I pee in a cup,
I turn my head and cough and pretend playing doctor
With myself:
Outside, maybe the cats are streaking across the Palates, maybe they have invented a new color,
Or something that can be described as real:
Maybe she is flooding with tears and taking the greatest River down to a home
Of darker slavery where yet the coolest lights of Amusement play:
Maybe she is selling herself into another bedroom:
Maybe she is becoming another woman for another man she Loves;
And in the yard or the garden, over grown, there
Is baseball and marble thugs and teacups talked over by Little girls who don't have the faintest idea where I belong.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fainting Of The Unfortunate Twins Of Marie Antoinette

We will all be socialists soon enough, but the dogs will continue debating through the night;
The little thefts that much more unclear,
Yet the poetry will flow like blood from
The lips of the guillotines; her beauty will pay
Us all the same, and she will love us in a smoky Union out the door of the chortling cabaret;
Jubilees of leggy flirtations, our hands on her thigh
And further up as runs the floorboards,
As we move the trailers go thump and rattle,
Shipping the produce over the cobbled stones
Starting out in the earliest mornings, as the monochromatic
Harbingers leap from the radio waves of wire-framed Towers, the way storks migrate around storms of Apoplectic pregnancy; and in the great dusty tears
Of the global depression, we will gather to hear the Monikers of the men who hoard the wheat;
We should spit and curse, and hold her red silk dress
Up a little more, the same color as her consumptive
Lipsticks;

I can't wait to fill my blue jeans up with her red fingers,
And the faceless washers of our tomorrow's currency.
And listen under the furtive corrugations to the loose-change
Of the rainstorm,
The infant's milkless gurglings,
The empty trains' hustling, and the thudding bodies
Shortened by just a head,
Rolling into washing bins, like stricken doves,
Or, taken all-together, the fainting of the unfortunate twins of Marie Antoinette.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairground's Verdant Yards

Space-shuttle looking nice in its place above the trees
And palaces
And movie theatres—
Over all of the forgotten parts of the world—maybe you
Haven't even completed your mission,
But she is here:
Floating over the forests—
Over the mountains that lose themselves and their
Summits in the daylights—
Even with the most gentle of slopes, the little children
Become lost upon,
Become foundlings of beavers and bears—
And their fingers linger in the spotlights of the orchards,
Hoping that the angels and the genies will place
Whatever delightful jams upon their finger tips,
So that they won't have to linger for much longer—
And they can lose themselves in the daydreams or wherever it
Is they can find for sure
That the lighthouses and the windmills talk to them,
Spinning in the sunbeams—and apexing in the buzzing apiary of
Their fairground's verdant yards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairy Tale Of A Glass Coffin

When my corneas dilate,
The clouds grow-
Her legs get fatter,
The birds fly south;
It snows-
I indulge and read most of
One of my novels;
Its good, its d*mned good,
But she doesn't call,
The forest is disinterested,
And the professionals are too
Scared.
The menagerie has taken off
And are busy selling their eccentricities,
Performing in the clearing between
The stripping aspen-
Afterwards, its time for sleep in
The fairytale of a glass coffin-
My friends wander off with the crowd,
The torches dim into kissing rooms;
Daughters who have failed wear nothing-much red,
While I continue to cry sacrificing
The words they shall fail to hear,
And the dwarfs in their mines continue
Pickaxing for birthstones,
The gifts we would all care to bathe her in
If she were ever home,
This milk-opal spume of the sinking bachelors
Only desperate mothers love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairy-Tale Of A Mermaid's Kiss

The final common man crossed me with his sword,
Said there will be a night beside the sea when the lord
Will rise,
Arms outstretching, a denouement epiphany,
And there the tourists will graze like lawnmowers
Morbidly obese, paying for the time, while the hookers jaywalk
The street in migratory herds, following the cocaine
And little children farting in their reddish shorts; the freedom
Of the open hands sign-giggling swath the mausoleum,
Butterflies injunction into the trees, the belly-dancers that Move in place, jiggle for the Japanese businessmen,
Making time in a glass house served by topless stewardesses,
While the clouds are mimes yet coming awake, misconceived,
And the professors, they are nothing more than water
Under the cleft of outer space, shelved in a bluer abyss,
And untouchable by his cousins, loneliness a single ant
Crawls across a body of incest, tangled in the sweaty sheets:
A chorus of eunuchs honors the symbol of Christ,
And a guillotine greedily eats the rich,
But it is mostly beautiful when nothing moves, or if seeming
So cannot be proven empirically, for this is only this,
A rejection which did not consider the consequence, nor
Was he the recipient of the prized kiss, but out on the yard
The day must go, panting like a season, not a tortoise,
And the waves are surely unclothed, a chorus line who have Long forgotten the fairy-tale of a mermaid's kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytale Summer

Sun bathes the unicorn
And I write poems
And drink rum:
I write poems and
Drink wine—when I want to Feel like a woman:
When I want to feel like a man,
I drink rum:
I go to school to teach children—
I go to the same school I graduated from—Parsimonious echoes—
I don't know how you feel,
Under the same banners—under
The same flags—
So far away from the fronteras of Arizona
And New Mexico—
Lighting the candle, the cat drags out
The wick—
Children sleep over, little brothers get sick:
And Jack leaps over the whole goddamned
Earth—
And Jill tumbles to the well,
Broken temples in the dirt—
All around them the day is another day
Older—and birthdays—muses evaporated
And muses metamorphosed—
Colleges like sand castles disappearing in
The waves—
Long poems, dreams that hibernating bears have—
Parks in California—
My wife in Shanghai, China—waiting for me
With all the hope in her heart—
Like a graveyard of beaten Ferris Wheels awaiting
The fairytale summer of their resurrections.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of Airplanes

Right here in the uncut grass looking up
At the fairytales of airplanes:
Taking their time like languishing super heroes
In love with the memories of the picture shows:
Of the clouds,
And the hills beneath them, purple and green
Seaways without sea, urchins scattered with the Upkeep of stones along the railroad tresses
Where all the girls I have loved have disappeared,
After their nights out at wondering,
Their dogs and unicorns still hungry: maybe they Went into the park to metamorphose, but when I check they still aren't there,
While their mothers bend their yawning elbows in
The kitchens, happy as if it was their birthdays,
Never suspecting that it might have been that very Sun making their shoulder blades blonde which also Stole their daughters.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of An Ocean

Laughing, finding shelves of turtles
Like hordes of
Rhinoceroses and candied apples baking
On the easements of the canal—
Blue gills waking up early to Sing for the stork's breakfast—
The homeless men fasting on beer
And the clearest espionage they will ever see:
Cops search for them,
Forgetting to buy their housewives roses—
The day turning into pigeons—
Three pigs nearly homeless but happy—
The cars in a round about way heading home
To graveyards in the soft mists of Granite orchards
Try hard to listen to the fairytales of an ocean
Not far away from here.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of Our Yesterday

Finally you have come to me:
A girl who appreciates my soul: who undresses and makes
Love to me,
Even if she still has two children, and the easier
Ways to more comely bicycles;
And even if still my night is all alone, underneath all of the Cathedrals of the bones of stars;
I rightly muses of even more I could never say:
There she is again basking in my auburn basements of my Bemused,
While all of her eyes swim so infatuated with my comely
Scars:
She swears that I cannot have these things, and I drink liquor
For her and enter into soliloquy;
And it feels all right underneath the shores, even though
This evening she has wrapped herself
Back into her extended family who have left me naked
And starving like a homeless wave;
As even, in fact, she has cast all of her penumbra's amusements
Away, and I am left like a zoetrope without it's shadows;
And like a body without his grave,
Even while her body did sing to me, and did become enlivened;
And did swear to me to marry tomorrow;
As tomorrows happen again and again like the promises of
The fairytales of our yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of Stewardesses

Off on another shoulder, freckled and Upstairs,
An angel wing in a bed- the sheets cerulean:
Of course they are halfway covering your Mother who Lives there at night and makes love to your Father
In a room like hands clasping the neck of your House back pressed against the woods;
And all of it is empty:
The alligators grinning full of blue gills and half
Devoured pornographies-
And your baseball players that you don't know
Halfway up there and chewing in the half light:
Fireworks pretending to be amused,
And then you skip school and masturbate in the only
Orange tree in your yard
As it blossoms smelling like a math teacher's Substitute:
And when you go down, you go inside and into
The air conditioning, folding paper airplanes
And filling them with
The fairytales of stewardesses you swear one day
Will be yours.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of Yards And Afternoon

This is how they remember themselves,
Looking into the stores where they bought things—
All of the heavy ornamentations hanging
Around
And around—like more words to be used—
The same sunlight playing upon the yard of another day—
Beautifying the memories
Of when they used to laugh like wind chimes in the Classrooms of their
Fairytales of yards and afternoons.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fairytales Of Yards And Afternoons

This is how they remember themselves,
Looking into the stores where they bought things—
All of the heavy ornamentations hanging
Around
And around—like more words to be used—
The same sunlight playing upon the yard of another day—
Beautifying the memories
Of when they used to laugh like wind chimes in the Classrooms of their
Fairytales of yards and afternoons.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fake Diamond Tabernacles Of Being Your Friend

I've been doing it so wrong, needing more Liquor to propagate my unwholesome song, going the Long ways around my lake, around the river,
Feeding my liver to the fish and Garden snakes:
Now this is a topiary of missing parts, the stones so Beautiful as to bring art running, but making as Little sense as another pagan revolution:
And I've been crying out the names of the girls in the rain,
Wanting to play in their baseball diamonds:
Wanting it to transcend before school, before all of this
Started out so it wouldn't have to end:
And this is broken and weary: it doesn't even cost a dollar
Either, to see how I will die.
Maybe Erin thought of me today, while she felt his evil spears
Up and down the world,
What he'd been singing, lying in bed with his girlfriend
Two stories above a pool of yellow lesbians;
And now the cat doesn't even know that this is going to have to End:
I want to love your senses clear: I want to do chores for you,
Or have a truce and compromise- defeated, I could be mollified
Into the fake diamond tabernacles of being your friend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Falling Snow Which Matches My Own Memory

If read you hear the sirens,
Though they should be turned off to mourn the Dead,
Maybe I am holding hands with your grandmother
In a game of possessive blue tag:
This is the way we caracole you, summit you
With prayer flags:
And there are no two snow crystals which are perfect
For each other,
But it is enough to memorize the street names which Caracole you,
To pray for lightning to strike him dead- to pray
To sweet necrotic pervasion:
Because there are shells and ancient coelacanth under Your vinaigrette stilettos, and this is the way you
Must come whistling under Tesla's celibate inventions,
Everything upon you medicinal,
A sweet shop if full soiree, and I pray for you in China,
And I dig holes through the sea
Just to peek into your window and see you there,
The falling snow which matches my own memory.

Robert Rorabeck

The False Lights Done Burning

Speak plainly in the emptiness of
A cathedral;
It is beautiful singing where there are Rats, making scatter over the Broken murals
Of a dilapidated religion; so many Unrequited failings,
As there are burned rafters
Where she once made love to her piano
As if she was some woman coming directly
From a French movie,
Composing after paintings of my grandfather;
Some woman, also, who fed her cannibalistic
Brood up on the gurgling shoals of
The venomous grotto, shedding oily scales,
As I did tears;
The kerosene lamp burning along with the Sulfurous fireworks;
Pale against the rummy tattoos of her besmudged fathers.
Founder of a school of thought where her
Student, skeletons, laughed like mute jackals;
Was she capable of loving, pantomiming with
The shadows in the cave where they Butchered sharks;
But she kept on coughing laughter with them,
And it was the last darkness coming up over
The sea she existed in,
But by the time I interested her, the horrible music
Was no polytonal desperation, but
A gesture in a crowd of gestures misinterpreted
With the rats.
The sea felt sick from too much salty confection.
The sky was butchered and she lay asleep, a
Strumpet with her men, all of them in shadow against a wall
Where the sharks hung the false lights done burning.

Robert Rorabeck

The False Promises Of The Sky

Hey, they said you were my sister- another brown
Or green sister,
Lighting her candle on her epiphany of Farewell birthdays- underneath the baseball diamonds
And into the skies of Another town- while you looked so beautiful if
So far away,
And I was trying to grow my fields of Burnished muscles-
Like statuary along
The avenues leading into Rome-
To look up and see you beneath the revelries
Of your tall and gaudy
Summits,
Dressing warm against the cold- until you come down
To me, burning your tail between
Your legs, until its luxurious price tags
Were smoldering ashes
In the fields that no longer exist, between the motel
Rooms and the highways-
As the airplanes took off forever, and you turned Away, swearing to never look into the false promises of
The sky again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fantasies Of His Yesterdays

The conquistadors could never survive,
Because we are all just men
Making love to anonymous women,
Selling Christmas trees;
And I hoped to look into your eyes, but you
Were with your better men,
Or married with a hypnotic badge,
Fully into exegesis and not in need of
A stranger's bouquets,
So I kept doing all that I could do,
Getting drunk and masturbating like the sun
With worse and worse eye sight
Trying to leap lightly forward, but never Escaping the fantasies of his yesterdays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Far Distant World

I want to be weeping right now: I want to Be right here,
Staring down the road after all the comely young
Runways are kidnapped,
And the sea has been taken back by the moon,
And the substitutes are suffering in the adulteries of Bad grammar,
While under the heavens of the scars she left me,
The oranges globe,
And the busses sit and whisper with the phosphorescent
Insects in the forests of their inner pornographies
That this is just a passing game-
A silent fever stopped like a cat at the edge of the canal,
A housewife turned away, cursing the brilliant
Promises of the far distant world
That lies repeatedly just over her unchallenged shoulder.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fattened Truants Of Fine Throats

My father has a plan, or he is just waking up,
And the Mexicans of Mexicans work for him: from Juan-e-Juato
Or wherever I am misspelling,
But otherwise it is beautiful: the things he has done and just has Unforgivable,
As the dogs fornicating with their sisters,
As the nights that are bounding and are never to wake up:
While Alma sleeps in her strange room filled like smoke with the Strange dreams of lovers that will never come again,
And My only wish is to become a better man for her avenues
As the slip away in imperfect stone and stuttering maize;
And all of it doesn't have to be real, the feels that are never emboldened:
The whims that recluse in the shadows against the narrowest of Steps of the prom queen:
This is just the aphorisms of the jest that we have had to for so
Long to be doing:
These are just the words that haven't yet had the opportunity to be Described against the unjailed opportunities of all of the Goldfish that were never waking up:
These were just all of the entrepreneurs behind bars; and these were Just the feelings swimming around in my gut all too happy to have Never have been found out,
Like adolescents swimming in the naked pools of their older sisters,
The fattened truants of fine throats
And lips and tongues.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fault Of Rattlesnakes

Baby swim up to the sun—in your sweet
Boat:
This is your bedroom, and you are dreaming on
The other side of the world—
I am still your husband, and come to the lips—
They have vanished after two weeks:
You work in a graveyard—who are you
Singing your drinks too:
I don't want you to be who I am—
Like doorknobs cast as droplets to the stolen
Bicycles—
Beautiful, confusing through the shallows—
And children who are always going to School have never been here:
Her shoulders, spotlights through a forest
And, yes—Runaways—Like silent deer:
Droplets of blood on her cheeks
Signifying the weekend—
She doesn't have to show up—
The airplanes come and then fly away again:
They are wishes that can never have,
Leaping over a garden that is at the fault of Rattlesnakes—
Outside of our mother's house in a kind
Of spell, which is where we live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Favorite Colors

Marching on the proud disinheritance of time,
My darling your lips are purple and full of dust, even though
Your favorite color is green;
And now you are so tired every time you come into the fruit
Market, Alma;
And I want to ask you how much you have been giving of yourself
To the man who sleeps beside you,
Whose initial you have tattooed on the web of your hand;
And it is killing me, and giving me un pure art,
Like a spider bite that is unclean but not fatal;
And I haven't cut off my ear,
But I find it so hard to orgasm; and the last time I was inside you,
I had no flower to give you, and now you look away to the Bright spots in the clouds because that is where the constellations
Are shining like your children through the day,
And they seem to be coming closer, and taking the shapes of Things and creatures that you can understand:
They seem to be telling you everything about your future,
And all that you have ever wished for you and your two young
And bright brown children,
As they cast such wonderfully yellow but unfrightened penumbras
Across the favorite colors over the yards of your land.

Robert Rorabeck

The Favorite Colors You Avoid

You neither like cats or dogs:

As far as I know, you have no pets of any kind,
Except for the rabbits who disappeared
So conveniently after eating your mother Rosa's
Mango tree:

I had rabbits who disappeared too, who my dog kissed
Unto death in my mother's rock garden;

And you don't like the sunlight, but you like the gold
That I can buy for you:

You can wear it in a band around your finger;

And you love your family most of all, while I hardly see mine,
Though I have hiked with them once or twice down into

The middle of the grand canyon,

But not as many times as I have made love to you,

And you have become a tourism of my art, my flesh a feverish
Banner meant to display itself,

And keep you comfortably in the esoteric limelight,

As I try to grow the world over in the favorite colors you avoid.

Robert Rorabeck

The Feeling Of My Sound

You almost positively sleep in the carpools of our Cenotaphs:
You waver over to me as if we'd both just dried off from
The pool,
And you put your mouth to my greasy fingers and I
Feed you french-fries:
Hot potatoes still steaming from their gunfights:
And guns and model tanks and airplanes and the Hitler Youth:
I want to take you in some abandoned avenue in Lake Worth where no one can promenade,
Where the calico cats serenade, and you'd never thought to Think of me in the loci of rest and transitory amusements,
Like funnel cakes at the fair,
I'd pull your hair and make you pant while sliding to the side
Your underwear;
But for now the good boys love you and the bad,
But I have to ask of your wonder, if you yet wonder if you've Yet to have the best you've ever had.
And the city pouts because it has no fingers to find out
The centers of pomegranates or geodes;
The thick and middle pages of story books, the creamy center of Your soul which would make me fat and happy
And peel out like pop rockets over the overgrown hibiscus of Indian burial grounds;
And I'd make you pop and gun your body until your lips
Moaned for the feeling of my sound.

Robert Rorabeck

The Female Latchkeys

The deer make love to their roads in the Golden keys, while girls just as gold touch themselves
To the waves
In golden chains, swinging, saying spells to the moon:
The lavender behind them of stolen cars
Blooming in the night- the caravans of tourists snoring
Like bears in their motor lodges propped up by
The coral of unrequited loves- dreaming of the Pledge of allegiance, bare-naked as fruit on the vine-
A coral snake in the box of air-conditioning,
Licking her eggy young like princes soon to metamorphosis,
As fountains touch the ankles of fairies underneath the Palmettos- tears and water sweating,
Stewardesses evaporating along their various ways- and,
Again the female latchkeys out in the surf,
French-kissing waves and collecting battalions of seahorses
In their runaway skirts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Feral Languages Of Her Upright Soul

I killed a praying mantis and lost
My keys,
So no one likes me now, but the sky
Is so beautiful
Resonating like a wine glass, saying her
Name,
And the airplanes are the little prizes
Won or stolen from fairs,
Breathing softly like cats or goldfish,
Streaking the sky with the feral
Languages of her upright soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Feral Mythology Of An Unfinished Highschool's Dream

Afternoons of burning up, of sorry reflection in the broken
Promises of penultimate glass,
Or whatever it is I have been up to, trying to summon you
Up from your grotto,
But today you showed me your belly: It birthed Michael,
And it birthed Heidi,
When you were coming to America by bus and I was in the Dark shadows of Tallahassee finishing my thesis:
I would never have dreamed of you then, but I have nothing else
To dream of now,
But you in my little golden house streaking across the floorboards
Your auburn soul:
Alma, this is what I tell myself in the darkness while my belly
Burns,
And I will have to turn in soon after the glass, and the lights are Doused,
Turn in and sleep now in a bed that smells of you,
But that will be impossible: I will see you streaming up the bay windows,
A fountain of butterflies,
And anything else beautiful enough for you to turn into:
How many times did I tell you today that I loved you, while I Took off your clothes and we pantomimed the sea,
And how many times did I question that reality, swearing it was too
Sweet to be anything but the feral mythology of an unfinished
Highschool's dream.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ferris Wheels I Am Never Allowed To See

Stranded through the years of my drunken
Hypoluxo,
You still might think me a little boy playing in the Graveyards of my mothers
Chest,
Even after all of the caterpillars have gone to sleep and Awakened in the hyper-luxury,
Flying away all dressed up as if for weddings of
Who they really are;
And all if this the failure of me not really being able to Speak to you,
To whisper to the pillowy recesses of the opposite sex,
That I know who you are,
Even if you have children who think the sky is a
Merry-go-round,
Or that the best of who I was failed in the Catholic
Universities of Saint Louis;
But I bought a house in which I can freely drink liquor in
Not to be persecuted over the thrown bones
Of despotic Indians,
While all of my love becomes a cannibal eating the heart
Of me,
While you look up your eyes devouring the Ferris Wheels
That I am never allowed to see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ferris Wheels Of Her Soul

Lost in a fairyland with scars above my eyes.
All of the posters taken down from the walls of my Abandoned classroom,
I drink liquor procured for free from
The flea market where I now work-
Everyone wants money or things for free;
My wife's eyes are a colossus that I cannot spell.
Eventually, every child is handed down
From the merry-go-round if they cannot pay-
And clouds build opulent if misbehaving
Castles in the sky:
Each word becomes a lost child in a game
there is no room for.
And I know you are thinking of her even now-
There are ways to her in the darkened roads
Glistening after the rains,
But if you find her, what will you have to say to her?
She doesn't even remember who you are,
For nothing you ever bought for her was ever
Sold to her, and the killers make their own
Amusements out of the Ferris wheels of her soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ferris Wheels Of The Tallest Forest

They have maps and black skin
They leave peeled on the hedgerows-
As on their fences,
And this is just another song, uncountable
In their numbers,
As they've been singing and crying again:
Crying
And masturbating and spending their
Monies to the wolves,
As the fires kick out all night-
And the dogs dance like pedophiles,
As I suppose I have no right to be here,
Underneath the savage lights,
Standing on my feet underneath the restaurants
Where your mothers clean dishes-
Transported all the way from Mexico,
While the skeletons grin-
And the spaceships faint beneath the heavens:
And I've just been trying to give
You this rose
In between the commercials and through the Mirages of the desert: I've just been trying to sing
You my old song,
And escape again to kiss the lips of foxes
Who sleep here underneath the Ferris wheels of
The tallest forest, slumbering in the dreams of runaways
Where I still hope we belong.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ferris Wheels She Gave To Our Hearts

These are the things we have to deal with
In our shells underneath the sun:
Looking out our windows behind the healthy
Ixora at beautiful girls who love
Beautiful vehicles,
Love the way they run:
As all of our mothers have gone away to Worship at the Laundromats down the street:
To talk and gossip,
And cut their teeth on something sweet
As the sun pretends to be a flowering rose
Making a vacillating bouquet out of
The sky—
We take one innocent footstep out of doors,
But we can already smell that the Perfumes of the Ferris wheels she gave
To our hearts have already fled away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Festivals Of A Lighthouse At Christmas

Wounded as true as this- words filling up the empty
Spaces that the cars punctuate rapidly-
And the hollow eaves under overpasses that the flea markets
Fill up on weekends-
While off over to the east there are waves and waves,
Gallantly dying for a woman who doesn't live in them
Anymore,
But whom they can still feel and remember, echoing:
And they going habitually answering,
Like bachelors in a ballroom of shadows in a forest where
All the leaves have fallen
And it aches to be a live, though it continues remembering
The lights that once filled up their throats
Like the festivals of a lighthouse at Christmas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fetishes In Her Name

Oh burning patina of her eyes is full of capitalism,
Or full of the bull rushes her legs give to her Privateering husband in the trailer park of Their night:

How many times don't they strike out into one another
Like dry wood falling into a massacre of sharp toothed
Mica beside the fast running river

Where the sepia colored mountain lion is also praying;
And I screamed like a cat robbing a train,
Because I wanted her:

I tore off all my clothes underneath the mountain and ran
Through the wildflowers just as sharp as a Kindergarten of switchblades until I grew faint and Gave into the occult knowledge in the Country of stones:

So when I finally awakened I began to trade objects of Sorcery underneath the overpasses in heavy weather,
Knowing that she would come this way after her
Shift was over:

And that she would have to get by me to return to the great Unmowed patriotism she was accustomed to;
And I wept for her children while I waited for her
Holding the fetishes in her name,
And knowing that none of us really cared.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fetishistic Seas

She's moved on, and the trees are bigger.
I live inside a shell at a restaurant where it always snows;
I am afraid I am sounding cliché,
But there is always a little grain of sand in her
Birthstone: We used to run together,
And she would push me along and blink her eyes
Along with the sun through the boughs.
Now, of course, the rivers flow south trying to keep up
With the birds- I never leave my house.
My muscles don't work. My twenty-seven year old mother
Sleeps on the floor of my room;
She feeds me my liquor after first tasting it with her lips,
But of course we don't get along:
I want to lead my armies in clothes too small,
With peacock feather and my favorite bowling ball:
And where she has gone to gossip, I can imagine the light.
I've painted my room to mirror her eyes,
How she used to see me and we'd disembark;
She had the voice of Johnny Depp,
And I floated along under her painted nails. In the parking
Lots of shopping malls, we'd look for whales,
But everything was illegal in that long ago kingdom of what
Not- Now she is just someone who answered the seasonal Ululations of a crippled tree frog; instead of teasing me,
She collected me with the fermented pornographies of a bright Haired labyrinth, and drizzled her honeys around my Expressive forehead in the hydrangeas sprouting over the easement,
Until the postman came with different letters for boys
Farthest off than me; she took those as her better duty,
And skipped far across the fetishistic seas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Few Things I Have Yet To Say

Stumbling through a drunken verdure, I am at it again,
Scribbling up at death as he shows up with the dinner guests:
These words like the pits of songs hoping to last for A little while long,
Rejected letters sent by eyes that were first soft and then fell away,
Made love to other men; nor did they mind the rain when the squires
Canned the overabundance of things;
And if you don't like it, there is only so much time before the friction
Of two bodies finally lets off the business of love making,
Of making children, and all that is left is the ever constant traffic which Still seems to echo, echo, while she beats at her forlorn
Breast like a mannequin in a store bought window, emancipated,
And entering the state of being in which she realizes that she can do
The best for herself; and that she is the most beautiful of all these Simulacrum, even if it is only one or two things that she is capable of Doing:
She does them until night goes away, and then she yawns and stretches
Like a puppy dog sapling;
Even she gets heady, already realizing in her makeup, the absolute beauty
Of the few things I have yet to say.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fields That Are Burning Down

Unreal vision of a hard day's heart:
Separated from my family, a rattle snake at birth—
Greatest delusion with only so many words
To settle the crepuscule over the mailboxes,
To put the foxes and the playboys into their dens
Until there is finally dusk
And Sabbath—where the king cobra unflasks,
And unjewels—and you lie in a bed with him
Of brown stems your children bawling around you—
When even in that coffee night,
The flamingos send seashells into the air—
And above the ocean floats the sounds of naked alleys
And the wings hoping there the empty sounds
Of footsteps that never touched the ground—
As heaven floats above your bedroom,
Never making a sound—the same way you make with Him—the fields that are burning down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fieldtrip Of Your Opportunistic Flowers

As randy as a young bull in the spectral
Ovoid of its first dance;
This is how I met you, and I will never meet you
Again,
But for that one night underneath the commuting
Airplanes
I addressed you: I breathed atop you like a bee
With ribs:
I kissed you once and apologized;
I made you sigh, or made you pretend to sigh:
And the room was weird,
But the room was ours,
And I enjoyed all I could, dancing madly, crashing
Into things just as happily to be getting nowhere
Across the fieldtrip of your opportunistic flowers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fieldtrips Of Stewardesses

As long as the stars and the moon don't care
We can go out swimming in the sea. As long as nobody
Can see us, we can continue swimming away—
Our backs pressed like butterfly wings beneath the Zoetrope that is outer space—
There, the wild animals go running in the mobiles of Gravity—and beauties linger with their bosoms
Indentured to the hopeless smiles of foxes—
Hewn into these aquatic estuaries, as if we were skipping school—
We will remain floating in the sea's memories
For a little while—evaporated busses will pass above us,
Of course—filled with the fieldtrips of stewardesses of Long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fieldtrips Of Your Mouth

Going down into the crypt, shoeless, Singing
The nursery rhymes that should exist:
And now all of this stuff,
Blown as if up from the consumptive lips of another
Exhausted and overworked genie:
And I really shouldn't have a home or a bicycle,
But now you are almost home, Alma,
Or you are making out with your man at the movies:
All my thoughts are hung upon what it is that you are doing,
And my father wants money,
And he is counting his horses, while the moon riles over the Cotton fields of the defeated generals of his glorious world,
And I don't care what presidents have been shot:
It is all in the past, and
Maybe it is that you will make love to Nelson again tonight:
Maybe it is that he will be that man of your soul,
Even though he doesn't deserve to be:
This world isn't fair, and all of the pretty lions are in their cages
When they should be out eating their men,
And I wish it was that the pretty colors that I wore attracted you Unconditionally, but at least it is that I have tasted the Fieldtrips of your mouth,
And shared a bed with you that never should have existed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fieldtrip's Playgrounds

And I'll look out with the sun going down—sinking into the crèche
OF a hurricane that will happen to take away our future—
And obscure it beneath the merry-go-rounds, and shopping malls,
And the abandoned book stores—
That your family will live in—having their dinners above the homeless
Cats that skip like coins amidst the gravestones—
And the dead will look up, captivated by their insouciant paths—
Thinking this the birthstones of their heavens—
So you will remain to me, a song without any joy—
As the beautiful girls jog through the greenery upon the campus where Your eyes are always so drunk that they cannot see
And the ocean swell over your shoulders: they are like young boys
Reaching up and learning how to kiss and give bouquets
To the stewardesses who are always leaving their fieldtrip's playgrounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fiery Absences

Going back to school, remembering the vagrant crushes
That linger there through the warn out palmettos:
Trying to get across the canals to the other neighborhoods,
And lingering in the places that certainly do not Belong- Lingering there- thinking upon the pond
Of bedfellows- of little girls whose bones are
As hollow as bird bones:
Returning to them in the after hours of their senses
As they light above you shedding skins like Katydid, like jewels in their kimonos- soon they Will be turning out the lights and coming down
To you- soon they will say all the pretty verbs that Create your world, and bring into it
All of the fiery absences that exist without them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fiery Angels Of Your Best Friend's Older Sister

Low altitude rum puts still living escargot in My ears,
Twirling, twirling, the beautiful little things
With a few cells on the brink,
The new eternity of little girls skipping chalk;
And I can't believe I am doing it again,
Usually with the same old conjunctions and semicolons
In my swarthy hand,
Tossing the grapes- When I want to be a better man
With a fine young mustache,
Want to spread her legs and plant her there
Atop the faithful alligator, and gross the man-dug Rivers across the zoo to see the cages where they Keep the age-old vampire, my alcoholic uncle,
And feed him peanuts, and show him slides of the elephant,
His girlfriend,
To live again in the 80s from a time warp discovered under
The ice of New Swabia, ands the skating rink,
And to make friends again with short haired and well-trimmed
Blondes, to ask them unabashed how is their sex-life,
To read fairy-tales to her four children, to get an erection Doing it- To feel good in the surf of her loins, all wet and Hungry, like being in fifth grade again, a patrol on his Way to Washington DC, believing in the altruisms of professional Wrestling, and that tomorrow I will be a sommelier and have Written something passionate in the ancient grottos of Colorado, while doing this, holding you in bed,
Having faith in the resurrections and apocryphal worm holes,
And going down smiling even as the sunsets on the last day
Of high school knowing that I should never have a chance
To believe in again the fiery angels of your best friend's Older sister laid out and barely altruistic beside the upper-Middle class pools.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fifth Extinction

Here I am, a balloon in ejaculations:
Spuming confetti over the mountain:
Here I am, believing that she is my mother,
The sky is my blanket,
And that the horizon shall go on forever:
The stewardesses serving us peanuts and condiments
As beneath us forever, the snow blankets the mountains,
A mortuary at Christmas:

And in the opulent stadium lights, we display our best
Pictures for the anesthetized audiences:
They who go down beneath the clouds, in a rain forest
Or a movie theatre-
Enjoying their popcorn, their eyes as big as reindeer:

Beautiful dreams told to tom-boys who could not Understand how to take off their clothes and rearrange their Fiery dreams:
The Seminoles are in the swamps.
The steamboats are in their rivers-

And the greater parts of this peninsula have given up all of Their hopes:
They have raised their hands and succeeded to the whitest of Gods who are becoming sterile as we speak:

There is but a moment for beauty,
And for all that is dying but a week:

She works in the shopping malls-
The bare stones break the skin of our feet:

I thought to whisper to you about whenever,
The snowflakes are a knife's blade upon my cheek,
And Satan is a stranger who has entered our small village forever.
After he has won all of the gold from our workers; we will depart
At the end of the week:
He will evaporate right into the clouds forever,

And no one will speak his name. The cumulonimbus will Suffer across the high schools,
As the amphibians will become the fairytales of our extinctions:
The housewives will be baptized in the dying wishing wells
Of our supermarkets until all of the lights turn off, suffering blindness
On our trauancies of extinguishing Ferris wheels.

Robert Rorabeck

The Final Rainbow's Chariot

I am now drinking wine and
My nose feels red and cheery:
I am no longer afraid that my house has termites:
I have lit candles for the Virgin of Guadalupe:
I have a two year older aunt named Mary with three children of Her own,
And I am a sancho: Romero is my unlawful uncle,
And now my lover, Alma, sleeps with her other man who bought
Her nothing on her birthday while
I struggled with Miguel to find a place in the open air market in which The tigers and aces of the wind wouldn't Blow out her wishes before she could get to them:
I weigh twice as much as my darling Alma:
I want to smell her tomorrow
And make love to her again: I want to give her everything that I own:
And I like watching her eat what I feed her,
And when my time comes, I hope that my last breath rasps beneath her soft
Tears,
And she holds me in her gaze while stronger men carry me to a whicker
Casket and then they all drink tequila or something Softer,
While all the garden snakes still bask their soft bellies in the rains,
Gossiping through the lariopi until the final rainbow's
Chariot comes to carry
Alma again to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Final Things Second Hand

Wounds don't becalm: if anything, they are growing like Calves:
The sea is in infancy of green, and Alma is smiling and laughing
In the exact middle of the fruiteria:
It seems as if I have gone away on a quest and found her there,
And made love to her repeatedly
While buying her things, though I do not know if she is A glorious monster or the all-mother of my progeny:
I know that she says that she is no good,
While her eyes smoke golden brown over all of that skin diademed
By all of that jewelry:
All of the wishes that I have found or bought for her, and thus Made real,
While all of the saints go marching over the sea; and I wonder if she Is even at home, or how many rings she will be wearing tomorrow:
I wonder if she wonders how much her children really need her:
Or if they need her as much as I need her,
While the sea is changing its graces, and I have come by the final things
Second hand,
While all of the angels that I was fortunate enough to know are Too busy weeping or were so fragile that they have already passed away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Finality Of Forlorn Migrations

We are here dancing and making love
And it might not even be spring, but I have two Bicycles
And letters that slip through my house like the finality of Forlorn migrations,
And now I admit to myself that I love you, Alma,
Even though that is what I told you all day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Finite World Of Its First Word

I started
With the stars:
The stars
The stars
So far outside
The besieged
City,
How distant
From society
And
Shopping malls,
Feral like
Wolves,
They haven't
Speech
They do not make love;
They are but
Senseless wonder:
The womb,
The kiln,
Unmolested by
This art,
They remain just
As beautiful
As the child
Before it learns
Its rules,
And stands up
To move into
Mortal congratulations,
Articulate though corrupted,
The finite world of
Its first word.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fire Rings Of Metamorphosis

Across from me—a great rooster
Showing its comb to the alley cat:
Like an apiary,
A purser in the heat of an underworld goddess:
And her dungeons this sky,
A labyrinth of carports and washing machines—
The ants fiddling over spilled marbles,
And the arrowheads like claws
Bitten into the blue dunes of the backyards:
Just images,
Now that the jasmines have shut up their bouquets:
And the rainbows have slipped into the Wetted boudoirs across
The canals
Where the stewardesses leap, going through
The fire rings of metamorphosis
That all of the numbed passengers so
Eagerly pay them for.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fire Which Has Drowned

You f-ed up big time
On the other side of the yellowest
Caution tape,
And now I know I've seen
The butterflies flying out of your eyes,
Or your mouth anyways—
Old muses such as you, such as milk weeds,
Grow out from the yellowed
Turnabouts of the bus loops—
No, I am not jealous—it is just your habitual Habitation,
Anyways—jaundice and in love
With lemon grass—
As old professors shoot themselves in the Ass—
And the Catholic churches paint themselves underneath
Of the moon—
Soon, the memories which you cannot Have will be coming home underneath the Equinoxes of the mailboxes—
And you will be just as brave as you can be,
After the fire has drowned,
Like fireworks for the fishes of the sea,
And there is absolutely nothing else which can
Be saved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fires

Warmed in a killjoy of passersby underneath a fountain
Lounging in the lowest clouds of the grass
Trying to be descriptive for girls who have already Passed by
And shoeless boys playing their guitars in the shallowest
Of estuaries
Listening to the hungriest roaring of the most Obnoxious of airplanes: Knowing this is their art
While their souls leave them like spent gasoline
While the coral snakes kiss them in the Certain perpetuities of the yard and the children who no Longer belong, grow up and set up across their Bridges, never mind the abuses of their heavens
Because their parents still haven't returned home
And the sky above their houses is filled with the paper
Shapes that don't even know how to start the fires
In which they burn

Robert Rorabeck

The Fires Of Your Gaze

I hold your broken anklet in my arms,
And I drink wine in the penumbra of my very own
Lights,
And I smell the gold that once wore against the flesh,
The way a cicada eventually sheds its other caravans,
And now it is late enough and you are Asleep with your man: while I am just your other man
On the frontier where your mother once wept for A month,
And it was amazing to be with you, like a terrapin waking up
In the sands and weeping for its mother:
I pray to your Lady of Guadalupe when I go to sleep and
When I rise,
Alma- you are an untouchable vision in the skies,
That the airplanes break through to admire you at close range,
And when I close my eyes I focus my soul to pinpoint
The spotlight that razes the fires of your gaze.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fireworks In Her Yard

The fireworks in her yard drooled up to the gods:
As she took off her clothes,
And thought of the boys who could change into foxes-
And even after the shows,
Her yard was green- green, and the snowflakes and airplanes
Were made of paper-
And she at first made eyes, and then puckered her lips
And kissed the serpent who didn't even know
Her name,
But came through her windows as if through an apple orchard,
Being beckoned by her;
And it told her that it had just been to Spain.
Afterwards, it slept with her all night, and her parents never Came home at all- and in the morning and every morning
After she never again had to go to school.

Robert Rorabeck

The First And The Last Time

Going away anew into the shadows of Migratory amusement—Flipping the soft pages
Of apathetic muses—of girls who hold
Their lips over the water fountain in the resounding Basins of the pearl and gold mountains until They are finished—hummingbirds moving on from Flower to flower—
At first their apartments glow and then dim—
When they make love in the graveyard, it lights up
For the night—the traffic sounds like trumpets—
For the first and the last time.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Car

Graveyards get tired and lay down:
Mountain lions lay off their blue saddles too, and forest fires
Finally nuzzle like birthday wishes amidst the Cinders waiting for a Hollywood forest of aspens to grow out of What they made surrender:
For a second there is perfection, and a snail is the most guttural
Thing, pearling like the open wrist of a bitten into apple
Before that too browns- and the first car is made:
And the conquistadors begin their biddings and shouting and Start forcing their love onto whoever they can;
Just as I awaken to another chapter of lonely morning, and clean my Yellow house waiting for your perfectly brown soul to knock and enter.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Fireworks

Birthered from the soul of some suicidal great Grandfather, whose own sire was shot in the mouth
Over the civil war:
So I do these things: teach in a diminutive room
With now windows for six hundred dollars a
Week—
Thinking of a woman I can no longer have,
Who I shouldn't have wanted in the first place—
So long ago, since when the first fireworks
Wanted for fire—
And the first mermaids experienced metamorphosis
Like tadpoles around the ankles of the briny
Cenotaphs.
Now we only have strip shows and dog tracks—
No clear way out of here—
Crepuscule descends over the parklands and Graveyards—ferris wheels still believing in
Some place that is preternaturally beautiful—
And migrating over and over
Just in the hope of seeing her pretty face.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Honeymoon Of The Earth

Aboard the pretty lies of elbows- looking at the last
Light of the room-
Wondering where the moths are, while listening
To the airplanes:
I am underneath their common flight path to the Sea- in a historical hotel,
With my little dog between my legs. I imagine
That the carpet is vermilion
And rich
And tries to make love with the ocean, and the beauty of
It that resonates when it gets into the bay
And lays waiting in its kind of bed underneath the crosses
And the all night hotels
Just as the conquistadors sleep forever-
And the working girls cannot afford to get off
Their legs-
Unbeknownst to them and all of their business, the terrapin
Are kissing their roses underneath the penumbras
Of so many broken down chassis:
Kissing lavishly, and reptilian- like the first honeymoon
Of the earth, and I am left wondering about what it
Is that they have to say.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Honeys Of Our Children

You are pillaging with your cherry lips in
Autumn,
As the tigers feel homeless amidst the aspen:
And the tinkering buildings of blind men continue pell-mell
Up the throat of the hurdy-gurdy mountain,
But finally I have lived while all of the clouds were sleeping into
The shapes of whatever dreams:
It felt so warm, the bodies playing like bumper cars across the Higher basins,
And making love, and cross pollinating, dripping the first honeys
Of our children,
And making love.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Honeys Of Our Children'

You are pillaging with your cherry lips in
Autumn,
As the tigers feel homeless amidst the aspen:
And the tinkering buildings of blind men continue pell-mell
Up the throat of the hurdy-gurdy mountain,
But finally I have lived while all of the clouds were sleeping into
The shapes of whatever dreams:
It felt so warm, the bodies playing like bumper cars across the
Higher basins,
And making love, and cross pollinating, dripping the first honeys
Of our children,
And making love.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Pleasing Man

The seesaws move up and down bracing themselves
For love or what for,
As the sky caracoles, counting the changeless numbers,
As there as so many of them,
As more and more people seem to enter the store everyday:
What are they doing,
But counting their wares and their small changes:
And we sell indoor plants; and
I steal what I can- I eat a grapefruit, and think of Alma:
She is not working today:
We made love yesterday, but now I haven't heard from her
At all:
I am looking less and less beautiful, of course:
I go to the back corner to weep
And masturbate:
Little black kids are playing the cinderblocks, or they are making
Popping sounds with their mouths
Over the things that they would like to enjoy with each
Other,
Until the spirits finally grow up and take over the past,
Present, and future,
As the stewardesses touch down sighing and letting down their Hair,
Happy that they don't have to say another word to anybody,
Though they are sure that they will happily kiss the first pleasing
Man which they happen to meet.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Seasons Of Watermelons

Street lights who show off their skirts all across
The cannons of church yards
Where the conquistadors have had their sleep for centuries,
Bullied by their own cousins into that coquina blood,
So now that all but Mickey Mouse is lost:
The grand destination for all tourisms, heading up the road
And stopping periodically
To make a wish, while I have been back and forth so many Times,
And through her wind tunnels, as before her windmills:
The lavished thoughts of brown queens who no longer
Have to prove their magics,
Whose little daughters have hair of straw gold, and baubles,
And all of their faults:
They sleep beside the endearing coffins of their most cherished
Grandfathers,
And there underneath the earth and the overturned wagons,
With the plastic cowboys defeated by the
Stained glass Indians in the marble carport during a rainstorm,
Wait to meet their heroes who will be cast there
Under the crown of thorns,
Who they will lead back out again through the catacombs'
Honeycombs;
And coming across their father's sword, defeat the same said things:
Eventually becoming their fathers, and taking the foundling girls
As their brides,
Sleeping beside them in the trailer parks to the good luck charms
Of unicorns,
Holding their breath as their bellies swell like the first seasons
Of watermelons,
Until the entire story comes around again.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Star Of Morning

I am always going back to the swings,
Collecting the motions they give,
The petting of the vermilion air after crepuscule,
Smoking the perfume of jet planes,
Thinking of the girl I love in the black neighborhood
Of the unfamiliar stars;
And the clouds traffic where I go, where the helicopters
Buzz as if in the séance of heirlooms;
And I wish you could see yourself there,
As I see you, as I take you out of your classroom
And dust the crop of sky- giving it all back to you, a playground
For your swimming, uncaring of the graveyards
That your feet could never touch,
If you happened to trust me and took my hand we could Always be children setting out in the motions of Just one curious space, like two lovers in bed,
Curious in the breathless foreplays, devouring each other
In abominable playrooms, sailing in big brass beds
Always towards the first star of morning.

Robert Rorabeck

The First Steps Of Outside

Making love in front of coquina fireplaces sometime
After school,
While all of the debutants were getting ready for
Their decathlon of enviable plays,
Jogging in place, and combing their hair:
The unmistakable angels in the iron clad air, kissing the Follicles of their perfect skin,
The tryst of crepuscule make vulgar machinations
Around the four corners of their house,
Like liquor around an Indian reservations:
But they would soon all go out into this, a sorority fully on
The metamorphosis,
With or with out roller-skates, and making love,
But never so far as to make it across the canal,
Or to think so long of the commercial voyages of the wishing
Airplanes,
As to remember or think of me, as I laid like something
Amphibian against the banks of their parks which they would Hardy think about anymore, which they would so Easily be stolen away from,
Their fast kindled fires burning before the doors of Other campuses, jaunting up state, until they would finally Graduate and become something less than more
All together but one at a time in their wedding processions
That would never even make it through the first steps of outside.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fish Of A Sea Of Rum

I drink a lot—until the story comes to
Mottled snow and my wife
Tells me I have a beer belly,
Which is slightly incorrect or fallacious,
Because in my belly swim the fish of
A sea of rum;
And that is why I keep a classroom without Any windows,
But every third period we stand
And, holding our hands as steadily across
Our breasts as we can,
Pledge allegiance to the flag—
As the airplanes waver off to fight so more
Giants—high across the make-believe
That is surrounding all of us— of this land, that is—
All and all—`nt half bad.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fit Amusement

Forts of cadavers with their Favorite flowers,
Showing off for tourists in the pollinated showers
Of spring,
Eating ice-cream instead of learning Latin:
And the airplanes leaping,
Leaping like the falls of quick silver honeymoons,
Back across the oceans that they once fought for,
And into another time
Where the hillsides of white-sheeted windmills was
The only form of entertainment for
The somnolent lovers, eating of each others' own
Fairytale,
Their tongues sprinkling their bodies with the spitfire
Havoc of little anemones;
And it was a holiday of respite
That I cannot remember, for it must have only happened
To my mothers' mother;
And all that I can recall of it is the dim retinue,
A pantomime scribbled into a vanished high school's Bathroom stall- but it still seems that it
Must once have happened, if only just to give good measure
To the fit amusement of a fairytale country's far Away romances.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fits Of Weather

Sunlight on a snake in between the Rabbits and the caesuras:
And it seems that she has the sunlight in her eyes,
Like the birthday candles of good luck,
While the airplanes curl and caracole:
And Sharon never looked so beautiful, even though
Now I hardly have to think of her,
Because I have different pains that are more impending,
And I house I come home to be alone in,
While my pets move in the north, waiting for me with More faith that I will ever have:
And the snake looks away to other pornographies
Waiting for little boys in the abandoned cars of their Drunken fathers:
And he goes to her, and they curl around for awhile,
Dancing,
While I wait for the fits of weather that I am sure are Just around the bend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flashing Knee Of A Jubilant Curb

Tomorrow all of the holiness will roll away its Stone;
It will not be too commercial, and young brothers and Sisters may even dress out in gray suits and petticoats
Underneath the banyans in the rolling
Hills before the bleachers of alligators and crocodiles;
And I can stare up seeing all the hidden
Eggs in the crooks of trees and swings:
See even to the bright beds in the meandering canals,
The colorful eggs there too and membranous
The fish and reptiles are always pullulating in the reef
Of bicycles and the wreathing spikenard,
The cereus like shifting banks of mountains, and a song
Curling down from the lips of a stewardess just as if
It was water from a fountain,
A hydrant blushing and spuming forth on the flashing knee
Of a jubilant curb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flawless Ritual Between Two Formless Gods

Engraft anything with a tree, and say
Is it not a beautiful two,
But I am tired of making sculptures,
When it takes so much bread and
Good grammar;
And the birds are unweary anyways:
They will travel south all the same;
And say now, there is nothing left that is Beautiful for them,
Nothing but the park after the music
Has gone;
The leaves have dropped enough chameleon,
But you are still not athletic enough
For her to love.
Stand forever outside the student center
Nude as lightning and wait for her,
Call out for her like you would the mailmen
When wanting a christening letter;
And if she comes, it will be like the heron
To gawk: She has many changes, and
Many species of flora and fauna and vitamin,
And she'll take many flights up to the points of Her world;
But there if there is a soul inside that statue
You made immortal, it has want to move
Her lakes piqued and intrinsic quivering wave-lengths
For the monsieur's of the football field,
The clayed and fine strata you have no business
Being out upon,
And it would only hurt you to take a look behind
The seamless door where you can hear her kittens
Blowing, the tangled infatuations of
The flawless ritual between two formless gods.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fleet Of Turpentine Heroes

The wishes I have of you are empty, all three of Them, gossiping down by the better sea of Bright cheap words;
And now it seems Mickey Mouse has something to Say,
But he thinks better of it and shuts off,
Sways off to go drink around the orange groves
And helicopter pads of saint Augustine
Where I've killed my fair share of men,
Where I'm even now sneaking into houses where
I don't belong, and going to sleep like a fairytale
Never described to the impressionable séances of children-
You can pet me down by the crocodile in my corner of the Zoo, you can breathe on me your homeopathic spells,
If you thought I was worth it, if you could understand me
Better than the girls from Oregon:
For in my way I am already defeated. I no longer go to The science museum for astronaut ice-cream. I got a C+
In logic, and I've been waiting for my chance to say that
All evening. My boats go back and forth on their lightbulbed
Pendulums at the season fair, where some girls die,
Like decapitated bouquets, but other ones seem to live forever,
Glowing like iron pyrite leggy in that midway,
I bight my lip for and draw my homeopathic blood, swing my arms
For trying to win prizes from the rigged games,
While the semi haulers are always driving up like thirsty
Honeybees- The corpulent hummingbirds hunting breakfast
Far after the race is over and the parking lot empty-
The girls are married, the rains are done,
And I am back at home on the green carpet masturbating like Usual, watching Saturday morning cartoons
Dubbed in Spanish hoping that she'll understand while I fold
Paper airplanes sealing the fleet of turpentine heroes with Kisses I'd much rather have given to her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fleeting Luck In My Paper World

The earth turns out for you on your birthday,
Mountains flatten on their backs like flea bitten puppies,
Or risky cobras:
You can walk on their summits like carousing your fingers
Across the ridge lines of her areolas,
Like the perfect exhibits of the twin sisters of her Natural symmetry while fat trucks drive by all night delivering Their whiskies and goods to the various purple
Enclaves;
But the things around her really try, and they pace through the Clearing houses of their perfumed foreclosures;
And when she puts cleats on over her high socks, she bites
Her lip and momentary forgets her husband
And each ounce of gravity across the terrible earth;
And she leaps and bounds like a story book of anxious young
Rabbits who momentary have found
All of the fleeting luck in my papery world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flesh Of Your Shared Presence

I can take out another one straight for you, Sharon;
My purse is bottom less, and filled with meals for you to smell and Taste over the valleys and highways;
And each time I either fail or succeed, but always in the quiet little ways;
And I think of your ears, and want to be around them;
I want to study the architectures of your ears when you are busy
Entertaining customers, and I want to smell them;
And I don't need to be popular to want to know you:
And you don't have to feel a thing for me:
I can dream for you: I can flood the sea for you, Sharon:
I do it seven days a week, and the animals come up paddling or they Sink,
And the housewives turn up and worship around you, gurgling up
The bottles of your good spirits;
And I have tried to find you: Like a shepherd I have called you,
Far across these modern traffics; and I wonder if you have heard me, or
Have struggled nearer to me,
Because I am blind and yet I am always persistent, as the flesh of your Shared presence will surely restore me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flight Path Of So Many Airplanes

Wimples and areolas of a zoetrope in the kitchen:
There she goes doing her own
Thing again, turning, turning while the commercials
And the rains come on,
With the conquistadors underneath her canals
Where will they go now, the sunlight like a grandmother
For them, and their graveyard right under the Flight path of so many airplanes leaving like bottles
Tossed into the sea and stewardesses filled up to the Neck with words I meant to share with her that can never
Be saved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Floating Constellations Of Ashamed And Misused Riverboats

The river is full of dreams—
I haven't seen them, but I
Would not lie about them:
She has the colors of our flag scaled
And swimming in her nicer estuaries,
And later on they go to her boudoir
To make love atop restless satin
While the old movies play lovelier,
And less attentive romances;
All in order, shallow to deep,
She is kissing the displaced leaders of
Our nation and one little black boy who Lost his shoe polish only to become a greater Gentleman:
She kisses him under the arch which resembles
Getting lucky far above the saturnine graveyard
Of bliss:
Tourists and their trained carnival children
Congratulate her:
I pay to go to class under her skirt,
And looking up chew gum even though I am
Not supposed to be;
And she is a substitute of a representation of Something supposed to be purely heavenly,
And I am not Mark Twain, but try to pretend to Her that I am, and I tell you this is a trusting
Secret,
But I have a hard time understanding the Latin
The wind spins curling the ribbons in her hair,
All the time far above this yard so green it appears
To be a headless graveyard leading to the steps Down to the Mississippi and into
The floating constellations of ashamed and misused
Riverboats.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flood Planes Of Airplanes.

Scarred without the bobby pens
And without a pool, listening to the Sirens in the afternoon;
And looking at my dog;
And now my after all of this,
And all done underneath all of the trespassing
And the midgets in their canals;
They are teaching me in high school
And underneath the Flood planes or airplanes-
So- think of me
Anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Flowers Of Oranges

If I had words for the virgins or their Mothers,
They would take on the form of a long
Vacation:
They would become the reasons for romances
In cheap hotels alongside the busy roads
Right before the breakfast
Shacks started opening like pill bugs for Experiments:
And if I had her for all time,
I would lay with her in the swell caesuras of Any roadside easements:
And we would lay for a while of days,
Letting the foxes play atop of us:
Remembering the cannons of the old forts
Of conquistadors even though now there is Nothing left to defend:
Remembering ourselves, as well, outside,
Smelling the flowers of oranges,
Our souls fluttering as if attuned to a banner-
As the king grinded his organ box
That the sunlight filtered in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Foamy Saddle Of The Enraptured Tide

Tattooed in an inner thigh, I took her
Guitar to the South of Spain. We drank the vintage
And our hair curled gaily like a lover around our Ears, the cones of 1/5th of our senses:
There was a lady all of stone waiting in the southeastern
Warf, and teal eggs in nests riding on the lighted foams,
And babies out of breath for wanting of their mother's Breasts: And other words, and hidden steps,
And dark unsweetened ways through the drying olive-
Groves: The whole country got drunk when, allegorically,
The old man died, and left his children his château,
And youth upon youth marching in the streets, just as Clean as if they had not already had their required Civil War, and the suicidal painters who decorated their landscapes
Just as madly as the occupations of butchers giving their Leftover gristles to children's rhymes: Things were yet changing,
The greatest dark-haired metamorphoses the enclosed
Sea could describe; and I loved her, just a little, where her hair
Fell over her left shoulder, down from the balcony, and Gardens in the crumbled stones with the archaeologies of Legionaries and petrified phalanxes stratified in the dun of Time. Poets were still making love out on the slender streets,
And from the backs of motorbikes, and if I had been wiser,
I would have had them scribble a few lines on my meridian;
But I went home, sobering, still like a child to the fundamentals
Of the pseudonyms of patriarchs; but disused, I did not withhold
From my pubescent rebellions, and shirked the flaxen busses
Into school, and called them names, and epitaphs, and slang,
And meant to swim away, but the sea was too wide; and,
Inevitably, I was brought back home, by the foamy saddle of
The enraptured tide.

Robert Rorabeck

The Food She Did Not Cook For Me

Another night alone into this world
And I am feeling fine and thinking of Alma:
How she must be cozied up to her husband by now:
Why her children are softly breathing so far
Away from graveyards,
And they will grow up and think for awhile
And then swim away;
Then maybe Alma will come to me in the dusk of Weeds and tulips beside the leaping roads,
Because I know that she already loves me,
But she cannot get away:
I know that Alma already loves me, and the sun comes Up and emotes, streaming down the strings for Angels.
And the spiders quiver in their spindling abodes,
And the trout wonders,
And her family sleeps together in their little World not so far afield from my own:
I can almost feel her breathing. Like the zephyrs
Kissing the backs of otters and wildflowers,
And it all turns around for awhile:
And I held Alma's brown hand today and looked into her
Eyes,
And ate the food that she maybe did not cook for me,
But fed to me all the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Football Games Of Your Tomorrow

Kind of candlestick in the mud-
Hoary light in the swamp
Turning undone,
As the housewives moan like alley cats in their Beds of predestination:
As they seem for awhile lost, pill bugs underneath
The covers,
As their pools glow altogether as if infected diamonds-
And their canals move slower
Filled to the brim with narcoleptic mermaids
And the fabershe cenotaphs of likeminded conquistadors:
See how the moon glowers over their
Strange visage swimming in the mud:
Each one with a candle undone just beneath the skim-
As the tadpoles dance
Innocent of what they will become,
And the minnows wander around aimlessly perhaps Dreaming of the footballs games of your tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

The Football Players You Pretend To Love

Into your houses that stand for nothing—popcorn light
That gets blinded on the 4th of July
While I steal the lonely bicycle from your garage:
And I was your high school teacher for a week
While the rain melted the cages of your suburban harpies:
And they got up and spied
And spied upon the real world like a buffet:
And you grew older, tending to know older men from their Various aircraft carriers—maybe even you spied one
The you even fancied to love until you decided that you
Had to look away and away—
Until you midnight happened that very September, while
All of your teachers were writing poetry except for the one
That never was—
And I right to you on this night approaching the first Day of autumn—already the world is old and virtually Defeated—looking for our heroes, I cannot say where They have gone—I only know that they've taken
Their time to fend off the everyday monsters just so you
Can go to class tomorrow—following the shadows of
The football players you pretend to love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Foothills Of The Heavens

All of the pieces were taken apart
Over the better part of a weekend
So now I am in China listening to Country music I cannot understand-
While otters I onced loved
Play in the streams I abandoned underneath
The aspens
Near my mother's cradle-
Where some horses have died
And the elk shed their antlers
Atop so many stepladders leading up to-
I don't know- the foothills of
The heavens-
Looking down into the parking lots,
Can't they pretend to see better than any of Us the kids practicing into dusk,
The butterflies as they get naked
And metamorphose, enjoying
The summers that kill so many people-
The memories of our ancestors roaming
So many parking lots
Nevering realizing they are just the Evaporations of the tears
Of some graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

The Footpaths Of Our Winsome And Lonely Pride

Churlish favors the brown eyes of boys
Almost in a caravan through the comely passage,
Almost hers; and then separated and made to Fend for themselves,
Made to eat pinecones, made to stock shelves.
Becoming literary majors, living every day in a sad
High school,
Looking at empty granaries as if they were the American Basin up from Ourey stocked with wildflowers
And wild scuppernongs;
This is my trance, one of these post-modern hop-a-longs
Where outside under the ice-clouds in penumbras of frost,
The trailer parks glitter in fish stocked streams,
As shimmering as gaudy ribbon spending my days off with My dogs,
I can call her up like bright rings, both instances of sound
And water coloring- Presupposing she is with any man,
I guess she is, but how can she know anything about him,
When she combs over my world like this,
And spreads my seeds without even knowing to the four Happiest of winds,
My dogs leaping like airplanes over Telluride and then back Again jaunting tongued the footpaths of our winsome and Lonely pride.

Robert Rorabeck

The Footprints Of Anonymous Seashell

Oh, what beauty spoken of that seems to be alive
While no one is looking—and after it is done—what is left of Fried chicken in the grass in the last days
Before the fourth of July—
I know you've never been there- next to the cradle of
All of the mixed up stars:
You were in China—alone in Kindergarten watching the Exorcist—I don't know how they showed it to you—
The communist party in your tenements -
Your mother chose to have an abortion and then she chose
To have you and then your brother—
I suppose that maybe she just chose to tell you this to Comfort you, as you almost miscarried—
But this English is only the penultimate words on my lips,
And now I am dreaming—now I am a fanfare on a
Tarmac that doesn't have to believe—
And maybe I should have stayed at home—
And maybe the angels are taking off for different climates—
And all of this is a wound that doesn't heal—
Or it is just a shadow of an angel who herself is only infatuation
With the footprints of an anonymous seashell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Footprints Of Birds

Now I am as famished as a stone sitting upon the High ground—while my wife lies beside me,
Reading in the night—
As the waves caress the shore, as the airplanes
Caress the sky,
And the other fabulous natures such as wolves
Retreat—
And what place is this but a graveyard—
And my scars want for more
Liquor while the skeletons are playing cards
With themselves
While my dog sleeps on the floor—
And then there are birds in the night and
In the mangroves—
And another reason leaves the earth never
To return again—these are the possibilities that
They leave behind—
And I have nothing left for you to remember even
As I disappear like the footprints of birds
Upon the shore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Footsteps Of My Beautifully Yellow House

My house, indifferent and yellow:
Yellow on the outside, yellow within: a beautiful yellow
In which to entrap Alma with these dreams,
To smear her skin with the wet postcards of my lips,
To finish her like a wolf in the kitchen of my bed:
The way a fable should never have to end,
But it does: but it does;
And Armando says it is too yellow: eight-five years old
And filled with the ghosts of an arcade of millipedes,
But too yellow:
He is from Mexico too, and his English is good, but he Is too jealous, and he loves my mother,
But she is in Phoenix and too far away to do it any good;
But when the sun comes up, he laughs over the Rabbits mastigating in their little colonies in the even littler
Yards that section away the one way street:
For he knows that the yellowness of my house is nothing at all,
For he baked the belly of Alma's Mother Rosa until she Yawned and came awake in that alligator pool of flesh,
And has done the very things I would like to do to her,
While I have at least five Virgins of Guadalupe in my house, whose Brows and holy children I kiss,
And stand back and listen as the brownness of waves whispers
And gossips up to the footsteps of my beautifully yellow house.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forbidden Perfumes

A grandfather clock is saying something
Atop your roof, underneath the clouds: but if you
Were listening
Would you hear it underneath the helicopters whose Heads are so amused
And brightly painted: they last like hummingbirds
Underneath the moon;
They drip like bright candy off the noon,
As you go outside and turn around in your little yard.
To see your world is not very hard:
There is your world, right under me, a cat
Whose cradle is infinity- and all of the stratas of
The earth are your dressing rooms,
And your neighborhood is just the constellations
Changing clothes- I will try not to look at
You-I will try not to smell the forbidden
Perfumes of another's rose.

Robert Rorabeck

The Foreplays Of Thefighting Fields

I am feeling good, while everything else feels Unreal, while everything else feels good and If I'm naked
On Sundays,
And this is the most south-eastern point of the continental
United States,
And I have to apologized while I am even starving
While everything else is going down throughout the byways:
And this exactly how it feels, going down by Norway's;
Why, oh why, everything else is given to the tear ducks of my Dogs,
Which works counterclockwise to my gods,
Which while any otherwise to my gods goes utterly unpossessed
Again last Tuesday
While the sun goes down again so utterly unpossessed again
Last Sunday, going down again over the foreplays of the fighting Fields who even after so many years aren't even real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forest Fires Beamed From Her Eyes

I was told the books were dark green because they were Born that way
And when they cried they opened that way for their lovers,
Like butterflies smeared into a carpet where the First time lovers had made a river,
And the softly washed children looked up into the eyes of Traffic that didn't mean to go anywhere,
But went just because it was their nature;
And Alma walked that way, holding hands with her mother.
And I held my breath at the window, but I could not go that way
Into another world filled with the brown hues of forest,
Because it was not my nature;
And so I watched the forest fires beamed from her eyes,
And her children walking safely holding her hand through the Fires,
But I could not go that way because it was not my nature.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forest's Green Back

Imaging how it should echo, and then it does:
Of grandfathers and country sides-
The days lay back upon the shed wings of grasshoppers:
And yes, it goes on and on speaking to the sun in
The sky- in the greening grass,
His sorority, attending like a harem: and the horses
Run like gearless streams down from the mountain:
And somewhere there hidden in the glorious
Switchbacks of bosom- of elk and deer
She lives, yes she does: and she has a husband
And he takes game home for her to Cook over a roasting fire:
And he cuts down wood: white and opal, and it falls
Across the forest's green back, or in the snow: echoing
Yes, yes it does.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forests Of Christmas

They loom so emboldened as all of the horses
Come inâ€”
Off to the right, they burn tires until the smoke
Gets too much:
I wonder if any one of them is my father,
Or if I will find myself encrusted on the back of Some fine snake like camouflage underneath
A fableâ€”
The children will come to school tomorrow with their Shoulders hung overâ€”
They will greet me, recording together
And they will tell each other fairytales of their own
Mothers
Until it all seems to become impossible and
We fall to sleep together underneath the forests of Christmas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forests Of The Sweetest Youngest Day

Alma- you are the soul of the muse:

You are whatever she has burning like a pearl or a lucky

Marble down deep in her bosom,

And even if you never come I will cherish you, because you are

The first inkling of what I have come to reason:

You are the beautiful mother protecting her young, while

All of the cars drive by at night,

And the airplanes leap, while the birds preen so prettily through

The yards of dens:

And I have lived another eight years than you, and I think all of the Empty mailboxes salivating for your rich brown skin:

How far back does it go, through the forests where the grandmothers

Of mariposas go to expire:

I loved you like a word on the wire, and you said it was a lie;

But if it was a lie, Alma- it was one that can never die, but spread

Like wildfire riding ungilded stallions fast across the land,

Their hoofs stamping on the green cloths whose virgin appeared our

Superman;

And I love you, Alma, like the first light in the sky; and if I don't

Love you, the airplanes will go to sleep in the sea,

And the songs that lay stolen from my ribs will yet go unsung:

But if I love you, then let us both hold hands and go into a country

Populated by youth- Where death is a lie,

And your eyes shine the movies of undeniable truth

For the parking lots of sweet young boys amidst which I lay,

And pray to you forever through the forests of the sweetest youngest day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forests Of Their Home

Weather vanes over Mexico,
And some people are laughing on the day of The dead,
And my love is gone from me,
But the rooster is strutting, red throated underneath
The overpass and nearby the high school
Where the children will fight the children
Today,
And you will go home from work and enfold
Into your home- the only place you know-
All uneasiness,
But welcomed by your children,
As the waves pant creases up to your door:
And I will go to work as well,
Into another world where I will have daydreams of Making love with you,
But I will not, and eventually the luckiness of
Your echo will recede,
Dried up by the moon- and the scars of your Footsteps across my house will fade-
So, eventually, the grapes will grow fat and purpled
From being unattended,
And the marionette will be fooled by the cat and
The fox one last time to plant the little
Gold he had into the dunes of the beach,
As the heavens cry over your shadow and then head off
To the forests of their home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forever Backyards

Each stitch in the peacock's feather,
A crenulation upon the mountains, stones waved into the
Quartzite caesuras where the lovers fall,
Teeth chipped upon the false romances of hoar frosted mermaids:

The milkmaid riding on the last-most seat of the bus
Turns a blue eye away,
The wind succulates upon her blondness,
Ovid turns her sisters into kites,
Zeus draws a bone and turning into the conquistador's bull,
Pursuing knee-high into the foaming surcease:

My children drizzle into the tiny yellow rooms
Where we have planted them,
Their insufficient nudities beginning to dry like dew in the morning
of the first day of school:

They are look up at her. They have forgot all of their memories.
A goshawk touches two weeds together in a thorny bush,
And a new pornography is born high up in the coned armpits
Between two war-begotten countries-

The last word spoken to their virginity has no meaning;
It is sent to turn them feral so that they may escape these earliest of Classrooms:
Leaping billy-goats of metamorphosis,
The fairytale spumed between two nests of giants:

They are freed to roam the canals dredged behind the backyards
Of society. The little girl pauses to kiss an alligator frozen by her presence,
And the land beckons in a bucolic, mowed excellence-
Where nocturnal boys recline forever, arms crossed behind their fermenting
brains,
Where gem-sized grasshoppers speckle their
Acned cheeks, far into the forever backyards of the most forgetful housewives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forever Leaping Stewardesses

Pageantry I am: stallion, peacock- fluttering
Almost as if I could fly above the roof tops,
Stuttering,
As if it were my job, pretty in my loincloth draped
About my
Elbows- eagles at both shoulders, clouds in the Somnambulating daycares
Who eventually get lost from fieldtrips and lie out
Underneath the misplaced architectures
Of overpasses who are forever so near and far
From the sea- while the homeless men teach them
Their priceless tricks
And she rolls over and plays dread- as roses bloom
For the working girls,
For the forever leaping stewardesses who haven't
A thought for me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forever Shadowless

Estranged from the places of narcoleptic estuaries,
The sea cries over the parts she
Has forever lost into her sister's coliseum sky—
Amputated from her shore,
Runaway like snowy stallions leaping from destroyed waves
Where she can not move to feel
Where winged men fly struggling over heliumed
Dreams— The closer they come to God,
The quicker they die—
They dive and leap in cloud streams
In the effluvial rivers like
Nostalgic ribbons once strung down from her window
To let them in- Now tangled in foreboding briars
Upon the doorsteps of dark castles,
Misplaced castaways of people who move on—
The helpful amnesias anchoring them to clean hands
Where they can look all the way up and recall no memories—
So, in the furrowed beds of evening's hills
The moon slumbers without a lover
Weeping into pools iambic pentameters
Of shushing lights, baby's breathing
Woven on the winnowing looms, spooling in exposed skeins
Upon the bared meadows in the forest's chest—
A skin of sadness
Where pregnant spiders quiver in their Purchased webs, egg sacks hatching in dew and evening;
But their loves have gone running to
The other sides of their worlds, hurdling
Like odysseying Olympians with no conscious memory—
There, at back doors, they strut haughtily tanned, knocking—
Without her moon, relentless,
They are the forever shadow less—

Robert Rorabeck

The Forever Wild Flowers

Panhandles filibuster, and I am no longer sure of where I am now:
The silent creeks buddy together and sound so little like
The way I've spent time
By myself in the corner of the classroom before
Leaving school and getting drunk and returning:
Figuring out the words are only waves,
Coming in again, silently but with so much motion, the Recreations of the past gods,
The failures of all of the current things, and even though
We all have our own houses,
How can we recognize the song while the virgins are all deep
In their grottos,
And all of our kings have kissed the lips of their undefeatable
Monsters and thus are sleeping beneath the forever
Beautiful and forever wild flowers of their Immortal graves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Amphitheatres

Scars of another illusion of Hollywood-
This is my goodbye
Underneath the anonymous honeymoons
Of airplanes,
Even if she told me she loved me-
As she told me she did,
As I've been trying so long to bring Down the very angels,
Even if it was just to starve them in the shallow
Illusions of my wishing wells,
Just as it becomes another thing I have to Believe in,
As they kill each other- but it is an ugly patriotism-
Into the shallow mirage that, I guess,
All of the heroes have to give up and drown
Themselves
As I, at first, masturbate and then slumber all to Myself in the middle of my school grounds
In the forgotten amphitheatres of Whatever schoolyard which was eventually meant to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Holidays

I don't know about the rose
Growing at the center of the labyrinth as
Some kind of unobtainable attainment
Or aesthetic truth:
I try to teach my children about this:
I try to hold each of their hands as they step
Outside—
But eventually there becomes a muted sound
Of their mutual enjoyments—
As the lowest places fill with clouds—
And the Ferris wheels are consumed by the Largest wildfire that ever was—
Until the gossiping angels are told to one another
So many times
That they fall down and make love with their cousins—
Underneath the hallucinations of the overpasses—
As the waves crenulate the east, sounding like
Vipers, sounding like boom-slans—
And all of the forgotten holidays of the housewives
That cannot find peace within themselves to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Parts Of Her Town

As a goldfish, I can barely breathe or Spell- growing lethargic is not the word, but look
At the mountain underneath its spell:
Words of luckless joy given over to her nimble movements:
She seems to be coming around again
Across the skating rink of her banishing echoes;
And the monsters patrol her old neighborhood,
Remembering how she would not kiss them:
She comes up to their necks, bubbling, golden:
She seems to, but she will not kiss them,
And the words distill their own joy out of nothing;
They remain truants crooked in a tree fort,
And, for whatever reason,
I have nothing for them: defunct on a raft in the middle Of the suburban heavens, I continue on, lazily,
Suppliant to their pop-art spell: she really doesn't Love me, but I've tasted her soul of caramel and it seems to Be coming up to her: the stolen bicycles and the airplanes
Are touching down- and this is my art in the palmettos
In the rainstorms in the forgotten parts of her town.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Playgrounds Of Yesterday

Burning in the hopes through a forest
That is afire:
The bears have lit it with gasoline- there are no more
Heroes for hire,
And the little girls out on Halloween, costuming the High tension wires-
The sun is a globe in a vase, the fish burn with ease:
Pornographies asleep through the old
Chassis through the ancient trees;
And there is something more than this, something sleeping
Down a slope that is underground,
Where candles burn
Telling of the burials of an ancient town-
Antlers shed through a forest in disarray; katydids leave
Their bodies on the open throats of Stalwart trees, slipping nakedly, easily caressing
The forgotten playgrounds of yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Tennis Courts Of Ancient Kingdom

The graveyards are leaping in their unabashed homes for
Little girls who so seldom come to the granite firesides
Of their despondent cenotaphs,
With the stewardesses leaping so highly overhead, with such strength
That they should have wings themselves:
While my little banquet of words pell-mells wherever it does:
While the tiny story books finally stumble from her hands, as they fall asleep
Beside her children like butterflies in a rich forest that keeps on going
Into the wilderness, without definitions- and into the feral
Apiaries and the forgotten tennis courts of ancient kingdoms:
And further still, as long as the sleeping beauty of her eyes
Lays closed: so far away,
Where it never has to end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Tennis Courts Of Ancient Kingdoms

The graveyards are leaping in their unabashed homes for
Little girls who so seldom come to the granite firesides
Of their despondent cenotaphs,
With the stewardesses leaping so highly overhead, with such strength
That they should have wings themselves:
While my little banquet of words pell-mells wherever it does:
While the tiny story books finally stumble from her hands, as they fall asleep
Beside her children like butterflies in a rich forest that keeps on going
Into the wilderness, without definitions- and into the feral
Apiaries and the forgotten tennis courts of ancient kingdoms:
And further still, as long as the sleeping beauty of her eyes
Lays closed: so far away,
Where it never has to end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forgotten Wishes

Sleeping in a bed your feelings rarely encumber,
It gets more difficult to recuperate, even with the hurricanes cheering
Us on outside of the windows:
The key deer kissing the tree frogs in the slender and tapered
Bedrooms of the aloe,
While the entire state takes off its clothes and goes swimming in
The sea
At the end of it with selkies and muses, and the stewardesses spilled
From their hapless planes like the thrilling sparks of Fireworks,
Like coins bathing in a wishing well, wavering underneath the Conquistadors' fingerprints,
Pretending to grant the wishes forgotten for so many years.

Robert Rorabeck

The Forlorn Waves Of The Earthbound Sea

Now that my mind is free and I have friends,
And my broken nose is healing beautifully,
I can go out in the yard and count the snow, discerning
Why my sister placed the wedding guests as she did,
Or why my mother is asleep right now with the only
Man she has ever known:
Because their religion is burning as regularly as sugar cane
In the backyard of the sod farms,
And the gray herons are forming acrobatically through the ash,
While she is in the bedroom stroking her hair like an Angel licking her wounds
And outside her transoms the coral snakes are hatching in between
The egg-like flowers of the plumbago and the aloe
Where my lovers sleep no bigger than snails hanging
From the soft wrists of music boxes whose Songs are weeping as the green swans go away the same color
As her eyes or of the forlorn waves of the earthbound sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Formless Evils That Will Never End

I go down- I go down.
The flights crowd over- Sunlight motes
Above long-backed crocodiles,
I grind my teeth- and the next line should Contain thoughts of a woman so far away
To say them would be to consider
Inappropriate time travels;
And though she is real and earthy, and goodly
Contained,
It would be a fantasy, an apoplectic bull keeping
The unicorns in the waves-
For she has her new lover who could never compare
To the adulations of Percy Shelly,
Who keeps her well protected,
Stocked with soups,
Harangued on a leased apartment with two cats
And communal pool, crystal chochskies,
Dust pans and all the modern confections which Crowd around her, singing the few songs of French simulacrums; or she has just arrive on a new Planet- Jumped ship into the low gravity Eden,
Begun to steal away a new knowledge,
OR, if not contented, she's at the old university,
Serving drinks to men with blue anchor tattoos-
She stands up straight and auburn and gives strange
Necks kisses like hummingbirds to scarred lumberjacks,
Just like she pretended to give once to me;
And when she's on her break she reads
South Florida crime fiction, loose but well fitted
Satires by Carl Hiaasen- And I've wanted to jump her
Bones since high school, and pretended that she called me
Over the linoleum seas during Latin, called me so long Ago when I was less scarred but no more beautiful,
But I fumbled the ball, became the line that doesn't end:
I wrote this poem and wound up for six years in Arizona
Floating over a dead sea,
And she went down and had her name choreographed in
A dance inlayed with his, thinking that he was young and Smooth and yet ironically crocodilian, and it would

Be better for me to spend more time with my dogs,
To fantasize about opal women lined up along the hillside
In the shape of trees,
To get nosebleeds and hangovers while writing these Insignificant things, these unpalatable denouements,
The wordy epitaphs to put the babies to sleep in graveyards,
The perishable unpublishable abominations of gout-ridden
Sailors who just go on and on like in some Beowulfian conflagration of the inner sea, the whirlpools
Of tourism which wind up eating themselves which never Quit except with the defeat of our pseudo-graphical heroes
Eaten in turns by the society of monsters,
The housewives and their daily lovers,
The formless evils that will never end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Foundling's Doom

Young life is born in the morning,
And with it the pain which brings it across:
There it is out in the field
Gamboling on four unsteady legs
In between the briars and the wholesome sky:

The wolves come waiting in
The lines of hunger's prowling,
And the talons circle in a blue abyss:
Already the pestilent eyes are wanting,
All the little bits of life they can scent on the bud:

For the foundling's doom is underfoot,
The winter's creep, the thistle's snare,
The snaggletooth grin insincerely basking in sunlight:
The farmer is too busy with his own affairs
To know the way the weevils go sowing his field:

The colt has done good to make it this far,
To breath from the larger womb,
The great urn the natives spoke of and worshiped,
And the bucolic sphere that kindles life and snuffs it out:

Too early to defend itself,
To take up and learn the sport of man and beast:
Just a young thing, a simple kid
Upon the fold of the agrarian and the boreal,
He bounds lushly before the insatiable gazes,

As he lifts his head to begin to suckle the sensitive tit,
His mother nuzzles the air warily, sensing foul:
And already the gyre begins the whirring:
The roll of dice for the pleasure's feast,
And the borders come pouncing inwards upon
That green loci of uneasy rest.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fountains

I am on the field drawing across your body:
Anonymous as you are to me,
Though you are over anxious that you should be found out;
The iconoclasts ripple. They are better than us,
And thus cannot be bothered with what we are doing,
Because you are just another muse in this big,
Big world in which I and
The fountains are coloring in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fountains Of The Famished

Joined at the hip to your cathedrals of ill fish—
Legs keeping warm like match sticks in an Exhibit of forest—
As everything else dies—as the fairs turn away—
And the wolves envelope with the snow—
Underneath the mountains,
Buried arrowheads—
The false light of playgrounds that keep tricking
The pace—
Fires that have gone out—
And footprints that lead to the fountains of
The famished.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fountains Sing

Another escape, but then the horses
Starve,
Whilst the world grows at large in its
Carnivals,
And then this is just so: and then this is just Another
Number tossed into the footprints of my snow,
As I was still trying to figure out
My loves,
Even as they hunted me, alive and bright in
All of their carnivals,
Just as this was just another joy we,
Together, were meant to slave away together,
Just in the jubilations of Another carnival meant to suffer perpetually
In the foils of another playground
Evaporating forever through the make-believe Ballgames perpetuating the Loneliness that we cannot wish again, forever-
To wish to know-
As the fountains sing,
As the weathers snow.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fourth World

I saw the parade of envious dreams
Board the colorless ship with fish bone
Sails and the tigers the color of cold amber,
The way you looked up from the Other side of the glass as it began to rain
To where things began to move across
The empty sea, and you tried to breathe,
Like distant people lighting up momentarily
To hold each other and failing, so the World opened up to the great things
Feeding near the bottom, and I watched
My infancy go down the maelstrom, the Animal's screams like a ship full of slaughtered infants
Somewhere far across the world where Everything was the same as this neighborhood,
Destroyed, the prophecy stood fulfilled,
And from the thrashing waves raised the great totem
Of the drunken Indians dead in the gutters of the reservations,
At the apex the wisest of the Hopis beat their breasts
To the dying of the fourth world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fox That Is Always Leaping Forever

What are you doing multiplying your flood in my Lonely gaze:

Here I am on my wet floor again, my fission a fanciful glaze:

My loose change all spent

Like the stars in the arboreal sky,

The school buses always returning home but never

Wondering why:

It is that my muse sleeps underneath another roof,

Cradled into the confines, the bivouacs,

And the cavernaseras of another man- laughing in the bathrooms

Of burning sugar cane:

As I take my place beside the road of rushing dreams,

Like the fox who is always leaping forever,

Never realizing what he seems.

Robert Rorabeck

The Freckled Penumbra Of A Beautiful Apple Tree

When you bathe your daughter in that little room,
And when she sleeps beside you in that littlest of beds:
Then these are just the unread words
Scribble in the lavatories of unclimbable mountains,
And you do not think of me;
But you feel me beating beside you, like a tiny toy heart
Wound to beat next to yours; beating through
The Christmases you have never loved, and coming nearer
To you along the northern highways you have never even Thought to have traveled by;
And though I am not beautiful, you know me now:
For I have become your hero, and I have slept on your Roof, and traveled around your neighborhood, protecting you
When you aren't even there, and reciting things to you
That have very little meaning without you as a subject-
Like thorny bushes that cannot ejaculate into flowers-
Like a lonely plane without the sky for a horizon-
Have you discovered then, Alma, that without me, you
Are like a sea without sailors, uncharted,
Unnamed- and you need my senses to cartograph the beating
Of your amber heart- so that I may lay down beside you,
Nuzzling your subtle columns- even perhaps like one of Your young uncles, a day laborer taking siesta in
The freckled penumbra of a beautiful apple tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Frictions Of The Soft Brown Mountains

She showed up and we made love
Under the cheap blue fountains clapping
Like dolphins for the sun,
And before that I had almost died, but it Wasn't enough:
She came to my door with her auburn stuff,
And it was true, and I was her champion,
And I swung her in my arms and we smoked
And there were candles drooling like heady
Song birds in each of us:
I believe they may have been long lost sisters,
And they sung to us,
And they spread their wings and visited each other
Through our mouths,
And decided to switch houses, and live for awhile
In the separated friendships of our brown dress,
Until the evening that they could reunite in Marriage and swing so freely back and forth
From each of us,
Like canaries sharing a fountain with butterflies,
And unicorns, and her right there doused in
The streetlights as with the moon,
Finally settling like the glowing rivers steaming from
The frictions of the soft brown mountains that
Are now so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Frog Princes

New hills in the Septembers the houses get out
Their drinking glasses to remember—
Trying to forget that they never kissed their husbands
Or whomever in a zoo—
Wet mouthed on the weekend of soggy letters—
The sunlight in ridges and ridges surrounding them—
The birds, oily winged—singing,
Christmas hallucinations—places to take off—
Multiple regresses in the bluer than azure grasses—
The echoes of their children like wind chimes
Saying that they are safely upon their way to school
And now is the time to enjoy all of this—
In the wetlands, in the Peitas of the frog princes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fronteras

Children turning to ghosts as they ride their Trains outside of Mexico- the tricky tracks of the Foundlings- they go into the emptiness of
The desert
Hallucinating for orange groves and the fresh
Waters of their soul to fill in their
Shoulder blades
Like stewardesses serving them soft drinks
Upon the long distant airplanes-
As if something beautiful trapped inside an Ugly dream,
Spilling themselves towards their mother's Milk across the fronteras- or across the yellowed
Cinders into towns with other eyes
And apathetic tongues.

Robert Rorabeck

The Fuels That I Mean

Eaten by ghosts, or eaten by grizzly bears:
The night finally grows up and is unhappy about itself-
The night finally gets out of its chair or swing,
And has to go home to confront the mirrors, or that isn't any of all
That it does:

Maybe it just sits in its corner of its classroom and pines for her,
Even though he figures that she will never be mine,
That I have already eaten the magic beans of poisonous skeletons,
And now I am for sure that I can never again cross the river;
But in the talking mirrors the planets absolutely look nice,
And I have had to starve myself while talking about the coal
Trains all sooty beneath the Christmas tree:

And I will give you a Christmas tree in that time of year,
Alma:

I will give you the gaudy spirit of my soul, because you are all that I love in this world:

You are the goddess who makes my knuckles crumble and speak
To themselves underneath the billboards of Disney World;
And you are all that I have, like an alligator who only has the road:
Who only knows the lights that will not stop,
Even far after all the waves had come in whispers, who had shipped
Off from the far side of the earth;
And now, finally, the hibernations are over, and I love you as my queen;
And this is just another imperfect night, while I try to keep warm,
Burning for you all of the fuels that I mean.

Robert Rorabeck

The Full Poem

The full poem is in her lips,
Pursed, she cannot spell.
Opened, she kisses him and he goes
Home and grows a garden in his sleep:
These lines are not for real,
But the pressed ivory of piano keys by
A child alone in a sunny room:
Searching for what she will become,
As bees sing softly in grandmother's garden.
There are bright days she knows,
And places she has walked to where
There are things she cannot say the sky
Shows in furtive glimpses,
Things she believes are real though there is no proof,
And nothing can be said,
Though this is what she thinks of as she
Waits for the bus to take her to school to learn,
And the days flip over like rabbits digging burrows,
The indescribable successions of lives and deaths,
And the saplings which grow up in the make-believe
Yard who will never move unless coerced by the wind,
And then ever so little,
Though they may live forever but not
Relatives and distant loves,
And when the rain falls like piano keys, like glimpses of Little children laughing unabashedly through sorrow,
Then as if in a trance, she sits and watches
The world outside her home slicking the trees
And filling the sky,
And does not say a thing, but I know,
The full poem is in her lips.

Robert Rorabeck

The Funerals Of Average Sorts

It does no good,
The ebullitions I have meant to accomplish;
It does no good this- this thing-
My soul, a prize in the crackerjacks,
He doesn't play baseball:
My soul, he doesn't look to well in
The effluvious destructions,
And mixtures of rainwater and spilled oils,
The guts of Spanish explorers,
The toy trumpets of useless things:
My soul, whoever,
Whipped into a popping jay would say that
The rabbit is dead and hung by the lolling dogs into
The crucifixions of the rock garden,
And there he is, and later on down the potholed
Road, my soul finds fossils in the tire tracks:
My soul was first kissed by a girl down that road
Who wore a retainer-
My soul has stolen, and remembered fantasy lovers
Like little tomboy saints waiting with spears in the aloes,
But it is a silly thing,
Maybe the best mocker of William Carlos Williams,
His pocket full of washers to Clog up the wiry machines-
Maybe he will, venturing long enough, pot bellied,
Clichéd by the weathers of the well and ready noose,
Find his soul mate, this lover on the bottom of a shoe,
Deep in the wells and drains,
Or he might have to rely on the memories of old news,
Teddy Bears recovered and patched from dumpsters,
Piss stained books on the California gold rush,
A Bret Harte decried by Mark Twain,
Abandoned his country and all of his sweet family,
Removed to the Victorian imaginations of some New century's Peter Pan-
Isolated and still born but still managing flight:
Not very well published, like any other mollusk retreating
Into the ostensible beauty of its home
Lives for a little while and then can only be remembered

For the scientific names of hardened calcium:
Conus Literatus,
Or Melon Aethiopicum,
The so many years of misgivings-
The dulled arrowheads and abandoned fathers,
The sad foreclosures, the shutting and locking of doors,
The funerals of average sorts to which
All and my soul must attend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Funerals Of The Down To Earth World

Too many things no longer much fun,
The rusting barrel of a worthless pop gun;
And I can't remember when they used to Be much fun,
The beautiful people sharing themselves under
The god-endowed sun:
I don't blame them, my mother's slick swears-
Those little seeds they were just meant to happy
The earth for the time spent tapping toes
And wrist watches, expecting the hearse unawares:
It will come any time now,
Chauffeuring the embalmed; and the houses
In shot-gunning rows will
Blister and howl underneath the apathetic sums
As they does them tricks around the world,
Those strangely luckier boys and them
Oh so sweetly distracting girls-
They sure will filigree mighty brightly the funerals
Of the down to earth world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Furrows Of Mars' Serpent

I will single you out on the battlefield,
And come against you roaring
Like a ram, caracoled, delinquent and Never minding that he crushing through
The lilies and the Easter baskets;
And I will gather you up in a pantheism of Sweat;
I will have a plan, while the others
Won't know what they are doing,
And caressing you there out amidst the Furrows of Mars' serpent, watching our High school of dead friends arise like unfurled
Sails,
The clouds, yes, an audience of evaporated
Gods;
I will hone you with a craft of lips,
And slip my crooked hammer around your ears,
Make you believe so many things
Until the victorious hour, when dusked,
Saturnine, and beginning to melon junoesque,
Caked in salt and lost bereavements
You lie out amidst the priests who are blessing
The otherwise dead,
The cherubic footprints of our child soon to Awaken in you pattering
Bothering away the first chance of sated
Rest from your victorious head.

Robert Rorabeck

The Game Of Her Spell

Placing a book in the window and leaving her there—
She will not look out upon anything without your eyes
To show her some kind of resort:
And you can display the fireworks to her: Chinese lanterns
That spring from the armpits of the cypress that Border your house from the neighbors,
Or five-hundred blue roman candles that go off in
The middle of the day when it gets dark enough because Of the crows:
And she will not think for one moment of the amusements
Of this love: laid down anywhere she cannot exist,
For she needs your eyes upon her,
To feel her bosom rise in the symmetry of her papery
Swell—
But any other man will do just the same—semiliterate—
Placed in the castle of his senses, her perfumes will fill
The pages of her boudoir,
And she will come alive underneath him,
And make a nest of his hands—and she will not look away
From him until he is done with her
For that is the game of her spell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Games Of Your Heart

Then there was a pretty boy on his Bicycle
Like a tool, Siamese of glowing pinwheels
And the spots in between
The trees
A zoetrope, a glowing lantern—
A house of bees:
You know what it is, or at least meant to me:
As I followed you,
As you were going to feed the loins
An entire bouquet
From the games of your heart.

Robert Rorabeck

The Garden At Midnight

Jumping, jumping- over the candles
In all of its wishes
Over the birthdays: foxes leaping for the Cleavage of the grapes:
Leaping, leaping and making music to themselves:
And this is the cathedral of its lighthouses,
And this is how its feral civilizations become Uncivilized:
Holding out its wrists like candy, while enjoying the Soft and even lights of its living room
That the goldfish live in,
While the jasmine get out into the garden at midnight
And tell their ten thousand stories,
While all of her fellows are crossing the road:
And the music boxes turn with their wound
Up amusements,
As the sea beckons and then returns into the grottos
Which are not yet explored.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gardens Of Another Man

This is often the summer, or the way the housewife
Feltâ€leaving herself beside the Long necklaces of the poolsâ€while the diamonds
Sparkled off of her and her armpits,
And the alligators waited downwind from her:
Yes, they were lesser godsâ€;
As her youngest son skipped skill and lit off fireworks
Atop of the roof just a few doors down from herâ€;
As they carried up furniture to all of the heavensâ€;
And the canals sang torpidly to their own amusements,
And to the space rockets farting off retarded into
The skyâ€;
Here are the spume of her cathedralsâ€;her areolas
Lapsing sensuously into the caesurasâ€;
As her canals become overcome with the raptures
Of the churches she can no longer feel right to Attendâ€;they illuminate her and make her a cathedral,
As, however, her swiftest hero is surely coming
To meet herâ€;fighting off all of the monstersâ€;skeletons
And werewolves regenerating on the other side
Of the bends of the catacombsâ€;until she crosses the Canal to meet me, and we kiss full mouthedâ€;
The tortoises languishing there, like Christmas trees
Underneath the tents of things we still have to sellâ€;
But for a while we are safeâ€;in the sidelines of the Amusementsâ€;as the airplanes swell
Into the skies until
There is no more room to moveâ€;and we have to meet
Her eyes even though the lamplight is turned to Meet the gardens of another man.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gated Community Of His Sea

Sharks are in the sea, doing their professions.
Going down, where don't they sleep;
Is there a woman who is not a whore, a liar:
I know men that are very good, who like to give head all the
Time.
Women are to them the sunflower in a smoky glade.
Then the dragon curls; it is her body after eating all of her Friends;
And I love Diana,
But she is just a river with the bends:
And I used to draw her or another goddess in class,
But then my glass was empty;
It didn't last.
And she is beautiful slipping away with the last of the day,
Giving her bosom to upside down news:
I saw her slipping through the shallows of the bay.
I thought to protect her, but I just gave her roses
Until they clogged up the sea,
The love-struck valentines clinging together in the Sea-green caesuras, making a pact.
She didn't know what to say, but she swam around me for Some time speculating. Turns out she was not hungry Enough to speak- Maybe she followed the letter carries for Another week,
Before desiring the richer man's gold and always
And forever slipped into
The gated community of his sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Genie Inside

Alone in the alkaline gutters,
Commuters travelling over us, hurrying over
The places we lie down in the places
That keep to their own shadows—where hobos
Don't have to wake up,
And share fleas with dogs:
In the sideways land, where flitting housewives
Throw discarded books, and traps,
And innuendos—
It is a painting without any sincerity,
A wishing well in a mall of our pubescent where
We drink and drink,
And lie down, far from the lamentations of our Mothers and fathers. We acknowledge
That we've finally gotten a faithful girl pregnant
But she is still on the other side of the world,
And we are still playing a lottery of Bottles, swearing to ourselves that we will one
Day find the genie inside.

Robert Rorabeck

The Genies French-Kissed The Terrapin

Now they are here
Like color,
Dispatched upon our side of the canal
Where we Pretend to survive-
Tied underneath the rainbows,
Trying to make a job of our nullifications-
Dying sparrows
So like a poem,
Dispersed into the tears of April after
All of the virgins have been selected
And sacrificed,
As I tried to say that I loved you,
Even as the baseball team drove away:
And our country fled
Into another country, only if the lands so long
Beneath the heavenly coats of forever
Could get along
Befriending the ponies that are never Misspelled,
As the oceans divide the lonely greenness through
The ibis of ballrooms,
Where the bodies live, like fish manipulated,
As the genies French-kissed the seraphim,
And filled the water fountains
With the libations they never meant to resolve.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gentled Rolling

They were held over in their march,
So even the prettier girls had to watch the way
The bachelors clung to their sallow houses
Underneath the forts and their dying
Butterflies-
The terrapins in the makebelieve mangroves
Eating lunch underneath the tallest of crosses,
While the greatest of loves is lost
To almost all of the tourists
Until she lies there, fainted in desperation
A cenotaph of a rose
For the graves of the conquistadors
Underneath the gentled rolling of the mowed
Grasses.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ghost Of A Bullet Hole In My Right Temple

The last of the rum swoons in my throat,
The ghost of a bullet hole in my right temple:
The temporary lines of the minor leagues
Glowing in dim hallucinations
Where I dropp them:
Her eyes so very far away,
Not even caring to notice or understand
The sadness in my wrists, and the lonely
Papier-mâché echoes I hang on the Rainy walls for her,
As I worship the abandoned distance between Us both:

I have taken her name from her
And hidden it beneath the indented knees
Of a particular cypress:
God will return on Easter-
She doesn't know who she is anymore,
So she cups the mouth of a nearby man
And marries him as she supposes:
He is fitfully masculine, without any of my concentricity:
When I was of her circumference,
I ran around her for seven miles and recorded poetry,
Though just at that time I hibernated
In a Jewish woman's cave:
Incidentally, now she is married to a Jewish man....
(And I am the only true Jew)

Today, they are taking my manuscript to the printers.
Yesterday, the publisher warned by that he might have
To reconsider,
(Notice how that rhymed, coincidentally)
In Britain, it should always rhyme,
But her eyes are always the same,
And looking away, if I could see them-
Today, my father asked my for $50,000,
And in return I would get good interest and all of It after Independence Day:
F*ck the red coats, because we are all now azure-

Lighting off some fireworks under the moon,
If I saw her eyes and remembered them,
What might I suppose she would let me do to her?

The sea without a name is where people
Make love:
When they make love they sing like young cats
Making love:
I would like to do this to her,
To become the nameless grotto in
The darkened window in some Floridian city:
To pass her my tongue, like selling produce:
A strawberry:
If you are reading this and you know who
You are, please write to me, because I am very alone,
But you will not write to me,
Because you could never understand this:

This is poetry:
And here is my tongue:
I am not yet a middle-aged pirate,
Looking to get a law degree, but all of it is selling
Something:
For instance, now all of this is the thing:
The beautiful linear random verb that should Be my sovereign line:
Here it is: I love my father, though we are always alone:
And the four years in this spacious basement has taught
Me a rhyme:
That I am too late to uncork her hymen,
Though if she could let me, I could love her still:
And present philologicistic cursive that she never felt:
I could return to her city for the first time,
And become that man she has hoped
For on the blue border,
And write her these lines that get entangled in briars,
The tumbling needs of bankrupted
Necessity....

But no- now it is done,
As I have had time to read it over,
With my flesh in a band-aid:

This is enough nonsense, Erin:
I love you, but who am I anyways?
I should die like a crucifixion in a used city:
And if I come to your town tomorrow,
Ignore me- because I am the inexcusable bruise,
And we are headed towards the last line:
There is the man who will supercede me:
Take him by the jugular and make him enter
You several times,
Because I do not know what I am.
And he does-
And we are all ghosts living in
A certain distance from who we want to be:
Yes, this is all, sadly,
And you are the only one who knows it.

Now I am spent like ejaculation,
And that is my failure:
And I will not read this another time:
Now it becomes rudimentary and vulgar:
I love you, but I am corrupted:
I need you but I do not know who I am:
Drunkenly, on my little raft,
I will swim away now without an entourage:
All I need beside me are me two dogs,
They love me:
I am going away now,
And this is no excuse for an ending:
Publicly, I have opened my chest
Like a number on a fast-food menu,
And that is all that I've got:
I love you, but you don't yet remember,
I love you, but the world is so
Busy reproducing itself....

Robert Rorabeck

The Ghostly Beach

Lay down the body where it can feel
My heat,
Because I can be successful at construction:
Her house is open like a glass cage,
Her lips are the luggage of our eviction:
I am drunk, but I will not die-
Tonight, the moon is still where it must be,
The sea is exchanging spit with the beach-
They are making love and then showering,
And pissing off my girlfriend,
Because her bikini is all wet, and not much good,
But for foreplay,
And the evidence of her beauty:
Nostalgically, those were better times,
Times of sex and candy,
Before Military Trail went under construction,
Bought out and tore down my parents;
But, really, things are never different, just exchanged:
And I am only partway intelligent, '
Completed by the cheapest bid,
And will make do by kissing her mother's lips,
And eating breakfast in the sooty escapade,
Sitting beside the auctioneers of expensive cars:
I keep on saying one day I will move out,
Buy a cheap house near the sea, listen to her panting
Forty miles away, even if she doesn't care, and Eats fried chicken and shops at the Gainesville mall.
No longer a student, what will she do now?
A groupie of the middle class highway, she will carry
Their guitars and drum sets for them, give them head,
Ride them- Whatever is the most plausible exercise-
Its not my scene, but my dogs give me tongue,
And each wave ignites the palate of the opulent speech,
The drift my soul goes into like a seedy tourist,
When my lips have touched too much rum,
And the conquistadors are glowing like a parade of forgotten
Truth in a seesawing bolero along the marriage processions
Of the ghostly beach.

The Ghosts

As you work in lights hanging over
An empty bedroom, soon I will be a teacher in
A high school all of my peers left
A decade ago
There still will be: the baseball diamonds,
The fields of green alligators,
The lunch rooms, and the sing - song truancy:
And I will find a way again to Forget myself unconventionally:
The echoes of footfalls like raindrops,
The students of a mind that they go home to Singing to their televisions at a steady trot:
And if I skip my own classes to light off fireworks,
To remember her shallow tails as the memories
Remember me,
Then I will be the thing who is still there,
Like a monster with a beautiful face who never
Was asked to leave for the tundra of Russia
Or Antarctica- and the music will play
Slowly across the desks of graffiti
And the sun will spin, illuminating all of the ghosts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ghosts Of Native Americans

Again elevating, making love before a beach:
Levitating for helicopters who come primary colors
Before they excavate the swing-sets of
My childhood- the very amusements my mother pushed me
On close to three decades ago are finally being Condemned- little recluse across the Palm Beaches,
Her sinister lips kissing the gods who live in the Sky- While I ride my bicycle homeless,
And wind tares away the meanings of these heavens
As I strive to remember, and find her warm
Embrace in the claustrophobic midway of the Carnivals forever escaping from the mortal wounds
Of this heart
Underneath a window of rocks where the ghosts
Of native Americans levitate, chanting my name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ghosts Of Those Things Now Thoughtless

I want to take you to that quieted reservoir where the Twilight always plays its legs across the lazing corrugations
As shadows bleed across given they pensive times, the lures
Of Florida Holly, or the bulldozed dunes; but you are busy playing
Those other sensory instruments which take off like thoughtless Tracers after the desire of your eyes: You will not come with me on My lonely walks, how many mountains I have summited alone,
Only to come down alone again, and bathe in that quieting dusk
Behind which the traffic passes just as insouciantly as you, without incident
Or sudden collision of unsuspecting bodies, like the required impact
Of bones framing organs and drowning blood, like I would have done with
You to seed such egos imbedded in the geometry of your movement,
You could never understand, but they would come wailing out of you,
Only to quiet, suckling on your tits, tugging out your creamy nourishments;
But you have walked away. Maybe you are moving to the Pacific, maybe
He is heavy bellied and red haired pubis and moving all upon you, his breath smelling of the food he fed you both tonight under the ambiance of a crowded, socializing restaurant. What can I say, but lie. I do not care. You've Straightened your hair and look like an overweight snow white. No one should know that you are supposed to be out of the Ashkenazi forests and Wind tunnels, except that you tell them with your jokes, and the subtle
Way you cross the street underneath the yet secular lights imbedded over
A lazy holocaust, the skin of your dead ancestors shading you, doing just What my family warned me you were capable of, but I will not say anything More of that tonight, nor moan the ghosts of those things now thoughtless
Which only should have been....

Robert Rorabeck

The Ghouls

I want to have Halloween in my own house.
I want to have candycane sex with her
In the next room
Even if she is an import.
And to take my children trick-or-treating.
I want to share bear-claws with friendly
Neighborhood cops in the morning,
So I can say,
Look, ma, pa, I have finally done something.
I want to hear the rain patter on the roof,
And the secret squeak of things
Intruding on my property.
I want to take part in the gossip
Of all the neighborhood's suicides,
And to stand on my front stoop
And watch unfaithful couples break up
And blow away like leaves in autumn's wind
As the spooks come out for the full moon's holiday
When we take off our masks
And housewives walk the street
In red licorice stilettos, giving away candy.
I want to have Halloween in my own house.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gift Of All Of This Sun

High in those basins where I wished that we'd Made love,
And while my dumb mother is brushing her teeth and getting Ready to go to bed in a rainy trailer park,
I just think about your bush: How it can light up and speak to Me from any part beside the road;
This is what it does while it bears children and chain smokes,
While it makes totem poles with the chain saws of your Friction;
Don't you understand now; under the dying light of these nine
Or so planets, I've chanted, I've climbed up and down for you,
While your children sang and then surrendered so that They wouldn't have to see the gun fight swung over the sweet
Monuments of your body;
And I've been up and down swinging in the Grand Canyon three Times or so for you, chanting out the long answer, with my old
Girlfriend, the old bushwhacker with all of her stars and tin
Surrenders;
And now I am all alone and doing good and will have a house
All alone in an ancient neighborhood that I won't have to hear the Sound of your surrender in unless you really want me to;
For you are the lightning, and the recoil of gun:
You are all that I've really wanted, because you bare children under
The gift of all of this sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gift Of Love By One Such As You

I have tried calling for you for so long,
The pain has become a common courtesy
Around which both you and your lover should attend,
Dance and walk down into and behold the ushering walls
That have caved in upon me: Point thinks out,
Nuzzle and curl under his arm and stretch,
See those things you would have found beautiful,
And let my fever fall down upon you like the pulsing
Thorn in a star: See how in the least I have Succeeded, if you didn't even know, or you
Don't read it anymore, that I still write for you Laid out upon a sheetless mattress, post-modern Prometheus in a tomb at High altitude; I pick wildflowers by the roots,
And thrust them still choking out for you like suffocating fish.
I once took an aspen bough in autumn and drove it
To your town, meaning to leave it on your doorstep,
But I only fell asleep at my friend's house, when he Said I shouldn't meander, so I didn't go to you to see You serving drinks to your many painless lovers. Now in The dark again, I try to arrange myself by your romance,
And wonder if you have scars on your body in the same
Places I have scars, and if you know I have one tattoo from Spain, a little Dagger now blurred like a cellist on a darkened stoop.
He plays all night for the cats, and when he lays down his Bow it just as well may be suicide, for the Roman forts
Are like white scars on the cliffs, and the windmills are Turning their heads like gawking choruses spinning their Arms, winnowing the wind's muses; and if I should Not brush against you ever,
Know that I have already changed uncountable times,
In my attempts to be near you; and I am forgetting who I am,
Or that I ever carried that notion to know myself through the Gift of love by one such as you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gifts They Never Knew

There is a brown thimble in my soul:
It goes beating- beating porous- letting the blood and Feelings through:
There are the rinds of acrobats in there too:
Curling, curling up the ladders that drew
The sun and the moon
As they walked their constant avenue- lovers in the grove,
And the spaces between two bodies that undress
And then pass dousing into rivers:
I suppose there must have been a fight, but I crossed myself
And went down and became homeless underneath the open wounds
Of her soul:
Her name: Alma, Alma, water beating in the man, tears on
The open bellies of asphodels as customers come in:
Wanting- wanting her too: but all that she has sung echoes
And she says she can only want for one man:
Not me- not me, but he who bore both of her children:
And I want to die, as the stag crests the saddle
On the valley overlooking the cemetery my grandmother receded
In- and it feels for a long while that I will not know her before
I sleep,
But I keep to the pinpricks of my veins, saying things that are awful
And scarred, as the traffic returns and the weathers:
The airplanes touching down like Indian feathers, stealing away with Breaths and cheeks the gifts they never knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gills Of Unknown Trespassers

Blood recoiling from the nuisance of
The absences of the senses as, at first, the busses
Turned around,
Looking just as beautiful as those chartreuse
Butterflies that attracted all of the boys from their Playgrounds-
And so when in the summer the angels cried,
Entrepreneurs, just as delicate as China dolls,
Went around and bottled the Sweat off of their delicate senses
And sold it to those of us who were in charge—
As the beautiful vision continued,
Stretching for many miles into the east,
Until there was no further places for the names
Of men, as the illusions skimmed across the waves
Where mouths opened sporadically
And the gills of unknown trespassers fluttered,
Not understanding what exactly it was that
They were supposed to save.

Robert Rorabeck

The Girl Across The Street

In another dowsing of the head—
To wherever the mammals go when they nod off:
When they are better men,
Given to valleys where they know the names of Flowers and of death—
But, otherwise, to amusement rides that in the Morning blow off like paper snowflakes making
Love to lighters—
Like angels sold as statuary at flea markets—
Only leaving the nuisances of the words,
Like hangnails, to bloom painfully by themselves—
To keep on pretending that they are getting Better—while the other side of the canal
Keeps looking greener and greener,
And the girl across the street
Keeps promising her back of tricks to the new Mailman who arrives every day with nothing
To lose.

Robert Rorabeck

The Girl I Can'T Even Be Sure

All day long going on the slender paths so
High up,
First using one eye and then maybe none:
The tumulting sea a laugh track roaring,
Apathetic grandmother riotous from their mice
Round crypts,
Girls in the curls of waves like mollusks,
Like lips of shadows underneath the sun caressed
Banyans,
The deepest shadows in the shallowest shade,
Taking boats as slender as her hips out to meet
The mother of all crocodiles to try and persuade her
To shed a tear for me, for the girl I can't Even be sure if I loved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Girl Who I Love

I can play my game- you can play my game
Too:
Open mouthed, looking in at the zoo,
In a wild and wonderful pace
Where the amusements filibuster and the zoetrope
Of the roller coasters turn
Around,
In days without number getting dizzy underneath the Sun so easily found:
Words on a vine, being plucked, and tucked in Beneath trucks,
Being turned up, unearthed
After the amusements have gone home,
After the bicycles have left the graveyard,
And I am left to roam:
Words in the cusps of her hometown in the nape of Her venison:
While the bicycles rest as breathless as candles.
Or I know that you suppose just what she does
And I have been up again in the Morning,
Yawning again, or telling secrets, but only to
The girl who I love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Girl Who Isn'T Real, Who Isn'T You

You give me numbers until I'm read in the face,
But I am still an old opponent-
Look at the scars of my failed suicide,
The places they've surprised me from the cake.
The puppies whose noses are like svelte tumble near
The drainage where the conquistadors sleep.
Grandfather keeps his poems underneath his armpits,
Like housewives keep there pies on the windows to kill
Lesser housewives with the smell of their baked fruits-
There was this girl too who wanted a ride home-
She lived on another planet, I know it was her tomb,
But I told her I had to encore my empty stage,
Sweep up the forensic evidence of cheap confetti.
I almost got to see her through the veneer of her brazier,
But I wasn't ready,
And now I'll have nothing to do, but sob in my room
Until she comes out of the sea of evil flowers,
Awakening senses who cannot feel. She is done servicing
The garroted pirates on her pinwheel,
And now she'll pluck her kisses on limbs loving the Changing of my scars, and hiss and feel-up
The girl who isn't real, who isn't you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glad And Cloudy Void

Unbounded reasonlessness looking for the broken
Bottles the same sheered color as the Grass, where the light is smoking through, and where
It is curling for awhile:
Where it is gathering up in Bristle vases,
And making shallow promises for the eyes of little girls
Who haven't yet opened the prisons of speech:
It all seems for awhile to be congenial, and the ephemeral
Misfits don't even know who they are,
As the cars speed through the showers of light that moves
As if curtains of whispers before the awestruck passengers
Who float with out reason of empiricisms through
The glad and cloudy void.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glint That They Would Never Teach You

Feral boy move with great sly in your
Canoe
Peruse the middle-class backyards not
On holidays
But school days: look at the amphibians
In a mess and truck of love;
They seem to cry of you-
Like the housewives on the green tramline,
Squeezing from the earth their
Citrus trees in taught bundles-
What they are doing is the same as you
Can guess-
Slip like a seed pod in blue mud down beside
The pungent ways they mow;
All the half starved lions escaped from the Reserve seem to know that there
Are blue gills in shallow pools.
Minnow farts ripple the sluggish teal like
Diving bottle rockets-
Pinwheel slightly around water lilies, speckle
In red holly shade:
Go down the grid of careless amazements-
Never know a word- Burp with sound.
Lie on your back and become the glint that they Would never teach you,
The oiled suit they couldn't sew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glories Of Your Tongue

Now is all in the skinny green of arrows shot
Above the prairies of harmless orchards:
Now is all of this, like the far away singing of my mother
Pressed like a hopeless romantic to my father's Breast:
While I am now all right hear, all collected underneath the gyrations of
The birds and the sea:
And I cannot even get a teaching job, because I am so nervous,
That I belong inside another country;
And I want your flag tattooed on my chest, and beneath that the Hallucinations of the frontera that you had to cross:
And I want to be with you, Alma, even if it means going without Breathing and without water:
I want to be a single wish of your witchcraft; and I want your body
Strung across me like a psalm,
Like a healing wound, while all of the actors portray the things that Cannot exist into a theatre that can no longer be real:
While the visions come like angels, like airplanes
Above the amusement parks of your russet elements;
Your body folding against the dryer of my beating heart like Clothes cling to the sun, like grapes becoming obese on the vine;
As I swear by these lines, as my kiss answers the glories of your tongues.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glorious Lights Of Her Fair Grounds

Turning down the road and dousing the Lights of cul-de-sacs,
And I have run away and so no longer have need for Any stanzas:
The bottle is amber, and maybe I have killed a moose,
And am offering its choicest peaces like a red yard sale
Out my front door for Alma;
And maybe she likes me, and maybe she will come to me:
Or there will only forever be obese mosquitoes
And obese call girls, taking my money and drinking my Blood;
And maybe my bed is a woman that my mother no longer
Attends,
But the fruit trees still whisper like unwelcome strangers
Outside of the glorious lights of her fair grounds
Into which she has so happily taken total possession of my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glorious Ways

Your brown body pulls me across the desert,
Just as desirable as the luck of the hares in your overgrown
Backyard:
You do this to me in your ways, swaying like the séance of A metamorphosing violin:
There you are
Crenellating the last calls of a fortress like the signals for life
Over the nameless hills
And the tourists mulling like jackanapes in the soft golf courses
Of icecreams;
And that you were so rude as to bother the sky with your eyes
That way,
Whose most direct of senses found their way across the fronteras
To Texas and your old backyards,
Calling up my dreams to meet your soul;
The involuntary arrows you plucked me from across the streets
Of our work places
Until I kissed and laid you down into the newest grottos under
The chicken wire stars where the films had just started shooting,
And there alongside the carport where my mother
Worked so diligently as a saint cleaning the working class vestments,
The toads and crickets ululating to her,
Signaling as if in the husks of unbounded prayer
The glorious ways we shed off our old selves, and intermingling
Had our pleasures.

Robert Rorabeck

The Glow Of The Fading Evening's Television

More powerful by number,
The larger we get,

And new scars held in our hand
At the petting zoo:

The otter takes off its oily pelt,
Actually an unemployed woman,
Look at how she cracks an oyster off
Her chest,
And drinks all your father's sea-green
Booze.

Oh,
What fun we could have if we didn't
Live at home,
If we hadn't been gone such an awful
Long time,

And the busses are already done going home,
Doing that strange dance after the entrancing
Ice-cream truck
Through our neighborhood;

But all the same,
I could bite my lip and live next to her again,
Watch the girls in their roller-skates,
The everyday cumulous-nimbus tromping in,

I could put her in my eyes like a ship
In a bottle,
And pretend for the rest of this strange sequence
Of afternoons that I am someone famous,
Immaculately careworn,
Who never had a father nor was ever contradicted
In a dinner conversation warmed
By spiced rum and the glow of the fading
Evening's television.

The Goblins That Dance

They say this thing to
The world of
Many lovers who are
Just getting up
Now that in this Neighborhood is not
Anywhere to believe
In-
The ghosts never find
Their love-
The immature Chinamen
Are still smoking in
Their stalls-
The lightning is waiting
For the goblins that Dance-
Your father is waiting for
Your mother across
The canal-
And the woman you love
Sleeps without any breath
While you get drunk
In the arms of a
Butterfly that has Forgotten all of the Ways to love-

Robert Rorabeck

The God I Made You In

Where am I going, now that the god I made you
In is dead: Because, I've drunken bourbon and Pedro
Barely snores: The cars are just in séance,
And I've been reading my poems; I don't know
What any of them mean, but I am listening to Daniel Johnston and, like he says, "I live for Love, " and if you'd let me, I would have delivered
A dictionary that bloomed inebriated in full longevity:
I have, but how unrequited it came; and how many Times have you let him come inside of you, while
I've spent myself fruitlessly onto this page:
How many times! That I should no longer care,
But vagabond from Florida, and Colorado, and take-up
In vacated residences of the distending rich, and Drink all of that forgotten liquor in sad cheer for you:
This is what I'll do: I'll steal the trinkets by which I continuously hope in catching your eyes, but will Not send you anymore flowers: You are cheap and Hungry, and I will catch you by that color which Reflects best underwater and by moonlight; and by
This I'll come, and love you, and build fun with you,
By either snow, or by sun; and it matters not what sex
You have even now apposed to you: I'll come,
As I've said, but first I'll go to sleep now into a yard
I do not own, where I certainly do not belong,
And then I'll come.

Robert Rorabeck

The Goddess Of Their Adolescent Loves

Canoe of the lavender gut in the tight rope of
The canal
Spending words into dusk when it should have Gone to school,
And underneath it all of the soggy fireworks:
And in the shade truanancies of panhandling
The blue gills look up to like
Cardboard preschoolers: what things do these
Wilds know,
Brushing the simulacrums of suburbia,
And the things coming home with the traffic
Listening to their music. Do they really know
How to wonder where they belong,
Or perceive the telltale signs of their children
Linger half naked in the Faberge oasis of the
Well mowed yard:
Well, for them the moon is just the goddess of
Their adolescent loves,
But she will never come down for them,
High in the thefts of nocturnal thievery.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gods And Their Women

If you go all the way back
You may seem them making love
At the end of the woods,
Where the wolves hunt unclothed,
Nearby the little house where grandmother
Still lives, though no one will admit it-
The gods and their women,
Paying no heed to the four seasons,
And only stopping twice a day for prayer.
They have no need for justification,
For they are happy to do what
They were made for,
And sometimes you stop the car
And idle up to the mouth of that road,
But it goes back so far,
And you know you are not welcome;
Instead you drive all day to the theatre,
Where you can watch them from a distance,
And you can be sure not to bother them.
After the credits, walking back again
To the real world turning with no need of you,
You count your change
And find just enough to buy a lonely
Condo, far away from your father
And the four horsemen,
But you haven't yet built up enough courage,
And your mother is lonely
In the foothills of the buffalo mountain,
So you cannot yet leave her to move
That much closer,
Though one day you will saddle up unnoticed
In the shadow draped forest
Were the wolves hunt unclothed
Where you are sure to see them making love,
Close to where grandmother still lives,
Never minding the four seasons,
The women and their gods.

The Gold In Fort Knox

You sleep next to your husband and sigh
At his breath,
And the snowflakes fall, and the wine
Comes,
And your little daughter plays her fingers
Through your hair
And nudges your tit like a fox does
Plums and scuppernongs;
And I don't know you,
And I don't know my father, but I care to know,
While the airplanes ripple,
While girls on them seem to be mirages,
Beautifully pale women being sold into slavery in North Africa underneath the missing nose of
That very sphinx
Made to strut and dance for entire caravans of carless
Men,
And coming in their ways to liking it,
Eventually gossiping of what they have seen,
Like the boys who happened out of the very shells of Opal mythology, and the waves
And woke up and strutted like pervasive chickens
Or cocks and made love to the two young
Swedish mothers honeymooning on the beaches
Their tits all golden and strummed like
All the gold in fort knox.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gold Mines Of Any Other Man's Bed

Burning by the fires of our pigeoning word,
The workers who are nothing building up the cenotaphs for Conquistadors
Or the grizzly bears or something less who is almost Never here:
But I remember skipping out of school, in my imperfect though
Beautiful skin:
Skipping across the reams of homes that the housewives
Entered in like sheets of music to dry the clothes;
And Alma is right here; or Alma is with him,
As I chase down windmills, as I sing my solemn hymn:
The day becomes just the choice gift of that star that we are all
Chasing;
Alma's brown skin goes to bed, and she lies down her mother's Head in the clouds of a unnamed room:
I have never been to her home, though she has been to my bed,
And maybe in my dreams like a latchkeyed colt who forever has
To roam,
A founding cheating its destiny between the lines of reintroduced
Wolves,
While the airplanes usher in their letters, too high to really sound
Down to her their gifts of love,
And their wings too unconditionally spread to ever comfort her again
Across the goldmines of any other man's bed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Golden Rule

Words on a veranda of awakening species:
There you can see them coming up from the mud,
Crackling,
Like lightning and jub-jub:
Some, some new pagan god must be doing this,
He himself just awakening from
A rusting hatchback,
Frostbit and erudite, but already his dogs are howling:
His dogs are howling as the moon circles.
She too is a pest in love.
She wants to know what is getting up while she steals
Her light,
And puts on her shade over the amphibian quarters,
Her high beams riding through the shanty eaves,
The ghosts towns;
And I would like to say I saw you riding there, a sexy
Centipede in caesuras of ridges, following the power lines,
Following the telephone lines-
Hoping for churches; but the new god proved me wrong,
For he was waking things up from the carport,
Or the easement where the sweetly trained otter was Already waking up to proposition venal housewives;
And already I can here the traffic;
And already it is time for school- And S- will be awakening
Beside A-,
And this is the golden rule.

Robert Rorabeck

The Golden Webs Of His Sister's Paramour

I am going into a new red bricked valley
Where I must promise not to look at myself
Too many times in what nimbus underbelly
There might be,
Or the indigo of leaking guts of blocked school-
Buses,
Look at me hiding out through lunch, my students
They fine and skipping,
Or playing basketball next to where the pummeled
Alligators are correlating;
And if I see two distant figures crossing the Funneled corrugations, leaving school and all
Sanctioned nations, coroneted by sea-gulls late to Brunch,
And the palm trees swaying like planted pompadours,
I must realize that it is my far deformed youth I am seeing,
That casual boy who looks nothing like me,
Who never loved me; and I should sit and pray and wonder
How far a field he is going, those two jubilating boys
Like unchallenged shadows going, to smoke and swing
And not think too much on the backyard patio where the Clear pool is crenellating, the golden webs of his Sister's paramour.

For, in fact, there is nothing I can Teach him- The cops have already lost him and his parents can not imagine where he is,
As they industriously stock the shelves of their Insignificant entrepreneurial store; but
Now I see him, a thought laughing on the roof,
A punk-rock conquistador slowly receding while the clouds
Ascend him- The sun is sinking- they are still burning Sugar-cane in the west, passing over so many canals of Citrus-tumbled drainage. Beautiful midgets ride upon the Smooth tops of soft-shelled turtles,
Passing languidly and cross-legged under quite peaceful Bridges; mermaids and commuters line up for Gas; soon too the students will be deposited once more like Rivers back into the romance of their domestic valleys,

The slender plots of green and rooms legal
And sanctioned for them to explore;
Finally he will find his own way home and the curtains will cloth
Him, and the audience will first clap and stand and go away
And forget all about him, and he will not be seen once more-
It will be like we never were, as I lay thus napping
Dreaming of a youthful brother who of, in truth, I am no longer sure.

Robert Rorabeck

The Goldfish Whom

You made a new mistake they help over our pillow
As the airplanes circled and circled into perpetual caracoles
Until they couldn't come down—
Until the very end of the hurricanes had left—and all of the most Beautiful of housewives had moved far away from My house—
And my parents eventually contemplating selling the last of Their horses—
And matriculating beneath the parapets to sell
Christmas trees—
So into the daylight of that hemisphere they christened
The color purple,
Until only she was good enough for herself—
And I kept on try to spell things to the new classrooms of Vanishing elk and marionettes:
But they still couldn't believe my simulacrum ever existed—
And in the fall of this year they will be vesting new presidents—
But I don't suppose you will ever have to come to see them
Now that you've decided to save yourself from all of this—
From you window where the cats are howling against The wolves—
And their strange memories echo to the Ferris Wheels of
The goldfish whom, thankfully, will never have an memory of This—of this.

Robert Rorabeck

The Good Feelings

My mother approaches me as
I drink tequila and read
Jorge Luis Borges' "Deathwatch on The Southside".
She doesn't even know how I am doing this,
As a fine mist seems to fall;
And she seems like she could be my aunt,
Or even any one of her sisters,
Even dead:
Where there are hills and hills of somnolent
Sororities next door to the day laborers in the Orchard,
The despotic chicken coops and children
Half buried by the tide,
And I should be skipping school right now,
Learning to love you over the shoulders and the Tight distances of classrooms,
But those school girl days are gone,
And here I am twisting wishes over canals like
Bottle caps,
Like brands which everyone uses, empties,
And just tosses away after the good feelings
Are all done.

Robert Rorabeck

The Good News

Predicted in terrible tragedies, even while the veins of god
Were struck in hosannas
Atop the fresh crèches of the mountains, tendered feet looming above
The tangling impotent fetishes of the busses full of tourists
Who crowd the nose-weary passes on
The cinderblocks of busses- everything about them putrescent
To the nose of a sommelier- these are not her bouquet,
Though it was her birthday today: and her body spindled
Outwards across the sub-lunar arcade,
And held thoughts to itself, and kissed her daughter:
And looked as if I imagined her in high school, like crossing the bath
With the first life sized angels who drank from the water fountains
And had bruises on her knees:
And there she was, accentuating the kennels of bricks- dragging whatever
Life there was in that place up by its britches,
And then to college and marriage and now far away:
Over so many canals and estuaries of Mexican honeymoons:
I cannot even say that I want her any more, since I have lived in so many Trailer parks, and now she is no longer my muse;
But I sing to her sometimes on her birthday, like a wish being bruised,
Though all of her candles still flutter after the wake of homeless airplanes,
As the days herself become warmed- and a family I can never know
Surrounds her- and the silhouettes of those mountains loom down
In a cradle of blessed gods rich in the steeped purples of the high basins
Who shed tears for her, and can only bring her the good news.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grandest Stories

I don't want to rest anymore while
You sleep;
I know the gods in their forms
Gifting me with amnesia, trying
To steal my sisters away
In the Phoenix
Desert
The planes popping around
Like gifts at New Years,
Spreading their wings like
Wishbones at the Dinner table for giants,
Saying a word of prayer
And the going ahead and telling
The grandest stories for their Cousins who don't even Believe in them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grass Is Green

Trucks burn through the forest
Where wolves sleep:
The sky is blue; the carport is green and there
Are virgins in both of those places:
They are my milky queens; and when I am taking a sabbatical,
I step outside and skip across the pools:
I hold my breath and lay a finger on the world,
While the alligators curl in their canals,
While the housewives grow poorer and far less assured;
And I am glad that I don't have to live forever
In their sad part of the world:
That I can go leaping over their sunken shoulders, so moribund;
And I can love a girl whose name is Alma,
Who is sad that one day she will have to eat her rabbits:
Because, sleeping inside their chicken wire cages
They remind her of her two soft brothers she left together behind in Mexico,
As she crossed the river and never looked back: Alma can never be A housewife;
But she has two children all the same, and the sea is hers
And the grass is green and cries out softly in Alma's name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grasses Of Those Backyards

I'll half remember you,
Placed like an insincere crucifix
Between the caesuras of
A butterfly's wings—something truly
Gaudy, if not utterly beautiful,
The housewives ignoring you as they
Drive home,
But the horses remembering you—
How you fed their senses with your tiny
Brown body struggling home
Through the houses, like the seas who
Have no name nor any heavens,
Just the tiny lights off all of their Doors—gathered together sufficient
For a church or a graveyard—
But you never lay in the grasses of those Backyards—nor do you look up at the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grave Of An Anonymous

How goes the day in its boiling summits
As airplanes turn up from the ground, exhumed from
The bilious cages of Ants and the baseball diamonds of ant lions:
Shooting across the stage like bottle rockets from a penny's
Cleft,
As all of the girls of the girls sit at all of the astonishment:
Astonished,
Or they wait for the racehorses who have sunken like Granny smith apples to be Exhumed from the waves, and animated in the sad avenues
Of carefully planted trees
Who are forever in their astounding cathedrals along
The highways-
And they go, while the tourists go: both of them exhibiting
Similar wonderments of motion,
As the waves crack their knuckles against the shore,
And the nameless rose grows over the grave of an Anonymous whore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Graves Of Conquistadors And Defeated Indians

Threads disavow with evening,
And rental cops shut down the illusions
Of the roller coasters' movement,
And no money is exchanged in the park
At night, as Mickey Mouse takes off his head
And touches the princess inappropriately,
And the offspring of tourism sleep oblivious
In roadside motel rooms, shushed by the narcolepsy
Of pines, drowsing, drowsing,
Unaware of the invisible stains and the terrain
Of microscopic insects, the paltry nuisances
Lovers exchange for free;
When my teeth ache, I reminisce of such places,
The landscaping of purified water that overflows
In between sitcoms and botoxed thighs,
The never ending parade of expensive automobiles
Flowing to and from those tributaries,
A concrete river, a ribbon twined for hurricanes,
And open mouths drooling near the burning sugarcane,
And orange groves over spilling like microcosms of Creation, and homeless men betting at the racetrack,
As the alligators wait to be handfed on the borders
Of the scalding parking lot,
And little children growing up half-abandoned leaving Trails of breadcrumbs through Walmarts, and Busy careless intersections, until they are solidified
And made real, and turn gray in front of the television
Set where the rat is inviting them into his mouth,
Charging grand admissions through the splendiferous
Parades of hucksters and talking rodents, the landscaping
Lushly green and overgrowing the graves of Conquistadors and defeated Indians.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gravestones Which Say Their Names

The prom queens are in disguise,
Brushing in their raiment, slipping like anorexic
Manatees into the green goodbye,
And the world is overheating, panting like a tortoise
Who has eaten too much of the deep orchid,
And is feeling nauseous watching the tourists go by,
Growing around the beautiful mermaid slapping with
The coy otters who can't think but smile,
And soon we will be selling fireworks, and I will be Getting paid; Even sooner still, someone will slip away, Forgetfully and finally, the persistent conclusions of Gravity, but grandmother finally has a headstone,
And I am writing another poem trying to tattoo my Skeleton onto this page: Wishful thinking, like trying
To mix cake in a recipe of scars and tears,
And everything else the little girls don't know to say
For so many years, as the buses draw up in evening,
And in morning, as mosquitoes steal insignificant amounts
Of blood, and the children in their seats fight and squeal,
And one or two yet afraid hide their faces in books and Worlds that dream for them- Led by the hands of the state,
They will grow up eighteen years knowing the system,
And the attritions will leave them smoking on the other side
Of the canal, or farting on sun torched rooftops, and the Successes will buy them homes, and insure them in fine automobiles,
But finally they will graduate in rented gowns, a zoetrope
Of accolades and smiling families, and then separate like Tributaries into the flowing institutions of their merit, and most Likely will never see each other again, except that they will all Rest like so much sleep under the fixed gravity and the Gravestones which say their names.

Robert Rorabeck

The Graveyard Of Man's Toys

I heard the noise of giving-birth today,
Deep in the truculent woodworks of the world.
This began with passion's coy whispering
And the coming together of two bodies in
The brush near the speaking fire
Where the griot told stories of everthing's beginning.
"This is how it began, " he began,
And the man and woman joined in the woods today.
Under the shallow sway of the Australian pines,
Like some kind of sea....
In a graveyard of ancient red cars
Filled with pornography. Their bodies vibrated
With a passionate hum,
The pollen and the bee in the river of life,
Two fish in the stream, a boy and a girl
Rehearsing for their roles as mother and Father, their lips expelling a Broadway musical.
On the other side of the wall,
Gathering scattered seeds, I pretended not to Hear my mother and father in their bedroom,
The lapping waves two bodies break-
With my eyes I could not peer through this,
The Cerberus bedding a hole in the earth,
The invitation of flesh drawing blood to orifice,
The extension of iris, the sacred thing
Spied through the wall's loose stones
In the graveyard of man's toys.
The months of copulation to produce a son,
The fragile vessel budded in the rust,
The sounds that come painfully jovial
Conjoined with such miracles,
Sleeping gardeners attending the bedroom,
Then lusty janitors cleaning up with lips and tongue.
I spied through a hole in wall
All these things that were done, the griot tells,
As their sounds leapt over and away,
Panting, leaving echoes to drip in my silence.

The Graveyards Of My Name

Now from the fire-engines—
From the fire towers—
You look at me naked in a way, as I have my wife
And sea shells,
But otherwise a very elusive and obscene vocabulary:
But the roses have raced and have been Given their nuptials underneath the pine trees,
And now the winners wear their wreathes and their lays
And now are otherwise going home misspelled:
As I seemed to see you in the painting, the only one
In a wayside room in a hotel, first or second story,
Going either up or down from
An all too busy highway—while the roses cannot Say even enough of ourselves—and while they are all
Too busy blooming,
And the sun is in his number and filled with the incrustations
Of the illuminate for-get-me-nots—
And this is death, in his busy portable—trying to Transfigure all of his numbers from the living—
It is some kind of equation—
And I am not telling you the truth—
But I am your paradise—if you are another angel fallen
From the sky—
And you are in heaven right now,
And maybe dreaming of the graveyards of my name

Robert Rorabeck

The Graveyards Of Sandcastles

Eternal suppositions of the somnambulant jellyfish—
This way she is going,
With her poisonous dresses flung out, and all around her
A sunken orchard—
Feeling through the tears shed by the clouds—
In a beautiful nation beside the shore:
This is my disease for her,
While the traffic stutters beneath the kites and the Claustrophobic airplanes:
She is not dashing towards any particular ballroom—
In a clutter of tangles—nerves like open extension
Chords waiting for the Pieta of my mother at
The Laundromat—even the men do not know
What to think of her,
As she waits for her time to glisten in the graveyards of Sandcastles where you take your children
To escape the prisons that you call home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Graveyards Of The Dust

Post-script to the sadness of the interstate
And the affair.
I saw you go both ways but neither with
The words for us—
As the sun fled like a doe over the Lactating estuaries of a Disney World
That isn't real—
That is tinfoil and show-boats—
But the ether—
The ether is there—and star dust
And tinker bell,
Taking off her work clothes—
Laying down in the brown mud baths
Of her skin—
And her reality unfolds with her
Eyes closed—
I went over the tracks to find her:
I went over every day until even my dog left
Me behind—
And then I went to China,
Ambivalent—
And she called once with so few words
They failed to advertise the beauty of her
Kidnapped raiment—
Catching me up like a frog, and turning
Me into many things—
Each with a space full of flowers cut amidst
The highways that flow into
The graveyards of the dust
Of each of us.

Robert Rorabeck

The Graveyards Of The Wintering Earth

Tractors no longer shall enfold the earth,
Leaving tracks that dysfunctional scientists consider
For carbon dating,
The beautiful tattoos in between the thirsty frogs
And coral snakes-
The wind doesn't even break as it tries to snap the Neck of the all-weather c$ck,
And little girls fall down and beat their fists against
The stones lining the walk after mommy and Daddy aren't home:
They just want the hurricanes to come and take them
Across the ships to a yellow bricked road,
But now even the hurricanes are pressed like
Cut flowers into the alabaster tomb,
And airplanes are free to leap silver and gold,
With their little banners and emblems,
With beautiful women all from other countries but
All in their stilettos;
And the dragon's fangs have been sewn.
Have I told you all of this before, all of the amnesiac friends
Are waking up, battle weary, but ready to spit and curse:
And right away, yawning, they pummel each other back into
The sodden dirt,
And now the great wide hearse comes taking all the wildflowers
Back to the graveyards of the wintering earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Great Body Of Excuses For This Love

Catches of knights up in their trees:

They too like bouquets, like fires who only burn through

The lunchtime:

While when it is our time, you like it when I pull your hair:

And the rabbits bare themselves for the luck of

The dog tracks,

And the men stationed there just grow skinnier with more

Tattoos:

And then you go to your home at night, Alma, filled with the

Excuses that you will never let me use,

While airplanes seem to stretch their stewardesses and use up

All of their love:

They return their princesses over the oceans, as the arks return

Their doves,

Underneath the suppositions of rain clouds where we have hidden

So many things,

While the neighborhood cats bask in the penumbras underneath

The trellises, nibbling on the thorny throats of roses

Who have grown up from the great body of excuses for this love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Great Catastrophe Of Everything Mundane

I don't go out anymore,
Into that fine neighborhood where everyone's
Smile opens in the plotted afternoon,
Where the busy traffic like fiery rapids lead,
Drown into suburban tranquility,
Where little girls' fingertips burn casually up in the Emulation of parkland trees -
Where is that but an impossible normalcy where
I before dreamed. Now
I have lapsed into my disappearing act.
I have begun to bloom into the real scars,
Where I drape upon myself the largest winter organs,
The impermeable tears of stricken angels,
And the trances storm clouds spell upon me
Smoking outside of work,
The inklings I had way back in distended high school
Class rooms whiles ago,
Cold chicken noodle soup and swing sets
A long ways from flat land and cornfields,
Or the amusement parks of out of work bakers and their kings;
Or the drive-ins where unfortunate teenagers go to make out
And swim before the great catastrophe of Everything mundane- This
Is unavoidable. This is the way I go walking as Purely as an usher alongside his lacquered pews,
The voices of strange faces distorted by burnished glass,
Just like the parallel
Lines of park lots and shopping malls
Never touching, not even thinking of looking up to Touch, and thus carrying on in videogames and into other Harmless obsessions.

Robert Rorabeck

The Great Tornados

Damp jewel in the hair-lip of grass or Hanging from the obnoxious skin of a cypress-
Petty witchcraft that evaporates
And the clouds plays hooky- until another sunlight is Gone, mumbled into the vocabularies
In the west where the sugar cane burns and the dragons
Make love to bare breasted virgins-
While, around here, after dusk, after all the Mexicans have Gone home from cleaning our house and mowing our Yard, the washing machines still do a strange pirouette
Trying to mimic the great tornados they hear so much
Gossip about.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greater Beauties

New remedy of your brushworks over the soft
Cheeks of a tourist town
Where everyone lives in a cabin and keeps postcards
Of wolves:
And chimneys smoke to the crowns of conifers—
And Indians keep a casino—
There is a thrift bookstore, and a movie theatre—
And cypress up the road—
It is the town made of the prettiest illusions of white
Men, and my muse lives far away from here:
But it is a soft place of wimpled justice—None of the dogs
Have fleas, but her circus never comes to town—
And the airport is too obscure for the greater beauties
To ever touch the ground

Robert Rorabeck

The Greater Mythology Of My Lonely Sea

Cars in the jungle of naked women,
One breasted and highly heroic, their kings made
Up of jaunting men in fine suits,
I sleep in their driveways and gentle abutments:
I steal their pies, and kissed them once or twice.
I went to school with them in an upper middle-class
Fairy-tale,
But I still want to see them again, and tongue them with Romance if I can-
First by their pools, for they all have at least one
(as as rule)
They are all like little toy Indians in high class wigwams,
Each of a sorority corded of by
Their religions: sweet, sweet bitter sweet memories
How my words fail them,
Merry-go-rounds in the rain with my little sister
In the concluding portions of a misunderstood novel;
She gives me free beer, and I go piss on the grounds of
The best university in Florida;
She still lives there, but she hasn't yet joined them:
She hasn't yet decided upon them man which will fulfill her
Destiny,
Though she has already fulfilled mine:
The eyes of my earth,
The lips of my earth,
The breasts and legs and all the senses of my earth;
The greater mythology of my lonely sea, I should say her name,
But I have already failed her, homeless and barefoot,
I travel by the perfumes of her divine providence;
I should say her name,
But she already knows what grand amusement she is to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greater Show

Ah! Let this night crumble into science,
The magnesium of her experiments put her
Hair in a spell:
In the empty pool she is chasing the rock stars
Of skateboarding,
The dirty boys with long hair who Don't have birthmarks, who are not Gauls,
And whose greatest virtue is the ineptitude
Of the cut:
Those stallions who rile in great strutting
Clicks and laugh like snide kings in the food court-
Those who fly their jolly roger from atop their cars,
And smile like debased angels pulling their ollies
Off in the shade while someone else gets compensated
To mow the yard about the teak;

She doesn't see me then, sleeping in the bin
Of alligators, narcoleptics of her cerulean element,
Alas! She doesn't know my name, nor would I give
It to her hitting off bottle rockets from up on the shingles
Of a successful roof, when I am supposed to be multiplying,
Or some such better seasons of hell;
A dove of tinfoil adorns my cheek, and the boys laugh
In the low amphitheatre of the living room,
Eat apple pie and cigarette ash- Soon they forget about me
As they return to school, eventually successful for A fair portion;

There is a lawn chair of loneliness on the windowed
Cliff above where the yellow buses chain,
And the ants are stratified unto their cognomens and snapdragons;
Soon they will ride home and hibernate in the bastions
Of empty homes and popcorns, loving the little wounds;
I see them now all going away as if in a long experiment,
The canal the teal trellis which separates the vermilion junctions,
And the loud boys in a long haired crew rolling and jeering
About the parking lot, harassing and delighting the Young-titted mothers hemmed with browned groceries,
But also even they too disperse like the whispering liniment

For a poultice of dusk;

And she is left there fawning atop her cherry car with her
Best friend, both of them juniors eating burgers,
Mayonnaise on their lips' seams, flies as well- too far away, they are gossiping
About what they have seen,
And perhaps choosing in the games which ones
They will marry when the sun turns around, but neither do they see my consternation
Above the roof, flicking my lighter to send of the Last pop-rocket in a quick hurrah! Soon they will have Driven away to be dorned in a swell college,
And will have well forgot the name of even their truest of loves,
As the stars are beginning to dive into the vinegary waters,
The wind bathing my bare head,
Inviting me to stay for the greater show.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greater Tourism's Raucous Lullabies

Fields as dry as I don't know,
And snakes sleeping there, underneath the toes
Of trees,
And rabbits lying there open hearted,
Calling to their sweet heart blood hounds:
The sky as blue as a melon rind thrown up there
By the best pitcher ever known
And sure not to come down until night:
Forgotten to the side of the great roadways roaring in Their delusions,
Like brothers and sisters absolutely enamored by their Incest:
And I want to take Alma there, to the barren folklore
Where most of humanity doesn't exist,
Where barbed wire lays buried in the thorns and Cow skulls,
Where gods have forgotten themselves in the hematomas
Of nocturnal footprints:
Where there is still good witchcrafts waiting for us,
And I can sleep with her in the waterless daydreams
Of arid kites
And paper airplanes stuck in the leafless crooks twisted
For the fun of no one:
And we can live for a little while far absent from the Overpopulated and undermined cacophonies
Of the greater tourism's raucous lullabies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greater Wrath Of A Mothering Soul

The bull is sleeping while the children retreat to the swings:
All summer, or all day long I've been touching myself,
But what has Kelly been doing, girl:
And the black faces emote amidst the groves of the plantation;
And the paper airplanes cluster to see just what is A matter of fact;
And Gracie sleeps, wondering; and Elijah is wonderless
In a cocoon of rarified censes:
Then far away Mount Everest always flumes with the cataracts
Of
Apathetic romance;
The highest grandeur of the world, hermaphrodite,
Wonderful;
And I kick my heels up on the swings, and remember your kiss,
And curse and wonder in the strata where
You hide your gods in their in ground pools;
And it is ever strange to feel your body's touch, unsanctified,
Classical and yet above allusion;
You belong in the places of knowledge, studied, sketched
Nudely and yet in the deeper philosophies and the Quiet sort of pools I have yet imagined that you have really been;
While the tadpoles gurgle and your little daughter curls
Beneath you like a clutch of vines on a
The greater wrath of a mothering soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatest Airplane

I have been to good airports
And seen in there many of her scars:
As she is flying away,
She is beautiful: so many words in poultices over
Her shoulders have taken shape,
And are renewing her as if in springtime:
She leaves her nest—she says amen:
There is a newness in her arcing virginity:
I don't know—maybe she is a candle
Who flutters over a birthday cake meant to be Eaten by the lips of another man:
Maybe she turns from him, and goes
Another way, with fireworks on her cheeks:
I cannot say if she lives in America anymore—
But she is finally outside of her tomb—
Trumpeting a holiday—with swans and flamingos
In her wake—
And soaring now in that aerie of burning cake,
She is a muse who goes her own way—
The ferris wheels on their knees blessing her—
The hearts of boys beating a peony just like the drums
Of pigeons underneath the greatest airplane they ever saw.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatest Distances Between The Earth And Sky

The day flies by with nothing left to do,
And there are so many people
With so little time
And not so many faces live forever,
And the quiet animosity breathes through
The fabric of our clothes,
And the world is miles high
And swaying by a thread,
And I think I said I loved you for some
So many times,
But you just lit out the doorway shaking
Your head at my ineffective rhymes,
And I think I said I love you,
But there are no tears building in the unaffected
Sky,
And the city goes up forever where the tarnished bodies
Are moving, breathing through their orifices
Reflecting the greatest distances between
The earth and the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatest Inventions

Opening the tomb for the children to Seeâ€‘showing off death in the classroom:
The children, little, open mouths and Yawn, perceiving that their day
Is still like the dawn'
With strange airplanes flying high above them'
Miraculously 'they pitch their shoulders
And head down the hallways 'the greatest
Inventions of men'
Eager with all they have learned.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatest Mirage

The butterflies get drunk in this cartoon,
While the cars go by yes they do whether it is raining or Not;
And I tilt my head back and swallow fire, glad to be unbusied
From looking into the degrees of vision of Cryless alligators and the women who have always come in Double-breasted as they do:
And it really should have been such a sweet life, and maybe
There is still time for them,
But I am still bitter like a forest fire who has nothing green left
To lick:
And she has the perfect features: heart shaped, basking in Valentines:
Look at all the stalwart youth lining up friskily at her kissing booth,
All day long while the trailer park moms slide down the water slides
In sweet surplices of coconut and bamboo,
Their yojimbo goslings entrained to them, the sky a whistle wetting
Itself over Timbuktu: the city the greatest mirage of sweet
Young things that I ever knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatest Sleep They Would Ever Know

Last night the law stole my dreams
And banished me into an unworrisome crypt,
Where the moon was so bright that it made the Nocturnal gardens bloom, coral and spikenard,
Where silver veins were revealed tangled deep in
The sand, and your eyes were not far off,
Though I couldn't write of them with any grace:
My mother was there, under the alto swings,
Where I was still a child in overalls with blond hair
And many wishes hidden in tall grass for Easter,
And just over the rise where the Australian Pine trees
Clustered both exhausted and inebriate, the sea washed,
Shushing the same lullaby it played to the conquistadors
As they bled out into her, and I still wait for her to Call without any sympathy, but that note is past due,
And they have left the orchestra in the liberal arts room
Well past midnight without any peanut butter and jelly sandwiches,
As the ghost paces the small square room of the clock tower,
With determined duties, and I recognize his face, because he will Not turn to me, for from his station he can see her crawling
Caesuras, the lauding she gives to the convex horizon
Without realizing for sure what it was- Just a memory,
A soul unfurled, and in the morning there'll she be again,
As cut blue as if I had never seen her,
But the ghosts and the sad men of their watch, and the Little child I was up and down across the arc of the squealing
Swings- all of that will become lost, unremembered for what it was,
The insubstantial twittering above the dunes where the Crabgrass grows, and the burs stowaway in the blouses of little Girls, and the winos sing up and down no worse than their dogs,
And she is there forever like a note carrying endlessly,
A sculptor of unequalled time, where in her tears and drool,
Nameless men both arise and succumb to her,
As if she were the greatest sleep they would ever know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greatly Anonymous Moonbeams

Abstained for a couple years, I feel like
Nikola Tesla, living in hotels,
Dreaming of his mother, or another man's wife,
Tinkering with electronics,
And making the carriage drawn streets glow at night-
I don't even know what I am doing writing poetry,
But starting down the sad slope of corn oil,
Trying to connect with her, the female end,
The double entendre just picked like a scuppernong
From the chain-link fence surrounding my great uncle's Property:
He's the one who lives near the lake in Michigan,
Whose the head of the physics department, and just Completed an important experiment involving magnets-
I don't know, but he's also celebrating a wedding Anniversary, but if I drive there it will only be to run away-
My glass is almost out of Dr. Pepper and rum,
And my grandmother is dead- The park is full of ghosts of Girls named Kelly- Funny, because the ghosts are married
And fat with dew and pregnancy;
And, bending, I find a twenty dollar bill in the grass
Good for an entire sack of penny candy- The cheap liquor is Making me inclined to masturbate,
And I have lent my father ten thousand dollars to stave off
Such a sad and unfortunate foreclosure,
And I have gotten the highest score in Mrs. Pac-man and juked
In my initials, electronic carvings in her bar,
But she fell in love with the blue anchored bouncer anyways;
She probably already married,
And by the dead middle of summer I'll have moved to Saint-Louis
And been the victim of my first crime,
As lawyers and their wives break the hymen of their first Mortgage in South Florida;
They'll make love on the other side of the wall to their in-ground
Pool, rippling with chlorinated crenulations;
And I'll have sipped up the last of my liquor,
Like a greatly bankrupt and inland pirate soon to be deinstitutionalized,
And left over once again into the penumbras
And deathly searchlights of the greatly

Anonymous moonbeams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Green In Mexico

Oh the joy fainting through the carnival,
Riding itself through the fair weathers of January-
While love is upon a lark,
Upon a jetliner- and all of the green in Mexico
Couldn't take her away-
Files and orders of parades, the star-crossed
Rituals,
Balloons strung upon trees with shoes-
The grottos weep beneath the gasping mouths of Traffic: the birds themselves are tied to tiny
Profusions of air:
Their job is to mine the sweet metamorphosis,
Pulling her down and making love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Green Planets Are Burning

The green planets are burning.
In high heels,
She steps on the frightened
Comet
And shatters it like a
Wine glass at a Jewish wedding—
She is not afraid;
She turns to me and says,
How can she be envious
When she never loved?
Then she takes off her rhinestone
Tiara and throws
It into the lake
Where all heavy things disappear.
Slipping from the edge,
Without a sound she Removes herself from my Gravity—
I become the emperor
Without an army—
I live alone on an island which is
My only country—
I am an insect trapped in amber,
The ghost of a disposed king
Conspired against by his family—
Poisoned by time,
I now walk repeatedly
Through my echoes, in the tatters
Of a life wronged by an Unhealthy universe where
The green planets are burning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greenness Of A Promised Holiday

Sheets of empty music
Asleep by the lake-
An uncle who is a professor owns a house-
A religious man- the sun skates like a spider,
A web of hoary legs reveal the cracks
That science proved
Onto his life:
His house is on a hill, a steep slope populated
By bitter apples that never reach
Pubescence:
I roll down the slope, after I run away:
And as a child,
Stolen bicycles,
Eaten penny candy:
Runaway memories my son will never have:
Ghosts on the swing set
Of a place I do not know-

Snow fills his eyes,
As he counts his stolen toys-
Sun fills his memory,
And in the morning he looks away:
A family awaits him,
A job on a planet far away:
And voices that call, remembering the carnival
Boxes that sent themselves spinning such as whimsical
Fireworks from a playground of yesterday:

A graveyard lies at the bottom of the hill,
All of the tears of gods' angels gather there:
Feral things, such as fallen leaves:
And losing boys who cannot read the names of
The gravestones:

A cold love that clutches at her stone-drunken
Heart- a child is cursing
The looming planets stepping down like voyeurs
Through the gardens,
Bending the greenness of a promised holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Greeting Card

Another soft sound meant to have
Been here,
But is this joy: the blue gills in the middle of
The day are not caught with any rum-
As the stewardesses fly
In leaps and bounds over the canals—
They are lifting their skirts and blowing out
Candles and stepping away—
Over the professors and over the sea:
They will go to make love with Men in France or men upon another world:
Men who have learned wings themselves,
Or foxes who have finally jumped too
Far that they float over the grape vines
Like bedrooms—and they laugh, nip,
And suck the teet of the moon
Who joins them languidly, perhaps expecting
The greeting card that will send them home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grieving Window

The grieving window is open a pace
Blowing consumptive curtains of atomic lace-
The world outside is glowing a cadmium wound,
And the war helicopters are dying like sprayed bees....
The young man has tried to walk to her door,
But he is a foolish coward asleep on the glowing sidewalk:
The landscaping is turning blue,
Choking where it is not burning-
The canopy of leaves sucked outwards,
Like umbrellas overturned and floating in
The swift currents of contaminated skyways:
Little children are crying in store halls underground;
Soon they will change forever,
For they cannot hear their parents' knocking bones,
And she is still beside her window, a musician unsure of the notes;
If she would only look a little further down
The road of cars like dead cattle, she would see her lover
Sprawled like a toppled windmill,
Collecting no more water from the earth, though
Seemingly in peaceful dreams of her....

Robert Rorabeck

The Grottos Of The Rain

We can share the same girl, and we can go with Her for hours:
I can look just as beautiful for her as you can,
But I cannot drink anymore if I want to go with you
To see her tonight;
And maybe you were my first love but who are
You anymore but an accomplice:
And from the adobe stilts we can stretch our necks
Over the inter coastal and look at all of the gaudy
Monoliths over in Palm Beach:
We can even sleep in their expensive shells when their Absence is rich,
And I believe a mermaid would even come to us
In between the caesuras of baby blue cavalries and proposition
Us both the same,
And leave us both hung over come morning sleeping in
The grottos of the rain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grottos Of The Washing Machines

Give to me vengeance in tight graveyards and exit
Signs- or give to me believing in down towns with unlucky
Numbers, or way to pull out of her before she even Breathed out the cares of her first birthday that she was already real:
Or give to me believing that I am already made over
In the forest fires of my parents
And this already the kindergartens of wherever it was,
And we all had to sing together to dragons our wishes:
And here we are blowing out our candles already over the lakes,
The knees of our virgins tremulating and claustrophobic
But already touch the heavens like Popsicles to the lips
Of kindergarteners underneath the sad easy of nursery rhymes into
The lavender showrooms of whatever mass they held for our Teenaged ancestors- and then there was this beautiful thing,
Left abused outside the grottos of the washing machines,
Until it rained as it had to rain, and the houses melted,
And even our father's horses felt our pain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Grove

Like intelligent swine shimmering in the mangroves,
The conquistadors are following the head of the cow.
If you look out my window from where we're going,
You can see them kneeling before the opulent cross
Just inside the shadows of the weeping bay, but that Is not what your mother told you, when she kissed your Brow and laid you down inside the little house amidst The others. She said to you, "Your two eyes are as Beautiful as half penny marbles under the pines where
The airplanes fly like strange steeds frightened in a blue Meadow." And when she read to you from books whose Unexplainable stains were more interesting than the Characters, didn't you believe that you would soon be Going into the impenetrable night where most things Never exhume. But I found you in a shallow well and Took you up from where you'd scraped your knees upon
The jawbones of stolen bicycles. The thieves had not Hid you well, though neither had you cried out to the Night circling through the increments of lycanthropes,
Where the decrepit hands of the grandfather chronometers
Switchblade over the abnormal lake which took the place
Of your young memory of the merry-go-round, and the Revolving hours where you hid the answers under falling leaves.
Now I am taking you to the man I believe you belong to,
Because a long time ago I saw you together in a photograph
Smiling like lucid sorrow in the park falling down to the sea,
Though where we are going can go on forever, as long
As you neither speak or look over once again to me.
Rather notice the bay of horses impressed upon the land's palm,
And the tide rushing in as the daylight streaks across the Troughs like the shivering brow of a man in a fever. Look Towards the things I tell you are going away faster than Racehorses on the final stretch, and together we will live
Through all of those who are passing, you with me in the Passenger seat far away from home, the conquistadors now
Like gray herons crippled without light, a cross rippling in
The grove.

The Grumblings Of Their Motors

Up in the heady atmosphere where the stewardesses
Nuzzle the tourists
As soft as grizzly bears; where, evaporated, the wolves
Run the highways looking for a trick:
The road kill their silent tears; and they are making something
Above the sea:
Looking down, gilding the soft vessels that cannot help
But to swim over and so near the cathedrals of Ferris Wheels;
Down at their ankles pretty girls kiss boys named Jim-
And it is like the enraptured but mostly villainous honeymoon
Of evolving truants- near the dog tracks, under the boardwalks:
Where the conquistadors used to live, but whose crosses
And bandoleers
Now have mingled in with luckless roses,
Tossed by the charioteers and bus drivers back into the sea
That is always galloped by some salacious mermaid or another,
While the selkies bathe with seahorses,
And the clouds gather in the consumptive foyer like a waiting
Room of wounded patients praying there
Above the spume of salt and tears, and the grumblings of their motors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Guesses Of Innocent Children

Rabbits flutter under foot:

Like little green snails in the hooves of traffic:

And Alma is at home and all too aware that she and her Children will

Have to eat her rabbits: I asked her to name one of her
Rabbits after me:

Name it Robert and cut its throat, if you do not love me,
Alma:

Watch it bleed to the curb and across the snow;

So if Sharon finally saw me she would certainly know that I was not beautiful.

That I was as stained as a mattress beautiful grapes had been Tramped into,

Like this world of cars and airplanes all of the time:

I have been out into the middle of this world,

But you will never guess what I could have found;

And now all of the houses have two hearts

Beating like drums around

The hearth where the fire is missing, where the stars have burned out:

Where the lovers are no longer kissing,

Where the guesses of innocent children have all been found out.

Robert Rorabeck

The Gymnastics Of Sunshine

We will have new candles brought to us—and our fathers
Will buy us new cars amidst our birthdays:
Even if she will never sing another song for us—but she will arise
And wake up her children
And kiss her husband and continue across the railroad tracks:
And other dimensions of so many orchards—all of the while
The carolers have been singing to us
As if it would snow—
As the dragons get up to saw their lumber—
The satanic fuselage beneath the gymnastics of sunshine—
Or other pretty ways of carrying on: one armed—
Inebriate—bouquets of ways to remind us that she is not mine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Habitat For False Romance

Somber glass ditches such as these Deserve no illumination;
They just keep going on and on as if
In some fairyland used for persistent
Fertilization,
But what are they growing that hasn't been Eaten before,
And where are the beautiful girls who should
Be out sailing, and winnowing between the rows,
And waiting to show their stuff
To the priceless fabriche gentlemen: but they
Are not waiting for the girls;
They must have fallen off their horses or some Walls, or down some wells at the tops of suave
Marble hills, if they've been really luck;
And all that is here are the blown glass swells,
Like a very intrinsic planet or mobile,
For an infant of a species which can never be explained
Much less thought about; but if there is a
Sense of heartbreak out on this empty, folded lot,
It is only because this was a creation for a callous bud;
She did not spring for it, as she had promised:
She didn't even blush; and hasn't even come to see the Amusement of these denoting amusements,
But there is another line for her a little further on,
And an entire retinue of our moons we have no business
Speaking of, though they are each quite solitary in the Perfections of their pure grade elements;
But eventually it all must be smashed, and undone,
For the habitat for false romance which isn't even taken
Out for the flings of holidays is a breathless place,
As she puts her lips and hangs her prices for the beefy Pinwheels and chimes boys with numbers, bicycles and Impressive biceps picked up at the drugstore at the Price of a penny each, and so easily amuse her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hair Lip Parade

My father has an orchard
He wont let anybody see.
He loves horses in his orchard of the colors
Of the likes horses are Never allowed to be,
And I still my father's limes from the back of His truck;
I break my jaw and have it wired shut along
I-95 to stave of scurvy:
I am like a color t.v., the very first time,
And we turn our broadsides around in
The venal sea
And fire off our green copper cannons to ward of Coral snakes and selkies,
And the banshees from the bushes and the entangled
Colonnades;
And there was a person she knelt for beneath the wrought iron
Cross, like a gate strangled by ivy,
And maybe she was the first woman whose birthstone
Was opal to walk free and unadulterated through this State,
Through the great inland prairies,
And the apple orchards, through the Bismarcks,
And the slash pine teepees the white men eventually made
Telephone poles out of:
And through the tennis courts of a teal man's pride,
I touched myself and dreamed I had her for a bride,
And picking her up took her to an expensive zoo,
Down the corridor of well placed gentlemen all in soft
Green,
We stole on through the flame swords and the softly
Beating serpents and I made love to her first with my Right hand and then
With my left, as I was meant to do,
Down on the soft green carpet of the giant living room
Of my father's orchard
Or somewhere else I didn't belong:
But it was full of secrets, and the leaping shadowed bodies
Of airplanes,

Paper and crenulated and folded along the wrist,
Spuming the choreographies of the forgotten generation
Who sunk the entire cavalry of German U-boats
And then went straight on into the next
Television show, college graduation,
And the hair lip rodeo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hallucinations Of The Neon Lights

Burning loneliness of a society in peril,
Made up of a species unconcerned with extinction:
This is how we make our diseases right here in
The classroom,
Filled out, tiny, tinkered boys walking in stages,
Taking our turns at the attempts of breathing—
Filling our lungs with the autumnal deceivings—
In some day light classroom with a rotten floor and A rotten teacher, it was almost near where I pretended to Touch you—jocular misconceptions that bring in
The flowers all the way from Holland
In grand processions of marriages and Deaths—
The way the bees once tried to pollinate the orchards—
It is not the same now anymore,
There are only fireworks in foreign land
Sold in all night stores managed by ghosts
Under the hallucinations of the neon lights
Of the pagan's scientific existence.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hallways Still Echoings

What are you doing, laughing to the piano
Underneath the forts—while you pretend to be one of
Their princes in the moonlight
Just to impress the mermaid losing her clothing in
The echoes of the constellations,
In the changing rooms of the caesuras or wherever she was:
As the traffics continued throughout the weekends—
As I stared at myself until the sandcastles were consumed
By the proportions of the evenings
And there was nothing left that could be enjoyed
But the dysfunctional classrooms that we all tried to runaway
From—
In those strange grammars that I could never quite get
Ahold of—with the sunlight still falling through the alienations of
The hallways still echoings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hallways Still Echoings

What are you doing, laughing to the piano
Underneath the forts—while you pretend to be one of
Their princes in the moonlight
Just to impress the mermaid losing her clothing in
The echoes of the constellations,
In the changing rooms of the caesuras or wherever she was:
As the traffics continued throughout the weekends—
As I stared at myself until the sandcastles were consumed
By the proportions of the evenings
And there was nothing left that could be enjoyed
But the dysfunctional classrooms that we all tried to runaway
From—
In those strange grammars that I could never quite get
Ahold of—with the sunlight still falling through the alienations of
The hallways still echoings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hallways Still Echoings

What are you doing, laughing to the piano
Underneath the forts—while you pretend to be one of
Their princes in the moonlight
Just to impress the mermaid losing her clothing in
The echoes of the constellations,
In the changing rooms of the caesuras or wherever she was:
As the traffics continued throughout the weekends—
As I stared at myself until the sandcastles were consumed
By the proportions of the evenings
And there was nothing left that could be enjoyed
But the dysfunctional classrooms that we all tried to runaway
From—
In those strange grammars that I could never quite get
Ahold of—with the sunlight still falling through the alienations of
The hallways still echoings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Halogen Halls Of High School

I read Thomas Hardy,
Or I ejaculate:
The traffic runs. My teacher
Is not home:
I drink bourbon while rednecks
Chop wood from Australian pines.
I will steal this cup,
And another line. Today was Thanksgiving, and I tried not to Think of her, rather the great calm
Of tourism: It didn't happen,
Even now the planes are leaping,
Like frogs from trees, or her lips
Move upon him, her body quivers in Bed. Filled with turkey,
After masticating, parts of her body hyphen,
Her hips drape upon him like warm laundry:
There are scientists in California dehydrating
Aquamarine brine from the Pacific Ocean,
And ornithologists driven deep into the Phoenix desert, sweaty and flushed. In Shorts they go out looking for her,
Just the tiniest shadow posed over the lip
Of a flowered sequoia,
Like a girl in a miniskirt tipped over the Water fountain
Hydrating softly
In the halogen halls of high school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hands Of Lovers

Thoughtless engines who make no sound,
Whirligigs that can't tell time,
Uncles of mimics and the properties that are so much
Far and near than mine:
The words and epitaphs on coins put across the eyes
Of the dead and blind,
The legless swimmers kissing water spiders-
The spigots of hope that have all run dry except that Maybe my Alma Linda will be mine:
Maybe I will see her tomorrow the way ignited gas
Beautifies the sky,
And look across the fruiteria in which I am no longer the Patronsito,
And be sure that she gives me that sweet hope,
The desires of sweet ownership and the little boats who Leave the hands of lovers to find her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hands Of The Outbound Night

Stone thrown from the hands of the outbound
Night—and now where are all of my old students—
I do not know what they are doing,
But I like to wish that they sleep—
And the angels give them some peace,
Anointed over their oily heads—
Successful or not,
It will soon be the graveyard for them—
And all things, just as the night makes love
To its valentines—
And the world scrambles over its busy voids—
Not even one or two words can survive from
The lips of the ant mound in the middle
Of the school yard while
All of the better reasons are on summer vacation—
And the teachers in their corporal forms are
Slumbering in their living rooms and dens
Watching television as if it was Christmas—
And the most beautiful of the littlest girls
Have found their own reasons
To fall asleep on the floor
And, closing their eyes,
Never imagine to call the boys they
Are already sick and tired of falling in love with.

Robert Rorabeck

The Handsome Grasp Of An Overimaginative Creation

Pitch-forks in the darkened surplus of the night,
Laying in the bucolic everglades
And the hemispheres of housewives:
Alma back at home when I remembered I held her
Hand today,
And looked into her eyes after she flirted with my Cousin for three hours,
Reminding me it was nothing:
She was wearing all of my jewelry: her body brown,
Perfect,
And could still be mistaken for a child except from
The roundness of it where it
Needed to be;
And sometimes she said she loved me:
Alma said she loved me, but sometimes she didn't know,
And she also guessed that she loved her man;
She was going home to him, I was sure,
And she didn't want anything to change,
For she would not leave him: and so ended the day
At the fruit market, the closing of my show:
I held her hand sometimes underneath the semi trailer
As red as marooned ixora,
And I held her hand in the car, as she turned up the volume
And remembered that she would be late picking up Michael
But at least she promised me that she didn't love
My cousin,
Even though she flirted with him three hours today:
Maybe she loved me, this amusement she left in the sand
Burning with the instruments of defeated make believe while
The airplanes otherwise blew away their wishes
While on their destinations through the sky;
And the housewives stood in the kitchens and cooked up
Anything,
Though I held Alma's hand today, like an unconditional make-believe
In the handsome grasp of an over imaginative creation.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hanging Men And Egrets Who Couldn'T Spell

I would go and get laid tonight,
If I wasn't too drunk & I am in love with you,
And all of this foreplay laid like chess pieces atop the Sink holes in the limestone,
The emerald birdbaths in the body of Florida;
And I haven't seen the violence of conquistadors in
A very long time,
But little girls are practicing on the swings to become Stewardesses,
And eventually they will love you, mouthing off,
Oral-s*x of training wings:
They will orgasm all the way up to the Front Rang:
They will grow cherry blossom orchards all atop the Collegiate peaks,
And your daughter will know a new world unbelievable
That I will sing to her,
As I sing to you into a coffin of repose we keep snugly
In the carport in front of the orange groves;
Here is where I step back into a pornographic dream you Never saw happen, while Mickey Mouse takes you
From behind,
And the billboards trumpet above the unlucky necks
Of all the hanging men and egrets who couldn't spell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hang-Man's Lover

The hang-man's lover mopes
Around after class,
Trying to figure out the word
To get him down,
Where he sways on the branch
And little bits of sun:
She's the only one who thinks
To see him there,
Decorating so high up the Campus landscaping,
Amidst the red bricks,
She bites her lip-
She's run out of chances
As he stops breathing,
The wind tossing him around
His reflection caracoles in
The third floor window,
Exhibiting for the Spanish Class:
She stares at his dirty souls,
The farting wind chime
Spinning in the sky-
She has the itch to go to her room
And f*ck someone
Then study Latin,
She'd prefer him,
But he is so high up and not around,
She figures she'll just do anyone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hapless And The Living

We are going to go by boat to the Park:
Just a little toy boat you can barely stand in,
That would tip over if the lions roar
Too loudly,
Or if the pretty but apoplectic housewives stood
For awhile looking at it funny,
Cursing with their wine-
But even though the rivers are all dry, we will Get there if we try;
And there are gaunt fevers under the tall, tall mounts,
Just amnesiacs dreaming themselves foot upon foot
Taller,
All of the angels cheering them on, happily jeering from
The theatres of their pulpits-
I want to smell you as we sail- want to know you
The way my dogs know the world:
Because all the other women have gone beneath the Current of your patinas affected melancholy-
Now they aren't even echoing but should be
All but satisfied in close-lipped trances;
And I will quit this soon and go outside the doorway
Which denotes for a little while the space,
The coral seething paths between locis of rest and Gift-giving;
And even though it seems we've done it all before,
We'll continue waking up at it, for such is the way of
The hapless and the living.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hapless Giants Shed From The Movie Theatres

Bouquets in my rusting jaw—and my Mexican uncle
Already home—
Restless and lawless—but promising to cook me
Shrimp—
And my house is his house, and the sandcastles eat
The sea:
The meager dreams of sandcastles built by little boys
And girls who don't yet even know
How they will have to escape school—
In their last ditch effort—
While some strange stag, metamorphosed,
Wanders out upon the beach—and now, what is
This? How did he get here?
He doesn't even know that he was once the king
Of a great kingdom—soon to be the victim of fratricide,
Destined for oblivion—
Just like the history teachers teaching from the portables
Year after year—
Corresponding to their own echoes—
Waiting for their wonder less loves to enter the ballrooms
Where so many crystals lay waiting in the heavens,
Evaporations of the tears
The hapless giants shed for them from the movie theatres
Where they were too afraid to go.

Robert Rorabeck

The Happenstance Of Suburbia

This is how it abandons for the good of trumpets:
While I spill myself over loose change like a wish,
Not even knowing if I will even get up again
To see another stewardess or Ferris Wheel:
But each day dreaming and turning around, showing off all of Her good sides, while the high school bands play Instruments I cannot judge- and the fireworks of our Truancy burn down the mealy sides of another house anonymous
In the happenstance of make-believe that suburbia commonly Makes come true.

Robert Rorabeck

The Happenstance Of This Touch

Rollercoasters of your shoulders and airplanes,
But anywhere, I am still here,
And it is almost time to go to sleep,
With the world slipping just over the parapets,
Pretending to be the gods of a different world,
And I've been thinking of you—you,
And, yes, you—one or two times—
And it doesn't even matter that you know whom
You are anymore—
The summer is falling all over itself, with glowing Spokes and splinters—
And I want to drink again, but my wife is very wise
And she is watching—even though she doesn't believe
In god,
These words still spill out in masturbations,
Like the subtle scars upon my neck, and
The another summer will be another summer—
And then the shoulders of airplanes and angels will Really happen—
Far above like fireworks, to this world laid out beneath
Them—from a world too far away to be kindled
To the happenstance of this touch.

Robert Rorabeck

The Happenstances Of His Casualties Of Exploits

Play with me before going back to sleep,
Because the cat has had her seven kittens like in a black
Box in the shadows
Underneath the penumbras of airplanes that go to read brail;
For I have begun vibrating through the fabulous joy
Of graveyards,
Humming the tune of asthmatic drums, that even the flowers
Should close up before they can be realized by the Tourists have their way to the ritualistic universities to congratulate Their corpulent and jaundice young:
That Alma can play with me all day the way a dog plays with Its rabbit in the rock garden until fear or joy destroys the Poor things heart,
And then she goes away to sleep at her master's side,
While the ghosts of everything who wished that it was real
Joins the procession through the sepias of the unreal carport
Like the credits in a movie that her eyes never saw,
As they turned away through the darkness
To embrace the happenstances of his casualties of exploits.

Robert Rorabeck

The Happenstances Of Our Gods

Crying the words that arc like angels birthing their young into
The kitchens and bathtubs,
And doesn't even seem to be real, or even almost possible:
While all of the traffics drive insouciantly, and the missions sit in the Glow of candelabrum,
And the orchards grow fat with the globes and conjunctions:
I like when I can smell you, Alma, or when once or twice
I get the words right: it is almost like being beautiful again, or getting Along with my apposing brother:
Then I grow wings and float like daydreams over the parks and rodeos:
Then I can look up the skirts of Ferris wheels and everything feels Alright, and I can win,
Or at least I can come back to you and lie and bask against your brown
Skin,
And then we can take your children to the movies, while the kites whisper
In the wind:
And I can write empty novels that fill up the brown vases of your neck,
Or I can just whisper silently to your eyes that seem to love me only
For awhile and only when the happen over the overthrown forts
Full of fireworks,
When they are casting and sewing their memories so far away from the Sunday schools which happen to be all of the happenstances of our Gods.

Robert Rorabeck

The Happiest Land

Held up into the splendor of a crime
That happened in the dusk of a
Fireworks tent
For a time:
I loved a Mexican girl across from a gas station
As it rained
And the stallions kissed the earth beneath the Telephone poles:
In Homestead south of the Coral Castle,
Transplanted:
Another warm surrender for my kindergarten soul:
Another fieldtrip through
The rainstorms that wanted to kiss both
Of her wrists,
Brown and from Mexico, but the lighthouses
Had turned out her light
And gone to bed with another man:
So it rained and rained
And the loneliest oceans flooded the happiest land.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hardest Time Remembering Who I Am

All your life you've lived on Florida Street,
While the better students turned out, shirking your dusty
Roads:
And I gave you orchids the day before yesterday;
And you wore your husband's ring as you shook my mother's Hand:
And you guys stood together like gunfighters, like outstanding
Rebels about ready to take out a star;
And I was all humble, holding your orchid;
And you have four children, and all I want is a chance
To love the tremendous weathers they keep having over the Catholic universities in Missouri:
And the place has turned out, it really has:
And even the people have stopped dying; and my mother is throwing
Away the trash; and now she is pushing herself.
My mother works a twelve hour day, and then she goes home
To no where and does the books for four hours;
And you don't know her, but the lions are still roaring in Colorado;
And then I touch myself and make a flume, like a firework's cone:
Like the lips of Mount Everest:
I push the broom into the sounds of new graveyards;
I clean the streets as simple as a chimney sweep, still believing in Christmas:
And the nights leap over like fauns: they leap across like good
Cavaliers, like kindergarteners learning in the graveyard:
And then like kindergarteners all asleep and touching themselves:
And my great uncle has speed boats,
And Shakespeare is hyperventilating underneath his lake I ran away to
With Jordan in the early epitaphs of high school;
In the places I don't remember,
In the places I ran away to, like migrating song birds too contagious
For miners; I've loved you in the felt-tipped anthems
Of better suited geodes: In the precious solicitations of lost
Heirlooms, but now I am not good enough to bloom into
The classrooms of professors:
I am all done away with- I am the plagiarism of dark classrooms;
I am dying without the true loves of holocaust,
And it is almost Valentine's Day, Sharon- My sick muse:
It is almost time for the closing of the shops of winter:

And I wonder how deep the snows have buried you;
And how long I will live after the revolutions of this blue earth and
The amounts of breath in my lifetime:
I keep selling to myself that I am as rich as Shakespeare,
But I have never yet written a play as beautiful as you are;
And you are busy diademing your pinball streets for the next wonderful
Pageantry out in the middle of such wonderful theatre:
While the earth is moving like the penultimate, and grotesquely
Obese ballerina broken free from the still life of her
Aquarium;
And I will finish this again into the séances of my early February;
And tomorrow I might even buy a home,
Even though I still have the hardest time remembering who I am.

Robert Rorabeck

The Harmless Disney Worlds

Listen to all of the chances that they keep to Themselves:

Coming awakened each morning rows of unbroken chrysalis:

This is how the housewives live

House to house:

This is the princess sleeping as a mouse- the strange pigmentations

That the gods gave to them,

The rituals of the privileged laymen- To make love like

Banshees like murdered oysters cracked against the tidal lands

Of the sea:

How their men move like dance troops with axes, sucking the winds

Of the kisses straight up the blow holes of their solar plexus:

Girls who move with pretty books pressed up to their

Pretty bosoms in between their broken classes:

Girls who have fallen so very far only to land on their broken asses:

They stop for awhile and sun on the green,

And then they try to travel on, and to sit and think of all of the means

That their professors mean,

While down in the grottos of the super stygian night the cicadas take

Of their unnecessary shells and leave them on the rivers of trees,

All too happy to never have known all the pretty syllables,

And the harmless Disney Worlds into which these fine young ladies

Have grown.

Robert Rorabeck

The Harmony Of My Parents Feet

Paddle boats in a sea the boys made
To take their loves:
There, the crocodiles are grinning, showing their Games to the grasshoppers:
When they jump, they go down blouses and into
Ice-cream:
The world is on the move, a transience of jade-
Underneath the spokes of the Ferris Wheel
Winnowing sunlight into Little girls,
The blue rivers only appear to move: the tourists
Are moving,
Like a serpent of t-shirts:
And I hear them not too far away, pressing my ear
To the grass-
The ants crawl around enjoying the echoes from
The open mouths of lions:
They will take the memory of this symphony down
Beneath me
To their muses in the cathedrals underfoot-
Their indecipherable dreams- with their heads like beads
Of sand,
Will transcend through the harmony my parents' feet
Make as they get up before the sun
And hurry off to work.

Robert Rorabeck

The Harsh Lesson

Do not let that get in your head,
Because I will fail you-
Do not let the sun become your lavender crutch,
Because it may awaken the mother in her,
But she will only kiss you on your Parched mouth and send you off into the desert:

There is only one oasis in the desert
(If you can even find it)
Where the ugly frog prince lives,
And he will want you to kiss him;
But he makes an even uglier prince,
So don't oblige him,
For as soon as you do he will
Be beheaded by a jealous populace.

Instead, you must stand in the blue
Light of the corner outside the church,
And watch her go by every night,
Held in the arm of the gentleman's silhouette:
There, if you are thirsty,
Will you find your somber liquor that will get you drunk,
That will make you hunger:
There, each night without fail,
You will grow into the color of a ghost,
And the moon will pullulate and catch you
In its exterior wombs,
Where sad thoughts grow like unopened children
In the gross arachnidan light of stillborn morning:

But this I can give to you,
And I will award you high marks in all your subjects,
And perhaps you will become a great philosopher
Of midnight,
The mute lover of faded street corners,
Always overlooked at the edge of the boisterous crowd:
There were ladies smile ruby
And stare emerald,
In the mauve amphitheatre of the passing twilight,

I will give to you the unmarked truth,
And if you believe me, then you might always Know her,
Surrendering unconditionally as you look on
From your affected distance.

Robert Rorabeck

The Haunted Sea

Back home again in the shallows of your brown yard
After you have stepped back in and only left the stones
Upon the cinder blocks,
And it rains for three miles down the street drowning all
Of the neighbors' fireworks and in the woods
The sylphlike creatures play with stolen bicycles
And the strange shells who like lost children continue
Calling to the haunted sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hazy Architectures Of A Weepy Chariot

If I compare my baby to the truancy of Wonderfully weeded topiaries, I sometimes get Confused with statuaries,
I may go out in the darkness and say nothing, but listen
To the traffic going back and forth like a gown on
The tresses,
Something half wedded underneath the alders, as if pulled
By the moon to gallivanting in very straight lines
Which is never any fun;
And I would have liked to say to her that I once thought her Beautiful; and all of her smoky nights as beautiful as
A lazy blue ocean that I could never own;
And that was why I bought her flowers and she said I could Never know what she was, or what I meant to her.
This was true and now it matters less than the most anonymous
Holiday,
So if I confuse her grottos with those of other women,
Like various species of butterfly dying into the armchairs of the Forest,
What does it matter to me since she has not once seen the beautiful
Landscaping or heard the wonderful choruses
I have tried to put her into like the hazy architectures of A weepy chariot that I naively hoped she might command.

Robert Rorabeck

The He Whom

I want to join you now
Even before we have to eat lunch:
I want to place my hand on the browned opals of your Knee:
I want to kiss and kiss again,
Like the wind upon your flesh; and it doesn't matter if Everyone or no one is looking,
Just as the very mountains rise, and the airplanes take their Passengers and their cargos deep through the Evaporating skies;
As at night, I wonder if you miss me when I am gone,
As the sun comes up and climbs again, up again like a fireman
Surveying his same old world:
Up there he can see your home so close to mine,
Alma;
And just like me he knows that you do not like to read,
And just like me he wonders who it is that you love:
Who is that lucky person,
Alma, as I hold my breath, unyielding my optimisms
That, yes, I am the he whom it is you love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Headstones Of The Classrooms

Bodies who will like children
Need to finally
Rest
Under the lips and breasts of Terribly lovely mothers,
Breath and eyes put into Heavy sacks
Like caterpillars into spider webs;
Like you, I have been here,
Where cops turn to stone
For Medusa in her
Hideous changing room;
When I once thought to Kiss you in the grotto
Down under the musselled
Steps of the aqueduct
Where we skipped school;
But you have never Really gone there,
But I have never truly felt the Need to be with the Posthumous
Shells of such a Vibrant body;
But only to feel the over eagerness of your soul:
To slide into your Senses like a
Virgin refreshing in her
Grotto
While all the less
Fortunate kids are sure
That they are learning something
Far
Less important back in
The perfectly aligned desks,
The headstones of the Classrooms in school.

The Healthy Lips Of A Sub-Ethereal World

I've fed on the breast, like the titted shop where Your children were raised until they awakened into the Water fountains in the hallways of their First world,
And the cars traveled around the world, speaking like zoetropes
To the drunken Indians,
While the airplanes where like a mobile of healthy and brightly
Painted buzzards,
Like cartoons of helium above where the crops blazed:
And your eyes where the stepping stones down into
The forts where my youngest boy lived
And kissed the echinus's open so that the tree frogs could Survive on the pedals of redness;
It was like your body as well, opening up into a wishing well
Where all my wealth was spent
And twinkled down there like gold selkies wavering
In the loose fitting estuaries, striking like candles for the healthy
Lips of a sub-ethereal world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heart

They will make creatures with new playgrounds
Whilst the airplanes still swing and roar into the sky
Until Romero finally returns home from Visiting his brother in Jail in Orlandoâ€that is his Disney world, his Private playgroundâ€and he can have all of us as a joke,
As the smoke lingers in the armpits of the titans,
Until we all wake up yawning like foxes for grapes in
Some new fangled movie theatreâ€
And we will have a hard time expressing our words
Underneath the alabaster doorways,
The armpits of cypress rich with echinopsis and airplanes,
As I wonder, yawning, and drewly-eyedâ€will
My father ever sell fireworks againâ€
Will selkies ever runaway to the sea, as the horses carry Their carts through another picture book that my Mother never had the heart to read to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heart In A Callous Valentine

Inebriations christened two same muses,
One sick and one dying-
On the evening news every mourning,
The sad calm trust I give my inability to live,
To drink socially
To compose to the sun's appropriate attributes,
But never pretending to believe that I am dying,
Just driving around in cars like other supposed
Gentlemen, tremulating
This way and that as I am trying to hide my scars, Populating my amusements well into the Bluer dark of crepuscule,
Where the mailboxes sleep, where the moon is Fanning,
Rippling like a junoesque dancer before the dawn,
Rippling along the mowed park of every Middle lawn,
While its ice-cream man sleeps; and I think of how
I should like to touch you,
Parked out in the middle of the burned hills of California,
North of Hollywood, nestled with serial killers
And the other heirlooms the ancestries of your Burned out love- How maybe you almost touched
Me,
Before you flew away and grew up and learned
How to better feed the tourists
From that lascivious vineyard that goes all the way
Down your mouth
And entangles fat scuppernongs like a chain link
Fence bending down in an over sick garden
Which grunts the muddy beating
Of the heart in a callous valentine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heart Of Me

Ants and sand lions making love:
Her areolas uncapped are sand-dollars too,
The arenas for these little b$asards
Or the custard cages of the abdomens of their Stingingly insouciant zoo:
And they battle on her twin pinknesses;
And they tickle her like two virgins,
Like quarters for pop bottles or ice-cream:
The sun comes up like a truck making a delivery,
And I've shot my mouth off again,
Want to say her name, broken like a starfish under
The Mandela of softly repeating muses,
Shoreline of auburn hair, in a horizon of blondes-
Erin cheers up for reveliere, says I'm shooting blanks, Knocks sweet farts atop her terrapin until
The enemy submarine sinks; and the sea is calmed,
As I am calmed, and housed, baked in a kiln or a
Phalanx of aphrodisiac sunbeams,
Put out on the lawn like a marble faun and made to watch
Over Sharon when she was just young
While Kelly French-kisses me and Diana comes, Forgetful of Jove, her husband lost in the cocaine jungles of Columbia-
She is driving her truck fast through the middle class tributaries
Of my sandbox suburbia;
And she flirts with me while I pick out my deserts;
And now I have named those muses who are dividing like Shell-fish inside of me, like a whip cream army,
Topping the juicy pies, leggy and flashing, four girls
Waving like perfumed flags of piece and justice
Deep in the salt watery atolls which pump through
The heart of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heartfelt Apologies

Words again, little coloring books,
Like the outlines of promises yet
Fulfilled;
The bodies up like lunatics,
Practicing with the pages of their wings,
Trying to recapture the Scarred aphrodisiacs of Lighthouse attendants and
Firemen,
In the fine braveries of a
Single star, or a single tear,
Or the heartfelt apologies of
A greeting card,
For there could never be Anything more sincere.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heartlands Of Saint Augustine

Now I am drunk,
And the real day was real gone
And over,
And it was a real fit
With many enemies,
And many incredulous eyes that faded
From me to more stanching men,
But who am I to care:
I am imperfect, but I am somehow beautiful,
And I will go on forever,
And someone guessed to know this in
High school
While I just want to be the fox warmed off
The chicken feathers of your sweet coup,
And I know your name,
So let me enter through the porticos of your Barbed wires
Before we are both one and the same,
Our common sexes extinguished by that common
Flame:
What I mean to say is that I just want to live
Forever,
Forever, by just saying your name,
So who else do you have to blame if you don't Return the same,
Sweet, sweet girl whose sister lives in the heartlands of Saint Augustine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heartless Reptile

The alligator makes love to
A cloud of the shape of Grecian beauty; an entire pearled
Orchard bilious and queasy
In the heliotropic shadow of the Broken down school bus;
I am the only one who Sees;
Because all the kids are raucous
But well behaved in their Lunch room,
And you are out on the soccer field
With scraped knees-
Tonight they will itch and scab in
Your bedroom,
And when you pick them you'll Stain the sheets;

And when famished, the Cloud slips away,
Beckoned by the raw sun;
And the alligator doesn't say
Anything;
It goes back to the canal,
And I crawl under the bus and smell
The sweat and tears shed in the Purple soot for the heartless reptile.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heaven To Which You Are My Queen

If we walk together again tomorrow, Alma: where will we Go while we hold hands and your two children
Are sleeping,
And your husband or whoever he is to you is out of work,
Like your father, Marcelino:
And I can only imagine what it was like growing up in Guerrero Mexico:
I can only imagine all of the corn fields and the mountains filled
With otherworldly rattlesnakes;
And I cannot even count your gods, and all of this is just my failures
To believe,
But I still kissed the lips this evening of a broken Virgin of Guadalupe:
And I still have felt your fingers like silent birds on my Throat,
And I am in love you: you are the most beautiful woman I have Ever seen, whether or not you have ever taken a plane to Boston
Massachusetts:
I was not going to make fun of you for never being in an airplane:
I just wanted to brag that my mother had once been a pilot:
Or I just wanted something to talk about to keep you on the line,
For while I listen you all of the angels sing,
And life feels good, and the heaven to which you are my queen,
Almost believable.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavenly Trailer Parks Of Their Own Television Shows

We'll hold class again, as the sun goes down,
As the bouquets, again,
Are placed upon her bosom: and this is the world again,
As the horses struggle in the lottery of
My father's deity,
To win again, while the vowels replace themselves
Through the overgrown syllables of my Annunciation.
As when it storms, and the demigods race their chariots,
As the super stations advertise their
Gasoline,
As over all of the oceans, the stewardesses start
Out once again,
Waxy bosoms the lustrous pornographies
Viewing the unseen:
Then I suppose, again, that you can start showing
Your own narcissistic hallucinations:
Like mother goddesses eating their own roe
In the rivers that birthed themselves and their own daughter
From the nuptials just as if the bouquets gifted
To themselves from the heavenly trailer parks of their Own television shows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavens Of Their Make-Believe

Glutinous tabernacle: these are my words
Erin,
Sung to a diseased muse eating popcorn in the bleachers
While underneath her the rattlesnakes
Make love,
And the cheerleaders are counting down their Favorite mountain ranges until
The storm clouds hold up the sky and school is over:
Beautiful boys who don't look beautiful now
Are thumbing for their rides home-
The truants of Socrates or one of his forbearing
Presocratics are already up on some roofs
Smelling the perfumes from the armpits of the housewives-
As the high school is emptied, as the high school is left
Vacant,
After the busses have turned around like butterflies,
And they all fly off to suburban migrations- and my notes
To my missing lovers all get mixed up with different
Seas- as the giants slumber like hibernating grizzlies
Dreaming of a fire the tourists keep from their Windows,
As the paper snowflakes fall down from the heavens
Of their make-believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavens Of Their Neighborhoods

Girls in the high country kicking off fireworks:
They look like beauties,
But they are such jerks: they don't even want
To be housewives,
They don't want to be undone to glisten in Tidal pools-
They seem like a song- they seem as if to coalesce
Anyway:
Doing their jobs and going home- plebian
Sentiment that is never here:
Riding their bicycles, collecting their rears:
And they seem like a psalm of diamonds
And salts-
And they seem to work, sweating in my hand:
They seem like a long day off of work,
Sweating their truancies coalescing in the Unsweetened perfumes of the grasses-
And I watch them from the coal mines of innocuous
Living rooms,
Biting their lips until they draw blood,
Their sisters dancing in the candles, the angel
Airplanes coalescing,
And flying over the heavens of their neighborhoods.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavens Over Lighthouses

Sounds of your memory—what does
It mean, all of those diseases:
Thinking and thinking of Colorado
Where my mother was born outside of Denver—
In just a little slip of a vale—
In a house next to a house built by a blind man—
Against all of those busied echoes up against
The canyons:
Maybe she was in love with her brother when she
Was in her youngest years:
But she graduated high school, got married
And had children—and her husband—her husband
Is my father:
Man from
Michigan—fat as a hummingbird over the used car
Ports and junk yards—while all of the time
Around his neck a beautiful sun weighing him down like
A jewel—
He was too busied to understand,
Or to truly be in love with her: my mother—my mother—
Windmills turn in the heavens—over lighthouses
And libraries—but what is there left to say?

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavens Went Indoors

The grasses were talking even after the Day was gone,
And the airplanes in their dresses dancing
With pearled bellies over the sea:
Did you see which way they were going,
Or notice their laughter as it disappeared?
And I just sat there and thought of
Her,
As the Ferris Wheels went up and then around:
Around, waving their hands
As if they were on an island- after the traffic
Had gone home,
Past the scuppernongs growing on the fences
And the mailboxes
As somewhere far a field a windmill stopped
Dancing for its lover,
And all of the heavens went indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavens Who Cannot Recognize Me

Shallow as the necessary
Habitats of our stock,
I do this like a theme
Given over to a wish
Never arranged,
As the tibouchina tree loses all
Of its purple blooms
In the shade,
As the stewardesses grow
Melancholy touching down
Pilotless,
Embarrassed of amusement,
My song is hollow, secreting
Out from the throat of
A bird whose voice is Never so pretty as to Attract its soul mate,
Who is already in another man's Bed or pie;
So I still sing like the dead up through
The gambits of mystified sky,
To all the heavens who cannot Recognize me as their love child.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heavy Sky

Swallowed you body in echoes across the Train tracks-
Went to school in the morning, across the baseball
Diamonds with pockets empty
And broken teeth:
There wasn't even a rainbow, and in all of the Canals sat the fattest reptiles,
All talking loud and obnoxiously, and smoking,
Smoking: had to look at those eyes,
Out beneath the slender bridges:
Slender as a wire: slender as a hair: had
To tightrope across those spaces- and look down
Into those eyes-
What were the reasons for those cold fires,
As I went to school with no one:
Without anyone, because you had made him
Cry-
As the blinded and dumbled angels tried
To leap up again through the cinders falling
Through the heavy sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Helicopters Of Hallucinations

And then they were soft—soft
And in the movie theatre—all eyes
Of velvet,
Children dissolving, homeopathic—
And the canal and the yards
Under their eyes, looking for a millennium
As the advertisements played their
News,
And boys—and boys better than me,
Like grapes all up and down their rows
Skipped in and out of school—
And the playgrounds melted into the daylight—
And the helicopters became hallucinations
After school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heliotrope And Silvery Moon

Work for me and clean my house
And I'll wake up, gleam in my eye- and pay you,
Just as if you were my spouse:
And we'll take honeymoons and fieldtrips and listen to
The tiny feet of mice and cats patter like
Lovers of baseball in the rain;
And we'll hold each others' hands underneath all of the school
Yards of the moon:
We will not complain- and the resins of hobbies of aircraft
Carriers and dollhouses
Will spill from one to the other as our loins take Turns raising our hands inside a classroom where only
You and I exist: a student a pupil
Inside a red school house or a rodeo,
Over spilling, cantankerously bloomed- the horses out in their Tracks,
And the lovely cars kissing under the heliotrope and silvery
Moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Helpless Yesterdays

There is a tree: underneath a house,
Underneath a cloud—
There is a woman, underneath a house,
Underneath a horse—
And it doesn't feel alright to be Alive—
While the pools glow in the blues of
The moonlight—
And in the safe times of the cul-de-sacs
Seem to rejoice that they have
New joy—
And seeming to keep that fact to Themselves—
Escape to be anywhere:
Escape to be anywhere—
And the sunlight is a suburban altar—
And the moonlight is an abandoned car wash:
And I haven't lived so long as to
Not remember, how the marionettes cut
Themselves from the umbilical cords
Of the state funded racehorses
And their high schools—
And danced forever through the shadows,
Burying their gold absentmindedly beside
The shores—
And crossed themselves—
And seemed to believe in forever—but they were Just superstitious—as all of the night time sat
And waited, riding
The caesuras of waves—waiting for the genies
To unbottle themselves
And give the perfumes of their descanter—
To the aphrodisiacs that could not help but to wander
Into the helpless yesterdays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Heralded Cities

So we had lunch together and then I died
And licked the spilled liquor off the coffee table
I bought for a song,
And even now I am listening to the train, and typing so much
Nearer to the sea that it is always dying in one place,
Like the rape of wildflowers,
Or the saturnine quibbling of really luscious lions;
And I pick up my stance and emasculate myself for you,
Just to show you the skinned knees of Beauty,
Alma:
This is how you do it, without any kings or their vagabonding
Heroes:
This is how my lonely night burns, and this is how I intend to Die for you tomorrow,
Alma,
Rising up like emolliated sugarcane over the ancestors in A graveyard, Alma,
Even while the lions yawn because they are bored by the wrecked
Vestibules of my features,
Alma,
Just as with today, I had to waylay you in your caravan just
To hold you up to show you the fourteen karat jewelry I gotten for
You,
Just for working the weekend for your aunt:
Alma, your eyes are the darkest and yet the brightest memories;
And can't you see now,
Alma- but in the reflections of my ruin maybe you will remember
What I have done for you,
Even while your cars burn away, and you children grow up
Grand and tall,
Like the narrow gage offspring of gods in the rich perfumes of the Orchard outside of the crowded properties of the Heralded cities.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hibernial Sky

Build up your stores by the dozens,
Oh my French cousins:
Put your shoes in the racks and the ovens,
Build your stores by the dozens,
While the weather is wolfing in,
Singing its song along the swish tailed mountain,
And the locusts are buried like sad jewels,
Like spirited cadavers wherever they lie,
The plagues peppering the earth under sky;
And put your husband in
And say goodbye, the soul's shoe store is under
Your lock and key,
And touch your hands down along the familiar
Tarmac, and think of me,
With the wind wolfing in, forcing the arcade of Bees under flower,
Quivering the roots, and you such a flower in a place
Of jasmine windows,
In a place of immaculate windows, where dreams start
Laying out under the pattering of milk clouds;
And lay your daughter down and say goodbye,
For you will make a thousand dreams you will have
To sell like sending ships away to kill for gold
While the swish tailed mountain lives forever,
Swishing its midway's flumes, each stone seeming to speak
Gossiping when you don't wake up;
But those are really just the things you cannot hope to See,
And your shoes hang and bake behind the pure glass
Exhibits, but they never fit me,
But speak in the tongues of gibbets, as the wolf with very Young eyes touches down his tongue to your tarmac
And you seem to swing and sigh
Underneath the swish tailed mountain underneath
The hibernial sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hidden Places Of The Other Words

Okay, I'm finally eighteen and I've seen Alma's eyes
Against the unregistered classes of the big trucks,
While the alligators wept and cleaned their wounds:
Then the might tortoises drank their glasses
While other girls I knew were looking for new jobs:
As she's finally laid down with her brown man now,
The father of two children-
And how many times she has loved him, she can count
On both hands,
But she doesn't need anymore machine that her body
Beautified by gold:
And when she looks into the mirror of her truck on the Way to work,
At least she can be satisfied that it is paid for:
And she has done so well for being in the States for only
Seven years,
And she knows this sprawling city better than me,
Except for in the white suburban pools where I spent
The folklores of my truancy,
But even those are deluded now- while her birthday was Last May, which was some other holiday in which I watched
Her blow out the candles on the cake
And make wishes for the hidden places of the other words
I could never breathe upon much less understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hidden Yards

A womb of a pledge of allegiance no one
Stands for—
In a sky full of ancestral promises without a single Drop of rain
Over a schoolyard just as empty of busses as
It is of children—
And I lie in the fever of the gutters of broken
Promises—married,
But my wife is not my muse: she is something
Forever more sincere,
Certainly I do not deserve her—
As I drink liquor and remember a clothes line Stretched across the hidden yards where
You told me your mother's rabbits disappeared.

Robert Rorabeck

The High Schools Of A Fertile Yesterday

The bodies turn for age old champions,
And we had lunch together and then you laughed and went away:
I wonder if in the sweet soft song lights of your parents,
If your dumb husband ever goes down on you
Like a fairytale princes into a mine of goblins: I wonder if they've ever Taught him how to love and pleasure a woman,
How to be a very custard gunfighter,
While everything I have been doing is wrong, listening to the obnoxious
Math of airplanes,
Underneath the pinwheels of their leapfrogging gears,
And listening to their captains:
Alma,
I have told you I loved you and bought you lunch for this shortest time
That I have known you,
But I want to skip right across the courtship like a really alabaster stone
As young and flat as the throat of a fearless and prepubescent
Melody,
And christen you with my German name, and hang savage decorations upon
You with my tongue in our bedroom,
And sweat it all out, and show you all of the capitals of my states,
And test you, and put my tongue like a welcome stranger
Into your ovens of transoms, and Perfect my art like the symbols of our gods over your body;
And make you laugh,
And turn you younger and younger just as the newly fastened cars
Are returning all of the bright young offspring to the High schools of a fertile yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Higher Earth

The meadow cannot recall the men who have Walked in between her belled stalks,
But she knows that they have seen her in Those seasons when she is most depressed;
When the leaves of her hem shake from timorous breath,
When her petals reawaken in the morning's lilac,
And the cricks flow like tassels over the smoothed
Stone upon her throat,
And the boot prints they leave upon her as they Moved into work the deeper wilderness
She never proceeds towards, but bathes there as her Shoulders yawn the higher cliffs where
Elk graze inoffensively, and foxes nuzzle the dimpled tows,
Her smile a kind of lazy nod, the flowers her blush,
The bees sip the pollen of her perfumes;
She pauses for the day upon the yellow slope,
As the men yell indistinguishable epitaphs
High up in the pine trees quaking like a ship
Far down below from where she gazes steadily
The daylight bright upon the higher earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Highest Of Playgrounds

Now while my shoulders were at play,
Bending towards gay children and dolls united—
While the fox and the p&ssy cat were sniffing
Towards golden coins planted in the sands,
Sure to grow into beach heads—
I thought up this breach in the séances—
Even whilst the stewardesses were attending their Head rooms,
And the lonely bicycles had a drink and laughed
With the obnoxious alligators—
And the storm had to twiddle its thumbs,
Wondering why all of the upturning boys had
To sound like this,
With the rainbows choking the necks of Suicides—
And the younger countries try to curl up around
The feet of the coyer and brighter boys:
There it was, this strange belief forever,
Fitted to the fingers while the heart was still beating—
Another word for the millstone
While all of the daydreams enjoyed the hearts
That were still beating,
And my parents' old windows still looked out into
The heavenly light, just so the obnoxious ghosts
And my scarred aunt could see that all of the highest
Of playgrounds were still bleeding.

Robert Rorabeck

The Highest Swing-Sets

The highest swing-sets taken down
Over the ghosts of Where I once parked my truck—
That adolescence of Cherry-bombs is over—
I have myself a wife and unborn son—
But I still swing the glass of words
About here,
Listening to the traffic on its somnambulatory
Quests—
After midnight and the end of Metamorphosis—
When even the dogs sleep,
And Eve lays down with the strawberry eating
Tigers—
Her basket empty of the illusive stars,
But her dreams filled by so many Promises.

Robert Rorabeck

The Highschool Of A Baseball Game

Repeating in the lions of the gaseous promises:
They sometime get lit up, and have their song- like girls
With lips in sleds,
They go over their boreal beds, and know when they Are going to get home:
And their fathers waiting for them there, cuneiform ed into
The darkness,
That once possessed the sentinels of the forest with animals
Inside their stores who never feared of Being bitten by serpents: the luscious syrups of Forked knowledge,
Key words in bright Merry Go Rounds- compounded
Pleasures of soft hills, reciprocations of green inns and blue
Fires,
Garlanded with the scarred cheeks of chicken wire;
And when once they were home, they took off all they knew
And climbed nakedly up the stairs and basked hung over
The mezzanine of truancy's preposterous allocations,
Who pretended to give to their opened thoughts the luscious
Cornucopia of cicadas to lavished songbirds;
Thus in the husks of degraded roe, they seemed to lavish,
Basking their like graveyards for werewolves:
And thus the heavens kept them pearled through the closing times
Of dusk;
And amnesia ed by the sun, they stroked again, pearled and out
Early as if for the high school of a baseball game.

Robert Rorabeck

The Highway By Which I Will Never Die

If you sleep. I will too- I will lay my hazardous Body across your brown cartography: you know that when I was Little my grandmother used to tell me that we Were related to some people who made globes,
And there is a city in Arizona named Kingman, but f- her;
Alma.
I can still smell your body's perfume, and the way I lounged about
It early this morning,
And the way I so hungrily wished for it even just this afternoon:
And there are sharks in the sea who never feel but Always move;
And there are hot air balloons above the glaciers in Alaska
Of a different fabric,
But you are still within walking distance, and now I love you;
And you are all that I move for, even if I can never really move:
And this is how a body feels making strides towards
Its immortal tomb;
And I love you now, and this is just how my skeleton mouths
Off to its delicious wine cremated in the sky;
And you are just the secret passageway of my immortality:
Alma: Alma,
You are just the highway by which I will never die.

Robert Rorabeck

The Highway Of A Football Player's Boredom

In the retinue of
The carrion and paper airplanes
Contrived-
Careening forwards through the Madness of Dishonor-
The waves like the Zygotes of misinformed poltergeists;
Until irretrievably other
Avenues
With friends and
Lights
Offering sweet fruits buttered with meats
At the doorsteps of
The wildfires of unresolved holidays-
Already smothered underfoot,
And carefully dishonored,
Blinded-
The diamonds of a unrequited
Nest,
Pilfered to the aeries of Amnesiac stewardesses;
And in this way misplaced forever
Into the firmament of Simulacrum and marionettes
Holding their breath futilely as she drives away
Without a second look down the highway
Of a football player's boredom.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hill For The Travelers Passing By

Watching birds outside of lunch flying like snowflakes
Of sunlight whispering for other planets
Until the night is cooled into metamorphosis—
And the moon comes and shines
And shines—its stolen lights over the shadows
Walking their dogs—
As time is telling tricks to the echoes of Neanderthals—
Back in their classrooms, teachers aghast with Plagiarism,
But in the morning over the deserts of New Mexico—
The sky as bright as gypsum with hot air balloons
And hapless voyagers who can see all of the way
Into Mexico where the strange sisters lie
Singing as they are taking the corn down—
And the Virgin of Guadalupe shines like a lighthouse upon
The hill for the travelers passing by.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hillside of Stars

Scars on the archipelagos outside of schools—
And inside, the band looks beautiful as it
Plays along the grass,
Following the borders of the contours of the School until they fall in love with the boys
Vanished off the architectures of the baseball
Diamonds—and are resurrected in new
Fonts for a while underneath the bleachers—
The meretriciously sad places that
The stricter teachers have never dreamed of,
Where one or two students have planted their Shark-ravaged feet over the Epitaphs of only a handful of arrowheads—
And for a moment, this is their world now—
Striking upwards like a match on a holiday,
Beautiful though mentally handicapped and Trying to cheat death out of his last dinner—
A tortoise stares at it all
As the hillsides of stars fall down around him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hollow Secret Places

Cold up in Colorado and beginning to be overrun
With thoughtless spirits,
While above the tree-lines the footsteps of iconoclasts
Only prove that they are alone,
And winter will be coming all too soon;
But they still with their ethereal butterfly nets wish to Catch the industrial bellies of the airplanes
Moving their cargos of
The planes of solid bones: they go leaping like princesses
Over the beds of the continental divide;
And they see all of the hollow secret places, that I have
As well so wished to find.

Robert Rorabeck

The Holy Ghost

Weather of green stars
And Christmas suicide:
The traffic goes by so balmy,
We work hard and
Then drink Gatorade:
And I want some friends, and some monuments
Configured sparsely over the immaculately
Mowed esplanade:
And I want a true love to sit with me on twin Thrones,
And I don't want to have to be a jealous god:
I don't want to have to kill too many red shirts
Beaming down from rotating spaceships:
I want to get lazy and melt like
Clocks from these trees:
I want to be allowed to cry over your beauty,
And not be obligated to watch football,
Because you are my favorite team:
See me rippling in the porcelain underneath your Sweet ass, like a dimpled orchard
I want to smack both of your hemispheres and see
If you wont dropp fruit:
I just want to lay your limbed orchard across
The bed springs and bras knobs
In some high basin too expensive for my Father to buy
And F- the holy ghost out of you....

Robert Rorabeck

The Holy Numbers

Hypothesize that ants cry
Just like the insignificance I weep for you;
It is a silly thing, scarred,
Rupturing from the ground to bring back food
For a queen who doesn't care:
That I have moved perpetually under the sun since
The day we came together insouciantly in a
Forlorn class,
That I have cultivated all of my songs for you,
While you kissed and manhandled the soldiers
Of your kindled field,
And now spread out we like to say that we are
In better homes,
That the days proceed kindly with outstretched and Untouchable skies,
But I don't know why I do this,
When you never were my real monarchy:
I just liked the way you looked dancing like an Indian along your way to better classes,
And I am all alone, something heliotrope outfitted
In a rainstorm- all of these legs getting me nowhere,
Castaway from the days when you were more inclined
To show off to my wide open senses the angles of Your great body:
Now its as if you're suckling the wolf pups off your rolling
Vineyards,
And this is just the junkyard temple I raise underneath
The boot hills of spending fireworks,
Outside the holy numbers of the Catholic church,
Hoping to draw in your attention as I imagined
That I had once done before.

Robert Rorabeck

The Homeless Trees

Peeling- peeling the rind of an orange
In the eyesight of a turtle stretched out under a buss Underneath a mountain where the sky is Falling- I told her wouldn't it be okay
If there were windmills
Against our armpits at the rest stop, but I did not Wait for her: her hair was blonde and falling
Through the living room,
But it was not right to second guess her,
Even if she would not help to decorate the Christmas tree: my college days were gone-
All of the firemen had escaped holding up their Ladders to the trees- and I could not figure out
The positions of all of the graveyards underneath
The stars: they were a new heavens anyways:
They'd just moved in and were still figuring
Out their way around-
As the motionless snakes slept underneath the dresses
Of the homeless trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Honeydew Of The Moon

Virgins cut from the paper of paper airplanes:
Sleeping there like motherless goddesses across the Impolite street- holding the rude and vulgar
Prisms of light-
Like kaleidoscopes up to their chests: kissing families
Of grizzly bears and eating their Porridge in turn,
And then making their way across the canal:
While underneath their phosphorous skirts
The blue gills live like pilgrims
Carrying their make believe prayers across the Fiascos of stolen bicycles:
And if I was just a little boy still, I would hold inside
Me some way of remembering,
And I would still have hope of making it through
The forest and to a home somewhere between the cypress
Drooling the lost yesterdays of katydids and spent
Bottle rockets to a mother who still held a light for me,
And to a father who kept lookout,
Sleeping like a sailor on the roof and, openmouthed,
Feeding off the honeydew of the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hopes Of Forget-Me-Knots

Prolific as the centipede underneath the castles:
Hero nobody thought of,
No princess loved, with so many legs: dreaming of Sea horses as giant lovers
He's heard of but can't say he's seen:
Spilling from leaf to leaf over the penny-ante quest:
Can't say he has a heart to know about love,
But too sick to be eaten by starving birds:
He'll be a horse for himself and ride over the blue bells and Buttercups.
The hummingbirds will whisper great disillusion about
This,
As he trundles with the legs of a crowd—by himself,
The eels, like dark amputees in the mud puddles,
Tie the ribbons into knots,
And the leaches kiss the shins of bystanders—trying to Make sacrifices of the sinless pilgrims who loiter
There—flat areolas twisting like shellfish in a pretentious
Rain,
Travelling with the hopes of forget-me-nots.

Robert Rorabeck

The Horrid Mountain

Poem of empty ballrooms- this is your star
Made for witches tearing- it is their airy folklore
That makes the dew, that puts the rabbits
To sleep while the girls are unremarkable until They are diminishing- and then they are Put into zoos, or sold at flea markets: they are made
To stand very still and given porcelain babies
Beneath them- and then they are the virgins,
Or weeping in pieta in a doll house's carport or
At some hotel- and the lions are their dolls
That the tourists enjoy driving around, like Indians
And their teepees, and their fires made out of Orange aluminums-
And I pick them up like some god awful monster
Made from the sea, and I hold them to my breast
And tell them I love them, as they bend like Wildflowers taken too far up the horrid mountain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Horses Back In The Valley

I do not wish to see the horses back in the valley-
Or the nights filled with bedrooms in which you lay with the Lupines and the rubrum,
Poisonous and as deadly as a naked book banned in that Season of schoolyard or graveyard,
A dragonfly trapped in the caesuras of your areola
Losing the colors of its species as it tries
To escape the colors you've been making up with your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hosing Trumpets Of Heavy Weight Elephants

The bodies granulate in pistils and games while
The butterflies make love to the rainbows,
And I don't want cable television because I will always be Too busy making love with Alma;
Now envision the photosynthetic train of our children and our Grandchildren,
Alma- imagine your body's most divine brownness spread over
The breathing hedgerows of our penultimate bed:
Because even though I am unappreciated by modern society,
Alma:
I still have been published- I am smarter and more prolific than most English Doctorates, even though all I sell is produce,
And my soul of love for you, Alma:
It is like a wishing well with a golden mouth that is always thirsty
And always spuming its thoughts for you,
Even though it drank of your divine clefts through multiple Orgasms,
All you said was it could only be that once, but I want to love you
Again and again.
Even though you don't like to read about these homespun cathedrals
I keep churning for you like ice-cream and the rich parapets
Of cotton candy higher and higher until they become the Horns of unicorns and the hosing trumpets of Heavy weight elephants.

Robert Rorabeck

The House And Her Carpenter

Her mind flutters there in those Secret rafters just above her eyes—
The roof leaks when she cries,
But seldom does, for her man is
A carpenter, a good one, and goes
About fixing her using just his Hands and tongue, so the windows
Of her eyes fill up on him, and
Her halls swell with the handcrafted
Furnishings he places there
As he turns on that warm light inside
Her— a glowing feline soul whose Purrs echo up from the basement
As the warm laundry churns in
The places he reaches for her along
The pinked ridgelines of her abdomen
He works in significant ways inside
Her, mending, staying there and turning her Name into a prayer he says over and Over as he takes hungry bites
Of the pie she serves him,
The kitchen table her lips and tongue,
Both of them fondling upon a grassy foundation
She rolling about on the quarter acre bed
Crying his name.

Robert Rorabeck

The House At The End Of The Lane

I am imperfect
And its starting to rain.

I live at the house
At the end of the lane.

Where no one's too nice,
And no one's too mean.

Kiss me, take my hand,
And see what I mean.

I'll give children,
And I hyphenated last name,

A nice little yard and Someone to blame.

I am imperfect,
Just a little odd man,

Balding and scarred and
White as the sand,

But if you kiss me, and take my hand,
You'll see what I mean.

I'll give you the kitchen
And something to clean.

You'll be my wife, neither
Too nice or too mean.

And by two or three children
We'll seal the whole thing.

We are imperfect and its Starting to rain.

We live at the house
At the end of the lane.

Robert Rorabeck

The Housecat's Grin

When it rains, stay in the library and read of arks,
And nod your head, and pretend to study while you drift,
Your drool leaving a watermark on page six,
Like a mollusk was there and then ran down your elbow
And off the world, just beginning

Though outside the little park is in a recession,
But the children still swing, like bigots or pugilists,
Over the hills of pumpkins, before the getting chill,
And even as you go out to them, they begin to fade,
They begin to crumple and return to the depression residences,
Like cells of encumbered thoraxes, so many anonymous
Behind the windows from where you stand,

And sparrows which no longer sing, or choose to migrate,
May eat a worm when the sun comes out, may fly above her house
Though they never watch her undress all lonely some evening,
For that is because she's not lived here for a decade,
Where little wings of songs disappear inside the housecat's grin,

Before I've come down again strolling beneath the embers
And palms, trying to catch a glance at her through the drying wishes,
The sidewalk encumbering cracks where red ants plume;
Even after the sky has evaporated its sadness, and blushes a leaping prism,
The said choreography of the divine,

I've followed it past her where she is kissing like a stone
On a hidden bench, perpetually motivating the stillness of nightfall;
It only ends in the dead fire-pits, the broken heaps,
Where mosquitoes queue to the ululations of homeless reptiles,
Those who bask ironically in the defeated promises of his love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Houses Of My Sea

Now in the broom closets of her extended
Home,
And deep in love with un hombre se llama Mexico:
How at first they kiss,
And then they peel, while Heidi lies sated looks Like a two year old shadow in the Darkness,
All of the words budding inside her jaws and running
Around the Merry Go Round fields
Where she was Christened and grew:
And they make love silently, the embarkations of
A brown ship in a nearly breathless sea,
The moon a cul-de-sac round with the haunts
Of preternatural reindeer;
And she is not looking so sad, his eyes are reigning down
Full of a smoking world that burns through the memories
Which way they crossed
The landscapes of humid fronteras, and how he even came Back for her after the bruises of honeymoons,
And there isn't a thing that she could forget-
A one winged Alma,
And she pants up to him, a fluming tigress, who remembers
Me as well,
And wants to swim in the houses of my sea all the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Housewives And Their Canals

The houses in make-believe rows, even if they run away
Do not get too far from here:
They are stopped by another road or a canal- the latchkey
Children cry mucus down their pale bone
Steps,
And the dogs kill the rabbits on Easter or on Domingo de Pascua- the housewives try to run away
To see the resurrections:
Then the airplanes guide them like stars: first over one
Canal, and then across the other,
While the conquistadors who were once young men
Lay up to their feebled chins in the dunes
Grown over with aloe and spikenard:
And the day chimneys, the birds in her all a rile-
But the housewives go down on all four legs, leaping into another
World, changing dresses and their last names;
The houses of their abandoned families hunting them
While the blue gills in the canals look up their skirts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hummingbirds

Another motor at the ribs not filling
Up,
Coiling in the cessation of the gullies
And the trampolines:
This is a cul-de-sac anyways:
And while I am here, is anyone
Selling ice-cream:
Oh well, I have been up and down her melting,
While selling ice-cream.
And her children have come,
Like crazy fireworks,
Buy two get one free, and eaten from the strange
Reservoir of my hand:
Or they have gotten up again only to lie
Down and enjoy the shade immediately,
I guess,
Of their most immediate place in the
Hemisphere,
The waves leaping over what we have made,
In the business
Of the children who lay here, freckled,
Like tombstones in the shade,
Underneath all of the trees who go weeping,
But joyfully, as if they were introduced
Into parks,
As the ant-lions promenade- what homes of Adobe exist anymore, and what do I have left to Go back home to,
As she lies nude and with him, relaxing with
The shade, as the waves leap and drown hungrily
Against her-
As the hummingbirds drink sangria-
And she remains the tattoo that I wish that I had.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hundred Proof Blueness

When we come again I will have learned to Groom myself:
I will either be another crocodile, tearless,
With the hands of dissembling pirates in my lips;
Or your lion,
Singing Broadway even though I have never Seen New York;
Though I do not know all the names of your children,
I imagine where you walk far outside on Shell rock,
The airplanes still some kind of illusion,
Though you should be serving drinks high upon them,
Leaping like cowboys taming bulls:
All the fools you loved while I was busy making out with Spain;
And this is just a commentary diligent into the unintelligible
Reasons of the feral rain;
And your children they are like orange blossoms:
Peter Pan comes and visits them from the open lips of Your double wide,
And they sail straight up to the first star of morning;
While you winnow your arms, yawning and step outside,
Masturbate like a fiddle over my lines:
Drool in sweet piddles into the earth, probably atop the sweet
Shell of an insouciant tortoise;
And I am not to blame, that I love you and I wish for you
The same:
Your body hiding the secret pearls of every girl:
But you are the one and only, a constellation with her ears
Pierced curing on Sundays into the fat bottomed doors of Any Church;
And I know your name, but not how you stamp or color yourself:
Your toes have remained the same color since Christmas,
But you aren't troubled that your boys haven't come down:
They are having too much fun,
In that fat, fat cloud that can only be perceived dredging the Hundred proof blueness above your one and only town.

The Hunger Of Songbirds

Embossed with these parapets of Swing-sets,
Perpetually, so nothing ever has to go down,
But these songs:
They rest like cut satin in a mess
While the skull is smiling through the Keystone
Where I suppose you've seen her
Smiling again,
And bearing her children- stepping
Above the downed power lines
That whisper to the streets where the housewives
Roam-
But she glides above them, her metamorphosis
Evaporating
Until her legs are gone- the foxes leap in her
Twilight as if they were her men:
Until she is gone with the hunger of songbirds-
And nothing is ever spoken of her again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hungry Ants

Spindles of golden hooks happening in the bows of the Treeless hills,
Or the voids that can never be cleaved; and if it rains
From her eyes, at least it is miles away,
On a fieldtrip to a roller rink that isn't even alive anymore:
Maybe you loved her,
Maybe she killed you, or it was just an amusement to give
The children behind your eyes:
They are always waiting to be delighted, as the brown bodies
Move before the sea,
As if it was our wedding day, Alma; and you cannot swim,
But I want to take you to the sea and her hidden places
Tomorrow,
For you are a proper goddess, and a proper goddess needs the Best sort of grottos,
And maybe we will dip into one another while the airplanes
Sing like arrows into the wounds that we can never Avoid,
As the night becomes spent and lost, like a firework out in The open field abandoned by Indians,
Like the child done with its weeping, motionless and blue,
Welcoming in the hungry ants.

Robert Rorabeck

The Husband's Fateful Verse

For better or for worse
He is married to a purse

Who drives a four-door hearse,
Shopping amongst the graves

And when he gets home
Sad and lonely,
She'll start on him bemoaning,
Under roof
And over floorboard
With her nails freshly manicured:

"Oh, honey, you adore me
With all you have made all for me,
You've turned me into a proper whore;
But dare I ask it?
Yes. I'll ask it:
More, More, More! "

She tasked him, belly, breasts and buttons
All pressing to the floor.

Robert Rorabeck

The Husk Of A Forget-Me-Knot

If you fall asleep underneath the Drowsing banyans,
I will find you there eventually,
Even if you don't think to wait up
For me,
Even if you bare your children by another
Man
Under the blustering rattle where you will Surely grow
Your belly like your vacuum in your Sweet scarless living room,
Listening to everything I never said:
Even the chandeliers will be without dust,
Looking like your birthstone-
Don't you remember that we were literally born on
The same day,
So how could you do this to me,
To leave my shady wildlife preserve, even if
It was second class,
And I am a feral man wandering drunkenly through Torn but gifted trailer parks,
And you have fallen asleep and while I have looked
For you,
They have bulldozed all the beautiful arenas of clouds,
And shaken all the unabashed sins from out of the tree,
And cut her down and mowed,
And used her to build your house,
So even if I come together again, and reanimate,
What use would it be to find that picturesque spot
Where we once had love,
If there is none of it left to find, but for the barren stain,
The husk of a forget-me-not.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hypnotisms That The Chickens Made

Glad as the cowbells that sparkle into rust
Over an epiphany of Mexico,
Like airplanes looking in at the best of us
Down in the low grounds of the playgrounds that half Abused us while we were skipping school and Trying to run away- growing our beards
Into the sea- nests for the birds to come and swim,
Little murals in our eyes that made our Neighbors and our peers jealous- why then all of The ruby lights took off for a holiday,
And vanquished through the corridors the knights
Parade:
Into the glades of witches as rich as vermilion marmalade
And there, careening over the kidnapped walls
The long necks of windmills
Scattering the dressing rooms of a sultry orchard's
Blooms across the rickety ghosts who themselves go
Fluttering like overused weathervanes
And banshee bridesmaids make an eerie patina across
The saturated guts of the pythons bending down
The playground's bows as they digest the hypnotisms
That the chickens made.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hypnotizing Mobile

And then we slept together-
These waves, continuing in the student
Parking lot:
She slipped out of her bra:
Jelly-fish, I supposed she was something
Beautiful underneath the moon
Even though it was in the middle of
The day:
And I was missing math class,
But I figured her out, or
I didn't,
As the sun presupposed over all of
The housewives sunning themselves in their
Yards,
As the otters sang from underneath the Easement- sang so many songs-
But kept their love to their
Breasts,
As the conquistadors continued to slip
Away beneath them,
Resting there, underneath the alligators
Who took the place of airplanes- in
The hypnotizing mobile
That happened to dance without having to go Anywhere.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hypothesis Of A Windchime On A Battleship Sunk In The War

The door is still open,
But I will never believe in god with so
Many maidens half naked in the wood,
And glad about it-
I am not afraid to die and be forgotten under
The evil flowers-
I do not deceive myself these feeble words
Will at all matter,
The little flaunts like tinfoil decorating the eyes
Of an angelic reptile;
To the spoon-fed muse I give my time,
But she would never think of leaving her husband-
She's not even sure if I exist anymore,
The hypothesis of a wind chime on a battleship
Sunk in the war-
Alone in the park with the houses turned off,
I put my dimes in trees,
And crawl up a ways, frightened but insouciant:
I'll come down when I'm hungry and wise,
Steal into the bedrooms nobody cares about,
Taking the Eucharist into my mouth, and when it is Time to go to the cemetery,
I will ride my bicycle there and flatulate all the way,
To the amusement of tribes too young to distain;
I will insist to lie down myself-
Naked in the cemetery except for my words
To her, to smell her grubby
Perfume, to deceive myself yet hungry for truer definition
Even as I close my eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Hypothetical Cathedrals Of Her Living Room

Alone in the grotto where everything that was Pretty burned down:
Alma back from work, and industrious in her own house:
That I can only get close enough to when drunk,
To spill myself off the bicycle like Cardinal groceries, to crawl on my belly and believe in Helicopters up on her roof,
While she is as if in the warmth of a hearth, cooling,
Skin like the glass of the earth:
Perhaps she spins her tiny girth, and calls up to me without Even knowing,
Tangles and tugs on the soul's strings who have caught me,
And who are pulling:
And I am not even a real boy: I have been persuaded by the cat
And the fox to bury all of my wealth on the beach:
And now it is gone,
As the ribbons are gone from her hair, as the flowers I bought
Her are dying in the hypothetical cathedrals of her living room.

Robert Rorabeck

The Iceberg That Sunk The Titanic

I drink gin and read forgotten
Or never read poems:
Soon I will be delivering trees well past the Threshold of gated communities;
And I remember the little Jewish boy who told Me my forehead was too big,
Like a glacial slab, like the wrecked Titanic full of
The cenotaph of forgotten racehorses,
And so I began to look surprised at everything,
And I wore a rubber band in my hair to straighten
The cursive furrows in my forehead which Finally got there;
And S- laughed at me, and asked me what
Was so wrong,
And she laughed at me even today and asked me
What was wrong,
Even after I told her she was my muse,
Even after I told her she was my muse;
And I am drunk on gin,
And I really want my dogs;
And I really want my dogs, the only two things that
Have ever been good to me,
And it's such a thing that they don't live for very long;
And I've never met another genius,
Even though I've read them, and seen the naked
Women they've painted into bowls of jello in art museums,
And soon the waves will be coming,
And the green sea will be absolutely perfect beneath the blue
Sky,
Utterly beautiful: everything I cannot be,
But I will get up and go to work tomorrow until I kill Myself,
Or until I decide it's time to own my own house;
And I really want my own dogs,
And S- is up in Colorado just west of Interstate 25,
I think,
But I don't think she's climbed any of my grander mountains:
She just sells the wine I farm;
And her eyes are utterly beautiful, and she is beautiful anyways,

Just like my forehead before I scarred it
From the remarks of the little Jewish boy,
The iceberg
That sunk the Titanic.

Robert Rorabeck

The Id's Ego

Captivated by another world,
I lead this body around. He Never quite knows where he is going,
Or where he might be found.
Hither and dither often bucolically,
Or some times all the way to town,
And I ride him just as you would a fiberglass
Pony on the candy-striped pole of a merry-go-around.

He is not quite as burnished as the waves,
But they no longer roll the same as they did back in The day, and when around women he sometimes gets Stuck and begins to stutter like an old ignition in
A beat-up truck;
But I rarely bother, for I can move him quite Ostentatiously; I can make him jump, and swim inside him
Like a fish, I can bend his elbow;
I can bite his lip,
And stand him in front of a class, raise his hand in
A pedantic pose, I can relay a sententious phrase,
And sit him back down while everyone else strays.

Or I can lie him down when his body tends to nod;
And let him rest while I dreamily jaunt over the seas of 12 point font; or if I lay and read for days,
I could put him into a thick malaise;
But for as long as he is breathing, I choose to stay somewhere
In back of where he is grieving;
But when the makers should box him back up,
Say he is broken and no longer works; then I will stand
Straight up and swan-dive right out of this jerk;
For I am no simpleton nor am I a Turk,
And though I may linger above him until the sunlight reposes,
I won't shed a tear, nor smell the bouquet of roses.
I wont read the epitaph, I wont say a thing,
I wont feel the wind or the rain,
But will go down from that hill as easily as I should,
And seek out another fine fellow, and slip under his hood;
And ride with him for a while as he goes,

And take off his shoes,
And pick his nose,
And lay him down and read for awhile,
Or watch the sunset, and make him smile.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ignorance Of Her Open Wounds

Playing the game that winks to the land as my House lays as quiet as a yellow tomb:
Like a daisy above tree line trying inhale the sun as the hikers
Pass underneath the wildfires of burning clouds;
And the regaled stags underneath the yawning circumferences of
The moon;
But it never fails to be this way- as the arcades sing like toads,
Slipping their mud pies underneath her lips to cool on
The windowsills of her eyes;
While the preternatural aspects of her carriages swing and sway
Like feral children who have made love to wolves in
The graveyard only to have gotten up again,
Supplanting the love shacks of fried chicken:
And going to where the bottle rockets have finally landed
Up against the dead Indians
Nuzzled by the well kept dogs: and there, once again, crying and Laughing- and cursing themselves as they drink the commodities
Of free liquors that come by the open highways
That openly and freely express themselves to the ignorance of her
Open wounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Illusions Built Up In The Sky

Hold outs for a while who forget their sleep—
They seem to be holding on,
Pageants over the most beautiful abysses of
The most abysmal canyons: you cannot see them,
But they are down there—archeologists—
The dogs digging through a kaleidoscope of Unhoused smells—words in a vision of Others senses—while, in the high basins
Where the ghost towns yet haunt,
There are serving up their smorgasbords
Jubilee to no one—by whatever means
He gets there, as the graveyards turn into Golf courses so far beneath them—
And presidents and lucky men
Seem to take their turns in the illusions built
Up in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Illusions Of Its Joy

I love you more than my cousin of silent thought—
As the blue cat, enamored of Indian headdress, sated by Porcupines and the first European explorers to this Region,
Stares from the perch of her dunes
To the silent fumbling of the chaos in the architectures
Of the sea—of a beauty I have never seen before—
And the cenotaph in the waters,
Granite cross, way post for the men who will have
To eat their horses and make rafts out of their ribcages-
Before the Castillo de San Marcos—
The first retirement city coughed a cannon ball across
The bay—and there was any other fantasy we could believe
In—Disney World and the diseases of gated communities—
Before my tiny nostrils first flared—or I walked the streets
Smelling the night blooming jasmine with a woman
Who was not meant to stay with me—
There was this void in a feral heart—
Already some of the heavens had already died—
And your eyes had not yet awakened to your mother,
But the cat on those blue hills sang silently in those cul-de-sacs
That spread up the length of the peninsula with the illusions of its Joy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Illusions Of Our Tomorrows

I want to cry into your pussy—
I want the sun to set—
I want the day to end
Tomorrow—I want to
Be the conclusion
To you last bet—I don't want to Wake up to this every again,
I want tomorrow to Disappear—
I want to f-ck you in France,
I want us to have our own cheering
Section on our airplane
As we get there,
And the seats get wet—
And the hemispheres of wherever we
Were to disappear—
And this is my last laugh to nowhere—
Even if the rainbow doesn't pretend—
I am not interested in god's promises—
I only hope that the illusions of our Tomorrows never have to end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Imagination

I once sold fireworks to a cloud
And to the wings of a jet plane
That we were trying to settle together:
Inside the desert didn't belong to us:
We were just trying to make some money
As we put our first born sons to sleep,
And I don't suppose any of you are still
Listening to this now,
Since where I've been sleeping and where
I've put myself once or twice,
Across the smiling lips of the cadavers
And across the towns and the cities that the Bees pollinate without waiting for the
Cows to come home—
Those bovine homonyms have their
Own Disney Worlds,
And the mermaids that get paid to entertain them
Cut and cross their legs—
And then there are the airplanes again—
Up above the sky—
The sicknesses come inside the cut and colorful
Forms of unicorns—
All of the imaginary creatures gathered together
In an unruly crowd—
I so wish that they could imagine the imagination
To control themselves
Before I was put one last time underground.

Robert Rorabeck

The Imagination To Control Themselves

I once sold fireworks to a cloud
And to the wings of a jet plane
That we were trying to settle together:
Inside the desert didn't belong to us:
We were just trying to make some money
As we put our first born sons to sleep,
And I don't suppose any of you are still
Listening to this now,
Since where I've been sleeping and where
I've put myself once or twice,
Across the smiling lips of the cadavers
And across the towns and the cities that the Bees pollinate without waiting for the
Cows to come home—
Those bovine homonyms have their Own Disney Worlds,
And the mermaids that get paid to entertain them
Cut and cross their legs—
And then there are the airplanes again—
Up above the sky—
The sicknesses come inside the cut and colorful
Forms of unicorns—
All of the imaginary creatures gathered together
In an unruly crowd—
I so wish that they could imagine the imagination
To control themselves
Before I was put one last time underground.

Robert Rorabeck

The Immense Beds Of Her Night

As a tomb of white innocents,
Sunlight washing it like a car—making nude the Pale baby's breath sprinkled there
Beneath the bulbous pornography of Roses—They linger for a few dollars
And then the sun eats them,
As it eats us,
Kissing us around the ears, forked-tongued
As if we were objects in its lustful shops:
Lion tamer making the grass grow,
As the moon pulls up the waves,
Wanting something to cover herself
For a little warmth in the immense beds of Her night

Robert Rorabeck

The Immobile Shade

I don't need any of this- blue feathers on a headdress
Being introduced to the wind on a highway:
I have bled myself back and forth so many times
From here to Disney World,
And I am just glad to see her happy- the day spun in
A happy ghetto;
And at least he has her, and I have my dog who Has fleas-
But the hurricane approaches, turning away the Tourists, and ushering the Spanish tortoises up the skirts
Of mangroves- and it hurts not to be buried:
The lighthouse just standing there like a blind man.
Even the waves cannot tell who it is,
Just as useless as a burned down bowling alley- and
The prettiest song birds sing
At the very moment the devil sacrifices another
Pretty young girl to the prick of his jealous sting-
Staining her throat a little, like bleeding perfectly
Golden hay-
So she lays tattooed underneath the bus, the domineering
Lion persuading her into his truancy's pride:
After he has jumped through his fiery hoops, he lies
With her purring purplish in the immobile shade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Impenetrable Heavens

Making another line in the wilting snow:
It is just make-believe anyways—
The cathedrals are over-run with parked cars
And the bouquets which were supposed to be Here—It doesn't matter if the lovers
Can hardly breathe—
They have been too busy getting all over themselves—
The words hunger, and then they starve:
The rain starts out,
Like beautiful banshees in a traffic jam press ganged
Before the mountains:
Those beautiful apiaries in their boudoirs of Nose bleeds: and I suppose I can say it
Anyways,
Because no one shall find this anyways—
There she was, on a high shelf, the airplanes making'
Her barrettes—
And no one had to languish too long beside her
Swimming pools—
Her amusements were all torn down upon the day
She was married,
And all of her senses dived into the seas of
The impenetrable heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Imperfect Art Of My Ever Cherished Secret

If this is my last poem,
Then it is the last poem I shall write for her.
As she has turned away disbelieving
The grief in my flesh-
The wounded cry my soul sings
Reaching for her once more,
My fingers weaving a line
That would turn her back to me,
To put her asleep in my arms
And do away with the lonely mornings

If this is my last poem,
Let it be as the others were Told to her as if to a child sleeping
All those sad expressions to stars describe
Hovering waxen overlooking the fields
Of orange groves where young lovers lay
Unattracted to the abandoned cerulean ghost
Who walks by them
Entangled in the pollinated flesh
Of their unwedded matrimonies

If this is my last poem,
Let it be cast unlawfully across
The furthest lake and skip in Many chances to where she might see
What I have done to be noticed by her
In the crowded room where we both now breathe
Across the impassible seas of continents
Let this be the final truth offered for her eyes
The truth that my lips would speak
The imperfect art of my ever cherished secret.

Robert Rorabeck

The Imperfections Of Their Favorite Things

Juvenile doves enjoying the architectures
Of their jaundiced neighborhoods:
They don't even believe the air will support them,
But they start off:
They fly like rats over the cleavage of neighborhoods
While the tigers smoke through rings,
Picking the right angles of their dungeons,
Webbed in the elbows of
The Precambrian subculture- They will fly forever
These brilliant things with burning
Tattoos: they seem to
Be catching the albatross like roses, as in their Feral natures, they think up the names of Their muse
And in the rains that cannot douse their burning
Gasoline,
They leap forever, resembling the imperfections
Of their favorite things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Impermanence Of Abandoned Amusement

And this day has brought another bouquet
Of nowhere:
There it is as the night wins out,
And the rest of that defeated sense goes home
Over the hills clutching its consolatory
Prizes-
What a special wound, to be displayed here,
In the azure park and without a job:
With no one to read this because it is not Great enough-
And I say this to the drunken peacock standing
In the impermanence of abandoned amusement:
Yes, loving you, but unrenowned-
Going through the hallways without even one
Face upturned amidst the pubescent multitude-
And you do not answer me,
Not even the way a minnow answers a ripple-
Not even the way an echo answers a cloud.

Robert Rorabeck

The Impossibility Of Where We Must Live

Beauty and genius die young, at the time
Of my illiteracy,
All I knew of was the lines of afternoons of Salient truancy:
I wanted to live by you then, and run my fingers
Up and down the places your mother washed you,
The ridgeline of that plated serpent dividing you;
I wanted to do better at all of this,
Passed out like a great king floating in his
Canoe,
Passing those great houses we could have lived
In,
The unfinished tombs of the business classes,
The half naked housewives in the back afternoons,
Topless and greased slick on the green easements,
Hand-feeding otters, breast feeding kittens,
Like the French song, gifts to men who must always
Be closing the doors to your bedroom,
Offering you free electricity and drinks-
When I've drunken so much for you, my liver is failing,
My lips like a bad oyster curdle from the absent
Folds of your velvet seas;
They hypnotizing your with their patronizing lectures-
They open you this way, like hypnotizing a bird with a
Whole bunch of string; when I could do better for you,
Wordless, and body-scarred, young at the hips,
I could swing you out of the practicality, the yard you
Diadem, give you swoon in a living coffin,
A wedding procession of soft-shelled terrapin and water-
Moccasin, to call your undressing room, a ribbon of Man-dredged teal to speak to us of the impossibility
Of where we must live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Imprints Of A Very Lonely Fairytale

But green and here and now,
And looking up, her eyes are also doing the same;
It is the end of the class:
It rains; and her eyes are looking up like cenotaphs who Learned to move:
They go up the smoky wells of the draftsmen and their Yellow mythologies;
And I don't think I can actually see her again:
I think now that she is unreal, but she was there before
And in that time,
Like a train robber, like something sharp that came toward Me, penetrating, and then walked away to art class
Her pockets bloody full with the things she tore,
And laughing;
And her father died, and I wept and didn't go to school,
But went the opposite way to find myself
Like learning the imprints of a very lonely fairytale.

Robert Rorabeck

The Incandescent Brushstrokes

I'm supposed to be going Back to work
But I haven't been with you
For three weeks,
And now with the sun going down
And all of this liquor
The semiprecious formulas are Losing steam
As the ready traffic is swimming by
Again,
And all I've managed to do is to Become lost
Into these woods that always Bare the heartfelt architectures of your Elusive name,
Peeling away like misfits up into the sky,
In columns of disbelieving opulence
That smolder for awhile
In the incandescent brushstrokes of a holiday
Never sanctioned for my eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Indistinguishable Powerlines In Your Eyes

All of it is imperfect, and I am almost home:
I have been found out to be a girl by the macho stags
With their machetes and flashing their grins
At all of their impossible wives,
Like you, Alma:
Wont you ever come over again to study and hold my Hand- I think that you won't,
But I love you, and I love your children, And I wish you knew me
Better and my footpaths through the deep young mountains,
Because I have seen the lower sleeps there of god and his contingencies
Of winged agitations:
I was born on this mountain, Alma, but before this time
I had never thought of or even knew your name;
And my craft is bankrupt and corrupt, Alma, but I would die on this Mountain for you Alma,
Speechless and emolliate, just to count all the frighten birds weeping
From the indistinguishable power lines in your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Indian-Gifts

Her body was a glove that I shouldn't have had:
I was too big to fit, but it felt so good,
And now it rains and I haven't murdered anyone,
But my bones rattle like song birds to cats:
And the mountains rise up perpetually, and the seas fluctuate;
And it is all such a terrible thing,
And yet so much less frightening than the Indian-gifts
Of your body's beautiful tributaries
That once dripped warbling over lips and throat and tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

The Indians Who Sleep Inside Of Her

Northern forest without any flags
Or women
Where women are like flags, but
There are no summits
For either of them to start out
And to arise:
Just a forest of absurd and devil
Worshiping Indians,
And no roads over that wilderness:
And no roads in the sky:
In fact nothing here evaporates:
The climates of the shoals keep their Armor,
The grottos keep the advertisings of
Their ilk,
No mermaids- no sea horses-
The green atolls are only mirages,
And beyond them, not a single wave:
But the forest
That sleeps alone except for the Indians
Who sleep inside of her
Whose dreams no one ever told.

Robert Rorabeck

The Individuals Of Her Sleeping Spell

Masturbations of shadows:

I do all that I can to become just another Disney Word—

And into the desire of all of the things that are lost,

I throw my trinkets that I burn for you:

Like all of the paper that I've folded so sacredly:

Praying to you until I have to go

To sleep

Into Another ballroom of unequaled pleasure—

Where the felines groom—while then it feels alright

That you are sleeping at my house at the end of another ballroom

Even though I don't know you and all of your heavens

That are just sketches anyway—and this line is

Just another cat yawning—and I guess there is nothing

Left to say about your ventures here- as the soft shelled tortoise

Escapes into the canal,

An another church awakens long after the perfumes of

The night blooming jasmine have gone to

The individuals of her sleeping spell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Indoor Pages

Now I a dancing while I feel my body's flesh:
Like jam, held over- for the pursers lips: while,
At the windows,
All of the goldfish are trained indoors,
Just as I will have to go to school again tomorrow,
Waiting for what must happen in Paris:
Must I lose every possibility of Everything,
To come down from the mountain again,
A new man:
As a child from my mother's bosom, while these Words scratch like chalk in a preordained maze
Which I jump through,
Licking my lips, the way the jungle licks conquistadors,
Thinking that all of this was better left
Though out to the casualties of Wednesdays: and it Seems a poem to me-
It seems a weather caught between the fingerprints
While driving into a town along the frontera:
It seems as if a special place through my loneliness
As my bones
Turn gray and tend to wear my clothing- and this Turns into a place where I am not here-
Housed in gilded allegory into another dream that I am not sure I will have tomorrow,
While all of the cars station out, parked as if jewelry,
And the coyotes howl,
Their throats giving roses to the housewives of the world,
The frog princes dancing underneath them
And destroying the indoor pages of my softly lit story.

Robert Rorabeck

The Infinities Of Dead Ends

Down in the piles of caesuras—
Made up like stately bouquets in the middle of Their Saturdays and Sundays—
Looking at the cumulus tricks of clouds—
Things that build up, weep and dissolve without being
There;
Paid tricks in their seasons—ways to head north
Over-spilling with their advertisements
And lost ships:
And when it rains, the universities of my pasts
Looking so ghostly and so passive:
Their libraries emptied—
Their rose gardens some graveyards for bees in their Pornographic cemeteries—
And I had my houses run like horses whipped by the Lightning—as I've tried to call her
Through the cerulean amusements that she could never Open her eyes to believe in—
Until the tournaments started out alongside the roadsides:
And underneath them the labyrinths moaned—
As the monsters stumbled underneath the headless windmills
Of the infinities of dead ends.

Robert Rorabeck

The Influences Of The Deities

Motivations swaying in the purple abyss-
While the leviathans gather their Breath to blow out a birthday wish
Across the mobiles of the first sounds and into
The evacuations of the school children:
They cross the planes of their love,
Pretending that they will grow up forever,
Kissing the red dirt of baseball diamonds
And becoming their own utopias:
Or they become as if a song already mentioned
To the careless angels who are just serving
Overpriced drinks between the wings of airplanes
Anyways-
Circling once again through the circus of the Sky-
Daredevils of the earth, maybe I've never mentioned,
As the tide surceases,
Leaving the anemones naked, but barely vermilion
Beneath the woman in the cliff of stones:
And we salute her, drinking sangria
And growing up in the thrusts of Spain-
Pretending that it will take forever, sleeping in bunk beds,
As various boys give your sisters hickies,
And then the greater and the lesser planets are given
Over the influences of the deities I will luckily never Have to know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Iniquitous Garden

What scars are better than these,
The ones that you will not let heal,
That you tend to like those gardens of sharp
Iniquity,
The hidden wounds,
The immensity of trailer parks and graveyards
Alongside the never-ending causeways that do not Care,
That do not even hear the music that you sing,
Howling, for where is she now,
The nurse with magical fingers and free
Alcohol. Five states over?
But she isn't real, she doesn't call,
And the flowers wilt with sunlight slipping
Over the basin of your jaw,
Reminding you of all those lonely mountains you've Climbed,
Touching you like the mortician for one last show.
Lying you down now in a devastated orchard,
And reading over you;
And looking up as the theatre begins its velvet close
To the unreal sounds of traffic and machinery,
You might see an eagle cutting those blue skies,
Soaring so beautiful
He is too far away to be reminded of you,
And yet even as you are laid low, the iniquitous garden grows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Inoffensive Night

Alma: I flood, I spill, and I lavish:
I look like a reindeer's tongue being spread out in a bank
In some greatly snow banked town in the delusions
Of Arizona:
And in this way I resound; or I reverberate for you, like
Some greatly strung instrument
While my own parents are stringing tents for
New Years fireworks and none of Them: not even my sister can believe that you truly love me:
But you truly love me:
Do you, Alma,
While the planes come in, fluctuating and making the sounds
Of a grand commotion:
And then once the holiday is over wont you go back to Work with my cousin,
While the very same old sun floats over the very banks of Everything and makes a mess of Itself;
And your children steam on along- doing so fine out of your lions,
While the lions prefer to panhandle,
While there are deep clefts left into the earth, and the salmon die
Higher up, but every year returning through the pitchforks,
And the hot air balloons of all of the any old tourists
Get lost until they hit the power lines
And then fell like money pits into their super zealous wishing wells-
Attributing to no one; answering to themselves,
And licking their wounds just where they happened to fall-
Across the dirty carpets, down from the snowcapped banks of Telluride;
As you kiss your wounds, and meander through your silver
Ways to midnight and back again to West Palm Beach where
You don't have to tell anyone, but curl into yourself
For the night- like a grail that glows with the big mouths of pearls,
Luminescent and basking in the shallow
And lonely bedrooms that are fondled through the inoffensive night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Insatiable Mouth Of An Undefeatable Giant

They have houses, and look at them storm;
When night falls, it is perfect to come home to, while outside the Lions roar: made up cages for the night,
And I find her coming around again, spilling the painful tendrils over
My dreams:
My exposed dictionary like a class of useless cars in an apple orchard
That has forgotten how to keep its pornography:
And at the end of each paragraph a lake, beautiful enough for endless ladies
To sleep in
That I go down to and wonder upon the nectars regressed there;
And if my muse is standing on the other side, or if the inconsequential Lights of the constantly migratory carnival have caught the attentions of Her sweet brown body- and the soul again of my Alma,
Pulling her away like a carriage with horses
Of a desire that
I can only fixate on, as my night tumbles into the insatiable mouth of An undefeatable giant who is forever ruining my fairytale.

Robert Rorabeck

The Inside

You put me down so far underground
Like a plush rabbit without his crown:
Sister, sister, you put me down:
My entire family put me down; I am the black sheep
Braying on his bleeding ground,
My enter family put me down:
Now it is past five, almost the hour of the mailman, almost
The hour to get up and go to work,
If you are a song bird, or if you are a jerk;
This is becoming the hour in which the city crowns;
The hour too that I should be sleeping in my crypt
So softly underground;
The hour that Kelly is sleeping- the hours that cats fornicate in,
Though they are always fornicating:
This is the hour that holy people have peace just before the hour
That their awful sun rises in the east.
And then that new offspring sings like little spirits multiplying
Like transom guppies, or other words I don't know;
This is the hour I imagine you walking barefooted through the snow:
This is the hour that I awaken to perceive,
This is the hour that I would kiss your grieving lips to grieving;
To lay with you for an hour, and pay you for your troubles;
This is the hour that my love is awfully doubled,
And I come slipping like a gray man through the walls of your Doublewide:
And this is the hour that I find the inside of your inside.

Robert Rorabeck

The Insignificant Pain Of The Time Remaining

A half million years
Before the Universe
Flipped on the lights
And I saw my only
Muse
Bruised lipped
Acne scarred
Debased
And I ran to her
And told her,
"I am so afraid."
And I wanted for her
To hold me for
The remaining time.
Like a mirror,
She said,
"I am so afraid."
And she ran
And ran far away
Before I could Sit down
And bite my nails
To the quick
And weep from
The insignificant pain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Insignificant Walls Of Her Attended Bedroom

My childhood neighborhood lost in
A deluge of Spanish tongues- bodies wringed with Gold- How far away they seem to have come
From her,
Mestizos out humming toward water fountains,
Out riding their bicycles or trimming yards:
Beautiful, innocent people
Who find so many loves and take them all to
The waves where the sunlight follows laughing after
Them,
And my words rebound like harmless eels around
The dunes of their family,
Wanting to be let into the traditions that they have Left behind- but she goes home with him,
Brown skin upon brown skin:
She forgets about me as she hears her children's Laughter and the candlelight decorates
And colonnades the insignificant walls of her
Attended bedroom.

Robert Rorabeck

The Insouciant Alligator

If there are horses leaping through the Timber of a forgotten house, where are they
If the forest runs like yoke,
As the systems come, bound tightly as Gifts of magnets
To the wanton sea: she throws them in again,
As a sacrifice to the beautiful elements-
And she goes home again,
Circumnavigating the cul-de-sacs, and something
Whispers overhead but not a long ways off:
She looks up and the weather seems to change
As the fireworks take off:
It is her boy, her only child, playing hooky on a roof:
There he is in a summer about to turn auburn,
And he doesn't know any math-
And he doesn't know the constellations, but
The insouciant alligator still watches him
As his mother is coming home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Instruments They Learn To Enjoy

A sound of a sorority so young pantomiming
What they know they must become in the courtyard:
The sun strums cavalier,
It plays over their bodices and their legs like rivers:
How many of these will disappear,
How many will come away into one another, and spend
Their next tomorrows looking up at the throats and eyes
Of immodest business suits,
But now they are here, sweltering, making tongues and eyes
Of themselves,
Laughing like drunken beauty, while all of the alabaster cars
Rest in the parking lots of their grazing,
And my words go down hard, for I have thrown all of my Bouquets all over them,
Those nudities that I have clothed so immodestly; and just in
That one stretch of sun they are bathing,
A galleria that wont take very long aging gracefully,
Forgetting how they belonged as restively as the deep smoothness
Of perfect stones placed together in the courtyard
Like inconsequential prayers,
Engines so perfectly unmotivated but as ready as lips who Whisper closer to the instruments they learn to enjoy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Insubstantial Indoors

Rainstorms were ruining your eyes—
As they looked beyond the castle you couldn't remember,
All of the way up the slopes of some clouds
Like a rose garden grown over the parapets,
Or this was my bedroom of a weekend's rainstorm
Folded over with paper airplanes
And my bicycle tossed into the bosom of the yard
Underneath the melaleuca tree—
Going to school tomorrow—strange didactics
Of the already abandoned children, parallelograms
Of simpler pleasures,
As latchkeys kiss and make love to their shadows
And dream of stolen fireworks underneath the corners of The yard's palmettos—mowed grottos where the housewives
Faun—sad delights of the middle class slipping
Away from their fingertips—airplanes flying over them
Like the divine providence of dinosaurs—
And the sun big in their eyes, waiting for their children
To stop behaving and rejoin them in their places of
The insubstantial indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Interiors Of A Landlocked Sea

I toss a Frisbee to the wolves as I listen
To the jet engine's holiday—
It sounds just like the apiary of your daydreams,
As I've been thinking about you all across
The footpaths of this campus—
You of a honey's sorority—whose body I once
Kissed and bought overpriced gold for,
And followed around weeping like
A puppet does to a wet puppy—
But you've never set foot on Campus—
You only made it out of Mexico after
I had graduated—you crossed the frontera in your Bare feet wearing a beatific negligee—
Following the orbit of your husband,
As dear to you as a rattlesnake is
To a devil—
Now the roads have split us—and the love
You proposed has evaporated from its shallows—
My new wife likes to eat pomegranates—
She is already pregnant and will come across
The earth in three weeks,
Maybe you will see her streaking across you
Like a comet—as the orchards there in your bedroom
That I do not know about,
Bend down with their bitter fruit,
Trying to console you—and you are in a cave
As brilliant as a television—
With your children lactating like mica from you—
Infantile nebulas burning from the interiors
Of a landlocked sea—and I want you to know
That this is how I picture you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Interpretations Of More Than Just One Meaning

They are so colloquial and well-spoken in
The dime stores of their echoes—
Until their ex teachers care to forget about them—
They become another antecedent that has no
Pronoun and lie just in another classroom above the Earth—
The dirt is lucky not to have them—the housewives
Echo like the last delusions of fireworks above
The drainage—and then I am sure that they Are going to sleep forever—
And the places that cannot keep them are just Trade-offs for my parents' well-being—
But I will not forgive my wife, even if she bares my child—
Because this land is beautiful and it is open to
The interpretations of more than just one meaning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Intricacies Of Autumns

Infinite stranger with your regresses,
I burn for you: and it seems for awhile alright
To swim in my lucidity:
While the Christmas trees drip the tears of Candles
And the traffic carnivals- and everything else is Spoken easily and softly- and the lines
Drift like miniskirts:
As the airplanes drift like paper snow flakes;
And the lions yawn on Friday:
On this Friday of make-believe, as the parcels
Are delivered, and the supermarkets
Beef;
And the girls I once knew start walking down
The streets lacing
The intricacies of autumns on their feet.

Robert Rorabeck

The Inventions Of A Chinese Wife

Looking at your shoulders- They seem Like the shoulders of airplanes
After you have touched down-
I wonder what the stewardesses are serving
On them-
Little girls who walk the streets of Shanghai-
They dont have too much to say
For themselves-
Some of them are holding umbrellas-
The inventions of a Chinese wife
Trying not to fly away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ironic Gods

Wastrels on the trunks of some trees
The stewardesses have disappeared behind,
Kissing after their pilots who
Are sailing the paper airplanes
And sending off fireworks into the skies:
The sugar cane is burning,
And the well maintained lions are in their Cages-
The batters are up to the plate, and it is Kissing time over all of the old high school
Where the students mingle with simulacrum
And the vestibules of a copper cemetery-
As I sit out in the grass, the windmills
Gossiping- the lady fingers firing off salutes,
And the traffic streaming like telltale
Messages of the ironic gods.

Robert Rorabeck

The Irony Of Immense Sunlight On A Dead-End Highway

A few words on the otherwise
Empty slate remind me of,

A forest mortally burned,
The flight of useless animals

Ghosts who don't leave tracks
In the snow,
The swift panther who does for them,

A highway on a flat and burnished sea,
Heading from Homestead south to the Limestone shelves,

A tortoise in a long and eerie wave,

An albatross approaching pale thunderheads,

A gravestone in an otherwise empty field,
A lonely soldier,
But dear enough to remember;

Of how far away you are,
That you don't care how often I misspell a few
Love letters,

The irony of immense sunlight on
A dead-end highway
Which might have once led home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Irrefutable Sheets

RipCORDS of these things that we cannot pull off:
Stewardesses eaten naked by the lips of the giants in his Sky forts,
Smeared like tipsy marmalade all over all of those Orchards:
Rhymes of accord, and holding her tiny brown fingers in Mine,
The way song birds are housed in their cages before
The lips of the golden mines,
When all of the night is in trouble, and in them the wolves
Are terrible singers:
But their eyes are even more terrible, as they hold all of The feral thoughts of the children
They must steal away from us, when we kiss each other
And go down beneath the irrefutable sheets of Another un sanctimonious baseball game.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ivy Leagues

Now they go down into their brown beds wearing
Their nightgowns of gold colors,
Like foxes selling wine, good at getting grapes, and turning
Grannies into suckers:
And this is my neighborhood, harassing and tantalizing above
The downy plateaus and grottos where I finally slip down to Sleep:
Like all of the roundest of stones down at the basest of mountains,
Crushing the corpulent lips of the most tourist of the wildflowers,
From which the ghostly footpaths circulate up from,
Giving their tramping motions toward the summits where the prayer
Flags of the ivy leagues flutter above the easiest of summits:
Above the water parks and the wine shops you snuggle in:
While I shoot off more and more, somehow conquering
But never getting down,
Like the divinity of an unobserving window trapped under the armpit
Of a motionless airplane:
A still life which captivates the nimbus, and keeps them around for Years and eons, while the hurricanes churn like windmills,
While their housewives whip milk into cream, and that into butter;
And the quietest of butterflies lies like a statue on Alma's breast which the half lazy lion nuzzles up to and finally:
Oh so finally makes his hungry wish.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ivy Of A More Inner Dove

Drowning its equinox of horses-
The sea brushes evangelically with cinder-locks;
It genuflects, propositioning queens
Of its shoreline:
All these girls all the same all the time;
The waves bring the bouquets to the docks;
And she is in love with her other men,
Far ashore in the orange groves like white knights
On steeds of metamorphosis:
She never goes to the light house again to see his Hoary propositions:
She remains stalwart farther inland dressed up
Behind green copper cannons,
Kissing the remains of a prettier kind, but
Their hotel room is empty:
She beds missionary in another household:
His words are replete with endless time, but her neck
Is enfolded by the ivy of a more inner dove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ixora's Red Entrails

Head strong boys with championship toys
Bric-a-brac and march along,
Drumming the footsteps of a forest's song,
Like in bed I touched Alma's knee as tiny as a doll's
China plate,
As brown and gorgeous as the throat of a whipperwhirl:
Whirlpools in the sky and fix it men:
I want to lay in bed with Alma again, and remember my Troubles to another world,
And take of my troubles as we unclothe, our eyes as sated
As the spumes of whales,
As we look out of our home's windows into the privacy
Of the ixora's red entrails.

Robert Rorabeck

The Jealous Sun

Lashed upon the teeter-totters of some milkweed
Park
The butterflies have spent across like burning paper
Bleeding and now across whose shoulder blades
The bright red and yellow helicopters
Are receding
And the cars are parked next to the dunes across from Which the ocean waves are sucreasing
Like sisters in a ballroom of mirrors the criminal
Moon is cajoling, stealing kisses that the light house
Is calling
And night in its jasmine zoetropes is falling into
A bed of senseless kisses until the jealous sun starts crowing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Jewel Of The Road

Kill myself in the jewel of
The road:
I am the prince that was a toad,
And in my meat is
A full load,
Of gemstones and nematodes.
Your birthstone waited for you
At the food court in the mall,
And after your daughter
Was kidnapped,
You gave him a call,
And let him repeat in you the sounds
The way water evaporates and crowns
The roofs of these lords
And bangs,
Makes sweet séances out of petty things,
Or puts sweet words into the mouths of Otherwise dirty things;
Makes them turn round and round,
Until they are dizzy and all
Cleaned,
Makes them say these things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Jewelry The Moon Steals

The moon a yellow Pygmalion—
A venereal marionette dancing over
The best part of the city
The most beautiful of
The boys has already abandoned—
I am getting drunk
In my little yellow living room:
A virgin of guadelupe still sits in the Floor of the foyer,
Paper airplanes being sacrifices
To her—
Soon my mother will come home,
Since tomorrow is the baby shower,
But maybe I will be too drunk to open
The door;
But sometimes my own thoughts still Get bright—
They become the jewelry the moon
Steals over the impenetrable bay,
As the waves dance with the dolphins
All with impure thoughts of her—
Like a goddess she will awaken tomorrow,
And the racecars will race for her
She won't even see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Jobs Of Clean Men

Your daughter has all those long lashes crying away
To better parts
Where I thought I should belong- where so many boys thought
To have liked;
And I swing alone in my parks and cast eyes into the mountebanks
Of shadows, the genteel lonelinesses:
I have learned about Simon Believer, and I think of you and your Daughter and Alma
While almost all of the airplanes slip across the moon with
The acuity of keen mental telepathy;
And underneath much of this penumbra your body pulsates and bleeds;
It is breathing but wounded, and it goes out into the snow
And tries to make romance with anything- While I drink mojitos all the Way down your slopes,
And I look at pictures of you specifically, cradling your daughter
Sweating in a dreamland I guess none of us will ever figure out;
But you will always be someone special,
Even when the jet engines fail and fireballs weep like tears of a sun
We can't understand;
And I drink mojitos and laugh at the jobs of clean men:
And I put on my armor and I kiss the creche of your apathetic soul;
Or I dream of Alma, which in Spanish means almost the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Journalists Of His Disbelief

Another try into the brigades of light—another day
Falters into a dictionary or a collection of Museums: I remember selling Christmas trees across
The highway from a comic book store,
And being collected to my father's echo that runs on
And on even though his life his almost Over and he is nothing special—just another collection of Light in that same museum that is always
Failing—after he is fallen, what will gather around him
To see that he is no longer there? Nothing but the Same old things—sunlight and butterflies and rainbows,
But nothing he ever believed in—nothing he could Tell time with or make money with—
But he will remain perpetually an echo for all time
In openness and wounds— in fact displayed to all of
The journalists of his disbelief.

Robert Rorabeck

The Joy In The World

It feels good to be in the weather
As long as there are so many houses
To return home to—
The truth in the daylight in the sky—
Unobtainable layers of it
Above the frothing surf
Filled with starfish and jellyfish
And sea horses—
The tourists can only stand there—
As the airplanes advertise with Their banners—
This is the joy in the world—
As the cadaver, still burning,
Leaps over the museums
Not know anyone's name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Jumpstarting Airplanes

Walking in a world that is not mine:
Moving colors dying as they consume themselves-
Dwarves under overpasses too soon besides
Where I used to live;
And thinking of her, while the sun goes down- flesh mending
On bone- flowers in a garden trying to survive
The last moments of this year,
And the sky above us- her children in a graveyard of
Make-believe
And all of my wishes approaching a summit as smooth
As glass beneath the insouciant wishes of
The jumpstarting airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Just As Many

Alma laughs and says we have to leap forwards:
She is so susceptible:
Like a seashell open mouthed waiting for the milk of her gut:
When we made love and her bellybutton filled with the resin of Pearls:
She was still bleeding from her pregnancy with Heidi high up
In the Alps;
And even further over her shoulders, in the derelicts of Pluto where nothing has to survive,
She was still singing in a chorus of new architects that could never Prove themselves even in the confirmations of her little sister:
Then she wanted to break up with me
Around the fourth of July: we'd only made love four times; but it
Was the first honest love I'd had in twice as many years;
It was a bizarre science fiction that had to happen for god to be proved;
At least the last of many gods,
Like grapes on the vine, drooling open breasted for the lips of the Fox;
And afterwards she didn't want anything more to do with me,
But luckily we reconciled and have made love six as many times:
And it feels all right,
Even though my soul has lost itself underneath as many grains of sand
That lie relaxing on the uncountable beach underneath the breasts
And armpits of just as many housewives
Who afterwards will go home laughing, echoing in the autumns of Their times the smiles of the lips of the just as many Jack O' Lanterns.

Robert Rorabeck

The Katydids

On every Christmas, the foxes strut out
Tender footed, underneath the marching band of
My heart while it is still alive,
Just as the fishing boats set out while the fish
Are still biting,
And then I have no excuse but to presuppose
You,
To kiss and curse you through the preternatural
Moats of all of the heavens whilst they
Are still happening,
And the girls play out, barefooted,
Hearts leaping-
And dancing for serpents in the carnivals I guess
You can have no idea of ever happening:
And the airplanes clatter across the dinner
Tables- their sororities
Stumbling, and becoming the famishing hallucinations
For all of the heavens,
As their tails unwind- and the chandeliers glisten
Like boats sinking just beneath their waters,
Whilst all of the simulacrum continue laughing on
And on-
As the katydids kiss themselves to the cypress-
Because I already know that it is just the one or
Two things that they can forever do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kaydids

On every Christmas, the foxes strut out
Tender footed, underneath the marching band of
My heart while it is still alive,
Just as the fishing boats set out while the fish
Are still biting,
And then I have no excuse but to presuppose
You,
To kiss and curse you through the preternatural
Moats of all of the heavens whilst they
Are still happening,
And the girls play out, barefooted,
Hearts leaping-
And dancing for serpents in the carnivals I guess
You can have no idea of ever happening:
And the airplanes clatter across the dinner
Tables- their sororities
Stumbling, and becoming the famishing hallucinations
For all of the heavens,
As their tails unwind- and the chandeliers glisten
Like boats sinking just beneath their waters,
Whilst all of the simulacrum continue laughing on
And on-
As the katydids kiss themselves to the cypress-
Because I already know that it is just the one or
Two things that they can forever do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Keyhole Of Little Bear Mountain

There were virgins: singing bodies of little girls
Up in the keyhole of Little Bear Mountain—
How they'd gotten there after all of the boy scouts,
Securely knotted together, had fallen—
It beats me—maybe they floated there—or rode upon
The backs of high leaping grasshoppers or Took a train that had gone off the tracks to vanish—
Anyway, the snows around them turned to pearls—
And they were laughing and eating tuna fish sandwiches
All day—
I heard them from my blue and yellow tent—like a
Jellyfish or yellow jacket down in the stickers and foliage—
I had plans of selling fireworks, but there weren't
So much tourists as there were arrowheads, red berries,
And mosquitos—and this wasn't my art, anyways—
It was there—but their echoes died when the sun went down
And school let out—maybe they had somewhere else to Go—but I really think that they stayed up there in The night and metamorphosed, as if that was what they Were meant to do—I am sure that the stewardesses never Saw them—They were already gone—
And who ever read about them but very few—the clouds
Over shadowed the moonlight—and raindrops fell down on My cheeks and scars, and I crawled away from there
In the morning and drowned myself in bards—
And whoever else heard of those little girls crawling up there
Into the highest kindergartens of the world—I never knew—
But the winds blew, the raindrops fell,
And the airplanes flew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Killers Of Real Life

I have a beautiful dream of vampires
And their kiss.
The fangs of your new life grow
Like contaminated roots,
Probing my sandy foundation.
We fall in love again.
Rent a room in Tallahassee,
Kiss each other like long lost pets
Newly reacquainted.
I don't want to know the details
Of your exploits,
But you say them to me anyway:
Like a sly politician giving a speech,
A filibuster until help arrives:
You were married and had a child,
Loved men you found fuming out
Of the lackadaisical cracks in the Sideway you walked down
Trying out your novel ego.
Your voice sang like malevolent laughter,
Great pain without a hint of suicide.
I find out I didn't want to be there,
So I took a shower. You called over a Young Indian who I could tell was not Jewish.
He winked at me and took you
And your pinstriped girlfriend to eat somewhere.
All that you'd done to me has made you famished,
The way you threw those once existing days
Like an ancestor's porcelain doll tossed
Out the window to shatter
Along the withered umbilical-cord
Of newly born highway.
I just want to get out of there so I wake up: 7: 20
My sister is over visiting.
She just got over a flesh-eating bacteria,
So I crawl up the stairs like a war veteran triaged
After amputation and tell her
The killers who happen to you in real life
Sometimes search for you while you sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Killjoy Sensations

The same memories were the killjoy
Sensations, losing the knowledge of words
Like blood,
As the girls stepped barefooted out
Of the trailer parks of Their no-good neighborhoods—
And the knights swung their Swords,
And quested,
Or were slain upon the benchmarks of
Their holy and heroic ways—
But their minds hadn't truly evolved,
As they'd never actually graduated from
High school—
All of them enamored with Disney
World while my wife
Whistled alone in the kitchen
Just because she had nothing else better to do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kiln Of Caesuras

Imperfect such as this: but beautiful- beautiful,
And lining the road:
The ululating throats of orchards and nematodes:
And all of this stuff wakes up on the burning
Fingerprint of a candle
And just keeps on doggedly cajoling- trying to sell its Forever blesses retinue from outside the séances of Forts that are as sheltered as terrapin
Until their candles burn out and their saints smell like
Roses they are so blind;
And the tourists return to their main rooms like hotels
In which they wish to discover better love,
But it all goes unequalled as the waves throw themselves
On the nativities of the sand- taking away
The tiny vestibules that used to wink like entire daises
Against the kiln of caesuras and up into the heavens
They never knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kilns Of Our Young And Unmolested Offspring

Bodies fill up with noise

Because it is you that I want as I slam the glass

Down:

And I feel like I am kindergarten and have been dragging

Up wished from the overused rug at naptime while

My parents are underpaying me,

The sad phantasms who will never learn anymore of my

Despotic gardens,

But this is how they form for you,

Alma: all alarmed and from the gut: this is how they sing,

Even while your womb has been busy disproving my make-believe,

Now I have a house for you too small to be your

Castle, to be your cave,

While all of the rich and purple boys pounce their tools for you:

They are all too ready to be your slaves,

And why haven't you been out in your front yard dancing in and out

For me,

Alma:

I have stolen so many roses for you, and I would take you to the new

Make-believe of my abused cataracts,

If only if you had any new feelings for me, and none of this

Could be disproved,

And then our countries could sleep together while the lions

Yawns and the luscious breads bakes in the fountains

Of the kilns of our young and unmolested

Offspring.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kindling

This is a good sipping rum- I have dolls
From Haiti and Peru in my kitchen,
And chameleons that run through my yard-
When I was very young,
I stared hypnotized at the fields where the Cheerleaders left
Metamorphosed into stewardesses, broiling
Confections and stains of honey:
I am sure they went up to be willing captives
Of the gods we misspell
In freshmen English- loving whispers of the
Ways that we conjoin again-
Bullet holes of twins overlapping in the Darkness,
As the comely suspects get away, blooming
Cadaverous and spoiled
To simmer underneath the kindling riches of
A misbegotten world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kindling Blade

Morning comes uneasy like a
First-time thief,
But he is back again to show quick
Eyes
The grief: Of workaday seasons,
Of dying pets,
Of cobras hooded in the Astroturf-
Pretty girls ignore him, surf:
And my two dogs still sleep,
Legs twitching through that gray forest-
Three hours to the east, old girlfriends
Are new wives, mewing, yawning in their Professional beds, bobbing their heads
And cooking things up-
The morning is lovely when fully occupied,
And the yards at the end of its drooling jaw
Good and mowed-
But up in the gray mountains the perpetual
Bachelors have a long road to hoe;
And still the velvet ejaculations sing like
Pristine pistils all poison and spurious rippling,
Rippling across the edge of the kindling blade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kindling Of The Rosy Paper

Now the mountains: you there, where the golden
Things are hidden, and how strange-
Artifacts of her lips where the Indians climbed,
And had children.
The river spills from her vest, goes down through the Golden lumber,
Divides eventually for tourists; but I wait for
Her in the Bosque beneath
A red sky's eventual intrusion: words such as filament
Keeping the birds in their particular airs-
All of it was beautiful before the trailer parks were born,
And we came down holding hands-
The sea that dried up during an afternoon's lunchtime,
Or through the many times I tried
Captivating you, my heart putting on lights:
In its castanet, turning for the joy of your brown hands
Upon the kindling of the rosy paper
I attended as if flames could make beautiful flowers come alive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kindling Riches

This is a good sipping rum- I have dolls
From Haiti and Peru in my kitchen,
And chameleons that run through my yard-
When I was very young,
I stared hypnotized at the fields where the Cheerleaders left
Metamorphosed into stewardesses, broiling
Confections and stains of honey:
I am sure they went up to be willing captives
Of the gods we misspell
In freshmen English- loving whispers of the
Ways that we conjoin again-
Bullet holes of twins overlapping in the Darkness,
As the comely suspects get away, blooming
Cadaverous and spoiled
To simmer underneath the kindling riches of
A misbegotten world.

Robert Rorabeck

The King Of The Dwarves

He licks his black arrows on the cliff,
Doesn't
He: and he has so many things to say
While I am drunk and potbellied on the old
Truck and full of his Fantasy and the rivers down into her libertarian
Orchid farm:
You can get three for a dollar
And I think of Sharon under the light of the moon,
While is quiver is full and hunting the dragon
By the light of the moon
And it is so sick from drinking so much water,
And all of the five armies are sick,
And only the Hobbit is picking locks and Federico Garcia
Lorca is sleeping drunken with bullet holes
Underneath his olive tree,
As I should soon be sleeping, though I have a few more
To publish anonymously,
As these dirty nailed fingers run like springtime afterbirth, '
As I think of her unwritten of, serving the effervescing
Systems of the ghostly sailors,
Her romantic thorns never ever spoken of by JRR Tolkien,
And yet I love her, and keep on riding barrels for her long
After the glorious denouement and the burial
Of the king of the dwarves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kingdoms Of The Sky

Crying like vanquished heroes in the golden
Fjord: each body a tree bending down in the shade
Of over cooling monsters:
The sunlight decapitating shadows, and spilling them
Over cliffs: trucks who lose hope
And tumble down when they were halfway getting up
To somewhere:
When they could almost see Mexico from
Arizona:
And now all of this theft; the homeopathy of scorpions
And coral snakes fondling newborn rabbits in the Underbrush:
And the ankles of the Indians as they pass away amidst
The states:
Blue bears smoking on the cliffs, jumping over entire Cities-
But making no movement to save her name,
To save her from the hallucinations of the tourisms
That have educated the things she has mistaken for love;
Or causing everything she has known to metamorphosis
Into something heavenly before her
Exodus from the kingdoms of the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kissing Rooms Of The Cars

I can survive if you can survive- for awhile,
Outside the trout streams of Mexico-
Here are the oily reflections of your mother,
Before she had a gun pressed
To her head-
And had to surrender, as you surrendered:
As I have surrendered for you,
And given off my skin to my classes: and shed
Myself on the stark and barren tree of my Classroom:
I hang my skin here for witches
And stewardesses, and they come around,
Fingering themselves and blowing kisses- oh,
The beautiful words that they seem to become-
As I remember you in the fruit market,
As I remember making love to you in the afternoons
When there was too much rain to work-
For awhile, for that time, you kissed
Me open mouthed, and when you saw me in the little House I bought for you, you jumped into my Lap and we kissed, and we made love,
Even though I was drunk: but eventually, you stopped
Kissing me opened mouthed- I still get drunk
During and after school- and I still like to feel the Warm recesses that happen upon me inside the daydreams of
The kissing rooms of the cars out in the student
Parking lot- but you no longer know what I mean-
And I no longer care.

Robert Rorabeck

The Kitchen Of Your Childhood Suicide, Sylvia

I love Sylvia Plathe
Even though its been maybe a decade since
I read the Bell Jar,
And they've censored all of her poetry after her
Son, the fish man, committed suicide
Too:
I really love how Plathe was so honest, how she wrote
About hiding herself in the nook under the stairs
Going down, going down:
And I'll be honest, I'm lit right now, and ready to Settle down with my dogs and Watch a movie,
After ten years, after ten years without a woman,
And never one like Sylvia:
I can't even imagine one like Sylvia- and my teeth
Are aching and my scars do throb,
My greatest imperfections reflected back up to me
Impotently when I read Sylvia,
When I read her- I'd go to get my haircut in Tallahassee,
And then outside there was a tiny park by the lake
Where girls jogged and walked their dogs,
And not a one of them was Sylvia,
And I'd never drink- I'd go to class, and I'd never drink,
But I'd read Sylvia:
She was so honest for a housewife, admitting to her
Scars,
As I've admitted to mine, and loving the girls who serve
Lesser tattooed men the drinks in bars-
Oh well, Sylvia, you didn't marry a doctor after all-
You married another poet- a man,
He wasn't as good as you- maybe he was better than me,
But I love you more because of it,
And I feel so exposed like I'm in your kitchen now with the Walls torn down, just a drunk tourist feeding the carnivorous
Birds, wishing I was French, or in my grave
So that I could understand you and reach over before the end
Of the week,
And press you to me like a prize and just use you to impress
Those girls I really love,

Those brilliant busy things crawled out of the sea who
Are so less than you,
And who appear to us both like delicious pies patriotically cooling
On the window sill in the kitchen of your childhood suicide, Sylvia.

Robert Rorabeck

The Knowledge To Make

It is not all good, and it is getting even more dangerous
From here:
And it just keeps falling up and up like whatever moonlight it
Was upon the crenulations of her skirt:
And the traffic is as busy as ants or centipedes:
Little girls who in their days, monthly, bleeding in their little ways:
And then we go into choruses,
Or we shut up:
And the fieldtrips of mausoleums are lifted by forklifts
And dump trucks:
And the math gets funny, and the moonlight serenades: and you make Love to him, because his muscles surrounding you make you want
To feel like a princess in her grotto:
All beefed up and surreal; and even if you were broken, well then
You were healing, and it all came down to this,
And maybe your children were feeling better, Alma: as maybe you
Have even lied down now beside you man of whatever weathers they Were that brought you to this country.
And then to my bedroom, to an oasis, or a woebegone opera,
While the boomslangs ate our flesh, and then the pretty girls rollerskated:
And we watched them entirely agog, and at least it was I who thought
How precious it was that they didn't even have to think of us,
While the waves repeated, crenulated and purred against the bridges
That we have come to join and walk, but which neither of us
Have made, nor have the knowledge to make.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lacquered Stages Filled With Grinning Dogs

I can never begin to start a new life:
I just keep rhyming again for the empty dens of sand lions
And house wives:
We saw them together getting out of the zoo:
So many children and each with two legs and two shoes:
This is how the earliest and newest life
Proceeds to move:
Away from sweet dens of rest to other dens too:
They come sweeping across our shoulders like the satin threads
Of Cinderellas who Never have to change back again:
And we can watch them go and spread out around us through
The day, Alma,
Even though they are nothing like us:
They make a beautiful show like birds who are injured but
Have been cared for and thus still survive:
My mother and father are going back to Arizona,
But that strange desert holds no more meaning for me, even though
I am alone in my house,
I held you near me today, and enjoyed you in every which way,
Like the astronauts enjoy the stars,
And the words I breathe come out in unwholesome circles and Caracoles like little girls who are just learning to swim,
Or ballerinas who are terribly afraid of the lacquered stages filled
With grinning dogs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lactates Of The Realm

See how I've dressed up
All in cumulonimbus and the yellow busses
Passing beneath me
Like hummingbirds with lipstick of tourists:
When the want to come up her
Skirts—
I dream of a pretty rainforest:
The world in a teardropp like a store,
On my shoulders twin reindeer making a pass
At their own lovers:
Beneath them, the soft willows beside the stream,
And my retinue gladly gathering
In a meeting of the lactates of the realm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ladles Of Featureless Joys

Who can I tell the joys I've had at night
Waiting for the quixotic bedrooms of little houses
That are as good as mine
Where strange cats come brushing whiskers through
The scuppernongs;
And it is just as good as if I'd had a speed boat
Along the dress of reeds an October lake,
Where all the hidden promises whisk beneath the mallards
Cooing to the duck blinds;
And different degrees of hallucinations go like runaways
Across the fields of corn and strawberries,
With the deepest dreams being like commercial airliners
Booming like Olympic runners through the tallow
Baking in an airy wedding cake of forgetful gods
With the clouds being the hands of two lovers pinching and forming,
A dousing one another with the ladles of featureless joys.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lady Of The Lake

Scarred for stewardesses
And how they run like sweet minnows through
Each and every nebular shadow,
Serving the open and vulnerable commuters who pass
Like the dead between the borders
Of so many states,
And new loves are found and buried,
And new talents are taken into the sea
And mothballed like
The wine into the skeleton's lips;
While we were going down,
I had no one's hand to hold, but it was still
Beautiful,
Staring first into her bruised eyes,
And then down her rivers,
And she seemed to smile and acknowledge the way
I and every man was looking at her even as we Shot beneath the waves
Like a great arrow which had passed harmlessly over
The enemy's walls,
And quill ed quite harmlessly into the hapless mythology
Of the lady of the lake.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lady Of The Lake?

Tongue who languishes for the chalice of Its voyage—
The questing beasts who sounds so savage,
And speaks of its lust
While driving to the movie theatres,
But grows quiet upon returning to
Its houses—
And into its kitchens without any poisons
Of snakes,
It practices its ventriloquisms—
And the lady of the lake?
She waits or she slumbers in a pool made
Entirely out glass meant to reflect
The cartographed jealousy of
The stars
Except that they are so far away
That their beauty continues
To burn without any of its mirrored passions.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lady's Wedded Gem

With a mouthful of candles I hold out and wait
For the new show:
Crepuscle has built and flood even over the blind man's House who is always checking out
The emperor's new duds:
And when they have weddings, they hold them as softly
As soft boiled eggs
As oranges are sliced and buttered into marmalade:
And if it appears to us at all,
It appears while the eyelids are still jumping the canals
Before chanticleer sings;
And even though they are diamonds,
And they pattern the rural glades: they are slipping away,
Atop a grass stained belly, forked tongue;
And it isn't to encrust the lady's wedded gem for which they are Made.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lamentations Of That Garden

Parched symbols of a paper sea
In a rebellion of totems who wait for you
In the darkness long after you have Gotten into your car and driven away
Underneath the latchkeys of the overpasses
And to Hollywood- They are making pictures of You whose brown stems are a forest- they are making
You feel unreal until your children come
Back home again from the water spirits of the mountains,
Bringing you a vial of the tears of their father
They discovered where you were sure
He was abandoned- doing his job for a lady who Is always changing him,
Doing the work you set her to, as the butterflies
Follow the school busses down from the lamentations
Of that garden.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lamentations Which Bare Her Name

The satin cones vestibule over where the pilgrims walk:
And Alma has made love to her man so many times
After she has made love to me:
She probably can't even feel me now: how I levitated the bed
Over the termites and said a prayer for the conquistadors
And their Indians:
She has probably now been to so many movies that she could Just sit for awhile in the sweet and velveteen silhouettes of Starlets and just gaze at the Magnificent of silicone- She is probably so far away that she Has never had to sculpture something that would Eventually die:
Why just look at her too children: they will go on forever as
The creek run like tears in their wet seasons down from The rocky mountains:
If I don't see her again, in a month or two she will all out forget
My name,
But I will continue walking down her immortal path,
The vulpine winds stealing from my throat the lamentations which Bare her name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Languages Of Another Tomb

Unspeakably coming home to me,
Lightweight airplane touching down over the Baseball diamonds—and in all of their Echoes wishing to know just who
Was exactly in love—
Plagiarisms inside a classroom of glass bottles
Leading to grandmothers eventually awakening from Coffins—and then my first born is born
And married, given the names of my ancestors,
Asked to take over without any instructions—
And in those places where the fantasies
A belly-full—
My mother alone and singularly beautiful,
Giving her best wishes forever over a birthday cake
We cannot see anymore—and if you
Exist on seeing him, then remember he is only
Midway there in your soul—gesticulations
That seem to evaporate in the afternoon,
While I guessed that I was in love with you—
But you just happened to be the promises I could Not survive happening everywhere like the dying promises
Of pomegranates dropped and heavy upon
The fallacies of the languages of another tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Breakfast

The last breakfast entangling in the fishtailed palms—
The last glow of Easter's resurrection
Before crepuscule beds over the mailboxes and housewives turn in:
Neighborhood of abandoned sunlight,
Softening structures, awakening crickets and cicadas who come
And change and drip down the armpits of
The cypress trees: beauty of natural delusion above which
The airplanes continue to fester and effervesce—
Shadows spread across baseball diamonds,
Night girls follow the railroad tracks to work—and the memory here
Of you feels like a song that has slipped itself away,
Winnowed and submissive as the trains glide like angels—
And the tourists who do not belong here look out
At the darkest night never wondering what they are supposed to see.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Day Of Spring

Have you discovered me out somewhere
In the middle of America?
Without song, but not having far to go.
Soon I might learn to sing of fireworks, and dream of
This if I remember where it is,
Where I too was still going when yet a child,
Soft-boned and innocent, mostly like a fish:
We were heading south, all the way to the tip
Of the world, and I had never tasted alcohol,
Never visited school,
Or your eyes like far distance penumbras
Which came to haunt me,
Pantomimes of sand-dollars waltzing on
My open neck,
Windows redacted into transoms
Well-lit and curious inside your bosomy house,
The crèche or hut of ribs and doubled purple nipples
With sills of lips that parted and breathed across my Mouth wafted curtains in the middle of the night
Collecting all the nocturnes,
Wavering in a world where you don't belong.
I don't even know who you are, but I know
You do not love me, turning in your gentle spheres,
Letting the bad scientists study you
With their rusted spines and eyes that never close,
Unclothing in your universe of cities, attracting the Cars and artificial lights:
When I think of you I get drunk and swim,
And stay up all night, fuming thoughts of you from Between my teeth,
And the ants move in little red trains, and herons fly
Over the crematoriums of everglades;
And I should have never learned to speak, or to Think in logical processions, because the first word I Found was a thing which happened to be true,
And as soon as I could learn to walk, I made this Bouquet for you,
But it didn't seem to matter, because I couldn't learn
To sing,

And you did not follow my message,
You gave up and, ringed, changed your name
Never suspecting that for me
Today is the last day of Spring.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Days Of The Living

The best specters reside underneath the bleachers
After the crowd of parents have done cheering,
And the popcorn is empty, the rains come hurdling
Oldsmobiles and Fords painted so cheery,
Have caravanned back again to the green suppositions,
The mortgages and cabinets of pills;
The whitest stones placed as if in laconic offerings:
There is a hidden park up the slope from the alligators,
Where from the swing-set echoes the laughter of little girls,
And the footsteps of truants sneaking in the afternoons,
Too early, how they would like to kiss the necks
Above the opened windows: How they move infinitesimal,
The circulations of society, naturally, stem from the Suffocations of the first incisions, those who were cast
Away and are living beneath them, in palpitating amputations;
They moan from the red oval of their persistent allocation,
Attached to the lucidity of the broken sparrow,
Just words now, reciting, lovers leaving messages,
Harkening, they see
Through the introspection of the abandoned quarry,
Naked ankles come flocking by them, and young girls again
Are laughing, for that is from the well where up-springs
Mirages brightly singing, even far after the last days of the living.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Of Any While

Wounded anonymity can find a spot
To lie down beside the fire,
And think of things less wickedly in which to conspire:
All considering the ways
For the achievement to become,
There will be warm fires beneath the mountains
And less wickedness for in the transformations of Everyday life to lesser become:
We can move out of the pinafores of the waves—
I have already thought of you now so openly as
To resurrect you sincerely from you graves,
And they gave their truths to their pigeon holes and
To the mountain lions but not so many times so that We had to explain ourselves as the waves caracoled over the opening graphs:
It is the last memory of high school that we shall ever
Have, and the waves increase as to enter our wounds
Like penny holding saints surceasing into the holds of our arcades for the last of any whiles—
As the ancient and bicycling pines stare up at
The moon—this perpetual and hypnotic,
The last of any while

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Of The Two Of Our Loneliest Of Children

In love in early October it rains- -
Baseball diamonds and angels tears falling down,
Collected by those whose jobs it is to look up
And collect the detritus of angels-

It is a fall since high school, and I am collecting
My own remembrances again,
Underneath an umbrella, invented in prehistorical times
By a wife in China-

The steps before my marriage have no decorations-
And she grew up upon this concrete-
In a land as far away from here as the moon,

And there is nothing else as undeniably puzzling as her joints
Dissolving upon the salts of a dove: e
She cleans the house, she does other good things.
I get her to pay for her own insurance; she is a new driver-

She cannot deny the waves which have assaulted her,
As if she were an early explorer of Florida- A Catholic cenotaphic,
Quilled as full of arrows as roses have bouquets-

And all of the nights of her lovely moons are stocked
Full of bouquets-
Dying flowers that drink for a moment
The pools beneath her eyes-

In the blink of an eye, she is my wife-
And she stumbles away from here fearing my memories-
An excitement something so far away from here that is worth
Nearly 600,000 dollars-

While I dream of other girls swirling within the caesuras,
She makes money for our children whom
Are already here-

And she awakens, starting out again into the daytime shows,
Singing the songs of communist propagandas that seem to have no effect

Upon her-

I drink two beers and a bottle of wine, and stretch out like

A blue collar minx-

The canals are green and cold and made by both the goods and evils

Of men-

And then, upon the streets and concrete shoulders of our towns,

The shadows play together

With the last of the two

Of our loneliest of children.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Pieta

Her family in the satin weebegone
As if lying down in a holiday of movie theatres:
Her family the brushstrokes of her fear,
Or my forgotten art- how it fails like matchless arson
To ignite her throes;
But in a bright trailer park I picture her on the west coast
Of Florida,
A runaway, half naked- happy to see the waves
As they brush across her feet as she walks with her first child
Before she knew me:
A religion to walk as if the waves are trying to hypnotize her:
And she smiles,
Waits for her husband. There are fewer cars on the road,
And fewer graves everywhere-
Her parents don't even exist yet. Right now she can say that She comes from America- If she is my mother,
It is a guess- or she is my brown skinned muse full of amnesia
As an apiary is its honey-
And she spills her naked self across the sand,
Teaching her son the few words that she believes she knows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Playgrounds

Now comes the keystone of grand exposure-
Up there in the breathy fairytales of angels
Becoming demons:
Where the airplanes are real in a petting zoo
Combined with the elements-
Where the rocks grumble in the lightning as their Very own species of men-
Where the skulls of wandered donkeys still Lay grinning outside the minds
Beneath the unbelievable crosses
Beneath the peaks named after the greatest of
Men-
To the places where roses evaporate and the most Cantankerous of kites spill
Over the barren and needle-point shoulders,
Laughing-
Where all of death laughs- the highest summits,
And the last playgrounds of kidnapped
And murdered children.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Ride Of Anyone

Fireworks,
Like insects of men,
Like a field of smoking muskets-
Everything done well in life
At first looks beautiful,
Exploding like bright seeds out of Scarred palms,
And then is done in seconds:
I drink cheap rum to try and be fashionable,
To socialize with shadows,
While my dog licks my shoe-less foot-
I can walk for miles and miles
And escape all the cops,
The blue-green men with their gunshot smiles.
I played minigolf, or I loved her,
But she took off and married a harlequin
Romance- now they live and work
In the South Florida gutter:
This strange feat is my bread and butter,
And the world turns around underfoot-
When the substitute is in house, all busy and silver,
I tend to stutter-
I write novels late in the evening, I return Sherlock Holmes weeks afterward, piss-stained,
And the Librarians tend to complain,
But I do not wonder: By the end of the year I will Have my own house curled in a cul-de-sac,
And I will attend new classes in the evening;
All alone in a house with my dog,
I will drink rum from coffee mugs,
I will imagine myself with her-
And the world will be pulled out from under me like
A rug,
But I'll just tilt my jug and salute:
For the earth is bright in turning, like blown glass still Burning, and when I trust my poetry in the old-model
Factory,
I feel like Robert Frost, choosing the wrong path
From the two,

Until I cannot feel anything, and then I just imagine her
Lips embracing the apple of my neck
Like an adolescent hummingbird adulating in Verse,
Until I cannot feel anything-
And the sky is only the penumbra, a word appropriate
For our verse:
The last ride of anyone, the final car,
The body reclined in the back of the hearse,
The long hike up the smoky mountain,
The last sip of verse.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Romances Of Stewardesses

Oh, god of roller-skates- god of dragons,
I try to remember you in the park in Michigan with the Last light fluming,
And the children who are old enough making love,
After all of my light is done,
And the snow is finally down, and lying like virgins
Beneath the slide and merry-go- round:
And what quietude, what peaceful, secular midnight:
And what folly, that I've run away at fifteen-
That I haven't even kissed a girl,
And I am not done playing cowboys and Indians:
Oh, night such as this, barren, impassive night, where Everything that is successful is already in bed,
And I am left latch keyed and crooning- oh sorrowful
Wound, with another love lost,
And another alligator yawning- and a hateful place,
Just like that pitiful mailbox out waiting in your front
Yard- waiting for answers to swallow themselves
And your fingerprints,
As the little flowers bloom in the graveyards
That the explorers and the cartographers disappear into
And that become so large that they take up an entire State that we disappear into echoing
The last romances of stewardesses whispering of the Suppers never served up to their under deserving plates.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Roundup

Hoodlums of macho circumstance:
I hold up strong swinging in the patina of
All that high school's ego:
And I get involved with the jocks,
And especially the black men;
And the ginger alligators who are always squinting
Tears like blood.
Then I get a real gun, and the sky hangs down
All thick and retarded.
I get a suit for baseball and some gumshoes:
And a bat; and there are wings crisscrossing under the Moon,
The cypress is holding out some leg,
And Johnny Dillinger is passing by the window.
Sharon has finished off her own wine,
And Erin's first lover is playing his guitar:
Little girls are crying gleefully down their water parks,
As they go- Not know that their parents
Are just tourists,
Or from the forts of the sweet deceased that we have Been so philanthropic as to let them live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Time

And you will say that you have died
While it rains,
And I will not have a care, while Another god is blowing glass over
My house,
And you will come home to your man
Over the sea-
And I will have no luck for you,
Not even in nursery rhymes-
And it will be a simple matter that I cannot Describe:
While all of it continues to be in the Fevers of the dying sport underneath the sports
Cars-
While for a purple while, it remains beautiful,
Dying beneath the motions,
As witches tend to give their kisses to their Knights underground:
All of religion defeated but crying up for Something,
As the ants boil upwards as the kettle:
And the children swing on the swings,
And the waves rejoice- sumptuously, for awhile,
Until they have to return home again and Explain themselves to their parents-
But it remained beautiful, as it was,
Dancing across the canyons with the colors of
A flag I am sure I never worshipped.
And with a decency that was lost to all of us,
As the Indians faded in the mists-
And I tried to remember the last time the sunlight
Faded across the flowers,
Or the last time I tasted your lips.

Robert Rorabeck

The Last Time You Thought Of Me

Quieting in your night's appliances,
Dressed for auction, I think about what you can sell

Now:

In your eyes the uncton of your powwow,
Tiny little daughter like a gun or wishbone at your hip,
But your father is a flag of junked bones at the summit,
And you've never been up to kiss him with

You eyes open:

Step up and feel the naked dressing room of all those Angels;

It is where you belong, Sharon: And I am not lying.

This is just how I pretend to survive,

As some kind of river, bragging to myself as I flood with
All your children;

And your husband doesn't even drive a truck,

And doesn't know anything about my America,

How I can move my body thinking of nothing all day long

But your body from time to time, Sharon:

That is all there is: No God, but the divine providence of Your body suckling at the hip,

Sharon;

And water-parks in season and water-melons and the wheels
Go round and round,

Sharon; but when was the last time you thought of me,

Or looked your father in the eyes when he was not around.

Robert Rorabeck

The Latchkey Who Lets Her Out To Play

Rum and cold in the ice world-
All of it some lazy science-fiction:
Pegasus in the grander canyons above
Olympic unicorns,
Everything in the low altitude rivers
Of light winged traffics:
Scars like the Aurora Borealis over
Pet Cemeteries over
France
Or Michigan,
Or the birth place of my mother:
Colorado streets,
Where they invented electricity and wore
Pencil thin mustaches:
I thought to reinvent immortality:
But dragons were already smoking like hot
Baths in her bed chambers,
Clutches of stones wisped at by smoke
As if for bees.
They made all the flowers I'd bought for her curl up
Frisly heads like
Folding up lingerie.
The pinwheels like hurricanes like
Windmills never really clearing their heads,
The antechambers of busty,
Perfumed airplanes.
I just want to be gobbled up by goblins:
I want to be the plate Erin finishes, coming home from A long day,
As giant and beautiful as the sea.
She can fit right over the world like the earliest god
Has forgotten about,
That Jove locked away in my heart to forget about,
But I can be the latchkey who lets her out to play.

Robert Rorabeck

The Laundromats Of Her Grottos

More consistent mythologies
Could have my throat
But I am always in my little yards
So close to
And yet so far away from
Home:
In the aloe, I watch the stray
Cats I don't feed
Eating the echinopsis of Red tongues instead,
And I want for Alma,
But she will not be over
Today,
Because her husband stayed at Home instead;
And this is a gift basket
Of bad news
Thought of underneath the Common flight paths of
The most common
Airplanes who are hardly ever
Manned by Indians; but it still all
Feels quite strange to me,
And I don't even have to look away to know
How the candlelight burns down
The wax towers
Just to kiss the halfbreed lips
Of the saltwater princess
Who slips away from the water colored
Tourists, and is fawning right down there
Past the roses at the water's edge
In the Laundromats of her grottos.

Robert Rorabeck

The Laundry In The Clustering Aloe

All over the yard, I've placed my
Guns in the snow:
My mother is drying the laundry in the clustering
Aloe,
And Alma is somewhere close to here,
Gossiping to conquistadors while the
Airplanes fly so low to listen;
And the television breaks the news, and the
Kidnappers don't look so bad:
So soon it will be Christmas, which makes all of
The vanishing children very, very glad.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lazy And Sun-Molesting

The weathers of Corvettes looking into outer space:
While girls as tiny and brown lie in the easements smoking their Thimbling lips up into the sky:
As all of their uneven English is over spilled, and the bluegills
Surcease by the empty cages of sand lions:
And then I sit out underneath the clouds and become all of One color; and it seems I have to keep counting my most Unimportant change,
While the fairies who were in her armpits are over spilled-
And the candles in the hutches of little cabins no bigger than the Aspirings of patchwork dolls through the unhealthy mothballs
Of the canyons on her afternoons canyons fill with the Recesses of her libidos unassuming graves:
Maybe it was always like this, and always will: feeling my own
Cheek bones underneath the shallow estuaries of the burning
Windowsills: sometimes before this supposing or presupposing
I was beautiful: or just beautiful, but having to turn away:
Counting the numbers before they are colored, and then
Cooling as the song birds of my yesterday and my kindergarten go
Cooing with the sad tears of the watercolors of my latchkeys go Turning the locks, and jingling home again disappearing before the Red ants of the open and most insouciant mouths of the lazy and Sun-molesting pride of lions.

Robert Rorabeck

The Leaping Days Of The Seemingly Religious Aeroplanes

It's time for the dour lying seashells,
In ways to partake and fill the sky above the earth.
She used to tell me that there wasn't
Any use in this,
But I told her there wasn't any soul in correct
Grammar.
My mother is pouring water from the upstairs window.
She is completely naked, and I sneak in liquor,
And think of ways to toast invertebrates,
To remember the catholic church I watched her once
And then twice put on miracle plays;
Then she slipped into the nests of other boys.
Their tongues shared illegal substances on the verge of Holy romance with the silent crèches at the edge of
The parking lot, but I lived far away-
I had no time to romanticize their salty foreplays, but Stayed up late at night and thought of all the girls leaping
On airplanes, leaping like the sky held no gravity for them-
Astral pilots in navy blue uniforms and perfumed nylon
Which disappeared into the canopies of the unreal-
They knew all the worm holes that would take me back to High school, that would teach me how to feel;
Married now, middle aged, they hang their dime store haloes
From the broken wings of their gray daddy's bed boards:
Crenulated eyes which sometimes sleep off and on for days,
And they too remember the leaping days of the seemingly Religious aeroplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Least Of All The Littlest Things

I walked my dog's twice today, and saw
A blond haired mother walking her blond haired boy
So far away from the sea- They must have been sad,
But they didn't seem so:
They were in Southwest Saint Louis anyway;
And I didn't see any cardinals or hear any airplanes,
But I got underneath the great buildings near the Stadium; and I am watching the seagull and reading
Travel books by Auden, waiting for the solicitors
And admirers to begin,
For all my good friends to move in and kiss me with Their eyes, and feed my dogs, and pay my bills;
I am waiting to learn better words for better things,
Still hoping to learn to spell, for my deficits to regain:
Waiting for the resurrection, the bodily resurrection of
A sad poet slumbering away in Bellefontaine;
I should travel to her by foot and spill my wine around her Crypt and bare my engorged heart which beats with
The golden tracks of the congo of her dead lover: Rejected,
I wait for philanthropic patrons to discover my banner
And toss to me banquets of incomparable riches that scatter
All around the roadside, rolling under the wheels of cars,
And the shadows of the wings of airplanes;
So I might scramble after it, like all the rest, thirsting for My failures underneath the skirted outfits of stewardesses,
Beseeching them for a sip of their overpriced liquors
Which curl like ripe dew from the gleaming tips of their Perked bosoms; or the least of all the littlest things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Leaves Fell Like Rain That Was Dead

Color these leaves anyways
They are already dead.
I saw them falling out your window,
But they did not distract me from the ways
You were lying,
How your body turned naturally to the way
My eyes shone on you,
As if you were my mother or just someone
With her head:
And he lay there against you like a leaning
Clock tower, and busy made you instead,
Made his time naked beside you;
I did not think to catch them as they
Were falling,
To stick in your mailbox like a hint,
But I left my breath blown on your window,
As your eyelids closed like a music box that is Silent,
And the little girl inside it, what does she do
Once she is resting and quiet and put away again to Bed;
I would have wished to have lain there beside her,
Or hung there like wire,
But I took to the train yard instead: and he lay there beside
You, and inside did guide you,
And the leaves fell like rain that was dead.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lees Of The Airports

Cheapening in an amphitheatre outside of School:
The truants smoke the detritus of paper airplanes;
And they swim in daylight
Which glows like ladyfingers across the wild
Manes
That are neither lascivious or mundane,
But yawn there rippling like uncomely weathervanes:
And this is the stone amphitheatre we all go
To with the terrapin,
To watch them standing around gawking around the turn
Arouds and wash basins;
It happens to be under the lees of the airports,
Of the trees;
And we can sit here forever and let the hungry bees lick
The rosy nectar suceased from the rose colored
Glasses overturned at our knees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Leggy Stewardess In Their Warm Planes

Deep into the range of good intentions
The housewives slumber still beneath the evaporated
Ceiling fans;
Eyes closed for good measure, and children shut in:
The clouds of disbanded chimneys and Creeping Mexicans:
The cicadas step out naked and leave themselves down
The necks of cypress;
And get new skin, while the delinquents are rushed
Into the nowhere of their plans; as school is called
For rain- and the game:
And the witches float there over the baseball diamonds,
So rich and so plane:
I seem to have seen them there, calling with your eyes
As all of the forests were smoking green, distilled
Of unencumbered conquistadors and the windmills who Have really sunken in:
The sun a wind instrument you blow wishes in, pin wheeling
The virgin from her grottos, and causing the waves to Caesura expectantly,
Like early mothers in their warm hospitals, and the leggy
Stewardesses up in their warm planes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Leisure Of Housewives

Another dime store cowboy goes home
Into the haylofts of paper
Airplanes
And paper angels- and I can see the prenatal
Smiling forming around
The rose gardens of your lips,
The way vehicles of lovers foreplay in
The driveway after each others' children
Have become lost
Throughout the playgrounds of wolves
In their apathetic schoolyards,
And the sun spins its web, and steals the Colors of a lion's yawn,
Just as all of the usual allusions come
Down through the broken roofs of sky
And lie there like soldiers recovering
With the serpents in the mowed
Grasses for the leisure of housewives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Leonine Insects

They are selling everything half priced and the busy
Nurses have their backs pressed against the coral castles,
Their lips pressed like flowers drying in a book
By the men they have healed
At the business end of this peninsula—across this almost Sunken field—
Where the cypress grow like maidens bowing in green semicircles,
With the herons like gawky angels overhead—
With the airplanes disappearing into surreptitious triangles
Where the mermaids fused from monkeys and blue gills
Suppose that all must disappear:
The evaporates of ice-cream underneath even the most Propitious of mountains—
As the leonine insects yawn underfoot in the sunshine of their Sandy pits.

Robert Rorabeck

The Levels Of Brightness

I suppose that I am going to survive by doing this,
Dog tagged in the anonymous cenotaph,
Bled clean by so many words running together making Measureless landscapes that return to the pointed Jubilees of my daycare:
And if we both went up together to pan for gold,
It would still be impossible to come down together,
For only the traffic is now rich, and the previously quiet
Dells are now filled with the fast food pleasures
That we could both serve, tin suited and making
Goo goo eyes,
But when crepuscule finally licked the edges of the envelopes
That it was sending away,
We would both have to return home to our big daddies
And our Uncle Sams' who had us as good as cleaned:
And prepared for dinner,
Our eyes couldn't even fathom the levels of brightness
Streaming at last through our windows as the world Fell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Libido Of A Firefly

Filmed on the libido of a firefly,
The storm flared up as the lovers went inside:
After the honeymoon, and down from the mountain,
They thought to drown again underneath the moon,
But they held out of metamorphosis,
As it turned out nothing could change- their marriage
Didn't last, but it surely rained again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Life Of Another Boy

When the day is far away—and all of the laughing children
Have burned like candles into their moats—
And the alligator's eyes are as rubies instead of blind diamonds,
And you little sister's chicken pox recedes to the smells of Night blooming jasmine:
And your mother drives home from spending all day
With a man who is other than your father,
Kissing his mouth right near the reservoirs of albino crocodiles:
How will you crawl in to be with them:
What door or hole will you enter—and what macabre games
Will you play with the defeated knight you find in there:
Abandoned to all of the false reasons of your childhood
Underneath the ceiling fan—as the jasmine perfumes
The reptiles,
And a mermaid courts in the life of another boy of whom you
Are sure you cannot believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Light From Their Wounds

Chatreuse caterpillar upon the brown stem
Of Janie's nose—
Ever wondering if she'll ever grow up—
And what is the thing that she was made to be:
A stewardess upon a quest for the Service industry—learning to leap from Like stony wishes from bed to bed—
As sweet as chicken, hypnotized from Paris to Shanghai—
As I lay in my classroom listening to the tornado
Drill,
Waiting for the beautiful girls to come in
And to promise such sweet things to me—
A zoetrope of healing wounds—
The foxes laughing around the,
Drinking the light from their wounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Light She Has Stolen

Orchards upon orchards where she once lived
As the hurricanes pick up entire trailer parks and the trucks
Of her grandfathers:
She has had two children with him even though she Used to make love with me, until I got fed up and Went to China and found a wife:
And now, tomorrow, or the day after tomorrow, which
Is Easter anyways, I will have to go back to school
And pretend to teach a story by Hemmingway—
It is a frightening place filled with lockjaw and bleeding elbows;
And I wish you would have helped me,
But the moon grows and pulls up the grass, and metamorphoses
The tadpoles, with the light she has stolen,
With everything she pretends that she is.

Robert Rorabeck

The Light-Bulbs Of All Of The Ferris-Wheels

If you said we were both the prettiest ingénues in
The zoetrope of the gutters,
Why then we would be right here—
We would be a ring in your shadows—we would be Calling to you like wolves and like
Wolverines—and so
The thirst gives out—and evaporates underneath
All of the airplanes,
Until there is only the fabric of this clause—
A needing thunderbolt half-given to all of the weathers
That could not birth you—
As you become the movie-theatre of a color that Would not come completely to our tongues—
And we are almost home,
But here are still figuring out, like stupid horses into
The pastures of our ghettos—
And our half-witted thumbs feeling over the languages
That cannot be described by housewives as
They disappear by all of their number,
But then become awakened like stricken angels by
All of the light-bulbs of all of the Ferris wheels that They couldn't understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lighthouse

The lighthouse is painted nicely
In a coat of white, a tie of red:
Standing upon the rocks of many seas
Across the world,
A gentleman on the brink of emptiness:
Forever waiting,
His bride gone away in the palm
Of another hand,
The guests have left in their cavalcade
Of loyal American station wagons,
But he hasn't done a thing,
For so many years,
After he tossed the rice,
As the model relatives pass away,
And mothers die after their offspring,
Living in the basement at the sea's brink,
Her name touching his lips,
Like a vine budding on the tomb.
In the night,
There is no one there to heal his face,
As the wind is busy on the waves,
The sirens lure their men upon the cliffs
And he doesn't do a thing.
In a moment he will walk away,
But for now he is waiting,
Waiting to step away from the sentinel loneliness,
His occupation,
To join in the forgetful procession
And end the sobbing sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lilacs

They have their own rattle snakes in the shadows—
Just as every skeleton once had a tongue
Bespeaking of eyelids as curtains:
And feet with toes for a soft or horned road
Leading beside the estuaries of the university:
Then it is not a long ways off to find her—maybe in a canoe
Floating as if in pieta just over the rippling of Otters and stolen bicycles:
Maybe you will hear how the half-nude housewives
Call down to her—bare breasted and next to those orange
Trees up the burry easement—
As the horses sniff the lilacs and dream of drinking from Honeyed decanters—
As the airplanes make their patterns, lackadaisically
As so far above the mismanaged schools—just as they so Often do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lilies And The Rattlesnakes

How do you look here—colluding in your telekinesis
While your grandmother is sleeping—
Dreaming in a bed which pretends to be spread across
All of Africa:
And this marks her like the kiss of a soft tattoo:
As she streaks in the trailers of her husband—that professor Turned to marble by the penny-ante basilisk as
The lakes milk the moon with
Their fangs stuck in the boudoirs of her reflection:
They pull her down to them in a reverse gravity:
And the stolen thieves float closely above the graveyards—
Straining the necks of the lilies and the rattlesnakes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lilacs That Stood The Test Of Time

I haven't been laughing:
The racehorses are not pretty, bastioned as they Stand, gelded stockings
Prisms of last changes:
Clouds in the sky, cars on the streets:
The passing of ribbons, the pedaling of feet:
And in the park,
The play of pretty innocents skipping school:
The old rouses brushing hands,
Remembering the lilacs that stood the test of
Time,
Or the way their mother haunted them only
Because she had nothing else on her mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Limestone Of His Flesh

Pornographies, sisters of the sinister thoughts
Selling to the rattlesnakes
Already devoured by the road:
One of her spiked shoes already cast away in
The amber weeds: they are sway—
They are two high—
The traffic sounds like snow, the airplanes like
Sky:
They cross her and go into the parks of the Oceans—
They learn to fly. Beneath them, where the Sun rolls, the roads are made of shells crenulated
Into a skin shed from the giant she lays upon:
Her lips the basalt he nibbles, groaning with Rivers carrying in the limestone of his flesh.

Robert Rorabeck

The Limpid Sunday

If you can't see it,
The validation is in the lines;
At least it is meant to be there.
When I am walking alone in the Sweating south,
Amidst the rows of colonnaded sororities,
And not a single whimsy lass
Hangs out her balcony with a springtime
Sigh, and a thumping heart- a swoon;
I give the polished sadness an inward smile,
And I few beers later I am still alone,
But scribbling out the crooner's lips,
My cheap pen then the paladin's retribution:
And my love comes to me,
Scratching at my studio door, the swimmer from the pool
Perfumed of chlorine,
Bronzed like a seventies supermodel:
With the hairdo of a sandy dove,
And I smile because she is there,
And the cypress are framing her like
An apocryphal nativity;
Her nipples the gumdrops lost in the leaves,
Her eyes lined with tinfoil and blue spray paint:
She has a bed of wet fireworks she wants to dry
On my rug,
Undress and listen to comedy to cheer up the graveyard:
The unlined sensation of the places on her
Unshelled and shivering,
The naked crustacean out of the feminine sea:
Her lips the little knocks timid solicitors give;
Her curves the abandoned highways in Spain.
In the morning,
I can take her out just as she is,
And no one can see her in the limpid Sunday:
Up and down the sororities- She does not rush,
But goes about as I give her time to,
And when the boys come out- She does not crush,
And I give her a dime to Call her lonely mother, and tell her everything

Is going to be fine....

Robert Rorabeck

The Lindas In Your Eyes

If the children gambol it is because that they Are not really there;
Those children and their friends have all run off somewhere-
And this is my house where I've been smoking away in the woods:
This is where the green cataracts of leaves fall,
And the virgin sits fat bellied, embarrassed and contemplative,
Wondering what she will do until you
Come home to me, Alma,
But sit on the sofa and eat crackerjacks and watch her soaps
And baseball
Until the street lights turn on so controversially and you are not Yet home,
And I wonder with her on my blue bed when or if ever again
You will come to knock,
So I can let you in, and you can watch the basking shadows of An exhausted zoetrope fawning for the ghosts of mailmen;
And I can watch the Linda's in your eyes,
Because you are so beautiful you have captured them all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Linear Flights Of Airplanes

Now the day has a word and I
Feel hard pressed to travel to you,
Even though after I was done selling fireworks you
Said that we could only be friends,
Even while my cousin who is taller than me was pursuing you
But making little progress:
And then I broke into my own home and laid down with
The feral cats who were not frightened of me
As they ate the grasshoppers and garden snakes:
And there was a glass slipper there underneath the bromeliads
That could not be explained:
And looking up there was a ladder too- taller than a roof,
Hopelessly in a loverless math over the roof of Antique row
That someone of your lovers had misplaced with his ever
Giving chalice and his surreal antlers:
While in the back seat of my Mercury Tracer still lay the two Tennis rackets that we'd used to play tennis poorly on Some Tuesday not long before I took your tiny brown Body into the waves, Alma- and kissing your Mouth promised myself to you underneath the linear flights
Of airplanes: trusting me even though everything else was chaos,
And you couldn't even swim.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lines Of Clouds

Grooms of sabotage and lanoline
Combing the manes of the mythical creatures,
Stepping up to be touched by her in a queue:
The Pegasus and unicorns
A griffin and centaurs- gossiping the wrong way through Traffic,
Hoping to be touched by her:

A light at the top of the stairs,
Emitting the ethereal senses of elves and gods:
There she is appearing suddenly in the middle of the flea market:

Maybelline, coming to see me on a Monday:
Supine goddess, Mexican, with new braces:
She sits in the cab of my trouble and we gossip nervously
About the past lives of nerds:

Growing up amidst the privileges of the middle classes,
She is nervous amidst the dispossessed:
I tell them she is my wife and they believe me-
She is on a diet and makes fun of my weight. I tell her
I weight 270 pounds: she cannot believe-
She says that I look like her father,

And the fairgrounds carrousel. Nothing can be published here,
And it is too hot for her:
She is on a diet. She will not eat a quesadilla with me.
I give her gifts before she leaves-
The mythical creatures queue and beckon-

I sell two hundred dollars while she is near me and another
Two hundred dollars after she has left-
I tell her that this week I will make six times my teacher's salary,
And she asked me what I am going to do with myself-

Now it is morning, and you cannot find her anywhere-
She is back at home in Wellington with her unassuming boyfriend-
The flowers loom on her porch-
She still complains about having to buy privileges for herself,

But I can freshly remember the day she saw mythical creatures
At the fair- in the land that grew up far away from her-
And I wonder how she can be so dissatisfied with her beautiful race-
And about the sad trinkets she wears on her arms-
The sex bracelets: every time I have seen her,
It has been with another boyfriend-

Today I worked at trimming my yard- I cut down the overgrown
Bougainvillea, and with thoughts of revenge on my lips,
I cursed yet other things I could not spell-
But looking up from the dissatisfied hedge,
There was Maybelline grooming the boys in the sky-
And I wondered when she would be coming down, settling,
Kissing the lines of clouds along the way.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lingering Perfumes Of A Girl

My thoughts can hold no gravity to a vanished soul:
And looking down upon all of this graveyard and all of Her plots,
The breathless mouth is open, but what will it sing,
Like a candle shut out,
The words are dead fireworks for smitten holidays:
The housewives start out shoeless going to see the long-toothed
Lions,
And the moon is so over ripe it has fallen, and I can almost Smell her in my house, the lingering perfumes of a girl
Who I am certain will no longer move for me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Linguist

The heavy philologist is in the city,
Sharing eyes which chrome with god:
Each twitch is an entire sentence,
Each look a vociferous tomb-
Across from his dinner, the young
Women are now song birds,
Twittering joyfully,
Their sentences full of glee as they
Fan and comb themselves in the open air,
Metaphorically-
Each kiss of air siphons honey
Into their beings, a crematorium
Of great lakes, and when they stand
Up to walk away, their legs waterfalls
Of shaven and spasming flesh....
Meaning that they could run to him and Envelop him with a giggling thought,
Entwined in their winged flesh,
If he were a younger man, he thinks,
With unperturbed humor,
As he forks another dreamy egg into a bite.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lion's Insouciant Grin

Wound up in words of baseball
Trying to out pitch the laughs of witches
In the trees,
The pitchfork pines and cypress wound together
So that you have to squint through the failing lights
To tell the difference,
Like barbed wire wound about in the old fires of That neighborhood over the sleek canals
Populated by blue gills,
And all of the old choices of once pretty girls
Who ventured only so far from home; their story of A fable of what they would wear,
Baring their shoulders to the totality of sports,
Overlooked by the little brothers too busy folding the Paper wings of sightless prayers underneath
The ceiling fan to wonder or to care how far
Away they would have to roam,
While the sugarcane blistered and the pines combed;
But surely it was not far at all,
For already here is their wedding, their casting call:
Indeed, indeed, they are home again,
Pasting the lion's insouciant grin; and, yes, they have Everything: they have found it all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lions Roar And The Waterfalls Tumble

The glass is under the chair
Outside of the little house where my mother
Does wash,
Or keeps the books:
I don't want her to know that I've
Been drinking
Scottish whiskey or thinking of Sharon,
My sick muse
Out amongst the Palmettos.
Now I'm all warm and want to buy a
Foreclosed house;
And I am almost beautiful,
Not enough to make money as Prince Charming,
But enough to be Mickey Mouse,
And I love you,
And I love you and the night tumbles until it
Is dry,
And I awaken all cleaned and sober
With a full set of teeth and a wired jaw;
And Nicky lives somewhere very close
Saving all of her turtles,
But she wont come and visit me-
And the day leaps up pouring out of its mounds all
Of this traffic,
And even deeply recessed we buy and sell,
While I jerk off in a quiet well endowed symphony
To you- It doesn't take me much time,
And I am immortal and ready for a Chinese buffet;
But I don't want to penetrate you enough
To steal your cut flowers.
I just want to hold your hand and look your soul in
The eye
As the lions roar
And the waterfalls tumble.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lions Yawn And The Alligators Roar

Dog of smut and rainbows- waiting for you to Get home so I can drink
My last class through the unreasonable ballrooms of Another day of high school,
Just trying to save myself while the Orchestra sinks,
And the day's shadows proceed over the ant hills
And baseball diamonds,
While really meaning the same thing with all of its stuff:
And I remember you
Even before I knew who you truly were- I remember you
Through the somnambulating amusements of
Ferris Wheels,
Or through the haunted daylight of pet cemeteries-
While nothing that I am is truly beautiful-
And even while none of it has to ever turn out this way-
Even through the fieldtrips to Disney World,
I will always truly love as if you really were- and if you
Cannot recall me tomorrow-
I will love you the same, as the lions yawn and the Alligators roar.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lip Of The Canal

Hammers in a circus
And little girls with blonde hair: see which way
They are moving,
Notice how they care- lackadaisically through the Midway: see how they proceed,
While the apples lay rotting in the pastures
Gone to seed:
See her red lips in the playground, or her thoughts
Over a rosy sea:
There she is remembering alone in a classroom
That has abandoned me:
See her there at the elbows of a unicorn:
See her there in the pornography of a rain forest-
She is all of midways, of cotton candy-
Of praying mantis:
So they have painted her on the walls beside the Wheels and the missing buffalo- they have given
Kisses to her under the pool that the sunlight
Made into diamonds
That the housewives sparkled around, gossiping
As the alligators listened attentively
Underneath the many airplanes
At the lip of the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips Of A Fox

They are selling something to the black men,
As to the doors the step, and in their colors dimmed-
The swing-sets emptied behind them,
And the airplanes flying stiffed winged through the Rains, over the overpasses
Where the flea markets are sleeping, and my words
Drool out as if from a shell of a sleeping terrapin:
There he lies pressed to the lips of a fox
Weaned off his vineyard,
No longer dreaming that the stewardesses will ever
Come down to him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips Of Fine Gentlemen

Clowns inside the spirit of the indoor theatre—like Housewives spread across the backyard pools a mile away
From the sea—
Like diamonds spread across the mirages of a desert—
And their time comes every afternoon—
And when they look up every cloud takes their vision
As they remember the Alamo
Or somewhere else they had to live for awhile
When their mothers were not home but went about kissing
The lips of fine gentlemen on the other side of the television—
And it sparked our interests for awhile
As the forest fires burned—and the airplanes leapt like fireworks
Skipping through the ashes of the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips Of Infinite Jest

I told you I loved you,
But that was a teal lie.

Now lower your guns,
And reach for the sky.

Because naked we're born
And naked we'll die.

I'll undress you like
Stealing silk scarves from your bones.

Its been a long time coming,
But its time to go home.

Let your eyes kind of swoon to the side,
On this yellow mote, an elevator,
Which we'll both ride up the sky.

The sun is the thing which will Burn all the pain.

At the top floor above even rain,
There a suite with both yours and my name;

I'll take off your clothes and put an End to the thing;

Because naked we're born
And naked we'll die.

Anytime now you're going to know why.

The end of the song is the best sort of rest,
Flying like birds over coffins,
The lips of infinite jest.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips Of My Bed

Resolutions of fairytale metamorphosis
Happening like the orgasms of a thimbleful of dreams:
If Alma doesn't love me,
She has never loved; and I work all day long for her:
I work seven days a week:
The forest streams like rivers,
As the traffics brush her cheek: and the animals run through
Her wilderness:
She collects her youngest child to her chest,
And the lips of a love that no longer comes to her,
Suckles at her breast,
As she counts the candle tips of her tears- as she returns home
From her daylong work:
The porridges of her loneliness are either too hot,
Or too cold,
But they continue to lie down, like fish out of stream sleeping
In her bed; as I famish for her,
Like a thousand thoughts of windmills dripping from
The lips of my bed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips Of Their Daughters

Rum moves through this body; it puts the scars to sleep
Like anchovies softly breathing over the flesh:
It gives girls I know lighthouses to feel with valuable clothes,
And it brings other girls to them like sailors all shampooed
In the washing machines and their caesuras:
And in the middle of their fieldtrip of good smelling caracoles,
A rock garden on an island under a golden moon:
A rock garden filled with lucky rabbits and their mothers,
And rattlesnakes that don't care to move; and little blond boys
Like the vermilion shadows of who I used to be,
Before I knew or understood any beautiful young girls, or Tried to steal from them all that they had to see: And all around
The rock garden a forest so new that it really couldn't be said to be,
But like the blueprints of white shadows leaping fast above the Sea,
Like a playground swaying this way for you, and that way for me;
And the words on the bodies who are not there, but who have evaporated
From their seats in class: their eyes wandering the forest of this Albino overpass- Where orchards live as neighbors in fleets so sweet
And strong, and even the girls on airplanes passing through the sweet
Smelling bowers, telling thousands of stories as the candles burn,
Just so that they don't have to sleep at night with other kings: Just so
That their lips can put the night away before the night, and make daylight
An ever living thing: The squid of a captain over the seals and dolphins,
Over all the muses who have crippled my pen, areolas weeping like
Ukuleles for the lips of their daughters, just as for their imaginary princes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lips To Spell

I will put a place on my body and then
I will die—mouthing off
Eventually to the full moons of the estuaries
That eventually have to move away—
And I cannot hold a grudge—
And I am moving slowly—
And the place is a slow dream—but in it all nine
Children of the dragon and the places
And the gardens where I will Certainly be married—
Into the quiet places of the stewardesses—
Into the quieted places of our times—
And then an echo: just an echo of
A dime or a penny falling down into the fallacious
Lips of a wishing will already over-spilled
With so many things—
The trinkets of the - and the souls we Couldn't sell—as we left all of our coins into summer—
As we've been spilling away our memories,
Locked up in prison—
And into another harmony that pretends to be so
Well—through the bastard diseases the wickedest of
Airplanes—
Apostrophes and commas and all of the misplaced
Conundrums
That our English teachers had to grow the lips to spell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Liquors Of My Unconditional Will

Maybe if Erin had discovered a baseball diamond in Time and had learned to love the resuscitates of taking things off
In the choking redness of the earth,
Of covering the fullness of her breath with sleeping ants and Arrowheads,
Maybe she would have found me out in time, and my love wouldn't Have died for her:
And by then all the rivers would have flown in to Arizona, and she Would have picked her arc for our children:
I would have sent her another house's worth of flowers;
I would have swept her off her feet as soon as I saw her on the tarmac,
And I would have made her wear jailhouse stripes so that all the jailors
Should have known that Erin should be my wife;
But all of this I'll never know-
Now the rippling flesh of the men Erin has known in place of my Bicycle breath, grows hoary; it doesn't even grow roots, Erin:
How many men did you let put themselves in, when I was thinking of you,
My pain swinging over the peaceful beds of a cemetery;
And how did they make you feel, squeezed up and pullulating
Pressed like a music box to its windowsill:
My yellow house will be empty until I can find another woman who, while
She has time, learns to drink the liquors of my unconditional will:
But Erin, Erin- this is something that you never will.

Robert Rorabeck

The Liquors That You Sell

I am empty as the bottle is empty.
As the shell is beautiful,
Look at you; you move as the bicycle
Moves,
Around those neighborhoods,
Caracoling mountains. Even the osprey
Are jealous.
Like them, you didn't even get to name
Yourself,
But look what you have become;
The sky follows behind you like a net of Surprised fish,
And all the men their and their airplanes
They follow you like weather,
Like intelligent or needy cumulous,
All impressed by your stamps, how you
Have budded after school
After all the fairytales of television have turned Off;
And I am waiting for you too,
In a house like a room without any furniture
Or books,
Waiting like your father while you are weeping
In the carport of amphibian incense,
Waiting so you might come in leaving all your Sunburned boys howling at the far end
Of the cinder blocks,
So that we too might burn like building incense;
So that we can return to each other those Things we have forgotten, which our classes and
Our other loves stole away:
I can put your meat back inside your auburn bones,
And you can fill me with the liquors that you sell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Little Fish

The little fish wounded in sunken university-
How they hold their sides
And wait for the brown eyed mermaid who never Comes;
And they say woe is me, woe is me gurgling.
While above their heads the heavy feet of pacaderms
Unsettle dust
As they pass in a trumpety caravan in a straight
Row through the tremulous plum trees:
And I have scars you'll never know, you'll never Know, and I imagine how well Gainesville proceeds,
Proceeds
But the brown eyed bar maid never comes.
Maybe it is because she knows I will soon die anyways,
And her bed is made
So she must hasten to the firemen's soiree-
I don't know- I don't know nothing about her dreams,
And still the crimson and vermilion airplanes go
Leaping, leaping straight over me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Little Picassos

When you are cleaned then look into my eyes,
And every part of your body which needs not hair,
Has not;
And you are wavering like a liquorish store,
Red hots, and bicycles trying to recreate their Own sundogs beneath the sun on the concrete-
Your body pressed like a flower into the book
Of my body;
And all the alarms ringing,
The church bell ringing- the rivers like freckle-
Faced truants stopping to listen;
It is miraculous and the birds are singing.
Your body is like marble engrafted into my Papier-mâché, and they are letting the little Picassos
Out from art class,
Maybe the world is taking on it any of the forms
That we just might be choosing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Little Puddy-Romeos In Their Sideshow Cavorting

I have all these scars inside me
Which no one reads;
They come out when it rains and play the Trombone;
They skin their knees,
And sometimes they like to pretend that
The clouds are made of bones,
Like drunken conquistadors,
Which is one of their favorite words,
Because they too have their cherished aphorisms,
They delight in such jobs,
But they are lonely and dwarfish;
The world is too big for them,
And they don't wash, but crowd up amongst the Grass in knee high socks,
They put their spider-knuckles to her windowsill
And pull up, grunting,
Wanting to see what it is she's up to,
The little puddy-romeos in their side-show cavorting:
They always want to do this, and they pretend to See her watching her favorite sitcoms,
Instead of just the usual shadows in a cave;
The house they made for her so empty it's whistling.
Her brazier drying like a silky weathervane out on
A line outback the row of shotgun houses;
Everything is made of paper, and its crinkling-
They do not understand that everyone here is so poor
That they've left their homes, and yards,
And moved into their cars
Where they now sit all-together rusting at the blank
Drive-in movie theatre not so far away from here,
But far enough that she isn't real,
And her effrontery but a set they lie out in getting heatstroke,
Waiting for the mailman,
Who comes bearing bags of confetti,
Thinking they look pretty;
But they are not getting paid, licking their chapped lips
Under the heedless kites and other things which have Half-way escaped the truer convictions of gravity,

Like butterflies who are so slippery as to shoplift
Almost anything, who have entirely laid-off migrating,
But mostly aren't very real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Little Things That Can Almost Kill

Tonight feeling the tiny coral snake's gargantuan breath
Seething like bobby pins underneath the unearthed titanic:
That thing called sky or like a witch's spell
Unspecified; and it almost seemed real, the way she was Stepping out of the trailer and down the cinder blocks
And into the trailer parks where he waited with her daughter:
Or with her son-
The flairs of open roads that killed all of the libraries,
And the infantile tombs that sprung up like weeds:
Her eyes were as blue as the death sleeping in the clitoris
Of wildflowers;
And you know what I mean, because you've traveled up and Down the spine of the Mississippi calling out my depths beneath
The arches and burial mounds;
And I've forgotten all the things that pretended that they couldn't Bleed:
You mother and father had a nursery and a house that never slept,
Until they separated and tore you in two with your monthly paper cuts
Down those weary steps:
Your toenails painted for the saints of Christmas, and all of my mouthing-offs failing you, drawn like insipid water from the venal wishing well:
There sleep the snakes in wonderful balls, reflecting in the light from Your pail carried close to your chest;
As if they were there now, whispering like animated pictographs
Never forgetting to let off gossiping of all the little things that Can almost kill.

Robert Rorabeck

The Little Towns Of A Little Earth

Young knights as green as scuppernongs hung on
The bowing fences of weak professors:
So low that the fable becomes completely disavowed,
And Satan in the form of a rood cross takes Eve underneath the school buses, yellow and bruising,
She says his name like skipping stones in a canal
Which takes the place of the wisdom of a dictionary;
And all the nights are lost,
The foxes and zorros are pot bellied from having at that Wine,
And they laugh atop and maltreat the head stones of
The gloomy cemetery where they have their fun, jerking off
And telling jokes
Even while the suddenly living world broils up all around them,
As if out of the mowed grass itself,
And is cantankerous across the little towns of a little earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Littlest And Youngest Children

Beautiful fanfare gone into the luxury of the night:
We take wedding pictures
As the flashing carnivalesque light bulbs of the fair disappear:
They are going to the rodeos of new towns
To fill up the hearts of emptied spaces—to bounce off the crisp
And amber lights of colleges and universities hours north
Of here,
Where the trees grow deciduous where the airplanes are Yet young and leaping,
And the housewives go out in the middle of the night to see
And find them,
To weep themselves out of their own homely occupations,
But then to go back inside again,
To take off all of their clothes and to bundle themselves
In salt and sweat—to dream of Christmas trees
For the Holidays of their futures—
And their littlest and youngest children trying to carry themselves
Away using the apexes of their swings—
And into a beautiful fever that has nothing else to believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Littlest Makebelieves

In a whispering melancholia the night tells
Its horses
There are no more sanctimonious orchards
To steal—
To climb and smell the little white flowers—
To see the bottle rockets
Shooting off over the chicken coops of Disney World—
And when the stewardesses return home,
Effervescing headily into beds,
With their blue socks stuck straight up
Into the air—
Their dreams have no more rooms for Boyfriends—
For in their limbos are avenues of nightmares
Underneath the sea—
Little boys steal into with their games of
The littlest makebelieves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Littlest Of Kisses

In Faberge bodies spring to me out of quinceaneras'
Bonfires who've had at talking a lit to hotdogs;
As if from across the great surceases of juvenile gazes,
And those canyons where all the best bouquets
Evolve,
And the wild rivers flow: down into the stoop of cinder blocks
And into the alcohol of missive aloe,
Where the premature faeries spume broiling in lies over the Unlucky and harangued toads:
Where too the dogs have ganged up in the rabbits and taken Away the last of his luck in the rock garden amidst all of the Echinopsis,
Like corsages in the cacti: as the borders of rainstorms
Spill over, pillaging the forts, and turning the sky as green
As the memory of the languishing valleys where in your first Home nested,
Alma: and all of the snakes and the fables of their lessons who Waited for you there,
To rise surefooted and start out again through the schoolless
Day, I don't know: but I pine for you as if across a table burning its Alcohol, asking for you to give me at least the littlest of kisses
When the valleys come again in the morning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Littlest Of Words To Anyone

An explanation or a critical interpretation of a lost child
Who my wayward uncle called thick today,
While I unloaded the peaches and said my prayers,
And thought of my father and Alma,
Like two separate constellations, one I would like to worship,
And the other to explore and Multiply: But I have already traveled so far across the suburban
Heavens, drunkenly, to sleep on her roof,
And watch the static and semipermeable dreams of helicopters
Who never come down, like little boys as misfits, until They are out of gasoline:
And the beach is long, and my back is warm, and once gain it
Will be morning, and the people will come out of homes
And into cars in driveways,
And seem to evaporate across the world again, without feeling
Much remorse, or saying but the littlest of words to Anyone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Liver

Mostly it's the liver involved.
He takes one for the Gipper.
He boos the pretty boys wooing from
Their stalls,
He comes home late for supper-
I let him ride the bankrupt amusements,
And pet the one-trick pony-
He fills my heart with grain-
He goes on distended fieldtrips clopping
Through the intoxicating rain;
I suppose he's made some fine deliveries
Though they've been mostly fumbles,
A bachelor of my home spun ilk carving
Trees as they burn, noting paper while it crumbles;
And I've sent him out again,
Or he's run off to join the carnival,
Lilting as he goes, tossing back and mumbles,
Swearing he's still in high school,
Nodding off under the palmettos: Awakening to
The silken calve, he follows like a bloodhound
In a rumble:
And when he's finished and as hard and cold,
As smooth as a skipping stone, I take her reluctant
Hand and drag her to the memorial,
Because he was a fine a soldier as I could ever wished.
And he'll be rewarded a purple heart posthumous, because I drank like a fish.

Robert Rorabeck

The Livings' Wake

Review these dead men
Down the anchor's linking line
Thrown overboard from Captain Father's everyday reprisals:
Listen to them sing,
The muted sea shanties of hungry men,
Wanting women to spoon feed them
As they dredge the bottom
Of the pastel fonts.
The fish of every size swim in
And out,
Taking what they can nick
Without getting caught
In the skin which flutters
Like garments caught in briars,
Fondled by a burry wind-
In the swaying blues and greens
Is where they hold on,
The sun is a smothered instrument
Yellow fingers play across:
Everyday they are being pulled up,
Introduce to the gulls' loud cries
And many are shed like
Loose scales under the crank man's grind,
Yet when there is a slothful day
Lubricated by the rums of Nasseau,
Eagerly the chain grows more knobs of men,
Down below the obvious waves
They cling onto the umbilical chord
And continue to swim in
The livings' wake.

Robert Rorabeck

The Local Public Zoo

I will soon be a tramp who flights towards Nothing,
Drinking his alphabet liquor and weeping weeping:
Oh, the age old tire swings creaking and repeating,
Wondering about the ratio of whores to Housewives in the world:
Oh I love whores, the ones who have turned out the way that They should because they were always up to no good:
Oh, I love you women, your otherwise saturnine
Nights, the wimple of your stars and your tattoos and how Your eyes don't fawn on my bruises like
The retarded lips and eyes of housewives: Oh, how I love you:
And pay you my good money underneath the soft and Otherwise translucent bellies of the crimson airplanes:
There they go leaping again like foals in a mainjure,
While I as drunkenly as in my childhood reach for another
Poetry book,
When just before now I had Melody straddling me and it was Almost her time to get on home,
And there was a hurricane warning before the President drove Through town; and I got my brains and maybe a heart,
While all that was courageous curled up next to the velveteen
Lions of some paramour who was claiming to be a very Vermillion mermaids enraptured at the local public zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lonelines Of The Heavens

Children in the stars made to touch kisses-
Outside of carports,
And housewives watching footballs games in the rain-
Other words I don't know-
And other movements that remain unkind to me-
Memories of unwrapping presents for
Christmas-
The very moment before Eucharist,
And frog princes waiting to become kings-
And if you saw her in Pieta: maybe your mother, or maybe
Someone else just as beautiful you know,
How would you linger there, beside the ball parks and
The high schools,
While the busses turned around to the smell of
Popcorn- and what would the beautiful girls you never
Truly know say to you,
As their memory slipped through the banishing echoes,
And you tried to please yourself in the loneliness
Of the heavens using any way that was left to you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Loneliness Of The Brightest Daydream

The day is doing what it does, no maybe
In its brightness, the sky a half an egg-shell
Nested in its orbit,
And the greater and lesser lights produce
To me those things which hurry in proximity
To the other and then away,
When sparing they sing, combatants those
Jubilant bodies, and yet so much is wasted,
Spilled from gossiping lips until contaminated:
And I sit here severed from all society,
For half a decade maybe longer, but do not Mind, nor her, that the grass grows unattended,
Nor have I procured a profession to magnetize
Lips of painted gypsum, in all the varieties of Chance; I have already spun my coins in the Dark room, and those I have touched lay well-
Fed, as they should not remember. Their breathing
Is the earthy sound of hibernations, and when They saunter off to drink, they are no longer wary,
For beneath all of this daylight there is a deeper spume
Which sates us, a well that springs unwary of the season:
Here, our ancestors unincarcerated in fluidity, swim
Just outside the brightness of our daydream,
And once the song birds are done matting,
And their empiricisms molt from us, awakening we Will find that open bath where the bodies of possibly Interlude, where fingers crease the constellations, and Each voice is singing together all the loneliness of the Brightest daydream, which finds me now still unopened,
Limbs draping the bedsprings, posing muddled philosophy
To the integrations of grass and weeds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Loneliness Of The Heavens

Children in the stars made to touch kisses-
Outside of carports,
And housewives watching footballs games in the rain-
Other words I don't know-
And other movements that remain unkind to me-
Memories of unwrapping presents for
Christmas-
The very moment before Eucharist,
And frog princes waiting to become kings-
And if you saw her in Pieta: maybe your mother, or maybe
Someone else just as beautiful you know,
How would you linger there, beside the ball parks and
The high schools,
While the busses turned around to the smell of
Popcorn- and what would the beautiful girls you never
Truly know say to you,
As their memory slipped through the banishing echoes,
And you tried to please yourself in the loneliness
Of the heavens using any way that was left to you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lonely Gifts

The lonely gifts,
We spring sometime
After April when the rains
Have finished watering, and the sun in God's meadows about his knees,
Wakes us up,
The lucky drifters in turns,
Half of us the flower and
Half of us the bee, unaware of
The greater chaos,
We are the beautiful mechanism,
Our frequent pollinations bring us
Together for several days, as stamen
Brush pistils, the men carrying the children
On their legs from lips to lips, as Early morning thoughts drip the Dews down her milk-white petals,
Just for a few days,
A full season for the luckiest,
And then to end all too quickly,
As the earth casts her head down,
Causing the leaves to shed the forest's
Sadness,
So our season ends its bloom,
Our colors go into hibernations
As our gentle gears come to rest,
Bees sleeping forever upon the flowers'
Open mouths....

Robert Rorabeck

The Lonely Girls

They said in the pornography of
Tomorrow
That the students would be highlighted
And fill up the highways
Built for them-
Bright emptiness over their Disproportionate bodies-
Always grooming- strange lottery
Molting through the hallway,
And the girls like living dolls fighting
Against the vortex-
Brilliant elbows, prisms of
The garden of Eden-
Not even one of them holding out,
Going with the currents of the middle-
Class heaven-
Nude windows without any curtains,
And tomorrow comes
Like a graveyard singing-
Like bobcats whistling for their very lives
Trying to find the immortal castle
Through the blinding armories of
The queen's rose-bleeding garden- prostitutes
And the lonely girls left out of the pages,
Sleeping with the tortoises through the weekends
Of broken down school busses-
And the angels, who lose their faith,
Flying lower and lower, expecting to find them
There and befriend them like lovers you somehow
Failed to mention.

Robert Rorabeck

The Long Collapsed Windmills

This happened over the pledges of the wanton beating
Of my heart:
Each beat a shedding of drear coinage down the wishing Well where the ghosts imagine they are bleeding-
Tearing with words that pretend to be beautiful,
Imagining that they can last a long time, an in each pitiful
Sob a metamorphosis, a new beginning-
When they are already stains in a forgotten bathroom:
All of their goldfish are stolen and tantalizing
The sun and the cats in the sun on the windowsill-
Each with a silken heartbeat that will too soon be dying-
And the ghosts blow like banners, and like tears of
The long collapsed windmills
That sink further and further into the world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Long Slow Syrup Of A Stare

I can go out today, and I can drive a car:
I can say many things to the wind blowing there over my car:
I can put my eyes on the world like fruit on a table,
Go mad or stay mundane;
But the world will just know me as I ought to be to him,
Transoms of windows of chicken coops:
The yards the esplanades that go up to the front doors of houses
In their colonies,
The sure fits, the sorbets: And this morning I got down on my Knees and at least lit the pilot light in my new houses,
So the gas burns
The light house: I watched another man take a woman through his Door last night,
And he turned and looked at me with the long slow syrup of A stare,
But she never once turned to look at me- she held his hand as
He took her somewhere.

Robert Rorabeck

The Longest While

Wear out the breath the sea gives to the cities,
Wear out the stones the chameleons think on turning red,
Wear out the mountains looking up her airy dress,
And put me safely into bed....

These are the conditions the armies give for surrender,
The unmalleable truths I wear on my face to block her out,
The fathomless weary trees whose coats are draped down
By the steady hand,
While the mothers turn an eerily blue from their shouts....

The prominence of adulterous sky in sunny weather,
And the hidden avenues where the bold and heartless traipse,
Even if her apartment is up some stories from the infant river,
My hands were a wreath for a hollow door until they lapsed....

Banished, stored in the silos of my husky cheeks,
The burnishing warmth of a new tooth and the mother's smile,
Removed her clothes and laid down on the second floor,
And didn't think to turn again to me for the longest while....

Robert Rorabeck

The Lost And Frightened Traffics

The bodies of flesh always fail:
It was what they were made to do, like seahorses doing somersaults
In the brine,
Looking like they can last forever only to be dashed on the rocks
Like the all too ready tears of virgins,
And now I know someone that not a single one of my major professors
Know,
And I profess by her light, though I am too busy to write novels to her
Right now:
I want her for my spouse, to live and sleep in my house,
And maybe that is what will happen,
After I get back from fireworks and before Christmas:
Maybe her family's burdens will be lifted,
Maybe her husband will go away on an over long and over zealous
Journey,
But otherwise you should not get your hopes up,
But keep singing your songs for the empty canvases and pastures awash
With her favorite color,
While she keeps her face up towards the clouds, and so becomes the Eagerly frantic butterfly who is just trying to make it above the Eager butcheries of the lost and frightened traffics.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lost Tears Of The Most Beautiful Of Women

Up in the attic of redressing conifers,
I cannot help but to imagine what we are going to Sell today,
As all of the stewardesses yawn and open their
Eyes,
Redressing- winnowing like spry cables that leap to
The skies,
Their hairdos toasted with marmalade and romances
By the
Buzzing specters of the enamored glades:
From which the alligators are sure fine, and lethargically
They are sure to bight the hands that feed
Them come picking time,
As the roads all get thinner and more out of work,
And the songs about them harder to remember, the skies
More clouded:
Soon there will be rain enough to discover where the Extinct Indians are buried,
Under the tollbooths between the caesuras spending
Their Sundays saddling atolls:
It seems that they had strange romances with the conquistadors,
For they both sleep together in the salty fevers
Decorated by the flowers of orchards who have soon lost
Their way,
As they come over the forts of coquina, and flaunt in the Shadows of the overpasses in the underwater flea markets
Drowned by the lost tears of the most Beautiful women to ever have run away from Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lounging Of My Greedy Eyes

I am building muscle and wasting time,
While the sea has decided to through a bowl of wet
Fruit out her car door: It rains, and there are no customers.
The 150 watt light bulbs glow like blue collar workers
Punching in their time: We have enough that when added
Together and divided they will cost us 8 dollars a month.
My dog is in Arizona, jump-yipping, far away like a fairytale
On the moon: I have used him to pounce up from the Cracker-jack crevice and kill the hording dragon who Said my name before he died, and revealed to me the name
Of my sister down in the white cataracts, down in the busy
Tombs, always falling and leaping like a circus without form:
And I loved her in a way I shouldn't have,
And I delivered Christmas trees to her front door, as books
Wilt and fade over, become damp and mold-ridden; the same
As the names of the women upon them, the bucolic lasses winnow
Wheat from the fields, in that bright sunlight folded up and Dog-eared in a country far away, covered with my fingerprints
And the lounging of my greedy eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Loveliest Of Stewardesses

There seems to be a song running along itself in a dark
Cul-de-sac,
While I hear noises: some of them my own,
Playing out next to the sea that is going away, spilling
And roiling in the catastrophes
Of the unalarming cenotaphs—until a fresh wound
Can be seen pulsating brilliantly in the sky—
And the last headhunters echo—
Continually—after the girls have already vanished—
Sped up and become the brilliant plagiarisms of
Another anarchist's classroom:
The day speeds by, fed up by the inebriations of the aborigines—
And another professor makes room
For the hidden masturbations: this world seems
A joy as it thrives away—further and further away from
The childhood where your little brother died—
As if even this fallacy could seem to be part of your memory—
Until over the stars the constellations of the anatomies of
Better placed animals were reawakened and sang to themselves
Underneath the broken down school busses
Even as it rained and the loveliest of stewardesses became Reawakened.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lovers In This Bay

Chainsaws buzz like bric-a-brac,
And so the traffic swarms:
Little white boys are angry that a black
Man will be king,
And so they cry out, but the multitudes
Do not echo such mutinous sawing:
I suppose I love them, but mostly her:
Dear God, she sings to me:
All my life she has put the sunlight into
A reasonable equation,
Even though I just read her, and now
Watch how she halfway poses for a photograph:
Maybe I am being unreal, even as tourists
Step out in meaty séances for the invitations
Of the lions' coy grinning:
Their cars are left empty, like coffinous tombs,
The air-condition voluptuously droning:
The savannahs are not real, but tennis courts
Grown over with languorous weeds: Where will
The rich go now, with bodies out of style:
This she reads to me in meandering streams,
Her motions changing with Heraclitian whim:
I stare at her as if between the wrought-iron of
A centennial graveyard: The side of her face is Scarred like mine,
As if something handsome has caught afire;
aroused, I wished she would Think of me through the gown of thoughtless cells,
But such a whim is an unnecessary salesmanship:
I will grow to her in little time, even as the apple
Tree quivers, and the knowledge falls loose,
Shaken so from the serpent's horrendously fetching
Tail: I loved her, but that was only high school,
And now she opens her blouse up to me part way,
Like her smile, as if I should touch her
Even though the distance is infinite; it is cleverly made,
And thus on this impenetrable shore I wait for her,
Eating everything until the horses are but bones,
My body quilled by so many arrows that the joints are

Harrowed, and cannot move in time or Keep up with the lovers in this bay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lovers Of Purple Airplanes

Oh womb, the color of Purple coins,
Lying breathlessly in a husbandless
Carport—
How the rainstorms sound all
Around you,
The slight inflections of a town
On the verge of metamorphosis—
A beautiful dungeon in
Your heart,
While your eyes are in love
With the echinopsis—
The katydid strum their diseases
And then disrobe themselves of
Their old knights,
As the bottle rockets forlornly
Strive skyward,
Wanting to be the lovers of
Airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lowering Planes

It seems the penny ante accord of Indians all covered
From the brushes:
They have been combing their feathers preparing for
The ambushes—
And the city lights and the waves proceed—
The schoolmarms blush as they figure out how
Their children can succeed—
And in the waves, effervescent—and in the Carnivals of other waves—
The glass-blown seahorses—and
The upset mermaids—
The times that they get lost from themselves—
And in their tumult of snow globes trying to Pretend to be housewives—
It is a penny ante succession—
And in the daylight it is like a zoetrope's procession—
And when it is gone, the wind hollows the weathervanes—
And when I think of you,
The mountains paint themselves like the severest majesty—
A royalty of shadows perpetuated upon
The lowering planes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Luckless Heroes

Why—there is a tomb:
In her shoulders, in her hair—
Either way, it is where
I must go to find
And save my love, or at least buy her:
In the super market—
At long last,
She will look up and see the heavens above
The overpass:
The sea will part like diamonds going
Toward their favorite terrapin:
The heavens will open,
Luck will win:
There is a graveyard in all of her aspects,
But with the promise of a hereafter:
The stewardesses prefer their bedrooms in
The cerulean rafters,
As the knights make their bed in the madness
That they must make surrender:
Kissing their talismans—as she eyes her men:
Wondering which of the luckless heroes
Will win the day to become her
Rightful husband.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lucky Pennies Of Goldfish

Don't sing while listening:
This is the empty cage of my body-
This is the husk of my pretty
Song bird
Thrust like the coal of a present at the footsteps
Of your door:
Oh- lo- don't sing for these pretty amusements
Anymore:
While another day comes up through the Chimneys and bagpipes
Of tomorrow-
While you've just been whistling and singing
For your supper again
Through the traffic, just as against the waves:
Don't try to become beautiful
Anymore:
Purple enigma underneath the sun: sour bruise
In its cathedrals of starving children,
Just as in its special places in the world,
Find me out
And bight off my tongue- There is a feral child
In me,
And she continues going through the motions,
And this is just my inebriated fire for her
In the stagecraft of a prefabricated
Highway besides or beneath the impenetrable sea:
This is just how I've been drowning, anyways,
Just like the lucky pennies of goldfish
Swimming around the racetracks of the overturned
But still live giving Christmas tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lusty Young

I imagine she used to be
A stewardess
But now she just floats around
The Christmas tree
And takes her top off
As I drink rum.

The penumbras of the ceiling fan
Moat our holidays,
And we don't make a sound;
And yet we move
Just as cunningly as bush-hunters
With our pantomimes
Of the lusty young.

Robert Rorabeck

The Lyrical Loon

Unbutton the stars,
Because I don't care:
Disrobe the night's gown
And let the sky hang bare:
Climb down your own hair.
There are little children living on Mars, without any air;
They do this with great care,
And stare at the fish just floating
Right there:
On her wedding day,
Was she thinking of me,
As the conquistadors crossed
The jungle to the ancient city:
Was there gold, or just death,
And did she count her breath,
As he kissed her and put on the ring:
Then didn't they stomp the glass,
But all of that is just the resonance
Of the odd jobs that have passed:
Some other girl now,
She does her nails, and wishes for Strong men at the beach,
Making sandcastles out of lunch pales-
There is someone that she loves,
As she tips her glass,
But its not me, not me;
So, unbutton the stars,
Because I don't care,
Disrobe the night's gown and
Let her pale shoulders hang bare;
We can all love who we love quietly and true,
If we love at all then let me love you,
And in the secret night, gowned all in black,
I'll unbuttoned the buttons sequined in back;
All the way up the tall tower, your tomb, I'll climb,
And kiss the mouth in your
Most secretive room....

The Mad King Has To Take A Pee

Here is another century of suicide
Before I stop to play the game:
I am Peter Pan flying in his basement
Waiting for rosebud to delight my tomb:
Too soon I will be busy
Teaching children to fly:
But your eyes will still haunt me,
Even when I've saved enough money
To buy the Spanish Armada in their century:
Before they are destroyed by nature,
I got you this and sent it to you,
And your excuse is that you thought
I was just being friendly,
And you are a strange liar as
I imagine you naked in bed:
You should be the only one who reads
These impoverished lines,
Because they are all that I know for you,
But in kindergarten I knew your name,
As I drew it from the lottery:
You were supposed to be my wife,
But you asked the teacher for a second chance:
I brought flowers, tulips stolen
From my parents' market,
But instead you walked away as if
In a sort of Spanish trance,
And changed your last name
And your street address before I Could find you again....

Robert Rorabeck

The Magician's Palm

Caffeine has me up, while they make love
In another sea, spilling vocabulary words
I haven't memorized: the piano plays behind
The unmowed grass, like minutes of sunlight
Trying to wade through
The crocodile's eyes: how lovely is his hunger,
As he eats the neighbors' dog,
Speaking Egyptian in a movie I am too tired
To understand, but this is an immaculate will,
The children lined up and salivating anticipating
The red play of the ball. I wish I wouldn't Stutter when I woke up to tell her good morning,
And made her runny eggs, a fine meal on Porcelain in the current of light, the white angels
Hiding naked behind the curtains, so clean,
Like tennis players, and her left breast haloed
In her insouciant slip, like a pigeon in the magician's Palm, cooing areola of yawning flesh,
She said to me, I suppose, she said to me with her
Eyes, she was bored, and wished she had something
Meaningful to read, or his strong jaw to rest upon,
Like an insect ready to molt and change on a tow of grass,
But then she wasn't looking at me anymore, her
Freckles redolent though disinterested; I fell into them
Like a child leaning over a deep well, curious as to see Himself in her eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Maidens When The Lords Are Not At Home

If your body ever really yields and counting
Backwards it was revealed that we were made out of the Same fabric
From the torn flags on the defeated battlefield,
Then how will it make you feel that I have seen your house
When you wasn't home;
And I have seen the park where your children breathe like
Butterflies over a crop that has yielded what it could yield;
And I already know your car:
Your silhouette- seen the tattoo on an N on the web of skin
Between your thumb and index:
Maybe it was a compass for a man; but all I know now is that your body
Roams sleek and golden,
Your eyes as big and lustrous as creatures who crenellate
The apertures of the seesawing tide:
I have been up to college and down again, while you remained
On Cherry Rd flushing, a bride in every aspect of her landscaping;
And all I have learned is that I need to steal you away again,
To bring your children into our home,
To make breath atop of your brown skin, to enter into your home
Stolen to my home,
The way some green knights kiss the maidens when their lords are not
At home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mailboxes

I have tried for so many times to sound beautiful even while Suddenly the zippers close;
And the body bags have their tags and the traffic slows to take out the Jubilee;
And Sharon knows how I feels: Sharon knows that I am a poet,
Even if I am unreal:
Long ago, so long ago while riding in my parents' car, I wished that I could be beautiful for her, even more beautiful than she should know;
And I wanted her hand,
But the strange earth was blue; it held its breath, and she went to college
And all of the night long it was one great hullabaloo:
And now all of the beautiful woman have strangely beautiful children,
While I am sure it is some sort of heavenly espionage;
I still have all of my teeth, and these are the same canals;
The days go just as sleepily across so many sweltering brows;
But these housewives who were once my lovers have many powwows
With their husbands who for all I know may once have been their brothers,
And the mailboxes are always filled by somehows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Make Believe Girls

They were selling all of the pleasantries to look
At the moon:
Up there were the trophies of her stolen gifts
Which made the foxes pregnant
To come craving, leaping from their dens-
Who made the truants breathless through
The juvenile mountains:
Purple throated, holding back their songs until
They were bruised- the clouds above them
A thicket of pale roses growing over
The make-believe girls buried up there
Who were never abused.

Robert Rorabeck

The Make Believe Promises

The artificial nursery clouded over, and the sweethearts
Of the workplace stopped holding hands:
She went back to her children, stepping on eggs-
And the basket that he set for her remained at the lip
Of the well:
The trees waited too, barebacked, and the sun rode Golden through them,
Kissing their necks, bringing to them the rumors
Of soft fire, the daydreams of the arboreal classroom,
While birds made love letters in the sky-
She, at first, got pregnant by another man: and then
More and more pregnant- the sea was deluded,
And there were too many airplanes in the sky:
People kept on moving into her neighborhood, only to Go away to work, and then to come home again,
And little boys who were not hers disappeared onto roofs
In the middle of the afternoon, like blind fireworks without Any holidays;
And she sat there, never mindful, the pool rippling
With the make believe promises that were somehow made
To fit around her without any life at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Make Believe Tombstones Of A Graveyard

Homeless men there you are, sweeping the road,
High in the alcoves of the liquors you find,
Pirouetting as you do in the noon time traffic:
I wonder if you've seen the entire country and tasted
The tears of its Siamese oceans:
I wonder what you have done, like loose change
Discarded by the existence of those who can't Be your peers:
And I am too lonely to be like you, except by the Fires of my insouciant inebriations,
While I call out to you like panhandling, like a little Child looking up to a wiser brother through
The make believe tombstones of a graveyard
Set up around him,
As if those were the things he was meant to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Make-Believe Cathedrals

Your faces go down: faces dissembled
Across the mountains:
Well, I havent been singing for you, anyways,
And this is just my rhyme on the flat land:
And you havent been her bothering me,
Anyways;
And maybe you will make love to my cousin
Before the kites are unfurled and I have Been here so long across the land of just because Before you were here anyways:
While your children were startling, barefooted
Before the fort of the anemones:
And I've begun to cross myself, while all of what You've imagined has started out breathing through
The shallows of its anemones, while
The bridges stretch and glisten blindingly across
The bridges of its anemones:
While, otherwise I figure I've been unfaithful across
The shallows that impart the uneasy or the Intractable skeletons of which have come so
Easily before us:
While then in the uneasiest of forest you fail me:
You banish me anyways, and all of the knights
Clash anyways, and it is a beautiful if unspelled
Union, as the mountains seem to coalesce and kiss,
Or at least come together for their weddings:
Until it was all together a funeral, held together
By the willfulness of some truck to which the Butterflies stuck to until they were into the forests
Of Mexico again: and all of their candied fables
Fell away again into the mouths into which Already expected again:
And it was all turned around, and made to wash basins:
Until their spindled manes tended to flow over their Glass blown cathode-ray: or, until they tended to kiss
And make up,
And to start, arm spreads across of all of the make believe Cathedrals once again.

The Make-Believe Heavens

Even if I lose my job, I will have new sorrows
Here waiting by the spring-
Pristine curling reservoirs gossiping with the water snakes
And the things who float here as slow
As girls who think their name is Mary-
The sun will burn until the walls of heaven hop like
Eggs,
And the clouds around them will make a camouflage
Of something we will not even think to see for Days and days:
But you will come strutting out of your orchard,
And down from your cinderblocks- and kiss and bless
The earth,
And think new and preemptive thoughts
Until the boys who once were your brothers are kidnapped
Across the street- and you go home, barefooted,
Remembering how they left you to play in those woods
Across the cenotaphs continuing through the streams of A nude transparency-
Running in a hidden avenues beneath all the Sunday
Blue lights of Churches which you enjoyed arcing under
On the swing sets that seemed furtively to take
You away, while the moon and airplanes mimicked
You like candles dancing to and fro in the make-believe heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Make-Believe Playgrounds

Developments in circles of amusements—
The same yards we've known together,
Separately—
The sun lactating from its greatest jubilation
Over us
Where the lions yawn like breakfast—
And no one thinks to even mention to look
At the grave:
You are a virgin wearing a summer dress
For the first time—
Airplanes who are attracted to you
Like a wishing well that haloes you with its Elements—
And you stand in the middle of where
You are
Next to the waves where the remains of
The conquistadors are your cenotaphs—
Waiting for the closing down of all movie
Theatres—
In your body of prisms stolen from the
Make-believe playgrounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Malingering Of Your Perfumes In My Dysfunctioning Soul

I've climbed forty of the fourteen thousand
Foot mountains in Colorado,
Sometimes four in a day, past tree line
Where the rocks gossip in a lightning storm-
I've heard them;
But who knew I was ranging all around you,
Like trying to cast an esoteric spell,
While you were busy drinking and selling wine,
Being pollinated in and out by your chosen
Man- And it is a beautiful town in you live in,
In the valley where nothing can be killed or Rearranged- While I've run further away,
Checking my drafts to reassure that I cannot spell,
Letting it trail out behind me as a sort of Perfunctory Will; and now I'll have bad credit,
As I have bad skin, but I still live in a dream-
A dream sometimes of Florida, and sometimes
OF Colorado, and sometimes right here-
A celibate invention I keep to myself, sleep
Walking with my dogs amidst slash pine and Standard bred horses, often pretending that you
Come at night to lay with me,
In the morning leaving nothing that could be Ascribed to a fairytale, but the malingering of your Perfumes in my dysfunctioning soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Manless Cannons

It hurts that your pain is gone from my day,
While the cataracts still dive across the banishing eyes
Of cars;
The puppy moves in your lap little tears:
Childless, what will have to prove, when the day is over,
And the motel occupied,
The beds spindled like pregnant mothers or Hippopotamuses for
Christmas,
And all of the countries left; the sweet savannah deployed,
The blush gone from the jungles,
And all of it is the question moving on a rush through the Orange groves,
While the fort lies abandoned underneath the infinitely
Magnified clouds,
Green and building, waiting for the manless cannons to Hearken.

Robert Rorabeck

The Many Canals

It is easy and I echo:
I've been plowing my field, and now I storm:
I look up into the stars of many fields who are not my own:
How many of them have been playing baseball,
But what is the use to sound the alarm,
Now that the witches are in the sky, belly up, counting the elbows
Of chalk,
And there isn't anything else to move: the planets are in their backlots
Showing no shame,
Marionetting for the damsels who are truly, truly to blame:
And I am drifting:
Drifter out of all sorts; all of my diamonds on their own fields, showing
Just the shallowest curtains while the blue gills hold their own
Breathes,
And the tenements come, accumulating their numbers: none of them
More humble than the sum of their women, and the airplanes
Arise, filibustering like longwinded fireworks:
They arise like sideways monuments to their own fields:
They groom themselves, and then they lie naked in bed except for their Elements:
And they await for me- across the many canals skipping in their Fairy tales: they await for me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Many Lives Of Inconsequential Things

It so happens that the places that we go all turn around,
Like gawkers smacking their lips at the fastly shooting umbrae
Of fireworks in the Skies- Both over Mexico,
As over America, and the truck stops in between where the Cicadas take off their early springtime
Of clothes,
Like stewardesses unhinge their bras in the springtime
Of Wisconsin,
Or in the warm layovers of France: while all of this has had its Turn at speaking,
Caracoling like little girls playing in the fitful elements
Of another Midwestern storm, that overturned all of the trailer parks
Like crowdads in the muds the dogs have been sniffing,
Their snouts toweling
The vulpine industry because that is how it works- the trees
Like a cerulean headdress around them, or that the sky-
The benchmarks of terrapin like spilled milk under her heels as I pushed my muse on the swings near the sea
Months ago, far across the many lives of inconsequential things that fly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Marble Roses Who Are At Hand

I love you anyways, even if you've been cavorting at the Fruit market with my cousin:
Even if you will blow away, like the flights of airy blue:
After my parents have all but gone away
To their horses:
And I am down in the lonely gutters of my bachelor's ditches,
Anyways:
And you could never understand my dogs: while all of my Kitchens clutter, and then you can stand beside your sister
And sort through the strawberries of my uncle's
First love,
While all of the airplanes get folded in their best ways and Then fly over all of the shoulders of our churches; and it gets Really busy and all of the rooms get filled with you
Favorite colors, and your gods seem to sing from all of The shoulder blades on the rooms of the grottos where
I have placed them, as the dogs run after the rabbits,
As the foxes leap after their grapes,
As the boats leap through the lakes,
And the runaways sleep underneath their swings,
And the dead sleep in their lakes of graves, anyways- hoping
Yet to find the marble roses who are at hand in their luke warm anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Master

Bare naked,
My family ran screaming
From the woods and
Tore down Rome.
My sister
Killed the Emperor
With her own hands,
Laughing.
Shortened by a head,
We shared from his skull
Imbibing the stolen fruits
As Beowulf and Brecca,
My good friends,
Torched the fields.
Then I did not know
Who kept History:
Italians have always been
About the Big Show,
But the day was ours,
No matter how the
School books read.
In the chaos on the streets
I found her,
The woman without a name.
Years of incest had Made her beautiful but weak.
She said she loved me,
But those were the only words
She knew.
I took her North with me all the same,
And built her a home
By the stream that flows
Down from the gods' plateau.
I was good to her,
But she was a slave and could
Not change.
She said she loved me,
But those were just utterances
From her lips,

And not understanding why I
Didn't shave nor wear metals
From the earth,
To signify myself,
After a few years she sailed away:
She went with the last wave
Of New Immigrants to America
Long after my ancestors had cleared those fields
From her window
High away in the city
She decried them and blasphemed my name:
A slave,
She once said she loved me,
But those were the words
She could not understand.
Homeless, but too busy to care,
I pioneered the Earth
Nameless to the Big Show,
But, all the same, doing it all,
Unwritten, a griot's son,
The master.

Robert Rorabeck

The Match-Head's Dream

I've eaten two hamburgers and a piece
Of chocolate cake. I watch the yellow
Dog nuzzling the trash. She would Make a strange raccoon,
But I've already fed her too well
For her to stay up all night:
Which is descending like the curtain of
The diurnal stage now just a shell of orchestral blue
Over the forested cliffs in the southwest,
And one star, or airplane.
My parents are in Louisiana; they've Picked up two hitchhikers and are taking them
Eastwards because they want to see the ocean.
Right now I am hungrily scarred,
But the food has dulled the pain. I am
Sated like a bear, or like a less jubilant
Octopus when it goes to bed beneath the Coral, ink sack full and unafraid.
Right now I could dream of dimly lit airplanes,
And the stewardesses serving drinks,
Putting on a smile, showing a little bit of leg,
Leaping to and from the thatched webs of light
From overflowing and boisterous cities,
As from my peripheral vision I can see the Snout of my sleeping dog. I don't drink anymore;
There are no clouds outside the window,
And next month I will be selling Christmas trees
Again in South Florida, the forest fire of my Dreaming diminished to a single match head,
But it still burns,
Dancing slowly like a feminine memory
Creeping warmly closer to my fingertips;
But I will not put it out, the little bit of pain,
But will lay it down and watch what it will do
With the rest of its extinguishing life.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mayhem Of A Fairytale

Imperfect as the knights hanging in the crepuscule
Of witches trees,
Shading off in the yard while she bubbles and completes
A spell,
And her folklores become evil and all the more powerful:
And then there is a good game of baseball
And some words spoken between classmates in the falling light
Of another birthday:
The quest is laid off instead for dinner, or to watch the Celestial catastrophes that are too far away to ever
Be real for any of us;
And she swoops into the air across the harbingers of what was once
The delights of the sky above the park in the daylight,
Fornicating with wayward kites,
Making fireworks out of misallocated paper airplanes:
And in this way she never comes down,
Caboosing with airplanes, fingering the clouds, and into that chimney
Of worlds she goes,
Up and upward like a vineyard into the mayhem of a fairytale that Never has to close.

Robert Rorabeck

The Meadows Of Her Dreams

Powerful disfigurement: ants under the microscope
Looking as dissimilar as my father infinitely alone with
All of his horses,
While the storm comes, surges:
Yes it does, floods: superheroes drown, unalarmed,
Over-bloated bellies smelling like five- o'clock fires:
Places to find nothingness,
Boats in the bathtub prancing around for another make-believe
For tourists,
Cornices upon the bank of teepees- silent prayers going Down her cheeks as the snowmelts- asphodels weeping
To die,
Sticking their heads above the crumbling asphalt above
The rickshaws of moaning trees- filing away
In the splendors that repeat for the door to door salesmen,
And then the best of it storming away,
Ending up in the grottos of unpersonified loneliness,
Like the unadorned orchards that are pony-less,
But never fail to lose themselves crying for her
As they slip down the meadows of her dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Meadow's Stamen

How mariposas got to Saint Louis
I doubt even they will know: even I flew so swiftly
Away from there,
Forgetting to visit Sara Teasdale's grave and no longer
Caring about Mark Twain,
But tasting some of the salt lit carved into the fair heart
Of whatever this country is for awhile,
And swimming with my dogs,
And never even expecting that I would replace myself
To Florida,
Back to my old home south of Disney World
And fall in love with Alma,
Crooning to her while eating the young of other birds
Like some sort of Cardinal out in
Some sort of thunderstorm over a pet cemetery at
A baseball game,
While all of the publishable authors colluded with Themselves
And put on in their walls the swell art all over their Classy shindigs;
And then all out before them the latchkey children game,
Singing of their game shows and cartoons:
They came pulling their red wagons just the way
Cheery stewardesses pull their airplanes
Through the sky, and congratulating themselves even while They were deified into the pinups of Aristotle's most Proletarian rings; until they all settled down
And got married so they could picnic like milkmaids in the Wheat and the barley and beneath mailboxes and churches,
Opening up their baskets and singing
While the butterflies mocked them, even while their hungry
Mouths, smiling, licked the homeopathic monuments
Of the meadow's stamen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Meal Of The Third Fitt

Prelude to sleep: I lie down with my dogs,
In this strange answerless room, at the end of the corridor;
Where, after dusk, there are no further motes, nor rhymes
Or bells: Holidays proceed us, decorating the scars all of our Mothers know us by, and my dogs howl for them,
Well just the little one, but he does a good job; and if she Were here, he would leap up to, and smell her perfumed crotch,
And get rid of the foreplay for me, so we could just get right
To the real thing, the meal of the third fitt: How our hero
Survives by his betrayal, and then how, after church, all we can See of her, is her shaven leg crooked out the car door, the Air-condition beaming, as we reach up and consciously mask the Watermark where the liquor kissed us, but all of that was a dream
In the rich layer of the wedding cake he feeds her. Soon they will Both be out of money, but will have each other as long as they see Fit, for now they are driving away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Meaning Of Their Words

I don't remember how I started out
Almost drunken from the boat, diving to Save that pearl,
The sun a parasol all through the school day/
We made love from the bed where her
Children could hear, so I bought
Them things
As we waited for a hurricane that was supposed
To arrive in five days,
And the other housewives called their alley cats;
But it would not rain underneath the overpass,
So they held their flea markets,
And I sat on the occultish greenery
Of our ancestors with my coloring books,
Trying to remember how I had found her,
Or how tadpoles metamorphosis into the meaning
Of their words.

Robert Rorabeck

The Measures Of Feral Elements

Pummeling, tremulous:
The sounds of fierce eloping- the tragic existence
Of all parts starving,
Eating all at once- the planes diving in opulent pristine-
While the girls are working:
And even your girlfriend melting away on a fieldtrip
From high school
Finds unexplainable reasons in the parks she fled to:
Where the bicycles lay down
And are covered by the molestations of sunlight;
But forever the constant roaring-
The graduation of bodies and their modifications up
And down the highway-
Always mobile and newly exposing
The weaknesses of their endangering presumptions:
Because there is a graveyard waiting,
Down from the bricked houses, and the tallow ignited
In the churches:
Restive, like something concluded: resolved
To lay there peacefully under the measures of feral elements;
And the busy world commutes atop of them,
Ancestors all in a field lying down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Meat

Fibrillose like a centipede and counting backwards
From the laundry or the arcade,
Following the bred crumbs and the beer cans until your Hair was yellow again.
And you were just a freshman emptied into his class
In a school that was just finding its legs,
While cicadas skipped themselves discardingly amidst
The over red blooms of the bromeliad
Outside by the archipelagos of landscaping where the Bicycles hid
And the grass was mowed just as orderly as housewives
And they had firedrills that took you outside so you could Be all by yourself until the pretty girl who played
Soccer who you would never make love with Came over to occupy a space near you, both of you bared
To the sun- underneath an important sapling
Until you skipped school to go to Spain and Michigan,
And the fair came around selling you the caesuras of unnatural
Haunts that seem to give you angels, only to Indian give you
Back to yourself, until you became an echo
That resounded with the spent fireworks of an obsolete religion
Rising and dying repeatedly like an orchestra of red devils
Playing baseball and the meat of your own hand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mechanism Of Your Moving

Lords of parks and football games,
The new girls think you sure are sweet.
Then comes lightning,
Then comes snow. Saints are struck down on their Camel's toe,
But I still liked you a lot: I dreamed in class when I
Should have signed the x,
That we invaded rare countries, and pine forests,
And got special gifts and lime disease:
Invention for you was as plebian as birds or clothes
In the wash:
The clouds came and called you boss.
The words came next like hungry chickens and I soughed
For them my abc's: they ate them up like tapioca pudding,
And I flipped over sixteen times consecutively at the Fair, at the zoo:
We ate astronaut ice-cream, watched the otter sewing
Sweetly on the mermaid's naked chest;
But, Oh-damned girl, what I am doing? We ain't done none
Of that: Oh-shuckeds, Oh-damned girl you floated away
Before I could pull you strings, to see and smell
The mechanisms of your moving.

Robert Rorabeck

The Melted World

Goddess, call me over to dinner in your
High basins, and I will drink your liquor, for it runs off
You as if you were always in the Spring,
And now you are laughing with your daughter while
I am lost in the woods, but don't think of me:
I have been lost so many times for going to high up,
And touching the backyards of god where her clothes
Were drying:
And I have had fun, even if I am dying: while this is your Youth, and she is looking up at you through the melted
World
That is colored by her eyes by which she has formed you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Memories Of A Forgotten Storm

When her eyes lifted,
We got lucky with the storms-
In the night,
We brought the power to the worms
And the houses shifted in the sands-
The way lovers lay across one another,
And turtles drift in the tides:

The moon looks into her window,
And into the mirror of shells.
Children go to school with scabby elbows.
They are making a kaleidoscope of expected dreams.
They come together like raindrops over a teepee-

The plains are destroyed by the wildfires teared
From the mountains,
But when the great bear opens his eyes,
All is calmed, and the buses find homes,
And the concrete hums altogether with electricity.

And the moonlight is a distant memory-
The stars cannot be seen-
Even though the movie screens have shed their Pornographies,
The way cicadas undress of skins and knights
Upon the melaleuca trees,
Our first loves no longer remember our names-

And the night is a pavilion for the teenagers,
Some of them believing that they will never have to come
Home.
The trees are distending into the shadows,
Arms as tangled as those lovers-
Those who made love together, welded into
The memories of a forgotten storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Memories Of A House

Let's give a ballpark figure when
I look into your eyes over New Mexico's desert—
Who truly was defeated in the Alamo?
I have a girl in my class who claims to be the Great-great ought great granddaughter of William Travis—or someone—
Forgetting about her, lets think about your Ancestors, the mestizos who learned
Through rapine joy how to love
Without fanfare or much attention—
And your uncles, even now—how many of them
Doing landscaping beneath you, surrounded by
The seas that give fallacio to this peninsula—
And you were kind enough to say you loved me
How many times—without loving me,
Or thinking much about it, but coming to my bed
Because I brought you gold and could make love
To you for over an hour—
How your ancestors defeated her ancestors in
The bitter part of that war where some land was Being annexed to something or someone—
But it was I who truly understood that it was
You who was being stolen—
And you were that prize disappearing,
Vanishing like something never truly given with Everything I was hoping to be transformed into—
And you will awaken tomorrow
And the sunlight will fall upon you—
And the horses will run around you—
And your uncles will climb their ladders to pick
The highest citrus alongside the necks of the busied
Highways—but you will never have to think of Me again—neither must you recline in a Pieta
For your children—you hold them right there before
You and they are not in any kind of danger—
And the light is soft and gentle—
Even though the memories of the houses you cannot Remember are filled with hanged men.

The Memories Of The Forgotten Prairie

Life is not about facts,
But about becoming cold-hearted bonfires—
As the moon delivers itself to the feral
Cats on a platter,
And my wife stretches herself
Across the living room
That we share together, our baby in the castanet
Of her ribs—
And all of my school children
Gone to their various tinfoil grottos
All addressed in their make believe epaulets—
They seem fine this way
Or in whatever way that they are—
While dogs do not have to shave
Underneath the moon,
And pilots do not have to shave—
But the rabbits disappear from their Magical hats beneath the moon
And other things—
Words that dissolve and become the Magical roman candles for
The seas that forever believe that Cannot forever exist anymore—
While the graveyards look pretty,
While there is nothing left to save—
And the moonbeams shimmer,
And the blue cats remain forever
Above the memories of the forgotten prairie.

Robert Rorabeck

The Memory

And what an illusion—the things that smile
Just as the sun gives off the rays of a crocodile—
Smooth embers coiling to the flesh
As angels go to greet airplanes:
It is their wish.
Their father son has cast them down as tears,
Like sadness cast away—
They refract across the entire articulations of
The sea—the kaleidoscope of her freedom
That hides the memory.

Robert Rorabeck

The Memory Of The Definition

My queen- My queen of Guadalupe:
I am singing to myself, while you are sleeping with your Usualest of men,
In your kindest of houses, and I yet have an ax and a forest to Clean,
While the green lightest is still shining it vermillionest glean:
And I am all alone in my house,
And I am getting to fat, and I am breaking furniture and waiting for you
To come over,
Because it is yet not to late: I can miracle you, and make you become Uncontrolled,
We can ride rides at the fair with your children together while the lights
Go out,
While the airplanes there go off in their different directions,
Like fireworks of their choosing,
While the lions on their savannas still burn and molt like fire,
Like the diamond rings around your knuckles,
And while I give my breaths, I also give my prayers for you, Alma;
While Phyllis is in Chattanooga and cant find a job,
While you live on the other side of the airport from me,
While your children are gurgling like sweet wells beside you,
And I call you up and look at your face
Just so that I might recall the memory of the definition of such beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mermaids I Love Are Praying

Day is up like a yellow cadaver in a stone country:
Which is nothing morbid, if you know who he is,
A laughing relative still too happy for death, experimented on
By magpies and down here in the tropics, herons:
Long necked, serpentine, fishers with spears for beaks:
Well, I jog in the daylight of my morbid relatives:
I even exhumed myself quite speedily alongside the greatest Rush of traffic,
And I see all the nature that this semi-urban day has to spell:
Hérons and terrapins and raccoons going down to the hot
Canal; and the fish underneath the highway's windowsill,
And I have even prayed to girls who are not real;
And I have made a mess of myself altogether like a frightened
Tourist at his hotel,
And I have watched the processions of conquistadors
Melt like hot wax into a quintile;
But the day of my jaundice ancestor has always kept near me
And run like the yellowest of ribbons against my sun pricked skin,
And I have waited near the shady coolness all of this habitat
For him to stop dancing, and to go down once again
Under the bluest slab, and under the grottos where even now
The mermaids I love are praying.

Robert Rorabeck

The Merry-Go-Rounds Of A Holiday

Pretty as a nebula of an eye blinded by
A cane pole,
As mine almost was—while all of the skeletons
Got up to dance,
Clapping hands in one hellish hullabaloo:
What parks they could memorize—
What places they were going—over spilling roe
Without any sea
Or visiting ships—her eyes the scarless spheres
Remembering the merry-go-rounds
Of a holiday we were never meant to have.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis In The Clouds

Angels in a blue stream they make their Swimming pool—
Airplanes fly overhead with stewardesses
Like cousins leaping over
The housewives—
The daylight an ambivalent net of color
With otters swimming against
The backyards in the Middle of the school day:
I have seen them because I could learn
Nothing more
Than a few heated words—
The metamorphosis in the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Of A Banished King

Showing off how more or less corrupt I am
Than you,
I drink on my floor as I remember the passageways of Roadways,
And the sunlit calypso through the palms,
The baying of the dogs to the evaporates of the sea:
The strange, unkindling light that never reads
But somehow happens into weddings, into New Years
And resurrections-
The effortless houses up and down the street
Overgrown with the resilient promises who like cenotaphs
Bend and crumble overtime,
Replacing honeymoons with the hapless shells of Conquered knights and conquistadors
A witch's laughing echoes inside them, and ferns hang:
Tadpoles in their sweat,
And the metamorphosis of a banished king.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Of The Cost

I cannot go through this anymore- run away
To Michigan- see where the rivers come
From the things that do not exist anymore: you should Have gone away by now- the airplanes should
Have touched down, the tourists should have gone
Home, as the candles distinguish,
As the wolves light up in the nocturnal estuaries
Leaving their brilliant cadavers to sup the moon:
Dysfunctional brilliance-
The homeless men of the wall-less castles
Who burn fires underneath the overpasses who Leap toward the sea,
Or they lie there remember a thing in their yard
That left itself to walk away-
The metamorphosis of the cost. The ambulances
Came absurdly late, and left again,
Never wondering what they'd lost.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Of Their Darting Hemispheres

Words get illusions and before
Long they begin dancing around with themselves,
Like lonely winos sometimes after midnight
Upon tennis courts to close to the Sea and firehouses;
But of course they are not there, they were Never there, even as the beach is vanishing,
And the city has taken away the swings my Mother pushed me on—
That I was able to take my last muse but Never my wife on—
And nothing of those dreams have held over:
They have all been parceled out like a
Glowing cadaver fed to the true believers
Upon the last Easter of Jesus's resurrection—
And now the mermaids ride their aquatic Carrousels in slow motion and backwards,
Trying to temp the Grim Reaper one stepper
Closer into the metamorphosis of Their darting hemispheres.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Of Their Dreams

When blue gills sleep they dream of Feral dreams:
But they are always of blue gills in Blue gill streams,
As minnows dream of their streams underneath
The windmills,
Because that is of their streams-
Only minnows dream of metamorphosis:
They dream of blue gills
And minnow streams, but they see the mountain
And how the mountain dreams:
And they see their bodies leaping into her
And the sky- and they whisper to her to let it
Rain of their bodies,
And to let the sky be of their changing rooms-
To be as well of the metamorphosis of their dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis That Can Never Touch The Ground

Cannot you just imagine
This slugfest of the dynamos—even if the crickets
Are not saying,
After the baseball game has just left the Diamond:
And the gumshoes and sleuths are following
The sand of the beaches
Never imagining which way they are headed—
Never imagining what lies above them,
As beautiful as all of the weather:
Stewardesses high above them serving wine
As white as silver—
Women of the genie's harem bootlegging allegorically:
Them in their Siamese waterfalls—
Perfuming the vapor's bedroom,
Delighting above their sisters and the waves that Want to know them.
They seem to be all wanting the very same thing:
As the sky just tries to rub them—
And the men who once wished to know them
Keep trying to turn them around,
But they are too high above them—
And this is the metamorphosis that can never touch the Ground.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Which Happens In Our Peripheral Vision

They said there was a most beautiful
Chance happening just a stone's throw
Over her shoulders—
Until all of the baseball games let out,
And they hid the uneaten cotton candy
Underneath of her shoulder blades:
I could not say if she was even one of my Muses—I was too drunk
And not published,
But I looked into her eyes furtively—
The metamorphosis which happens in our Peripheral vision, though you knew me
As some sort of a teacher,
And almost an adult—
As the pageantries were flying over the moon—
And the unicorns knew that they would always
Be in love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Metamorphosis Which Sets In The West

Grown up in the shallow bays,
If your father's eyes were swimming, lackadaisical and Surreal,
You took comfort in your thumb and that this was
Your America:
Where did you go, so much further away from where the lions
Were roaring,
Almost close enough to pet against my ear;
And maybe almost every night the rains were dying or trying
To make love to the always and eventual sirens:
Then, of course, I surrendered,
And without having to have known you I gave you up,
Stopped using the metaphors that could have smelled of your Lingerie, quit trying to hang out with the prettier
Boys like the landscaping in their greasy rows-
College was a similar threat I couldn't even hope to attend:
That they were all burning upwards like paper airplanes
Infatuated with the gyre:
The plastic cowboys and Indians all looking up from their gunfights
And tomahawks in some glorious menagerie of reverie,
Come stains on the green carpet of their habitual prairie:
And nothing I have yet to say has been anything more than A beautiful lie:
And I saw a foreclosed house today that had its own condemning room,
An apiary; and I thought of you and tool boxes,
And the cuts on my leg- the little wonders of wonderful things:
How many times I have spilled my seed into the dry throats
Of this worrisome mobile,
I don't know; but getting up and doing it and going to the movies,
And wishing to know better words for it like starlets,
Like girls who stayed up all night and showed their legs like birthday candles:
Now it is almost like I am absolutely young again,
And headed out into the fistfights of California, or the high topiaries
Of Colorado,
Where all the tourists in their family sedans turn belly-up down in
The roots of the séances of them dusky mountains,
Like oil drums alight for hobos under the repeating airplanes:
And I never have to think of myself alone next to you once more,
But just to touch the snow,

And see a girl like you walking away in heavy hallucinations,
Believing that too you looked as if to be in dreams I had Thought couldn't possibly be real;
But then you were just what I had paid for,
A hotel whose door lay open wontedly letting in the mouth
Of this obsession with snow beasts,
The metamorphosis which sets in the west, rises in the east.

Robert Rorabeck

The Middle Of My Little Neighborhood

Hard cut are the loins of fireworks:
Ripped right through the paper middle, thrown by Paper boys
On their routs through the trailers in the trailer parks:
As loud as dogs to the rusting
Windows-
The joy into which they are thrown, a beating heart
Cast over the middle of an empty sea:
While buses wait in the turn arounds of school:
Little pinhole flowers grow,
And the super markets breathe- slow motions truths
And faults- peppers of sunlight and shade,
Make truanies with another boy who will Soon separate from me into common manhood:
There they go,
As the lion's yawning mouth is filled with silver grasshoppers;
As I pretend to be doing something good,
And the sun jumps over my little house in the middle of my Little neighborhood.

Robert Rorabeck

The Middle Of The Night

And if I were dancing drunkenly
South of Spain,
Would you catch me in the New Years of that
Country and across
The railroad tracks
While it all has to happen to us—
In the venal enterprises of the mail men and our
Mothers,
Whilst there is nothing left that is beautiful
That we have left to say—
And yet the sun comes up over the mountains—
Luminescent daydream of a movie theatre—
And those who are the oldest of this country
Cannot stop with their busied menstruations—
As the movie theatres play their daydreams on and
On with out them,
Spilling their gossips out onto the catatonic streets:
The open throated estuaries that wait all
Night for their own throats to be
Filled with baseball and the pollinations of witches—
Until the wind has caught and she has finally flown
Above them—
Casting her spells, she is now a stewardess, something
Respectable if only slightly above minimum wake:
But she has nothing to fear—
Eventually the mountains will weep,
Sending their lactates and melted ice-creams down
Atop of her—
Answering all of the unanswerable questions—until it
Is very, very late in the middle of the night—
And I am guessing that it is finally alright to go to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Midnight Sky

Fastening to the heirlooms it attends,
Going out into the streets after the make-believe Fireworks and climbing up into the family tree:
What is this to happen here,
Beneath the astral bellies of all the airplanes sinking in,
And the rinds that smoke up from the wimples
There- the frogs singing in the drainage,
Encouraged from their metamorphosis as tadpoles,
That they will be princes by and by:
And paper ghosts kissing me at the elbows,
And paper gods celebrating at the table of stolen
Light the moon holds and by it entertaining the midnight sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Midnights Of Our Quitting Times

At all the dead ends of the dead-end dungeons,
The dead girls are doing porn:
They are becoming the erotic photographs for all of the weirdos.
As all of the dragons are shedding their horns:

In the sky outside, so far above our heads that we can make-believe
It is all of the heavens,
There is thunder whose flinted claps spark lightning above the drunken inns,

The mermaids are canned into their fishy grottos,
The jinns are jammed into their horn-rimmed tins:

Grandmas and grandpas are sleeping in all of their graveyards
Across the highways of our lands-
The cows have crossed into their pastures,
As to Disney Worlds all of the tourists have entered in-

And it has become a hapless lightshow, jism spilled upon the paper heads
Of dead presidents:
Memories of our high schools have evaporated and are floating
Above the crowded mazes of the suburbias who have
Impregnated us with our socialized dreams:

Adam and Eve are picking strawberries from the stars,
They are an advertisement licensed by Satan to sell us the forbidden
Knowledge of so many useless things:

The keys are in their cars,
The housewives are in their kitchens, and their children
Are playing with kidnappers in their forested swings:

As the lamentations of the old gods' giants effervesce into the sky,
Causing hallucinations for the stewardesses who are working
In the airplanes that are all passing us by.

The skeletons tap-dancing on the abandoned steps,
But they are taking their time-
The emptied throats are opened, trying to imbibe
The grapes of a withered vine-

As our rhymes recall us from our windows,
Trying to transform us, into the metamorphosis after the midnights of
Our quitting times.

Robert Rorabeck

The Midways Of Evaporating Amusement

You need to leave him,
With the sun coming up
And shooting through the Sodden fields
As if an angelic sorority
Crossing the interstate;
You need to lay off the Uneasy masks of
Disney World,
And take a seat at my Plate,
Into the amusements of Empty cathedrals
Filled with the starvations
Of your eyes
Or the dreams of your fort
In the coquina esplanades
I have dredged for you
Stolen from and no longer of Mermaids
And the temptations of amphibian
Habitats;
I will cross myself with the Most majestic of harts,
And come to you like stolen
Royalty,
And take you to the midways
Of evaporating amusement,
Where only you and I
Can play.

Robert Rorabeck

The Midways Of That Lonesome Carnival

Revisiting her like
A machine gun in high heels from
The closet or
The constellations: they say that they have
New heavens
All on the mind- and I look up as the frog
Princes sing
From my mother's carport:
Can't you hear them: singing a renaissance:
They are imperfect
But it's Christmas and they're singing,
Singing- Now they are all of one body
Pressed against the rebar
Of Christmas,
And though they are rusting as the neighbors
Gossip,
They are also learning how to fly-
The housewives see them, and their daughters
Dream of them:
They are flying like muses over the waves
And the heroes look up, dreaming against
Their star masts that they can save them
While the museums contain the echoes of their
Graves:
As they are still here- as they are everywhere,
Singing of a chorus that cannot contain
Them,
As the traffic steers by them, reminiscent of Echoes- and of the entire cases of fruit
Stolen by the foxes,
As these ethereal phrases linger before the Lips of the beasts who
Keep on jumping
Atop the midways of my lonesome carnivals.

Robert Rorabeck

The Midwife's Sea

Worrisome sunlight in the green grass overgrowing
Her skirts until this is heard-
The sky up in echoes; it is just sweating,
Curling in the vespers of marionettes and Queen Anne's
Wheels:
It tumbles, as if looking for gold, as my alma
Holds her child,
As if beneath the strong shadows of a fort:
As if in an apple orchard-
And the sea feels as if they day is alright-
The women are buried anonymously beneath the rose
Bushes,
But she has come so far away to get here:
But I suppose that still she cannot lose her husband-
Her brownness is brilliant,
As she looks away- thinking of who she would most Like to be in love with,
And I do not suppose that it will be me,
But very soon I will be running away to Mexico,
Or New Mexico,
And I not suppose that she will follow me:
But when I come back, she will be there, kissing the right
Fellows,
The rain and butterflies collecting in the gutters,
And as we hold hands, the housewives following the perfectly
Newborn terrapin into the midwife's sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Migratory Thoughts

I can hear the traffic, its empirical migrations,
And the power lines silently tremulous easily killing
The nation,
And long time lovers come in under the 100 watt
Glow,
And buy pumpkins; and I do not know what they Must know,
Long time lovers- And I read poems about her hair;
Oh, if she were here,
I could show her the flag which I raise every day for
Her,
And we could watch the traffic flow,
And disbelieve that we are anything-but a harmonious
Creation,
Sitting back and counting cars, each one a luxury
Flowing through the wind's hair which steals the quiet
Thoughts of the pine trees,
And sends their children scattering into the mouths
Of crocodiles and other places,
And has no sense of this- or she of myself- If she were Here, she would be as good as gone-
Her other men swinging axes cutting songs-
I want to keep her from a distance, and feel her without Her ever having to believe in me,
To become crippled, a ruined winsome, so that she might Happen through me without even moving,
Which would make me more beautiful and swift footed
Than all the migratory thoughts under the moon or sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Milky Flumes The Wind Would Otherwise Have

Call now your lords from the stage,
Because the jousting is over and someone has died;
My pretty cousin, or was it myself who has died:
Killed by the black eyeliner around her truest of greenest eyes-
Lawns mowed in the dark by serial killers and their Butcher-knife scams;
Flamingos in their ballet stances, constantly waiting for the Mail: Now you are here, or in a historic town,
Giving out free samples of blue-eyed ripple;
And I don't have a chance; I don't even have a mail route near
You, so how can I breathe:
And it is hardest on our children; I've made them all up
And fed them astronaut ice-cream, that their father should be
So entirely refuted by the windless answer over the flawless pools,
That their mother should be so beautiful;
So beautiful and shameless that she should absolutely not Care to take them against her junoesque respirations,
And feed to their untried lips the milky flumes the wind would Otherwise have.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirages Of A Once Poisonous Artistry

Glass elbows concubined to the shadows,
Puppets pulling their own weight towards
The falsetto of minnows—
Moonlight hatcheted by branches stared at
By a virginal serf who has never tasted
A stolen apple—
Wife and children awakened to a drinking
Husband
Who tries to type a few more lines of a poem
He cannot finish in a decade—
The sun steals away the sadness and possibility
Of rain—all of it is a quickening heaven,
Drying up the mirages of
A once poisonous artistry.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirages Of Another World

Womb of a coiling rattlesnake,
Pregnancies of why she looks up at
The sky lazily
And doesn't care if anything
Becomes resolved—
In her delusions, little girls skip out
Of school
And show their dresses to the wind—
The highway is going by her on both Sides,
Taking things away which belong to
No one—
The golden spheres dance in the Heat like nymphs
And the sun rolls across the cargo
Vans,
As little boys, lighting off their Fireworks
About the mailboxes
Surely are the mirages of another world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirages Of Her Gifts

She laughed at me when
I wouldn't show her my face in the morning
When I came to visit her and Slept on the couch,
Instead of bedding with the lesbian,
And now I love her...
But there are more sinkholes under the highway,
And it is snowing in May,
In the white mountains where my dogs howl for
A long time, fearing the unburied bones of
The drifters in the train yards,
The phone calls left unanswered every night,
Even when eyes can see the numbers,
The solicitors of easy freshman.
Carly said that you didn't want me to know
How you had a boyfriend who played the guitar, and I thought
I was special when we took photographs together
In her bedroom,
But I was just average,
Because she doesn't really want any man to know
Who she is doing, creeping through her window
Like radioactive spore,
Like the mists in a monster movie filling a miniature bay,
Like a luminescent dragon which ate all of China,
Eats her like rice and wontons,
Her flesh like sushi still dripping the salt water,
Her lips the keystone in the rocks the wind moans through,
Her legs open like a broken exercise:
There it is: the truth of hidden Oregons,
Making me take drugs with two years left
In high school, to drive home alone with trails
Of wild eyes, to frighten my sisters,
To sleep in my knocking caves,
And eventually leave me where I am now, bastardized
In high altitude, drooling like an idiot
For her Catholic legs, her knees like collection plates
For the successful foreplays of knotting boyhoods....
If she were a lawyer, I could refuse and sleep naked
In another meadow,

But because she is not I want to be naked beside her
In bed, but the profession is occupied by a silent gentleman,
And it has been so very long since I have entered
The steaming cracks of Yosemite's sorority,
That it makes me want to bight my lip and pay by the hour
To get things done and out of me like target practice,
All the little ghostly children released from school,
By the bell and the moaning psalms,
But this is clearly some reality, and I am no rock star,
No poet,
No millionaire:
Just a little bit of man crawling through the desert,
Looking for the waters of survival she has fun
Flaunting in the mirages of her gifts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirages Of Terrapin

Artform of plumped legs:
Of you climbing up to her,
Satisfied with death's gifts: and you
Have a sword
And her phone number.
Elephants on stilts rise from the ocean
And kiss the mirages of terrapin
Cloistured in the architectures
That don't even appear to be anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirages That Once Danced For Her

Then it happened from a window looking out into

Dusk:

So many windows in a house, my car approaches and then

Moves away:

Inside, Mexicans- descendants of Aztecs and shepherders,

And she sleeps with him,

Brown body curling like something from the woods-

Until- Now I am in Arizona once again

With my dogs

And the pretty scars, getting up into a world to sell fireworks

Again,

And she will make love to her man again, or any man that

Strikes across her path,

To put in place of the vanished gods, and I will move like on

The silk road: the other way,

Using tools as they come to me, finding it hard to get up-

Striking things down as if they were snakes,

And these my clubs:

The horses will move. The trees will die, even though there will Remain a music between them,

Until it is also gone

And passed across the frontera though years after

She has left the mirages that once danced for her there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mirrors Of Her Face

Exorcised to the shoulders of unicorns:
The unicorns must lay over and play dead to survive,
As the Mexicans pretend to pick their
Rainbows
From the armpits of a beautiful America—
Coming back into what was stolen from them—
Epitaphs,
Cathedrals—and amens: but there is a night
That doesn't know how to reign in—
The dogs cannot smell their way home:
The skeletons rum and kick their own skulls across
Their bones:
And beautiful avenues haunted at a place—
Plastic barrettes in her hair,
As the airplanes disappear as the mirrors of her face.

Robert Rorabeck

The Misconstrued Cinder Blocks

Waiting so quietly to disbelieve,
Wanting to see the maker, so climbing the Most precarious of trees
Underneath that golden track in the sky:
My mother who took me to the library but never wondered Why it was that I harkened so attentively
To the dismissive stories from the wet books she So heartily read to me; it wasn't to they that my senses were Crying for,
But only to be next to her sodden breast, to lay my senses against Her heart at rest, as if her body was millennially given over to me,
As the airplanes swept across our ceremonial ballroom
I languished in with her,
Her prettiness fading across my flesh as she waited forever
For my forlorn father to return across the misconstrued cinder blocks
And again to her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Misleading Gravity Of A Soft Pillow

What is left of the cheap liquor is waiting
Paradoxically to put away the scars,
While more grow like unobtrusive lichen on
A mysteriously alluring planet, like a leading man;
And the French actress doesn't know you exist;
You've just found out about her yourself,
When you go to movies alone and watch her in
A gunfight burning in a theatre full of nazis:
She represents the triviality of your art form,
The lackadaisical anonymity you play around in Building your little castles in your bedroom populated
By plasticine armies and Indians; and wax figurines
Stolen from the zoo, even though you don't live
There anymore and the house was given to someone Else- Maybe she is really from Canada and you only Went together for two weeks, but French kissed almost Every single day and had phone sex until she left
You spendthrift in the everglades; and now the parks don't Ride, and the literary agent isn't caring to write back,
For who has the heart to publish a two week long novel
Anyways; and there is nothing for it, but to put your Head to the misleading gravity of a soft pillow and March down to it, all the time entreating those gods who Don't exist except for on holidays and tourisms across
The lamplight sea, and then only for more cavalier men than Who you'll ever have the right to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Misspellings Of Two Or Three Decades

Dissolving the plagiarisms of the Flesh,
The misspellings of two or three Decades of bachelorism-
And now I am married and spending
Time in China-
In a suburb of Shanghai-
The only American around for miles,
And when I drink Chinese wine
Left over from our wedding
Two years ago-
And against my wife's objections-
I rewrite poems that don't Exist-
I think of circumstances planets
Away-
And, though it has not helped my weeping
Muse,
I know that by luck- by divine providence,
And the very same thing that drove Virgin through the depths of Hell
And expelled me once again from a teaching
Job at my own high school- that
I somehow got lucky
And married a good woman.

Robert Rorabeck

The Missplaced Applauces

We'll go to school—you'll see: we'll go,
Until our parents drive away—under the sunlight,
Under the moonlight until
They are so far away and I've found out that I've wounded up
Again in my truancy—I've skipped school:
I've nodded off—I've nowhere to go—
Kissing noses with the otters—I am the brilliant
One who is never in your classrooms—
I picture myself feeding apples to the mirror,
And misplacing applauces as the housewives drive
Home to another cliché never realizing
That I am happiest alone and that all of the prettiest
Girls arrive from Peru.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mixing Teardrops

Most tender eyes upon the womb
Of a child of a night—
The vampire sits forlornly at her window in Tallahassee, Florida—watching the switchbacks of
The hills,
And the apartments that roll through them
Like a labyrinth—the blue children going
To school—getting up
Kitty-cornered to the graveyards: all the lost
Heroes forsaken to their epitaphs—
The heavens having sunken up to her
Elbows—the airplanes her berets—
Her parents lost somewhere in the sea like
The mixing teardrops of one too many gods.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moats Of Your Yard

Awakening us in the cradles and sewing fears:
The highways the lassos of her bridle gown,
The happenstance of movement that can take you all
The way to Miami
With the sun shining down:
And I can still remember you, Sharon, out in the suppleness
Of the green canyons of our wicked neighborhood:
You had friends- I had dogs,
And naked trees, and my corners of the rooms we both Inhaled;
It wasn't until much later, across the universities of forgotten
Bicycles,
That I began fantasizing about sleeping under your desk,
Underneath the rudeness of careless astrology;
And I went and bought gas today and set up fireworks tents
With seven Mexicans;
And I wonder if you read me anymore, now that all of my Sadnesses read for Alma:
A muse that makes love to me, if not love:
And you will never see the scalding parking lots to which I have lost my mind:
But you remember when I was a wino at sixteen and drank
Bad wine and floated mostly naked around
The moats of your yard-
And pined for you, Sharon- which wasn't hard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mobiles Of Crystalline Airplanes

Whatever, I leave the muses grazing in Their own estuaries—Even my heart seems to Ignore them until I drink
Rum and then I hear the music playing from Another house—
And then I call them, painful dances up through
My scarred body,
To display them before the unpublishable
Elements—
Girls who never truly loved me or didn't even Know my name—whatever,
They are here, gathered in the nightmares of These piss stained pages—
Apart of the irony that they will live longer
And be truer in my unavailable broadsides—
They will be more beautiful folded up,
Forgotten by their husbands—
And they do not even think of me—
And it rains outside until the tears
Are pushed away by the cold front
Decorated by the mobiles of crystalline airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Modernity Of Airplanes

The breast of a caterpillar curled from a leave
Curling as if pulled from
The moon: yes, his metamorphosis is an experiment of Science,
Changing as he does into the night,
As the children echo home from school—
Or get lost in the park where they spend all of Their fireworks—
But his world is in the merry-go-round that has already
Vanished—
Like the complexity of mythological creatures
Whose space in the sky has been taken away by
The modernity of airplanes
That brush across the middle of the sky like an Artist's stroke—
And what does the caterpillar bent towards—
Nothing, if he doesn't see you there—
Soon he will enter chrysalis and, once bloomed,
Enter a world of espionage above the greenery of Your mazes, above the labyrinths of your rubies:
And he will become so beautiful if ever so delicate—
And he will land upon one of your shoulders—
I do not know which,
And promise to you so many things from his steamy and Hard-boiled midnight—and if you do not believe him,
You will crush him—he will become an epitaph
For a paper airplane—or a cenotaph
For a blade of grass—and you will walk away
Deceiving yourself to so many boys whose eyes
Are like vipers for song birds,
And whose lips are like Christmas trees for angels
Who are as delicate as china dolls
Falling forever.

Robert Rorabeck

The Momentary Playground Of Youth's Fickle Beauty

Great scars- good enough for emperors
Are reduced by the sun;
Like predatory flowers, they are good and well
In shadows,
And when I go outside they easily come,
Like female peacock feathers around the eyes,
The eyes of wisdom, or of rum;
And if I were William Carlos Williams I would Give now a gashing name,
Like a purple string of pearls upon a bugle's
Rod;
But all I'll do is in general misspell the regional Beauty,
Make her wait out for hours on the gloomy tarmac
While the airplanes continue,
White chassis like the stick figures of Angels that aren't any certainty, but steadily leaping
Coming and going, busily by the juvenile's
Hand, so that he does not think of masturbation,
Until he is too exhausted,
Salivating over the saltwater stewardesses,
And his mother calls him in from the parade of ants
For dinner;
But I will light off firework cones in the rain,
Their goldenrod spray defying the deluge- a safe patriotism,
About which the busy cars should come and go rolling
The dying neighborhood where all the dogs are so old
And tired that they only sleep,
And the little boys who I can almost remember gone inside
To slip from melancholy fantasies beside the freckled
Cleavage of their housewife mothers;
And I should stand outside a little more,
Professionalized by the lurid shadows, becoming A crowded game,
Until my bag is soaked, empty,
My fingers crisscrossed by the fuses done hissing
Into the driveway's quarry,
The earth under my feet the excrement of a nibble zoo
That passes away the senses,

And seems to make a nostalgia from the momentary playground
Of youth's fickle beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

The Money In The World

The city loves as your daughter loves
The merciless floats, those things that the professors never Care to perceive;
And now my mother is dressed all in black;
She has done away with all of her gunfighters
All tonight,
And maybe she lives on Florida Street with the Winnebago's
And the flights of indestructible herons:
Maybe she has a new man tonight,
Or maybe she graffiti's her taboos from the juxtaposed lips
Of open windows and hobos;
But the plays go on even through the midways of that Green tornados are done sucking away her tomato dacceries-
So now the fields are all far a field,
And yet there is yet sugar cane and school buses,
Turning around and around like the sad music of The disinterested Russias;
So soon there will be no more beautiful video games,
And all of the beautiful girls will be shut ins kissing
Their dogs
And coming to the names of the boys under their Damp rugs who can never rhyme for all the money in the world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Monolithic Airplanes So Far Above My Head

Forget the yellow light:
Forget butterflies and the Mexican slang for Rainbows:
Forget the nursery and the tourists who come
In wanting to know the meaningless names
For the horticulture of their
Inevitably boring landscaping:
Forget even stewardesses and their milky eyed Lawyers far above the Mandibles of ants or the jaws of alligators,
Forget even how you took off on the swings with me;
And how before that I had run away to Michigan
To jerk off in a fabulous cemetery
And kiss my aunt:
Forget my affluently dirty trick of an uncle water skiing
Or playing water polo:
Just remember that today is your birthday;
And you have spent all day with your daughter, or kissing
Your boyfriend and eating flan and making wishes:
Just forget all of those wishes except for the small kindle
Of the one in which I was your man:
And remember, dear, today is your birthday; but any day
And any time of the day is special, really,
As long as there are blue birds and allegory;
And you are sunbathing in the little yard with your Mother and daughter,
And I am just a good man
Hoping that you didn't Forget to wish
And watching you through the blinds instead of the monolithic
Airplanes going by so far above my head.

Robert Rorabeck

The Monolithic Stranger

Perfectly, the sun is dying over its hills
Again,
Squinting into its world for the last
Minutes of the penultimate hour of the day,
And the homeless men walking the highway
Look up and bless it,
As the warmth of the sun fades away
Into night's shadowing footfalls,
Fades away like a sedentary traveler
Who watches us leave,
And then unpacks and prays before his sandwich,
Then smiles as he is on to see his second wife:
When the men see him again,
He is like a monolithic stranger over the road,
The treble of his rays like the flaxen diamonds
Of rattlesnakes coiling onto flesh,
Wrinkling and wizening the gypsy things,
And soon they are blessing him
As his monarchy zips the air:
As his sheen quickens the crops and
Seems to make the traffic into fish:
They are going in opposition to the Blindfolded commuters:
Eastward, where the messiah has already risen:
Through the inebriated waves of
The morning's sloshing Eucharist
From the great and riotous bays:
The direction that skyscrapers and gravestones face-
None of them can walk a straight line,
And they do this to confuse ex-wives and Lovers, to throw their children off the scent,
To thatch their hearts into green bottles,
And to forget how to read:
They follow only one thing and he is there,
The crackling scoundrel who leaps from the theft,
The basin of unruly spears lancing from his immortality:
A yellow poet as fat as an elephant swimming in rum:
Strutting over America like a dandy
In a feathered hat of rosy clouds:

Smiling at all the girls on their abutments,
His homeless army marching like intoxicated waves,
As his light hurdles over this continent,
An unlit candle, damaged and harmless.

Robert Rorabeck

The Monuments Of The Effigies

The sun was up all of her times
As she laid in her bedroom and Prayed to a god of blue boys in football uniforms:
She was shady
And not fully developed, and the sea took to Her liking:
When she undressed, it was only halfway:
Her fireworks were
Cerulean:
She was only half-blue. Pg-13 was her favorite
Rating-
Under the Christmas tree she slept alone:
For a different holiday she was waiting-
Her mouth and eyes took to books the way
Civets took to mountain hibernating in the hidden Nooks of
Hibernian fountains- for in their ineffable
Basins they were somnambulating- as the unredeemable
Tourists practiced their insouciant sports upon Them- for upon their excelsior cradles they Were counting,
And like babes up to the lactates of strange heavens
They were mounting-
And, collectively, their gods joined a chorus and Pitched their tents
Underneath the monuments of the effigies of unduly
Kings which they were too happy to be burning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Monuments Of The Vanished

Morning awakens in the sweat of butterfly
Wings—
Lying apart like a prayer to a Ferris Wheel
The tourists of breakfasts encircle—
As I wake up a breathing gold-fish
Delighting in the merry-go-rounds that I
Have trouble spelling,
As the roads spill out and lead to school and
To other places—
Taking me to where the baseball diamonds lie
Almost hidden—
Until I remember when I was a kid,
And the parks of my truancies were an echo of Sunshine,
And you weren't there for I only had joy in White girls and the common circles
They gave to themselves, like cadavers of Incest—and once a year the fair came around
And then it matriculated, taking none of their dreams
To the far and wide—
When they left, it was only for upstate—
For they could not see the monuments of the vanished
Seas—and I am sure that they will forever be lost
In the classrooms where they cannot remember me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon And The Airplanes

With the bonfires gurgling jaundiced boned,
The marionettes are leaping over
In a perplexity of spells: yes, they are trying to become Real, true—even the truest boys,
While I contemplate
Making a living selling hermit crabs,
And the butterflies who used to be my lovers
Contract tennis-elbow,
Just as in each wave lies imprisoned a wind-chime
Of perpetuated unicorns:
In this, the shallows of our racing courses—
Beautiful diseases disguised in words of Latin
Or the literary complexity of suicidal professors:
When, in actuality, it was just the disease of some love
Lost so many millennia ago as if to Become a religion to blind children stumbled off
The marble footsteps of some buses,
To reach out, stumbling, hands outreaching for Blue gills and pitch forks alike:
The joy in the unrecognizable senses,
In the words that fit together unrequitedly—
It is in the morbidity after society's sensibilities that
We find ourselves, and lay down for a long time in the unwinding
Grasses, flitting like censures without any priestly virtues
Back and forth underneath the moon and the airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon Or Anything

So drunk,
I can feel the rattlesnakes slender
Tongue like a pen,
Unwary, licking my palm,
And my stillborn school mates teaching classes
And getting doctorates up in Saint Louise, well formed;
And tomorrow will be ugly,
Now that baseball is over,
And I've had enough liquor for the night.
I just want to masturbate,
But I don't do drugs:
And the poems are good, but I still cant spell
Bouquet:
There, I just did,
And my muses are both higher in latitude than me,
Though one just so,
And they are so beautiful, like creatures of the gardened
Forest,
They hardly even know; and they will love their Men venally and sickly unto a ripe old age,
While I continue serenading them from my Weedy church like a iceberg creeping and biting its Lip,
Looking at all the tainted fish in this canal,
Trying to figure out how to get to the other side,
To undress her,
And lick her down like ice-cream
Like outlawed taffy,
While still remaining pure,
Like the light of the moon,
Or anything.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon Was K's Father

I don't know your language, but how you
Climb those hills,
All that time laying your hands on the sweet clay who Needed you;
It really needed you, even while I couldn't speak,
Nor was your hair blonde, but it couldn't care:
It still went down past your ears as if you were a careless Swaggered of a Navajo living in Gallup,
NM;
And I've been by the time the sweet roads entwine,
And my dogs love me, but they cannot speak.
They weep alone and the moon is unwashed and fully naked
And it goes around,
And K- is alone with so many children and their paper
Airplanes and their BB Guns:
K- could live forever, and she really should:
She can really go on forever, and she would:
I want to make love to her like juvenile sleuths atop our Monuments of elementary school,
Where she never loved me, where she sang in her chorus,
Where she got high marks and a bunch of stars:
And she will go down good into the earth of mailmen;
She will go down good delivering the fine print of finer mailmen:
K- will live forever inside the tender teenage wings,
Fluttering out the opulent throats of the throats of our Anarchic swings;
And her children have guns, and other precious things,
But it is hard to describe her with the moon looking down as he Always does,
As if he were her father; as if the moon was K-'s father.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon Whispers Of Bicycles

Ferris wheel, keep me indoors while I sing:
This is my new body-
My thrown on the web of a thumb:
This is the thing I seem to be,
In the glass whispering,
While all of the other lights are out,
But the lights on the Christmas tree
Are dancing,
And I am sleeping in bed with my sisters,
And the moon whispers of
Bicycles,
And of the lost expeditions of conquistadors-
But if you made love to your husband tonight,
I will never know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moonlit Nursery Rhyme

Beneath our house
The wolves are eating the dead horse
Who fell down the hill.
Like Jack with two left feet
As he chases Jill
She wears an empire blue sweater
Unbuttoned down the center.
Slyly she bends over
As she fills the pail with water.
After teenage sex beyond the window sill,
They've arranged themselves
For the funeral:
Brother and sister,
They sure look beautiful,
But isn't what happened just terrible?
If they skip out during the sermon,
I will be sure to go with them,
No matter who they are burying.
A trio of young sweethearts,
We'll hitchhike to the park
Overlooking the cemetery,
Where the town boys are busy digging,
A cradle for the coffin,
But we will laugh
And we will giggle,
As the swings crest towards heaven
To fall back again,
Jack and Jill are smoking
Then Jack and Jill are kissing,
Until moonrise when the wolves are
Out again,
While Jack and Jill are in bed sleeping,
The needle-toothed carnivores
Set to work at trimming
The dead horse to its skeleton.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon's Admirer

Who can say where the weather goes
When it leaves this house, it jumps over
The rafters: an octogenarian,
An old hurdler,
Who has practiced all his existence
To touch the glowing belly of the lonely
Satellite:
The woman he saw casting her eyes
Through his window
While he was a teenager.
Then, young and eager, he still prayed
And faithfully competed for her,
And thought that by graduation she
Would know him,
And the secret roads he ran on through,
Where, between the interludes of clouds,
She cast her light down like scattered seeds
To feed the exhausted birds
Famished from trying to swallow her
Opulence to feed their young,
The chirping existence swaying in
The tall Australian Pines.
Before he knew, he was sure of his path and Let her light radiate his shadow,
The ever faithful soldier following the Body wherever there are doorways
Through light to follow—
He would cross small bridges over canals,
Where alligators swam like lazy gentleman
And lapped at the silver saucer of her eyes.
There she was, dancing patiently in the sky,
Through her seasons,
The waxing and waning maiden that knew
The world before he existed,
Yet came every night to swim in
Cloudy pools over the sleepy green neighborhood.
How was he to know then that she gave
No more thought to him, than the sun
Gives to men as he sits laughing on the Wings of an airplane.

For her, he was just a pale ant running
Across the hills of his landscaped mound.
She did not know he was trying to catch her,
As her mind was already set upon a long and Shivering prospect
Dressed in the shedding tailcoats
Like a revolutionary horseman
Who still comes calling to her with
The charms of a liberal politician.
And even further out, there was a red
God the sometimes came blushing
Onto her horizon.
Now an old veteran, like the north wind
Rattling the windows of a farmhouse,
He learned some years ago that
She would never come down to meet him,
Though she would forever glow
At night and thoughtlessly tease him;
But he is not bitter, for his Futile love for her taught him to Jump and leap all the higher,
As now he goes skipping through
The highest branches of slash pine trees,
Blowing like a tropical storm over
The tip of South Florida
High enough that when he bounds
He can see the ever gesturing ocean,
Another desperate gentleman long
Shackled by gravity who is still
Affected by her immortal attraction.

Robert Rorabeck

The Moon's Quarter

“Three more weeks of Heavy petting, ” said
The moon to her lover,
“Then I will lose my memory
And we will have to Start all over,
Though it may well be that
I will choose another.”

Robert Rorabeck

The Moral Of The Story

There goes the wombs back and forth, the Day labors licking their own salts: red ants
And mothers:
There they go, horticulturists of their naturally
Embalmed off springs:
The little sparklers of their joys, watering their Lawns,
And crying through the hibiscus that something
Else is found,
And come see: looking across the canals
At the comets giving chase-
Unicorns idolizing horses with wings, as pilots
Sketch their stewardesses fizzing across
The cloud banks which turn out to
Be giants peering into tinfoil windows:
At their feet, in the grape fields of Spain,
The foxes leaping at the moral of the story.

Robert Rorabeck

The Morality Of This Silly Fable

This girl blows you to kingdom come;
It only takes a few seconds to buy ice-cream
For it to melt and run away across
The Astroturf of her love, with other boys as Built up as lead balloons:
I pass Shetland ponies and orange fields.
Dreams of satanic cops are in the sky:
There isn't a mountain in the sky:
They've all must have been laid in bed
Or smashed by the careless housewife's circus
Hammer:
Five winning numbers in a lottery ticket thrown
In with the broken dolls and corn bushels
Beneath the counterclockwise cormorants:
Driving west like hot feet across the sand,
Not wanting to build anything that will leave a Hole when the tide comes like Mexican cleaning ladies to remove the desks of School:
Otters are road kill like so much playfulness gone
On to sleep,
To resonate immortality unperceived persimmon
Stains on the hair-lips of drainage,
The little houses the body moves stand as forlornly
Still as the gutless airplanes.
As the sky leaps like startled does;
As it leaps and leaps never intending to come down
To kiss the outstretched palm grained in the Morality of this silly fable.

Robert Rorabeck

The Morning Before Dawn

Imperfect though beautiful weather
Inflating the weather veins,
Carving the tombstones were the zoetropes
Of lost housewives step so
Carefully,
And the lost dogs lay- they have forgotten any Names that man may have given them,
And they run from stone to stone
As if recognizing their lost masters,
As deeper in the foothills the elk step over
The blue echoes of Navajos and other
Nameless Indians,
Their bugles resonating and catching in the Red clay,
Rattling the song birds awake so that the Bring the morning before dawn.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mortal's Flame

I've had a dream of you the final summer
Of my morning's sleep,
A denouement to the deeper aberrations which Exeunt from the surface of my vision
Upon awakening,
The echoes of a dancer's feet now refashioned
For the rebuttals of the courtyard. Authors
Die and wilt, and you read Stephen King in Middle-School, though I can't imagine you do anymore,
Or how you came to visit me and cheer up the side
Of my face when I wasn't sleeping in David's
Van during home room studies,
The little publications that you gave,
This journalism you gave up for Even greater recognitions, and in my Dream I bought you a sequined dress so petit I must Have mistaken you for a doll, and the careening world
An exhibit in glass, but things graduate so rapidly
Even from my indecision,
Your affections gave way to wilt and dismissal,
Volunteered for the continents of other avenues,
And the last time I saw you, you were too busy riding
Your bicycle to a moot courtroom, so you only waved
To those oddities which pass away into inevitability:
But this morning we kissed, and it was the last thing
I did before waking, and beginning my fieldwork,
The steady drudgery of my muddy obsessions,
But wondering I followed you through the mountains and Found you echoing with another's name;
So quickly and impressive people do their metamorphosis,
And in rich houses spread their wings,
And even now your are driving between sky-scrapers
Air-conditioned; If I care to sing of you, I will do it here
And write these little imbecilic flings,
Here let them blow out the window into the mortal's flame,
And catch you again tonight and tug you in dances
Across the red courtyard where the cicadas are newly undressed.

The Most Beautiful Aspects Of This Baseball Universe

I hear the rumor of dancing green mermaids:
For moments they seem to be,
Leaping breathlessly and coughing from the Traffic's bolero;
But I have lost my will to go see them,
For the chickens are already dancing with the Serpents at the low end of the ski lift,
And I want to see the end of them,
While each tree enraptures the wooden epitaph,
A steed birthed from an acorn
Which bad men entrain and dance of the jib,
Nefarious scallywags with candles burning in their Beards,
Already have those vermilion mermaids eating out
Of their hands at two a peace,
And the traffic streams to a rather new kleptomaniac
Séance;
But I don't care:
I just want the love of a good woman to last a life time,
A daughter named Ganymede,
And a son who has his back turned, who is always running
Away from me
Like the most beautiful aspects of this baseball universe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Beautiful Gift

I have another open wound for you,
So open your eyes only when I look away.
Do you see how fast the clouds are moving;
They are busy to go shopping, to Bring home the rain:
Each dropp should fall on us with its own
Identity, even if you don't care anymore.
Up and down the street lets take the Camera and take still photographs
Of dogs biting their masters,
Leaping in sepia, and the hues only the Eyes of such animals suspect.
I was once in California, but you didn't Care. I worked at Subway for a day,
And filled semi trailers all night,
But there was nothing there to take care of me,
And I went alone to the parks and rolled down
The dewy grass,
And there was metal there painted and put together
For children, and I am writing so fast so that I might finish before they grow up. Everything
Is so theatrical, and should be self-published,
But that is not brave, just as I should write
A poem, to display my wounds before they Should heal, to make if not money from them
Time: If you come to this park, how could
I know who should come, but I've set the trees
And the lengths of rope. If we cannot fly,
We should at least hang, and the let wind whistle,
And the ants find their way, as they will.
If that is what you want, then you should come,
Because I know you have a great body, and if
Your soul should leave it, it would be perfect.
Now don't curse, you won't because I am talking
To the wall of an old apartment that was close to a de-Cade ago where angels swam disguised as vagrants
In the pool down below, as the rains engorged and Blurred the lights, and the train moved not far Off and the leaves shuttered near midnight as if

From the novel of a little girl;
So you are not here anymore, the elk bugle
Across the valley, recalling a rut,
And the man with the money lays the gun
On the table and counts the bills.
Soon I will have to pay for it, and a bar of Light will come across her eyes, but I will Replace them with yours before I walk back
Onto the sweaty street where you once passed by,
If you don't recall.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Beautiful Of Causes

Maybe like you say, you love him, Alma:
You love him, and these are your words.
The silent weeds who spread out like dancers before the cataracts of
The honeymoons of the sun.
And maybe you said that you would be all that I could afford
Just so that you could go home to him,
And maybe that is what you was and what you will become,
But I am thoroughly depleted; I sleep in the hood of the house of my Bachelorhood, just hoping and praying that you are good enough
To become my banner, and my national anthem,
So that you can whip out all freely over the weeds and the gently hooked
Teeth of all of the pretty housewives that I am otherwise sure
That you would surely become;
And these words are not mine: they are feeling their way outwards over
The sloughs like blind men all too ready to believe,
And maybe we sell the things that you want over the banishing or the Banishment of the eaves: and maybe I cannot talk about this anymore:
Maybe I will come out strong and find you out on some find and distant
Shore and kiss your mouth and brand your young,
Alma, because maybe I am yet the demigod and you are still the Most beautiful of causes that I have yet been fighting for.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Beautiful Of Muses

Up in the Spanish hills where I get nose
Bleeds
I've found another love
In biology class-
And I know you don't even know
Her,
But you've seen her in the bowling alley
Drinking beer
And striking out:
She is also a vermilion swam amidst
The saplings they just planted:
She is also
A tombstone- and a wart:
She will not come when the blue bird
Calls,
Sometimes she drinks water from both of
Her lips-
Or from the roots of an evergreen,
And sometimes she orgasms alone:
I know you do not know
Her,
But you watch her from her open window
As she cooks dinner blouse less-
In fact, no one knows her,
And this is just my first psalm of a broadside
I intended for the most beautiful of muses who Never existed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Beautiful Of The Littlest Girls

Stone thrown from the hands of the outbound
Night—and now where are all of my old students—
I do not know what they are doing,
But I like to wish that they sleep—
And the angels give them some peace,
Anointed over their oily heads—
Successful or not,
It will soon be the graveyard for them—
And all things, just as the night makes love
To its valentines—
And the world scrambles over its busy voids—
Not even one or two words can survive from
The lips of the ant mound in the middle
Of the school yard while
All of the better reasons are on summer vacation—
And the teachers in their corporal forms are
Slumbering in their living rooms and dens
Watching television as if it was Christmas—
And the most beautiful of the littlest girls
Have found their own reasons
To fall asleep on the floor
And, closing their eyes,
Never imagine to call the boys they
Are already sick and tired of falling in love with.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Beautiful Of Things

Baseballs of pledges of allegiances:
I am getting older over these parks—grey geese who Land in the knots of arboreal witches
As the boys sleep forever upon their red diamonds:
The souls are lost all around here—
Their bodies having grown up and left all of high school:
Only the teachers remain, bloated,
Amphibian—they cannot even reach the lowest orbs
Of the orchard—the lowest cones of the poniard:
And they stutter and struggle and go into and out
Of museums with creaky doors in which
Mermaids have been fused together from spider monkeys
And blue gills: and for those of us who cannot read,
They are the most beautiful of things, but for the rest of Us—we know exactly who they are.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Expensive Of State Universities

All day long through the open mouth of
Song,
Patrons and their lovers
Like uncountable ants underneath the repetitious
Sky,
The little bowl crafted by Sharon's palms might
As well be this world:
Symbolic like the mythology of Plato's wisdom
Teeth,
She has made everything that is meaningful
In this last trifecta of decades,
And I would do no harm if I was only allowed
One square foot of her shade to place my head
In,
The penumbra of a sommelier: I wouldn't
Even have to hold hands with her.
She could turn away while nursing her daughter,
And greeting patrons into her store,
While I would let on to unawares-
The day would be so beautiful, like a shade tree
In Africa I can only imagine.
I wouldn't even have to touch my lovers flesh.
If she would sell her shade to me by the hour,
I would work good and long through all the careworn
Holidays,
And I though I would be as meaningless to her
As ruined clay bound again to the confirmation of Her kilns,
Every day underneath her insouciant reservoirs
Would be as insatiable as the most expensive of State universities.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Familiar Star

Gather your dreams beside
And fall asleep at noon.
Let the sun flood you,
As you are not yet fully formed:
But your hair is white
And today is Easter,
But the words don't come,
The immaculate profound:
The hidden declivities of women
You work around,
The navels of spring,
The thimble pool of navels,
The opal glasses in soft white gardens
Whose scent speaks more eagerly
Than tongues,
And whose eyes are bound
Upon the flesh of hindered men;
Those farmers' sons who fall asleep
With the infinity of shadows amidst
The fattest oranges in a particular row.
Sugar cane crackles the next field over,
And alligators move like torpid
Cords of wood in the drainage ditches
You run across to skip out of school.
And the world is not fully formed,
And is hollow without a wife
The seedless clouds torn in the sky,
A cracked pomegranate of several masses
Dripping a colony of fiery ants
Trying to make advances towards
The most familiar star,
But he would rather not bother....

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Forgotten Of Forget-Me-Nots

Embittered dungeons milking themselves,
With all of the monsters in them,
Not one coral snake,
Not one way out of here—
The hero, a diminutive sort,
Can see the cheerleads a bouncing
And playing of sports—
All happily chested and taking for Granted the beautiful weather in which
They were planted—
And never hearing the laughing children
Across the rosy bay—
As the night settled itself that it was in Love with the day—
And our hero sat and pondered not
One jot—
And his thoughts lingered upon the trails
Of not one never a thought—
And the dungeon stretched just as it
Did; yes, it hid for miles beneath—
Forever it hid—
And he stood there just as cool as a
Spring day—
As the lights fell across him, but Never he may—go one farthing further—
No further he did—
As the sunlight beckoned upon his unopened
Lid—
The monsters in love growled from Beneath—
But forever, he thought, his sword would
Be sheathed—
And sheathed so it was,
Never married was he—
But made his bright home under the brightest
Of trees, because it was the best place,
It was—and no one could argue that—
And the nights came as cool
As a smiling cat—

Until one day he did—he ventured a jot—
And in that moment he did,
And became the very epitome of the most
Forgotten of forget-me-nots.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Intrepid Of Airplanes

Starting all out all of the runners know the words of Their joy,
But eventually only the best will know the absence of fatigue,
And they will molt the histories
Until the angels leap around them like the bonfires of teenage girls:
And how now I can barely even remember my times in Gainesville and Tallahassee,
And the times I spent pining for them all night long through the Reticulated sidewalks of those slums:
Though even now I sleep alone, I have crested so many ant hills,
And tasted the wines from so many caesuras of the Spanish
Dry lands that I now have no more fear of losing my love
For you:
Alma; and maybe it is that you have never made a single thing out
Of wet clay, but you have made my love by just being awakened in my day:
And oh how I love you- and how our love is strong in the darkness,
Like a tree felt up by a blind man who can't even speak about it:
Our love continues upwards through the sky and is gossiped by
The stars and is gently felt by the leaping bellies of the most Intrepid of airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Joyful Of God's Most Basest Of Amusements

All of this in the reason of a prayer, mutely and as silently
As a nest of rattlesnakes thoroughly at peace;
Articulating my love who has yet to arise from the east,
So her beds are unsold and yet lay dampened, and upon them
The season's wildflowers surcease
Like an ice-cream shop closed for the off week;
While in the somnolent pools of eyes diademed by whatever
Light can be found creeping through their suburban houses,
The arrow heads of easy witchery find out the smells of her unopened
Blouses:
And they move this way, creeping in the caesuras of the Lighthoused waves back and forth through houses, calling out to Her like the feral choruses of foxes towards their more Educated sisters; and coming up and burning like wild, and feral
Fires,
Like disastrous weeds about the ankles of a ballroom,
Climbing until they can feel the perfumes around the armpits of Airplanes; and getting there and purring, figuring that at least they Measured up enough to ride even the most joyful of god's most Basest amusements.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Northern Of Peninsulas

I am listening to my friends:

They come out barefooted, silenced in the fields of their

Work,

Just as the kites happen to happen out underneath the ballrooms

And the gas stations of the empty streets

Even though Alma cannot remember any of her dreams:

I fed her camerones diabras today:

And my Spanish is as bad as my skin, but look at how

Many times we have already made love,

Mi vida:

Look at how heartfelt my coffin is, and the races of the dog

Track with its four legged luck:

Look at it spilling through the confines of the new

Racetracks,

And into the virtues of your own silhouette:

There you are in a Catholic household underneath the birthdays

Of both of your children;

But there has already been a rich assassination behind the ruby

Curtains,

As the orchards lie overabundant with their mouth rinds and

Shetland ponies;

And the circus hasn't yet left town: I still dream of you

Underneath the rotundas of your futuristic pregnancy, and I speak

To you whenever I can, kissing your wrist with my forked

Tongue, promising you air conditioning and more of everything:

All of the fortunate sins that will bleed you forever,

Like a tributary returning faithfully again- languishing in the forgotten

Shows that happen for miles and miles unnoticed beneath the

Swaybacked and manmade bridges across the all but forgotten

Tributaries of the most northern of peninsulas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Ordinary Of Men

Knowing nothing of a girl's love,
But lost into her
Like vendors in a flea market in the deepening Shadows underneath an overpass:
And whispering to her after midnight even when she
Is in bed with another man:
That this religion will not mend- it cannot even
Be sold;
And we go to sleep kissed by our dogs:
Like frogs dream to become princess, or even
At least the most ordinary of men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Terrible Day

Imperfections spoke out loud on airplanes
Fallen down so far:
I get back at you by going to see whores, but
I can't even get hard:
I am incredibly wounded by the way I remember how
You moved against me,
Like a piece of ambered driftwood in a stone-stiff sea:
And the light house of your eyes with a coy light
Like the greenness of an indoor storm,
The way it must have led all that I held safe inside me
Astray,
Because you have gone tomorrow, leaving me wrecked
In the most terrible day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Ungodly Of Seas

We have a forecast for echoing
Like homeless people wishing that they could
Be inside of their cars,
As the iguanas exfoliate in the rock garden
And Romero watches the horses:
He is in love with his cousin in Mexico,
But the fires are out in Arizona- the sea is a blue
Snail blazing into another sea:
The slow echoing of the tortoises underneath the Broken down school buses- the long sad
Drifts that cannot drink a tank of gas:
The land is flat like her chest as she straddled
Me one last time across the fields of Thermopolis:
There she is an ancient goddess driving in a
Minivan, her soft young legs so brown and tan
And going up and down or anyway that they can:
And kissing the sun,
And killing dogs- she rides around like a brown
Forest that all the butterflies go to release their Poisons and so to go an die,
To flood again like cheerleaders coming outside
Of school buses, like beams from a lighthouses
Searching across the gymnasiums of the most Ungodly of seas

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Uninhibited Of Rains

All of the songs for a girl who never made it to
High school:
All of the songs to her, to verify the beauty of the penumbras
Of Spanish shadows
In the flea markets underneath the overpasses:
All of the songs for her now, while all of the professionals
That I once knew in my classes bend low and offer up
Their asses:
All of my songs for, Alma, because I am being led through the Brightest of home rooms for her,
Alma: you have let me round all of your bases,
And the sky now is a light bulb which I can exchange;
And I was carded today, Alma;
And I guess it was because I am halfway beautiful, even if I am strange;
And I buy plastic bags, and I light all of the candles,
And I kissed the lips of the Virgin of Guadalupe tonight Alma,
Even though she was wrecked, and I asked her to bless
You even while all of the traffic seemed to pause,
As if all of the racehorses stuttered to your name; and I am
Listening to the whispering mirages of airplanes as they pass over
My house, and blessing you, just as ants bless their queen
Deep in the hearts of their mounds,
Utterly safe even in the greatest deluges of the most uninhibited
Of rains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Viscious Women In The World Never Knocked On My Door

I seem to smell like cigarettes,
Gasoline, but we've just been burning
Pine trees- Without any Mexicans,
It is a sad thing;
Without any unicorns, who's to say we're
Even real;
And I've been pulling it out so long,
Running away from haunted houses along
The train tracks,
Imperfect, clutching the warm bodies of Rattlesnakes, and now she says she's Married: and I don't feel it anymore,
The way you must feel it coming down from
A long flight in an airplane, escaping your Bedroom for the acceptance of France:
And I thought I was invincible, that I couldn't Shrink anymore, and we could go out
To dinner at high elevations, and you could Strip dance for me in the careless movie
With our flask of firewater, firewater; but this Echo isn't true- it is the reflex of a dying man:
It even isn't a dog barking,
Scared of the night, because nothing in it is real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Most Woebegone Sensations

Moving me this way to heaven; it is my hell,
The presocratics waiting for me with lustrous warmth in their Eyes standing outside the baseball games of all of Our windows:
The strange conjunctions that they want to show us down
In the pit they've been mining into Eden.
Their flaming swords singing, and turning up opulence of Compounded words, like endless insects stuck together
In what must have been their throes of love-
But they will never have to love again, like cut flowers who Somehow never find out how they are going to die,
For they stand so forever in the statues
Of their ecstasy, the same way I want to keep you in my mind,
Echoing like the caesuras of the oceans,
The saddles between the mountains, the undulations of
The zoetropes and the windmills,
The specters who wake up underneath the cenotaphs who Will forever bear their name:
Just as the rose bushes are blooming in the front yards
Of kidnapped debutants, pistilled in the perfumes
Of the most woebegone sensations.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mostly Perfect Pornography

Inside the places which fold into into's
I waited for my parents who had left me in the careful
Hands of a daycare—
The latchkeying playground that never so happened to Finish high school,
But was there anyways—in the balconies of the Sabotaged places
At least where the marionettes hang themselves
Anyways—right there in the folding wings of
The airplanes' bouquets—
And the sunlight stutters as it comes up upon the failing Amphitheaters of the reckless
Playgrounds—
And little boys who are better known than me
Always chop—and chop the cherry trees down—
As the little fairies are folding up
Their wings,
Like golden books: they sleep like pornographies inside
The hoods of sleeping cars—
If you haven't seen them there, you haven't walked far Enough, because that is where they are,
In their very little world where they are the mostly perfect
Pornography—
And, when yawning, their mouths open for a brevity of an Aforementioned anywhere—
Because that is just where they pretend to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mother Goddess

Nard refers to spikenard,
A flowering plant which grows richly abundant
In the Himalayas,
And is used by indigenous sherpas to garland
Mountain goats during high-altitude weddings,
Where the air is naturally heady,
So there is no need for wine;
And as corsages when they go to prom,

But its only color floats at the top of a reedy
Stem, like a spattering of bruised stars,
And even that is far beneath the Black-faced cadavers who are forever grinning
Like presumptive way posts jewelling the Weather around her bare shoulders;
Mummified, they remain there for eons, even
As other, more permanent artifices erode;
They too float like abused heavens around her
Subtle neck laced with climbing ropes,
And studded carabiners;

For, just as the names of flowering plants may Belong to wayward poets, so too do these men
Belong to her coarse natures, and they whisper
Her name to the other trespassers,
Those whose fate she may pick and choose:
The Mother Goddess, Mount Everest,
Chomolunga,

While the spikenard suffers through the lacing
Drizzle, shivering outside the monasteries where the Fires leap to the monks polyglottal chanting;
As from the tent poles, the prayer flags ripple,
And the soundless monuments rest in their wetted stone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mothers Too

Anonymous penmanship-
Grotesque calligraphy-
Misspelled words raised from
The circus of dread:
Everything is flat even the Strippers have gills-
I ate two cheeseburgers: That's
All I'll eat.
Teachers are finishing up school,
The bright colors and shapes,
The molecular bonds of peanut
Butter and jelly-
I live alone underneath a snapping
Turtle-
I once saw a mermaid-
Only once-
She is all I think about,
And the children come home,
And the mothers too.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountain Clefts

Little Brown
Girl—sleep
Inside my Classroom—
Do not take
Your test—
I will protect you—
I will run away
With you
Forever—
And show you
The Ferris
Wheels
That rise to kiss
The mountain clefts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountain Of The Verdant Rose

You treated her like sh#t,
And you'll be buried next to her:
But, I ate your wife's pus#y better than You'll ever eat your wife's pus#y-
And this is just another way of believing that there
Will still be airplanes in the sky,
Remaining like paper snowflakes, or like whatever
Sort of make believe death you believe in:
And we will get along, selling fireworks until Summer ends, and then it will be Christmas
And we will sell then too: we will sell, we will sell,
And the moon will get up and shine:
Whatever it does- just you know that it will be good,
And it will be beautiful,
And whatever god you happen to believe in will get up
And save us in time- galloping, purple throated,
Singing to the choir
To the horse thieves and the stewardesses:
Then it will be a dusty Christmas but at least it will be there,
And we will sing our newest brides into her newest coffins:
And we will sing that way for so long,
That they will listen,
And the fires burn their way straight through the mountain:
And listen: listen, as they are climbing up:
Soon they will be there, and enjoy the summit of the word:
Open breasted, bloody lipped, busted nosed:
And then they will have to go down too:
Singing, singing, singing- just an echo:
They will have to go down too:
Singing, singing, singing, about this their joy, and then this
Their open wound- their open coffin, the mountain of the verdant
Rose, open lipped into the dirt,
As wide spread as a child into these woods without parents
To suppose them in memory:
And singing, singing, singing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountains And Candied Apples

Off to a party of Ferris wheels, while the little girls—
Spendthrifts—are all gathering their stuffs:
When they get done,
Bloody-nosed—they look up the slope to the atmosphere
Of the waterfall—
The waterfall is seeming to come down in
Some kind of pieta for them—
Maybe it is almost Christmas—I wonder what has been Happening, while, all of this time they Metamorphosed—
Yes, they did—until they became the grandeur of An astonishing zoo populated by girls all of
One of a kind—
Fed by the offshoots of the nipples of the mountains—
Like carnivals of weathervanes spitting chewed up
Confections and candied apples—
To feed her in the exhibits too far beneath all she Ever knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountain's Demiurge

Die in the mountain's demiurge:
The disinfected basins where god sends
His clandestine lights,
The undulations of a blinding harem-
Crown yourself on the nipples summit;
Make the mountain your paramour,
Your nude conquest,
And, like a time traveler,
Kiss her faint lips-
The indistinct goddess you are on,
Or fall and become a discommunicated
Angel,
Fled from the garden,
A fatal boy scout badge,
The first step to an everlasting coffin
Nameless under stone:
The lowest candle in the high hallways,
One of four anonymous lights,
And the dancing of silver bones
At the lip of the Christian mine:
At the precipice of season,
Where the miners' spirits hold
The laughing festival beneath the elderly heavens:
Drink with them in the crops
Of mica, harvest the ores of eternity-
The zincs of their ancient irises,
And in the bizarre moonlight of quieted space,
Indulge in the longing truths of extinctions:
The breathless conquest and the Cessations between the melodies,
The month's rest before recovery,
Where the needles of hoary decay gnaw
The white off bones,
Disappearing the corporeal orchestras
Amidst the magnetic mountains,
The drumming basins where
Trusting lovers go to die,
And there to remain forever afterwards.

The Mountains In The Distance

Green as a sick jewel,
Like a rattlesnake with a tooth ache knee high in The parks
Of my childhood, and all of my dogs are lost,
But the fair is in town,
And the stewardesses are touching down,
Knees scabby from playing in the grass-
I think of all the words that they will never know:
The mountains in the distance think of snow.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountains Looking On

Golden warm body underneath
A tree:
Underneath a swing-set, looking so beautiful:
And I am looking up into
You, as if this was your world-
And I am resting as if a knight vanquished to Infinity,
And the sea a roaring lion of mothers,
And the airplanes doing their bests:
The mountains looking on and on-
And no one can tell them that this is their world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mountains Where The Wildflowers Are Sleeping

Only the emotions of a seashell:
How the sea repeated her lulls, her vacancies
Into her,
Underneath the ceiling fan, like a horse galloping
In a windmill- votive words
That spill from the maiden's lips before
She has to go to school,
Or sit at the bus stop and dream about milking
A cow:
Lines of a cover artist kissing coral snakes-
As the morning evaporates and is proven
Something unreal:
Easter eggs across the train tracks like
Catholic churches, and the brown girl who is
My muse: she worked at the fruit market today,
But where did she go? Where did her heavens drift
Off to, and now my words loiter for her
Underneath the jewelry of leaping airplanes
That do not linger, for they go
Skipping across the very oceans, as if their Great waters were but canals dredged by a god
Who doesn't live here anymore: his vacant house not only invaded
By the usual nocturnal forays, but their perfumes
As well- as another virgin is resurrected from the grave:
She stops and smells of the lavenders of Abused cheerleaders underneath the midnights of
All of the mountains where the wildflowers are sleeping
In unified sorority together.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mourning Darkness

Gaslights glow like churches on the brink of the wood:
It almost seems that, yes, someone has been crying here,
Beautiful, wayward,
Girl from Appalachia with someone always following too
Far behind;
Weren't you out here tonight, but where have you gone?
The flecks off the lunar shrine
In the epitaph to rattlesnakes now torpid with the afterbirth
Of where she sat mourning,
Curled in an indentation in the grass up the easement from Another road:
This is where you sat considering: This was you,
But I see you have gone, up river or down: I think you
Were following something. The moon had to get down from Your shoulders and fend for itself.
Now this spot of the world is saddened. The thrushes are quivering,
The pines leak with golden tears. The snakes lay like breathless
Ribbon keeping eyes with the toads- Maybe one of them
Saw your car; I must ask them, uproad or down:
The road is so long until you are found; and this is the place where
You sat considering in your world:
The moon purring on your shoulders until you had to put it down;
Now it lies here weeping like milk through the grass,
The green bed where your hands touched while your back
Was up against the mourning darkness.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mouth Of The Lukewarm Python

On arches of chains we go back and forth
Trying to survey from the tops of pine trees,
To see what the goblins are selling under the moon,
What new languages are being written by
The elaborate hallucinations of helicopters,
And younger sisters who are really wishing wells,
Fluming ingénues from the backs of sugar gliders;
And god is there, or his close cousin, and in the language
Of his post-colonial incest, a coral snake is milking
His wrist between this sway of the clouds and the moon-
There are more than several levels of stratum up to His room; and his eyes are gone, but we won't be getting to Him:
This is just the séance of our out of doors room-
The pools are skipping beside us like uneven diamonds,
Or as blue as the reflection of the blue bird's eye
Coming into the crepuscule in the mouth of the lukewarm Python.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mouth That Accepts Her Musings

We all have successions, and this is mine:
Another game of pinball, another word coming up breathlessly,
Losing definition:
The Mexican drives the truck home through the purple immolations,
While his ancestors gathered the architectures
For a calendar that foretold the end of time: a nubile premonition:
The pretty and un mollified musings of black girls
Down beside the river, slipping its silvery pinafores over the snags,
Losing itself into the oceans that bare its children;
That it goes home to every night, and douses its scars past the Bare-chested hemispheres, hangs up its endeavors and tells itself
That it can do no better;
Its throat filled with tar and terrapin like a plate that moves all over
Itself;
But in its greatest night, eyes and senses closed, it is showing another
Movie, filled with truth and promises;
But never to the light will such an answer be revealed;
And so she flows steadily, mail-giving- attributing to the mouth that Accepts her musing, but otherwise is as insignificant as so many Things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Movie Theatres Of Her Own World

While Plutarch thought of the angels of
A spell,
I thought for a while, while he thought of
Her—
Until they were all up in arms—
The miracle of the imaginations of
A Ferris wheel—
Turning around like the busses of the butterflies
Upon one single horn of
All of the unicorns-
Until the words failed, and they all fell off—
Dropped down to bed,
Through the chasms of the heroes
And the fjords—
Learned to make love with the purplest of Angels—it wasn't a pretty sight,
But at least it was to their own accord—
Gumshoes of passersby trying to make a buck—
Beautiful women up to all of the angles of Their tricks—
My wife not understanding a thing, but resting assured
That should would wake up
Again tomorrow into the movie theatres of Her own world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muscular Syllables Of His Golden Bed

How to be beautiful at night all alone
Covered in a layer of sod, making love to no woman,
And minding no woman all the same:
I don't know,
But that there is no amusement in this: my filthy face
Has no grin,
But listen and I can still hear the traffic and the little things
Still being stolen:
There is still one light on in the RV, but I have never known
A woman whose name still is Erin:
I have never known her, and how sweet that the snowflakes do
Not fall, that beautiful women
Are still walking out properly trimmed, still walking out
To get married, or just to think of him;
And I go out too, all in the banished light of so many Churches:
Yes, the light is blue,
And my throat is cut; and it lurches, and when my body is stilled,
Yes, it still breathes; it gathers up her perfumes, and inhales
Her bouquets; and this is my little plot of crippled
Daisies under her windowsill waiting for her like a mortified
Fortuneteller, while she makes the sounds of his name
Strung out in the muscular syllables of his golden bed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muse Has Hit You, Has It Not?

Presupposing we put a ban on all that's holy,
And the mud mucks up the land from shoulder to shoulder,
In a final and messy epoch less cohesive and malleable
Than clay,
And W.H. Auden sat around bare-assed in rain slicks,
With the jowls of a gamy dog,
And gave little girls broken petals, with the sun embarrassed
By noon with nothing left to do,

For I have read from all the Jews and homosexuals,
And sat practicing suppositions under the crucifixion,
Listening to airy farts whistle from their stigmata-
Leaving blank the voter's registration,
Recalling, instead, how you sit away from me, downcast;
Though, perhaps, jovial,
Not disproved yet by science,
Watching the ice melt straight into your liquor.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muse I Once Had

Wrapped inside the cages of hedonistic
Byways, looking for the hemlock of the anniversary one
Last time,
At least I can say I kissed her lips and held on to Her, and took her out into the waves
Even though she could not swim: which made all of the tourists
Watch us even more;
And we made love: and we made love in almost a year
Of adultery,
But all throughout those fiery nights, the souls of my Words ran lonely-
And it got colder as more of the years approached:
She went back to him, sated and bent and subtle like Soft wood I had imprinted with my telephone number:
And her two children, waiting for fireworks-
Hungry as rabbits- she said she was not a good mother,
But she would not leave them- A Mexican woman,
Her husband exhibiting entire control over her,
Except for with me- for this last year,
And the times we made love- now she is a lion,
A rose content to be a in a cage- and when I see her mother
Cleaning the windows of the Italian restaurant
Along Okeechobee Boulevard- working without A smile, bent and overweight- I think of the muse I once had,
And I think that must be her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muse Of My

Done again with your ablutions up against
The lakes that some rich man dug:
Up again and the dunes all around you, the cantankerous
Hyphens peppered by loons:
And this is your ballroom; this is your bedroom.
Your movie theatre is wide open and over spilling with the Third Reich and the bearded Sanhedrin;
And now the day is all the time laughable, and all the good
Sports are only baseball;
And this is not my thing, catching consumption for the beautiful
Darts of beautiful dragon flies out once again in the Perfecting gardens in the drenching rains;
And if I know you, its because I've flown airplanes over the Glaciers in Alaska,
And picnicked with my family and black cats:
And I know there are things you've yet to even think of Even now in your backyard; and I wonder now, Erin, how many
More days do we have to go to get to Easter,
Because I really want to find your legs; and all of your men right
Now, how are they doing:
What kind of show do they put on right now, and is there smoke in
You dance halls, because you really belong out on my prairie;
And my mother isn't home right now, and all the planes are straight
And comely; and if they've been spoken by me, why then they
Are exaggerated.
And you are a beautiful fountain, contemplative, blue collared and Busty;
And I love you, and I steal things to offer to your chromed emblem,
For you are up again each morning,
Burning, the muse of my eternal stories.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muse Of My Eternal Stories

Done again with your ablutions up against
The lakes that some rich man dug:
Up again and the dunes all around you, the cantankerous
Hyphens peppered by loons:
And this is your ballroom; this is your bedroom.
Your movie theatre is wide open and over spilling with the Third Reich and the bearded Sanhedrin;
And now the day is all the time laughable, and all the good
Sports are only baseball;
And this is not my thing, catching consumption for the beautiful
Darts of beautiful dragon flies out once again in the
Perfecting gardens in the drenching rains;
And if I know you, its because I've flown airplanes over the Glaciers in Alaska,
And picnicked with my family and black cats:
And I know there are things you've yet to even think of Even now in your backyard; and I wonder now, Erin, how many
More days do we have to go to get to Easter,
Because I really want to find your legs; and all of your men right
Now, how are they doing:
What kind of show do they put on right now, and is there smoke in
You dance halls, because you really belong out on my prairie;
And my mother isn't home right now, and all the planes are straight
And comely; and if they've been spoken by me, why then they
Are exaggerated.
And you are a beautiful fountain, contemplative, blue collared and Busty;
And I love you, and I steal things to offer to your chromed emblem,
For you are up again each morning,
Burning, the muse of my eternal stories.

Robert Rorabeck

The Muted Creche

Florida is returning to the way she looked
Just before the sixteenth century,
The conquistadors swimming in their bloody
Bouquets and hang-over hard-ons:
All the lost tribes are showing their faces as
The hybrids of our new species:
Guatemalans and Cubans and Haitians and Columbians,
Swimming up stream and making love like
A kaleidoscope lost in a
Sweaty, irrational poem: What would be a Disaster from the white man and his college
Professor,
Except for the fact that these women are beautiful,
And the bring over priced lunch,
All the roundnesses of their body like ripe
Fruit,
Like the clichés of a lunch basket passed between Business partners;
And they all have exquisite names with three or More syllables,
Like mermaids or butterflies that have finally settled
And learned how to live forever
And to roller-skate:
Julie is a unicorn, and I buy guava pastries from Diana for the rest of my life,
And the cicadas sing as they have always proposed
They have,
And the alligators grin because they still remember,
And the old forts settle,
The cars proceeding heedlessly,
While somewhere to the east the waves continue
To eat away at the throat of a cross planted there
By silver crusted men who cannot much longer
Afford to live behind the muted crèche
Of their endangered gated community.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mysterious Instruments I Need To Survive

Your brown skin encages your wet butterfly:
While your legs pump the gas, and you are migrating to your Place of work and back home again
To your children:
Maybe I will make love to you in the morning before
Breakfast,
Before I have to drive down to Miami to sell fireworks:
When I have already promised everything I have ever owned
To please you,
Or everything that I have ever been:
The mailman licking your stamps like rain pressing the highways
In their petticoats,
Giving your home flowers that embarrass you,
And besos for your lips when our coworkers have gone home to Sleep,
And my fingers curl up the blinds of your ribs, like blind hikers
Searching for the angels of your throat:
There they are singing, Alma,
And playing the mysterious instruments I need to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Mystifying Surface

My soul still makes potty words, seeing the absences
In primary colors:
It can not hold the court of its browned gaze for longer
Than ten seconds,
But it still sees the unicorns gagging like the effluvious
Bubbles in the backyards of preschool,
And I have tasted Kelly's tongue once in the penumbra of The Riviera Beach draw bridge, but will never Ride in her pink saddles;
It is almost enough to talk about the glued glitter of roller rinks,
The rubber balls happily bounced by two legged canines
Whose tails have shrunken to the size of secreted goldfish,
And I suppose that every one of us has our diamonds, Glittering in the shallows, or hidden deep beneath the Mystifying surface.

Robert Rorabeck

The Naked Damsels Of Flowers

In those elements drooling from you
Mouth divide as you take school busses home
To the busy housewives:
You are fables anyways- silent lessons with Porcelain legs traveling the votive canals
Alone:
Above your heads, those gods evaporated silently
From the world that once was theirs-
They seem to be creeping forwards from longevity,
And singing through the creeping vines
Covering the ice-cream cones and the skeletons:
And it was a long and perplexing dough eyed
Fable that happened whistling gapped
Toothed in the park, and periwinkle-
And you sat there all alone on a swing, and swore,
Thinking of me- while the apples held to their Boughs- and the sun shone down the naked
Damsels of flowers,
And I knew there was really nothing on your mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nakedness Of Meaning

Words huffed from a quiet man's body,
Like cloudbanks in their syllables, come easier, like
Love,
With liquor, but now I fear I should not drink unless
I lose my soul,
My Alma on her breathing yard, if she is even there;
But I have my green virgin in the soft
Green of my foyer,
And I still pray that if I keep repeating these words
For her,
Like enamored continents filled with children laughing in Recess,
That she might reflect the beams, and kiss me as quietly
As true love's dream hidden by a shield of Cars,
Defeating all of our impossible monsters, and finding out the Liquid gold of tongues as if panned from
A river of fingertips like the boughs of fruit trees basking in the Sun,
And all of the nakedness of meaning that never has to say
Who we are.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nakedness Of Sky

When do you call to me,
Unicorn- Now something I hardly believe in:
The world series is over,
And you've gone back home to
The woods
And your children: what color are they,
Or can you even possibly imagine-
How they love you,
How you love him- and how your eyes fall
Across him- across the railroads and Circus tents in the middle of the Night:
What do they know, and how can they survive here:
Maybe they will become lost forever,
As the silver trains buckle through Spain-
Or maybe they will fall upon someone
Definite-
The lake remaining so exuberantly quiet,
As the airplanes undress into the nakedness of sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Name For Alma

The quieted ness of all of our bodies, as if in a muted fraternity,
Or a very saturnine baseball trip on airplanes,
Astonishes me:

The way she pushes herself all day, body flipping like rides at the fair,
Body turning around and all around

With her favorite cardinals: That I would wish for nothing more than
To be more beautiful for her;

That I could stop clowning around and straighten up and show off
In the bright sunlit ballrooms of the day,

That I would know my numbers and arithmetic and count on all of My fingers and toes:

I told her today that she was my patrona, that I had mean feelings about her
And that I was just starting to get up while the hummingbirds were Mumbling:

Why, of course they were, and this is their song:

Something completely pedestrian and repeated while the chariots held Races and the bodies lisped in their cornices; and I thought it must be
The altruisms of a very beautiful race, and I was just as sure that I had not Yet died, for the gravity was as of yet pinging me around like a ball in A school yard, and the name for Alma was as of yet my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Name For Its Soul

Bodies who overturn for song birds:

This is my love nest, Alma: this is something that

You should feel to need to overturn and fill-

While I went to the movies today and felt the need for something

That wasn't real,

And then I passed out only to come to, to hear you knocking,

And it was a marvelous feeling, like the Indians were dancing:

And they were singing in the airport and under the mezzanine:

I love you,

Alma: I love you, and this was our song that we practiced together

While you were sleeping, and when you came to and yawned and

Gathered your children together to take them

Together,

Then I got up as well and mowed the yawn; and realized that all the White girls had gone,

As if upon the fabulous months in passing had disappeared,

And I could never be anymore happier, as I realized that you and only

You, Alma, had always been the reasons for my songs:

And I sing to you, Alma;

And I pray to the Virgin of Guadalupe, for you are the reason why

My candle keeps burning tonight,

So bring me your children, and become my roofless kite:

For the sky, like me, is so empty, and yet is so receptive as the know all of

The reasons why it needs to be filled with your body,

And the name for its soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Name Of The Man You Were Bound To Love

I'm warmed by Spanish blood-
And the hills flood. The regiments are in Ruin,
Orange trees are, yes, tremulous; it is what they've Always been doing;
But have you ever cared before:
Driving in your car in the deep airconditioning,
While I was so far away and so terribly scarred- and balmy,
Bending paper to make airplanes
Attended by unimportant stewardesses ghosting with Your old last name:
In the tomb I play in is eternal: I've leapt over the Coal-fired ruins of a campfire attended by the bent faces
Of so many pretty adolescent boys who grew
Away from me;
But didn't I keep to you, leaping like a gazelle over each
Sumptuous irrigation just to bring out my telescope,
Erecting it under a finished blue sky- to get a look at
You:
But could you really care, pretty- pretty: Maybe you come
Around once in a hundred years, cold centaur leaping out
Of your soap-opera comas: Could you really care?
That I jogged the entire neighborhood for you-
That I made up dreams and reanimated conquistadors from
The blue dunes for you;
And that I have become lost and terribly unfortunate
Just to call up your mix breed;
That I drank enough on that day of the communal fieldtrips
That I shouldn't have to recall my name,
And remember that, alas, it was not the name of the man
You were bound to love....

Robert Rorabeck

The Nameless Children

Aposing bodies know how to have children without having
To know how to do anything;
And when I gather myself and travel the streets, and the trees
Just become gaudy and full of uneven weathers,
Than I can see the lovers inside and between their middle-
Class cathedrals
Making love and cleaning themselves, and counting the bells
Before dinner,
And the steps that god has to take to come down and enter them-Alma:
There are so many steps that they are infinite,
Like the echoes and the shadows inside caves,
While the sharks sleep at the bottom of the sea, never having seen
The waves caressing the crepuscule or the dawn, Perhaps Dreaming as they do of the mailboxes that contain both of their Names,
While the nameless children look so far away before school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nameless Graves

Received in a choir that has no throat,
Received in an ocean without a boat, the lines of clean
Absence in the roofless house
Looks straight up at angels, the airplanes flicker like
Bad celluloid,
And the windmills blow out their cakes like the wishes of
The flesh,
As I remember you, Alma, and call you to me,
Like a dream of pennies drowning in a wishing well,
All of my half spoken hopes wasted into the flatbed
Caves,
As all the empty happiness boils up from the most nameless
Of the nameless graves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nameless Palate Raining Again From The Sky

You said all of this while cavorting in miss-behavior.
And the shells at your wrists where little things live
Wanting to be bought by so many tourists,
But I am remembering that I had other dreams too, in gardens
Not fully formed, in houses underneath other even more Beautiful rain storms: dreaming of living at the end
Of a cul-de-sac in Saint Augustine, before I'd even Met you or bought gifts for your children, the sky divulging
All of her wonderful thought in sad stories to my backyard
While the airplanes bloomed rather gloomily in the crooks
Of cypress- the conquistadors gone into limestone,
Their bones flutes for centipedes and the ghosts that they Bring with them for whoever and forever riding the
The legless spines of serpents while each blade of grass whispers
To the nameless palate raining again from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nameless Though Everyday Storms

The New Mexico's song urges me further beneath the Last song of the mountains,
And the field trips of the auburn planes, and the bed sheets
Of ways past like rusting gunfighters
Who are still sleeping underneath the fibrillose shells of their Over turned carriages:
And now I can vote, and march out into my song and display
My weapons the suffocating wives;
And Alma is here, while the my own mother sleeps in the Carport of the dreams of my childhood that she Cannot remember,
Even while all of the old pornography is failing through the trees,
And the secret music of my furthest relatives passes away
Through the trees,
Though I get drunk enough to remember all of the woman that I was always supposed to love;
And maybe it is enough for her now to just know the bloom
Of my carnal cemeteries:
They are the biggest things and they go on forever without the murder
Of chalk borders;
And her name is Alma, and I have given her flowers several Times a week for the past month;
And I suppose I am being too romantic for her to love me;
But she is my sea: she is the tattoo on my very soul;
And I suppose that I may never truly have her,
But she resounds in my and then arches over me all of her favorite
Colors that still carry her eyes so very far away
From the orchards and castillos that I have built all of a sudden
To carry her name sanctimoniously through the nameless
Though everyday storms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Names For Her Prayers

The tulips are all busted, but she liked my Unicorns,
And these are the things we sing to her after she
Has left my house,
While they are doing more construction at the bright end of
The street-
And I didn't have to meet anyone else for lunch; and
She stayed so long and played with my hair and the rest of me:
It was the first legitimate love making I've had in over
Seven years:
She was a fountain of butterflies;
She left me a painting of elephants, and I broke her anklet but
She didn't cry:
She just kept on persisting with her eyes,
And the bed moved by itself, it levitated as I told her the names
For her prayers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Names I Will Never Know

Walking the pensive rounds in that darkness
Probably in Colorado
Caracoling the lake off to the side of family get-togethers,
Looking at low hanging spruce branches to hang
The paper snow flakes that don't
Cost a thing to my mind.
The traffic seems to run its accord off these mountains,
Like a chromed weather unto itself-
And lovers hold hands in the park beside me, but I've forgotten the rules of their game:
My sister is married and successful in college;
Her mailbox is choking on it,
And her friends gather around her like candles in tallow,
Softly burning like little song birds,
Like tourists lined up to see the dazzles of a mine,
Like a fat womb of quartzite peppered semipreciously;
And the girl I think about has an opal birthstone,
And a GED: she knows all the names of the plants that grow here,
Many of the names I will never know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Names Of Other Lovers

You'll go this way, and we'll make love:
We'll sleep over alone together- the rivers will Flow around the empty rooms in Houses,
And the eagles will birth their young over the highest Canopies in the forest:
Their first born will be as blonde as a forest fire,
And in her freckled armpits he'll find shade,
As if in a fire escape or
An apple orchard:
He will learn how to stand up and breathe at a rest
Stop going up to her university
Oily and tanned, never learning a better language,
The airplanes traveling as if on
A scent overhead, the pinwheels and roller coasters
Curling in the peppermint hallucinations
Too sweet for the tourists to avoid-
And if there were any better words, or prayers to Sing to her- and if there is a better girl than
Her to sing to,
He, of course will never know- because she will be
As far as he can learn,
And even all of his nights will be spent auburn, nude,
And wounded beneath her windows,
As she cries down to him the names of other loves,
In languages he is too far from her to understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Names Of Our Ancestors

Well, the cities pullulate and strut in the atmosphere:
They are making a crystal gown out of their tenants whose tresses
Diadem with sea horse eggs that procreate a legless stampede
Into the oceans:

In its panoply of enigmas,
The races get started for the extinction of man:
In the somber music of estuaries, they are making a séance
By which will be forgotten all of the names of our ancestors:

In those bygone eras, the beauty of centerfolds is faded
Into the rotted pages of the swamps:
Wherein even the most beautiful of men is legless
And is using his arms to climb towards the lizard's embankment:

Only one star remains, shimmering faintly- already destroyed,
An echo of the final hope, a booby-trap for the human condition
Flashing on and off above the chicken-pox desert.

Robert Rorabeck

The Narcoleptic Amnesiac

Can't remember my name.
When her blue eyes crack open,
It's the first time I've seen blue.
Hungry blue birds flutter about me.
She says, "I love you,
Whoever you are."

Then, promptly, she falls
Back asleep
In the other man's arms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Narcoleptic Jasmine

They gave to themselves the pleasures of
The hearts of the palm—
Like swing sets swinging over the sea
The airplanes flew over—
Wings spread without another care in the world,
The stewardesses stepping in their Narrow cathedrals,
Serving over priced drinks between the pews:
Until the sun came up and enameled the East—
And the serpent came and kissed the drunken
Beast—
And the sleepy rose eventually gave
The last kiss of dusk,
Its rosy negligee intermingled with the disappear
Perfumes of
The narcoleptic jasmine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Narcoleptic Waters

Up in the air
The grandest of giants
Kisses an airplane
Holds it by the throat beside
His golden castle of
The sun's metamorphosis—
Stolen bicycles waking up
In the morning beneath—
Remember the feel of her hands
Upon them,
And her ass sitting there—
Like a turtledove upon her nest:
Now she has gone away to
Her school up in the air—
As he sleeps in the Narcoleptic waters that Somnambulate around the Emptied houses.

Robert Rorabeck

The Natural Catastrophe Of My Very Soul

I think of you,
And write of you all the time;
And it isn't fare,
This immense disease of my immortal dysfunction:
Its like being with a warm family who's Never there,
So you are left praying beneath the ceiling fans
Who are always turning
Away on strangely tremulous fieldtrips and never Rescuing you:
And after all of this school, and the sweaty of Sweet little bodies,
I am still only left with the masturbating/
Recreations-/+*
Of a gray haired truant:
And you have cats and dogs and a little girl who Looks up to you highlighted by those mountains
You have no business with,
Except you are selling your wines,
Using your most familiar instruments:
I don't know how many casual boys loved you like this,
Like obsessing over your best friend's sister sunbathing
Topless enriched in the sparks of Downed power lines,
But how many of them can you say have ever done this;
And I am still waiting for you to reciprocate,
And give me a bag of goldfish as some reward,
While the sky shoots its angels,
And you play your faithful sports, shooting across the Clear blue day,
Just a small manifestation of the natural catastrophe of My very soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Natural Forces Of Her Echoes

Another holiday lost as we go piggybacked
To our grandmothers,
And the love of the late afternoon is strange:
But there are birds up in the sky
With airplanes
Migrating in winter- in a weird tapestry
And her shoulders are as brown
As honey
The cicadas and katydids become stuck to Like leggy freckles
As she bends over the water fountain,
Her hair falling and Bouncing,
As her lips take a drink- and if she hasn't yet
Kissed a rose,
She should do so now:
Before the busses come, and the wolves come,
And all of the other days come to her
Expectantly-
And she is lost in the natural forces of her echoes-
And cannot even remember the way
I looked at her
As she bent over the water fountain
In a hallway we both shared.

Robert Rorabeck

The Necessary Reasons To Yet Survive

Now I am all down by a skull
And my wishes are as little as little girls:
As they go by the homeopathy of their dollhouses of Grottos,
So humbly and wishing for nothing more than Their mothers' happiness: while we have to make it through Again all of these lightning storms and these Civil wars,
The architectures of landscaping hyperventilating atop the Grasses,
The roller coasters coming down and caracoling against
The voyeuristic glasses,
And the way her body sings; it is almost in my dreams-
I am almost waking up against her body like an angel picnicking
In the higher passes I have almost died to have seen:
But I have seen then and survived,
Like an outlaw making love to the occupations of the daylight:
And I have done this,
As I have loved a Mexican girl named Alma who swears that This is not her country, even though it is just as much as It is mine;
And she cannot swim, but she swims in my eyes; and in my dreams:
She defeats me by the cannibalisms of her own eyes,
But as long as her heart beats in the libraries hoping underneath the Unending futility of the overpasses;
As the orchards still overflow with her favorite colors,
And her children go to school right before my eyes:
Then I will always remember to bring new bouquets for her:
Because Alma gives me the necessary reasons to yet survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhood Of A Vanished Carnival

Drunk mothers
Get down on Their knees
In the middle of
A dead-end
Park-
Admire the butterflies
In the last leg of the Race
Having naptime with
The rabbit carcasses-
Empty shot-gun
Shells
Are indescribable
Like knucklebones
Across
The neighborhood
Of a
Vanished
Carnival-

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhood Of Her High School

This book is the collapse of the America school system—
What frightening amusement
When there is lightening over the green driveways
Of a suburban glade,
And we each make our own friends—
The telltale signs of their carnivals are up in The forbidden skies forever—
The night drowns with the possibilities of casual observers,
And there are new wounds in the penumbras of Mailboxes we were never supposed to observe—
What old gods are trapped here,
Near the inventions of the internet and VHS players
While our neighborhood is still round and becoming Clouded with the sodden fields—
For a moment, I fall in love with your older sister,
But I am not there anymore—
Children come on and get off of merry-go-rounds—
They are looking up for Easter—
The pies in the sky are looking good, even Delectable—
And the middle-class fanfare crescendos:
She supposes she is in charge of you—while now the Oceans get ready to flood—
The hoof prints in the shape of an unicorn can
Not be described while the housewives are heading home
To the bonified apiaries—
Some wolves are licking their fingers,
Whilst the children of the prettiest women are Getting off their turns at the mall—
And the neighborhood shapes up
And dreams of itself underneath a Christmas tree—
And the lonely heart inside of her is
A wreck in the department stores: she is a mannequin,
Acquiesced into the pitfalls of marriage-
Graduated from the neighborhood of her high school,
She will fall down forever.

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhood Of The Earth

I am placing you in left field
With the other girls.
Everything will be okay because
You cannot catch
And I cannot hit- The Day will be filled with red
Clay and narcolepsy and
There will be nothing left
In the neighborhood of
The Earth
Except for the emptiness of our Sport-
And we will make eyes
Across the classroom-
Or fall asleep next to the canal-
Underneath brocken down machines-
But I will never say I love
Your
Since I've known your
Sorority is full of thievery-
The same way my wife knows
All foreigners have blue eyes-

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhood's Fata Morgana

My legs are crossed and cooling on
Some promontory in Arizona:
I'm almost as big as a hill, a tit-
And the traffic goes by as smooth as ants;
Listening to the perfectly rounded mouths
Of radios;
Made softer by air-condition; each one
A pet-
And I've forgotten who I am;
I think there should be a sea beneath Arizona
Instead of Mexico- I think there once was
And dinosaurs and vampires:
Now look at the shopping mall shimmering the Neighborhood's Fata Morgana;
And I don't know what I should eat-
The hummingbirds are too quick, and of course
They are such little meat-
The pretty boys in their towns somnambulating
Around,
And the girls are all done with me- Even the Pretty ones- I don't think they'll call again, but I Wonder still if they'll read my poetry,
Or skip school with me to see the tiny world of Dolls atop the roofs of the chicken coops of lawyers
And their dolls;
But she probably doesn't know what a roman candle
Is; she just likes the taste of wine,
And when the sky is like a soup matriculating across
The elbows and joints of the mountains she can see;
Then she might know who she is,
She might read my poem, even though she's Forgotten me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhood's Merry Go Round

Growing up through the summations of the body:
Learning how to spell some things,
And buying more gold to adorn us as we go leaping
Like birthday fire,
Like catholic chariots cutting themselves on barbed wire:
And I love you,
Alma: and I love you dear, with the cars of our neighborhoods
Making their peace mill excursions
Even after the flea markets have shut down, and the brown
Séances that happen mid afternoons in them have dispersed:
And families all across the wetted tip of this peninsula
Are home and so contented they don't even try to cipher
Tomorrow's weather:
And it happens that the shadows that get up and come down
Through the exhausted but amusings in the ululations of This neighborhood's merry go round.

Robert Rorabeck

The Neighborhoods Swathed With Men

Orchards are made of men who Cannot sleep—as fairies sleep in the cabbages and Pumpkins:
And they drink teardrops of farmers who
Have lost their fairest daughters to the town
Drunkards—
But these other men do not turn into werewolves:
They come down from the thorny backs of bric-a-brac
Mountains, carrying with them their sacks of Antlers and arrowheads—and when they Get underneath the fullest premonitions of the moon
Metamorphosis, as I've said—
Themselves into orchards—that the Mexicans come into
And baptized and eat apples under with the coral
Snakes—until the lazing otters come up the bank
And proselytize to them like preachers over
The working congregations of army ants:
Asking them to change again, to set an example for
The tadpoles:
What will they remember then, and where will they Find themselves—as the most jaded of individuals try to Cartograph the hemisphere they sea at night
Until the gods give up to themselves,
Absolving in nebulas that bloom like the riches nebulas
Up above all of the neighborhoods swathed with men.

Robert Rorabeck

The New Accidents Of These Tourisms

Filled with scars and their positions
I am afraid of taking off my shirt in front of company,
And the evening turns over moaning in laps for other men:
I wanted to give her oral pleasure tonight, but she wasn't home:
She was out learning to sacrifice for the always busy sea:
So I made love to another woman; it is what I am always doing,
While the townhouses depreciate and Erin finds out she is Finally a new bride
While moon blushes over our shoulders reading also to make love
To the new accidents of these tourisms;
And the housewives surrender and go back inside.

Robert Rorabeck

The New Precambrian

I make good practices at anonymity,
In fact I have succeeded, for there is nothing
More important than to be the unthought of Spittle on the lip of immortality;
If I should put out my hand, she should not Come for she is already married,
And quite bored by my undeadly sports,
And so I go down the easement to the canal
Which is allegorical for the border of death,
And I look at the alligators soporific membranes,
And wonder if he will take me across,
Or eat me on the way: The better part of
The world is underwater, and maybe she loves
Me unconsciously, pitying the scarred imperfection
Of my artistic visage, and I should write all of this Down before-noon, and let the penultimate desire
Crash, begin to ponder the simple sports of food
And sex, and there she goes running in shorts,
And I will go down to the valley and rent a video-game,
Something to put my fingers on, an experiment
In the old illusion of movement and stillness.
I know I should not put down another word,
Because it will not make me a dime, or catch her breath,
But I do,
And I do again.... And the alligator awaits the new Precambrian, as it eyes do not blink,
Even as my eyes close.

Robert Rorabeck

The Newly Rehearsing Storm

And then their bodies plant over exhausted
In the brown recesses that
I have too many times felt for myself:
While I drive back and forth today
Before Sparrow Lane and the hollow echoes of what
That means to me:
If it means to me anything:
While we all have been to kindergarten or prison:
While all of our pets will sooner need to know their Model cemeteries:
While the stewardesses flame like birthday wishes in the skies;
And it all pillages for awhile across the echinopsis of the Toy jungles into which the magicians rabbits
Are defeated by the pet jaws of our Daylabouring canines; and the country turns yellow,
Waylaid and all too barren:
And the band starts to play- the scarecrows dance with
The flying monkeys:
As I cross the canal to get to my wife who is haunted
By the house who has warped the floorboards
In its efforts of following her across the streets of Coquina and into the turquoise dunes of thirsty headdresses
And buried pornographies just to get one glance at her
As she weeps her head down to the luxuries of the water fountain,
Like in the absentee chorus of a hummingbird- her soul-
Her Alma lighter than air as she turns away, heady with the Recesses of whatever seasons she pretended to exist in;
As once again I cross the street over night just to Get to her, as the storm clouds fall like defeated forts for tourists;
And the waves are coming in with the adulations of bullrings,
Quiled in their effortless gambits like valentines
Sent away across the sherbet and valentine rugs of Kindergarten that I still pretend to be kissing just to get to her:
My muse or whoever she was: her faces and breasts changing,
The bouquets of her armpits and graveyards shrugging off my Efforts;
As I linger in the sidelines of American football, no longer assured
Of her fanfare as her aloe grows and lingers smudging the sides
Of a woebegone household whose wet and seaside paint

Runs all too eagerly at the last sight of the newly rehearsing storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Next Awakening Sea

I am found in the quiet solitude of
My inebriate isolations,
Found this way surrounded by all the Brothers of my species,
Salivating over the conditioning of
My brotherhood of likeminded holidays:
This is the way we go,
Each in the fraternity of the crashing sea,
The drive in movie theatres of inexpensive
Foreplay,
The kind of want that aches in the teeth,
And kindles in the eyes,
The want of fingers to play over the overturned bowls
Of divine knees,
Over the tumbling and sweet still life:
For eyes to burn into eyes like the strange
Explorations of two unexpectant stars
Which cannot ever reach their true light
Across the abandoning distances;
And this is all we have,
The striking of keys into the gutted cars,
Her lips surrounded by the made-up scars
And she stands out fixated amidst the Tumbleweeds—
And the attentive jackrabbits—
And we put the rattlesnakes into the tip
Jars, and the rainbows replicate the cheap
Promises,
And this is the way we are headed,
Famished and hallucinating in the cinder-blocked
Courts—the tiresome game we have to play,
Our ever attending bones the instruments,
The skin such sweaty canvas, and there is no
Escaping the impossibility of the tide ever escaping
That way,
Of ever caressing the highway or even the
Orange groves,
And I have no more dreams of her,
For my inherit definitions have had their day,

And there is no separating the deserving man from
His well-earned currency,
The tourisms she has abandoned and redressed
By throwing all of it away and swimming out before the next awakening sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Next Day Comes

Licked a little rum
Off the fingers of humming birds,
Wanting more,
A little more genius as bright as newly minted
Pennies,
With the face of a president, made out of the Same worthless stuff:
And this morning will be cold, and Diana will come
Rolling out of the woodwork,
And you can barely even speak to her even though
She thought you were cute two months ago
For a speck of pleasure, for a tryst.
And you will think of one or two muses in the world,
And it will do you no good:
You will uncover the plants and turn them upright
Like your father showed to you,
Making them bask in their hoods.
The angels will come like giant airplanes or other Horatio-Alger.
The traffic will conduct a steady tempo of the most intelligent Mammals you know, or
Can think off, farting heartily in the air-conditioning;
And you will look up once or twice into that Beautiful January sky of this new year,
Supposing it is the lightest shade of blue where more Industrious and clever boys than you are always leaping and Dying like minnows battling tadpoles in sunlit shadows;
And you will want to say her name and see her like spokes
Passing out of the windows of a school bus;
But you will not say her name. You will not sing for the Police,
And when the next day comes, you will swear to hardly think of Her at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Next Morning

Nothing but a dirty boy naked except
For when I sleep:
That is when I put my work clothes on and set out
Down for the burning canyon
Where the trains and airplanes are always ending up,
Wrecked,
And the species of sooty tourist and housewife
Come like wounded animals out from the darkness;
And the best of all, the creamy stewardesses,
One breasted like Amazons punched in a fight
And made to retreat up the footpaths that ooze like
Gray spaghetti in my skull cap:
We meet together like wolves with forest fire eyes;
And I run my bones up and down the smoothest rivers
Of her thighs,
And I do good work, and I sing:
And I am fully famished and a hero come the awful light
Of the next morning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night

The night is a stogy panther- With you in it
Further north and away,
And in it always remaining those things I cannot Spell and thus cannot say-
Prancing, newly pronged- a lackadaisical knight
Out in his hermit-pilgrimage,
How often do you really think of me:
When you can't see these scars, they leave you pretty Much alone- Oh, but they haunt me,
Driving me like bumper cars-
I have been up in my lonely room, laughing with my Dogs, while you scrimshaw on your beach,
Fully armed- Often, I think I can smell you,
The richness of your sweaty junctures, the perfume
Of your clammy cloisters:
But I should not even try to comprehend what I cannot Spell- I have grown a beard to hide myself-
I think it best to hide you as well.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night Before

In the forest, a cold meal of rain:
Nothing of phone calls in the forest, and the caterpillars
All balled up- in their stomachs a chrysalis:
The hikers gone away with their ice-creams:
Gone to hibernate in their trail parks with their working Girls who have come home from
Their own ways:
And the graveyards bask, and the airplanes fly so far away to Speak of no meaning for it;
But with one looking up, they must think of the passengers
So warm inside, like coins in the smoldering cul-de-sacs
Of an evaporating wishing well:
Where will they go now that the moon is hugging the saddle,
Its face as big and preposterous as a church
And down from the ridge, and through the spindles of aspen
Stumble old girlfriends, falling toward reason
And away from the darkness of the summit where one supposes
Nothing but a cairn of stone sits and awaits
The sappy blessings of juniper who cross themselves across
The path the elk hurriedly made as they went down
The back way and into town again
To look through the glowing transoms of the evolving girls
Who spill out their innocent light from the palms of Their windows,
Beckoning the feral princes they easily tame: breast feeding
Them with dishes of wildflowers they have learned
To distill- so by their own feelings they climb up again,
Like colorless fires without sound that caracole through the Boulders of the darkness
Until they intertwine beneath the watchtowers and go no further;
Buoyed in the presence of an ethereal theatre
Until they remember their own, empirically,
And thus fall all the way down to their beds of sleep,
As easily as wishes blown from the shoulder blades of Their candles,
thus to haunt the lurid bellies of their roofs that hood them
Like the breasts and the navels in an orchard
The early morning will harvest with its pregnancies of surplices
Flowing across the bodies flooding across the carpets

And once again being let out doors- to enjoy the sounds of Schoolyards, like song birds themselves cheering beneath
The paths of a mountain high above them
That they cannot even remember laying in its airy slumbers only
Just the night before.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night Flows From It

Little tricks like silken web spume from the thorax:
Her eyes are oleander, they make patterns under the school
Bus, awakening and closing.
The airplanes are diamond birds with frozen wings who Never fall,
Only the truants know this echoing forever scarred upon
The swings,
Eclipses of bodies doing their bit to sell candy bars,
Her mouth opens for his fingers, five or twelve, A handful and then some, but the carpet has just been Vacuumed.
Lying down, so close to ants, the window looks like a
Very blue stairwell right over to Pablo Neruda. The eyes quiver
To see the South America poet making love tonight,
Biting a hang nail and signing greeting cards.
Above his head, the roof a pyramid little boys summit,
Giggling, their hands splayed over crypt orchid fireworks
To expulse into the spotty void. The king doesn't even know how They will crown him, looking into his celebratory ochre,
The backyard pool veined with gold effluvious- Or the boys
Above, what do they know, except that they weigh about
The same as all the hummingbirds in north America;
And the bottle is warm, and the night flows from it.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night Of Our Predestined Architecture

What have I finally done wrong
Muse of shells and hourglasses- how will finally Fill up again after the rain,
As the weather come down again
Kissing the skirts of airplanes- the rivers
Who ribbon the earth and touch all of her planes,
Will lie in their basins and protect their mud:
If I ever see you again, I am afraid it will Do neither of us any good:
For the night of our predestined architecture has Past away with the summer- carnival of our Spent offerings did not bear any children-
And I had no friends to share your honey-
So go along now with your poisonous butterflies,
Your bearded ladies and your lion
Tamers- I will not see you when you leave
For you've taken all of my vision from me:
I have placed all of my lights outside the yard,
And given your brown stems my useless
Senses to take away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night The Werewolf Howled

Forklifts of golden brown sunken into
The pornographies where the egrets high step
With eagle eyes, searching
For the foundling's gold, as the forest
Fires hesitate, tongue tied to find you in his Bed- an amber zoetrope your two bodies
Shoving off, spilling like graffiti into
An amphitheatre the night the were wolf
Howled, and your children came out
Golden skinned echoing from the places that Still bare your names.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night They Don'T Understand

Echoing- echoing, the bones are young
Filled with yellowed specters, like song birds who saw
It all
And were turned away- down from the yellow sun,
A goddess torn,
Or other beautiful things that flood in the spring
In a coitus of joy or forget-me-nots,
While the grandparents are at church, their oldest daughter
In a grave at the top of the hill,
And swing-sets in their arc- while a brown muse
Curls like burning paper,
Up to the ashes of the cliff dwellers, who make their songs
Like water moccasins swimming up into the sky-
Wings and elbows moving across the stage,
A garden of lovers lost in a classroom or a supermarket,
As we made love until her husband called
Home- the crepuscule of cedar, incense of forgotten parks,
Lovers led astray from frightened fireworks,
As my dogs say nothing to the night they don't understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Night Where You Were Mine

Now I will be singing in a rodeo of empty houses:
And I don't know any other words other than these joyless places-
The places that we've picked upon themselves
And the songs that we believe in echo
The parapets of the cockpits of the shopping malls -
And the housewives—
Or I love you, smelling of my mother's magic tricks,
Or the pornographies of jack rabbits leaping out of the back seats
Of Volkswagens in the sandpits on the other side of
The canals—
And it all seems a brighter realm, made by the vocabularies
All accumulated together that were made particularly to sense
The places: you see—I've been to high school too—
And I otherwise have a sense for the unbounded catastrophes,
And I've been up and down in some realms—
That either happened real or imaginary—
And maybe the girl I once loved with eventually come down
To see me in the snow-white estuaries—
Brown skipped—veluptous—looking out of the folds of the Blanket—Gladdened with her eyes as bright as Ferris Wheels and her skin as brown as the lactates of honeys—
That this is her world too—and I am her world too—
And we are just coming up, like water rising over the benchmarks—
And I love you now, even as I see your echo receding—
And the brilliant sun—and the memory of the places
That no one remembers—
The parked cars and the silent airplanes—and the jasmine—
Blooming in the moment of the night where you were mine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nightmares Of Their Shuddering Metamorphosis

Bilious and immature,
The fire lives for a second on the spot-
Flames, at times rotund,
Struggle lithely, starving beneath the coital belies of
The airplanes- silver amphibians there:
Nubile women learning to fly:

They leap over the second's life,
Celebrating the careers of freedom, not bothered
By words they do not know-
Sommeliers of nocturnal oxygens- maidens
Who once slumbered in the balmy dews with the Foxes in the grasses underneath of the boughs of A presupposed orchard-

Hollowed bones, feathered, discarding the entrapments
Of chain-mail,
And the battlements of stone- the electronic fortresses
That hunt them in the night,
And the kings who are haunted by the nightmares of Their shuddering metamorphosis.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nights In The Airplanes

As fine as the memories of those windows:
Glad expressions of personified houses
Making eyes with the alligators perpetually lounging
In the backyard dredged of their domain:
And when they have a reason to feel her, in the rain
Storm,
Before her husband or children come home—
She waits beating inside of them like a heart that Moves around according to her chores
And drinks from a tiny village of crystal glasses—
Hypnotized though erect,
So to her each raindropp has a voice she cannot understand—
Listening to the sky falling into the earth,
Like a sorority into a football game—drowning out
What is left of her soap-operas—the house a glowing Giant because she is somewhere off inside of him—
Like a habitat made for her,
The alligator looking across the moats and up into her
Seclusion—not a thought in her mind—
While the knights in the airplanes quest for her
Forlornly from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nighttime Wildlife

They made a massacre underneath the sun—maybe they Were just playing with themselves—
While, in the tomorrow, the sun would jump up yelping and Asking for help
Even though there was nothing left that was owed to Him—
And then the moon would rise, hoping to steal the gossip
From the ropes of your business,
As the tears dried off the hurricane,
And the silver foxes settled down underneath whatever mountains
Where they were, until the most Beautiful of the nighttime wildlife cried out from under neath
The parapets of its cathedrals that was Then all that there was—
And whenever the moon came out it dried the eyes of the foxes,
And then settled down in the amphitheaters
That pretended to gossip over whatever it was that wasn't even
There.

Robert Rorabeck

The No Particular Disaster

Fall into the games of dead men,
The no particular disaster.
I had never before been out
In this late of an afternoon,
And I shouldn't....
For they are making love in the barn,
Just painted and yet coagulated,
And the rattlesnakes are catching,
In their venomous solar diamonds,
The last of the drowsy sky
Where the ghost ships begin to creak,
Loud and unafraid
Their men taunting me worse
Than they have ever done before:
They are playing the games of
A kindergarten, stretching out the hours,
Throwing back the rum they cannot taste,
And tossing the weighted bones....
The cats are yet still sleeping in the Lengthening shallow places of Convenient shadows, and they will
Wake up again, nice and clean,
As the lovers step out of the red barn
Smelling just like the others....
But they will not have to say a thing,
As the gray felines step between them,
Swishing their tails.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Animal

The nocturnal animal who feels alright to move
Into the middle of nowhere,
Underneath the bridge, the canal the cradle
For the lost bicycle—
As words ship out for other loves,
As I think about drinking again—Florida rum
In the sunlight of this new cold front—
My pregnant wife wants to sleep,
Like a fairy in the forest—
As I dream of a muse that doesn't exist—
My emotions becoming lost
In the cantankerous graveyards that look like
The rest of my relatives—
Until the simple thoughts beckon and all at once
Nothing has to be given or taken anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Aphrodisiac

In prisms that happen outside of School,
The fish swim upwards to look at knights—
Boys on quests with fireworks,
Waving their banners
And their swords—
Making friends with hypochondriacs
Who wave at them from their uneven windows—
Say now that they are uncertain if they are Even alive—each of their televisions
Their motivations sanctuaries and wishing well—
Maybe after dark they will come and see
You after work—your lips to quaff, your love
To strive—for you are
The nocturnal aphrodisiac of their nocturnal
Heroics when they should be home counting
Sheep and dreaming of lesser girls
And marrying them through Christmases and holidays
Of lives of lesser weeks.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Curtain

Now I am here—where are you—slow shoulders
In my space
While the lawn is growing, and I am exhumed
Twilight: twilight,
The dresses of the housewives are changing—
Their bread is done baking—
They have dawned their diamonds, their silhouettes
Reflected in the pools seem too
Of muses,
As we travel across the yards, their greens dimming
In the ballrooms of crepuscule,
As all of the characters are figured out
And the nocturnal curtain descends.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Habitats Of An Insincere Moon

Words, words: you pile up like colors,
Like excrement on the floor of kindergarten,
And I can still remember my dirt roads that I
Disbelieved in,
And I saw kidnappers, and I had so many fireworks,
But the truth is that I only desire the kiss from
One set of lips,
And she is away from me, even though we made love:
And she is sleeping in another man's bed,
And she remembers her honeymoon even though they Weren't legally married,
And now that the day has come to this,
I can say that I don't see the yards anymore or their colors:
It all seems like the closing curtains of Alma's eyes
Have run over me,
And we sat together yesterday in the restaurant and I felt
Her legs like the crisscrosses of smooth rivers,
Like the foundations of romantic planets that are still too
Close to the sun to breathe upon:
And now this, like riding a unicorn or a Pegasus, something that Is sincerely impossible and shouldn't Be spoken of:
All of the best leaders are dead anyways, and their cenotaphs
Whistle like construction workers:
And now this:
The feeling that her womb was sometimes warmly baking on My bed,
And that I planted the recipe in her deltas but it never came
To fruition,
And now all that I have is my bicycle and the paths to move
Towards her treats that
Are perpetually encouraging me, like mirages in the misplaced
Deserts of roses who hold their breath through the Nocturnal habitats of an insincere moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Summertime Of A Celestial Carrousel

Nothing else is beautiful,
Because I didn't stop by the liquor store
And I can't count to high numbers;
And I've forgotten what I consequently learned
In college,
So forgetful even then when the leaves were turning,
When it took them forever to touch the earth,
To drip upon their family the syrupy inclinations
Of that season's incest;
Grey haired and ringed, a desultory creature of These mountains, still in love with his mother,
You can tell by which way I am coming if you listen
For the lulling tongues of my dogs.
Otherwise, I can't even recognize myself anymore,
When I drive to and from town displacing the air
Ever so slightly with my inherited wings,
Listening to the crinkly roar of young mothers all ablaze
At the supermarket,
I pick out a movie to slip into tonight, and so the stars
Begin their celestial alignments like beautiful teenage
Dancers courting too far above my head to smell,
To even begin to suggest upon their prophecies;
Yet, senselessly they perfume me,
And yet so very high up they turn perfectly contented in Their airless bedrooms;
I imagine their flairs crying for what boys they love,
Even their earliest light anciently shed,
So that if I might look upon their bright camouflage,
Like a nest of fire-lit muses insighted, I could only make Up names for them, and they wouldn't come when I called, but they are all just as beautiful
As if I lived at home with them,
An their names seem to echo around the earth, basking
The spiritual pugilisms of atheists and the more devoted vertebrae
In the nocturnal summertime of a celestial carrousel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nocturnal Things

Plagiarism in your hands is not love—
It is a simulacrum underneath the French mountains
That will never metamorphose
Fooled by a cat or a fox that you are coming home,
And slipped inebriate with the daisies underneath the Windowsill—
Drawing the lines it knows how to draw:
As you sway like a wave escaped from the sea—
Sauntering atop the bricks in a buxomly censure with
You pretty boy lieutenant made of bayonets—
He entertains you with the drills,
As the girls leap in the sky—flying in airplanes of Leaping candles—and the nocturnal things melt with My wishes into the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Noises With Their Rooms

As softly as the children sleeping on their lancesâ€&quot;
At last in a childish bivouac of kindergartenâ€&quot;
They leave these spaces weâ€™ve invadedâ€&quot;
They sift into the heavensâ€&quot;
They are whatever elements weâ€™ve forgotten, lasting
Above the cypressâ€&quot;
Beautifying in their trauanciesâ€&quot;;they languish as they are divided:
The same as a moat in the tiniest of living roomsâ€&quot;
They are the silvering candles of a firework in their recesses:
And I have appreciated them all of the afternoon:
I have mooned over them
In their ethereal gardenâ€&quot;;as the stars they have bloomed,
Opening their eyes from their long recessesâ€&quot;
And filling up the noises with their rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Noon Tipped Sea

I am here mouthing off to the fish who always move:
The thunder is sounding, the traffic is muted:
I am warmed into my home, while Alma's pony-tails
And miniskirts are off a ways and sleep,
Like the spindling iron pyrites of Ferris wheels who don't Even believe in themselves:
And then they arrive straight out of the jungles of Car ports and trailer parks:
And when we have children the first thing they learn is
To light off fireworks,
And we watch those things that we don't even know how
They were made bursting above us:
And I love you, Alma, and I talked with your aunt today:
Your godmother; she's lost thirty pounds since
Her man Romiro left her to f$ck his cousin in guerrero
Mexico,
And now it seems like the planets still exist, and I will be going Back to work with you again tomorrow, or Friday,
And your young sister Yvette will be coming to work for The fin de Semanas on Saturday:
And I love you, but the trouble is I cannot spell, and yet my Soul is still filled with the faux and disbelieving dramas of Hollywood
Which I guess infect all of our souls while we are young and Growing up and latchkeys on the prenatal field in the baseball game
Of whatever these stars believe, as we go blistering, naked-hearted
Or feet bared like milking kittens, the curtains and furniture
Spread like an autopsy of a really beautiful forest;
And then there will be a parade, and we will go out beyond our screened in Doors and have to blasphemy the heavens that cost us our whole
Heavens as the egrets rise up like green emeralds,
And we buy a cradle as bright as the noon-tipped sea;
And I say I love you; and yes, yes I do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Noontimes Of Their Tomorrows

Imperfection,
And then songs over the Christmases of Rooftops:
Trying to look beautiful if you can,
While another day laments,
And the bums cough tears underneath
The overpass
Into a can,
As the unicorns dissolve,
As our currency decreases-
As the beasts make love far beneath
The roses
Of roses:
So far down,
Making the hummingbirds angels, while
All of their songs tend to dissolve:
Like the apertures of noontime- as your sisters
Count their own scars,
And you continue building your pyres to Worship your landmines:
As the pictures dissolve in the most tender
Ways possible,
And then the sky floats across the sea,
Trying to light all of the open mouths of all of
The noontimes of their tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nude Elements Of The Lamenting Plain

Crippled deities condoned to flame,
Burning upwards is their game- this midway about them
Gets busy, teasing prizes-
And the panoply of lights gardening ride in their Irises;
It becomes a noisy beauty toyed with until overused-
Trashed, it is quieted- as the tourists leave out in the night:
They will go with one another, holding hands
Until they disappear all together;
And there I will remain, wishing I was one of them,
Until the carnival that was once all around me
Is packed up into another rain
The teasing mechanisms folded like sheets- the simulacrums
Of its amusements of love's overused pedaling
Eagerly quieted- abandoning all that I believed to the nude elements
On the lamenting plain
While the angels metamorphose into husbands of modest Households, stealing away their housewives
And joining to the sky again-
Like the very airplanes which they find so richly amusing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nudity Of A Drowsy Opulence

Crowns in the passionate grass, kindling lost love
Letters to the paper airplanes
Who no longer have any unction to fly away:
They just look up at her skirts as she resurrections,
As she crowns:
Grapes on the vines of consumptive professors, and other Words than these, curling up their unmolested shoulders:
Hooded, poisonous,
And they will go around campus sucking their thumbs,
Remembering and petulant on the bruises,
While the prettier girls will stay out all night, serving their Drinks across from the Catholic church and having their Fancies until the ghosts and the orchards grow fat;
And the forts next to the sea pregnant with moonlight
Fill out.
And it all becomes desirably surreal, the beaches peppered with Tortoises making their abodes for the night in the sandy hotels
That will become transformed and be speckled with their
Love,
Which the gulls so love, turning gyres and sad, lousy tricks:
Getting down to the anemones, and basking in the nudity of A drowsy opulence.

Robert Rorabeck

The Number That They Will Give To The New Heavens

This is the number that they will give to the
New heavens:
After they find out she is in the middle of child birth
Or she is dying at the same time:
Mother a black hole: mother of
The Bible—
And race-horses—Won't you watch us put
Garland around the tree—Won't you give us time
To figure out what you are still doing here—
And I cannot call her,
Even while she is above my head wearing a crown
Of racehorses—
And I cannot figure out those devils,
Though I will be going back to school tomorrow,
And filling up my vertebrae with the bric-a-brac of Abandoned carriages:
And it doesn't feel alright, and yet it all comes smoothly:
The sound and smell of distant traffic-
And the metamorphosis of my child living inside of Her mother's womb—On the other side of the world:
Tomorrow, she will be taking a twenty hour train
Ride towards a place I am too afraid to spell—
And today my child is almost a grape—and yesterday
A fish—tomorrow a cheerleader and then
A real woman—not a puppet, nor a wet dream—
Something that caves into diamonds,
Something that can ride horses and read a book—
And can be seen silhouetted into the sea of far too many Ways, echoing and waving—
For sure that she is delighted to be alive in a mirage
Of a circus of migratory butterflies,
Because tomorrow there won't be anyone else—
And you can kiss me on the cheek in the sidelines of Far too many ways—
Remembering that once I loved you, and once you did
The same—and for now
We can only remember, as new mirages arrive on
The surface, beating their phantoms of hearts,
And building to crescendos

In the hearts of lotus that bloom in the shallow waters
That lie not so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Numbers Of Aspens

In the numbers of aspens,
Airplanes singing, I have my wife—I have my wife,
And now my child—
Rainbows stutter towards the kaleidoscopes of Brick-a-brack of the homeless unicorns:
It was supposed to be a baseball game,
In all weathers, but especially on valentines—
And then the windows stuttered,
And even the luckiest of the gold fish caught a cold—
And it turned out to be all some kind of make-believe—
And the weathers surrendered to their favorite
Stewardesses—
And other words that cannot be repeat because
It just so happens they didn't survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nurseries In The Afternoons

Wishes in the daylight as the wounds of ourselves
Spill over,
And coagulated with the nurseries in the afternoons
Where my love for you disappears,
And I find myself alone reciprocating to the echoes
Of the vineyards far away from the mountains
And no longer busied by Christmas:
Just my pitiful art, held to the moonlight in the shallows
And tied by a bouquet of eels:
While your passion finds another chariot to ride upon:
Up and up again, past the stalagmites
And the industrious mines where all of the cherished
Knights are buried:
So, eventually, the mountain gets emptied,
And the dragons, in clusters, consume the fires of heaven
And other pretty verbs that used to be tied up in Translucent or indigo ribbons in your hair-
As the elephants wander aimlessly, as the airplanes leap into Air.

Robert Rorabeck

The Nursery Rhyme To Which He Was Over And Done With

I have no more reason to live that isn't Alliterative and done out,
Already remembered and ejaculated on some
Green space in my mind,
Spilling out like a butchered cow tongue
All the girls who didn't deserve
The cheap bouquets I've thrust to them,
Like cutting their throats and stuffing them full
Of busy incense:
And how the worker bees are busy making honey
From such wasted and nonsensical declivities.
Luckily, most of that sorority didn't know how
I pined from them from wetted graveyards while
They made love to their firefighters and mayhem,
Or they didn't care,
And are amusing themselves with my uncle
In a collage of speed boats;
And it has been a long time since I've received
The praises of shop class, or watched her spinning
Amputated in hospitals,
And it keeps going around like this until I am too
Dizzy not to feel beautiful,
But then I always have to take time to think,
To stop the swing, and remember where I buried the Pornographies in the roots of palmettos;
I have to hate myself and try to not remember why it
Is she isn't calling but once every six months,
To appease myself by propositioning the homeless dwarfs,
What I am becoming,
The silent absence on the pages of a useless harem,
That great leggy sorority done hyperventilating and kicking
Their skirts up for me,
Done spinning their frilly parasols on the lacquered stage, and Gone to bed with more genteel members of our species,
Time for me to be alone and to look out for fires
Atop of mountains, like Jack was doing before his usual suicide,
While the candle was burning still awaiting the Nursery rhyme to which he was over and done with.

Robert Rorabeck

The Obscure Blindness's

Lost in the deep symbols of the deep
Vermillion deep,
But diving again, diving forever wishing
For the jewelry chests of her
Heart:
There are sirens and chases around her:
Little boys are playing dark games even Though they cannot swim-
I feel awful when I disturb them; yet I
Go beneath the lion fish,
And through the spokes of bicycles
In a lucid dance of scribbles, knowing
That she grows her gardens in the obscure
Blindness's of these depths.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ocean Between The Moon And The Earth

Lost underneath the heavens,
Or into the strange palmettos of witches,
But it doesn't have to last forever:
The tomb will be reawakened,
And all of the best part of the country will Come alive in a cavalier memory-
Of that brilliant sport-
And what a song, spume of the throat,
And in her eyes a carnival
Never published- words sacrificed to the Surreal in fieldtrips of Carnivals already abandoned in the palmettos
And cypress
After there was a fire,
And the rattlesnakes kiss the citrus canker-
And the school busses circle the stars
A long ways off as an asteroid
The size of a battleship passed through
The ocean between the moon and the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Oceans Beating Their Hearts

Anything that means anything
To me
Is a sadness- and, yes, the serpent
Echoes
Up in the apple tree, telling truths
I took for sadness:
While in the airplanes pass
They roar
Like lions of sadness who are also Personified:
Coming down, doing jumping jacks
Like fireworks dying
In the cloud banks, showing off
Some lights
And some heel- but going down:
Magnifying everything that appears at sea
Level
And the oceans beating their hearts
And say so many things that we are never Meant to hear.

Robert Rorabeck

The Official Stamps Of Her Loveliest World

Twisted up in the cold studios of jellyfish,
Tied into knots for Alma not even able to read full length books,
Just buying cartoons for Heidi,
And picturing her and her mother in Pieta on the swings
In a living-joy sort of world whose colors just get Brighter and brighter
Where luxurious museums loom with trumpets and the grass gets Tipsy and bows,
And everything gets its turn of pressing its mouths to Alma's
Flesh,
And me begging especially that she should bare the official stamps
Of her loveliest world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Oil Rig's Birthday

Virulent glade, open for me- and wear
Your green stars about your wrist: Smile summertime,
And swing your hips,
Knowing I will never succeed:
I am just counting coup in a field of atomic sport-
I'm using a dead art to fight the new angelic fireworks;
I'm leaning back and closing my eyes into the Siamese headed lion
With all the chlorinated kindergarteners sticking
Tiny fists into their mouths, not knowing if I should succeed:
I've put my keys on the as$ of a kite and sent it
Sailing in all sorts of your domestic weathers,
Waiting for you to slash my hopes, to send me popping
All over the mercy seat and then the bag:
I am doing all of this like a legless ballerina out in a somnolent
Parade in Saint Augustine, not even knowing she'll never Be picked,
Not even knowing her mother is lying even now under the
Just transplanted rose bushes;
And the conquistadors proceed like zinc and copper cenotaphs,
And the priests sell candles for two cents,
And it is the oil-rig's birthday just bathing there like a stilted
Butterfly house;
I sell ice-cream and hotdogs to stave off the impenitent dreams-
When I once thought she would emerge freshly brindled from
The sea- But she doesn't come-
I once saw her drive by very fast in a new car with her man,
But she never looked my way;
And the windmills turn, all sorts of them, smiling like Queen
Anne- the royalty who know but never speak your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Old Man's Dream Tower

Our dreams come from
The glass tower
Sparkling for ships.
There is an old man
Who lives there
Who has crystal spindles
For hips.
As we nod, it is his job
To refract the light of
The teaming in the sea:
The hungry cuttings and leaping
Of waves and slapping wind
And silver shingled fish,
To bend the movement
Through our open windows
All sailing in a front
Blown off
The Residential Coast.

There he spots us like passengers
In a jigsaw airplane unarranged
Through the clouds,
Like floating candles creating the Monsoons of smoke.
The bulbous deluge of roofs
In rearranging constellation housing
Dark blue
Mumbling fools....

Then the light shimmies
Through the tower,
Tinkling like glasses pressed to lips
At meal time,
And crosses through his hips.
Leaping a full color spectrum,
It knocks down our Front doors
And blows the cat
From its perch in the kitchen.

Running into our bedroom,
It jumps into bed with us,
Right into us
And tells us in secrets rushing
The tales of our doppelganging
Shadows
Who shoplift all day
Like uneducated,
Forgetful truants
In lazy strip malls
Far beneath the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Old Playgrounds

While Dracula was whispering,
I jerked off:
I skirted Miami and looked into her trailer,
I worked for my parents,
And I jerked off:
Later on,
Maybe I went to Disney World,
Maybe I was a knight who just didn't care—
Maybe I made love to myself,
Over and over, repeatedly
Just so later, I could make my Asian wife
Pee in her pants—
And I gave her orgasms like ant farms,
Like new ways of behaving to the battlements of Baseball games—
While all of the midnight's origami was coming
Apart like the accoutrements to the wings
Of a paper airplane—
Until it was settled and
All of the nation was divided—well, here
I was, and here I am anyways—
Waking vampires like daisies beside the road of narcolepsies,
Calling up the fancies of the routes of bygone days,
And the housewives hum
And then remember what was lost to them inside the Inebriations of their own telltale shadows—
Falling in love with the delusions of madmen
While I become the prettiest delusion of my own species:
While I remain on the rack for a long while—
Whatever the time keeps for itself—
The old memories cast their dice over
The playgrounds that don't exist here anymore anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Oldest Cities Of This World

Not far from my eyes
In a jungle of grey and silver gold,
Where the conquistadors once fought for
Your mother,
And the airplanes got stuck like tattle-tales
Up in the trees;
And the most beautiful place was the capitol
Where all of the ineligible women lived
In a hypothetical university where they Studied heart-throbs—
And it was here that the shadows panhandled them
While my pregnant wife breathed heavily from
Our bedroom: here was where the muses
That could not handle it
Laid themselves—across the habit of that
Campus, just a fever-dream too old now
To even complete their degree—
Their eyes fawning drunkenly, perceive
The habitats I imagine, taking homes in the Half-gloves of the sleeping habitats in the oldest Cities of the world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Oldest Of His Species

In this nostalgic
Penumbra
I eat my lunch
Like a sad
Fish
Wondering
Why everything moves
Away
From high school,
Forgetting that
Such places were
Not always
So beautiful
Or that the devil
That walked
In your Legs
Still echoes in
The sad and Warm
Places
My mind yet
Swims
Looking back
Like one of
The oldest of
His species
Yet still Alive
And you are
There remaining
In the lake
Of my Breast,
An Orchid
Obscured by Yesterday's Tears

That somehow
Remains alive,
Coursing like
Minnows through me,
Schooling in
My throat,
Giving dark vows
Like the inner shadows
Of bells that never ring
Nor come true for
The oldest of his Species.

Robert Rorabeck

The Once Brave Men

Groomed as if to be a pilot, and then lying there
Reclining as if triaged in the half light of a living room-
An astronaut who never got even higher than the arboretum
Of apple trees:
Not even quite high enough to see the goblins and the Dragon approaching- and then to go down
From there, helped by the Mexicans and their sad dreams and strong liquor-
Wayward like the naked changing rooms in an autumn
Falling down from the world- while everything else moving Onwards only multiplying the complexity of the universe-
Fireworks resembling her features in the sky
The tourists frolic towards in their mobile cities,
While the insatiable mountain lion drags off the last of
The once brave men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Once Fair Grounds

Glass cooling into the daydreams of class:
All of his eyes running across the desks with the elk
And the rain deer:
Afraid to look at the beautiful women, the grounded substitutes:
The housewives taking time off
From attending to super exaggerated trailer parks
Until evening looms,
Marooning baseball diamonds,
Making witches fluster on their brooms- returning to the daycares
Of the tiny cul-de-sacs of forests:
And the feral girls living there for awhile growing lustrous horns,
Returning to the rabbits who feast with them
On the endives and scuppernongs underground:
Until they too finally have to forget themselves
And travel up the stone rivers to colleges and universities:
And the other cemeteries of the once fair grounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The One Or Two Beautiful Places

Oh, THE one or two beautiful
Places see, to be shot out
Never mindful of the hemisphere or anything else
We had to believe in:
This is us all and us all right here:
It isn't the prettiest of all resolutions,
But this is how it always happened,
Her children starving out in the middle of a park
Inside of her echinopsis—and, anyways,
This is just how we imagined that you
Would have to starve out inside
The playboy centerfolds of anyways and just Because—
The beautiful monuments
And the homes that were once inside the Otherwise wayward realms that otherwise
Could not believe in the waywardly bedrooms
And monuments that other wise tried to Believe otherly and just because.

Robert Rorabeck

The One Who Got Away

Oh well, the day wakes up so fast.
All of a sudden the ten grizzly bears run off
From where they'd been nuzzling my meats:
I think they suspected that if they cracked me open,
Like a comb they'd find some honey;
And with them the shadows waken up, black eyed,
At first lengthen but then thoroughly retreat,
Around noon
And the raccoon sleeps with my eyes in the wheel wells
Of our slick machines,
The day gets healthier and young wives have Adulterous picnics,
And kindergarteners start off in their own woods to Turn into the stymied or clever animals of Fables;
And I have a favor to ask: and I am biting my lip,
But you are always so busy talking, or masticating with
Your venerable creatures of the forest,
That I have a hard time disturbing you,
Tapping you on your shoulder, or to razzle-dazzle
You with spikenard;
So instead I do this: I do this while all the prized
Angels are taken down from the top shelves
Even as the carnival moves away,
And the beautiful creatures and sleuthy forests
Somehow get on down to another eager city,
All things moving on at a steady clip
As I wait right behind you in class, waiting for you
To turn and acknowledge,
Or just to shift your weight so I might get one more
Glance at the one who got away.

Robert Rorabeck

The One Who Is Falling Apart (Censored)

Come to the new land of vibrant filament,
Like phosphorescent moss on the underside of the hazel planet
In the wet spots where caterpillars best transform,
Where the angels are talking at the end of their chords;
The milkmaids are marching in the pollinated valley,
Where the gray generals are waiting in the wooden chairs
For their haircuts;
All the medals are sparkling like half-blind sunbursts,
The little epileptic ruptures slur speech like wine;

Under the boxcar shadows, the infants are sleeping in the cool trestles,
Next to the soldiers' patiently blue boots,
Swished and fed by the calicos come down the steep slope;
The patient cats who bat at pu*sy-willows,
And assemble the lunar milk with their spiked tongues;

Down in the wishing pools at the end of the lazy fires,
Past the toppled apple-crates and the one-eyed maiden's tears;
There in the cul-de-sac of torpid paladins,
Where the boys have fallen asleep in the deciduous trees forgetting
Their journey of the scattered kites;

I have to tell you a story of a wooden boy who sold his leg,
To find a ticket for the leprous girl to cross the sea;
Here he is waiting in the green tent for the bugle to echo the c*ck's harbingering;
Then he will come out like a man of assembled metal,
And stand at the attention to the gray officers' perusing;

Underneath their shining boots, in a world of muted solace,
The felines are feeding the forgotten orphans in the cool trestles;
And the milk maids are marching in a short-skirted séance;
And the wooden boy is nervous, because he knows and loves
The one who is falling all apart....

Robert Rorabeck

The One You Were Meant To Be With

Joy to the French girls I have Never seen-
The ones Rimbaud never kissed-
Because, I am intoxicated-
And feeling the joy of serpents
Who on their bellies spin the
Earth,
And my art takes the shape
Of a werewolf
Barefooted on a lycanthropic
Honeymoon
Strangers keep disturbing-
A blind werewolf with Blue marbles for eyes
Who is growing a gut
In the immaculate darkness
In a cathedral of vanished pilots
Who tried to disseminated this Religion and dissapeared
While you stay in bed all
Winter
And your mother washes so
Many dishes- she becomes A poltergeist staring across the Canal- and the world of
Your first love dissapears-
And tben the next
And so on
Until the one you were Meant to be with comes to Stay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ones Who Shouldn'T Have To Die

Patience for movies escapes me.
Lightning in a traffic of blue sky and I'm
In a mobile home waiting for the Caravans of my father and his Mexicans,
Regretting what I've done to myself,
What I've said to myself while looking away
From the mirror,
Frightened of hideous fairytales- The new years
Celebrations of candles and grapes,
Like empty vines scarred from fire without her
Bosom;
And the shallowly glorious lakes she has never drunken
From,
But they seem to come to her, my father and his Mexicans,
The clichéd airplanes like heavy song birds touching down,
While I hold my careworn leonine face in a crèche of Oily fingers-
The same teachers are here, the same buzzards in a gossiping
Cone of sky,
Their gods sitting back and relaxing, enjoying the moment,
Knowing that out of all of us
They are the ones who shouldn't have to die.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ones Who Survive Over Me

Going down into the ditch Indian style:
A hero of the first or second war;
A halo no one will see tonight as I lay immaculate
On my bed by and by with my dogs,
What a perfect purple hearted saint, or suicide
Machine-gunner: It gets pedantic, the staccato tap of My stunted vocabulary, my rubber bullets
Just bruise her chest, trying to get at her heart:
Insignificant wounds, ineffective bee stings she kills
Away with a shot of any kind, and she's good to go:
She's made it all the way to the runway:
She's taking off directly in the sun, and impossible
To see to comprehend how beautiful she is:
And my body and soul is derivative of the homeless man,
Going down in a clutch of weeds. The one the sorority of Poisonous snakes licks the ears of, gives kisses to the Lobes, and then crawls away by the crack of dawn
Their mother-of-pearl bellies showing; or I can see them leaping over so
Many ditches, irrigations and subjunctive easements good
For nimble legged truancies hand in hand in musicals starring Boys better looking than me, or with sugar-daddies with Better money: high-heeled, the four-legged kind of thief,
And I've fallen off the wall she told me she would be Waiting for me there; and I'm all messed up and the Knights came, but I still hadn't a prayer-
So there she goes leaping, a ship out to sea while I'm Some kind of hero, heartache yet un translated down at the Curb where the housewives come home at different times very Near one another with paper bags filled to
The brim with dinner, pressing corrugated cans to their Nippled breasts with cantaloupes and dry good to feed the Lips of the ones who survive over me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Creatures Who Only Seem To Really Be

Parasols that aren't even real, carousals of chalk Madams;
And I can't even save my sister. My tongue is dry and Stuck like a bat to the roof of my mouth;
And nothing moves and it is just like silk dressing
Rooms left vacant through the shallows;
And at night I dream of girls I should never dream
Of:
Girls who are married: They are all married,
And their eyes are the sea flowing in and out of Incredible bays.
If any one of them saw me they might love me for tomorrow
And a day,
But all of the rest of it would just be my graveyard, just
As it should always be:
And the airboats float through the sky while my grandmother
Is underground;
And so soon I will be underground, and I've already had Enough of all of these stores
And the brilliant senses mutating in orgies through the sky-
I just wanted to adopt her children and brush her
Thigh,
But she moved on after the first kiss of evening;
And she is so confused she doesn't even know what to believe,
And she goes back to him and waits and the shadows surcease;
They seem to breath as the highway sucks in and waits:
They are the only creatures who only seem to really be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Echo In The World

The liquor has a new name as she makes love with Her husband in one bedroom of a three bedroom house;
And there is neither applause or moonshine:
It is raining, and her soul is as quiet as a mouse, and she is the Personification of her name
As she moves her skin across the brown adobe:
It is the same color, and she has hurt me: hurt me;
It is the only echo in the world,
But what is her name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Feeling That I Can Feel

Little children speak to the bird houses near the sea;
It seems that they have been growing up and up,
Pantomimes of who they ought to be:
Little children as soft as the lights who weep inside the Houses of toy soldiers while their Women are counting sheep;
But the neighborhood has no need to worry, because all of its Property lines are as soft as they can be:
While at the heart of the neighborhood, down past the tourists
And so near the sea as to be touching, the fort is just as steady as it Can be:
The fort that has a soul of copper cannons, where I have strolled
And touched the coquina fleshes of the ancient and prosperous
World;
And where I have wished to love girls here that I will never hold,
But who I have seen like phantoms weightless up and Down the prosperous rows;
And maybe the way I have been calling them has been selfish and Unreal,
But if it is false, then false is the only feeling that I can feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Gods They Can Understand

Off in a tent
Just after being married- all the words left
Her tongue:
Naked, the trees sparkling outside,
The sky wandering like shadows through an Opulent orchard;
And she bends like a ripe instrument
Trying to detect the coming hour
Of his touch,
And the children that will swim in her
Symmetry,
Counting their nascent chalk games like Innocent serpents finding their Way into a park
Where the vultures sing like angels
Around which the housewives live and change
Into the same things at dusk,
After dinner:
And like mailboxes they are filled with bills
And love letters-
While some other fellow's cats prowl the night,
Swinging their tails through the moats
Smudging the yards
And talking to the only gods they can understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Instances That Let Me Live

All the day bullwhips and I drink:
Super heros who have become too heavy for their Britches sink and drink underneath the Old homestead's overpasses,
And I have been trying out without any hope of accomplishment:
And I wonder what Alma looked like going to high school,
Except that she never went:
Alma was pregnant and embarrassed on a bus straight through Texas and to the limestone beds of Florida even while she was turning sixteen:
The same age as her younger sister who just had her confirmation
Across the street from where we used to sell Christmas trees,
And I've asked Alma to marry me a couple of times,
And I have bought Alma many things:
But where is she now, the graveyards sing with their vastly sunken
Fraternity of entrenched kings:
But she is here, walking over them with so many legs, like
A water spider, like an orchid in Monet:
And she doesn't even know how she awakens the vermilion
Yards during crepuscule
And makes them sing: while I am vastly alone, Alma:
All my nights are alone,
And the three times that you've been over to my house, they are Like a fairytale in which something important is given to a nameless
Hero,
Which allows him to defeat the evil things:
Mute and blind, I call to you from a burial mound that shoots like
The cataracts of newly resurrected venison,
For your brown skin walking onto my property turns a mausoleum into A fairground:
Alma, being with you are the only instances that let me live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only One

I am wounded,
And I am scarred:
between classes, I crawl to the Ocean,
But end up with my wants shelled
Beneath hijacked cars:
And I hide all day when it rains:
When it rains I especially love
You,
And I want to die, but I don't Know the way:
Oh, if I could only be so talented,
S-,
S-,
The pet and master of this séance,
Would that I had never meant you,
Or that you had so haplessly persuaded me upon
Your bicycle of skeletons:
You only wanted to love me for so long,
S-,
But look what you've done:
The sea is so far away from me,
S-,
And you are married,
And the monsters have sacked me and brought Me beneath your mountain where you
No longer care about me,
S-,
But where they still race cars for fun:
And I will never forget you,
S-,
But the buzzards are like custard guns,
Especially in the winter where everything
Flips over weeping,
Like dragons giving their weaknesses away.
Why do they do that for you,
S-?
It must be because they love you,
S-, and they want to give you all the gold they've

Been hording,
And they want to share their magic rings
With you,
S-,
Because at the end of the long journey,
Don't you know,
Sharon, that it turns out you are the Only one.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only One Still Fresh Enough To Truly Love

Choking and spitting the asparagus and the meat
Of your better man,
But not the one who gave you that child,
Your fireman, your blue anchor who is never sad,
While I just spread out my words to feed the Pigeons: They don't even care anymore, but I think It's been a long time since they've Enjoyed their feeding,
Because my heart is severed and well stocked in
The rolling concession stand driven around by
The beautiful Columbian named Diana:
Her no good husband out gallivanting somewhere
In the airplane wrecked jungles of South America,
Her other man home all day making love
To American women and watching game shows:
I would say that what I have is not a crush but
And oral fixation,
But there is my major romantic organ on sale
Cooling just above the stockyards of ice:
I wonder what she'll charge me- Maybe more or less
Than the next guy,
But it will be my heart she is feeding us,
The only one still fresh enough to truly love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Other Woman

Pedaling bicycles through the backyards of
Our graves:
The sun whipping down against the backsides of
The slaves:
The Mexicans cleaning house finally never have to Move;
Medusas sweeping in with the evening news:
All the short films over the cartoons of latchkeys,
Breathing beside the languid
Crocodiles beneath the shivering eaves: The sky roars
Up for awhile; it flumes like the fountains of Alma's brown skin,
But returns to its quiet, and slicks across the windmills,
As my mother washes clothes barefooted in
The disremembered carports, still the only other Woman I have ever loved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Thing I Can Believe

What color is this, unused of by the hinges,
Bled off the excrement of butterflies: vagabonds of the working class
Knighthood,
Reversing through the drives, as the windows crush on waves,
And never getting anywhere: but bleeding forward through the eaves
Of emergencies, facsimiles that seem to care:
Runaway to Colorado, California and more of the letter C's:
I want to open a fruiteria and open up my wrists
Underneath the lonely-werewolf traffics that never stop to think of
Me:
And you seem to be fireproof: you seem to be spelled so correctly
And pure:
And you want to holiday back again into your Mexico, but your husband
Said no:
My Alma: you need an operation, even though you look as beautiful
As the month who birthed you,
As all of the wise men are traveling just to get a good spot underneath
The constellations of your crutches:
Who will make you move watermelons and then swim so far away,
Back into a holiday of white women who once they fully opened their Eyes will be horrendously envious of you:
And this, my vida, is the only thing I can believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Thing That Is Different

The night can be telescopic, and my eye got Punched;
I'm waiting for the stores to shut down-
I'm waiting for the arcades to wind down, for
The students to pass out from drink,
To slip into the street with their guitars unstrung,
To slip into the street and drool in the gutters of What dreams they have laid over from
Highschool-
Waiting for the cats to trick like coyotes,
And for the old girlfriend to finally stop pulling out
Her hair;
Here, in the golden turnabout where a cop pulled Me over a decade ago, I think of you as I thought of You a decade ago: Here, across the street from
The Chinese junks, from the yellow studios and the Naturally hairy lesbians nude in the nude pool-
All that is different is that I have new scars,
I've switched places- old friends have faded away into
New families, better words, employed;
And I'm still off in that night getting drunk my manager,
Will be leaving soon for Tallahassee to get my degree,
To fart and light off fireworks for Halloween,
To sunbathe in the graveyard of segregated confederates,
Wandering what tricks you would pull that night-
That night of sleeping bicycles and all my impotent haunts:
I knew you were calling off work, tasting the hemispheres
Of your blue fireman, and that was why I was getting drunk;
And that is why I'll be getting drunk again tonight.
Because, don't you still live in Gainesville, and aren't You still a beautiful auburn girl? Wherever my old girl is,
I'm sure she still has a bald spot,
And the only thing that is different is I have new scars,
And I'm waiting to get drunk.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Thing That Will Ever Lie Buried

It is strange that my old teacher has just Left my house,
And commented congratulating on all the little things
I have done to spruce up this place for
Alma:
That I have bought this house for her and turned it into A grotto for our Lady of Guadalupe,
And I have dreams at night now of a sixteen year old leaving the Streets of Guerrero,
Pregnant with her son Michael, traveling through the bastilles of Forests,
And the deciduous mangroves ululating with fat-winged Butterflies and pig-headed conquistadors
Or in the very least their cenotaphs:
But this brown girl is in another world, resting her head beside
The heads of her children on the other side of the highway,
While I am tucked in between the waves,
And the airplanes roar like gentlemanly beasts;
And now I think that I am in a graveyard where I am the only Thing that will ever lie buried.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Thing You Had To Pay

Bodies, starting off by themselves, get to know one another
By interspersing:
I check on them as I go through my day, like a maudlin canoe
With over sad eyes:
I don't even look up when my mother is coming through the door:
There the clouds lay like young men baptized but really in Love with someone else;
And I never felt what that was like: and maybe you came along
After it was all done, and the store was closed up:
Maybe you strolled through the super dark garden we'd been Trying to sell all day: maybe you remembered us,
Maybe we were the only thing you had to pay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Only Way You Learned To Move

I've been exercising my routine while I've Been very lonely: I am that very point that the airplanes
Are always leaping from.
Beautiful girls like does, like silver grasshoppers spilling their Guts to firemen,
Filigreed with the razzmatazz of their makeshift gazebos
After the curtains of the latening evening and the Church are closed,
And all the houses which I thought I'd want have been Sold: My best friend's older sister is having a picnic
With a wolf who knows karate;
And where are you but all the way down the belly of the teal embankment,
Making goo-goo eyes with all of your harborers of the time-honored
Traditions of reptilian gravity:
And maybe I've even seen you making love with the conquistadors
You've exhumed underneath the lightweight pine trees
While the buses move unsuspecting children in between the shows:
Maybe I've even seen you making love dressed in the pantomime
Of a grand egret's draping silhouette,
But maybe that is the only way you learned to move.

Robert Rorabeck

The Open Day

The heads of the reindeer were taking off into the sky:
The airplanes were taking off too;
Of their own accord and the truants were skipping away
From school,
Where all of the parks looked good, and kicked up their Heels-
And the homeless men were eating their uncanned eels
Underneath the telephone poles pinioned beneath
The skies-
Unwrapping the gifts of I don't know why's, while the Housewives were in their Houses, missing their children- doing the dishes:
And the backyards slipped down to the alligators grinning:
And somewhere around there, we were just in love
And kissing in the same tracks the buses used for returning-
Home to graveyards and their likeminded plots,
Past the pastures of forget me not:
And it took awhile- and it took days- losing myself into Unsought pleasure,
Pressing myself to you underneath the weather;
And the birds cried hungry from hunting prey-
The sun sailed in the lighter elements levitating in the open day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Open Wounds Of The Earth

Remembering the places they left us,
The new and the old chicken wire of the stars—
A zoetrope tossing over the sides of
A baseball game I missed you in—
The entire crowd an animation of skeletons,
And the road leading away from them growing old—
Old shadows over the renewing fountains,
The same birds singing—
The highways go down on their goddesses,
Just like the sunlight upon the Earth,
As the young skeletons turn over in
Their particular gardens—
See in the morning the new colors which are Arising—
What plots which are bouquets upon their Shoulders,
And the memories which the yellow buses
Drive home—
How many times have I told you I loved you,
With your head turned away
Hypnotizing—and in the morning,
Like selling fireworks,
Other beautiful heroes disappear upon
The open wounds of the Earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Opened Throats Of Song Birds

It is always appalling to think up the weathers over
The far titted fields,
While the cars filled with tourists make their merry and are Always growing up to take on Greater retinues: and then there is the sphinx you have to Cross before to become the hero,
And apple orchards asleep with the bees of wisdom:
Her hand as clean as milk lying outside the roots
Of some carriage,
And vampires with the little darlings singing like the open
Throats of mailboxes all ready for their lovers
Who are coming with the fall sales of this suburbia's
Wedding promises,
Doing way with the promises and the soft light of Kitchens, dousing if you will the opened throats of song birds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Operas Of Their Truancies' Jubilant Moods

So cold,
The wind nibbling at the bones,
The winter is taking off work from the mountains
And coming down;
It doesn't have too far to go,
And already it can smell the impatient girls all
Dressed and lit in the well-displayed town;

And I once was at the top of the mountain,
And I could see all the forest fires burning around me,
The politicians swearing,
The tomboys spitting and stealing candy;
But I was never in any real danger,
And I would only go out as the sun was coming home,
And all the cherished cars returning around and around
To the pies wafting from the warm-mouthed sills;

Nothing was perishing-
It was beautiful,
And everything was greenly mowed,
And even the juveniles were vibrating
The operas of their truancies' jubilant moods,
And I could skip off school and go anywhere across
The canals,
And dream of girls all alone in the arcs of the Swing sets neatly on speckled lakes,
And parks, and quickly constructed tombs
Making me an offer;
Make them smell of meatloaf and oleander,
Put cottonmouths in their wonderfully fluid means,

But now I sleep in the cot of the aqueduct,
Down with the disposed who having had everything have Since rolled down,
Heavy nursery rhymes now out of fashion:
The working girls with broken legs who are useless,
Flirtations at baseball games no longer cottoned to,
The housewives whose children have grown off the suckling
Vacation;

And the banks are fat and sumptuous above our heads,
Gilded in glass coffins and filled with raven-haired,
Rose lipped, round breasted savants,
Refracting gluttonous through the smothered zones,
And the chainsaws sing, rippling with the brilliant teethed
Innuendos, down to our wasted grotto,
Mouths wide open,
Vilified by the clams,
Eyes the same but all dumb-
Bullsh*t: The senses washed,
The stores closed-
Everyone down here who doesn't bother anymore,
Wears cement shoes,
Like offerings at the bottom floor of the department store
Permanently condemned
With nothing else to give.

Robert Rorabeck

The Opulent Playgrounds On The Moon

Prayer flags in the tassels and salvos of bad weather:
And I am the only one in my family that got up high enough to Ever have to believe in them:
Summating the green summit with the yellow background
Woebegone,
And somewhere way down there a sommelier selling wine
And nursing her just born child:
And then all of the night alone in the hotel masturbating as Succulent as honey with scars on my face,
And the cars telling the hours on the road outside:
While all through them I just kept doing this, keeping some
According to myself, and trying to start a fire with the singular
Vibrations of whatever familiar friction that I knew:
While Alma had crossed the frontera and settled down,
Pregnant with Michael, herself safe and warm in the world,
Her soul surrounded by a wilderness of family that swore to Protect her as the wolves smiled at her naked trees;
Until finally I climbed down from the forbidden heavens, recognizing Her- tired off peeping in at the nubile stewardesses behind their Flighty transoms always on the move:
And I loved her, and called her up my throat like blood from a
Yet vanquishing wound: and maybe she answered and swam to me
For a little while, but gave up- her immaculate body so tired and brown:
But she loved me anyways, I guess- back in the old neighborhood
That she called me to- and played with me and bought me things
Until I was finally a fireman hung outside, exhausted,
Letting the kitten climb up its exasperating trees as it tried once more
To suck the wonderful paps of the opulent playgrounds on the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orange Groves Where You Lived

What is there to say of your love- you have Gone to Palmetto to be with your husband, to see your Son-
And from my life, like mist rising from the campuses
I used to walk,
Still dreaming of albino women, and their Sick witchcrafts-
And tonight it rains a sick week before the Forth of July;
You will be all week with him, gone to Ocala as if
To be with the horses,
And not listening to my failures of songs about you,
Like this one, told to an empty church
In a flooding crepuscule,
An empty swing set- an open mailbox, as if something
Half tamed escaped across the canal again
To be there
All during school, and even after I get out, sweating off
My clothes and occupations- to return aboriginal
And to hunt for you over the smoking sugar
Canes of my rum,
And into the orange groves where you lived for so
Many years after you fled into my country.

Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orchard In My Mind

Where is the orchard in my mind,
Following behind the lions—waiting for you after Lunch, even after all of your soul
Has swum over the waters and into the trailer
Park where your little children have disappeared—
I ran away from school and fell asleep
In the middle of a canoe,
While even all of the oceans were counting wilds—
And you were gone back to him,
Recreationally continuing along with your life—
Shooting angels who meant nothing to you—
Just to stay free—they fell into the bushes on
The other side of the road like the twilight of Another holiday—
And your world was young for a while,
And smoking through the aboriginal pyramids
Where your grandmother stole roses—but from which You left behind in opulent condition—
Now you live like the Virgin of Guadalupe above
Disney World—and I keep on loving you like a
Marionette who has lost all motivation in the grasses:
Hands gone that once pretended to love him—
Rabbits and Ferris Wheels and foxes gone—
As the lamp spilled across the world—and the blind man
Lapsed into the chassis of pornography,
Lamenting everything that could not seem to be undone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orchard Of One Single Orange Tree

Bicycle- bicycle silent as the night
Going away after Christmas: going underneath
The house and down to the canal
To bring its roses to the lips of the patient alligator
While the sirens sound the cops,
And boats of homosexuals sink again for
The holidays of other young boys- as your eyes
Enclose all of their raptures and perpetuate towards Him- into the statuaries of his burning arms
I suppose they have to fly, as a graveyard lies
Out underneath me- she seems to be waiting for Me like a cemetery, as the swings lay rusting:
And the old carport which once held all of the promises
Of your eyes now doesn't even contain the rebar
The toads used to spore, like princes regurgitating
The fowl of a thanksgiving feast: and in the back Yard after all of the plane crafts have crashed,
The orchard of one single orange tree lies
Fading like a fable of unfortunate gold that
Has long since been swallowed up by the frozen
Rivers after your husband and all of his unfortunate
Cousins have fallen into some impassable pass
And eaten themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orchards Of Apple Trees

Alone at the billfolds of my dogs,
At last with the joy of my scars: my loins drooling over
Another mountain of abandoned cars-
My mouth an opened jewel in the midday of class,
Halfway wondering where the swans have Swam,
The moon still visible in her negligee- an open lunch pail,
And way to believe, or to get out of here,
Where all of the eyes of the cannibals have been blinking over
The broken jaws of the stalagmites;
And I have nothing else to believe in, except you
Are beautiful, beautiful, Alma:
In a graveyard
Except that there is not a single apple left in all the orchards
That I know- in all of the orchards of apple trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orchards You Abandoned

Busy visions of a childhood and her ghosts,
Words that linger in a poor man's clutch, as she looks
Away perpetually, browns stems quivering over
Her children, but she is out of leaves and warmth-
Sexy vision of catastrophe, how you loved my gifts
Of flea markets for a year, but could not entirely give
Up your sailors of Mexico, and the pretty cannibalisms
You put into your bed across the train tracks at night;
While he still doesn't satisfy you, you are the personification
Of any soul, but it wouldn't be right to say your name again,
Not on anyone's birthday- though I will not be waiting
Anymore like a rabbit in his green hutch or rock garden
In the little yard I remember bordered by rattlesnakes
And aloes- Like the urban legends that exist in the Highways of gossiping sky: I showed your aunt the hickies
You gave me as we made love for the year that is over;
I gave your sisters and more of your cousins fireworks.
And now I am left counting other butterflies who migrated
Across the orchards you abandoned, while my mother
Falls down in some mock Pieta, a wasp or some power
Cord stinging her foot again with its preschool lavishing,
As she dries the clothes of my childhood underneath a thunderstorm
That is already passing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Orgasm Of Battleships

With all points folded to singularity,
I can end up working at McDonalds,
And I will still be your love surfing through the Dangerous toughs of that dark continent,
Sniffing out your golden trap which lies in wait
For other men,
Professionals of the dark side of the moon,
Word smiths of the loom of hair-lips and cleft
Palates:
I will spit into your snare and have it done myself,
With sphinx-like hair all over my body,
With my eyes unblinking shadeless lamps- with my celibate
Limbs oiled in amber grease and lamb chops,
I will spill out of the orgasm of battleships,
Spitting out chunks of heavenly bodies
And the oysters of a sexual renaissance and trundle
Toward you through the battlefield of spikenard
And alabaster terrapin-
I will misspell dragons and misquote important events,
But I will catch you there like a fish beating with
A rabbit's heart,
Like a wax model fighting for a spell of life,
While the bullies key my car,
While the alligators invade the food court,
And deeper lovers lose their virginity in the wild school
Bus:
I will take you for myself and feed you steaming macaroni,
And make you libertarian,
And otherwise surreal, and pick up your houses in a saucy
Hurricane and otherwise try to remember what I was going to say in the small talk of a rainstorm
Some summer day,
After I'd gallivanted to your home, like a wolf drinking
Wine with your mother waiting for you to arrive
To swallow you whole to fill my lupus soul;
And the only thing true about the whole ordeal is that Through all of high school I never got to follow
You home.

The Other Absolute Spaces

These things happen here, because I need them to:
Eking them nightly out of paper, out of stone: while the Airplanes and housewives pass just as insouciantly as if they Had come over the mundane fireworks of any man's neighborhood;
And I pass my time bighting my nails and wishing that
They had turned out more beautiful:
That they were the girls loving me just as I love them, and thought
About them all day long struggling their own bodies through the Happenings of our abroad surrounding:
See them up close, thinking on how to describe their naked faces
That are so beautiful that it is just as well as seeing their Everything undressed,
And talking about their eyes with the bright silence of my eyes,
And maybe their eyes even smile like happy little children stealing
Eggs;
And so now I have a house that I will soon fill up with my cloistered
Body, as I would have it fill up with hers as well:
I would give it a drinking fountain should it mean she would come calling
As if back to the sacred halls of our high school,
But all I can justly conjure is the echoes that she left, the perfume of Her absence lingering through the funneling conduits,
And all the other absolute spaces that she left me to fill.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Awakening Gifts

Feeble day on the cusp of a dying wing:
I cry for you as you melt into the trees,
And I try to figure you out:
Why I was born in the yellow hypnotism of you
Dinner table,
Or why I take an airplane up to see you at Eye level,
And how the sun comes down from you
Like Ferris wheel losing
All control- and my dog barks up into you,
And pants in the sweats of your Job,
And the rattlesnakes, and the kittens-
And the paper boats who dissembark into you-
As you go down
Across the mermaids in their Spanish grottos,
As my mother does the laundry one more time
In the carport of the house we don't live
In anymore-
As the kidnapped girl falls asleep up in
The tree behind our house
She doesn't live in anymore- and you melt
The sherbet over a knife, or a weeping birthday cake:
There you go into the shadows,
Giving us wolves and the other awakening gifts
Of your stolen light.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Diminutive Christmases

Bicycle lights sashayed by the breeze,
And I get the feeling that I am never going to Make it California:
The lighthouses are floating in the sea:
My boys don't survive,
The windows open the meat of the world,
And their throats start singing back to me
The metamorphosis
Of housewives, the little plagiarisms inside
The tender classes:
And all of the streams I've had to skip myself,
That Alma doesn't know,
But I found her alone in the store again today,
And I took her to the bicycles,
And we decided in the little time that we would Have upon which the best
Turn of the century machines would bring us the Best joys:
And she wouldn't even let me touch her or Sleep on the roof of her house:
And the clouds finally melted, and mice and the ant lions
With their indescribable games finally went to Sleep,
Leaving their prey to reason about the other diminutive
Christmases, while she at last found his other brown
Hand and closed her eyes to my dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Hopeless Planes Of Existence

I am making $400 dollars a week,
$300 of which I have promised to Alma
Over the phone while sitting in the Chinese restaurant Along Southern Blvd, well approaching the Lake Worth Lagoon,
Which made her laugh, and to say that I was crazy;
But when I pretended to be with another woman,
She hung up the phone,
And my neighbor is an antique shop who cut down the Hibiscus which shadowed by back wall
Under which Alma's bicycle is now infinitely sleep,
Like a fairytale child waiting for her to come and prick
It awake in the morning:
And then we will go together across the beautiful road,
And through the orchards, if we can find any,
Because I am a lonely boy, and it probably is that I am
Not real,
But I have my habitual songs that no one can hear,
And the mirages in my head the resurrect and undying family:
And I have once been to Spain, in which I got this Blurring tattoo, but that problem is that I have never yet
Even been to Mexico,
Alma's brown cradle of salt lick and scorpions,
Separated from me by the great frontera of murdered banshees,
And all of the other hopeless planes of existence that I am so
Happy that she can hardly even remember.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Side

Spikenard is a beautiful thought,
As the two year old bottle hit's the lips,
And maybe this is what I should have been Waiting for
And drinking all along;
Or maybe I should just remain sober and think of
You,
Heaven ensconced egret:
And now I can hardly fly, and now I don't Think I have the right to,
While the traffic moves, while the traffic flies,
And I don't have the right to hardly Look beautiful,
While you are the reason why night time creases
At midnight,
And the cops finally fall asleep,
Finally coming into their brides,
Bowing their ribbons,
And crossing their fields to get to
The other side.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Side Of The Canal

Children in their lithographs making oblong
Rounds,
Girls young and beautiful and yet stranded like
Upside down terrapin at the racetrack
Far a field where I stop out of the way to buy
My beer-
This night has been weeping a pittance, and I went
And saw a movie alone with all my other
Bachelors;
Then outside in the play of cold opium tresses;
And I want to spill myself into her, all those girls
Whose minds have left their bodies:
Who have spruced up the place and then left like
Fair weather to confront secret affairs:
Gaunt young men who sit behind them in the pews
On Sunday,
Whiling the skies away where airplanes are like Crucifixes, and visa versa;
And I can see the lizards that no one else can see;
So the day is over, and I am waiting again for my parents
To make love,
As I too begin to dream of girls and little children who Are not real anymore, but so persistently turn their Heads to face me from the ice-shaven dunes,
I have no choice but to sing to them
While the alligators await for me on the other side of
The canal, knowing what they do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Side Of The Earth

I do not want to lay down upon you again,
As if the resin of a petrified cornea, this disgusting
Sap of my aping ventriloquism,
Another apocryphal psalm barefoot and asthmatic
Walking fretfully though across the well-tread
Path of the earliest explorers who out from their shells
Bathed in fires and the fertile rime eddying in roots of lime and sea,
Who call each wave mother as if in a herd of plumed
Cervix never dazzled by the encroachment of Sun through shade, the limpid curtains sacrificed
To the lips of vaporous angels;
A monkey with spangled cymbals wishing to emulate
Those masters for the leavings of their meals,
Or to encroach upon his fury mug the relaxations of Her Siamese mollusks, those insects called lips
Yet metamorphosed, though when awakening trough
Up the remnants of unconscious desire- To do this
For her with my levers, to excavate love through the Subtleness of opposable flesh bathed and christened
From her yawning stems: I am trying to go about this,
Unpublished and unrecognized, not given a chance to Be misunderstood, leaping through rings of anguish for Her, mimicking the calls of those insurmountable brothers,
The very cliffs where the current winds up perplexed though
Laughing, and there to lay in shivering tidal pools,
Hurrying to collect the tight and chastised flesh, before the Tugging maiden withdraws her curtsey once more, leaving me once
More to fill my mouth with sand, the dissolutions of those cliffs,
Trying to expose holistic reason from the brush of her
Disinterested tresses, as she walks down the aisle of sunset
To be wed to a far distant man on the other side of the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Side Of The Earth'

Accumulating in the wretchedness of their petrification,
Stoned in Riga mortis: how will these corpses now enjoy the vacantly
Pleasurable shelters of the structures they deserved
To hold mortgages on: while all of the fireworks shout like Football players stoutly in the jubilee of mud pies in an Away game across the centuries of tattoos and bruised
Cheek bones:
As if at night there was a fair ground high across the cross saddles
Of a truly believable high ground where the countries could have Fought each other forever: and the night could have glowed with
The petulance of farm boys
Who had discovered kerosene and masturbation; and taking the Tractors of the adults, driven into town to buy whiskey, laughing
At the stuck out spokes of the bicycles of a world underneath them:
And laughing just to swallow the rain believing it was her tears
For them,
While the animals were so infatuated they moved back into her
Forest even while the ambers curses:
For they were so in love, and they learned her language, and curled
About the fairytales of her maypoles wrapped in the butterflies and Rainbows and the candy dropping of the yesterdays of her old
Skin: even though she'd gone, finding everything they believed they could Sell to her useless- taking the forms of the forest and the streams, Until she could find a lover who would suite her fancy- and the Sun pulled her up by the throat and promised her the better adventures
On the other side of the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Team Is Empty

I've been at it all wrong, trying to make out with you
In the middle of a baseball game your little brother is in:
That you really love,
And autumn is in the air and we have misplaced our returning
Dove;
But all the earth cracks off itself anyway, everyone is in love:
Trees are naked and the road is covered,
My uncle teaches and then you get up every morning and count
The brushes through your hair:
Cars sound outside of your open transom, flowing like rivers:
Going just the way you soon will be going, and then coming
Home again;
And I really wanted to be in something mutual, but I went about it
All wrong; and now the other team is empty
And I can never find my glove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Other Way

Over your shoulders fell
Sunlight
As you f—cked me over a thousand times,
Called me while your sisters
Were in the car:
Said you couldn't apologize:
I rode my bicycle and I rode my bicycle and
I rode my bicycle until I
Reached the other side of the sea
And still you did not Apologize: when you found out I had
Finally capsized and got a wife,
You literally moved north of Disney World:
You moved into the ripe vestments of Those orchards of
Ocala and Palmetto—but you still owe me
$270 for paying to speeding ticket
As you sped down one day,
Fleeing your husband to come see me,
But more likely he was in
The car with you,
Kissing your mouth, trying to send his
Daydreams between all that we had said
While the hot air balloons escaped
To the graveyards above the atmospheres
And the a$$hole gods looked the other way.

Robert Rorabeck

The Otters And Their Mermaids

Bride and groom matchsticks—
Burning by striking until there are little brush fires
Underneath the mobiles of penny-ante mountains—
And they name them,
As they turn around blazing for a life time—
The very exact things that fill up trailer parks and Apartment buildings and, sometimes, teepees—
While the beautiful airplanes whisper above them—
Offering things to the moonless atmosphere—
Until the people go out shopping again,
Amassing in the hazards of their amusements,
Bivouacking in the coliseums that fold up eagerly filled
With pledges—
And the blue collared antelope dream of the otters
And their mermaids, until the day disappears underneath
A swing set taller than all of the world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Outskirts Of Town

A blasphemy upon the walls of a religious Bathroom:
This is what it is, and scarred with dyslexia—
Devils hanging upside down.
They are who stole all of your mother's jewelries
While she was kissing her new bo—just
On the outskirts of town—
And when I saw you in the classroom,
Like upon the far banks of an entirely innocent
River- In unkempt séances these were born—
Pets, lactates—and staples of every kind
Of luscious meat—following you through the hallway
As airplanes circled in the sky—
And sometimes you would look up or Fall to your knees in pieta—as a yellow butterfly
Presses like a barrette in your auburn hair—
But it was only to show your appreciation
For the heavens' cerulean discharges—
And then you went on your way back home,
Or to grandmother's house—
And back into the world where you could not Be appreciated by me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Over Splendid Rose

This is how it happens-
This rude experiment,
Bringing over to her my lunches
While the vultures circle with
Other plans-Volunteers in a tent of sky;
Demoralizing in the Great blueness of this Country
Where they've been taught
So much goodness,
And they have fun making love
With their eyes
While the lilies suffer;
Heat stroke in the asphalt parking lots,
Hallucinating unprotected and
No cavernaserai-
Now who will
Have the heart to tell
Them this,
While the over splendid
Rose grows out
From her mother's skull.

Robert Rorabeck

The Overabundant Earth

Waking up to the echoes and their kings-
Words that come up to her, making a show with the lunges of
The sea, to finally recede in the drowned dust bowls
Of caesuras,
And all of the horses of mermaids riding in the quicksilver bowl,
A ballroom of caracoling blue that tries to enamor
The copper canons up on the terraplane of that old but inexhaustible
Fort; and the tourists happily up there looking around
Premeditating Disney World, and soup kitchen sex
Next door to their relatives come down from Michigan honeymooning in road side hotel rooms I once Remembered her in; but there she is- gone underneath so many Billboards, neither kidnapped or taken against any will:
Lost in a game of predestined cards- the holidays on her back
Like wonder lust, and the windmills selling the story
Of my discarded defeat to each others lips
As they pull up the water smelling over sweetly of wildflowers
And road kill from the flesh wounds of the overabundant earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Overeager Sky

Sunshine came, or at least she admitted to the lie:
If she came, freckled on the long strong
Tie of a rattlesnake's perplexity:
All of its aching venom curling up in the pitchfork
Of a tongue,
Eagerly lying in the armpits of Satan,
And trying to form newish verbs from its storming
Soul,
Heading around like a windmill- sticking things into
Her- the old fairgrounds
Of no one else we have to believe, bartering:
Getting things in return- like the beautiful fences overgrown
And spilling with fat scuppernongs of professors who Water ski stumbled upon by pubescent runaways:
Now like the gifts for abusive foxes down in
The silent pastures-
Like barefooted bootleggers- and the teal pleasures of the forget-me-nots of graveyards:
They don't have to go so far, just up the soft necks of Peninsulas where the other explorers vanished so far before
Them,
Taking turns disappearing under the loosely constructed ice:
The trees around them laying back and Disappearing under the earth, like windmills who have Finished and almost vanished from lunch,
Getting rewarded as their mothers, so often like stewardesses,
Vanish again into the overeager sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Oversexed Orchards Of The Know

Day plunders its Sun around
My eyes,

Until I am of Its ship,

And I go,

And the women
Don't
Love me,

But their children
They are so
Beautiful;

It is such a
Shame that
They should have
To grow up,
Into
The over
Sexed
Orchards
Of the
Know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Painfully Life Giving Qualities

Stories are good for the reasons
That we don't have ourselves, and that's why I keep
You near me all day long,
To read by your eyes, even if you are only playing with me,
So that when at night you become a star,
And I have to resort to my loneliness if not evil,
The light houses will still sing beneath the aurora borealis
And the pictures of the unicorns
Addicted to the intimacy your brown body has to give me,
As we both breathe in like fish the painfully life
Giving qualities of another work day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pallet Of Your Burning Sun

The horses this time sleep standing up, Erin;
And my scars have switched sides once again like girls
Skipping rope,
Sending fibrillose and vibrant shadows once again over
The estuaries of their deep and rich
Graveyards: The sky above them is first blue and then purple,
The same way I saw you out taming your yards:
I saw you jogging like an angel floating like a fish beside my Car, Erin; and it doesn't matter if you do not love me,
Erin: I am not a boy to be employed by your love:
I am a vagrant and truant of love. While I have tasted the lips of One of my muses, that's all that she allowed me while She returned from my swingset to her husband, and now where Do you think I am standing, Erin, but out in the burning
Opulence of your son:
I am down in your opulent grotto with my toy gun, Erin:
And I don't want to go empty handed on Halloween or Valentines
And you are the only one, E- E-
You are the only one and the sky is first blue and then purple
Underneath the pallet of your burning sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Paper Airplanes

Doing good echoes as the airplanes
Fly like
Crows above the classroom or in the trees:
They remain there harping above
The fading pornography inside
Of the junked cars,
While there is nothing else happening-
Except the rain
Over the abandoned children- Where
Do they exist now
Like lavender in a trailer park,
Like something soft and beautiful peeling
At the edges that the housewives gossip
About but cannot truly grasp,
As they smoke cigarettes over the tree
Frogs and daydream of the men who
Will never truly belong to them,
As the paper snowflakes fall,
As the paper airplanes fly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Paper Airplane's Incredible Metamorphosis

Hobbies of bobby pins and new Christmases:

I spend all of my day off ejaculating in my yard, or doing

The laundry- these are so much the housewives chores,

But they have all gone up to their cathedrals;

They are all spent like fireworks, and I am left to

Languish here,

An airplane in the palm of my hand, my words the mute

Joy that the tadpoles experience as they metamorphosis:

As the swans enjoy their breathless highways,

As the mountains stalk the gods- I have no health insurance

Or cable television, or even a love that can understand:

I have no canal to leap across

In the paper airplane's incredible metamorphosis.

Robert Rorabeck

The Paraphernalia Of Hotdogs And Souvenirs

Soft as a sip of beer:
Over and over for the every day men—
Children on the swing-sets looking down
Into her,
Bodices untwined in her mirrors—
A pretty game that we have to pay for
From life to life:
Like pennies into wishing wells
Wanting things,
Like prayers before mealtime—
Before drowning back into
Plutos' of minimum wage jobs:
The glossy atmosphere of something beautiful
And made for us to belong in
But is not real—
Dolls made of plastic, housewives
That little girls turn into—
Young boys looking up into
The satanic and poisonous wishes of the stars—
Cages of gravity that create this obnoxious behavior—
The escapes that we have to pay for—
The tinnier and tinnier cages—
The rust of graveyards,
Mazes of the paraphernalia of hotdogs
And souvenirs. The knees of once grand
Cenotaphs left praying for ghosts to the sea—
The pieces that make up the houses
We live in, moved by the invisible hands
Insuring us that we belong—
Gladly, we are turned up to face the ether—
As vulnerable as porcelain mice with Ruby hearts—
Seeing the proof of the atmosphere almost Blinds us:
Airplanes are our angels, the turning metal
A flaxatone to our song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Park Near The Cemetery

If you want to have a friend,
I am still right here: homeless but seaworthy,
Unmade by the weather
And piled into my basic elements:
I sit in the park near the cemetery and imbibe by Spirits;
And they come to me bosomy and warm,
Like other things that can metamorphosis,
And they whisper promises to me in the sun showers
In the afternoon,
And touch my body with other thoughts I neither
Try to believe or understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Passions That I Have Had For Her

Burning in the yellow love,
Caving in the houses about their bruised ribs:
O, I smack her eyes and jab
And here the things that I cannot give,
While she gets browner as she works, and her husband
Comes and lays down his ivory guns,
And asks her to forgive, standing beside her like
A crib:
And I guess she forgets or she remembers to forgive,
And they go out into the long and favorite estuaries of
The grass,
And fall together like timber in a hutch, like golden
Clouds touching the west as it goes to bed:
And she forgets the passions that I have had for her;
As Alma forgets all which I have said.

Robert Rorabeck

The Patios Of The Passersby

Lost into a school in an afternoon:
Like a goldfish bubbling at the edge of her perceptive
Sea:
This I see all over again in the movie-theatre lives
Of all of the adolescents of this fare country:
There they are burning in unison:
All-together,
Match-sticks glowing in like-minded epiphany—
All of the hills rolling as lovers towards and away again
For all of the esoteric bears:
Pictures lost in a book of brail that only knew so many fingers
As his lovers:
Eyes as alien as the effervescing clouds—
Having to look away again, narcissus into the ever-clear basins
Of all of her amusements:
The daylight of the afternoon having been shot and fallen
Into the Earth—
The promises of the teachers clogged into all of the Choking throats of mailboxes:
And another god with all of his pitiful ambulances of numbers,
Crammed and clogged up once again into the sky:
The pieces of blindness that fall down to love us,
The sunlight falling once again onto the patios of the passersby.

Robert Rorabeck

The Paychecks Of Lost Men

Dying figments unsuited for these hours
Sit underneath the dabs of wasps,
Or at the corners of her cheek where she lives:
In the pornography of rusting cars,
Or at the sad confines of the canal:
Floating along in her trailer park underneath
The washout heavens of those Billboards trying to sell their god to the highway-
When she smiles, a long ways off,
She can see her children even if they cannot Recognize her- and it is her art form to do this,
And to sit beautifully alone,
Pleasuring herself as if she believed in ghosts:
Like my own childhood where I remember sitting
With my mother and reading books
Underneath skyscrapers and landmines of sunshine:
Or leaning over to see our doppelgangers in the Canal,
The tadpoles swimming with the paychecks of Lost men: reticent to transform,
They remain in my childhood long after I have gone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pedigree Of A Park

Bluest of the pedigree of a park
Waiting with its lover
To watch the helicopters go by:
Just one lover per day
And in the morning no memory—
Even after the swings are closed,
And the waves don't come anymore—
If only all of one life existed for the moment
The pinwheel turns—
And her breath was only given in my Presence,
So when she returned home, the clouds
Went down and slept in between the Venomous parapets of the coral fort
With the turtles and the otters,
Combining their lavender—
So, if in the morning, she saw another submarine
And fell in love with him,
She could not breathe at all,
Even though the orchards bloomed
With the helicopters coming down and kissing them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pennies Of Wishes

This is how you feel alone,
With the cadmium rays of your classroom
Washing over you,
And the American flag hanging there as if she
Was drinking from a dried up aqueduct
The horses have migrated far away from,
Knowing that they don't belong there
Anymore:
And the teachers move without space suits:
They look at you with the cantina eyes of too
Many lunches there.
Their jockeys have joined the stewardesses
Of the state fairs,
And they are leaping with them over green
Orchards,
And down the old southern ways, and angels
As chartreuse as butterflies hang around,
Reading over their shoulders,
As the goldfish wait for the pennies of Wishes to fall all over them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Penny Candy

Remember the traces in the shallows,
The words that it was alright
To give for one last day—
Before the last holiday of our lives
Looking out into other worlds, separate:
Made to keep us apart underneath
The moonlight, like a knife over the Railroad tracks,
And the airplanes like silver angels
Over the penny candy
Of my hopes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Penny's World Of Hollow Bones

If you are standing with the beautiful people,
Aping beneath the lavender sun:
How will you hear me
Read you the thirtieth canto:
How will you know the way out,
And through the windmill's legs:
The lines in Virgil's palm,
The summit of purgatory:
If you are brushing your alabaster hair
On your grandmother's terrace,
Counting the hatchings of migratory hummingbirds,
The penny's world of hollow bones,
And I am on the trellis bighting my lip,
Thinking about falling through the clouds,
How will you know that I am supposed to be beneath you:
When the ride starts to begin,
The concentricity of learning to fly,
Like two wounded siblings caught in a game,
Where it was so easy for you to begin to shop around,
The complicated marketplaces of inebriation
Locked away in a basement,
I am running my fingers over a feeling
I can't seem to find the meaning of:
But at least I am calling you like a medium,
I see you jogging around the periphery
Of a stranger's last name,
And I would cry out to you to come back again,
Before the storm remembers to bury my voice.

Robert Rorabeck

The Penumbra's Beauty Mark

Unlike you, I have no other choice,
For it has been long since I've received such favors-
Or looked at another folded in the outward hymn with the rectitude
Of an unrequited lover; rejection falls like the appreciation of Open spaces, the emptiness in natural beauty,
The poisons of the more cleverly dawned aphrodisiacs of any Strata of species:
And I am saying this all now like the call in the dark,
A revelry from a tin horn, as such a ragged personage must do
Blowing against the traffic like a firework's sparking cone, spinning
All the same out front of store windows and passionless lovers bedrooms:
My heart is failing, the rejection of scars: to hell what they say:
My cat has been killed by the dogs in the rock garden,
The green dragon is entering her bedroom, blowing green smoke
From its clay pipe, moving as with the sea, upon the legs of many Sailors; and this is not fruitful. This is tripe,
The architectures of a derelict farm, the silence that carries
On after the recordings has stopped, the blind wonders of Water smoothing stone, mute fingers over flesh;
the murder is left for investigation until late afternoon:
As out higher than it all, the horses tromp and snort, well-fed
Their emptiness as beautiful as a well-fashioned thundershower;
Though already, all the crowd has walked safely down the mountain,
Driven to room and board; they do not see the phosphorescent harems,
The penumbra's beauty mark held in the cup of my breath,
And what a shame that I should try to make words as not to feel so empty.

Robert Rorabeck

The Penumbras Of Ferris Wheels

Lapping at the stone,
The forked tongues of rattlesnakes behave like
Weather vanes,
As they are searching for warm:
Some crawl into the plastic grass of Easter
Baskets and sleep all afternoon:
All through the sun showers
And the penumbras of Ferris Wheels,
And when they awaken, like fissures in geodes,
Like opened pomegranates,
Why their eyes light upon the world,
And their lips part as if they were going to speak.

Robert Rorabeck

The Penumbras Of Their Late Afternoon

All the ghosts up in the equipage
Spitting in harmony:
And now they all sing like the last thoughts of Birds in a bath,
Or the passing lips of teenagers over
A high school fountain:
And the busses are turning around and filled with Summer light:
And then there is the common place exegesis,
But where are they all going,
In their everyday flight: but back to the Oasis of everyday homes,
And the penumbras of their late afternoon
Televisions,
With clouds floating over their mowed yards,
And everyday mothers soon to be coming home to them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perambulating Nebulas

Strange limbs gesturing in outer space.
I suppose they are the perambulating nebulas,
But I cannot see them with a naked eye,
How I imagine they go about their jobs
Like softly pin wheeling bees
Pollinating the offices of their roofless universe.

I have nothing else to do, but write another poem.
I don't know where its going, what might evolve:
The hyphenated last names of ex-lovers who want
You to know,
A girl you love smiling in a constellation you made up,
But she is off in her world of leaves and billiard balls.

Another day in the empty wilderness with a toothache,
And the need to connect asexually and forever....
There are only two women in your mind,
And neither one remembers, but the dogs are your friends
As you steadily save your money and the constant premonition
That you will walk on the moon before you die....

But there it is, the fornicating wilderness,
The sea is in a séance taking away her memory;
Soon she will be a doll of shells, with her eyes the ochre
Driftwood of sleeping romances,
And her smile the penumbra of distance satellites,
The complacency of any beauty before a needy urchin:
I would give anything to put just one thumbprint
On the inside of her upper-thigh,

Like a cartographer who has come after so many others,
But appreciating renaming the country all the same....

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfect Candlelight

Words come forth gentle soldiers,
Impotent lads and stand for her amusement,
Shivering,
Bare shoulders:
Yes, you are the things who are made to die
Forever, like
Hair, the undulating bullets piercing sky;
And it is not seemingly that you are
Here,
Going off like popcorn when you want to
Be expensive rounds,
Like silver fish flapping pathetically upon
The receded shore
At the feet of her restaurant where she is Always kissing and making love
In the perfect candlelight.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfect Example Of Your Species

How high do you get without stepping up.
How many times can you lose the knife I gave you,
Or ignore my eyes because the wind is Calling to you like a pilgrim.
And I remember my mother's forgotten days with
The laundry and the toads in the carport,
The baby blue Lincoln, the pale rabbits
In the clutch we finally had to release with the Pornography across the street,
The borders of coquina, the sweet tide leaves behind,
The world from the rooftops,
Where the stars are all those silver dollars of Carnivals,
Shooting off goldfish across the ant mounds of Kidnappers:
If you watch them very closely, you will see that even
The most insignificant things no how to count;
And I've been saving up all week,
So very soon I will by you a tear from the jungle between
The yards,
And you can put it in your purse with your false numbers,
And the other things that don't touch your heart,
That you give false promises to, that you will never call,
While the churches rise up further and further,
Straining over the Nile, and the soft deltas of all her rivers,
Just to watch the wind take form through your Hair, turn it into a Cherokee's panoply,
Or the weathervanes of your forthcoming children,
As the roof of the world forms around you
From the natural voyeurisms created by the perfect example
Of your species.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfumes Of Her Insouciant Victory

Nomenclature of my lips and
Senses dressing the habitat of my despair-
The failure of such pretty atmospheres
To linger,
As the cars drive away- the housewives collapsing
Like dry wood and pantyhose
Where the weeds are tangled,
Where the latchkeys play cards and where the Thorny citrus hangs so low as to be kissed at
By rattlesnakes: this is her valentines,
Corrupted by truancy and jealous smoke
Signals- this is another one of those impotent
Flairs remembering my childhood
Spent in the pornographies of the damp woods
Across the seashells in the skin of the little road;
And this is how I linger for her, felt up
Like wet kisses on bloodstained paper,
As she inches nearer another highway of massacre:
There she goes lightened upon by the perfumes
Of her insouciant victory- the fairies make
Pavilions out of her shoulders,
And they gossip to her greedily, even as she Carries away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfumes Of Mountains

Degrees of amours sleeping in an abandoned
Colorado,
Sleeping with the ghosts in the childhood minds,
And now Sharon has a child, a daughter who she is growing:
And the youth comes up and up like a magical
Beanstalk discovering
The world, and I wonder about her on Halloween,
And the sweet words on her forever lips:
And I can hardly breathe, because all that I have become
Is failure,
Except that now I love another woman who has the same
Power to save me,
But even the fieldtrips are difficult, and coming over the hills
The families never expect what they can find,
The science in the hidden places running their wet fingers
Over the gills of the esoteric fish,
And the world spins like a bet, and it keeps on taking numbers,
While the breath of so many species blow their wishes
Into the grass,
While the great bears wake up in the Spring, and go out
Snuffing the perfumes of mountains,
Forgetting who they were, but always wondering what it is
They should find.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfumes Of Their Trophies

Another cathedral with the ceiling of
A cave—I wonder outside into Another home
Of reindeer and foxes—
The housewives look out through windows—
They do not remember any of this,
But their pools glisten with moonlit jubilee:
And their faceless men
Are coming home wanting to inebriate
And kiss upon the perfumes of their trophies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Perfumes Of Unrequited Bouquets

The gold ribbons over the brown skin,
And now we are all here and talking reasonably about like:
Drinking beer until something accumulates
Into baseball,
Making sense through the immodest jungles, while the stewardesses
Use themselves through the sky,
Making so many wishes, gathering across the lake,
Finally falling asleep in the green trees with their red wagons
Naked of presents,
And your lips who once spoke to butterflies in Mexico,
Finally whispering the dew of your dreams onto the quietest pillows
In the lattening innings of your room,
As if a manning a base on the team of your extended family,
Who promises you so much,
Even though I am always the one, Alma, who buys you lunch,
And floods you with the perfumes of unrequited bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

The Periodic Table

How, if you came by boat,
Where there nights of peace and tranquility
Between the sloughs;
And your beautiful reflection unperceived,
And the moon over us both,
While I grew up slightly affluent, tanned,
And scarred like the wild horses
They entrained and captured to race and bet
On at the races:
Like the girls with little song with strip
For the men with the switch-blade billfolds,
This being just another quiet sound I make Tonight instead of watching the news:
I have been around enough to see how your Beauty lasts forever inside the art of Damaged men,
And I am not beautiful,
And my toes are black: I am almost crippled,
But I get along through thoughts of you,
Like an overripe still life inching its way through The sallow tide:
And I want to say your name, and bloom children
From your stems,
Compare your blood to chlorophyll, and hang you
Forever like an immortal Christmas ornament
On the periodic table.

Robert Rorabeck

The Permanent Dream

Infrequently the heart mingles:
Pulsates like a basin giving off code:
Here her eyes mix with something
Obscured:
Down beneath the fractured surface,
There could be a precious hope,
But to disturb the water would Set her to flight:
Imbibing, she is calmed, and remembers
Days when the sun slid in the grass:
Her family's caravanning
As they entertained the known world,
The pinwheel of lights juxtaposed
Against the steadfast ether-
The places where laughter existed for awhile, but
You cannot capture her here,
For this is an amphitheatre to come and observe,
Where the philosophies of beauty rest on stones
And if you set one finger on her sensitivities,
She will leap away and never again be seen:
She will disappear in the storm of the world awakening,
And become the fiction on the tongue,
Debased: she will flight from bed to bed,
Unrecurring to every man:
If you touch her now, as is your wish:
To sink beneath the bucket's gentle glimmer,
In hopes of grasping the permanent dream,
She will disappear
And you will have destroyed
What you came for.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pest Of A Failed Lover

These words fail to slice open beauty—
They deliver only the annoyance of a paper-cut
To her half-open eyes
When they want to gash her open with a mortal
Wound through the startled heart—
Like a broadsword cleaving her breasts,
So that you could rush in with the paramedics
To become her savior,
To give her ½ of your own heart to keep her living,
So that you might become her spiritual cousin
In the secret awakening light of an early morning
Bed, where the two pieces of one heart try
To penetrate the flesh, to rejoin
As lovers into the original body—

But these words really can't do that,
Can they?
When she is your distant affection
Where she swims in waves that break and die
Only upon her in moments of frighteningly beautiful
Surf that are born for her and which you will never see—
How can these words ever reach her there
To breach your desires for her in a cleaving manner
Which would bring her needing to her knees to pray for you?
Rather, they can only become the pest of a failed lover,
To cut her only so slightly that she sucks her finger
Until your sting is gone,
And then she shuts the door of her world in your face.
Your words are already forgotten,
Like waves dashed upon the shore,
She can't remember she ever felt or saw.

Robert Rorabeck

The Phantasms Of Illegitimate Ancestors

My body feels like a guinea pig and it is not Easy getting drunk again
Knowing that Alma is in the house of another man,
Even if it is crowded with her two children
Her parents, and her two sisters:
She is an incredible piece of cinema: and yes, I feel Like I could go on forever in her celluloid,
Even more resilient than the cadmium artifice of all of My major professors:
Now the leading man and the leading woman are kissing,
And perhaps Alma is making love with Nelson:
She told me today that I better ought to write about something
Else,
But there is nothing else right now: I have held her vision
In my heart like a merry-go-round of water colored children,
And my words have failed her in every way possible:
And all of Mexico is amber and real, and it just goes on through
All different sorts of lawlessness and murder:
Alma has her man's initial tattooed on the web of her hand,
But today she wore my ring,
And I want to promise her so much: I want to become for her that Flood of light over a newly born butterfly's wings:
Like the mindless exploration of feral angels who don't know
How to care for anything but the feeling and unreality of our motions:
Alma,
I want to crawl up to you in the morning and pretend your body
Is an impossible monument for my body and senses to attempt surmounting:
I want my lips and fingers to become stranded in your elegant Precipices everyday,
And I want to holiday in your banditries forever; for if I should come down
Again, it will be a graveyard;
And I want to kiss your tongue, for otherwise the mist will reclaim our Senses and all that will be possible is an endless nursery
For the phantasms of illegitimate ancestors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Phantasms Of Vanishing Holidays

Fishtailed palms yellowed by autumn outside my Window- feral cats
And reports of wolves: my dogs lonely in a far away place in Arizona:
I hardly even think of them, so preoccupied with the subtly chested
Muse I make love to underneath
The ceiling fans of my little house with the fishtailed palms
Skirting the outsides of my house
And the same occupations of travelers and pedestrians coming around
All year;
But surely she is tucked away right now, brown skinned with Her daughter up against a wall- tucked in with a man who comes From the same state of Mexico as her:
They attended to the same elementary school, though he was a couple of Years either ahead or behind her,
And so I lay on the floor and count my loose change of visions,
While all of the color leaves the world, like animals encouraged by A forest fire to leave their very own beds,
Leaving the place that was once of rich abode that now has become
The phantasms of vanishing holidays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Picnics And The Honeymoons

Listening to airplanes trying to picture you:
And stewardesses up there—pretty girls who have Learned to fly forever
The daylight all around their half-naked bodies—
The strange pictures beneath them:
The picnics and the honeymoons—the sudden bloom
Of valentines as the bank robbers try to get away—
As the freckled lovers say what they have to say
Underneath the singular orchards over
The unmarked graves before they have to go away—
And the night blooms filled with so many of the tiniest
Things with wings,
And the horses come around the field wishing to speak
With the luminescent fairy they seem to recall dancing
Across the sleeping flowers last night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pictures From An Easier God

Breathing heavily through a night of
Busted dreams,
Asking questions that no one has the answers
For, so right getting lies
That glow as brightly as the hypnotisms of entire
Orchards underneath the forgotten
Forts as squat and as fearful as terrapin
Kissing the currents of the grottos
And the hidden declivities of adultery's truancy,
Like the lactating carpets of roses
That the tourists could never get the pictures for;
And all of this alone,
Said like a firework that goes off from the mating
Of two cicadas in the rut on green copper,
Kissing cousins with a penny's worth of masturbation;
And maybe she will knock on my door tomorrow,
And flow in her tresses and flirting horns,
And berth me with kisses who are the accoutrements
To fires and loins;
And even if this is not so, all of this was said instead to
Her,
An Alma mated from the pyrotechnics of Spain
Howling in the Aztec geometries
That have saved us many times before from an easier god.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pictures from An Easier God

Breathing heavily through a night of
Busted dreams,
Asking questions that no one has the answers
For, so right getting lies
That glow as brightly as the hypnotisms of entire
Orchards underneath the forgotten
Forts as squat and as fearful as terrapin
Kissing the currents of the grottos
And the hidden declivities of adultery's truancy,
Like the lactating carpets of roses
That the tourists could never get the pictures for;
And all of this alone,
Said like a firework that goes off from the mating
Of two cicadas in the rut on green copper,
Kissing cousins with a penny's worth of masturbation;
And maybe she will knock on my door tomorrow,
And flow in her tresses and flirting horns,
And berth me with kisses who are the accoutrements
To fires and loins;
And even if this is not so, all of this was said instead to
Her,
An Alma mated from the pyrotechnics of Spain
Howling in the Aztec geometries
That have saved us many times before from an easier god.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pig's Pocket

The piper has a new song blowing
Like the studious wind against the pedagogical sea,
Waking up the smooth red-lipped clams
Who are nakedly hypnotized and Come square-dancing off the cusp
Of waves,
The apartments vacated like beautifying compacts,
The alabasters of derelict cells.

The Walrus and The Carpenter,
Over-bloated on stock-market shares,
Their lips lined with corpulent slime,
Their glutting sink-holes burping gaseous
Bushels of commodities,
Come courting the shore like
Azure swine who use their tarnished-badges
To skip the line queuing up to
The muddied trough,
Trampling the working-class
Trodden and malnourished at feeding time.

Ministers of finance, occupied by
Each others' wind-bag charms,
In trickling smiles of their shared society,
Dressed identical and devouring beyond
The speed limit of pious good health,
Finagle the virginal sea-creatures
Unprotected into their clotty gullets,
Where all does perish save for
The Piper's flighty tune, whose prints
Continue their molesting cadence
Along the alchemic shores,
As he is followed a step behind by the
The lawyers and their politicians,
A herd of unclean animals invading
The ark at suppertime,
For the artist is in the pig's pocket,
With a gun pointed at the back
Of his head

Marching to an unmarked grave.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pillars Of Emollition

And I will be all empty, as to be
A plague at last,
A thief and a liar on the Siamese overpass;
And words which will not heal, eating goat cheese,
And smiling up at the weathers of concords and airplanes:
Smiling through the weathervanes of the surreal,
The crocodiles becoming purpled,
Pickled, and congealed, and taking their stock in coins
Piled up even headed in the cathedrals of the water fountains,
In the places that the truants mock,
Or make their love with their peering stock;
And it becomes for awhile, and it feels good, like the freshly
Mowed grass through the thorns of an unemployed
Conquistador's neighborhood; just as it feels as if it
Has been all the while,
The pillars of emollition who say cheese for a smile.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pilots Of The Midnight Of Faraway

The petering out of the substances of a heart
Stain the carpets of an imaginary threshold
Where all of the thoughts of the muses step inside
Bringing her gifts,
But she is already losing herself into the backyards
Where alligators grin like the cenotaphs for Conquistadors
And the pilots of the midnights of faraway promise
To bring her roses—yes, she is already gone—
Maiden of the sorority that is impossible to Befriend—she turns your heart into a rabbit
Trapped by a wolf
As she invites you indoors—and looks the Other way—to the sea, the stars, and to the Stolen moon in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pinwheels Of Little Girls

Strung out with feelings on the West coast
With the turtles in their huts
Moving along: look at the winos: the park of
The stars,
And the dead dogs who no longer go on weeping-
After dinner, the fish thrown into the street,
Strange plagiarisms where the little girls cannot Breathe- the fisticuffs of wet kisses,
And everything else I never knew from Mexico:
Alma up in Ocala looking for horses,
Her children indoors, enjoying the air-condition and Cartoons,
While all of the oceans are mobilized: the zoetropes
Spin flirting with windmills- the clouds cauldron
The sky, blowing through their maelstrom of Wishes- perhaps strongly telling all of their secrets
To the pinwheels of little girls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pistils Of Your Orchards

Because of your jealousy, your sister can see
That you care:
There are slow diamonds in your hair, and ladders leading down:
You work with her at the fruit market past the closing theatres
Of crepuscule
Even after I am no longer around; and I have taken a bullet
In my soul for you, Alma:
And she doesn't know that we make love; and it is because of
You that I am even now slipping away
Underneath the backyards patios decorated sparsely by you
And your friends:
It is almost Michael's birthday, anyways- and your tiny brown
Bodies wave together in their Catholic haunts,
Never even once dreaming about the swimming pools of richer
Elements; or how I lay discarded at your feet like
An otter heady for the pistils of your orchards, blowing their Alluring scents from a bedroom into which I
Will never follow,
The bicycles surrounding them like gifts underneath a starlit
Christmas tree that I will never be allowed to give.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pistoning Engines Of Each And All Airplanes

Close your mouth and take me,
If you care to take me,
As you care, when your shift is over
At the ice-cream parlor,
And you are just another one of those Pretty girls your hair in a pony tail
Watching the phony entrepreneurs awakening from Their otherwise trailer parks:
Take me in your mouth in the apex of Ferris Wheels,
And swallow me with the spur,
As the sparrows fly,
Over the midway,
Halfway to the sky; if that is what you do,
I can win you teddy bear;
I'll be that confection imbibed, the yeast of your Lips pie,
Something you always thought yourself too clean for your Husband to do:
Then shush, shush on our way down,
Letting me spoon your Indian hair back across your Brow smooth as a liar,
To take you quietly home to your green children
On a luscious planet where everything is mowed
And you can hold his hand
Bent kneed in prayer,
Keeping your silent superstitions deep your throat
I've spelunker- Only you would know
The power of our oriental fruits
When all the light bulbs blushed from the modern Revelations
Humming like the very same throats or the pistoning
Engines of each and all airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pitch Perfect Hallways Of Overspilling Wells

I caught a dropp of spit in the stream of my piss;
But what do I care about:
The things that give love also take love away,
And my goddess speaks but she only says cruelty;
And in the oblong moats of a prison's
Suburbia,
She saunters trying on that and trying on this;
And her feet lead her mind to wonders:
Maybe she is going over to a little boy,
Crippled and gasping in a ditch; maybe she is Running over to save a faithless pet sinking like a filthy
Trinket into the yard:
Her husband isn't home; it is all the gravy of the bone-yard:
The moon is the mouth of the well, she fell down
And got married while she was falling; and birthed devilish children
In a well-mowed hell;
Or maybe she sees up into a mask of sky of only my lips whispering
To her of such bereavement,
Dreaming of sailors of crisp dollar ships when we were just Children catching our perfumed eyes in farfetched lines
Across the pitch perfect hallways of over spilling wells.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pitchers Sweating On Their Diamonds

I watch pretty ribbons with no discernible
Reason draping your shoulders—
My dog sleeps at my feet, the sky sounding
Like a marching band of feeble carpenters—
And I wonder if they will ever get anything
Done, but I don't wonder too long
As the largest of airplanes are taking off.
Can't you see them from the Disney Worlds and
The make-believe forts—let us imagine together
Where they might be going,
Stopped half way to take snapshots of metamorphing
Titans—they go all the way around the world
As if to become its garland—and when the stewardesses
Step off, as if off a circus ride, throwing their hair
Back and looking at the pitchers sweating on their Diamonds—They will explain with their eyes
So many things we haven't seen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pitch-Fork Pines

I can make the sound for you:
I can make the sound:
I can say your name a resurrect for you from the ground;
But you never did care enough for me
While I was around:
I can make the sound for you: I can make the sound:
I can thoroughly arise for you,
Arise from the very ground: I can carry to town for you:
I can carry to town:
All the things I ever grew for you, the cornucopias that I misspoke
And misspelled for you,
While the night vanishes, while the day harrumphs- Haroomphs:
I can forgive you underneath the Long and pointed crowns of
The pitch-fork pines: we can wait for hurricanes,
Or I can just go down on you-
I can just go down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pitiless Streams Of Nocturnal Traffic

If the day is gray in Florida, why shouldn't it be Michigan;
While I am spending my last few days with my parents in their
RV,
And then I shall have my own home: my own quieted space so near
To the sea who can so easily be called my muse:
She is apathetic and she doesn't care: men can sell ice-cream right
Out in front of her, and she doesn't
Care:
Men who fish in her throat, laying lines into her, even going down
Breathlessly on her, moaning into the ballrooms that she drinks:
She just goes on and on, besmirched in her waltzes, sloshing her
Spirits and her boats;
And I am always trying to cultivate new rhymes like bouquets for Her in my tremulating latch-key neighborhoods, pressed into
The strange and white-faced peninsula, like a starving child licking
His finger against the wind, like the rich perfumes of a night blooming Jasmine striking out in the pitiless streams of nocturnal traffic that She moats.

Robert Rorabeck

The Places In Which We Were Found

Bodies enraptured by the tendrils of coitus:
Both smoking and dewed,
Are impressed by the sounds and feelings passed
Like a life giving sea between two bays:
Their eyes are light houses atop their bodies, the stones
That move cushioned in the night,
While the traffic passes by them unstoppable,
Bringing back and forth other lovers to and from their homeless
Graveyards, swinging them through the tragedies of a metamorphosis
That gives this sweet condition one last reason to come around,
While the lions roar like rivers like buses taking us open-mouthed
Back home again to see once more the places in which we were found.

Robert Rorabeck

The Places In Which You Were Born

If the words are perfect, or their delusion perfect,
Then they become a fire escape,
And the ways out from even the long arms of airplanes,
All the way down the strange tresses of the vineyards,
As from down your lips and tiny skirt:
And your eyes felt like air-condition for gold-fish:
And none of it was real,
And afterwards I went to the library my mother used to read to Me in even before I went to kindergarten: and then I Bought a bicycle and went to the oldest school yard in our County,
And saw the primary colored helicopters pass like basic lovers
Beneath a standard moon,
While the rich people played all around me- while you were
Away,
Giving your love to the brown skinned graveyards who tattoo
Your body,
And who know your name just as well as the places in which You were born-
Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

The Places That We Already Know

Not enough liquor to write more than one or Two poems halfway—ruining the antiquarian niceties
Of my obvious failures—
Pleasures that drift with the memories of Kindergarten—
Lock doors that no longer belong to any Discernable rooms—
Canals smoothed over by roads
And coral snakes with their once-dangerous
Colors re-arranged
Now that they have fully become the places
That we already know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Places Where They Used To Live

Red flowers fluttering like torn ribbons of an aftermath:
Her eyes the dual vision of languid matadors:
They have given their colors of the deepest riches to put men
Beneath them quilled and snorting blood,
Asking for her children, their eyes the banner of surrender,
Leaping like a rabbit in a clutch of striking snakes:
And her soul smiles at the assassinations, while cars
Drive apathetically high across the places where they used to live.

Robert Rorabeck

The Planet Mars

Diana's chariot caught afire,
And read listen here is a muse for higher,
And when she got down and Opened up,
She had so many sweet pastries to sell from
The chest of drawers of her
Truck,
So many species you wouldn't believe all forgotten,
Moth balled,
And made to deceive and the wind blew
And the wind picked up,
And I laid her down and kissed her in the Bed of my truck:
And the dogs barked,
And the cats barked,
And the propellers twittered forlornly on Sunday,
And cast the planes they swept so horny over the Church bells,
And the theatrical fever of full bosomed thrillers:
Thus I swept my arms and dived
Like a full grown white boy from the ever ready cross
Into the arms of the conquistadors,
And fell in love with a Columbian who had a four year
Old daughter
And an open minded boyfriend,
Whose eyes passed over all these scars,
And we started the dance of her red shift,
And broke out of these bars,
Laughing and jouncing with our sabers,
We two who became the neo conquistadors who defeated
All the backward sailing windmills
Of the planet mars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Planets We Cannot Touch

What if I was to become better than a god:
Bride less, what if I rode on Pegasus instead of a carriage,
Or something else that was spilling its Letters dreamily into the sea: open mouthed like a fish counting
Its heady weathers,
Waiting for the fabrics of art class to move it once again
Like a newly born aftermath out of my muses' hands:
And, Sharon, maybe I did love you up and down those Cloistering hallways of high school,
But I have to move on, and I have to breathe even if it is Halfway made up into the tinseling limelight of A fieldtrip half occurring in high school;
And I never loved the buses or bicycles that got me there
And now this:
I am not even beautiful, and I work on a path that is not Even safe for a fairytale:
While she braces herself and kisses his mouth, and now they move
Together like actors in a sleepwalking dream
Across the foaming mouths of a rabid surf that doesn't even Deserve to be there,
And this is just for myself, while the sea is rising higher than the Fame or egos of the planets we cannot touch,
Even higher than our neighbors' fences, who still have to awaken
And storm into the yard, to prove that they have to be there
To exist.

Robert Rorabeck

The Platitudes Of Infinite Wonder

Prettier when the days go by Like fast hounds chasing scars;
And the decisions of the World aren't even made up,
The Siamese helicopters
Seem to float like her
Brown eyes
While the motions of
The world rise up together,
In the platitudes of Infinite wonder.

Robert Rorabeck

The Playground Of Your Swings

If I am here, up in the chambers of that valentine,
Trying to come out fully formed
With shield and pectorals to match any hibiscus:
If I was to Drift away to Lake Tahoe- If I was so beautiful
As to learn how to turn around
In the infinite space of always coming close to You, as if classmates in the circumference of
A classroom- then this would be the only thought
To have- repeatedly lapping, each wave
Like a new messenger inspecting the walls of your Grotto-
Hoping to lie in the traffic lights of your postmodern
Pieta,
And distinguish you as the permanence of Irrevocable form- to languish in the semi permeable
Architectures of the angelic overpass,
To proposition the evaporation of a fingerprint
In the prehistoric daycares that echo of your Senses only while you are on your way to school:
To live it up as a pinwheel knowing the pivotal motions
Of your routine- the somnambulating of your Evolutionary cemetery- to be the trick of a hat
In the staccato of your heartbeats- to be the retentions
Of the forethoughts of a dream which you rise out of Forgetting- the perfumes of the atmosphere that sustains
You in the hours you abandon while your body
No longer works, and all of the heavens turn around,
Fainting and crying for water-
To be that thimbleful of a thing that lays in the reservoirs
Of the infinity of your childhood-
A runaway who infinitely adores the lapsing inclinations
Of the playground of your swings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Playground On The Otherside Of My World

Houses with Chinese wives
Advertising at their feet
Running through a paper field
On a wall:
It is a calendar where I am those Horse and my son is a snake:
It is the zodiac-
I don't have a phone here.
Tomorrow is my birthday-
I don't have a car-
But I found a bottle of White wine left over
From our wedding-
And the television is on in
The next room-
My son may even be crawling to
See me-
My lips are chapped
My face is scarred-
There are rooms to live in
On the otherside of the moon
As I take a bus through Downtown Shanghai
To malls as high as the clouds
And grottos thick with milkmaids
Of black hairs and slanted eyes-
The dark heard of women in High heels spillin out of Using the busses and subway to Speed away
To tenements high and low
In this the playground
On the otherside of my world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Playgrounds That Dream Of Your Sleepless Children

I remember the sound the traffic made as it
Made its way around the sea—
Outlines of the sea-life architecture—
And the mermaids its mythology:
Architecture of its tears stolen to water the flowers
Of our suburban grottos lit up like Christmas all along the front stoops of
The churches—
And the places that we have loved kept like
A movie in front of our attention:
I have given all of my soul to these wet monuments,
And soon I will ride my bicycle nearer to the Bereavements that wet the stones of a lonely preschool:
Maybe you will remember me—
Maybe you will cry out my name—disregarding
The dances of marionettes
Across the playgrounds that dream of Your sleepless children.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pleasure Of All Four Walls

Troubled into the palsy of another glass,
My wife and kid and their kind one room over,
And in the rivers it is snowing
Where I live, seperated into the temperatures made
Differently for every one of our plots:
A checkerboard of weathers where some fairies freeze
And others get lucky and melt and lactitate
And take it all off—
Where the sky boys fly just to get on their busses—
And flowers bloom like those very same coaches,
Choking out the classrooms where they cannot teach us
Any of this stuff—
The house knows luckiness the smaller it becomes,
And just the same a pretty girl can better feel herself
In the pleasure of touching all four walls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pledge Of Allegiance

Positively left me underneath
The turtle
Underneath the school bus
Underneath the middle of the day-
And you were teaching classes-
The afternoon got older,
And the children changed around until
They were out of chairs
And some were left without identities- and my art
Was found out,
And sold for nothing- my muse left me,
And her brown skin evaporates
While all of our glorious country got up
To say the pledge of allegiance.

Robert Rorabeck

The Plot Thickens

My eyes happen to turn off in the middle of
A zoetrope of summer vacation:
And it isn't any fun anymore, covering myself with
The canopies of defeated bi-planes:
All the fairs have migrated too, and they aren't Giving away anymore free shirts;
And I know your name, because I beat it when the time
Comes to dusk,
And rolls over like a sick and dying clock into Crepuscule:
Alma, when I am in my house alone, lamenting you,
While your mother cooks your traditions
And you pearl the way the sap runs down the brown
Trees,
Then I become soulless, having to awaken in the morning
And go to work to see the love bites your man of Many years gives to you,
Whether you want it or not: when I could build you castles
With sundials;
And I will keep buying you roses until there is a drought
And all the shelves of stores are emptied
And the plot thickens while my laments bare the brunt of your Name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Poem Of My Wounded Thoughts

The poems of my wounded thoughts must Want something they cannot have—
The illusion of gladness,
The same thing as an amusement park beside
The road:
It must look like this, with its hands out:
Maybe they only want a little money,
Or a little honey from
The little girls—who go back home with
Their fathers as big as wolves,
Into houses that act like caves with the Warm voices of cartoons bathing over them,
And the sea pushing right up against
The door,
Attracted by their insouciant smells.

Robert Rorabeck

The Poems Of The Efficiencies Of My Echoes

If you do not know of the poems of the efficiencies of my
Echoes,
I promise you will not survive in the classrooms of My hypnosis-
I am the joy that happens in the playground of Drunken arrowheads and roses—
I am the silence that sleeps forever underneath the mountains—
And when I see a transparency between your shoulder blades,
I will not call you out—I will just wait for something else to happen:
For the sky to become beautiful,
Or for today to be painted by all of you tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pollinations Of Green Words

Overly persistent:
The pollinations of green words.
My novels get done in a week,
Then sit around and wither until they fall
From the vine,
Without a little girl's eyes to perceive them,
And not a dime earned.
Their mothers buy them better fruit.

A member of the organization
Of overgrown boys, lost and Taking directions from Peter Pan:
Daycare rock-stars unwedded
And working together in a gingersnap union
Following the trail of bread crumbs
Running away from the mainland,
To pursue their first star until morning,
And then to sleep until afternoon
Mouths drooling on the white sands sinking
Into the crystal clear bay
Where lines of toys parade in aquatic fanfares.

An epic poem of fast food and tooth decay,
Sleeping on the dusty shelf,
The misspelled words who wake up
In the middle of the night and hang themselves-
The excelsior packing the box of unsold perishables,
That affects the lines to grow on the yellow page
And into the worried flesh-

Unnumbered tears shed for princesses
Going to school to better themselves,
Wed to the men of their concentricity,
Drudged up from instances of the imperfectly memorable
And given peacock's feathers and good lighting,
Made the subject of the nickel novel.
Instead of gunfighters, we have flaxen muses
In various poses of undressed deity.

The night is lonely in the torpid awareness
Furrowing the mundane's brow
With the needs to express the watermarks
Staining the beating heart,
Not fully knowing the successful artist's Deeper desires, the homeless man's basic needs
For food and shelter,
And his freedom to look up amidst
The traffic and see nothing but
A canvas of beating stars
Without a hint of love for him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Poltergeist Biding Its Time

Boats of a long-lipped scar:

I play the housemaid of a truant, I don't get too far:

When I was a ghost, I made it all the way

To Spain,

But when I died as ghost, living I came back home

Again;

And the city, and the village grew with invention,

And you could hear what they were making all night through

The swift toed streets.

They made those too, and the university, and the halogens

Over the soccer filled stamped with cleats;

And I loved a girl there,

I suppose:

I loved a girl there from the rose bushes no body

Knows;

But I had already died there.

I had already been eaten by the swifter avenues of the petty

Men-

The petty men who got her first and afterwards she wouldn't

Let me in;

And now I sleep all night alone atop the rooftops of Ancient high schools.

Like a laughing skull I swig my gin:

And I can almost taste her, taste her, while I kick and Flutter like a laughing wind vane far beneath the

Swift toed airplanes,

The venal rocket ships, the unequivocally winged devices

She cleans houses in;

And it must be petty of me spending my breathless time

Repeating the abuses that she has forgotten;

But she is just a simple girl biding her time,

While I am the fruit that is really rotten:

I am the poltergeist biding its time inside a boy who is Forgotten.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pomegranate's Bitter Blood

Never read out your poetry,
Because that makes you a whore;
When you see a star,
Lie and call it green;
Prick your thumb on it, and your prick:
Stare into a certain dream and laugh and piss:
Make love to the limbless on the back of a moving train:
In and out of deaf tunnels and the rain;
Bark at the jade dog, and then toss it into the flames;
Pin a live butterfly to your vest and let it pull you
Along the shady lindens of the promenade;
Never love her alone for too long,
Never her at all, if you feel you must;
Displace the lust into the spindles of the draping dust:
Because if you read out your poetry;
If you smite open the imperfect geode,
Spill the pomegranate's bitter blood;
She will only laugh until interest is utterly lost;
And you, alone, will rust
And rust and rust.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pompous Sun

I want to share my silent
Mirrors with you,
My mute narcissisms,
My tongue less voodooos,
Because I am so tired,
Like a girl spun out of an airplane's
Womb,
Who hasn't a bed,
A fairytale without a crèche,
A river without a head
When all the little boys have been Playing at leaping over the Fire- All the little jack's,
The liars:
I've been off in the shadows for Awhile,
With my eyes been eating your Colors,
Your bangs that swing because you
Are wild,
And I want to be your feral child,
Without religion,
I want to dance my language to you
That I should love you by Careless circumstance,
Like traffic without direction,
Like tourism without monuments-
I want to crash into the hapless
Romance,
Like waves that slap dying and moaning
Underneath the penumbra that wakes
Up in the morning,
Yawning as it disappearing behind the Play of the pompous sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pools Of Her Brown Eyes

After the numbers of a chalkboard have vanished:
Just as with another day,
Words on the lavatory cubicles remain forever,
Misspelling forever of an abandoned love:
The housewives returned home, the apiary hibernating:
Swans on a golden lake turned into trinkets-
The otters in silky trances calling up make-believe:
Trumpets of mermaids and
Stolen bicycles- words which belong on a Christmas
Tree;
And I am learning Spanish, but I have not heard from My muse all day-
Because the sun is a monarch butterfly in its arch:
And we are falling away from her, as she distinguishes
Who she is from where she came from:
She is adjusting herself to new fires, forgetting our Expensive, alluring displays- because they Are all spent before tomorrow- and her children bathe
Across her, slipping through the pools of her brown eyes,
Reminding her of how they once tugged on her
Brownness,
Until she is finally resounding, unafraid and so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pornographies Of Fast Food

Speakeasies in the wombs of pleasure,
And brownness in Alma's eyes:
It seems so joyfully dangerous as I talk about her
When I sleep,
When my stanzas drool, and the bats blow like leaves:
And all of the scary movies feel so soft
And my body gets warmer and warmer holding inside
Its play land of ovens:
I blush over the things that I have forgotten, as the cats
Leap the roofs
Searching for cannons or conquistadors,
The fireworks laying spent and untroubled beside the Sleeping venoms in the ditches;
And the only thoughts I carry up again for you
Are of the pornographies of fast food, as all of my life
Is bleeding or spindling like confetti stripped in A fair
So happily and away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Portable Home

And you are not on the wall
Of the portable home
The dolphins are swimming
In joyful home,
But when the hurricane comes
It can pick up
And take away
The trophies over the shellrock
Of your childhood's yesterday

Robert Rorabeck

The Possibilities Of What You Can Forever Mean To Me

I am not getting it right: my dogs are sick in Arizona,
The airplanes make fruitless love into the night:
Erin doesn't write,
And Alma looks so far away and she will never wear dresses:
I just want to take Alma to the art museums underneath the overpasses:
I have bought dresses for Alma in the intersections of My vagabonding childhood, which I have written and misplaced into Novels,
But none of it feels right, even when it happens in graveyards:
You see, I know, none of this will save me: none of this will grow
More beautiful than the most beautiful weeds in the most open lips of
The most naked of cemeteries;
But I can at least buy you your lunch, Alma, and then wait for the four Horsemen and the apocalypse with you underneath the foxtail palm trees:
And your man makes love to you,
And you forget about Mexico: and the other places that I have never been
That seem to burn brighter and larger still inside of me until my entire College is the limpid star of a place so far away,
Ferocious and yet as beautiful as your brown skin; and I lie and bask beneath
You hemispheres, while your constellations whisper down like sparklers
On romantic holidays all the possibilities of what you can forever mean to Me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Postmodern Hills

Paleness that is wondering over the postmodern hills:
It is even here, where I have felt myself;
And curled into the caracoles of a snail that doesn't even Realize where it is going;
But come morning it wisps away, back over the yards
Of trailer parks:
The plum trees, and the lushes of sorority:
All of the disguises are put away, and sunlight spears:
Mewing kittens on mothering hips:
Bells to doors jingling, eyes and billfolds, and transportations:
Entire movements from the seaweeds
Leaving behind the beautiful stings of the man of war:
And as she proceeds the men just keep getting more and more
Beautiful,
Until it is all without a shadow, and the song has no place
To hide; indefinitely, she has found her own country:
And she sits atop the warm marble, and awaits that sweet apiaries
To be delivered unto her lips.

Robert Rorabeck

The Powers Which Control You

The powers which control you
Are too great to understand.
You stand there holding his Silver hand—

The moon floats uncannily
Grinning her wicked plans—
The unfortunate kings,
Lost in the forest,
Transform into stags—

We are hunted by our own sons in
The darkening pitch of our autumn—
You are still playing with your Father's guns,
And he goes down on you
Fumbling his tongue—

The powers which control you
Are too great to understand.
You stand there holding his
Silver hand—

The powers which control you
Are too great to understand.
You who have walked so far away
From our summer's plan....

Robert Rorabeck

The Prayer Flags Of Any Number

Up in the candelabrum of the lighthouse
We do our good work for Indians
Or anyone who wants to come in to kiss our
Scars:
And the bicycles ride by on their adventures
And anyone you know who you can remember
Who wants to come in:
Let them,
While the sunlight is bright over the tailcoats
And pinafores of otters:
And the aspens up on the mountain cry to
The little girl who but once walked inside
Their sorority:
And now like dime store pets who remember her
Innocent perfume, tell tales of her while
The mountain lions come in,
And the abject wanderer lingers on the pinpricks of Their summit:
The elk as red as the pennies of their tears,
Offer restitution
For the prayer flags of any number.

Robert Rorabeck

The Precious Things

Calling up a new sandy pilot
Where there are girls going down
Like sticks in a river
That cannot drown; so airy and so free,
Like a hyperborean park
Where families of bears sleep in amidst Gorgeous flowers
That you never wore to prom:
Where the ceiling fans are waltzing in synchronicity:
The architectures of clocks see no reason to mend,
And everything is perceived from the distance,
A man on his spires like the first star of
The unreachable evening,
Galvanized into crepuscule how he defies the city
States and their platitudes of habitats;
And when he lights off his vestibules the copper
Cannons of his girlfriend's legs
Sing;
And they are the chorus lines of constellations;
They are such the precious things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pregnant Bellies Of Airplanes

All rightly quieting in the necessitude of bachelorism,
The pitched green follicles dancing in the merry weathers
Outside of Uncommonly drunken bordellos emptied of dreams and Mules,
Emptied but for the dancing of fingers striking the strange
Keys on the hollow amusement that Fancies its loves,
Growing up brown in the household of another man,
Quarrelling but making love; and outside, the chickens hypnotized,
Clucking up to stars and the pregnant bellies of airplanes
Who are going this way and that,
Shirking their duties and floating commendably like captain less
Paramours:
Shopping through the cloud banks, like the very same sensations
Of toads chirruping through the aloe
In the rainstorm outside the carport where my goddess lives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Premonitions Of Footprints

Up into the lights of the world again,
Completing their contemporary circulations,
While the lasses bathe and perfume and then leap right out through Their porticos and transoms:
Never fearing the specters evaporated from the baseball diamonds
And the lawns:
Going their own ways up above the earth, holding their breath
As they try to recollect the letters that stamped them through
The calling hairs of the lawn when they were dampened
And fell like the premonitions of footprints through the swings
And into the sandy pools dug out beneath them:
While the realization of what exactly it was they were trying to describe
Has gone on, while the busses are already filling themselves up
With gas as they get ready to pick up the heady students for Another morning.

Robert Rorabeck

The Preordained Rivers Of Another School Day

I am wetted stone where
The tears of caged
Daydreams fall
In an instigated midway
Where adolescent lions yawn:
I miraculously stare out of
The windowless hall
The specters of collected
Truancies haunt,
T-shirted and backpacked:
They go in their preordained
Rivers to oasis's of Maths and sciences—
And mope at the shores in the carnivorous
Sunlight of a featureless church;
But above their yawning persimmon
Throats,
Fully formed angels leap through
The well-developed daylight
That is yet theirs to reach—
As they listen to the unobtainable grace
Cascading up there, roaring in tumultous evaporations
In the forgetful senses perfuming the Metamorphosed limbs of an orchard the perfumes of Which are too high for them to leap;
Though they try—fish returning home to blind
Foxes who sit them at their dinner table
Not knowing how very soon it is that they will have to leave
Once more to cascade through the preordained
Rivers of another school day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Presence Of The Petrified Gods

Down from the mountain
Rain drops from
The fingertips of
Little boys-
Frogs sigh remembering
Their bedtime's
Metamorphosis-
And there is reason for
The king to get up
Beneath the clouds-
Rainbows are fornicating
With unicorns-
Arrowheads have snagged into hearts-
Housewives are Drunk and
Nude in a sea of
A thousand fabrics-
And I say your name
In the presence of
The petrified gods.
In an afternoon of Movie theatres-
Where the ghosts enjoy
The red
Baseball diamonds-
And the reptiles sleep in the Coolness of the rocks
Not having to get up again
Until the next sunshine-
Eyes closed- reminiscing
Over all of
The magic they have enjoyed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Presents I Have Written

Alma, do you get high at looking by yourself while you
Drive down the road,
While you haven't even realized all of the presents I have Written for you:
I go by myself this way, Alma, until I can endear even more
For you:
While I can hold my breath and float up even higher,
And then see your yards and the cars that you drive:
And I believe that you are here,
Infesting my ribcage with the poisonous rib that some god allowed
You to steal,
While I can go outside into the yard and yawn up to the fairgrounds
Of airplanes,
And miss eating the hotdogs of their cotton candy wings,
And curse and pray to you with grass-stained knees:
I can be anybody for you, except for when you need somebody to Feel;
And I am moving away: the river is forcing me away like jewelry down
Into the scuppernongs at the longwinded throat of your Feral sea:
And I am right here, Alma: I am right here, swimming alone
And trying to romanticize the fishes who can never outlast the waterless
Days I have felt boiling up from the ant mounds of my mounds
That I suffer from yet another day alone and with out you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Presents Of Every

Now I've seen you, supposing where I live,
In the diminished cul-de-sacs, amidst the forsaken
Ivies-
And weren't you attending bar, again,
Caring nothing about me-
Turning me out into the cold shallows
Overlapping the banks,
And the jellyfish with their aquatic apiaries
Kissing in the churches of entangled masses
Through the jolly caesuras-
And their spinelessly coital monuments: there they
Are: another world told in the brainless sorority,
As the traffic pauses as if for the lights
Of a Christmas tree- only to go again,
Only to enjoy themselves once more- passing onward,
And opening the presents of every door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Presents Of Every Door

Now I've seen you, supposing where I live,
In the diminished cul-de-sacs, amidst the forsaken
Ivies-
And weren't you attending bar, again,
Caring nothing about me-
Turning me out into the cold shallows
Overlapping the banks,
And the jellyfish with their aquatic apiaries
Kissing in the churches of entangled masses
Through the jolly caesuras-
And their spinelessly coital monuments: there they
Are: another world told in the brainless sorority,
As the traffic pauses as if for the lights
Of a Christmas tree- only to go again,
Only to enjoy themselves once more- passing onward,
And opening the presents of every door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Presupposing Romance

When I let you in, I will be
Behind the door-
And the rubbish of your eyes will affect Me when they turn like
Rusting fireworks
Beneath the American flag where I am
Waiting for a kiss:
Then in the presupposed surrender of
A flattering high school,
We will meet like parents on Sundays
And say our prayers
And eat peanut butter and jelly beneath the Playgrounds and the graveyards
Where our progenitors are buried like livestock
Piled up for the additions of a god
Who never comes home:
But waits for a lover somewhere across those Dulled and blunted mountains-
That will never come,
And we will pity him, as we pity ourselves,
Waiting for the presupposing romance
Of our school day to finally come to an end.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pretence Of Water That Doesn'T Move

Like red roses on the hoods of Dead cars,
I am in love with you parked beneath
The power lines,
The old donkeys overloaded with
Gold,
And bats are flying out of the cave;
And you wouldn't think that would be
The most beautiful thing,
But now it is crepuscule and we
Are just north of Mexico and the blind man
Is doing his laundry in between the tits
Of stalagmites,
And the micas run as smooth as new born
Foals,
And he knows every breath of her;
And I haven't bought new clothes in ten years,
But I have the ghost of Billy the Kid
In my underwater speak-easy,
And all the crocodiles who don't know how
To cry,
And I can almost see you leaning over the other Side of the canal,
Perhaps because your love is pretending its Light opulence
In the pretence of water that doesn't move.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pretending Number

Fell off the stage for somebody, and slept underneath
A school bus
To lay in an orchard of shadows with a terrapin-
With your eyes,
And breakfast all around you, laughing-
Until you made them cry by breaking up with them-
And the saddles are between the mountains-
Isn't that where aspens grow in a different type of Sorority than what we have right here-
While our little brothers sleep outside in blue tents-
Out numbered, they pretend they never have to Go to church again,
Just as I pretend I never saw you kiss his lips-
As I watch you from the shore,
And you became the illusion the failing light played
Across the cliffs- and kept the firemen up
All night with your illusions- until
The lighthouses dimmed beneath the horrendous
Mobiles, swearing they'd had enough.

Robert Rorabeck

The Preternatural Everglades

I have been awakened and it is September:
I have been sleeping: I have been sleeping,
But now I am awakened
Out of my dreams
And looking at the boys playing
Baseball in autumn
Underneath the bouquets of all of
Their things,
And the little girls playing housewives
Or at least pretend
That is a beautiful orchard- and we don't
Have to stand here all alone
In the Laundromat of our afternoons:
We don't have hold our temples
Through the bereavements of all of these Septembers,
As the rains come, and the leaves change color:
At least we are in the same graveyards
As our grandmothers,
As the airplanes cross the paths of the heavens,
Even if they wont be touching down
To the lips of the wishing wells
Into which we've spent so much money- we can Love them anyways-
As they seem to be cursing through lesser known
Heavens, as we count our luck down here,
Hoping we can sell even more fireworks,
As the racehorses trample the murky flowers-
Trying to pass their heavy bodies off as lovers
Into the abandoned natures of the preternatural everglades.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prettiest Girl In Class

Waking up in the carport of her
Grotto: my mother with the lazy eyes the night
Tattoos -
Where has my father gone, with the spectators up
In the fruit trees
Down the rows that my muse used to live in-
And now words smoking in bowling alleys with too
Much green beer-
And the way that sometimes a few unicorns light
Up the night like neon,
And the tadpoles grow new legs and folklore
As you find yourself sitting beside the girl you think
Is the prettiest girl in class,
And she is looking at you like your father with Approving eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prettiest Girls

When I'll go to a little store in China—
Shanghai, actually—while my little Chinese wife is working
In the sky scrapers that look like two Siamese dots
In a circus,
I will learn how to ask in mandarin for one or two boxes
Of wine,
And then I will go back into that entry place—not a foyer
At all—
Not an amphitheater, in fact—and spend all of my summer
Away so many floors beneath her,
Drinking that swill while the three little pigs dance,
Trying to make light of it all
And writing something: something that doesn't Even have a chance—
Until we are free to go to the parts of the world together
We have never seen—
Like marionettes stemmed off from their orchestrates
Wills, going to see caesuras, and bonfires,
And glaciers—
And sharing dreams of French kisses—as the world that they Happen upon boughs into its nebulas like
An infant in the daydreams of Christmas—yes, kissing us on Both cheeks, this is the way the creeks are flowing,
Downhill—
Like tears from the Catholic church across from the university
Far into the midnights past crepuscule,
Long after all of the prettiest girls have checked their mailboxes
And gone inside.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prettiest Sororities

Ambers of the road taking you home
To make love-
In the bed next to your quieted sisters,
And down the little meanders
Where your children resonate everyday:
Echoing as if brandy:
And I cannot say this is a poem,
But another broken wing on a bird that
Pretends to be beautiful,
Just hoping to draw the attention
Of the airplanes,
As they steal all of the prettiest sororities
And make a picnic with them in the clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pretty Directions

Now it happens to be that I found myself for
The first time in the last modern gold rush: even if It wasn't real,
The way sometimes butterflies aren't very real as they Advertise their paper thin migrations
Over the truck stops,
Calling home with the strange cries of nothingness-
Ululating like the prickly pears in the armpits of cactus
To the bosques of Mexico where
Alma once lived and walked the same paths as the dangerous
And copper backed snakes
That live there: and she didn't have there her own football team,
Or Disney World,
And what she thought behind the deep mysticisms of her
Unthinkable eyes, I will never know:
But Hoodini died on Sunday, which is the day after tomorrow
And Halloween; and if I will ever contact him again
I do not know,
But I have so many pumpkins left to sell, while Alma sleeps
Curled up in her brownness with her family in a little house not
So far away;
And even though I am amputated from her, I am close-
And crawling towards her still with the uncanny jubilees of my show-
My own soul burning in filigree and birds feathers
Understanding that her address is in its reach, and obtainable,
Even while this body bleeds the mortal wounds of a stigmata
Whose indications and weather forecasts are directed Always too often by the pretty directions that her pretty two legs
Go walking.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pretty Forts Of Her World

Words make contact like agreeing compasses,
If they do then the unnamed flowers will grow, like from the Fingernails of a grave,
And you can listen to her beauty sashaying in the breaths of Sunlight,
Popping wheelies atop of each stone.
Out in the market, we must run through the citrus, our eyes on the Bodies of far away,
While the airplanes hum and chirrup, the traffic aggrandizing
Populated by the instructors of my evaporated childhood-
Now how I have seen her eyes from time to time
Coming into the market, and even looking for things that will Never sell:
How her lips parted like innocent clementine, even though they Were not innocent:
Like clear bells that wimple in breathing; and her body flutters
As it goes sweetly in and out of stores,
Hoping for things of pollination, while the yellow world ripples
All around her,
As if she were a flag in a state of embarrassment and all of the Windows looked out upon the pretty forts of her world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pretty, Pretty City

Now the city has a studded nose,
Because the city is so pretty, and the city knows:
The city, she almost fooled me underneath the Chicken sky- The city is so pretty,
But the city lie:
I loved the city and all its vermilion moods and ice-creams,
With parks and busses and city airplanes
And city rides- City coffins and city dies;
And I watched the city get drunk and turn around
And raise its monuments and party down;
And I sat upon one of her benches in a speculating mood,
And wondered if the city was so pretty,
Why was she so rude: The vulgar nebulas of the city's Eyes, the narcissisms of its displays:
There are so many well suited boys better than I out walking
In their sunny city days:
And I realized, the city didn't love me,
The city plays and paws and eats up little boys such as
Me- She said she loves her little poet boys, such as me,
But the sweet, sweet city lies,
Because the city is so pretty, studded nosed and stunning eyed,
But she uses her autumn facades to blind the autumn chicken skies-
The pretty, pretty city has me hypnotized,
But the pretty, pretty city lies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prisms Of Sciences Collapsed From High School

Put these call signs away in little cars—in shipwrecked vessels
Underneath the mountains
No one believes in anymore,
The pornographies of the unbelievers who live slip streamed
Amidst the pines,
In doll like houses of unfortunate rows
In days of anonymous ambiguity—
In the cathedrals of their hallways like holy vessels—
Or the semiretirement of a daydream while
I am still in Shanghai
And I have lost my hearing, but will go to the hospital
Again tomorrow and then maybe the game store,
If the weather is good—
My wife and one year old child will accompany me on The subway—and my fifteen year old scars will Dance like fire snakes with the shadows of a ceaseless world
That I must stumble back into every day—
Words yet the prisms of sciences collapsed from high school
While everyone else assured themselves that they were Sleeping and this was only a dream.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prison Of Your Absolute Denial

Our combined bodies are slowing down the earth-
The waves are pausing,
Giving off flickers, like organizations of Dragonflies and lightning bugs. Those chemists,
What are they doing-
Little daughters are forgetting to look at themselves
In their pink vanities,
And they leave off for school with empty brown bags,
Shifted through by blind verisimilitude;
The pretty yearling-things don't care that they are starving,
So unprimed trees grow heavy and severe from apples un-plucked
In the over comely orchards;
And isn't this all utterly strange that I shouldn't see you anymore-
That I once ran around you in a park organized by
The successful perpetuations of our president,
Where Benjamin Franklin was playing his latest
Glass armonica,
And he was too busy to understand how you came at me
From all angles through the deciduas
Of ankle-deep housewives chirping as they pushed such trams,
Smelling like kitchen-sink sunlight, everything moving up and down
Due to the propulsions of our relative bodies,
Speckled incest reposed in ululating recreation,
The shared weights and levies of a fieldtrip's seesaw,
And how I used to chase you inside a fable of my mind,
Leaping at your unreachable ankles, until I declared that they Must yet be unripe but amusing,
My glances ever ready to find just a homeopathic teaspoon of You somewhere along the pubescent hall's Perambulating road coarse,
Leaning back against the piratical lockers, eyelids painted like eager Bruises, like violet punishments,
Your supermarket bra graciously stuffed and reeking of carnival perfumes,
Of tennis balls and freshly butchered salmon,
Areolas the flambé of kiwi and wild scuppernongs;
And at night your mother sponge bathed you underneath the Calming whisper of the ceiling fans;
But now the familiar traditions are all changing,
New men are migrating across easy borders,

Climbing defenseless shoulder blades, innocent pilgrims
Hearing that you serve good sin: They've crowded me out onto
The street side of nocturnal Catholicism and you don't care,
But I'm left in earshot of that pantheistic celebrations,
The nature worship they caracole you with;
They start gasoline fires and rev and whoop
As you try to re-christen them with domestic alcohols, they en-crèche you, horned, rutting,
Like stags prancing around a doubloon-ed aspen;
And the tricky sacrifices of your body language slapping like
Coins making wishes off the blue anchors of their tattooed biceps-
You said if I'd been more
Attentive to my needy stanzas, or if I'd stood still while you drew blood,
While you went to work piercing me for your cruel brooches,
But I flinched, and I fled into the shadows and all the things which Have no space of their own- They are happy to have me,
The diasporas of what good honest men would refuse to own,
And they've hidden away the salvations of light which might Pull me up again and place me like a locust practicing
With his wasteful band on your Willfully paralyzed abdomen, an outlying caress along vibrating
Canyons, the enlightened spaces who seemed before fully serviceable
To me, but now look wearily from
The other side of torrential windows,
The voided apertures of condemned lighthouses,
The sightless towers of despotic kings,
Where the horses bray trapped within the spokes of sand dollars,
Where the glass is coolly flawed, and it is known as if looking
Upon the cold granites of openmouthed tombstone,
The sad afternoons of reviled dentistry's,
The possibilities of a dark plague fill up in your pantry,
And the dead lie there gossiping and watch you fall back onto the shroud
He pressed you like a moth or a flower;
You press the mouth to the pillow without anesthesia,
Folded into the collection of his mortician's almanac,
Like the instructions for planting fangs in that season:
You pant
Such living death blooming in the senseless wreath; and it is all Drawn out, so that it is just the scar perfect sunlight leaves on My memory because I stared too long at you
Waiting at the bus stop, sundogs and all the lions roaring,
The alligators panting long-tongued, grinning with the terrapin like thorny

Presents beneath the poisonous holy,
Red-cheeked and flushed beneath the venomous sky,
Like a virgin willfully suffocating;
And now the world isn't real:
There is a sinkhole in the middle of the highway
And its art is crippled by the offspring of its toothy perpetuity,
And I feel as if I weigh just as much as the sum of all of most everything;
And all that I am missing is the weight of your supple
Wingless body falling, being carried through the required threshold,
Fingerprinting the teak of a good wedding for luck;
And the scars are like hooks, and I find that I am being carried
Far away up into another happenstance's birth,
And you have gone your way through the currencies you have chosen,
And mountains build themselves up around you heartily fraternitied
And strong because they have the sense that I should have Wanted, that your body's presence has a substantial Meaning; it moves comparative to Lake Tahoe, clear and deep and beautiful into Which a entrepreneur, young and banked should look down into forever into
That absolute reflection of your essence to which all oceans
Seem to diminish,
Into which truth distills prohibition's collective liquor;
And it is to this place that all bodies are moving, like
Tourists driving to a favorite picnic spot,
In togas and motorcades up the hill of Cavalry;
But in it heartless lawn is required the dour spirit of your post-modern segregations,
And to it reopened fountains I was not allowed,
for the flaming sword is panting,
Thrashing alliterative and vengeful before the timely garden whose knowledge I
Once tasted with you naked and throwing,
But to it you have uplifted your fickle chastity,
And the world is falling into you from all angles,
Like so many instruments pitched into the fires of your bosom,
And yet there is no undoing this knowledge,
The songs that I remember singing,
That I cried for you like a child in a latchkey wilderness,
But to the feral entreaties you wouldn't choose to come,
But toasted your glass and smiled, and kept the men revolving
In your bullpen like powerful bullets in the chambers of a gun

You just stood there leggy and smoking
After taking potshots at the world I had created around,
Tearing down the canvas to which I inspired
So that there was nothing recognizable except the prison
Of your absolute denial.

Robert Rorabeck

The Problems Of Green

The problems of green have their own colors:
But they all together only cost five dollars: like the stripes
On the Mexican flag:
And Alma making up her own excuses for whatever she does or Doesn't do:
And the roads to and away from her are being used,
But her children are doing good:
And I am in my own house in my own graveyard inebriate and Scarred:
And maybe she will read this, and maybe she will go down
River and find more beautiful boys and read them,
Her brown skin getting goose bumped over her brown and Perfect skin;
She is the only female I ever think about or try to smell:
And I come to her in the fruit market and then drive away, as my Life recesses, grows frantic from its lacking amusements,
Or doesn't exist at all:
And the green planes frolic in the green clouds;
And the hungry green foxes leap for the out of reach grapes,
Vermillion in their over abundance and in their virginal aptitudes,
Or they don't even try at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Proficiencies Abounding

You don't even want to stop to remember
The way that summer flies:
How the good guys got the bad guys on the doorsteps of
The theatre of a graveyard,
The horses galloping on four legs- streaming their manes
Through the memories of evaporated caesuras,
Speaking the feral code that never pretends to Hurt anyone
While the sky looks up embracing the heavens:
And the dark girls underneath, shopping through the playgrounds
Trying to remember through the proficiencies abounding
If there is anything so sweet.

Robert Rorabeck

The Prolific Stock Of Your Divine Hips

Homonyms of lovers city on the benches in the zoo,
While the rains patter on the Faber shay of my illusioned caves:
This is like the light underneath the decorative paper of A Chinese lamp glowing forever
In a grotto- either yours or your mothers or your daughters:
It is you long destiny in the deserts where no a single tree breathes,
Where terrapins evaporate,
And airplanes become mirages, where spelunkers go down underneath
The roots of name and malanga, where the blindness of Believers wins an unspoken lottery;
And all I can say is that your world is always, always comforted by Air-conditioning; and it always so sweetly on the move:
And I wish I could have become the hero of a silent quest for you,
But now it is already to late: my birthday candles will forever burn
With the wishes of growing lips,
Because you already have your man and he has grown your children
Up and tenderly from the prolific stock of your divine hips.

Robert Rorabeck

The Promenades Of Our Grandmothers' Eyes

The end of sad abuse washes across the yard;
This is the end of it,
Harmless- so obtuse- and the girls that were listening for
It, have finally gone inside-
The paper trees are on a holiday,
Purpled insects warmed inside: they too will see
New bodies in new beds-
When the heart beats forth another year, lavishing for Likeminded chastity- and the promenades
Of our grandmother's eyes proudly following our Married skins.

Robert Rorabeck

The Promises Of A Blue Or Purple Rose

Summering loneliness- you are here with the goldfish
And the housewives,
In a kind of house, underneath the airplanes while the Turnip trucks overturn,
Spilling produce and dwarves, while the giants of our Fairytale fart out clouds and
Nasty weathers in the sky-
And I just sat in a saddling greenness where only the Katydid were disrobing,
And the pools are as innocuous as diamonds;
And looking down into the saturnine death of somnolent
Alligators,
Whose mascots seem to last for anon and anon
That there must be some avenue straight up to the heavens
Of the muses I was getting off to,
If they would only dropp down a long ribbon from their Stranded airplanes,
Or casually relay one passing though to me-
The sky fibrillating like an infomercial filmed in the armpit
Of Michigan, but I was too lazy,
Enamored as I was like a waylaid knight in a poppy field
Blown by windmills,
And death grinning at me, sabertoothed but immobile,
Grinning with all of the promises of a blue or even purple rose.

Robert Rorabeck

The Promises That Were Never Made

Bandy-legged, like a curious instrument put Down in the middle of adolescence,
And never picked up again,
Molting in a suburban orchard, yes I still Exercise
Lollygagging through the semiprecious
Mailboxes of this next evenings crepuscule-
I become as delightful
As the tail end of a pantheistic carnival,
As liling as a see of obnoxious fanfare;
And my muses perpetuate the sky,
Soft and venal, with only airplanes interrupting
From a different level of sweet hallucination;
And it feels so wonderful to know
That not a single one is considering me:
Diana isn't even considering me, and I would Buy her a house;
And I am as thoughtless as the immortal alligators
Creating crenulated geometry down towards
The wet lips of the overconfident easement;
And my feet strum, and my feet fibrillate,
And the only souls a see are retired and they wave
Like ghosts, like the inopportune bravery of Already surrendered flags,
And there is a new school of whispers in the surcease
Of overeager tadpoles,
The traffic streaming on the other side of the world
Like herds of feverish angels,
Taking all the old ones away, bringing in new stores,
But I seem to pass it all away, leaping on randy
Foot through the mowed glade,
Breaking all the promises that were never made.

Robert Rorabeck

The Promises Who Have Fallen From The Sky

From where we live, the backyard coliseums
So from the armpits of the yard
That all the way to Arizona can be seen and stories Told of a desert of stain glass broken underneath the Feet of rattlesnakes,
And beautifully feathered arrows shot into the heavens
To bring down newly budding angels
Who suspected safety in the camouflage of the sun
Where a glorious draught strikes the earth
And rises from its skin the same kind of deities
As Easter that the overpasses fold up
Like petrified bows- and the garden snakes come out
From tying in the manipulations of the newly Budding dehydrations- and if there is a girl right here
Who you ever loved, she has already gone in
To someone who can better provide for her;
But you are left out in the overprized gutter with the murals
And the hummingbirds collapsed from the exhaustion of Likeminded hallucinations so that they find themselves
Solicited to by the most persistent of serpents
Who have already molted their skins and bed blankets for
The katydids- so that now they can say something Wonderful, pedantic and legless, to the promises who Have fallen from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Proof Of Your Favorite Colors

Bicycles make love before they are spent
Away in a immiscible city in the waves with satchels of Letters:
But, Oh boy, I don't even know if they are about love:
The city is liltng,
And the strangers spill like popcorn on Christmas into each
Others' beds,
And when they find each other, no longer cuckolded:
They tend to grow as tall as pitch fork pine trees,
Until they destroy everything, and yawning they are just
As tall enough to rub the purring bellies of commercial
Airplanes:
And I am not going too far: I am jut going a foot or two Over hear,
To shoplift something else for you, Alma,
Because I have made the sea our bath, so all of the immortal
Swans and their ugly duckling are bathing in
The caracoles of hurricanes;
And finally something feels immaculately right about the chaos,
And I can yawn in the mouth of a loin and petal my Paddle boat chock full of snake oils over to kiss
And give hickeys to the lovely brown throat you have opened
For me,
Using the green keys that I have plagiarized, using the proof
Of your favorite colors.

Robert Rorabeck

The Propitious Heavens

Parade in the trombones of plebian castles:
I look at images of Vachel Lindsay the day before
I leave for Shanghai:
The roads were so busy today, two days before Christmas- and I was in love with someone
Else-
A muse who escaped through the bullet holes,
But I don't shop for her
OR go nearer to her ganglands than I have to:
Her brown skin like an apple still dazed in the sun-
And her body stretched into a cornocopia
Across her bed for her children-
Paradoxically, they are her harvest, but they need
Her, and nuzzle up to her like glittering foxes,
Eyes with dazzling midways,
Like circuses who'd been born at the same time
Underneath the propitious heavens
Who have become like the mobiles of Ferris wheels.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pumping Jungle Through Which The Red Hearts Love

The fidelity of the day
Runs along the chrome gills
Of her highway,

The glitter of a stream
Disappears in the shade,
When she tells you, you
Do not know her.

When she slips off
For other men, your
Dear brothers,

Going around the bend,
She does not look back
But cascades

In the tangled memories
Of skin and bone laced
With skin and bone

The defeated sun
Kneels beneath the
Horizon's teeth to Shatter, and fall
Steaming into the sea,

The gift of the craftsman
Wasted before honed

When the city becomes the Jungle,
Private detectives working
Overtime
Gunned down without audience
On unseen intersections
Before all the ladies

Opening their doors,
Going out on the walk for the evening,
The skin of their legs flowing
Like running facets

Cooling the parched eyes
Of men, their bodies lighting up
The safety of nightlights
Next to the bedroom,
The doors left open,

Inviting

With All the husbands gone
On very long and expensive trips
With the objects they wish to posses,

Humid and beginning to swim,
Women become the sea-wolves,
The bones of their bodies learn to Breathe through the touch of skins,
Burning through the ancient fires
Of survival

The glass roof above where
The commercial airlines
Fly, comes down

The dryads uncoil their forms
Swim through the muted clouds

Sweating, rings slip from fingers

Fangs, like roots, moisten

In dark corners paid for by the hour,
Friends make love to old lovers
Again,

Back at home,
Locked,
Old lovers stand alone

Hand in hand with a Gun

Kissing

Where the sun plummets
Through the caves,
Settling amidst the wrecks,
The hopeless hearts,
Forgotten and undisturbed,
Where the greatest man lies
Beneath green green grass,
Nameless,

Not even an allusion of movement
In the graveyard of the deepest
Bay,

Discarded by the pumping jungle
Through which the red hearts love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Puppet Of His Heart

Tables at a spot in the woods
Incredibly distant from all humanity,
Yet a creation of
Man place in the wilderness.
It is not possible for an object to be Lost from itself,
But they remain
Like wooden presents in the evergreen's
Shade,
Waiting for the palatial fingers of Sunlight to stroke upon them
Like the pornography of the Sky—
The airplanes like open pages
Centerfolds revealed for a little while,
Sparks of holidays
Going off in the ethereal and burning
City of the clouds—
Not one cognizant aspect reflects
Down upon them.
The creator has vanished
But there in the wilderness I have described
The puppet of his heart remains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Pure Feel Of Her Touch

I'm sorry sir,
But she's said we can't take off
With liquor only
30 % alcohol- because this way
The moon is too low,
And she can't seem to lie back and caress
The first ancient fondling of the early morning
Sky;
It isn't quite beautiful enough for her to give up
And die,
Not numb enough for her to really not feel to Know if your written emotions are what lies
For real;
And a soul is the engine turning over but dead,
Like an unfortunate robin stung by a fortunate snake
Straight in the head;
And its not even good enough for the mainstream
Songs in between the pages of pulpy psalms,
And the books they'll teach your children
Before nap time,
Just a little nip of nothing but rhyme; and so we Should stay here just floating through the great bleary day,
Enjoying the lower canopies, the soft graveyards and such,
But it will take purer liquor for her to reward us
With the pure feel of her touch.

Robert Rorabeck

The Purple Gang

The maggots clean their plates,
And we can't help but smile.

Robert Rorabeck

The Purple Rimmed Estuaries

You are alright here: and it feels alright, being in the skin of Tourists: daydream, up in a blaze sleeping all night in the cul-de-sacs
Of the nearest sun:
New words are invented as it rains, and lovers make love, while the Pitch forks arise from the hay,
And the clouds make new constellations over the river boats that Float over the immolations of the grave;
And it is just as beautiful as being out and blinded in her front
Yard: delivering Christmas trees and making money
As Alma's first and last children are breathing and cooing:
And I will buy them presents again
As the first and the last saints and nicks of their chariots come close
And then burn home again:
As I have made numerous home runs on her, as her flowers pullulate
Over the open and glittering graves of prostitutes,
As the families come around and have dinner with themselves
In their warm and embalmed institutes;
As their fires reflect the stars of whatever gods who are here;
As the pools in the backyards of housewives shine like dimes, bloody
And numerous, homeopathic to the scars that multiply underneath
The heavens of her wombs, or in the anthills of how to end a poem,
Enigmatic of the fears of the nations of fieldtrips of trailer parks
That already happen to take place underneath the fireworks and the flags
Of the playgrounds of centipedes and latchkeys who have to admit
That they are already here, in the backyards waiting with the cenotaphs of Katydids in the armpits of cypress who emulate the last pantomimes of
The afterlife in the fires and fairies of the rum burning sugarcane
Who deliver whatever it was meant to be before the eyes of the Florida
Lions and alligators who burned their thumbs off in this last Cul-de-sac topped off in the purple rimmed estuaries of whatever was meant To be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Purple Tomorrows Of Our Violet Yesterdays

Reindeer underneath the windmills
Drinking at the faces who exist for awhile in the valleys
As yellow as the reflections of the sun
In the wheels of bicycles: and anyway, this is how it goes
In the yellow flowers of arcades:
Or this is how it doesn't have to be, buried up to our necks
In the gold mines of her wrists
While the hummingbirds pirouette at her water fountains
Waiting for her just desserts
While she is too busy giving me hickeys, and waiting for her
Lunch: Camarones del Diablas look so good on her lips
And I swear to her that she is a red riding hood that Never has to go home to
Her husband, and her children: she can bring them over anyways
And teach me how to do laundry and cook enchiladas
And we can look out together as the school buses cross the Street before the paper thin headstone of the pet cemeteries
In their imitative estuaries:
And then we can turn inwards anyways and kiss each others'
Lips and believe in the purple tomorrows of our violet yesterdays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Purple World

If all of a peacock was purple
It would be a star—
No cerulean or evergreen—
No place for
Mermaids to admire it—
Purple fanning underneath the sun,
Showing all of the tourists—
All of the housewives that he is
A man—maybe if they could love
Through an everyday metamorphosis,
They would wish upon him—
To feed him popcorn
And to make love to him—
The usual hijinks between the orchards
And the highways—in the singing
Prisons where they they—
But it is not possible for them to think of Him as anything else than a peacock,
Even if all of purpled fanned—
Though he is more beautiful than them—
And at night,
After the busses leave the animals naked
Underneath the heartthrob heavens,
He will count dreams to himself in
His purple world—
Think of all of the women he could have Married—
If he were not only a peacock, a star in
The purple world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Queen Of Typos

If I am a marginalized figure, will
You write a screen play about me?
Will we then go together to the juvenile Vineyards and run down those rows like dirty
Wedding processions, throwing our fits;
Because we have not won any awards for our Hard earned scars. We will carry the flag together,
And I will kiss your greasy forehead as if this were Spain,
And we will feed each other heliotrope orbs
Before they can commit to the bottle: If I have You here, cannot I say that I hold in my hands evidence
Of the signs of life, more available than any billboard;
And even without permission, blow you in those Early morning mists even before the yawners awaken
Lined up against the Pacific, for even if I am
Taking a break from luxury cruises, I am still the Queen of typos. Now all the old gods are dead and Laid out in vivid lavender and they are playing reruns
Over them, with uneasy laugh tracks trying to earn money
But feeling terrible about it. Let them cover up the murders,
And stuff what flowers they have sent into a tin horn to mute
The crying dead: IF I have not loved the fermentations of the Bottle, I have not loved you, and if I could only learn to Quote Bukowski with the ease and girth of middle-class
Pomposity, then it would be as if to draw the handkerchief
From your neck and call the palest of bulls from
The freshly painted barn.

Robert Rorabeck

The Queen's English

I love speaking the queen's English
So well, I could never be Mark Twain:
Testing the depths of Mississippi's lips,
To know the extemporaneous Ebonics
Of rivers- No: My language is hers,
Though sometimes it is better to believe
In the purpose of animals: when they
Leap and nip, the tortoise and the hare
In briars and tar: The fields rustle, and
The children play in lofts of daylight,
And I know her legs run like streams
With trout leaping the mountains of this Great country, bent at the knees.

In the lights of the university,
She looks so trim, watching the sailors
Get buff at the gym, and when in kindergarten,
Right before rest, the teacher has a story
To tell about grapes, like serpents, twined
Into trees: the ones you can't taste
Are often the best; I've tried to leap so far
Off the ground, for sly is my toothy nature,
Fox not hound; and in such stories the Vintage is fine, grapes are like her orbs
Spilling with flesh, I turn down the bed,
And douse all the lights, and wait for her
To fall into grasp; and if she hesitates, I will Take my sweet time, knowing full well
That grapes taste better as wine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Quiet Game Of Latchkeys

Stewardess go on planes all day,
On long slick silver panes—
They leap across the canals of my childhood like
Double spaced lines,
Like hoodlums, and rowdy n*ggers—
And things I shouldn't say:
I get to look up their routine skirts,
I get to skip rocks across their bellies
Corrugated at the gyms,
Made slick by the easily appealing aspirations:
Everyone of them is beautiful,
Everyone one of them whispers her name like
The ocean annunciating out of a plump seashell,
And I should pick one out and marry her,
And put her in my band;
They all say I can do this, but they are leaping so fast,
Serving their clinking drinks,
They make even well-shaven gentlemen calm and drowsy,
And there they go leaping,
Their skirts sashaying the bow-string aisle, pink amphibians,
Their skirts deep Catholic blue,
Pain-killers, their knees well-curved, swift opalescence,
Unearthed Etruscan crockery;
And I don't even know what it means,
But I fold them up in my hands,
Bosomy origami and watch them slip around the Ceiling fans,
Slipping like ribbons along the currents of red
Lips blowing kisses,
And the midmorning talk shows proceed to evening
Sitcoms,
And my stomach grumbles watching the shadows
Grow,
And the grass quivers well-mowed outside the open
Window,
And I fold my knees up to my chin as I watch them
Go, lickety-split, serving their hot toddies—
Laughing the way pretty girls should do when they Are all done up in their sororities,

Like a bundle of sticks placed conveniently
Beside the fires,
Waiting for the door to swing open and end the Quiet game of latchkeys making time until Days draw close, and dresses slip under clouds,
And home comes mommy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rabbit Around The Imperfect Rock Garden

If I go away now into plaid and silver dreams to Sleep upon what else I know,
There will be no use of you trying to find me,
No classical illusions to the warm vase of your neck,
No marks to denote where the roses or my fangs
Have pressed:
The sky will just come as lackadaisical and as slow
As a snail,
Like a small house in a very confined yard which will
Squeeze the cleavages of hyperventilating housewives,
Like gold fish in plastic bags;
And there will be nothing that can be done for them:
Their months will never end: their stomachs will stay just
As premature as ill-begotten cantaloupe,
And what they have to steal today will remain wide open
Still waiting to be stolen tomorrow or yesterday;
It will be like Easter, every young brother and sister so finely
Dressed in gray; but it will lack muster and bright bouquet,
And the dog will chase the rabbit around the imperfect
Rock garden,
But none of us will ever be able to capture our prey.

Robert Rorabeck

The Racecourses Of Everyday

Ventilation seeming smoke, curling baseball players
To the moon:
Where the airplanes go anyways, arms like clocks spinning
Upwards in the windmills that glow red hot:
The time of loneliness is here: see it down the road,
The fish in the blue canal, the rabbits in the red holes:
Spokes of windmill fire,
Feral encyclopedias- the magics of train robbers steal her
Away from me,
And her two children in department stores:
Her husband a kind of bad dream,
And the love she has called up like a dead child, marking
Over her:
She is a wave happening, chaos and black magic-
And I see her from my citrus tree,
Like seeing the messiah slipping into the bay: I can never have
Her,
But she is my eternity. To her, like a wounded amphibian
Breathing in the early truth of her metamorphosis-
A muse that shortens my life, defining it into a weapon
Slipping low into its schools,
Dashing upon the racecourses of everyday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Racetracks Of Their Canals

In January my wife will be here—and I may or may not Still be a school teacher—but the fair will come,
And I will have a companion to go with me to the fair—
The light will circulate around the earth,
Because the light is a youngish boy on his paper root—
And candy will melt and decorate the apples—
And upon the midway that are soon to migrate—I will Win my wife and soon to be first born child
A gold fish— a golden metaphor for all of our love—
And I will love her—even though I go about my ways silently
Around these neighborhoods, too flawed to be anything
More substantial—we will bloom our hearts together—
And look out into the gardens of the morning,
And to the wonderful hippocampus that compete together
Nearby the televangelists in their churches beside the Busied highways and the racetracks of their canals.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rain Showers

Trees in the lost syrups of little girls,
Dried up but making the asphalt stick, so when the Scattered firecrackers explode
In their fraternity of dyspeptic claps, their paper
Like red fingers splay on the road-
The road kill of the infants of Chinese butterflies,
Over which the traffic of housewives drives utterly Insouciantly, receding back home to the Premeditated weathers of their living rooms and offspring,
Their thickets controlled,
Their serpents starving- and their rabbits multiplying in
The pretty teal gutters warming up to the bric-a-brac of lost
Tennis balls, last weeks savings, and better lovers
Under the blue crepuscule covers in a corrugated den
Hibernating but crying only when the rain showers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rain Showers Over The Zoo

You really pull the course to the side,
Until all of the dogs stop running and all of the bets are off:
I really don't know much about you,
Alma, save that I wish you for my bride,
And your symmetrical body like a pair of wings to swing beside:
How I have loved you: I think that I have always loved you,
Even while slipping like a throat cut trout through the Asphalt streams of high school:
It was just that I didn't know you: It was just that I didn't know
How to sing,
But now you swing for me, Alma: and oh how you swing,
And the last day we worked together you let me carry your watermelon
To your car,
But you wouldn't let me kiss you, you said it was impossible,
But look at how much impossibility we accomplished for a couple
Hours in one day:
And you said that you thought my eyes were darker than my fathers:
You said that you thought my eyes were the same color as my mothers,
But you are wrong:
I have brown eyes, the same as my father's,
And my mother's eyes are blue, but that means our children could Have blue eyes,
And we could name them after the sweetly captured animals in
The rain showers over the zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rainbow's Excretions

And then in the rainbow's excretions- -
The metamorphosis of another hero.
Go and see where he is going—
Probably to wrestle some primordial alligator
Far on the other side of the city—
As the cars flood away from his good side
Like the evaporations of far too many angels—
Even as you are invited in, I suppose it is well
Before he gave up
And the snows melted all to the snarling laughter
Of our feral adversaries—
And then, it just so happened, to be a dream
That could not be awakened—
And slumbered on—narcolepsy over the Architectures of the ribald highways
While my mother grew older—
And the sun slid across the earth like the Slew of a snake that was undressing itself
To look pretty for the daydream of another Marriage.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rainstorms Don'T Exist

Call me until I rise,
Necropolis-
The dogs are scraping at the door,
Or are they dogs?
Let the sunlight eat you-
And let it in.
Make the dinner beautiful,
Extending your jaw and clench,
Creating a soldierly profile:
Tattoo mandibles of insect royalty-
Everyone deserves to look beautiful
Before they die
(If just for a little while) ,
Soldier boy:
Observe all the scars and bruises,
The imperfections that yellow-jackets
Have, like us,
A very short life span
Just above a spreading stain,
Children crying on a bus: The rainstorms
Don't exist,
The chickens are hypnotized
And in the sand,
Doors that never close leading out to
The holes where our twins
Live,
Wingless-amusement dropping from the
Sky
Who land like frogs or princes
Singing all around the little girl on the swings
Who used to bare your name,
Who doesn't remember,
Kicking her feet for some purpose or Momentum,
Becoming a waveless miracle:
Will she ever retire?

Robert Rorabeck

The Rattlesnakes Always Lay In Wait And Smoking

Now I am really going anywhere:
My heart feels like it is at the fair for Alma,
And when she is gone then it feels as if time has stopped
And the sky bleeds over my grave:
Now I can say that I am sure that I have never been anywhere:
And the sun lights up the world of smoking cars,
And then it goes down again with the dogs and through
The trees:
And I dream of Alma in a giant's house, and it seems that she should Be my future but it is all uncertain.
And mostly I have disgraced her, while her children has swam in the Depths,
But Alma don't you think that my body looks good next to your body:
The juxtaposition of the fleshes and the colors,
And now the world turns again and we have to hold on and close our Eyes and feel the motion that is just a dream,
But otherwise Alma I would always hold on to you and lead your safely
Through the keyholes where the rattlesnakes
Always lay in wait and smoking.

Robert Rorabeck

The Raven Of Snow White

Scars fade like maidens into their bedchambers,
Or at least I like to pretend:
Pretend that I awaken beautiful, clay boy-
Out summering by his amusements and shallow, caution less waters: see what I used to be,
Sitting with my good side pressed next to you
Like a giant moth in folklore; and read by the sun,
And read by the sun- You came by speedy on
Your bicycle, happy on; and you have places to go,
Oh god, and pictures to pose for, other young Professional men to propose for,
And all of this happened to you- Were you coming into Something beautiful, and really lucky- and you might Be out anymore diademing any corner of that red
University- The successful avenues you took a track for,
Became a success story, but still something most passed
By; but when I get my night on, and burn my lungs by Little cheap ways, then your hair is still the raven of Snow white, and aren't you the fairest in all the land of Sundry amusements, taking your checks to the bank,
Cuddling your new born puppies by the legalize of tennis
Courts and sea: What you sued for was a poisoned apple,
A broken promise, taming the ways of tall sure men;
I watched you pass by on your bicycle like a river
Who once remembered my name, and even called on me
From time to time between classes whose utilitarian knowledge
Beneath the spikenard and date palm is now, thankfully,
All but forgotten.
Though never evangelical, don't I still look out for you?

Robert Rorabeck

The Reactionary's Defense

free will is certainly subjective, and really can only exist radically outside of any society, at a personal level, an individual religion, an individual language, so in this sense societies shape the collectivism of individuality; and it is a shame that given the opportunity to pursue freewill, so many are dazzled by capitalism and consumerism, and yet they are given the choice. I remain a product of my society, and yet open-mindedness does not conform to hatred, and your limerick clearly demonstrates hatred for the United States, and I believe what is being shown in the current state of the world is what has so often been shown in the past, a dualism of thought and self-identity defined by the other; it is very simple to rebel against the obvious fallacies of capitalistic gains, and yet in so doing result in a fallacy equally as great; so what is demonstrated in the seeming clarity of a pro/anti American stance is only the deficiency of weak comprehension. Surely, America is finite, as are all political states, and yet the opposition of the American standard is just as finite. Perhaps a greater cultural dimension will grow from the current conflict, but to place a certain political figure as an ultimate solution to current American/world dualism is grievously finite, and such jealous reactionism would arise given the subject's need to identify itself through opposition to the perceived object. I am rather apathetic to politics in general, and consider politicians and lawyers at sub par at best, while even amateur poets crack farts with the angels, but I am subjective enough to recognize the bias of reactionary hatred, because it suits us well so far. The countries mentioned are as finite and fallible as USA, the difference being that in large part they owe their current consciousness as a free people to the efforts and charities of America, and yet America, in return, as with any people, can stand to learn much through empathy. All that is demonstrated by these posts, however, is the Ego's need for some sort of recognition, and by decrying a foreign ideology, which has strangely in large part shaped your own construct of self. America is great, because I say its so, and that also makes me great; but what would really be super is a supreme isolation of the individual both artistically and spiritually for only through this form and realization can a person come to understand the himself ultimately.... Now I should go say hello to Susan, because the song is singing about her

Robert Rorabeck

The Real Florida

I failed gym,
But I climbed the highest mountain
When the rest of the class was studying:
In kindergarten
She gave me her old shirt
And then we fell asleep.
She awoke and made love to Roman soldiers, though
I took her with me on top of Every wave-
She wasn't really there-
So I went down driven by
The rainstorm,
And we slept in my truck alone:
Look at the cat father found under my truck.
Early spring,
Look at the snow falling outside.
If you read closely,
Her looks are the words driven
Before the sunshine,
Though she doesn't see it anymore,
As men pass from the lighthouse,
Refusing to turn in.
She is spoken in the palm's heart,
And echoes in the shallows as men fish.
She is pulling up to a little house
Somebody lives in
And this is the real Florida.

Robert Rorabeck

The Real Shows

Inebriate in the thralls and resting everywhere:
Going over this, like blue birds passing to nest somewhere
Into the unisons of well lit living rooms with Entire families commingling there; or what it is that they seem To be doing:
But resting all spun out like a spun out fair over which the Sky masquerades in its masquerading ballrooms:
Full of its seasons of paramours just about for anyone,
Each nimbus its own aphrodisiac cultivated by some giant
And all of them in cahoots up there:
And they make their own games for show, colliding
Over our streets so unaware, as the baseball diamonds rest themselves
At the edges of familiar bliss, and we all play our diminishing games
Down here, far away from the real shows that just don't care.

Robert Rorabeck

The Real Work Begins

I enjoy the irony of not being taken out to dinner,
For writing bad poetry, and getting Away with it: And when the leggy substitute drops
Like a bombshell into the room, to watch movies
For the rest of the period,
And notice the canopy of her interior skeleton
Heave like a buxomy pink tarp as she sits at
The head of the class, inhaling, flickering her temporary Eyes over the rows of boys.
They lick their lips like suburban wolves as she Crosses her legs and her long-distance calves
Flex: She exhales and it smells like rum, from
What the pirates have done to her:
I don't care, I still want her, and contemplate
Asking her to prom, or abducting her on the way
Out to her car, and thank god this isn't math, or
I wouldn't know what to do; but now I have a plan,
And I doodle a map on the desk, which spills like
A silkworm's womb onto my hand, a pubescent jig-saw
The Mexican lady will wipe clean over night,
Doing away with the graffiti of my memory, as I ride
The bus back into my carefully orchestrated habitat,
And the real work begins....

Robert Rorabeck

The Reason For Its Diamonds

And I will go up into another busied architecture
Listening to all of the kissing bees
In their bad architectures around the scarab knees
Over the mountains where
The stewardesses sing: and this is their song, mindless over
The mineraled overpasses—
Over all of the jaded architectures—over all of the busied
And receded reservoirs,
As I go up blindly bachelored—as she is trying to figure out
Herself, herself, whilst it is still save,
And the dogs make their own rounds over the railroad
Tracks and over Easter,
As they are paid to do—as another doe flights lightly over
The snow that is melting into its nurseries of a hullabaloo—
Until, finally, this is the reason of its baseball,
And so
So many of its things: this is the reason for its diamonds—as
I am afraid—
This is the reason for its rings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Reason For Its Rings

And I will go up into another busied architecture
Listening to all of the kissing bees
In their bad architectures around the scarab knees
Over the mountains where
The stewardesses sing: and this is their song, mindless over
The mineraled overpasses—
Over all of the jaded architectures—over all of the busied
And receded reservoirs,
As I go up blindly bachelored—as she is trying to figure out
Herself, herself, whilst it is still save,
And the dogs make their own rounds over the railroad
Tracks and over Easter,
As they are paid to do—as another doe flights lightly over
The snow that is melting into its nurseries of a hullabaloo—
Until, finally, this is the reason of its baseball,
And so
So many of its things: this is the reason for its diamonds—as
I am afraid—
This is the reason for its rings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Reasons For Your Name

Crooked jewel in the armpit of school-
I slept underneath an overpass
During math-
And thoughts of you came, flooded with Reason and ennui-
It meant nothing to society-
The tortoise yawned but didn't know what
To say-
And the rattlesnake danced, and said it
Was her art-
Airplanes flooded across the canal-
Like paper snowflakes-
And I pretended to die for my grandmother,
While telling myself perpetually that
My lips would never again
Have to taste the reasons for your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Reasons That We Feel

The sun into the orchard of its pilgrimage:
I will keep you hereâ€”I will not let you wonder far off:
The rains will swell the wishing well over our Shoulders,
But she is still no a safe bet: I will cry for you until
There is sunshine raining across all of my scars:
I will put you into new prisons of Museums and zoosâ€”until I treat you to ride across
My shouldersâ€”
And then I will carry you across the baseball
Diamonds and the school yardsâ€”and I will keep You into the seamless greenery foreverâ€”
Kissing your lips and amending to youâ€”our lips
Blooming into the crepuscule of our distemperâ€”
Each of us recalling how we feelâ€”
Until we remember the reasons that we feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Recreational Deltas Of Your Soul

If I am here, you are here, counting our Wounds,
Blessing our virginitas standing on our windowsills
Propped up in a place,
And I saw your browned body on Christmas:
Alma: your daughter kissed me and felt like a
Wave leaping out of the sea,
And telling me things that I couldn't hear-
The cars were like stars on the streets,
And in two more weeks there will be a fair:
So the bodies move, surcease and recreate-
Recreational plateaus over easy through the city;
And the family, bless them- Won't you?
Green as the favorite colored world in your eyes:
The only though I have all day:
When will you cross my lonely threshold another
Time:
And when will I imbibe the liquor off the recreational Deltas of your soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Recreations Of A Ghostly Orchard

Palaces fed in the shadow of my liver,
I had almost forgotten you:
And this place you forage,
Whispering all of your fairytales
And combing your hair down to the knights
Who wait with their pet alligators:
Savagely,
In the red-tongued everglades
Through the hallucinations of the Turnpike, and loves I thought that I once had:
Strangling visions that
Feed me my liquor, and keep me unrequited
Into the pretty hours where
The shadows of your echoes feed me the Grapes in the recreations of a ghostly orchard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Red Bricks Of Philosophical Capital

Careful lovers ignoring the words of this sinner;
The way ideas come together like ants over the Motionless ankles in the grass;
But there is only so many things that can be said to her,
So many wounds before the battle drowns;
There is only one queen in the sea of so many shades
Of envy;
And when she plays basketball her hair sways like
Really great ponies;
Then the airplanes waltz or they serenade; and I touch Myself just briefly before the open throats of Mailboxes while her parents are away,
Square dancing in another state over. Maybe she is Trying to swim away too, using the interstate as her escape
Route, rolling past the elaborate mirages of Orange groves and Shetland ponies so that I used to love
You's can only come like whispers to her now with her
Ear pressing like the most delicate of a virgin's senses to
A freshman's pillow,
While she dreams of other boys all night, and wakes up
Drooling like a bluebell, like a stewardesses who smells like Wildflowers;
And then she goes out into the yard under the red bricks of Philosophical capital and kicks the ball around,
Just as I knew her once to do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Redder Than Red

There they languished and waited for the dragon
To come-
He came, expecting a hoard of gold, like conquistadors,
But finding only brown lovers in
The ardor of
His disbelieving jungle: what did he find but then,
And took to obsessing over the feminine one,
Took to calling her name into the empty
Wells in the middle of his dungeons
Where the skeletons danced
And kept up their tomfoolery- where he tried
Not to laugh, and he could not cry:
Where the redder than red blooms grew: he supposed
He drew them,
But in the end he could never say if he ever knew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Reddest Berry

The reddest berry is never seen—eaten by blind
Lips before the average means produce it—
The deepest love enjoyed by the pests at midnight—
Blooming for awhile
Like the incest of a cannibalistic mother—
Ripened pestilence above and beneath what
The middle-class can enjoy,
But blooming in riots while the popular news is not
Around—
Faithful nudity in the sand dunes of a blue boy's
Wet dream—
A showgirl's feathers making a cerulean crèche
For what he paid her to do—
Blooming habitual in the playgrounds of foul weather
The city officials would have destroyed at the First rumor—
The rapture of a thousand criminals—migratory as
The jet streams across the pearlescent avenues
That cannot be controlled by the societies of Men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Regular Crypts

They put the nameless men
Whose mothers have died
Into the regular crypts.

Two black men carry him out
Of the apartment in California,
Where he must have sat for
Some while waiting for
His unfamiliar friends-
Not wanting to be discovered,
He'd swallowed the few pages
Of his unfinished novel,
The way a spy swallows microfilm:
There in his unfocused eye, though,
Like an imperfection,
A fleck of failing memory,
Not one single government worker
Noticed, was the reflection
Of her he still carried with him.
Who could this woman be?
Do you see her here,
In the corner of his eye?
And here again,
As if it was her at the very last?
Whose name we can only guess,
Who continued even in some small
Part to affect his physical carriage
Who could this woman be?
Who could this woman be?
Was she even from our time?

That concludes our presentation.
Will someone please turn on the lights,
So we can head out for lunch.

Robert Rorabeck

The Remains Of Your Stolen Ribs

You have gone home and crepuscule forebodes and wreathes
The yards,
And I have forgotten how the spelling is of anything good:
And maybe it is because I have a hard time feeling the remains of Your stolen ribs,
Even though you crossed me today, Alma, and in our out of work
Truancies we made love,
Like tasting the hidden bottle of angels, so that all of the cars had
To park
And movies were watched, as unicorns drank deeply the eyes
Of other unicorns,
While their beautiful fairytales were so high up with nose bleeds
In their aerie castles;
And you told me that you loved elephants: I suppose I said that I would never forget,
And we swung down across each other, my pale loins in your Brown,
And never was my mouthless hunger more satisfied than when we Did all of those things today, you swore that we shouldn't have done.

Robert Rorabeck

The Residue Of Visions

Comparative to the structure of your eyes:
Bending back, brown-stemmed visions of places
Lactating in the milkweeds,
Feeding the big-lipped minnows—
Switch-back from the dens of housewives,
Hidden away with the jewels of extinct Indians:
Somewhere around here,
A latchkey child,
A lost love—an almost thing—
New abbreviations in the spring, and her words
Are gone from the indistinct pages
I could never find the words to fill
But heard them like the residue of visions that
Had already come and gone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Resonance Of My Children

Laughter harkens finely from a distance,
Hear the resonance of my children as their mother bathes them-

I drink from a three dollar wine bottle,
Christening the only writing I've done since Christmas:
Sipping off the love of Saints and other superstitions I try Hard not to believe in:

But here it is,
Another day going down, and bodies melting superflously
Into beds like wilting flowers into gardens-
Their airconditions humming like moths trying to Write love letters to their abandoning fairies:

The absentminded wishes of anywhere:
The night takes off her clothing in the school yard
And dances around, flirting with abandoned bicycles:

Who look up into the bilious sky where airplanes go
Leaping forever like fawns
Across their ethereal fountains:
And I think they have no reason to ever touch down into
Our lives again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of My Days

There might be a song in the night of birds,
And thousands and thousands of stories of great deals:
The princess just might love me if this is how she feels:
Or she is probably just keeping me captivated in the Sugar-land shade
While the apiaries make their honeys into blouses of Marmalade; and as she tells me she loves me,
Her lips stamp on repercussions of flesh: she thinks of entire Squadrons of other men sliding down poles or Climbing up ladders: the boy who saved her cat on Valentines
Day,
And all the world was whole, and she had never fallen down
Or bruised anything;
And in the morning she might kiss me, but I know she's going off
To get another tattoo, the pictures scarred into her flesh
Telling the truth she will never say to me,
Light upon her body like paper dolls, like designs on airplanes;
Like scars given after birth, like candles burned out on a birthday
Cake:
And then I sit and watch her in the shade of some kitchen,
Some tree's shade wimpling her through the blinds, before I have
To go to work and she has to go back to washing the dishes,
And dreaming her things that are too precious and caustic
That to ever share with me who petrify me in the stage of a basilisk's
Gaze, and into a graveyard of gray topiaries with the living-dead
Pets I would be forced to pine away the rest of my days.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of My Life

And there was a castle I invaded
When I slept with you for eighteen months intermittently—
The sea would come in
And half destroy it—we would put it back together in A bedroom of mulatto salt—
Astonishing, that I couldn't fit all the way inside of you the First couple of times,
Even though you'd born two children on your way here
From Mexico—
And all of the songs I sang of you, and to you—
Hoping to win our castle from the sea—
But you could not give up its grandeur—how it was Able to destroy what I knew of you entirely—
How you went back to him every night—your neck
Pulled and bitten by the moonlight,
Leaving me with the things I of immortality I saw
While we were together—
Until I gave up, finally, and happily married—and So fought for the rest of my life.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of Our Lives

I'll get up at noon and whisper out of my jail cell—
With my dog at my feet
And the roads moaning, carrying up to mountains
Where entire populations of windmills sleep—
I don't think you can remember where she placed herself,
Even though you can struggle up—
After we have run away and each of us lied to ourselves
And laid down like plastic flowers in the graveyards—
I am just so sorry that it happened,
That the paper snowflakes fell from your eyes,
Folded up love letters in the middle of the meadow of What was supposed to be sunshine's class—
Even though we were about to go to jail for the rest of Our lives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of The Way To Her

Unoriginal swan in the middle of the street
Do you not know that it never snows here- and if You have come to see your similar beauty in
The conflagrations of the sea,
You are still several blocks away: the Mexicans live
Here, and the boil mermaids and ad Chili:
They are all out of work, though they promise to Work so hard if they ever get any- and that Is why they are so hungry. I saw one at the very Top of a mango tree climb right through the air
And kidnap and airplane: he took it back across
The rivers of Mexico in a joyride to show his family:
And if all of my money is lost, who am I to care:
And if she is also lost, it will not bother me:
She was someone else's wife all along, but it
Was I who stole her heart and ate it out in the naked
Air before her gloriously careworn family-
So swan, your beauty is in the wrong neighborhood:
You have floated over so many anthills and baseball
Diamonds that I am sure if you pick up the majesty
Of your beautiful wings you can almost make it
All of the rest of the way to her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of The World

Every night dies into a new month: they die, like little school
Girls who have nothing else to believe
In, who have his name tattooed into the web of their brown
Hand,
Alma- and nothing else about it has to be real; and you don't even
Have to be a good girl.
Alma: but I still love you tonight, as I would love you any other
Night,
Even though this world is so cruel and unhindered;
And don't you hear me, Alma: even while he is touching
And making love to you:
He is hardly even enough: he is only the pitiful,
And he has given you two children full of flesh and breath, but any Man can give you that trick;
But who, otherwise, can give you this- Alma,
Alma, If you ever read this and I still somehow survive,
Please remember that my lips aren't just the smoky whispers
Of some used up genie; and that I am still right here,
While the traffic purrs and purrs,
And the rest of the world makes love and mows its front yard:
That can be anyone, Alma; but oh god, Alma, only I-
Only I can be this....

Robert Rorabeck

The Rest Of This

Underneath the Travelers palms,
The pilgrims
Stopped
And ate
Box lunches before
Reciting their
Salty psalms
And the chorus lines
Of bruised eyed
Catholic girls
Powdered
Their lips;
And well, oh well,
You get the gist....
Of the rest of this....

Robert Rorabeck

The Restless Shadows

Beautiful and sudden ventriloquism doing away
With all of the harpies so I just have Medusa to deal with,
And her cave is really beautiful and filled with cars;
Oh, I wish I had my own butterfly, this diminutive woman with Wings who is attracted by the light of the television, or
By the words I haven't yet parceled together for her like fruit baskets
For truly deserving brides;
And I will go out and vagabond for a block tonight all amongst the Constitutions of black men, even though
I had my own skull pressed by a gun right here: When I jaunt
It almost appears as if I am quite beautiful, and so I run out and kiss the Pavement and imagine all the ladies fanning their opulence above it
And reciprocating with the moonlight:
Alma in the moonlight, hair fire-engine red in shadows, the cats passing
By underneath the coliseums and the civil wars, and the anonymous
Victims of her love spread out in beds they can never afford,
Spread out open mouthed and opened tongued,
Waiting for the sky to open to reveal their lord, while the vagabonds and Hobos attend restlessly to their stone pillows, like liquored up lords
Of my kidnapped but happy youths,
All of them the blond haired sacrifices for something sharp but beautiful,
Attending to the restless shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Reverberations Of Your Name

One more day and I'll have the semblance
Of beauty again,
As if her fingers were on the strings of a
Wicked marionette,
But it never lasts forever- It really doesn't Even last as long as a few words spoken
Into the cornice of her ear,
Before all that she thought is persuaded out
And eaten for some long beaked dinner;
But there are cars that last forever,
And bouquets who have gone into hiding in
The Colorado rockies whose throats still
Sing
Under the unpinned ears of the clouds,
Who smile like a zoo of animals,
While the cabins are hibernating in a fever,
And you are selling your wines,
Forgiving the independence of snowflakes
Falling, or whatever it is that you do:
While, laid out on the alluvial plane the crypts
And graveyards last forever,
Their cut stones singing the reverberations of
Your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rhyme Of This Thirsting Tongue

I am well done:
Getting felt up, and filled up,
On the Disney World tram,
The ancient roller coasters, and parades
Of ancient mice
(Where were you, anyway,
And can't you feel me now,
As I call you?)
Then, for the senior trip, I was
On a little bit of ecstasy, trying to figure out
Myself in the reflection of the rented bus'
Gaze,
And the little half Jewish girl waved,
Some five years or more before she became a
Lawyer: And I am happy, and just as healthy,
That I will live for a century, for sure, ha! ha!
Shakespeare, and she is a bartenderess high on her
Luck:
When she was an outdoor waitress, she Kissed my neck,
But who in the hell is the he she does f*ck.
Westminster Abbey, drive dump truck-
These Venetian blinds are made of bubbly, replaceable
Glass, 400 monuments and some weddings in here;
And the roller-coasters are cliché,
And my poetry should just be criticized for being totally Drunk,
But come July 4th, I will make a buck,
And hide my wallet in the inevitable clichés of her
Tw*t, but I have said that before,
In the food court of her obese malls, and not in
Her flea markets: Still, it is funny how she looks at me,
And how I show up in her photographs of,
.... And I wonder still if that is how she will find me,
So many years after she has failed,
That I have loved her, unpointed in the recessive sea,
Basking in the maul of this star, I pretend,
And she can find me still, if she is in the mood for
The rhyme of this thirsting tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rhyming Ribald

Night in gabardine
Stuck his fist in
The prom queen.
Until Chanticleer
Screamed this dawn
Came near riding
Butt naked on the sun.
Thus night dispersed
In tendrils fled
Streaming into his crypt
Like a bannered warlord.
The prom queen blushed,
On night she crushed,
But she married the sun
Because her parents said
He had a respectable job;
But every eve while he Sank to work in the sea's factory,
Night came scratching on
The backdoor.
She let him in,
Thus gave to sin
As his shadow fist-f! cked
Her on the floor.
Until dawn came riding
Butt naked on the sun once more.
Minced in a pie,
Chanticleer could not cry,
Thus the sun found night
Elbow deep in his wife,
And with daylight
Revealed her a whore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rhythms Of Your Very First And Last Loves

I don't want to have to give you up:

The night is still on fire, the animals are still running like

A fable of a bad cartoon:

The windows just get higher until they get nose bleeds over

The green fields in the memories of my first

Masturbations

Over which the ceiling fans turn remembering the zoetropes of

Paper airplanes,

And calling up all of the missing paths like the mining of

Ants and ant lions in the metamorphoses of the Colorado

Rockies;

Until all of the sky is a bath over your brown body, as on your

Elbows run its brown cadences,

And the heartbeats stop and start to the rhythms of your very first

And last loves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rich Layers Of Unawares

Young girls sweating out in their tree houses of Steam, or I suppose that they do:
And your second youngest child is a little girl named Gracie;
And she stares up into the places of sky over the Cankers of citrus;
And the airplanes leap and emote;
And in the trailer, your reciprocate with your husband,
The strange but expected species underneath the pinpricks
Of so many stars
And I am like one of their satellites to you;
I see you in the parks of darkness,
And look at strange clusters of coral:
I wait to listen to you, and I admire your ear; and you wear
Sunglasses, which hide your eyes,
Though I think you should never do this; and you shouldn't Smoke;
And I forgot to ask you today if you'd permed your hair,
Or what that signified;
But even still the satellites beeped down their signals;
And Gracie slept and then fawned somewhere,
Drawing little things shades of vermilion and maybe
Grizzly Bears:
I wander what she was drawing in the world you made her in,
Mother and daughter deep and drowsy,
So narcoleptic and utterly beautiful and captured in the Rich layers of unawares.

Robert Rorabeck

The Riches Which Were His To Explore

If of course these eyes are the hungry avenues
Along your very Egyptian neck,
And you sell wine and are already thinking of making space
For another child,
Do not worry about me: I promise you I am mundane,
And I am not very beautiful;
And I have loved other women than you, if I have loved;
And I have not shrunken all that much,
But I have shrunken, but around that time you gave me
A certain type of unrequited poem dissimilar to Any other sort of romantic poem I have written;
And I say I have seen angels in your bone structures,
Or maybe even an entirely new continent good for the fingers
Of your husband's body to explore,
If his mind had the know how and where with all,
As mine should have; which is does not; but yours is a
Fairytale place not with standing,
And your daughter will grow up as tall and beautiful and Heavyhearted as her mother, never knowing how easily he Placed her in you, never once conceiving the riches which were His to explore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ridge Of Empty Trees

If you drive into the fire you will see how the Fire works, how the deer and the bear run over even the finest
Of maidens-
How the tourists stop to listen and count the antlers
Running alongside the road,
Until even they are consumed: the sun is a muted thing,
A king twisted in his throne, and gagged by a witch who is cackling
As she burns all of the pretty horses of a heedless knight:
There he is on the ridge of empty trees with my mother:
All silver as they feed the horses,
The flames surrounding him- even the reintroduced wolves
Have run away.
What can I say to him that he will not laugh at? What can I promise
Him that he will not disbelieve?

Robert Rorabeck

The Right Key To Sing

Tonight is meaningless without Red wheelbarrows or empty rooms where
The pines are sleeping awaiting the borrowed
Day,
For the gods to come awake, long legged,
Shaved, to begin their routines at the gym-
As I begin mine here, sweet demiurge,
Prometheus discontinued,
Robbing armored trucks,
the last of his kind who can barely
Even spell, searching for the next to last line
To nail his prom date to the wall-
Ironically, not a pugilist but with a swollen jaw
Muscle twisted with a bit of wire, a cyst,
Political cartoons to draw- Everyday waking up
In the maze in the sky, overweight but wanting to fly,
Idolizing King Kong, wanting to pluck the stewardess'
Bra, like a flower,
Discovering who she loves but not knowing her,
And then to discard the rest of the crew into the burnished
Caesuras so far away from anyone you ever knew,
To let her bathe by squeezing nimbus,
Waiting for another chance to shrink into her room,
Wary of the freshman class of knights who've
Read the wanted ads and are perpetually climbing the Beanstalk way up to your fiberglass preserve devoid
Of herons or song birds- just her weeping kind
Of romance, or getting her drunk until she realizes she Loves you and she's lost her underpants:
Wayward ideas which want to swing perpetually,
Living forever but going nowhere,
Forgetting the way home,
Never learning the right key to sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The River It Ruined

Be a word, or bright thing,
Light-bulb, pillow-fight of pumice
Light:
Imitating a young Frank O'Hara,
I ask the little girls what they are reading.
They don't care,
They've read two hundred novels this
Summer:
They're on a quest- They've figured out
Green iron keeps away elves,
But they have to use it three times,
Three times,
Three times: And all the horses in the valley.
Are horses color-blind; and the rest of the valley
Had its mug-shot taken,
Was tired of the pantheisms of the western hemisphere
Always kicking out the day;
It went quite peacefully: it was priest going to Proselytize the other end of the earth- Go tell your Mothers what she's worth;
And I picked these daisies for you, but the educated man
Called them weeds; and I was pretty sure it was weeds (then) ,
Ashamed to have picked it for you
Standing indisposed watching the cars grow
In their rows,
Like old friends out of birthday cakes
Or dragon fangs was how it ended like the fair book said it,
Like a picture outside a dun fort of beautiful dead
until the river it ruined.

Robert Rorabeck

The River Too Deep To Pray

I am moving now,
Floating past my old captain on
The rocks,
Still calling out the depths
Even though his ship is sunk.

I am invested now even though
The current is too wide and deep
For me to make it to the safety
Of either riverbank;

And the sun is going down,
Releasing a purse of crocodiles,
As I imagine how her legs are lying down
Like an archway of a national moment
Taking a breather from the flash-bulb tourism,
From all the pretty shirts,
The petty smiles; she dims her torch,
And yet silently, black-jetted,
She runs on for many miles;

And I am steeped in her,
And I will continue to do my good works in
Her until I drown, until the little foal is too weak
To nurse and thus lies down, and all the lights
Bleed into night as she does his thing,
But the blessed river is too wide and deep
To pray for blessed rain.

Robert Rorabeck

The River Where You Were Sent

Bullies on the sidelines of my love
Looking at the underbelly or penumbra
Of the arc hidden in the Swedish alps
Like voyeurisms of milkmaids
The long daylight gives equal
Dividends to both sides
Of the canal,
But upon only one side can we live,
And the paper airplanes
Are thrust away,
And the fireworks are spent, while
I spend so much time loving you,
But you can never love me, gone-
Flown across the river where you were sent.

Robert Rorabeck

The Road That Hides Our Souls

It feels no better, drinking the leaky poisons of
The serpents-
The fruiteria up the road as bright as a carnival where
I can no longer grow:
Beautiful things who are budding from her lips and Breasts,
As she tells us all of the things that we want to hear just
So we don't kill ourselves-
The livestock frolicking on, both real and make-believe,
The kinder ones sticking their heads out from The cars and smiling, smiling
As they pass us on the road that hides our soul along its Ways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roads Again

I sweat at the angles that she can love me in,
Like angels holding out,
Still reading underneath the softening pyramids,
Or the lamplight of dousing lighthouses:
And some young man discovers electricity and Horses
While the housewives run away across the Canals- they become the pornography of an Endangered species-
Strung out and freckled for the wet tongues of Puppies,
And when the daylight floods the roads again-
At first beautiful, and then harsh-
Why, they are nowhere to be seen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roads That Would Not Turn Around

Remember the roads that would not turn around,
The rainy cul-de-sacs and all of their pornographies—
Remember how you just got lost as
A little boy
And to solve all of the problems for Yourself,
Your seven fingers so sticky from the candy?
And when you were a child
And the littlest yard on Haverhill
They have now paved in with a two lane road—
And across the caved in street all
Of the broken down chassis so chock full of
All of that pornography—
So the public school system won't let you teach
In the classroom anymore—
And the job you used to have,
But now you can just go home and get drunk
And dream of candy—
The sea horses and the manatees—
The baseball games underneath of the wayward
Palm trees—
The bases crowded with the boys with the scabby
Knees
And the patrol cars that never have to check
Up—because they are all going for home base,
Their lights blazing—
Open throated inside of the song of the little House—
The songbirds inside a seashell of rainstorms—
And all of the emptied houses ending up
Down near the canals that gave themselves
Over to the roses of virgins throwing themselves
Upon the hard-shelled roads of anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roar Of Engines Along The Edges

Let me take you to the places on the side,
The green pastures and ivied slopes that drip
With anticipation, waiting for us to couple in
The writhing jade undergrowth,
A pastoral that Hardy once thought of, only
He couldn't understand the metal streaming of breathless
Cars shooting like modern insanity upon their Slick stoned rivers.

Let us touch our wetness's to each other's parts,
And take turns pollinating our mouths like busy insects
Dabbing upon the pistils of divine floral, budding mammalian,
With bits of each others' kisses smeared along the precipitous rim,
The way our ancestors did it disrobed and flaunting
Newly aroused peaks filling in cavernous bloods
Wishing to geyser, flow, and pool
Into the other and then to evaporate to the beat of drums on a crackling
Yellow savannah whose only borders are the wildfires whose Flames stampede....

Watched by the animals whose lives flash in Hungry succession, who only have time to copulate
Once or twice before they die and are utterly forgotten....

Let their blind fears tremble upon us, so that our Hands may learn the feral touch of instinctual hunger,
And our eyes come to know only the motions swinging on their visions,
And to understand by the growth of hungry irises upon our lights,
How we wish to move upon the other, in steaming cascades,
Which cause the evaporation of dews, and a drying of the Forest in which we linger in mist draped upon one another,
So banks of fog move like velvet curtains upon the gladed boudoir
And drown out the now unfamiliar noises of cities
And streets, smothering the forest, silencing all the minute
Cicadas shedding, crickets chirping, snakes slithering, cow's chewing....

So there is no longer a sound on the forest floor, nor
The roar of engines along the edges, only the drumming of our Hearts which thump the sound of our borders disappearing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rocket That Shot Away

The world is freezing
On the other side of the moon.
No one sees the silver trees dying
Amidst the little boys.
How many invisible levels must be completed
Before you find her waiting in the secret room?
Up the hidden ladder, which the mathematicians
Had predicted,
But she's lost her heart
And the way down to the sea. The sky is in A plastic bag- it can not breathe.
She can only watch you go down
Like an airplane fireballed,
While she masturbates atop the red velvet
Of the curtains you bought her,
Before her mind turned into the golden
Arrow that knocked you off your horse,
And put your breath in the bag with a
Little fish.
And something about all of this reminds you
Of a father, who moved into the gardens
Beside the highway to sleep with a younger
Woman, while your mother staid at home
And roamed the kitchen like a butchered
Banshee, screaming out the window
Across the canal- the crickets and alligators,
And the lions down the street in the zoo
Serenading her as they execute the moon
From the second story
Where nothing remains,
Placing it's feet in the places where
You remember stepping before you made
Yourself into the rocket that shot away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rocky Spittle Of Your Bay

I am too much an amateur to trespass your shores,
And mingle in the calligraphy of the little sea snails,
Though my older brothers might leap and play within
Your lips' matriculations for nautical hours,
I only eat ice-cream from the beach in the lucid
Light of day,
Though your dress is sweeping beneath your bared breasts,
And you are swooning as best you may,
The children who go into you are too young to know
The way you kidnap them in your womb,
While the ships harvest your cornucopia's spume,
I lay amongst the rocky spittle of your bay- Your Charm is in the hypnotism of your dance,
And the sculpture of your lulling waves, but I would not Want to fall to scorning chance,
Thus I only read amidst the rocky spittle of your bay,
Where the sea-doves cry from your romance,
And the man-o-war scatter like suffocating electricity.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roller Rink Shore

Hoard me to the basement,
My concrete love:
This is where I warm and cuddle with
My mutts,
While the better placed angels are upstairs
Yammering, the birthday cake sl*ts:
And this is why, this is why I have so many Books- Hide my beautiful features in books,
Talk up a page,
Try to out-mind the yammering,
Birthday cake sl*ts:
This why it is better you don't know me in Any degree,
Because my whole soul is churning like the Pedaled-neck snapping of a butter-cup;
And it is better than I love you from the bottom
Of a dried up inland sea
Where the elk arise fully formed from the Harrows of dragon fangs,
Where the shadows of pre-ancient sea life
Are still crowding to the wispy shoals;
Because I saw you roller-skating one day down
The halls of high school;
But I really didn't, I really didn't see you,
But shut my eyes and made a wish, pouted so
Deeply for you,
A roller-skate dish; but I fear for my soul, vociferous
And afraid that if you came over you'd be just another
Birthday cake maid: One of those sl*ts,
Or one of them wh*res, with yammer and hollerings
Once angels but no more, ovoid and holding Hands all around the roller rink shore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Romantic Cartographs

Everybody was gossiping while I looked away into the Sea and you came over to my house in the morning,
But you would not kiss me open mouthed-
I will die, Alma, without the mirages from the wells of your caves,
And from the gods that you give me,
And their little graves, while the hounds bask in the cemeteries atop
The open graves,
And the mausoleums are washed anew;
And I give you roses and I dream of taking you to the zoo:
I dream of changing all of my clothes and becoming more beautiful for you,
While the day washes away into the green parades of
The forest rangers who are greener than you knew;
And it is easy, and it is fun to climb the mountains into the places
Higher than you ever knew,
Where I can sip my rum and look straight down on you:
Here is the places in which you have become, with your soft, familiar
Songs swinging all around you:
The cars hustle and they bum, and I have never seen anything sweeter than Who you are,
Alma, even if you are out all night with other men, even if I am not Beautiful enough for you:
I create the songs the caracole the amusements of your sad eyes:
Alma, your eyes are so far away in the soft but poisonous sub consciousnesses
Of Mexico:
And there you are playing cards and conquering, and when you look up
Into my eyes, it seems as if the entire stage is lighting up,
And it seems as well that I will live forever in the soft brown love letters
Of your skin that I have caligraphed in the romantic cartographs for you to View.

Robert Rorabeck

The Romantic Rumble

They woke up the splintered morning
After the rumble:
The beach was jeweled with green beer bottles,
Iron knuckles, lost teeth and pride;
But the waves still came the same
Unending pugilists of fragile glass,
The shattered surrendering at the end of the line:
The blue beasts giving up into boot prints-
Into the young crab's sidestepping dance at the prom;
No one had died, but they had wanted to,
They had beaten so badly into each other
The needs to surrender and change;
The clouds uneasy priests too light to approach:
They hung back in the alters of the crowd
Spent all that they had in the falling light,
The salt of blood cut with sea salt,
Maybe tears,
And the incomplete dialogues of youth;
Each species of bird crying in hungry neutrality
As the pretty faces were beaten into burger;
Until, in conclusion, the two left standing found
Love, and the motion changed:
The plain jane touched bruised lips to the slender john,
And they made impromptu romance in
The breaking waters of the Somme....

Robert Rorabeck

The Rood Of The Resurrection Poem

I will look at you from here
Where I am broken, where I don't belong
Literally across the world
From our vanished paradise—
Where, some three years ago now
I made love to you some sixty times
Underneath the primary colored Helicopters and
Airplanes
Everyone one of them with their own paisley
Stewardesses—
But you don't have to know about them,
Because you never went to school in America—
But you became a citizen.
I was supposed to help you,
But we just made love in my bed before
Going to work in the fruiteria—
Now my Chinese wife is pregnant again—
And my life continues like a bottle rocket upside down
In an aquarium—
This scarred exegesis, resurrect to be like a lizard
Basking underneath of your pyramids—
I drink white wine left over from our Wedding two years ago—
Fifty proof wine, unlike anything
They have in America:
It helps me to see you again,
Put a—delinquent muse who never truly saw me—
See me now resplendent in my anonymity—
A Christmas arcade:
I am the tree you cut down underneath the moon
Only to become the rood of the resurrection poem.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roof Of His Mind

This is how they helped the scores of the word,
This is how the swordfish and the seahorses tangled in
A ballroom of kelp and sunken heirlooms;
Or this is how it never happened, how it all drunk alone
And got hardened and set out on a quest:
This is how the dragons ate their heroes and hen glugged into
The west;
Or this is all of the words that I could never sing:
This is the youngest of girl-children I somehow couldn't save:
This is the Easter egg I could never find,
Or this is just the dying butterfly in the forests of Mexico
Who has made it so far only to be patterned like a deciduous
Leaf to finally know that its poisons could do it no
Good and that it must be buried above the earth and to be Forgotten with alma, with his very soul being stuck to
The roof of his mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roof Of His Mind

This is how they helped the scores of the word,
This is how the swordfish and the seahorses tangled in
A ballroom of kelp and sunken heirlooms;
Or this is how it never happened, how it all drunk alone
And got hardened and set out on a quest:
This is how the dragons ate their heroes and then gluttoned into
The west;
Or this is all of the words that I could never sing:
This is the youngest of girl-children I somehow couldn't save:
This is the Easter egg I could never find,
Or this is just the dying butterfly in the forests of Mexico
Who has made it so far only to be patterned like a deciduous
Leaf to finally know that its poisons could do it no
Good and that it must be buried above the earth and to be Forgotten with alma, with his very soul being stuck to
The roof of his mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roof Of The House Again

Down in a hutch where damp stars pool,
Like heliotrope dragonflies who tried to cross
The cut-up ocean,
Drinking the sharp milks of lactating rattle-snakes,
I don't know why I sing,
Like a dog excited to get out into the back yard
Where its wild cousins are taking down a foal;
And I upstairs, tiptoeing to sneak tomato sandwiches,
Fresh looks at foreign exchange students open
Bloused with the tongues of their uncanny glades,
Everyone has entered their own loneliness of Beliefs: She was so young when she started acting and Fell from the sky, and I am unsure if I am succeeding at This, but there are only a few sips left and the coffin
Will be dry, allowing every kind of us to float up
To the roof of the house again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses

In the end,
A rose bought in a store of amusement,
Captivated her heart for a very second,
But her heart was reclaimed the Very next second
By a similiar rose and on and on—
The fickleness of the female muse—
She loved me and she loved me not Until she forgot me entirely
And all of the roses that I unfortunately bought.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses Bloom, The Crocodile Smiles

Going up and up into the world
Only an hour after you have awakened,
With your wings spread
And the sunlight feeling so good and filled
With so many unpredictable
Numbers:
A pinwheel of spokes and architectures,
Each one burning off for a minute
Over the skeletons and the blue prints of
A newborn city:
And it all seems to be a little less reclusive
Or many up of the cornucopias over the Pollinations:
While the prom girls are dressing out or coming Down the aisles- while all of this has Just been words,
As the roses bloom,
As the crocodile smiles.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses Of Stolen Ribs

Fleet as the cannons go, coughing their verbs
Through the melting snow:
As it happens right here, along the long drooling jaws
Of the hermaphrodites
Doing wanders to their pillows, like starving conquistadors
That confront the satellites across the insurgencies
Of archipelagoes,
And then go away mumbling to eat their horses:

And to fanfare and woebegone symmetry: to any of this
And all of this at once:
To what was never any grandmother's vanity anyways:
To cloy armpits and to smitten, love smitten, cash;
And then to falling away like embers and popinjays,

Across the heath rows and cornstalks on the other side
Of canals where my busy hands, my busy suburban hands have
Spend so many fireworks,
Manhandling, pinwheels, to all sorts of aristocracies:

Until the last light flames, and it is time to turn in: and her brown
Is dun anyways, and comes no more, but like wax spent off of a candle
Into a house of butterflies rests without repose,
While all that was inside of her, her breathe, her alma, vanishes into
The elements, perfumes airplanes with the roses of stolen ribs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses Of Stolen Rips

Fleet as the cannons go, coughing their verbs
Through the melting snow:
As it happens right here, along the long drooling jaws
Of the hermaphrodites
Doing wanders to their pillows, like starving conquistadors
That confront the satellites across the insurgencies
Of archipelagoes,
And then go away mumbling to eat their horses:

And to fanfare and woebegone symmetry: to any of this
And all of this at once:
To what was never any grandmother's vanity anyways:
To cloy armpits and to smitten, love smitten, cash;
And then to falling away like embers and popinjays,

Across the heath rows and cornstalks on the other side
Of canals where my busy hands, my busy suburban hands have
Spend so many fireworks,
Manhandling, pinwheels, to all sorts of aristocracies:

Until the last light flames, and it is time to turn in: and her brown
Is dun anyways, and comes no more, but like wax spent off of a candle
Into a house of butterflies rests without repose,
While all that was inside of her, her breathe, her alma, vanishes into
The elements, perfumes airplanes with the roses of stolen ribs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses Of Their Lips

I know who you are
Into a web of kindergarten
And I am right here
Listening to the Housewives behind my house
Whispering of their
Mango trees,
And bragging about how Easy it is
To sell themselves;
And then the busses of high school
Come and their candy girls
And hummingbirds
Line up at the Drinking fountains
Waiting for the roses of their Lips to dry, only so that they can
Kneel down to drink again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Roses Which Still Bare My Name

Unicorns wounded on the road floating
Above the discos and orange parlors, like armless
Beggars,
Their outlawed horns like the perfect ice-cream cones;
Their goblins are road kill, and there is some kind of Orchestra rising like gnats for two days over
The sink holes of ex-girlfriends before they Disband like band members, like overweight boy scouts
Or Hitler's youth given up on the mountain:
So many overpriced airplanes, Japanese Zeros,
Panzers in the flea markets:
Really, I stumbled upon a toy soldier show in old Lake
Worth; I ate a cow, and congratulated myself:
I stared at pregnant ants and their beggars in the relief
Of unborn bedrooms;
I nuzzled in the straw in the Eucharist of starless generals;
I fainted, and came to through the smelling salts of my own
Wrists;
And now my parents are home, and I have trapped myself
In a human body to go mad, but the village is still Defending itself, the archers bristled in the cornfields and the Tennis courts;
And I almost bought something, I almost defeated myself
Into the penumbras of your overpriced love;
But I am not so easily found and committed;
And there is yet so much more to be defeated in the colorful
Grooms of the sound;
And I am antique and pulling myself out of a race with
The waves,
And you can never love me, because that is how I made myself,
While even now the turtles are making love
Across the stretch-backed darkness corrugating I-95;
I have hidden myself so well, neither the egret nor the kite
Can find me, Erin;
Nor can you ever be allowed to find me, because I am not Well;
I have crashed into the mangroves and the thousands of Islands of the pet cemeteries and Indians of the Everglades,

In a thousand pieces of indescribable cenotaph,
And the mailboxes are empty,
And the housewives are amputated in crepuscule,
And you are a perfectly beautiful woman,
Erin,
Except that you have never bitten your lip in wonder,
Or had thoughts of summiting my shipwrecked mountain,
To find me grinning there like the remains of
A way post with the skeletons of the roses
Which still bare your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Rosy Caracoles Of Her Haunting Symmetries

I've really lost it now:

There are green doors hung up in the grass-

The sun is a trout leaping the overpass,

And girls are dolls and marionettes strung in the Houses built on a stage of hills:

Each one beautiful, each one singing,

Powdered bosoms:

And I'm in a cart trying to count my fingers,

Forgetting the larger words which once lined my

Vanear like particular degrees:

These girls perfumed underneath the trams,

Being imposed upon by conquistadors

While outside it rains;

And I'm and spinning around and around the

Piece of corkscrew sent screaming from the

Sudsy which is even now making her

Farts whistle while he squeezes her like a

Harpsichord,

Like one of those things- My gondola is a coffin,

And all the fish are coins spilling from the

Wavering prostitutes sleeping beneath them-

Soon my heart should give entirely like a child's

Hand releasing a balloon,

And I will finally forget Jordan's sister bathing topless

Beside the pool waiting for her to lean over and Turn the page, to show the rosy caracoles of

Her haunting symmetries.

Robert Rorabeck

The Runways Of The Sky

What do you know about the shoulders of Sonnets: I know nothing of them,
And yet they remain carrying me—over the playgrounds
In the middle of a school day,
And over the scars of the moon with the dogs we have Somehow found there to play with us:
I wonder, haven't you seen them—while your very own
Mother was kissing the shadows of her house:
And then, I know you have—for all of the cats have been called
In, and it is the middle of the night—
The serpents hang like wet laundry from the armpits of the Lonely citrus tree in the backyard—
And there still isn't enough time to call all of the anonymous
Angels down from the runways of the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Runways Of Your Lips

Patriotic negligee flooding over the Estuaries:
Everglades that speak to the manipulations of Thought without wisdom:
Like stewardesses, they have somehow learned
How to fly-
As my heart beats- and the traffic continues,
Habitually:
It cannot stop or it will die- and I loved you for
The while that we were lovers,
And I bought you so many things,
As the boats with their long sails propositioned
The drawbridges so they could pass-
As the clams kept tight and listened,
As the dolphins played, and the winos burned tires
Underneath the overpass on valentines day,
Which was just another day-
Accoutrement to what will be inevitably lost:
Like the knights on their quests bustling to the witches:
They seem to be inevitably ending up
At the same conclusion: hanging up in the garlands
Of her Christmas tree- as the green dragons
Breathe and then make love to her in between the ficus
That shade against her house- and into the smooth
Estuaries where her shoulders lay barren,
Like naked ornaments waiting for the amusement to Land across the runways of your lips.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sacred Grounds Of The Indians

Browned onion in your sparse rib cage:
Where will you go with your child once you are all the Way over the sacred grounds of the Indians,
And what bromeliads will bloom for you back a ways
In their cul-de-sacs of puzzles, or how the day will Sweat to an end, filling up like tears the mowed
Corners of the yard,
Where the children who want to sell you things
Curl around the unnoticeable spines of your ancestors:
There they make a monument high enough to hear
The sea- where the waves are rolling, as you come to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sacrifices Of Pop Culture

Underage minors take care
To brush your teeth and comb you hair
One hundred times before you go out
For sacrifice to the dragon's lair

Robert Rorabeck

The Sad Wolves

Burning in the sapphires- I have plow shares to hold,
And the constancy in the infancy of this form
That burns the coal cinders for the muse,
While out there the trains ride high upon the levies,
And the nocturnal blooms look up and seem to whisper,
And gossip about the school children who have already Passed into the grave;
And the Mexican mothers who have two children but
No husbands,
They pass across too making the diminutive orchestras of Music boxes,
And the sad wolves howl: and the sad wolves sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Saddened And Pointless Road

Break in the forest: you can see the stars:
The deer are looking up
Anyways, and ignoring the dryads in their
Sorority of caracoles and bars:
Laying nude throughout the glade, Diana's Sisters just hoping to get Paid:
And naiads in a sea not far away from here:
And furies up in the sky of roller rinks
Underneath the china plates of a very delicate
But appropriate design;
And the waterfalls beside the zeppelin that
Is about ready to cross the yard and lie down
And go to sleep underneath the mailbox
In amidst the hydrangeas and the sleepy
Eyed puppies who'd been kissing the water moccasins'
Full lips all day, but now are finally ready
To concede,
As the hills grow greenly feral across the shells
That bight into the skin of the saddened
And pointless road.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sadness' Anymore

The lights are out and the clouds are full,
And only the moon is the thing at seven post meridian:
Something else I've learned,
My mother is gone to the dying of a red transcendence:
She took her best vehicles and left her old credentials.
My father sleeps like a king in a holy castle,
And the beetles have eaten all the trees;
And the wind is out of music, and the mermaids are out
Of sea. They say that there is a curse, and the girls you Love don't care anymore. The dwarf is driving the Hearse,
And the girls you love don't care anymore; but in other Countries there is hope as in Antarctica there is over
Two hundred species of lichen; and there are so many Doors inside airplanes frozen in an icy sky: Blue doors
And red doors with keys and grasshoppers,
And if the accoutrements are null and void, pack up your
Things and meet the tide of a different neighborhood.
See where you have captured yourself by the ear all of these Often sad years,
Or steal the stewardess through the door and give her new legs
That lift her up so she takes new names and doesn't serve
The sadness' anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Saints

We made this
Super-shopping gollum
Its eyes of gelt
We will not give to Charity;
We own this trivial
Abomination
This fool's gold
Dragon;
It is our property,
Hoarded-
Our wife,
Our children,
The guilt we drive
Around in.
The Indian nations
Are destroyed
But free.
Pardoned-
My father works
50 Mexicans,
While Dirty Sancho
Washes my mother's Back,
In the car, her garden-
How many Mexicans
Does your father work?

Robert Rorabeck

The Saints Of Your Joy

Your daughter's body was sick today, and I could not Help it
With the customers coming in and buying corn fifteen for
A dollar until my parents painted over the sign:
And we watched each other while I carted around the Green island fichus and sang the sweetness of
The theoretical mountains I keep you in,
Your brown body having its own prominences the size of Dolls,
And I have desires of buying a bicycle, or taking you on My shoulders to the island in the center of the Lake Worth Lagoon,
But I am happy now that you don't have time to read
The lies I've been singing you- Your young daughter is sick
And needs your attention,
But Sunday is her birthday and I am going to be glad to work
Your shift:
I'm going to work hard to find the work you named her after in Spanish:
Heidi is her name, and she is your daughter, and her world will Soon heal and fill up with sweet things in the refrigerator
And with the saints of your joy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Salt From That Very Sea

I want to know what you owe on your house
As the starfish hold me close
To the ground echoing, and I still do not know
Which horse to bet on,
But stand for hours in front of the mirror looking
At my pretty scars,
And thinking of my muses who no longer wish
To attend me,
And my mother far away in the habubs of Phoenix, Arizona, hand in hand with her
Husband, like roses next to the sea:
Pinwheels are a franchise in her eyes
And she doesn't seem to care that her son is
So far away,
As the wolves are reintroduced to the waves,
And thus they tongue forever the salt from that Very sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Salt Of The Names Cursed From The Sea

Nose bleed through my skeleton
And I will have to almost go to school tomorrow—
These blinds are getting dirty—
But these are the steps through the fitful night
Theatres of here or wherever while the night
Comes and the cartoons are beginning to look beautiful—
And then a lawnmower of my last muse while the Perfumes of the beautiful flowers are blown away—
And the gods that had to be within our second guesses
Are found forever—
And the daylight fades light vampires over the shades of Our second houses—And for a while we are here—
While the dead—and then we are here wherever—
And this cannot be foretold—because this is not in rhyme—and
This is not even a poem—but I am getting out of bed—
And then I am getting up to live forever—
While then the movie theatre is resurrected—and then while Then the movie theatre is filled with science fiction and My numb fingers in an espionage have to spell it out for Themselves- while we slept underneath the baseball mausoleum
Another shadow and another place to devolve
While the cenotaphs of the puppets had to happen out forever
Just as was the baseball games over the salt of the names
Curses from the seas-

Robert Rorabeck

The Salt Of Your Tears

Rivers you can fly over,
Or leap over like burning glass using all of
The wishes of your birthday—
And then lay in the snow and in the sun bask:
Above you,
A festival of hot air balloons, losing themselves
And conjoining—
Promises to the thespians in the make-believe
Clouds—
And when it gets to quiet and so cold that Even the river stops her singing,
Lay like a discarded angel, and the deer
Will come lay beside you,
And even the foxes—then what will they say
To you with their eyes,
Their tongues lulling for the salt of your tears
As the airplanes look down from the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Saltlick Of Cathedrals

All of these false echoes cannot keep pace with
The stars—
My young child is growing up—
I want to name her after my grandmother even While she is in my wife's Chinese womb—
I want to emulate the starlets
Who drape the vineyards of their nuptials
Straight over the sincerest of the faeries whom dance like light loving Spiders over the esplanades of my living tomb—
And when I awaken tomorrow, and drive my car straight into The echoes of the schoolyard that I do not belong in
But which I grew up in—
Then the daylight becomes the most beautiful of silence's
Pleasure—filled up by the memories that could not Contend with the heirlooms of the housewives of Spikenard—collecting from the perpetuity
Of the saltlick of cathedrals—
A beautiful world over developed by fairies—
A joyful place overgrowing the tombs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Saltlick Of Seahorses

Prettying ribbons around a heart—
She is dying in a flea market: around her,
All of the vanishing houses and
The sea:
Getting up tomorrow, tasting on my lips
The salt lick of sea horses:
Their fishtailed homeopathy:
Swooning in the bathrooms between
The classes of my students:
They disappear at an hour's length:
They go home,
Dividing like starfish—they all know their Way home,
And they go that way,
Like intelligent rays escaping the sun,
Biting their lips
Too self conscious to talk back to
The heavens that birthed them in their yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

The Saltwater Fables Of Her Motivational Clay

Perfect young couples come in for open houses:
They are lorded over me by what maybe a wicked godmother:
I am not sure:
I am just happily sleeping with the litter of foxes in the aloe
Beside the Lady of Guadalupe,
All blushing and silent like well suckled infant, all famished
From our radical travails:
We have just made it through the deepest sea caves,
And made love to all the mermaids waiting at the intersections of Opulent and lactating stalagmites;
And we ate all of the sea grapes, and flew all of the sea kites:
Until we passed all of the conquistadors and ended up here,
Right next to the laundry room with the metamorphosed princes
Right beside the carport of the house they are trying to sell;
And even with my eyes closed and my mind dripping the translucent
Transoms of long-footed jellyfish, I have the nerve to think of Her: miracle mother the next room over or in the sky:
She is floating there like a miracle play; and she is the reason
Why I journeyed here, but I am just one of those foxes
Leaping forever in the saltwater fables of her motivational clay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Salty Abutments And Stone Wet Atolls

Your sister is yet a wink of a soul,
But I saw you inside of your uncle's house today:
The walls were not being blown down by any wolf,
But there I was:
I who had just come down off the jerry curls of the mountain:
And you were sitting in the living room with your sister
Telling good times with your tongues:
Oh Alma, you are still so young,
But wise,
And I want to share in your disguise and drink the dun water
Fountains of you eyes:
I want to walk with you through the sleepy avenues of your
Skies;
It is the only new dream that my old body knows,
While the sea kisses sky throughout the love making of the Salty abutments and the stone-wet atolls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Salty Hymn Of A Mumbling Tide

Failures of rum laughing to me and echoing in My kidney,
Where my lips have been burying all of this horrendous
Gold of his heavy but untouchable sport:
I cannot read prose anymore, but I get on my bicycle and Go out towards the mouths where the waterspouts are Battling heroes,
And I hope for the elements to win, even while the roses of Another love are impossibly blooming vivaciously out
In the salty hymn of a mumbling tide.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same

Yes,
All my teepees are upside down
Trying to supplant flowers somewhere unchallenged
Northward through the sky,
Christmas trees and tennenbaums we go selling,
Selling like Norsemen,
Like aphrodisiacs without any children'
While the rivers bleed their births through the snow,
And the tourists come and touch down,
Like, like well you know:
I really, really love you and Florida has won the game,
And I want to live in a big,
Big house, and I know you want the same;
And I want your lips,
And the crèches of all your senses, like wild
Grapes scattered to the winds and all the wild fences,
And I know you want the same,
The same,
And I know,
I know
Your name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same As An Anonymous Death

Give me something to do for awhile-
Give me your eyes and don't change them, even Though I am not your man, and you don't Care. I told you I've been to Spain and seen Lorca
Floating, shimmering beneath the aluminum bellies of great Societal birds;
But who are you? I don't care- See the things I've been Doing for you, the greatest clichés and games:
It costs everybody a little to get in under the canopy where
The air is cool, where they reside- but it shouldn't Cost a wooden nickel for you. Bight your lip and stare at Me for a little while with the ribbon bowed in your Curls: Who are you, anyways- You might be my cousin,
But it is the same to you- You've never been to University I
Can tell- Never ridden a bicycle:
My hand has been so hungry for your hand, even when I was
With another girl, and my face haunted the reflections of the Lunch room, so young and awfully perplexing;
And the leaves changed, and death grew:
These words are the same as an anonymous death you know,
The most careful sort of pain that will take you safely home where You reside, and will leave you alone to watch the fichus tremble
Under the chipped window- I wish I knew better things to do
With you- You can see the ice-cream parlor from where you
Tend to live, but you are not my girl- and I don't Care in what color your eyes tend to live. Kiss me and I will Go away; and it won't cost you a thing- nothing is all you'll Have to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Color As Your Eyes

Aspens are always in sorority:
They are almost as light as air, they strike out tenderly:
They are tenebrous and winsome,
And they come after the fire easily when there are no more
Of the stranger, more uneasy trees;
And even if all the grizzly bears have all been roped,
And the wild flowers of her slopes have wilted other wises,
Melted right off the bones of the aeries of skree
Just because, why the aspens are still there:
Gossiping, changing in and out of women,
Drinking in their pools and having sleep-overs:
My mother was born in Colorado, Sharon:
And the two of you make me think of each other,
And I wonder if that is why you moved to where you finally Came to rest,
To sing with the aspen, and to walk through their unplanned
Canopies while the naked air blistered you with the same Color as your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Creaseless Daylight

I write this every time and visitors they come
And laying fawn in the sun;
And the traffic is behind my head, but where are
The conquistadors and the things that they must have done:
This is the place that I was almost born,
And here is where I keep returning and blowing my little Horns:
The girls coming out of the wind tunnels on their bicycles seem
To know me here;
They seem to be striking out and repeating their bodies
All around me like helpful flares which last for awhile
Until they grow either tired or bored,
And then they return to the countries and to the men where They came from,
Leaving me under the same creaseless daylight but all the Same far less assured.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Gods Of Light

I sleep under the ridges of carports, Indians panting over
Me, purple or vermilion:
And when they get out, I watch them from down the tawny necks
In the wet laps of the cannon,
Like an ant lion as they build their doll houses on their slopes,
And have vertical parades:
And the smoke signals that they give when they are in the Right mood,
There is no word to describe them: their sundials are the opulence
That puts the modern erudites to shame:
They feed their newborns the yellow tears of the sun which They grind up and fling under bicycles who are having
The identity crisis of windmills;
And they grow up on the brown tits of the their cousins,
Never taking to monogamy,
They sway in the higher declivities, and in the rope tricks that they Contrive to show the conveniences of the evaporations of water:
The girl I love is among them, and she never looks at me:
I am like a window that is never used, or was never imagined
To be there but is;
And though she never sees me, going up and down like the prenatal
Servant of a fairytale in the golden strata above my head,
I know that she loves me: for her alma is my very soul,
And there is something towards the prove in divine providence that
We should both survive together equally in separate worlds
Draped together by the same gods of light.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Magnificent Colors

Skies jealous of the color green
While I've been to high school,
While your father works on the truck:
And now all of this:
Your son smiled at me driving by Today without knowing who I was,
Or of all of the gifts I had sent him
Even though all of the mountains I've spoken
About are all so far away-
And the time proceeds through the traffics of the Unseen,
And this is just my work bullied up beside
The regular traffics:
The cats and the snakes hissing: why, lets try to Figure out what they've discovered,
Underneath the house, or underneath the wave:
Lets try to figure out if it was something good,
While the students come home again,
Drawing their own way: I wonder if they will think of Us as the jump from the bridges that from their Efforts find survival easy-
As the airplanes continue their loopholes through
The same magnificent colors that I've swear
We've never seen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Old Engines

Look at all of the people behind us melting into
The chords of snow,
Alma: they are breathing a ghastly that I thought you Should know,
That it has been awhile since my travels have been so long
Since they have been at such an impasse;
But you don't care:
You are a Mexican with auburn corn-husked hair;
And you hang up the telephone on me just whenever you can,
And go to sleep with your more appropriate of men;
As I call to you in the dreams that you cannot answer,
As the seas flood over with my unrequited rivers given down
From the diademed crowns
Of the weightless mountains, culling upwards like ghastly children:
They seem like strings of tits on a centipede,
And they have poked out your eye while you were riding
Your bicycle,
And now they go down to the lake by the graveyard to smoke for Awhile,
While you can't say that you love me like a tender child;
Or you cannot say that you love me while the kines run wild,
Smoking over the boulders and chugging along,
While the same old engines sing the same old songs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Old Pegasus

In uncomplicated silhouettes sing
That I am still right here, listening to the drum beat of my Temples
Like the heartbeats of rain:
And Alma is tucked away in her own house with her family
Where is time is already spent,
So there is anymore reason to save her;
And Alma has only driven through Arkansas just to get here:
And she has never been to Disney World,
But we looked at the albino alligator together one
Tuesday
And she made Mickey Mouse eyes at me:
And I love Alma while the hot air balloons play badminton
With another version of the same old Pegasus.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Relaxing Meaning

The same relaxing meaning drinking its liquor in
The middle of
The country while the race cars race
And the baseball plays its games—what is left for
There to be sold
But fireworks and
Christmas trees—the same pleasantries the Indians enjoyed before our arrival—
And the teacher who teaches next to me had no
Parents
But he all placed fourth in the Olympics back in
The 1960s—now the mouth is off
The bottle of the genie—
While you are still serving liquor to your lost
Gentlemen—
There are only so many wishes for so many lotteries—
And the same palaces imagine a night without so
Many stars—
And she drives home to him—
Into the places where she secludes herself—
While the heavens decide if they will cast their Rain forever atop the heads of the mermaids and
The Cyclops who imagine their love so many times
As to become forever
Nearer and nearer to the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Same Things

Fine young bodies will lay just as
They will,
Telling each other secrets, looking up at ceiling fans
And then to whatever sort of verandas they have:
Kitchens off to the side,
The night stokes, sirens abuse the darkness,
Bicycles pick their spokes: and in little clay pots
The flowers blush, beside where the chimneys stoke:
There is a high school somewhere near here,
And a field for playing or making love;
And I wish to divide like the mitosis of starfish here;
Yes, I wish to migrate here like the final migration of A butterfly;
And work the rest of my life in the little plantations or Zoos, feeding all the aquatic mammals with juice stung eyes:
Like the mermaids in their underwater barrooms and grottos,
Which make me think all the same things of you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sandbox In A Child

I am nothing but a sandbox in a child,
Burying red trucks while the teachers and Students are sleeping in the structure;
I am alone and the lightning goes laughing
Like troubled day workers in the nebular greydom:
Perturbed for the afternoon,
I hold the rain to my cheek like tears,
And imagine French-kissing a Shirley Temple
Named Chelsea- She is only six,
Anyways, and I have already stolen from her
The intricacies of careless good-will;

She doesn't know me now,
Like a song in that part of her mind she's Destroyed with all that alcohol and sex,
The little things girls do to come on to the world,
To find the boys shooting arrows in the caves,
To take one and kiss him like an acolyte,
A purveyor of the divinity's truth,
And those legs who struck the fact,
Kicking upon men's jaws
Across the Smokey Mountains:
The bearded revolutionaries,
The Shakespearean Thespians,
The landowners,
And the inventors of electricity:
In quick time at the cabaret, she owned them all:

Though they are now all dead,
The reclusive life-long abstainers,
The highway men in grandfather's grave,
The successions of better men, falling to the fast
Flung pellets, falling to the bears,
To the lucky Indians, and the plotting of the rich:
The machete's blushing glaze,
The machine gun's extemporaneous enjambulations
To the unforeseen mishaps of chaos' broken jaw,

Along the highways

And her thighs

They lied down ploughed in the fields,
And did not wake up, even after her accoutrements of Aphrodisiacs and witchcraft, she placed upon their Winsome foreheads, watching by the jetting penumbras,
Cared after by the old maids still full of breast,

The men who lied down for lovely wisdom,
Even before they were fully formed,
The pilots of blushing gardens,
And the forbearers of this knowledge so far-

Thus, striking out, I find her a little ways outward
Before death- the low oxygen harem of her eyes,
In the highest mountain of Alaska's insufficiency-
I love her, I love her, I love her-
Though I am neither whole, nor justified-
No longer do I know what I am no more-
None the less, and all along, I cry out to her now,
The wounded wolf, nor fully formed
But protected by the government-
I cry out to her now, from my little play room
Above her head-
If she should hear me let her know that I am
About to end,
But I am waiting for her still,
And still hold hopes of finding her in the Expensive amusement parks of rodents,

In the soft salted gardens,
Where I still imagine twists with her tongue,
And long talks with her eyes,
Should they choose to bloom upon me still....

Robert Rorabeck

The Sands Shifted Against The Baseball Games

Another living grave bleeds the flowers of night:
This is all my middle-class mind knows how—darkly obsessed—
Making love through the unadulterated anarchy of These cul-de-sacs—one or two other feral boys lighting off
Fireworks somewhere near this place—
As airplanes skip like well-lit stones across the prophecies
Of the heavens—
And marionettes shed their strings. Skipping across
The ocean, they are wedded to real live Chinese girls
In shanghai—
That is just what I did, a real live boy, anyways—
And when I got home, famished—the Ferris wheels I had once
Loved had packed up and moved on,
Going north into the ether—to the daydreams of the genies
As the perpetual foxes always leapt up to Try and grasp the meanings of the beautiful women
Who pretended to be there for them,
But were just mirages—as the sands shifted against
The baseball games,
And made their peace somewhere else.

Robert Rorabeck

The Satellite's Inebriate Shanties

The lights are out and set the mood.
The children are perfect on the green carpet-
Ceiling fans are quiet, as if its in their thing,
But the tinsel on the Christmas tree is Glittering;

And I saw you there, because I could not sleep,
My heart pullulating its nocturnes,
The grass' perfumes wafting through the house
We don't own anymore, but stay to see
You weeping on the pristine shore:

Where I thought to show you,
How I wept like I was your brother, only my soul
Was a nick in wood,
A discoloration in the eye- A soldier who survives
With his body,
The bird out of season without wings,

I thought to tell with you under the crude patina,
The satellite's inebriate shanties,
But you looked at me and I could even tell, that your Soul would bate the imperfect time and again;
And you'd already cast it into the waves,
To see what you had found, and there was nothing more
There for me- You had set it free.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea A Mightier Retinue

By body enfolded the same old
Art: of plagiarism, of rattlesnakes:
The tourists move as curiously as snails before housecats:
Packing their luggage on their winabagos
And setting off like fat bellied conquistadors;
And this a whole yard and not so far away,
The little spots where I sat and rusted in
A forgotten yesterday:
And the grooms, and the brides, seesawing underneath the Airplanes- and all of it moving its luggage towards dusk,
Bandylegged- like old men who once were curious
And followed the preening girls homewards at least Half ways,
But were too curious- and got distracted by the wolf and the fox
Burying the wooden boy's gold in a seaside and shallow
Grave, and saying to him,
And promising to him- that this is how it would come to us,
Overflowing spilling over,
Tempting him as religious as bees mothering their honey:
The sea a metaphor of flame tipped birthday candles,
And the preacher standing over our mistakes- our rattlesnake
Bites, our dead dogs and stolen baseballs:
Promising us the truth, as the witches rustled with the crows,
All eager for the storm: ashes to ashes, dust to dust:
Wooden boys who awaken daydream of what they might have had;
Their pockets empty, their saddlebags empty:
The sea a mightier retinue of cats and foxes
Blowing their wishes away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea I Cannot See

Wounded are the words that no one saves—
Words that my mind misspelled the first
Time I flew into Shanghai, China—
When I was married on my second day,
To I wife I bought not borrowed:
I keep her in my little yellow house so near
The sea today,
And we will have our first child sometime
Tomorrow:
If I truly loved her, I couldn't say—
For my poems languish over the intangible
Shadows of the girls I pretended to love,
Or paid for before I even thought to leave the Country—A muse that languished,
The eighteenth girl I'd slept with—
A girl from Mexico, built with the delusions of Windmills—an aperture to spearhead my Lonely art—but it was a delicate situation—
Catholic, married—and more than that:
Two children—good excuses,
Even with endless gifts of bottle rockets and
Christmas trees,
But life only gets easier the longer you play
With death—
Now my wife, the sixtieth some odd girl
I've been with—
She sleeps in my bed, waiting for me—
Afraid that if I get drunk, who will Drive her down to the birthing center in Miami, FL—my mother arriving tonight,
Driving in from her place of business,
The Strawberry Palace in Plant City—
And I am up to my old misdeeds,
Still dreaming of girls I shouldn't—
My love beside me at night,
And the moon at some odd circle over
The sea I cannot see.

The Sea Is My Mother True

Caffeine and another glowing stroll:
I could stay up all night and look at cheap
Houses in Saint Augustine. I'm thirty,
But in one more year I can afford a middle-
Class abode outright, and self-congratulatory.
This is how I read my own words,
With eyes half closed using the lines as an Addiction, thinking about making love to Bloated tourists the way sea tortoises do it
On the beach, to leave their young to attrition:
I go there now and tan all of tomorrow,
Drink sulfur water from the fountain of youth,
Count cannon balls in the Spanish Fort,
Following the invisibilities of stronger ghosts,
But that will not win you an hour away. And
In those cemeteries which stretched to the sea,
And the crosses etched with nameless caresses,
Understand where my hand must lie across my Quieted chest, like a soldier decorated by seashells:
The sea is my mother true, deeper than the somberness
The moon plays across the skin,
The smell of orchards to the west, and the tractor's Steady growling: I could live there debt free in A year or so, and dream of the deepest friends and
Their child who has learned to walk and is testing
Your name on his innocent lips, like stepping into
The water for the first time deeper than he can stand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea Is Still The Woman I Love

This is a strange song of your hypnotism
This is another candle's flame haunting another forgotten birthday—
And how the park echoes without your absence—
How I used to buy you breakfast before you had to Start out for the produce market—
But you are married and bedded down near the horses
And I used to think that this was a beautiful western—
Something beautiful enough that I could sell it—
But you are not here, and I am sweating around my scars—
The same old men are glowing from their pores underneath
The overpasses—and the sea is still the woman that they love,
And the sea is still a whore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea Of A Broken Heart

What will they say about your children
After they've gotten onto the bus in the middle of A sad rainstorm,
And you've driven off to sleep in some other bed
Than your husbands,
When the dogs are crying over the cats they cannot Steal,
And the cats are mewling beneath the clocks
For the boys to come and step down the hidden Corridors and down to the sea where
Some other maiden is waiting:
Some other maiden, as wonderful as the sea
Of a broken heart:
A woman who is not their mother- and she is not
You: they must taken airplane to reach her:
They must go over so many canals,
But eventually they will find her-
They will find her,
But then, they wonder, what they will do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea Shells

Brown cathedrals of sunshine,
Burnishing equally over the carports
And the grottos
As well as the chicken coops- inside
Their soft waters,
Mothers in pieta, bare footed housewives
Electrocuted by open faced extension
Cords
As the toads sing that they want at least to
Be princes
Who most certainly ought to be kings:
The rhythms of a steady metamorphosis beat
In the rain-
As the fair in my heart never return- it went
Out into the yard,
And through the corrugations- the sea
Shells became brindled underneath the sun,
And someone who was more tragic than
I ran away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sea That Is Still There

Chicken noodle soup in a thermos
Made me sick in preschool
On some fieldtrip in Palm Beach, FL—
There are things I remember,
But not your love—
How it crept like a sleep at naptime
Through the heavy sherbet rug of
Kindergarten
Where things startled me that I stole,
Pissing my pants waking up from
The dreams of tree frogs and ant lions—
There were toads in the rebar around
The carport where my mother
Slept in the rain—
And blue pornography across the street in Graveyard of drunken cars:
And the soft dunes where the conquistadors
Slept—
And soft boys, no longer running away—
And the sea that is still there
Saying the same name that I always wished to know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Searchers

How painful it is to keep riding these words,
Like a stupid chimpanzee trying to figure out equations
It can't possibly understand, those cold avenues
Walked in deadly night that might somehow rise
Up into her sun, and the golden key stretched out,
Like a fingerprint and her palm, laid there, open—
With the right word she will allow you to kiss it,
The secret equation which will unlock the chests of
Her eyes to flutter and to look upon you her love now
Realized, when all the cold marble sinks and the Bitter world melts filling the sea with you and her
To stretched on infinitely, the sun casting down
A net of a million points, destroying the aching need
To touch another human being in permanence,
For that is done, and the word that you found,
The perfect fit, has joined you to her with eyes
And lips that never stray.

Robert Rorabeck

The Seas Forgotten In You

Imperfect as the stamen tricked by the bee
To pollinate the high boots of insouciant epiphany:
I look for you through the woebegone crowds
Of the market place,
And at the dog track; and when I certainly become lost,
I sweat out beneath the ceiling fans my mother became Used to,
But waited, knowing that you would come and I would Fill my eyes all over you:
Brown, like a dunned river who divides the states with
The riches of her symmetrical tributaries;
The nuptials of your vineyard fill my mouth as I kneel,
And airplanes fly low over head across their common
Ways and avenues,
As we lay down in bed, like a canoe who slips away
Into the deltas hoping to become unrequitedly anonymous
Into the seas forgotten in you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Seashore That Fit Her Abscense Perfectly

Mammals shrouded by palm trees;
And all around me the sounds of mammals making
Love in brilliant cages,
Contained by the rotoscoping of religious caracoles;
Isn't this not unlike the amalgam of penny candy
And fireworks,
And the days in sweet spring when I ran away
With Jordan,
And we touched ourselves in the sepia bled off of Glaciers as we watched the heroic
Pilots crashing by themselves,
Making bonfires for us which kept us alive
Until Friday when
The simulacrum was hard at work, needing his pubescent
Pen in a hurdy-gurdy of circle-jerk;
All the things the teachers had taught him,
The dancing chicken getting rewarded at the bottom of the Ski-lift,
Making fast and easy passes of love; and she was smelling
Like the very forbidden fruit,
But it was just a cheap knockoff, underneath the overpass
Which wasn't even in Spain;
And somewhere nearby Sharon was a very beautiful
Woman,
Legs as long and trustworthy as one of those sweet copper
Cannons, and the skies were kind of all lonely and Leporine around the spot where I would have expected
Her to be;
But she just wasn't there, and I couldn't act for her anymore,
And still I was glad I had come,
Since the stages of the seashore fit her absence perfectly,
And I really felt as if I belonged.

Robert Rorabeck

The Season's Failing Play

If I should not expose the expressions from this Wound, how would you come to know that you are in me?
Opening rather, the way down to the street,
In the cool theatre: this is how it begins, for with it I Should entrance you equally, in Technicolor singing:
How joyfully we should rumble, and my fingers clack the Notes of you along the splendid ridge down the back
Of your aperture's dress,
As if an apple's twig along a picket fence,

And openings upon me as well, show yourself to you,
Grinning from the voluptuous mirror the audience sees you
Mortally in me,
And their butter snacking pauses, as from the focus of the lens,
Are you now multiplied in a Mandala of sad, though infinite
Twins,
Gazing thus in an epiphany through the orchards, the geese
Are flying south so early- they are leaving the reeds where You washed your ankles, and let the saccharine peaches drip
Upon the insouciantly early tadpoles,
As along your undisclosed borders the young men marched finely
Off to war, at a youthful, steady clip;

Now you look to the corner of the field, where winter is blown Upon your father's industrious plough, as I play through the branch upon the audience's
Head- they are laughing at the tragedy I have come up with,
But neither are they looking away: Thus, behind you, but even you
Can see yourself multiplied with me off the ground:
Moaning, I sing thus for you, as slowly the camera leaves your eyes,
And, following my gaze, as if conducted, recedes into Magnanimous clouds, and the orchestras bow their strings,
And marvelous children not so far away, run around the jabbering
Flag, a bit around the season's failing play;
They have not gone to see our show, how I on the mark revealed
You to an evening crowded in an early dusk, for they Were too young to go, and thus take part in each of us.

The Secret Of Hemmingway's Epiphany

Tomorrow in the afternoon it will be snow here;
In Florida, she will invite him into bed.
Little girls will play paddy-cake in the carport while
It rains, the toads will ribbit- opened breasted,
The stewardesses will serenade- aspiring, their arms
Will become wings, silver and fixed, they will leave off
Their certain neighborhood for the evening, they will dawn new Things; but tomorrow, I will be enveloped by the regular old
Snows of half a decade. My great, great grandfather was shot
In the mouth for the new president of the United States-
The secret of Hemmingway's epiphany was he was always drunk
While recording things, encouraging the bull, teasing the fetid Clit without any clowns around to save him. The night is Dark but there are clouds lit underground by the scars of their Own lightning, and every beautiful woman has driven away naked
In their own cars; but I am still here, and today I sent a full manuscript
On over to NY, NY- Now I've had some rum, and I sit where I've Always sat for half a decade selling fireworks, hoping for news:
My head is warm in itself- it is its own meal, and I expect nothing
More from it, for its imagination has already killed her father
Which drove her here, and her legs are naked in the rain:
They are marching down, down, down, but they cannot get out of it,
For they are nothing real- and my love for you has proven to be Useless.

Robert Rorabeck

The Secrets Of The Truth

Pacifists looking on, jaws constructed of spider webs,
Flotillas of daydreams eking through the yawn,
And wearied, defeated husbands and wives
Still swearing they're in love;
And under a naked light above you kiss, your flesh the absence
Of angels,
In a mote where what was suppose to be your ethereal guardian
Emolliates:
You just want to lie down with her in a bed that has been used
By no one else,
Kiss by the alley cats her tenements of brownly gifted extremities
And wings-
To yawl in the morning beside her, synchronized-
A boy and a girl at play, selling produce to the tourists and the fire
Flies,
So you can call her your life- Now as she flirts with anyone
That comes in,
That what you are hawking is fresh, and her eyes that are so
Dark and growing deep enough to hold the secrets of the truth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Secrets Of Their Fire

They were singing once again in the atrium,
But what were their words:
The student parking lot was empty except
For birds,
Baby- headlights blind to the ant mounds
And baseball diamonds.
I guess there was someone I loved, as the airplanes
Filled the sky, going above the storms
To other worlds, filled with beautiful women
And twice as many of their legs
Bearing their cups like Ganymede to Saturn,
To constellations drinking them
As housewives, their innocent cousins
Remained in the earth slumbering just like Grizzly
Bears, and keeping their scars and the Secrets of their fire for themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Secrets That Her Children Made

Ailing beauties taken at the cost of sherbet:
Lines at unsanctified weddings stretching around the block,
Yawning like colorless fireworks:
Girls with retainers tossing newspapers to drams of Fishhooks on the docks:
Seagulls and pelicans plundering the waves for sardines
And plastic dolls:
Alma is happy when I shave, and when I meet her halfhazardly
Scarred through these mornings:
When our cars and our bodies happen together for the refreshment
Of some besitos;
And I feel alright, and I lie and tell her that her body is
As voluptuous as a guitar- when she is nearer an aspen yawning
Up to the yellow dollar of sun
Sprinkling it with French Kisses in a harmonious glade
That the otters come to with their stolen bicycles and whisper
To the grasses as the dandelions and bluebells get laid:
The crickets and locus smothering over them
Like green and orange knights over their milk maids,
As my pallid fingers brush her brown temples which like Symmetrical ovens surcease with their thoughts,
Giving off the tide pools and bread baskets
And languish in the secrets that her children made.

Robert Rorabeck

The Secrets They Can Keep

Didn't you see the Indians sleeping
There:
Underfoot, and in their ditches:
Down hill from the monuments and the
Trailer parks,
Where all of the Christmas lights are Strung-
And you said you loved me, but you just
As easily could have been talking
About baseball,
As all of the pilots come home after Midnight but never sleep,
As outside of their bedroom windows
On the third stories of yellow
Studio apartment:
You can see dormitories,
And baseball diamonds, and fox
Gloves, and all of the pitiful stories
Of the students who will one day soon
Have to get a job and stop leaving their Fingerprints in the caverns where the lovers
To sleep through the echoes of Ambulances and helicopters-
As the roses and the hookers keep to their Defiled bosoms,
In the flea markets of the Sunday churches,
All of the secrets they can keep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sectarian Churches Of Our Workday

Let me make a song and give it to you,
A paper bouquet
Filled with the colorful scribbles of my Feelings
For your throat and eyes- because I am only
For you
Even though it doesn't seem to be a possibility
That you will ever listen,
But I have had my love, for I have seen you
Like the heavens around a Christmas tree,
And my heart has swung for you,
Smoking confections I have sweated through
The sectarian churches of our work day-
But you are gone now,
And the lions yawn, and the little girls board
The airplanes,
All of them filled with joy as if they were Going home to see their mothers.

Robert Rorabeck

The Self Affected Truant

They read your poems, because you sit
Out in the food court with them and randy them
With your eyes, like a click of masked avengers
Dreaming of a Pulitzer prize,
As your stuff yourselves with pepperoni pizza
And greasy fries, and the words which go swiftly
Through you and straight to your thighs,

And I have seen something else, while glaring at
You through the rafters of this sun,
For the perpetual lovers are making like in the gladiolas,
And something is blooming, but I cannot tell which one.
For already in the sky and on the concrete humid enough
To take a bath standing up,
There is the building up of a rumble, and a towering of Cloud, and the principal is getting restless, for he can Tell from the furtive eyes of the chorus of the greasers
And the misfits, that something is most definitely going
Down,

But just as things start to look good, in the falling of
The gray, I slip out past the baking pots where her soft
Hands are like caterpillars in the clay,
For already there is another land sweeter than in the seats
Of sociology class, and the spittoon trumpets of the marching Band, where another poetess is beginning a romance with
A marine, I do a tightrope act across the teal canal
Where alligators look up at the souls of my feet as if I was a nibble god, if I could say what I mean,

And the ample poets now are in their slumber in the food court
Of their souls, their eyes blackened as if by daffodils,
Their teeth chipped like girls from Alaska, their hearts bruised,
And their lungs like broken wings of sparrows shot in unolympian
Games, as around them the bitterness of men breaks out,
And the school begins the tidal hemorrhage of what its all about,
And the underpaid principal with the receding hairline, which he Can also do nothing about,

But I have little more to say than this, for I do not Like to preen, though I am justified in the loneliness
Of beauty, the self affected truant muted on the long and rolling green.

Robert Rorabeck

The Self Refusals Yet Easy To Rhyme

I feel guilty for my liquor, or my love-
I have no faith in the monster making friends above,
Turning out the ilk of psalms, the pasty solicitations,
Thrumming the heart of palms:
I watch her pullulating from the vast pool recessed in Lazy shadows,
The white man is mothballed, the Mexican still battles:
My chest is scarred by myth and masticating beetles:
They made love vast and hard in the self-motivating
Maw of a hurricane:
And this is what I used to do, but crawl up over the rented Shingles, place tiny bits of paper against her jaw so
That I might look out over the leaf-flooded pool
At the downed power lines, and the entrepreneurial destruction
Over the vast forest of American enterprise:
It looked so beautiful, the supermarkets glossed over the quieted
Buck of her thighs, so that I might be well-sated,
Fulfilled by syrup and dollar bills, learned to love the quieted
Displacement of rosy seashells- Learned to love restively
Backed up against the drowned shoals of the highest tide:
She is well-engaged, and I am placed inside the imagination
Of a touted brook:
The last line is stolen, or it is misplaced, the hieroglyphs
Misspoken, my love erased:
The vast gulf of palmettos, the truncated strides in the armpits
Of cypress, the fresh-water otter cracks open the song,
The house wives are rented, and the canoe floats over the Shelter of dead-men or the vulnerable homes of fresh water
Terrapin, like the ink blots of meta-fiction,
The last choreographies gilded like goldfish in a middle-class
Pool yet refusing to rhyme.

Robert Rorabeck

The Senses Of The Hills

Standing in a blue abscess, wounded around
The eyes:
The nocturnal pugilists countingimps,
And the gates awash with freezing water
The blue spruce cried-
And other planes coaxing down: inside their
Golden necks, their stewardesses all
Asleep-
The weather about them a blanket that pulls
At them softly,
The sea, a mother waiting in the deeps-
While each pine tree rises just for them,
Nocturnal spectators in the senses of the hills:
And they go over them, nodding in
Sorority,
As the hillsides sigh, damply drunken,
And holding up to them bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

The Senses Of The Sleepwalking Hills

I can feel at home
Weeping at any place
All through the
Albino cathedrals-
Fallen like snow
Beneath the monoliths
And keeps of Paladins
Who have all bled through
The paper of sweethearts-
And soft animals alongside
The road-
Trying to remember if they
Were the metamorphosis
Of pilgrims
On their way to a sea of Ferris Wheels
Pinwheeling all of a sudden
Through the senses of the Sleepwalking hills.

Robert Rorabeck

The Senses Of This Class

Clichés of cadavers laying opal bricks
On the mean streets,
What heirlooms reside in your bloody flesh:
When you eyes and lights are gone,
The bowls they drink to Sate the king of a river forest
Where we get all of our Christmas trees
After the cars are done purring,
And the university is just a transient penumbra
Where you could never have lived
Except for in the old wives tales where the bicycles
Parade,
Somnolent, like tight rope walkers on the streets:
And she has your eyes,
And I think that you should both sleep together
In a sorority's coffin,
Like a constellation nailed in a horse birthed
From an acorn;
But for now bight your lip,
And kiss his tongue, but never forget of
The love I have told to you once there is nothing left
To cover the sky,
Who like a silent tiger leaps from the limbs,
Never once harming the bells which would open
Your eyes,
And would awaken you from your boyfriend's
Sleep in time to make it to the senses of This class.

Robert Rorabeck

The Serpent Is Hidden

Calling up the children from the Green roadway: trying to recall the sounds
They made,
Effervescing, up to some good:
The diamonds dancing on her dresses hidden by
The blue car in the carport,
While she is turning around,
Turning around- and the serpent is hidden
In the backyard: yes, the serpent is hidden up in His tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Serpent's Sin

Gun bolts left in the open throats of the Frontera, where the illusions of fireworks and muscle
Men pirouette:
The airplanes the fat biceps of the zoetrope's overblown
Mirages,
While needled into their golden caves, the nuns are Playing video games,
As the graveyards travel sideways: and I am singing to Unicorns,
And making love to windmills and all of that;
The wishes felt up in brail on the tough side of the mountain,
And none of the weather is ever coming down,
So she is safe to climb, even though she is really
Forgotten,
While the buses of your grandmothers school years
Rust in the curling armpits of her jungled alders;
And the otters swim up to kiss and entangle with the throats
Of beavers,
In the pulls of ancient jubilee who will forever be too pure
To feel the serpent's sin.

Robert Rorabeck

The Setting Sun

I cannot lie to her
When she will not tell me
Where she lives:
Not since the flood when
All the sorrowfully innocent lives
Stopped reading books and looked up:
Surprised-
Until they got to their destination.
Getting out,
They politely walked away.
Where I sat behind the wheel,
I was too stunned to speak
So I just remained and Watching the instructional video
I fell asleep-
Blinded by drink I drove around town
Calling their names out the window
Like a wounded hound,
My piss stained tears marking the Territories she used to glow
Like the seed of a virgin summer
While the maritime marines pulled
Up and did battle in the sea.
After I had gone away
I heard from a friend
That she crawled out of the clouds
Like a swan
Just realizing what she was
And yawned:
She did a high-dive toward the east
But tore her leg against Spanish Moss,
And from that wound
A choir of angels sang,
Little children played triangles
While she, still bleeding,
Fell in love
As the shade gathered
From the setting sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Seven Seas

Spindling ablutions,
The catastrophe of the weathers above the ways
Out in the make-believe of an ultimately beautiful day:
The frenzy of kites stolen away from
Little boys,
Who know so few words as never as yet to have Surrendered to the loquacious avenues that birth the Fraternity of sea horses:
Poppy seeds in the air, making an illusionary breakfast,
Cantankerously up from their low birth,
Gossiping their tranquilities over the low flying airplanes,
And their majesties:
Demigods who float on the breeze, in a woebegone
And yet innumerable sisterhood all over the seven seas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shades Your Lake Reflects

Other women are jealous of Sara Teasdale,
Even though they should not know who she is:
That is why her name doesn't show up
In more poetry anthologies;
And it has been a day or two since I've masturbated,
And another week beyond that since I folded a paper
Airplane,
And years since I've been to the zoo and seen a
Male peacock in real life;
For they are the ones who are most beautiful,
Strutting legs-forth outside the otter's den where the Mermaids try to represent you sheer-blooded
Motherhoods;
Then with grandmother, we could go and get astronaut
Ice-cream,
Or pretend that we were at the movies,
Or fall asleep down the little jeweled declivities of Famished canals,
But grandmother is dead, and she cannot take us there anymore;
So I am still waiting for you to take me there,
Sharon,
But you have your own daughter now, Sharon,
Who will eventually make you matriarchal in your old age.
She is your spitting image,
And I love the shades your lakes reflects,
Though it would not behoove you to appreciate who
I am.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shadow Of His Own Song

Everyday is too early;
It wakes up before the gleam of your eyes,
And my sad passions subsides:
On my bicycles of so many dreams:
The fish are just fish slipping through the streams;
And the days are not on high:
The high king has said his sad goodbye,
And the territories are awakening up to their
Sorry toothed pups;
And the fireworks shoot and say their goodbyes,
Like the mailmen yawning, yawning up to the skies:
And the cities float, and the cities dream-
I have scars like cadavers floating where they don't Belong; and there is no reason by the rhyme,
Like the fabulous skies at picking time:
And this is another sorry wound meant to lift up
To the balloons of charlatans; this is nothing but an airtight
Tomb: floating, floating
And making me feel again as if I didn't belong,
Even as a mate to his own song,
Or even to the shadow of his own song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shadows Of The Armpits Of The Sun

Strange as the shadows of the armpits of
The sun—
My father trades upon his hopes and fears,
And real live angels hold their breath long enough
To come down to kiss
And bless the roof of my house—
Even after the days of their own family of Angels are over—
And everything gets softer and more poetic—
I linger, beleaguered in my old neighborhood
Until we are entirely famished and
Do not know quite where we are
Until we are there—
And Saturn keeps carrying his many rings of Strange and saturnine lamps,
Made of girls who have turned into the pig millions
That once existed upon the borders of
The jungles of their high schools' proms—
And I hold their cheeks in my beat-up fists—
As the goldfish seem to ponder the invisible heavens
That they have made up in the daydreams of Their front porches—
And it seems to just go on and on—
And isn't it just a made-up graveyard of forever?

Robert Rorabeck

The Shadows Of Your Infinite Sisters

I've counted coo on the roofs of high school,
And now she is mine:
I don't have to buy her bouquets anymore, nor wait
In her homogenous lines-
I can stand out in the sun taller than any bullies,
And twirl my phallic gun,
And she'll come to me- after my car is keyed,
And all the circuses are done.
Then the sun is just so runny, almost eloping with Crepuscule and all the mailboxes are opened tongued:
And the housewives are softly revolving like
Satellites in their air-conditioned cars,
And grandparents are fit for dinner. The ambulances
Have crashed, the alligators in the torpid rivers;
And I know who you are, even while wearing your Violet masks, your heliotrope surprises:
You sound just as silently as immaculate gliders:
You are the whispers of a burglarized house, and I am
Almost getting paid:
I can run up those slopes to your ding-dong
Door
Just as easily as my dogs: We can all come to you,
And we can all fly, and take you out of the windows
And make-believe: You don't have to be wife or daughter,
And all your mountains are the savage paps of
An unending goddess the twins of America were founded,
Suckled and let loose in a floating trinket through the weeds
Of an almost great suburbia;
Even with you missing from the streets, somehow,
The clouds seemed to paint over where you had left us,
Making the shadows of your infinite sisters dancing there still
Which I hope you do not mind.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shadows That She Grows

Another terribly valuable thing left
To spoil in the summer rain,
With the kittens and the lizards,
The tails that swish and slither,
And know the ins and outs of instinct,
Whiskered:
They have her eyes that are always gazing,
Hoping for things which aren't yet represented
By flags;
And I don't know what she is doing,
But that sometimes I see her laying in the Stones of a cerulean garden,
Growing things better left unknown,
And I come to her for all her lives and she just Basks there in the swelter penumbras,
Or the rush hours that seem to whisper the Shadows that she grows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shadowy Passages Of Another School

Coming swiftly towards Christmas while
All of the boats and their
Pirates swing-
And the oceans look so beautiful, whilst the rose
Bushes are all awash-
And the forts of your harems are always so beautiful
That their colors cannot even be described,
But they keep to themselves,
And keep flying their unsundered flags
Underneath the heavens whilst I search for My own home,
As the sea swells and becomes too beautiful and Doesn't even care,
As my sisters travel further and further away from
Me,
As you keep your mouth to my ear, and keep
Wanting to promise me "promises, "
Forcing me to spend the weekends alone-
Getting massages,
And losing all of my faiths as the sea swells,
And the airplanes fly higher and higher, managing themselves,
And trying to keep up the witchcrafts- whilst, eventually,
I cannot even bother,
As the sunlight burns forever through the windows of Trailer parks, and the evil I know just gets more
Evil- and the super heroes fail while we all travel back
Again to the shadowy passages of another school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shallow Pornography Of Blue Gills

Glimpses on the skin recreate the times when
Two bodies might have fallen together on occasion
Practicing out of the apple orchard
Like ghosts wondering inflammations of the sea-
They stroll by the rattlesnakes and cords of Wood- The day slows down so that they can be Together, until the hours go back inside shells,
Their mothers curling soft and yellow
Around mailboxes-
The trailer parks through the pine trees landscaped
With discarded plastic and coral snakes,
And the bicycles lay down there with the burs
Beside the girls leaning over
The shallow pornography of blue gills.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shallow Sands

Beautiful call girl like a peacock
Look at my scars
And lay down in my tomb for two hundred Dollars and tell me how beautiful
I am- In a fugue of greasy surrender
Outside of the halos of the burger joint While my dog howls at home
For me to return:
Make love to me the way my mother can't Even though we are so far away from
The mountains where the Aspens live like anorexic china dolls:
Say that you love me,
Even though I only have one moon to give you-
And my heart is a coffin filled with grasshoppers
Who are spent into husks
And picked up by little girls along their paths
Across the shallow sands.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sheep Of Angels

Continents of love and now lions- I'll find Away, while I've just been starting out underneath the Halos of starless forests, while the foxes have been leaping,
Busy mouthed,
And I tent to exaggerate: well, this at least is my busy vine:
They keep leaping for steaks, and drinking
For wine:
And the railroads of star-crossed lovers continue their Burning séances underneath the mountains-
They can hardly remember the lost hallways of their high school,
But they keep turning out,
Like topless angels without a voice to shout- or in a school
Yard far away, parked like cars,
I care not to wonder what they have to say- while voices proceed
Voicelessly- while I have been counting the sheep of angels,
But I can hardly imagine you understand how much it means to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shell Of A Supposedly Beautiful Thing

I pass the bottle of laughs towards the Tiger who is no longer leaping.
He has retired from his ring of Predictable flames—
The instructions his parent, master,
Teacher gave to him every day after
He got off the bus. He was kept so busy that He was never allowed to marry—
Juvenile in mind, he never produced great
Art—and now his yellow coat is like
The ash only dogs can see—
But that will keep him for a little while.
When it rains it seems like birthstones,
And the echoes were once like the footsteps
As he passed through China—
But he never came across the top of The mountain to worship the footsteps of Buddha—but for a moment the school
That trained him is empty,
Like the shell of a supposedly beautiful thing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shells Of Their Homes

Entirely folded up yellow angels,
Their wings pinned back
Don't have to talk about opportunity—
They have the sun,
Busy as a man in his orchard
Spinning things off—
The cars like ants beneath him do not Wonder where they are going—
They are just going—
Seeming to follow him somehow
And the angels around the atmosphere
Lit up like a boisterous torch over
The interstate—
Until they lay down like venison upon
His crackling shoulders
And look into her eyes as she comes over
Them, luminous in her stolen church
And placing them like shadows into
The shells of their homes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shimmering Architectures Of Windmills And Weathervanes

Across the pastures of cold sleep never Forgiving the stars:
House wives who look as hungry as wolves staring at the Chickens hypnotized outside their cars,
And so near the beach where their children are whistling
To airplanes,
And then going away to make their games as if they were
To be their professions:
Above their heads two bridges going either way:
And your lips a mariposa, Alma, flattering, like rose
Pedals basking under the wind chimes,
As you look up above my house, admiring the shimmering
Architectures of windmills and weathervanes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shopping Malls Over A Tomb

Don't you know the cars driving away
Sounding like raindrops
On the highway that isn't a dream but is getting louder
And louder as it too becomes a vortex,
Or something else provided for that doesn't Pay it back—and the otters who are another
Species and who could care nothing at all for Baseball or any other sports that are never their own,
Still sleeping headily in the manmade estuaries,
Catering to their own hearts in the noontimes
In which all of the housewives I bet are too busy
To come home and see the heavens that bloom there
In their absences like creation myths over the Shopping malls of a tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shoulder Blades Of An Afterlife In High Demand

The truth finally comes out like long awaited
Orgasms heard breathlessly over
Phone lines,
And the pitiless flume like white roe dances
To death on the Indian rug
In one pitiful spot which makes her laugh for Awhile like a
Bouquet she wasn't expecting,
Nervously;
But the stage is pure, otherwise, and she looks
Fine in her serviceable outfits:
The entire definition of her creation is to look fine
And comely for your creation,
And that is why you get together,
And her hair is so long like a river straight through
The woods which has made you
Wonder,
And turned all the deer as white as ghosts:
In fact, she puts you into a somnolence where silver
Airplanes float as slow and unsure
As bees,
Taking passengers back and forth to pollens that have Yet been extinct for Uncountable years,
Making scientists yawn forever, as her immortality strikes
Nude and past her ears,
Down into the shoulder blades of an afterlife in high demand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shoulder-Blades Of A Goddess

As soon as the gloves are off,
All of the tit-mice fall asleep in their fields.
A wisp of cloud is at my midday's
Window.
And, although the world is broken into Factions,
For the moment all is peaceful
And I can lounge anonymously
And not suffer the pangs of greater
Or of lesser things—
As I once did—
As all accords now to its various Perspectives—
Arthur Rimbaud is buried in a field in France:
In a womb, in an armpit;
Children I once knew are hallway through
Their school day.
The sun is strolling through
The mountains.
Using his trusty cane, he sings
A lullaby,
A daydream for the sun shower
Passingly and momentarily beautiful
Highlighting the shoulder-blades of a goddess.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shoulders Of Her World

Votive orchard there you are:
Open throated underneath the airplanes:
What are doing while the
Birthing mothers lay apexes beside you:
And what are they doing,
But turn around into the good world again,
Releasing the continual specters with
New names,
Faces- and so much hearts, but there is Only a certain amount of energy allowed inside of Them- cooing next to the speckled
Hibiscus: what are they doing-
What do they seem to appear to be doing,
But growing upturned underneath the soft speckles
Of so many forts, or going their way
In the decrepit longitudes without knowing
How they can; and I wonder if they can,
Lying there beside them with the other tourists:
And I wonder now if this is their world
And if they should know it now as if in the Amusement parks of some dull terrapin
Trying to make it across a baseball field
As the clouds undress for the ether and the stars
Once again speckle the shoulders of her world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Show

All this rain and some people are Talking about me,
Using me for the butt of their jokes,
Smoking;
But it is a very casual thing to see the Sun when it caresses the arm span
Of airplanes,
When the clouds finally part and the Play begins:
And I guess I've always been humorous
And a drunkard,
Good at making cider and running
Away,
But the mountains kind of always had
A thing for me
When they awakened somehow indigo,
And girls named S- loved
Me too,
Even when I was making a mausoleum of
Their fun.
They asked me to smile as the birds
Took to the sky;
It sounded like the laughter of a great
Audience,
All those wings multiplying going
Up into the weather,
And all the acrobatics of human invention
Touching down softly across
The schoolyard where we finally settled
Down to watch the show.

Robert Rorabeck

The Showers Pouring

Pure torture shackled Prometheus
In front of the television in the middle-
Of South Florida:
The carpet red, the curtains velvet,
The air-conditioning expensive blowing.
The brochures said for a short holiday,
But the ants have already found the cracks
And trail of breadcrumbs, so along his
Grayish shanks they are crawling;
He quivers trying to remain politely
Knowing there are gods about, though maybe
They've all gone down the street where
He can hear the lions roaring, and there
Was just a car-accident, and the ambulance is Coming, and right now the studio audience
Is laughing, and above him like so many Hindu gods, the ceiling fans are pirouetting;
And Cupid and Psyche are chewing bubble-gum
Over by the piano, playing awful romancing.
The cat is purring, and the dog is snoring,
And coming later that same afternoon
The showers pouring.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shows Of Angels

They swung their hips to the shows of Angels in their parapets:
They raised their hands and petted the wet paint or Tears off of airplanes
Going the opposite way,
And the dictions of the clouds spoke of so many Rejoices simultaneously:
Metamorphosis was in full bloom—
The softest strata that poor girls feel as they,
Poisoned, swoon—
And lay with the leap frogs in the grass—
Soft and inconspicuous where the unicorns have Disappeared in the anonymous islands leading up
To the overpass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Shy Moonlight

Pretty as a child in the Throes of truancy—tumbling down hill
With lilacs in her hair and the dogs following her:
Just a succession of paper wings
In the hallucinating lamplight not far afield from Her parents,
But enough to be forgotten and given over
To the playground's caressing caesuras:
Now they say she is here, in a whisper,
As if a coloring book of a church—
And she mimics the sweat broiling off the tin cans of
The trailer parks over her shoulders,
Until she pushes herself into a saint of those arcs—
And sees the shy moonlight in the face of A pond—
As beneath her, the traffic sounds, and it's saddest
Realities make their stumbling away across the grounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sight Of Her First Green Storm

Scars recede to new abutments under the Castillo de San Marcos: We who live our lives
In different stages of vending,
Do not know the ways in the mermaids know,
Whose boudoir fetishizes the grinning remains
Of conquistadors;
We go by the way of tourists. Poets sing who
We despise by our outfits,
And girls in summer diseases cough bosoms of Roses from those lunar trains of Perfect middle-class easements. Waving there
Like flagella or like flags, while the good airplanes
Superimpose the meaningful instruments of Long legged breasts, who are answerable to their Captains as to my free verse:
Harems of just ripe women saying their pledge,
Baking their cakes, leaping the hedge:
All above tree line, circumnavigating around the Expensive necks of the Himalayas, going, going like Esoteric nursery rhymes, so dizzy to fall into bed
With any properly groomed man: We can do anything
With our lives in the dunes of lost joys;
I have my flesh in hand, recreating the parade of Missing newlyweds, my closest relatives two tortoises
Escaping from the carnival shows. I am so very glad
To be aware that I am utterly alone-
It is the only answer there, to see the girl smelling
Like Dr. Pepper on the Root Beer float:
She looks like a sailor ready for bed- A yet metamorphosed
Honey with a good head,
Who breathed her first breath by the kiss of my pen-
And I would like to take her our for fake sunsets amidst the Leaves of loose pages, publicize her like the negligee of A weather vane all excited at the sight of her first green storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sign Of The Albatross

Down- I think of hanging- the cool creep
Of grinning theatres grandmothers and cancer knows:
The organs play, the wolf is waking up;
And I think if I go, my poesy will save me,
And I laugh- The crow's eyes glint like evil marbles:
Not a thing I have done is of my choosing,
Just like the naked girls down in the pool after midnight,
The thieves scouring the barbershops on their bicycles:
And not a word of it will save me;
She is looking away, smiling at a man she can be proud
To believe in; I have become a crooked jag of smarmy rust,
Without oil or singing girls who through happenstance
Abound bucolic with their dogs:
And I really want to swing, and know the words won't
Save me- so much ink the squid shoots against the barb,
But ends up under the knowing glint of the nearest Insincerity, just like another god, wild-eyed no one had the Care to believe in as they heaped him to their load,
Covering in tentacles of their good deeds,
Perfumed with the sign of the albatross.

Robert Rorabeck

The Signals Who Travel The Spheres

My cares are not personal, but they must be met:
The sky rises up like a water fountain and wets the lips of Angels that it rears:
The sky in a somnolent dance lighting like a fire off the sea;
And if you have ever seen it metamorphosing,
What you say you cannot see, but must be believed like the Proof of a scientific romance,
The way cicadas and katydids leave themselves like jewels on
The necks of old southern trees,
Where my cousins are always wetted and being born
Like kittens amidst the liquorish tongues of the echinopsis;
And now it is almost time to see the air show,
To see where the daredevils are blowing like feathers of arrows,
For they are those who delight in the fireworks that like
Missing children who are never found,
Never fall back to earth, but leave their bodies behind in the Mythological colonnades, in the flumes of old houses, becoming the Signals who travel the spheres.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silence That Is Out There

Modern algebra in the hotspot of
A tourniquet—Or, how you hurt me, father,
Made of the lances to faithful abandoned
From the high school you didn't believe
In and never graduated from:
Blooming, burning buildings as the heavens
Spin and illuminate above us: turning, turning Brilliant and never to be spoken for,
For more than a dance in the ballroom—
Spilled, and accumulative—
Silent joke of the flowers giving their lives for
The weddings—
As words break into the colors upon the ballrooms
Of an orchard—and all the silence that is Out there opens its throat, as if wanting to—
But not daring to Sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silences That Lay Between Us

Another cathedral dreamed about of
You boudoir, as you serve
Drinks all night long underneath the vacant ceiling fans:
Yes, underneath the busied stewardesses that would Fit you like a glove:
And I go to the movie theatre and look for you
In the celluloid—
And I drink to forget my senses, to find you like a cartoon,
To figure you out after school, pillaging at the end
Of vanishing rainbows that are now
In dispute over the baseball diamonds and the ice-Cream trucks
Where I guess you never discovered me—
As now all of the silences that lay between us are in dispute.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silent Slender Body

Oh, Alma. Come with me,
And become unnaturally holy:
I will step outside and kiss your feet and say everything that There is to say about this and now
Unicorns, and now this, and all of the plumes of sciences

And the colors that they have passed: and your name is, alma,
And we have slept together and I have tasted your soul;

And now all of the world turns around like a Ferris Wheel that Isn't even real, and all of its joy seems to happen over
The infinite fields of strawberries where I guessed that We were making love,

But otherwise I couldn't
Even believe, while all of the numbers were counting themselves
And all of the numbers of themselves were gathering themselves
Up and bathing together in the rainclouds of
The rainforests that weren't even there,

And I kissed and held your hand today which I guessed wasn't even Real,
But that is what this all about, the pouting of your body
Before all of the eruptions of the penultimate summate,
While my parents are coming home again
Never minding what was had to be real;

And this is just the silent slender body shooting its way, Alma
All throughout all that you've never had to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silent Tree

Forgotten by the ixora where the interesting
Lives-
I walked through the canals and the overpasses
Away from my home:
The airplanes coming towards me everyday,
After I am done with another school:
Transfixing me,
I cannot figure out what it is they have to say,
As they shimmer across the housewives'
Pools,
And your children are inside- and they have the Right of way:
Maybe they are going home again-
Maybe they are touching down fondly in Another estuary, where they will rest as silently
As Christmas presents underneath the silent tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silent World Of A Stolen Gold

If you flood in with perpetual vagabonds, how
Will you discover whatever was meant to be real:
As the remainder of that cavalry still struggles
To make it up the hill,
Trying to crown the precipice of the sky that they Feared to be real- blue boys looking into
The silent world of stolen gold: as if I were Waiting outside of your bedroom
As you made love to another man at least as beautiful
As I.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silhouette Of Her Name Stone

There were plenty of flowers at the funeral;
If I knew their names,
It would make a pretty list;
But I only knew her,
The dead girl- hit by the flapping door
Of a semi truck in North Carolina:
Walking with a boy I never saw,
Looking at the man who turns into an owl,
For the last time:
The scents of the open world
Budding on the dangerous highway.
In that room where her family mourned,
They paid by the hour,
And I shook each of their hands;
The drummer wore a pink Mohawk,
And did a good job beating the dirge-
Her face was sewn up like a doll
Whose insides are made of corn:
Something that you or I cannot keep,
But little girls can play with in their time
Only to put away when they grow out of dresses:
And then she was no more,
For the viewing lapsed into the grave:
Once she straddled my leg which pretended
To be a horse taking her to a pomegranate tree;
She made love to two men, as far as I know,
And was a better poet in the spring:
I have not read about where she lies now
Furrowed into the earth,
Though a decade ago, I cheated off her
Sociology test- Somehow I passed,
And she failed and fell into
The silhouette of her name stone.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silky Fathoms Of Another Unfolding Story

With the urge to call you, I fold into a river:
You are smiling auburn
The luxury of an abandoned muse- my faith a scar
Of autumn,
And the wind feels like a luxurious coat around
The used car salesman as he sells
His used cars to whom ever, underneath the overpass,
And across to the sea:
If there were mermaids there, I would know already,
And the light houses have all gone away-
It's just the auburn bodies, spindled out sweating
A forest who walks across the sand:
Raising her little arms to her little child, who swings
Into her,
Reclamations of a soul which moves into itself with
The silky spasms
Of another unfolding story.

Robert Rorabeck

The Silver Waves To A Golden Shore

Look outside the window- see
A chastity of green elbows, and hear the swinging of Green airplanes;
A bough of the senses hanging on a wreath of air. Pluck Nudity from the sky for a moment,
A vineyard of opalescence burbling above a
Wicked spring-

Ants parading atop a planet of metals- distilling the eyes
Of rusting heroes,
Burrowing, regurgitating jewels for a queen embossed with Insectoid caviar-
Displayed upon her mantle of dirt, a nudity of blindness
And the unclothed mandibles sensing the enclosed air:

A parking lot is in bloom! Lush capitalism embossed in Third dimensional space- Stewardesses skip across
The used car lots like nursery rhymes,
Like stones turned into wishes:

She walks down the aisle serving refreshments to the People leaping between buying and selling-
It is their privilege to be upon a vessel in the garden-
Here they are in transit,
The bills are collecting. Outside of their portholes
The last great Titan tries to blow down the flying houses:

He is looking for a wife that thought to fly like Icarus
Upon a minimum wage chariot: the King Kong of Greek Mythos- once captured,
She will have no choice but to become chaste by his Imaginations-
A real creature metamorphosed above the tourists'
Migrations,
Whose shared mythos draws them back and forth
To Disney World
As the moon draws the silver waves to a golden shore.

The Sincerest Attempt

In beautiful pictures the kaleidoscope murders
To make more beautiful
I look at her underneath windmills and drinking fountains
In high school;
And when I go out to be alone it is to smell her there,
Wafting across the canal- the good side of my head
Stuck in oil,
From the wounded heart of a school bus,
And I wonder if she will make a good housewife,
Abandoned by me- maybe all the way up in Colorado,
While the tortoise eats its purple orchid
A discarded corsage
Of the sincerest attempt, continuing its usual
Routine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sincerest Basins Of My Songs

The night fills up anything that it can:
It feels up the houses and the lands of this world,
If anything,
That is what it does, while your eyes still burn for me:
Alma,
Burn and sparkle like great auburn vases in perfect
Symmetry out on the perfect shore:
While all of my love lies out its stuff, revealing to you
All of my cards, all of my guts;
As if I am throwing a game of baseball,
As if I do not know so many words, as if I am just Enamored by the swans in their dearest basins
Off from the carports
And the trailer parks; until it is their time again to move:
And I will love you again, Alma;
And I will always love you for this long, as long as Your throat holds to the sounds in the sincerest basins of My songs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sister Who Could Never Be

In the places that so pretend to be—
As an after-thought, it is where the best of the littlest
Boys pretend to live:
Yes, they are here, in the armpits of the sieves of Goldmines:
Yes, they are here sleeping while yawning,
While better hopes jumps like frogs for golden shadows,
And the moon bends:
Yes, it arcs the sea, and other mermaids go home off
Their shifts,
And the waves beckon cajolingly,
Like a perversion of the senses in which you were Taught to believe:
This is the way that it happens, that it all gets off
Track one way or another—
And the places we one pretended to make love in just
So happen to light up again,
And you swim in the shadows,
Pretending to be caressing the shoulders of the Sister who could never be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Skin Eaters

Nothing kills a good western
Like a Hebrew's ledger:
And the golden palates in the east,
The android cities
Where electric sheep dream,
Upon the shoals of the nimbus wiring:
There is according to the Lord
A high-legged whore
As tall as the tallest buildings in the world,
With commercial airliners circling her breasts.
The 17th floor,
This she uses as a step to raise her dress
And adjust her garter.
To this the Japanese business men
Swarm the windows,
And heavily dubbed burn out flash bulbs.
From the clouds,
The cowboys cull their herds,
And offer her young heifers upon the Granite slabs their forbearers chiseled for offerings.
In the dust and sweat the sun devils swirl,
The dancehall girls pirouette,
And Mr. Piano Man's jangles
Spill out into the street with the drunks;
Decorated by the vultures
And the dying man's humming of Danny
Boy to the saw's jig of the carpenter's undertaking.

The ghost riders down their whiskey
A final time
In the shade of their brims,
Then take off running

As the pale blue boys come knocking-
Soon the free range will be fenced in,
And afterwards the wolves are returning-

Robert Rorabeck

The Skull's Hulking Hum

This is what we do:
We put things together;
We sniff glue.
Riding on the backs
Of our racing snails
To and from the Nothing
Our mothers' legs the porticos,
The changing rooms,
Our big hullabaloo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky Again

Jump into a
Cup of light weight
Birds,
Go ahead and spill
Your light weight
Herds
Up into the sky again,
Never to return to your eye again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky All Around Them

They drew marmalade and ponies and they wondered
Out amidst the yards until they regretted that there wasn't
Any air-conditioning;
And the flies gathered around whispering like blue pig's
Ears,
Until they somehow stumbled upon the Mexican dance
Where beer was five dollars,
But the yard behind the place just kept turning green and
Greener- filled with strangely polished
Equipment and wheelbarrows; it was a good place,
They figured to cut some wood to build a cabin- and to lay
Seeds in the ground to make the garden grow;
And each by the other sang out loud, and grabbing each other
Where they could, swinging around in the tarnation of Daffodils trying to make even the wolves proud:
They did just that,
As the airplanes took noticed and landed from the sky all around
Them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky As They Do

Dandelions in a basin of light with Purple and blue ants fighting each other:
Dandelions as soft as the lips of tourists underneath
Commuter airlines;
Or girls who are transforming for them so high up
In the clouds they get nose bleeds that float upwards like Red tinsel:
And the clouds are svelte beneath them, each continent
As whimsical as a soft picture in a glass;
And afterwards they lay there exhausted with their hands
As open as mollusks hanging over the brim
Of the sea;
They dream of themselves as saltlick and they wait lustily
For deer to come traipsing out of some verdant glade
That isn't there:
To touch them softly with their tongues, as if they were Rivers themselves, rivers of soft young bodies reposing
In the sky as they do.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky Is Not Really Swinging With Me

Days and days of fireless interludes,
Where everyone can survive, and everyone is Doing something,
And some of the women are very fine:
They seem to get even more precious after I haven't Seen them for awhile,
And they are just getting further and further away;
And I am a boy again on a drunken swing-set under the Precious moon: How she is stilling my light like the moon
Is stealing the sun on the other side of the world,
Deep and bosomy way back into mountains like
Backyards,
And no one remembers who I am anymore:
Grey haired, quietly feral, feet sore, eyes quiet and not Seeming too distant, but very distant:
Down your avenue right now, snow flakes falling like a Christmas carol- the alligator nudging my leg to see if I have awakened to have some fun,
But I am too drunk of your spirit, but you are just Like a goldfish already dying in a plastic bag, like the moon
Swimming, won from surreal midway,
And I am just climaxing repeatedly on these altruistic swings,
And the sky is not really swinging with me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky Talked

Bodies slip away until their oceans dance,
And the cars peel away:
Alma- only you are left, and I feel so guilty, but Tonight you will be sleeping with your husband,
And your children will dream under the lush trees and roofs
Of cherry lane:
You rabbits will dream until they are eaten;
And you move away from me like a comet on a tale spin
Through the chicken wire, like a fox getting ready to be caught
And I was left without any shelter:
You drank my water today, Alma, and I felt as if I was in a desert,
Just as boneless and smooth as the statuaries in the next room;
And I need to find a good Virgin of Gaudelupe,
While the sky is green and the estuaries where the fire trucks are Parked,
And I walked into the vision of your eyes today, while the earth
Moved,
And the sky talked.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky That Happened To Be There

Dogs come down to the basement while ash floats
Through the sky,
And airplanes and baseball are coming down
Across the moats to the castle,
While the silver or the green knight is still up in the Hills,
And it is a long ways to China even on the wings of A Pegasus-
As the pinwheels spin out even after all the lips of Pretty girls
Are gone,
Having eaten all of the apples meant for the science
Teacher-
And it was always such a strange class I missed,
Preferring the company of otters or blue gills;
So, closing my eyes, I could always practice remembering
The busses always turning around,
Taking their turns, showing off for the orchards that used
To be there- the pollen in the air
As yellow as birds, or the memories of a kindergarten
That supposedly existed in the fieldtrips of kidnappers,
Their off color lovers sleeping deep in the perfumes
Of their armpits with the weather without any Purpose or meaning visited through the sky that happened to be There.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky Their Unweeping Canopy Of Deepest Infatuation

Feel these contemplating things under my eyes,
Birthstones who crenellate flesh,
Dreaming of streamline beauties dripping in balmy pulp
Fiction out beside the swimming pool:
Oh, I don't care- I don't care:
I would experience for you the exhumation of entire cemeteries,
The Eucatastrophe of things that aren't real just before
The real light of day;
If you gave a d*mn, if your eyes could spell love,
And this wasn't but a rejected greeting card, for no
Certain occasion:
Unrequited, going down by the spectating glaciers, the band
Still playing, but not one instrument saving your heart from
The icy creep of highways like mortal wounds in all directions,
Leading you far away from the comely slopes where Numbness infects the throat and tongue of every anonymous hiker
Drowning above tree-line, the sky their unweeping canopy
Of deepest infatuation.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sky's Backyard

Already brown and coy,
I want to take you off your Legs again,
And make you potbellied,
To put you on a Christmas
Table
At my loneliest bachelor
Party,
While the airplanes
Spread their wings and Fly,
Gossiping of our amusements
To the arcades
Of the four winds,
Whose divine ululations can
Be heard ushering across the Uncanny flight paths of the Pop rockets entangling our souls
Through the canals cut like amethyst
Into the sky's backyard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slanted Elements

Art sifting as a match'
The traffic going by penumbrous, but Making no illusions:
The average day settles,
And the armies in her close their eyes
Like baseball teams that don't believe they Have a chance'
That beauty somehow survives in her
Skirts'
And the failure of the amusement parks into
The recesses of trailer parks
Where my cousins make love to one another
On a fieldtrip of the dumbly
Sublime'
Just as Eve comes to Adam, her arms filled
With plunder in the slanted elements
Of the age-old picking time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slender Prairies Of The Darkest Purples

I saw you calling this way as I gathered the Sticks for the fire:
The butterflies done licking the sweet sweats off me
And gone to collect their corpses on the other side
Of the poisonous forest:
And the dragons sleeping there like honorary mounds
For dead heroes;
And some where in the middle of that perilous kingdom,
The undetectable fjords where
The slender prairies of the darkest purples live:
Down in their great cuts like anorexic flea markets under
The insouciant highways that the clouds make
While the try to figure out through their adolescents
And their high schools, like your little sister,
What they can fathom themselves to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slightest Rain

It rains so light that
It shouldn't have to rain at all,
Except it makes the parks
Where I would have liked to Kiss you prettier;
And we have rivers of oceans
Inside of us,
But only so many breaths to Blow these sails,
Like my body coming against your Shore and lying down against
Your so many animals,
Like kindergarten:
Your eyes the wildest of them all,
Something that even the slightest rain
Knows I
Can never tame.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slithering Of Speechless Vertebrae All Through The Mowed Grass

If I want to lay down and sleep like
A well published author, sated by my moribund
Of words, if not beautiful,
Will you place your bet on me and lie down
Beside me and make eyes at this poor sap?
I wish you would, because I am exhausted beyond
Belief, greeting each family as they come in boyishly
Grinning, concerned and ready to haggle:
I've loved the draw of your legs since high school,
And how your skin speckles like a well-fed fish in a shallow
Pool.
Though I do not know anything about you, I would Take you piggy-back across the everglades, and steal
Into the cane fields and suckle on those stalks with you,
And watch you take off your shirt and lay kitty-corner
To the niggardly crocodile, grinning, grinning, but Not knowing what for, not grinning as I should grin to Be within your vicinity, and beneath the cloudless sly
Against the hedge across from which the traffic roars, but Not being seen by any of it, just our eyes upon us, and those Naked opalescent trunks: Oh so would I love you, this way?
And if this pittance of words is enough, then I have dreamed
Of you, and deceived my brain into thinking it was real just
By watching your foray laconically with your books and Precious stems in the loci of that green lawn, and into the Backyard strung out like diamonds on a lace, and the cypress
With its garland of shadows: seeing you there like a fresco
In open space, and appreciating you in the quieting cadence
Of the crickets, the slithering of speechless vertebrae all
Through the mowed grass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slopes From The Mountains

Yellow paper making out of us Pharisees- and
Other plagiarisms in the church-
While our grandmothers rested in graveyards,
And the cars drove
Around underneath the bumble bees:
And the fires roared, and scattered the deer
And the other wildlife in a lurch-
And the tourists, crowding the ice-cream parlors
Down the slopes from the mountains
Could not sit still any longer-
And the barbers looked up the slopes as all kinds
Of children of god came running down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slothful Metamorphosis Of Aphoristic Midnight

Sand-lion, mountain lion,
Hermaphrodite- Some f%cker has stolen
My kite,
And the waves come up phosphorous all
Damp, enraptured honeybees-
Golf courses of crinkling foil
The never-ending beauties of uneven verisimilitude,
Jujubees and lightning bugs caught in the can
Of a young mongoloid and pitied up,
Made to sing dying fire:
Rope tricks slender knots around the woman going
Up into the sky
Who really isn't there, suicide of smoke signals,
Her bangs, weathervanes and occult fingerpointing
Over the old bathrooms of high school and College,
Worlds of young homes fitting in a peg board
In a game of restaurateurs- proving there really is
No easy solution for mutton headed ingeniousness,
The airplanes like flares leaping from point
To point seeming to last forever
As long as Zeno keeps them in sight;
Then, finally, sweet and functional girls settling into Bed, turning into cricks and aspens all with the power
To dispel the needs of life,
Never thinking to yawn up and scratch my Superstitious jaw drooling over them all the faucets
Of never feel,
Which has the power to bath and manipulate their Petit souls after the slothful metamorphosis of Aphoristic midnight.

Robert Rorabeck

The Slumbering Day

The sun began the
Hungover suicide of dusk
First brushing the Keys' dying ivory,
Then a lure cast west of Hawaii,
A glow-bobber in the Far East burning
Slipping into the waves' temporary bed,
In a sweltering forest of tangled coral branches,
And darting flying fish, tiny eclipses on
The slumbering day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Smallest Bit Of You

Your fingers have touched me some how;
They have set off on their own and hitchhiked
To my aching flesh just to brush me once and leave,
As that's all they could do, those gauzy beings
The smallest bit of you that cared. The rest of You did not even know, where you sailed like
A merchant's fair ship through the day, the Channels of sidewalk moving you easily, your Loose garments lapping flesh and light together.

Your lips did not know—
They did not come so far to kiss my lips, to speak
Warm words into my ear to ring inside my listening eyes,
To make my nervous body begin to burn with that pale brush on my soul.
Nor did your sculpted legs move you close to me, like silky
Pistons moving your fleeting thoughts upon an ephemeral
Track hidden in the forests and deserted shopping
Malls across the desolate states of the nation, jogging
The starry course of boarders real and imagined to My homestead at 8,000 feet.

Your lips did not take off like rosy biplanes to Come bombing me with kisses while I sat outside and Read and stared out across the valley where Molly's Nipple rises,
Looking for those parts of your body that might come that way,
Like parts of angels playing silent instruments the final
Gifts of God's artistry, a mob of your lashes, hairs, and breasts—
These things of you did not come marching down from the pink nebulous
Like pulsating bees in swarms to sting and swell me,
And blister my tongue from visions of you in parts
Laying and spread across the harlot's open sky.

Though your fingers came, little thieves, and brushed me only to Leave before I could understand, the way those fleshy
Daggers worked into me, like an infant's need. A contented ease they stole away,

And in that place a vast and heavy longing lies, an icy mountain
That knows how to crawl through all of my body, from tip to tip,
And there quaking movements bring upon heated landslides in

Thoughts of you crashing down and fumbling like uneasy lovers on me.

For your fingers left their prints in my heart,
Marks in stone, the smallest bit
Of you who never even realized.

Robert Rorabeck

The Smiles Of All Of The Wolves

I want another house to contain my imagination while I live
Outside of my self—
In a little while, I want to live in the bossom of mountains again,
And make an arcade after midnight
In all of the silent palaver I am sure no one but you will take
The time to read and thus to undertsand.
The horney toad waits for this open throated,
Making an illusion of carports beside my grandmother's grave—
While off in the distance, my father's horses run—
Unanimously, making a Disney World out of the Broken hills—
Their hoof beats stamping out creches and fjords where
I can hide all of the wilted flowers I once tried to give my broken
Loves:
Now corsaged into the cut stems of dying flowers, the Recognize the places inwhich they are made to love—
For a little while, kidnapped movie theatres that never thought
To open for themselves amidst the open hills—
The blooms that slow down until evening
And then close up shops and all of their business—
What beauty they rectify against the smiles of all of the wolves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Smiling Alligator

My grammar would be better today if
I hadn't started out from so far away
Listening for the canoes of your ethereal gazes—
And followed the trails of your perfumes to where They fell away in the parks of unnoticed trauancies
Underneath the stars—
And I left off the place where I could never Manage to belong,
And somehow failed to mention how I got here—
In this sad, sad place,
Like in an apartment without any wife—
And just the long days making love to themselves
Without any electricity—the pigs eating themselves
In the sun—the elephant running from the mice
Toward the direction of the smiling alligator.

Robert Rorabeck

The Snout Of Windmills

Popgun oasis
On the end of
A candle stick—
Jack a hurdler of
The snout of
Windmills—
Dreaming if climbing
Up Jupiter,
Fleet as a
Javelin over
The gerunds of
They valley—
Sure as an Arrow knowing
The harvest
From the orchards
Of its time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Snowflakes Of Darkness

Put a pearl in the mouth of my soul and Walk away—talk about hunting unicorns, even though
I know you don't have it in you—
You have never read King Arthur—nor are you one
Of Mordred's brothers:
You came from Mexico where they gave you other Legends—and apple orchards so you could escape the Thoughts of the graveyards of your ancestors:
Those beautiful Indians that fell in love with conquistadors
Or were taken wholeheartedly by them
Underneath the pyramids and the stepladders to the sun—
Here you will find me climbing up to you again,
Because I am inebriated and sleep walking—and I know
That you do not care, and that I cannot be found out
By any path: these oppressive avenues all devour one Another, and I am married—you came out from the labyrinth of Solitude to work for the lost souls who enjoyed going
To Disney World—and I made you my muse—For a while—
Now that I am married, I cannot love you, though as the witch
Steals my shadow when the snowflakes of darkness fall,
I remain lost in your soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Snow's Sad Drift

Recall her now
What the world does know
Fluctuating back and forth
Through the snow.
Go the way the Temporal serpent
Slithers,
How there in the Ice forest
He is the hallucination
Of your life
Echoing deep in the crevice,
The reflection nothing sees
Drawing its closing
Like a child runaway
Adrift in the quiet tundra
The only one
Beneath her eyes falling
Asleep while kissing
Underneath the nitric blankets
Of the snow's sad drift.

Robert Rorabeck

The Snowy Lights Of The Playgrounds

Now I am dancing:
Weaponless, armless, here for you:
A peasant who is also a song
In the river-
A rabbit that pants in the ferns, or beside
The houses of the uneasiest alley cats:
And you know that I am wrong,
But I am still here:
I am still here, loving you, and calling for
You-
Even after your washing machine is over,
And the lines of untrue foxes come
To an end:
Maybe they have caught your grapes like
Goldfish,
Or maybe you didn't let them in:
But there are prizes anyways: the entire
Sky is a midway of prizes,
As you know: and as you know, my Heart is a fairground with you inside of it
Lit up with all of the beating estuaries
That remember how you, sleeping,
Took on the snowy lights of the playgrounds
And never let them go.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Antlers Of Their Deeply Slumbering Beasts

Opening up what scars there are to feed
The hungry cats- the places that open with milk and Red decorations:
Now this: that my friends are all gone, and now that I
Speak one too many languages
That are all drowned out underneath the roar of the Unearthed airplanes
Going somewhere on Sundays: going from church to Buy icecream:
All dressed up and in a fever of words that come swift,
And then words that linger:
And the shops beside the road, and the old lovers trying
To stay warm underneath the overpasses:
The stories and contests of fables-
The talking animals of my clandestine resorts-
Here they all are in a classrooms holding a caucus full of Feral retorts:
But the substitute is so pretty- and she is so fine:
She makes them stutter as she makes them all add up
Six plus nine; until the workaday world is over,
And all of the children are safely returned to their mothers:
As the thieves are returned to the sea-
And the cats reawaken into the graveyards beneath the constant
Curses of swing sets underneath the unmovable mountains
Who speak underneath the rains of how I moved Across them- and they lifted me up to catch a glimpse
Of the heavens- and then they surceased into caesuras,
As the rainstorms mat their grasses,
And the soft antlers of their deeply slumbering beasts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Bicycles And Mice

Distended bellies under skies or highways
While the fires are roaring, and the Columbian women are Selling in the flea market with the tattoos
On their shoulder blades like brown wings: where will it
Take them then,
When the fire comes, swiftly and sending all of the animals
Away from their works,
Forcing what moonlight there is to admit to its thievery,
And me to go out again and work for my father-
All the time listening for the waves,
The promises of new loves in them, repeatedly- the soft
Bicycles and mice going along the shore,
Saving themselves for the morning- as the fire burns around
Her neck,
And airplanes wear necklaces in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Blue Footpaths

Through these warm collusions I devise the memories
Of the lonely romances where I once was a truancy,
Saddled up to highest cul-de-sacs in the patriotic
Foothills that coiled like serpents in love;
And I pit my cheek in class, and never said a word, while Her body seemed to me for the sleek tourisms of water
Parks,
Her lips a fountain for the promises of doves; and I took Care of myself in the green shadows of my own bedroom,
Or I didn't talk to anyone, but I played with fireworks,
And became a conquistador long after my parents had gone
To bed,
And I had eaten their fried chicken; and all of the monsters
Were in the shadows and the wind,
And the nocturnal bromeliads were out and showing their Tongues and cleavage for the ceaseless kidnappers,
Or to any of their sorts:
And I got on the long boat with all of my dreams and made
It all the way to California, spindling through the soft blue
Footpaths of what no one else would have believed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Declivities Of Paper Airplanes

In the soft declivities of paper airplanes
As the rain storms above the abnormal classrooms,
And the prisms of our more beautiful
Daydreams are shelved—
There are one or two firedrills
Before our prettiest daydreams are shelved,
And then we embark all-alight like the fires
That kept to our wings—
As the blue-gills fluttered and
The fishes sang—
From the hidden places bound into the Recesses of suburban parks—
As the dog without tongue howled
To the muses of
An unpublished ferris wheel—
In the enamored dialects the housewives
Once remembered,
Who could not believe what it was that they Had actually fallen into—
As the eyes recorded nothing upon the fields
The players had left
Where the enemies would not yield.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Enclaves Of The Grottos

Foaming in the sun across the reefs
Of Dionysus, waiting for the fruiteria to finally close
Down,
Waiting for Alma to finally wined down, to finally think of
Me,
While all of the fuselages of airplanes are in the sky,
Like the birthstones of boys who never believe:
The bicycles of virgins are touching the soft enclaves of the grottos
Of the virgins who have become so predisposed
To ever have to believe anything of everything that I
Have mouthed off to the midsummer morning, to ever have to Believe:
All of the monoliths of cenotaphs, and the failed midways of the Games of despondent lovers too numb to know the feelings
Of who they are or whoever they were meant to be,
Will all of the graveyards accumulate upwards in mountains
Of grandmothers,
As all of the forgotten ancestors try to exercise their beliefs
Into the constellations of the mid afternoon constellations of the still Living graveyards into which we never even have to cast
A wish in to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Shelled Tortoises In The Canal Underneath The Bridge

Sing into the open mouthed
Void of woe begone
After the fireworks of holidays have Died
And the traffic seems to have Disappeared underneath the overpasses,
And the girls that you loved
Are all confused while you write
Novels against the baseboard
Underneath of there the coral snake lives
With her little fangs like pearls
Wanting to kiss the water moccasins
And the other poisonous sorts
That live with the soft shelled tortoises
In the canal underneath the bridge that
You used to cross everyday just to Get home from school.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soft Transgresses

Early in the morning like a musical,
The sun on the heels of the snake, kisses the grass;
As if I could lie you low like a knight with
A passion,
Or like a curious airplane over the orchards:
Little girls kissing in between the buttercups of class,
And all the days a long adventure
Until they finally came suddenly and quixotic to the windmills
Of your brown eyes,
Who seemed to be smiling their meanings to the fickleness
Of the trafficking clouds,
Where every road has their ends in illusion:
Where the galleries tumble and the pretty affairs finally become Tight lipped,
Where the bedrooms float like fairytales themselves;
And I think that wouldn't it just be night to awaken the next Morning at the end of the drive,
Into your brown and dusty arms: every pore on your body a windmill,
Speaking the soft transgresses that I am so glad that we have come
To know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Softest Estuaries

My old muses live here—
Holy grounds of junked cars and pornographies that
Have already bloomed and wilted:
And I don't want to live here
While I am alone: the dragon cursing and Getting up for fornications in which he spits
His fires to the naked girls like
Hamburgers and hot dogs underneath the sun:
And it is not a pretty art,
But it gets the jobs done—Ferris wheels under the minds
Of my grandmother's grave
All throughout all of these altruistic pornographies
Where little girls are just born
To turn into werewolves pushed against the seven Seas—and made to do math in classes
Of high school—where the bands practice next
To the yawning alligators where so many Indians have lived only to appear again: brighter,
And phosphorescent—as if all of the word
Was a cavern where the housewives lived
And fought off the wolves of young boys and Young men who just wanted them to be their muses
And brought to them fruit baskets and carried to Them apples pierces with from their venomless
Fangs—with the most hungry expressions in their eyes,
As they carried themselves over the softest estuaries
Of the minnows,
But otherwise kept to themselves all of the time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Softly Rounded Opulence Of Alma's Birthstones

Now to get distracted and daydream up to the Corduroys and cenotaphs of my visions:
If I play videogames, I know I will lose her,
But there are ever so many dungeons full of monsters,
And the homoerotic love I could give them is almost too tangible
To be unexploited;
But then my thoughts can drift away to the beer can bellies of Industrial airplanes, up in the air and doing some good,
Gliding softly with the zephyrs who are like ceiling fans;
And the sororities of them,
Homespun from the same fantastic visions of my very own
Colleges,
From the truanacies of daydreams and graveyards I guess Alma will Never really know,
As she gets impatient with me when I cannot figure out who she
Was:
Sometimes I mistake her for a forest fire, and when I fill her ribs
She becomes a xylophone of overpriced houses that her father
Marcelino got suckered into,
As the airplanes whisper like buzzards over mortally wounded gods;
And when I hear them I know that my time is coming soon,
So that my every twenty four hours will be overfilled and ringing
Like the effluvious wanderlust of my luckiest waters over
The softly rounded opulence of Alma's birthstones.

Robert Rorabeck

The Song

She is the song, so the old story goes,
The words are the things she doesn't sing-
She doesn't park too close to the ocean anymore-
Where the turtles make love,
Where the seagulls glut:
She wears a ring, and keeps a certain dance.
Dresses up in her charms, she drives by the airport,
The roller-rink, broken down- men have become Tramps,
Alligators fart in the park: She doesn't sing.
She breathes steadily and when amusements come with Their seasons, she holds on- She knows what she Is doing,
And she hasn't pretended to feel anything worth much
More than her easy situation for so very long.
She is a song that was predicted.
She never puts her feet above her head,
And there are other ways she could be going,
But she keeps to her tune instead.
She is the song- a mammal, a wedding ring struck out
On the baseball diamond,
Another sweaty thing on the paper thin land beneath
The clouds- A sad or happy song,
A metaphor who likes to dine at restaurants, who keeps
Her hair neatly bundled, and kisses her nephew on the Forehead, a kosher stamp, I wouldn't want to know
What will become of him;
Exactly like her, ululating across the splay of palmettos,
The steady movement of the feral sea she doesn't Answer-
In black and white, in dreams, a song with steady moods,
She holds in hand whispers, tunes;
But to me, never anymore does she answer.

Robert Rorabeck

The Song Birds Going Down Into The Mine

If they said that the rivers were beautiful,
Then you know that they are; and you are sleeping right
Now in the little bed next to your brown
Man,
Your extended family breathing in their adjoining rooms
Like windmills pecking a valley:
And you have crossed the frontera, so you languish like
A desert rose in the forefront of my mind:
And I think sometimes that you have been so kind to me,
But other times I think you have been so unkind:
But the traffic rushes by anyways, and other girls forget who
They are and are never mindful of what they could mean to me;
But if I say to them that you are beautiful,
Then they will know that you are-Alma;
For my drunken music comes singing out from every pore,
Geysers of recreation who mouth of like the last echoes
Of the song birds going down into the mine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Songbirds Who Sing With Our Tongues

Scarred and unbeautified, I somehow have abducted a beautiful
Woman eight years young than I, who my nineteen year
Old cousin also tries to court;
But right now I am even outside of her, and the fruit market is closed:
The water cooler of my hunting grounds is bereft with the mercurial
Visions of both of her eyes;
And the way I have propositioned her atop the nursery but on my Knees:
And she, my Alma, has promised me that we will be married tomorrow-
Always tomorrow, until she goes back home, and the pictures of Her bed like a nest into which the shivering birds fold their wings:
Next door, but beside their lovers who eyes are small enough to Disappear with the grains of sand on a beach,
She lines herself with the cadavers wavering like gossiping anemones
In the shallows of the streak-
Who will roll over for anyone, but she cannot swim, so her brown
Limbs curl around me like intelligence in wood, in furniture:
And I gather her up lovingly like driftwood for the fires of my blue Bed, to which in my troubadouring artwork I am always Leading her to,
And the insularly cathedrals like legumes half cracked open in the sunlight
But forgotten by the laborers of the day;
Making a lunch for the songbirds who sing with our tongues
In a living room where no one is left standing who believes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Songs Of Dead Rivers

I lounge inside the songs of dead rivers
Where better women smile at me naked atop
The tufts greener than all Christmas trees;
But oh, how these lands are wicked, even If calmed: The king is smiling even while Possessed, while the traffic is heady and conductive.

I dress out for PE, but don't work out:
I make laps around the basketball courts and take Notes, while the Jewish students collect on the Fiascos which they better perceive, which
They have been working towards, never mindful
Of even the soccer moms' leggy tresses,
Their dun ring fingers and extroverted scents.

Now in the cacophony of Catholic churches the Play strums: She is wearing the red dress, smoky and Ethereal. From Canada, and a thief crawls through her Window, and her eyes are for him and glowing Something mythical. Like a fire in a horn up on stage,
Like a specific bouquet damply bequeathed above
A loved one's coffin I have singled out, as I wait
For the trucks to come, to unload from them
Whatever it is I have to sell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sorry Mound Of Calvary

Massive bends of yellow gold,
The incest of falling cupbearers, and the winter's Boiling,
The foals unfold and everything becomes less cherished:
The hills take ship,
And oaring trees pretend to make it up
The faithful resins of the cheering day who with all of His angels in jubilee seems to be standing
Fully suited-
An arc, a leviathan sating his burnished liquors
Above the sorry mound of Calvary.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soul Of My Alma

I am only supposed to be awakened by a daydream
That has fallen too late, that has enamored too deeply into the shadows
Of a stream
Streaming all down from the mascara of her eyes, falling so far as Migrating butterflies
As to stumble through the higher and lower forests of all of Mexico
Like rose pedals in a wedding sacrificed to the steps
That she doesn't want to believe that her faith was lost in;
And her work bleeds with the ululating of amphibians awakened through
The nocturnal gestations outside of her carport by the hours of Darkness,
Addressing and redressing to her the way her knights have turned;
And by that most unclever of moons, the windmills that should be Breaking their necks serenading her, stutter up the abutments
Trying to siphon off the tears and oil slicks of the sunken tenements of the Boys, both real and make believe, that used up all of their Lighters on the wicks of fireworks just to amuse her for a second,
The soul of my Alma- my muse, into turning their way.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sound And Fury

I walk to the back of the house and take off my boots.
This is in the middle of summer, monsoons,
But there are no mud daubers- that is good
Because I've become friendly with a widow spider
In the pump house (mud daubers are her natural predator):
I look at her in the morning, laying on the web.
in the rafters, along the porch, as if a saloon,
My mother has shown me a nest this morning-
I was up so early, I mistook the chicks for kittens,
Mewing slick and velveteen, eyes so blind,
Until she explained. When I step inside, they look at me as if I've not been working, which I haven't, which is my luxury.
I worry that the publisher hasn't received my book,
But it is such a little thing, a small worry of an insouciant heart,
Like an overused word kept handy in the margin,
Until in overuse it becomes rotund, a morbidly obese cadaver
In faithful romance:
A fly crawls on the skin over my elbow, and I've begun to Read Faulkner, and all the children in high school pray in Silence, hands whitened by bleach, eyes accusatory- They do not contemplate,
Like I once have, the kiss for a greater love,
The sea in faithful gyration, the curling empirical goddess:
I suppose, I do not love anyone right now, because I haven't Grown up, though it is getting late, and all the gentlemen with Their ladies are returning from the ball, and the sky is in a particular Sort of glow, and not a single vehicle is moving: Right now,
This is how it must be. The houses are only half built,
The young mother is balancing on her bicycle with the enfant
Seated behind her, drooling. Here, the canals divide like Suburban calligraphy, the lesser successes abound,
Tiny palms grasping irresistibly, and even I
Can remember what that gallery displayed as we came home so long ago
To pray and eat our dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

The Soundproof Bones

Building your house inside the soundproof bones
As it rained—
And the housewives awakened all at once
From their social unconsciousness:
Little girls they might have been,
As elusive as teal and ruby dragonflies in their front
Yards—spinning their bodiless cadavers
Amidst the lots of cypress, where the Echinopsis bloomed in nude bouquets,
Thrusting the nuptials of their phalluses towards Every airplane that passed them by—
And prostitutes falling in love in the park amidst
The graffiti and tampons of Truants so wonderfully scarred and beautiful—
Trying to imagine their own reflections
Cast away just as they were
Into the cerulean abyss of sky where airplanes
Came like mirages swooping low
And trying to make that dying jungle fall in love
With a vanishing make-believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sounds Of Woe

Slow down the sounds of woe,
The jet planes sleeping in the snow,
While the unending light cuts the yard in two,
In a Siamese twin the mailmen knew,
While all of the flowers bloomed and grew,
And I stepped outside to remember you,

In a wind tunnel world the snow flakes fall
And the sounds of woe kiss them all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sounds To My Sorrows

Each raindropp dancing along in the cowbell games of Their brotherhood,
Patting the head of my trailer and engorging the skirts of Her canal:
People live under this cool sheen: people everywhere,
People in cars, and people in buildings,
Folding over and to sleep in airplanes- related or unrelated by Thought or inclinations,
Forever and everywhere like the living echoes of their graves;
And I think how rains should relate to people in the World that we share,
And I think of Sharon, or a muse somewhere; lighting up the Mountain, all eager to get somewhere,
Wolves curling like kittens, her warm underwear; and how we Shared the atmosphere of schools together,
Each Monday a warm renewal- the presence of her body a breathless
Art gallery- the rains would come then and make her faster,
While I slept under the bleachers and listened to her laughter;
As I still sleep under the mobiles of all of my tomorrows,
Because both school and Sharon have gone away;
And the rains on Sundays and Mondays always bring back home
The sounds to my sorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The South Florida Sky

Alchemist

You begin a poem shirtless
In the landscaping outside of your Home room class
Full of bruises that your make believe
Lovers will not see,
And the cathedrals of your heart
Are torn like wet paper-
They seem to flood the intersections of
An airplane, or it was just that
I was dreaming:
Here you are again on stage- found in
The weather doing acrobatics,
After you left the canoe behind
Anyways,
And all of the girls became makebelieves
As the mists rose above the
Baseball diamonds,
And you lifted your eyes after a long afternoon
Daydream
And saw that you were still in the Student parking lot- perfect, the south florida
Sky almost ready to storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Space Between Themselves

There is the carport waiting patiently
Even as the rain floods the weedy gutters,
The unused lawnmower brushing against
The rebar,
As my parents make love inside a little house,
As my muse steps inside to him:
Haboobs are reawakened across the Arizona
Desert and nobody buys anymore fireworks:
The angels are all dusty,
Coming down from all of their trucks-
They say nothing to my pitiful face-
They go indoors again
To carouse and drink: they keep the space between Themselves,
As down from them, the ladies kiss the
Toads that are coming in from the busy highway,
Trying to figure out if anyone of them has Money enough to pay to be a prince.

Robert Rorabeck

The Space Upon The Canvas

All of the chassis burn inside the land of
A silent sun:
As all of her wickedness finally eclipses the last lamp
Light of a Christmas tree-
Until she is all turned out and burning:
Burning—why,
She might As well burn the whole thing down—
As she is the exact same thing as my Laundromat
Shed of foreskins in the last days of
Its epiphany—
And a zoetrope here—and katydid upon her white
Arm or elbow-
As she bends back and forth as a white swan trying
To breathe—
The traffic passes by her and her lawn—
And they are almost beautiful to believe—but the
Sea and the day swells and swells,
Taking up all of the space upon the canvas—
Leaving no room for nothing less than all that is perceivable
To be ultimately believed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Space Upon The Canvas

All of the chassis burn inside the land of
A silent sun:
As all of her wickedness finally eclipses the last lamp
Light of a Christmas tree-
Until she is all turned out and burning:
Burning—why,
She might As well burn the whole thing down—
As she is the exact same thing as my Laundromat
Shed of foreskins in the last days of
Its epiphany—
And a zoetrope here—and katydid upon her white
Arm or elbow-
As she bends back and forth as a white swan trying
To breathe—
The traffic passes by her and her lawn—
And they are almost beautiful to believe—but the
Sea and the day swells and swells,
Taking up all of the space upon the canvas—
Leaving no room for nothing less than all that is perceivable
To be ultimately believed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Spaniard Meets An Indian Princess

I will die by your borders,
Your estuaries,
You silken paths-
I follow your tracks
Through the thick underbrush
And around the edge of your Gulf.
Hostile Indians shoot
Stone-tipped arrows at me
From beneath palm meadows-
You set sandy panthers
Loose to stop me,
To extinguish me,
To defeat me,
But I have seen you once
Through the sunlight
And swaying banyans,
The last of your kind
Washing your thighs
In the slow streams
With the early crocodiles
Guarding you,
With the white egrets
Fanning you;
You were a misty portrait
Bordered by cypress curtains
And filigreed by stunted
Citrus -
Cicadas crossed their legs
Back and forth for you,
Playing their primal violins;
Manatees watched religiously
Like lazy priests from the Deeper gladed waters,
As dove-tailed deer nuzzled
Acorns from your fingers-
Your eyes were free things,
Your eyes were unhinged
From society-

Your eyes were saintly and effortless,
Like driftwood in deep inlets
Stripped of inhibitions of language
And revealing your life's daylight;
But when they saw me
They took off startled, scattered
Ripples over the water's surface,
And the swamp grew suddenly
Quiet and hostile—
But, heedless, I come for you.
As you can see, I bare no cross
About my neck. I have no religion
Save for the one your acceptance
Would give to me.
I do not
Come with the others to Take from you,
To build stones upon you,
To diminish you—
I come now but to worship you,
To be guided by you,
To kneel before the teaching of
Your eyes on all natural things,
And to become a part of your landscape.
I need to find you,
To reside in but an aspect of you
To do for you as
Those things which you cherish without speaking—
Thus I hunt you now
Ceaselessly, to die if need be,
To become the extinction of a forgotten soul,
To nourish the memories your passing
Leaves behind as you flee from me,
Not to capture you,
But to hold your hand
In these dark quiet spaces of the world,
And here, to love you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Spells Of Rumor

I'm so drunk that my fingers no longer have
Their own androgynous feeling,
And I'm fourteen at the movies of Wellington
Trying to catch eyes to make out;
And I've got to get out of the shadow of these Housewives,
But I have an entire bottle to finish up
And some time before she gets off work, and an entire menu
To peruse at the ice-cream parlor,
And the week's spelling list to memorize.
The sleepy alligator down at the end of the driveway
Is watching me: He has your eyes and I have Nothing else to say: she is in love with you too,
And maybe she'll make you change your persuasion with
The miracles she performs with her tongue,
Or so the spells of rumor go,
But I am otherwise quite lazy, and I have no friends,
Nor the patience to teach my pets better tricks;
And I will not live forever, for when I die I will stop making
Believe, but lie down and smile up to the soft bellies
Of airplanes where you still go leaping,
Or maybe it is your daughter now, smiling, hand on hip,
Serving the better middle-classes who,
Not having yet learned their lessons, are trying on newer
Wings, trying to skip like stones, to tease like wishes,
Those younger gods you can never fail to interest.

Robert Rorabeck

The Spells Of Their Mating

Animal traps and quivers.

These baldheaded bulldogs give me the shivers;
All alone in some humid park,
Listens to the waves crocheting long after dark-
To the silences of turtles mating,
In grottoes under sandcastles, and Canadian Stewardesses leaping so carelessly,
So far above the sky; they give no pause;
They are rushing like angel-faced Cinderellas,
Skipping over the everglades to get married
When I remembered them from some class some far Away, tipping their glass, rolling in the hay:
I had so little time to care for them, leaping out of Schoolyards, balancing over emerald gutters,
Sweating alone in some cars, but they are getting married:
Tonight they are getting married, and they've Remembered both of their glass slippers,
And the spells of their mating- so everything should be okay.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stained Glass Of A Broken Church

The car swerves between the red cliffs
In the bosoms between my sisters and my parentsâ€™
The sky an accentuated mirror of something
Going on beneath it'
I am headed to Phoenix, to dry gutters'
A desert of plagiarists 'apartments rising like mirages,
Seeing things that must be similar to what my Grandmother must have seen growing up here'
But dissimilar 'good for her asthma'
And the citizens of the illusionary plains, now that The citizens have all gone 'evaporated into
The blankets of chicken pox'
And my own mother weeping over a horny toad
Like a pieta over the stained glass of a broken church.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stains Of Hummingbirds

Overhaul ejaculation,
Women in trees like Christmas ornaments:
Kitchens, Laundromats,
Wash your breasts, perfume their caracoles:
Make them holy for all the senses of their sailors:
Do your job, and make meat pies:
Of your legs, long like expensive apartments,
The feelers of tenements,
Wet and spruce your jaws, give me lines like
Acrobats: Let me swing atop of you:
I just got the vacancy of the snake charmer
At the saint Louis zoo;
Degrade into the rhymes, incest, cheap colognes
I shouldn't even spell:
It all ends at the trailer parks where my cousins are Waiting in their bathing suites,
Waiting for their men to come after their games,
And birthed from underneath the oil slicks of Consumptive cars: And I loved you is the rule
Of the greeting card, rhymes of a familial aristocracy
I couldn't care for anymore, so I have left in the Concrete abutments of the desert,
Even though it will never rain: to the hungry
Jaws of coyotes and pranksters,
The piss stains of hummingbirds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stamens Of Anarchists

Indifferent wildflowers pullulated by the Stamens of anarchists,
As everyday in the vastly empty schoolyards I
Hoped to touch you,
Across the soft algebras of Mexican tiles;
As I described your eyes while my thoughts drifted
Like mariposas, and I slept
Through the classes all strung out in the student
Parking lot
Until night came and the airplanes from underneath
Looked as if they were wearing their mothers' jewelry;
And when I was fifteen,
Alma- you were eight and still figuring out for Yourself in Guerrero, Mexico,
All the fables of the ghosts bred out of your volcanic
Earth,
Until you skipped like a stone well placed across the Prairielands of these United States;
And the airplanes flew around your golden brow like
Doves finding dry land:
And all I've ever learned is how to kiss you as you
Hold my hand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stamp Of Anonymous Rest

If I could drink more liquor, I would write
More romance, the bottle is good for want of woman:
The bottle is good when you are all alone:
And the city is busy and made of coral foam,
And airplane dust: Airplanes are angels on the rush;
And I could leave my dogs and add another conjunction,
My working class pith,
And walk out under the swaying shoulders of Saint Louis: I've got enough quarters for another round,
To see my pretty mythological sisters hibernating red-lipped
Underground:
And all the women in the city are made to be in love
With certain men; and a select few are with them- The Rest, scorned, will never love again:
Angelic women from high school with angelic bone structures:
I would like to populate my airplane with all these women,
And give their identities in a sweet list,
But what would that say about me, truthfully- if anyone was Reading this- This sad lonely song, only it is not a song;
It wants the root of immortality, but it won't live so long;
Girls who I still hear ringing in the halls,
Who I remember fondly, whose newborn children I shouldn't Recall at all; and I want my immortality on a garnished plate,
And everyone around me to declare, "That boy can write, "
But that's not what is waiting for me down at the dimming hall:
An open sack is waiting for me and that's all:
With no rhyme scheme and no name tag, the coroner will Examine me and say, "Not bad! " For a boy who didn't know
His lines, the park was his mistress, his wife a lonely mind;
But is dogs did love him, I have an awful hunch, but now
Where those dogs are, I haven't a hunch- But god bless them,
And keep them in their feral mortality, and let them range along
The train tracks under the moonlight of this world's humanity;
And when they have a moment of pause and rest,
To think of this kind master, and tell the ghosts of beautiful women,
The name of their lonely master, of him whom we have put
The stamp of anonymous rest.

The Stark And Naked Sea

Even if the singing mines of a heart don't pan out—
The sun will still paint in the blue prints—
Over this subtropical part of the world: over the bandits
And the man-o-war:
With beautiful women languishing further inland,
Brushing fully naked against the sexualized horns of Unicorns—
In the tall grasses, with the libidos of jackrabbits—
Like blue gills and foxes jumping up to taste the quicksilver
Of airplanes—
The Ferris wheels spinning around like well-armed gypsies—
And the windmills stealing their lights—
Circulating throughout the valleys that I remember,
Making the soldiers drop their guns into the rocks and Pig-nosed snakes—
But down there somewhere as well—like a torn banner
For a defeated belief,
A single angel blown through the currents of the rocks,
Who still remember when it was they lived in
The raiment of the stark and naked sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Starlets Of That Superimposing Glade

Romance is the formula for a
Queen,
To persuade her to undress her armies,
And then herself in a bed she herself made,
The milk of the kind mother
In the meat of her shade;
And I laugh just as sadly as if I had found her
Watching from the carbuncle
Of this terrapin, like a family heirloom
Swept under the clouds by the swishing brooms;
And what color are they but the window
Dressings of the first wave of her senses;
Those very purposeful corridors who must allow
For anything else to proceed;
And her name is weeping from the convertible
At the drive in movie where
The fruit is shaken from its cluster into the Open lips of the shade,
Just as peeling thighs relax, doors welcoming,
Under the larger than life senses of
The starlets of that superimposing glade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Starlights Of Too Many Names

You know I love you, Alma,
And yet I am not free:
And this is the last of my soul,
Like your name starving atop the doorway:
The wildflower drowning
In the sun who traffics in the starlights of too many Names.

Robert Rorabeck

The Starvations Of Your Hopeless Supper Times

Bountifully I enroll in the space that my body enfolds;
I know this through my senses and through my parents senses,
And I remember the suburban neighborhoods I used to Skip out of school in, in your town,
And smell you all around even when you wasn't around:
You were always going to higher ground, past the pastures and the observation
Centers of sciences, either bad or good; and if you ever unbuttoned
Your blouse for a man it was in a house in which I've never been,
Or probably never seen;
And if you were in a sorority while I was away, I am sure it was lit
Up with the laughter of your clever cruelty;
And now you grow your beautiful children like glowing bobsleds
Down the banks of the slopes I have had to climb up all of the Way past tree line just to get a peek down into
The private life that I couldn't otherwise seem to find; and what a sight
To find you weeping up at me, begging fitfully for my Mercies through the Starvation of your hopeless supper times.

Robert Rorabeck

The Steady Rain

The paled hearse drives down
The way of her spine
After closing time;
Her lips are sealed like an Envelope sent to a dream
Stamped like red wine;
The dollhouses of lonely granddaughters
Line the looming countryside,
And carriage-less young boys straddle the opal
Fences to see the $1.99 colonnade,
The single toy pushed by his feathering hands, carrying
The model death inside;
A balsam coffin for a plastic bride;
To which the absence of little girls
Stare out from the pearly driveways,
Her thighs' quivering neighborhood;
Inside her body, she is transformed into a doe
Hunted by the aristocracy of easy men;
Hemmed down to the sea of drool,
She changes into a pewter eel with patina of eerie rose;
Then the hearse pulls up to the cemetery of weeping-willows,
And waits in the cul-de-sac of her nape,
As outside it begins the steady rain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Steepening Hillsides

Jaundiced by the pinafores and the pain:
Here I go running again,
With or without the paths up through the nosebleeds
Of tourists,
Crying out her name through the scars of golden
Aspen and exeunting grizzly bears:
Here is a car filled with pornography, across the street:
Across the canal and up the hill:
Here is the pain I have less than delivered;
While my mother makes love to my father alone,
Before so many horses:
And I wonder if she wonders about how many times it has Been that they have made love,
Like letters mailed into her: and how many times it was Before I was conceived, and my sisters:
Like my own muse: how many times did he thing of entering
Her,
Before he finally did, and customers started coming in to the Fruit market,
And cars started passing through the street like bottles with Impotent genies filled only with my thoughts of Her and zygotes
In a merry go round in a fetish of zoetropes grazing through
The blindness out in the front yards of the open wounds
Of old lovers,
Like paper cuts burning in the fingerprints of lonely muses
As they busy themselves with the places that they should Stash their stolen bicycles:
Because tomorrow they are even sooner to be married,
And then they will have no excuses for such equipment,
Even as the cement dries, as their lactates evaporate
Against the adulteries of the sunlight; as the bodies of their Chariots pull themselves up the steepening hillsides,
Burning their oils, as whatever gods they hope to believe them
Give them further excuses to proceed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stem Of My Heart

Word is a bud blooming the stem of my heart,
But I don't know how to play music and
My wife is already here—
We almost lost the baby and last night we made love—
There was a little blood and I had to apologize,
But above us—airplanes, and at our elbows,
Baseball diamonds—I am not sure I have any muses
Anymore—
Tonight there has to have been two or three Sirens—the werewolves who are already too heady
Sleep beneath the nocturnal jasmine,
And my shadow walks the shadow of my dog—
When I look up after my wife is already asleep,
I can barely make out the far away heavens,
As stewardesses skip across the earth like your Vanishing birth stones.

Robert Rorabeck

The Steroidal Harrumphs Of Weight-Lifting Saraphim

Regards, is how you should end it,
And not even attempt leaning over to press her
Lips for verification that you are not a poltergeist,
Apoplectic, working with hurricanes to tear down
The rows of breadcrumb housings,
The nemesis to real estate; For she is busy
At the water cooler, her eyes on well dressed
Coworkers, the light bubbles; it is effluvious,
And better words could not describe her pagan
Magnetisms. You would need a doctor to hypnotize
You, and a shrink to analyze the deadness of your mind.
The infomercials come ablaze way before breakfast,
But, in short, they will neither make you stronger,
Nor more appealing. Such as it is, the park is all yours
When the moon pulls the chains on the swings,
And your face is cooled and hooded in the embrace
Of mumbling maples. The cops should drive by Patrolling, but do not fear them, because you are Sadder than a criminal, and they do not cherish you.
Go about your cryptic séance, the looming of pinwheels
In a rainless collage with the nest of hungry hairless birds;
For you have seen her photographs, and the full-busted Amnesias of the wellness in her sport. Hang up that Hat, and sit in the quieted ennui of the dysfunctional class.
Tomorrow might become a better afternoon, but don't Suppose it will have anything to do with her low
Mortgaged beauty; they are already inside her and comfortable,
Her lips are stung with barbs of Errol Flynn- Yes,
There will be better lines than these, perfumed hiccups
That would have undressed her if she had saved her virginity
For the quips of lonely professor; but not now,
For how she beams, sure to become a grandmother strung
To the limbs of the fraying jockeys, or the steroidal
Harrumphs of weight-lifting seraphim.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stewardesses Who Work For Charity

The horses kept their stalls
Until the men around them went for breakfast:
It was the most beautiful sun above them
That anyone could bet upon—
And it was a silent, silent world that they were all drawn
Into—men inside studio apartments
As empty as reason is on the moon:
Starlight and moonlight above the dinnertimes of Places where people happened to disappear into, following Whatever they happened to remember that they Could not believe in—and the hot air balloons were Going up by different degrees over the fireworks
Tents scattered over New Mexico's deserts—
And the lonely planes flew,
Like your lost jewelry—like another Sabbath lost at Sea—as full and as high as the moon is for Werewolves—rising and hoping to kiss the lips of
The stewardesses who work for charity.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stock Footage Of Just Because

Yellow broad way,
But where are the song birds- are they or Aren't they
Listening anyways-
And it takes some time to proceed and Become beautiful:
As you are beautiful, sunbathing beside
Your pool beside the Broadway
Of any positively general gentleman:
And it seems for awhile
Outnumber,
Just as while it is such a beautiful fight-
And the numbers continue,
As if the daylight were the night-
And I think about you,
As if your bosoms were just the echoes of Anyways- and just because-
As if I saw you laughing in the hallways of anyways-
Like another management just for the bullies
That will see is all together
Stocked up in the movie theatres of our tomorrows-
Anyways- and laughing, perpetually,
All throughout the stock footage of just because.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Bobbles That Are Your Heavens

Elephants between pretty girls, gifts you gave me
To survive the world, until you burned my crops,
And return me to the loneliness of my bed:
You laid me down as silently as a child kissing a rattlesnake:
And this is my grave, as I lie here, as the centipedes dance:
This is my grave, as the rain measures my body,
Suiting my fancy- as you drive home in that brown labyrinth
Overfilling with the stolen bobbles that are your heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Gifts Which Once Brought Cheer

Bicycles stolen near the canal,
Tinseled handlebars- I wonder who has stolen
Them and thrown them here,
Frames of spikenard crinkling the grass
Down beneath the high-stepping footsteps
Of bullies;
And I would like to show for you;
And for you to wear mistletoe in your hair.
Your brother can come- I don't care:
It's not far. We can follow the water moccasins
Who will lead their ball of uncouth slick-toed
Young down to the lips of her water's
Edge
Where maybe your sister lies always thoughtful
Selling beneath the open skies.
I swear, you don't even have to look me in the eye.
Why I am doing this is to bring you near the stolen
Gifts which once brought cheer,
Now interlaced, crenulated with eels in indefinite space,
Half exposed like a woman interrupted.
You see, the wind takes your hair in little spokes,
The airplanes flatulent over the high backyard leaves,
The housewives beating yokes;
And I don't care- Your eyes are so far. Wherever
They are, I don't care- I just wanted to take you here.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Lessons

Katydid's awakening from their dreams hung
Like dew from the armpits of the cypress as all of The rivers of heaven sing,
And the housewives drive home so slowly
To their carportsâ€”Cadavers Of sunken knights against the rebarâ€”and a plume of Another space shuttle taking off into the skyâ€”
Making a hedge of cauliflower that gardens into
The heavensâ€”
And the shells are heavy and sharp against the childrenâ€™s
Feetâ€”
And the kidnappers lay against the campers,
Offering smiles, and friendships so sweet:
And behind them, the cool recesses where the old cars
Gravitatedâ€”and inside their sunken chassis
So muchâ€”so much pornographyâ€”And the moon glows over
Her, and she overflows her nocturnal cornucopia
And gives all of the stolen lessons away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Lights Of Their Pools

Telling nothing truly horrible to the School girls, as the snakes curl around the warm wheels of School buses-
And I sit in between the warming grasses, hidden by the Parking lot,
And read that she truly loves him- as the light dies through
The blinds of the bleachers,
And the housewives who also used to be school
Girls drive home to different husbands-
In their yards where the days have been, unobserved:
Where truants have lighted off firecrackers, where burnt
Paper and wishes have blown,
Where ants have taken the drool and excrements of doves
Down to feed and decorate their queen:
They go home, jewels in their bellies, dishes in their kitchens,
While I sit outside the stolen lights of their pools,
Having read that she does truly love him,
Evidenced as she goes home to him, as she does.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Moonlight In The Pool

Softest convictions in a spyglass keeping
Time with anyone, and then looking away while Holding her hand;
And you can see across the entire yard, how little
And beautiful it is- this space that the sunlight floods
Over,
And the traffic comes in ribbons heading home,
And afterwards- when there is that silent emptiness,
And moonlight with silver fireworks in the park,
And a softer light across the man-made lakes
And canals,
Then your convictions are in a ferris wheel of your Senses that have gone asleep in the castanet of your ribs-
The better words, and the girls you once loved,
Slipped off to other beds in other states;
But your wife is back at home, her hair curling around her
Yellow shoulders,
Her eyes bathing with the stolen moonlight in the pool,
In the sorcery which cajoles you home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stolen Sunlight

Back home again in between the shallowest for-get-me-
Knots—My girlfriend doesn't call—
It is only a recording—Doesn't she know who she loves,
While the same shadows beckon back and Forth to the children—
What causes these haunted estuaries where only
The planes and the satellites are the eternal
Spectators, blooming from the gravitations of Their runways—
With imperfect wings and bodies—
As some snake of fables sleeps forgotten more golden
Than the stolen sunlight of the moon
Bedded in the sweet, sweet grass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stoned Earth

Sun, a scandalous thing over the movie theatre—
Is it even up after I have gone home,
Begun to cross my legs and drink rum
While my dog sleeps beside me,
And my wife makes love to the shower—
In the blindness of the after-theatre of
All of the shoes—
Asteroids palavering over all of the parks
And the zoos of earth—
As something is said around the corner
That was supposed to be beautiful,
As the baseball diamonds caress and Copulate with the overgrowing fields of
The stoned earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stony Heavens Of The Overpass

And we all must come awake one Christmas
In the soft rains and open seashells:
In the grottos of the carport beside the car our mother
Almost drowned in flipped over like a harried terrapin
In some canal
Beside some water moccasin- and it grows beautifully
Mysterious in the backwoods
Of the compounded earth when you can no longer
See your way to the mailbox:
But there it is, and the road ends at the Canal: but there are strange neighbors across it,
And blue gills inside:
But no other ways to cross it- and the bookstores have No meaning,
While your mother takes you to the library and shows
You pictures of other words to put to your lips:
While the apple is still falling,
And the school buses are turning around- and your Smallest sister isn't even yet conceived:
And the idea of the muse as your goddess is as unsentimental
As an unplaced bet at the dog track,
And the other words you will not use: a lottery of numbers
Standing out numbered before the beautiful
Indians- and death coming around while the amphibians
Sing in the aloe,
And the superheroes sleep in the grass- picked up
And carried away by the insects who live there
While the kidnappers drive by beneath the stony heavens of
The overpass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stoplights Of The Lost Bedrooms

I wish I could win another house in the waves
Like goldfish bagged underneath the moon
From the midways of this fairgrounds
As the Ferris wheel at first rises and then recedes,
Like a somnambulant elevator stuck to itself, unsure
Of any other words—
Scars that build underneath the stars and the time capsules
We keep buried in our front yard
Like a beautiful picture of a venomous snake,
Sinuous and about to strike across the swing sets underneath
The moonbeams: another thing that almost means
Almost nothing to us—
As the genie is always lost in her bottle in the waves—
Until there are cartoons in the busied afternoons of all of these Tenements always going up and up—latch keyed
But looking beautiful, biting their lips like lost arrowheads
Tattooed high upon the semaforos—the stoplights
Of the lost bedrooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Store

If I have traveled up to where the jasmine believes
Where the bachelors live on roads that never Quite get you home,
The alligator twisted from the breath of their masters,
Where all of the Indians have evaporated or Melted into the virulence of sky:
Then I should offer my mortal coils to the slugs of That great washing machine;
And not having to look twice to know that Diana is making
Love to her homeless gods,
Throw myself over that old Roman wall, to swim with Dolphins, to become myself the sacrifice of mercury
Like Alice to the lips of her young cult:
They will pick me up and worship me just like a car they've
Wanted to put out:
And then you know, Erin, I will be but an echo to the footsteps
Of your bridal shower; and when you move over the earth,
You will tickle my calloused soul,
And you will tramp my holes like grapes; and my wishes for
You will remain so tremulous as to keep needing your Delicious secret and soul,
And I will keep playing baseball for you out and blackeyed
After high school; and it will do me no good,
For the otter will be cracking his greedy shells and making
A mess all over your bared breasts, while the citrus somehow
Flowers into orchids,
And oranges so round and perfect as if I'd known you,
You can see and taste at the store.

Robert Rorabeck

The Storefronts Of Her Blossoming Soul

Switchbacks disappear halfway up the
Already vanishing heavens'
And you have to scramble with the hooks of
Your evolving soul'
And not even a single angel will take note
Of your most hollow of
Victories 'with only your car waiting down
There beneath you'
Headlights draining the battering like
Some type of parasitic intelligence'
Your sisters making love to their eventual men
In the deserts of another country'
Your father a prince with amnesia'
And your mother enthralled to a werewolf'
So you pin your art to the hidden classroom
In the apiary of her stone guts
Hanging breathlessly above tree line'
And you start out again, becoming enlightened by
False summits 'the day perpetuating its
Perfect tattoos upon your skin'
The tourists dining beneath you,
And melting into the storefronts of her blossoming soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Stories Of What Will Happen

Filling up the gas tanks of your bright eyes-
Can't you tell we're in love,
Or other things I don't know- I haven't
Yet thought of,
As the sky swells as it does, over the amphitheatres
Where the gathered there are
As wildflowers blown in the séances of
A spring of airplanes-
Becoming habitual, as fingers and rings-
Where you crossed the mountains, feet stubbed by Fossils- and your mother crossed alone,
Almost becoming a cenotaph of a housewife,
But came a long ways to see her daughters again,
Underneath the stars and their predictable plan:
Came into the numb sanctuaries where I write
Floridly for her daughter,
Strange songs in a tongue she will never have to Hear spill- the stories of what will happen tomorrow
That yet have to be real.

Robert Rorabeck

The Storm

I did not even want to do this-
Tonight, I just wanted to be left alone:
Shot through with arrows,
Watching television with my dogs,
But what does it mean
To be forlorn beneath the banyan without Any serpents to eat the knowledge what not
Was;
And your great breasts,
And your ears curled back- you should be a mother,
Of that I'm certain:
And so I had no use but to cry out to you,
And in the same moment I was shrunken,
And unpublished; and you were a great amusement,
Even if you didn't care,
And I called you out and you rode across me like
A bull across the sea;
And that's all I can remember about your metamorphosis
Deep in the glinting rafters of the butterfly house;
And hotdogs, and sunshine, and caramel popcorn,
But that's all there ever was;
And it was so delicious on two legs and then on four Until the serpent came preaching through Hibiscus,
Drowned the puppies in the storm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Contrivances

Overpasses and overpasses of tools,
Fluctuating dynamite- words spill from the caesuras
Of what I know,
Listening to the human language of flat tires,
As the amber liquid spills from the lips of Tightroping humming-birds,
As lost and runaway children spill from Michigan,
Imagining the fledgling spirits of their words,
And the cold hopeless nights of what it
Takes to survive,
Selling ruby glasses to crocodiles, trying to Imagine the sublimely great trumpets of immaculate
Valleys where the angels sing perpetually,
Nude busted, swinging in all of their stuff
And from their very lips smoking the ether like
The exhaust of the progenitors:
They go- and they move, censers of priests in
A room for acrobats, the swim and do summersaults
And back flips through the spokes of bicycles,
Figuring out the strange contrivances
Of what they can justifiably live to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Curses

We can't get married- the little princess tells me everyday,
Brown and dizzy, like Pocahontas on a seesaw,
Braving all of the elements that took her here across Mexico:
Now she wants a boob job
But not another child- and she has a hernia that I hope will Soon mend;
And when she gets home to him, she goes right to sleep:
Or she slips out of her clothes and into the bathtub from which
She can see the mango tree in the backyard
About which her rabbits have disappeared which made her Mother Rosa happy, as they were eating all of its rich leaves;
And I have gotten drunk to sleep on the roof
Across the street;
And when she is washed and my Alma is cleaned, she goes into A bedroom where she never reads and she turns out the Light and turns to sleep: or she makes love,
While the dogs run their ever faithful races over her shoulders:
Either they are lucky or are they are not,
But at least I do not think she can hear the rattle of trains
Like inky zippers of linear octopi that separates her world
From mine- and I am almost certain she never wonders out at Night to bite her lip and shiver looking up into the strange curses
Echoing from the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Festivities

The strange festivities of their souls
Cannot trap the butterflies I don't Know anything about—
As the sun come up over the shoulder-blades
Of the airplanes while we are still
In school—
And there will be recess tomorrow—
Or almost forever,
Underneath the sweet sweat and the daydreams
Of stewardesses or
The girls who are in their own rooms,
Captivating themselves by the Strange games which we all play—
And then, as if Christmas comes—
And the kaleidoscopes beckon from
The most beautiful illusions of
All of the churches, well then all of the barmaids
Become mermaids to whom the best of
The professors sing to forever—
Counting clockwise,
Their hearts in a chorus of magnificent shadows,
And the angels flying like
Daydreams over the baseball games of Their sweetest tomorrows—
Well then it feels alright to evaporate
And to become another part of the illusions
That run forever like racehorses over the seas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Migrations Of Her Successful Weddings

Open fair of wounded hearts taking too long at Playing their game,
And caught in the harsh reality- they pullulate like
Gold fish
In drowning mockery underneath the sunshine:
This is what they said they would be doing
When they were little boys,
But as it turned out, it was different:
The traffic is all around like buzzards- the tourists
Are hot, but satiated,
And Saturn is very visible, turning around like
A ringed spotlight,
A ghost of her cherub husband floating over the Shoulder of airplanes-
Casting down his eerie resilience on her birthday,
Singing to her brown skin as
She looks away from the massacre- all that is left
Of the gardens of a young forbearance-
That at first bloomed, and then caught a fire for
Her,
Only to drown in the consumptive airs,
To be left behind by the strange migrations of her
Successful weddings.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Relicts

All of the strange relicts were gone by Christmas,
And I got married one year ago—
So my heart wouldn't have to die
By the usual flight paths of another replication of
The Earth—
Strange thoughts to be having when you don't Have to be alone, like any other words
That spill out from the times
While we were supposed to be together,
With the jasmine perfuming the night
After the baseball games were done—
And the flight paths were emptied—
And the orange trees yet bloomed—
And the world stood barren on a precipice looking At the castle of vampire, and saying over and Over, as if trying to put a child to sleep
Underneath the mountains—
His will be done—his will be done.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Summits

What you can be: a tourniquet for the dogs underneath
My flag—
Filthy banner of a flea market and a stop watch—
As, all of the housewives swing home on
Their censers,
Smoking with perfume and legs that flood the cul-de-sac:
And I've wondered,
Can you see into her eyes, looking down from you
Apartment—
Your heart something taken out at midnight from
The refrigerator as your old girlfriend cried herself to Sleep on your floor—
And your thoughts, lost in Los Angeles or Colorado,
Like little arrow heads pepper the strange summits—
And you go to sleep, knowing there will be school tomorrow
If knowing nothing more.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strange Visions

Down to the slow plagiarisms—after the cats get tired
Playing with their mice and visa-versa—
Down to the open mouthed mailboxes of crepuscule—
And the last tags of the fire around the dance—
In the troubling diction that is muted by dinner,
When all of the spent fireworks lie in the grasses—
And housewives go back to pretending to be someone else—
It is the time when the diamonds drink the sea,
And the toy dogs come indoors to bask beneath the strange visions
Of the televisions and the Christmas trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strangely Captured Sun

Doors divide the emptiness of two places:
Then there is a without and a within,
And her eyes swinging in the lullaby of her deep
Alma's
Eyes and the dreams of her impressions:
And infinity between the parks of a constellation
That the human imagination uses to Cartograph
Trying to do some good, or to get together in some Religion,
Denying that even their most ritualistic of sciences
Will ever reach her:
And the flowers you gave her are dead:
The yards are empty and her children are not home,
Though the doors continue to impersonate
A pathway to her basked in the lights of the strangely Captured sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Strangely Usual Faiths

Coming up to another church again
Through the shallows of a Peabody's imagination:
Like cousins counting each others' freckles
In the shoulders of the mirror-
Far across the landscaping of an utopian misappropriated Underneath the extraordinary pulling of Moonrise-
Like the last knight of morning galloping out
In the strange pools and Lakes of that day's sunshine-
And so we were: another school yard going through
The matriculations of recess:
Another dime store astronaut counting the ticks
Of oxygen leading up to his weightless
Graveyard:
And a hallway leading to a doorway expected
To lead towards somewhere,
With faithful wolves lollygagging on either side,
Waiting for the malapropisms of Lycanthropes to howl through the forest
We thought already tamed anyways- as the dragons
Sang for their dinner,
And the damsels stepped easily-
Already according to the spiral staircases of their Inner cathedrals- like the backwards propositions
In the fingers of Chinese fireworks-
And the maypoles of firemen- but I suppose you
Don't know or understand this:
So, just kiss her lips beneath the tiny flames of Goldfish,
And rewind yourself, and go barefooted back inside
Your little house, with the Christmas tree
Waiting side by side with the television-
The two of them entirely kissing cousins to the strangely
Usual faiths that we both just happen to believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Streetlight's Fiasco

The streetlight's fiasco keeps to itself underneath the Spume of wildhorses,
And this is just a relief as another day stops its echo
As a weakness—and this is a weakness,
This wasn't supposed to be here again in the fabulous raincloud
Like an oil slick over a holiday:
The white bread children all raise their mouths up to the Baptisms of sweet bread: and they are tenderly laughing,
Just as the airplanes touch in;
And their white, white mother's pretend to love them—
And their white—white god is as white as the white
White snow—
And it becomes so beautiful whatever it is that they forgot that
They had to remember,
Whatever it was I am sure they will never know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Streets Of Shanghai

There is a teepee over the very sport
Of the soul of the waves:
And over that some old chief is riding
Some old bicycle
Just as rusted as the ones i saw in the Streets of Shanghai:
I will be going back to Shanghai next week-
Going back to the woman I married
So that I wouldn't have to be alone,
And she will sing that our marriage has become an Ocean,
And over that the sky and moon
And all of the luxuriates of the water fowl
That fall down upon the grottos of her bossom
To bathe next to her heaters and wax figurines:
And we will rent a hotel room next to the Shanghai airport
Where the fields of strangely nettled
Brown-brown grasses twice the length of a
Full grown man have been cleared away-
And make love in the hotel as the airplanes
Peel into the sky,
And skin like stones across the earth where we play
For awhile like wishes who have settled
Into the mouths of cicadas and bullfrogs who have learned to Sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Subtle Waves Of Your Ocean

It is Easter Sunday and we are both
Happy about a green door,
And your husband is sleeping on the couch
The light box fibrillating and dousing him like the Bird bath of a mother;
And we stand across from each other in the kitchen
Still dirtied with the plates of barbeque:
The light is on and weepy; and your eyes
Seem to have their own tides in their perfectly circular
Oceans;
And I think about the creatures that must come out and Bath on your cheeks when you cry;
There are little cuts on your legs from where you were Before;
And your children are sleeping like pickup sticks in
A kindling game across the hollow floor.
I just want to step nearer to your neck and warm it with your Name,
But I don't say nothing at all to you, but watch as silently
As I can the subtle waves of your ocean.

Robert Rorabeck

The Suburbia We Have Done

In the suburbias that have the overabundance of Patios like green shoots,
Where the pools teal, and the housewives glisten and spoke
Off in all the avenues of their pink-glossed limbs,
And each tree is a loose waterfall:
There I have a bed in which I often lie with race cars
And empty liquor bottles beneath me, under a pop corn ceiling,
Under a sale of a sky;
And like me there are also many other bodies juxtaposing:
And all that they can think to be doing is to grow up and begin Superimposing themselves, conjoining and throwing their Bones down hallways of equal venture;
And to shoot their eeking young down the same hallways that They can still remember learning in: math and hyphens and comma-
Splices,
And the worlds of dissected frogs; and the windows gossiping
Headily from strong strokes of the petting sun:
And now all of this gladness gathered together in a softly flowing
Utopia:
Why just look at the suburbia we have done, once we got out of our Beds and let our bodies run.

Robert Rorabeck

The Suffocations Which Prove Their Love

Grottos of our truancy, minute hummingbirds
In the chain smoke of battleships,
As the little yarns of school girls come unbound but Golden
Across the fabulous lies of the wooden marionettes
Striving to know the living flesh of Youth:
The donkeys are braying in the carnivals trapped by
The sea
From which the smoke of its children comes up loud,
And worth,
Even to which the incurable lions are loud and opened
Tongued,
And they lie there as the cars drive by like a parade,
Each little child inside them holding the cut roses
That die with the suffocations which Prove their love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Suicides Of The Sun

We sell fireworks and then by the same open wounds
We drive home,
Having to look at ourselves in the dirty mirrors—
We go the same way as Vanishing angels,
Crawling back in to viaducts as if they were bouquets—
And other words tossed out to her
Like chicken feed while she wasn't home:
Hypnotized by the wizard which made her dance off
The cliff the same way a dozen times,
Taking the same direction the cars swerved—
So by the very telltale signs of night
The same way as the werewolves find their Victims as the pretty flowers
Create the perfumes of the midnight neighborhoods:
By these shadows come,
Puppets and foxes speaking in tongues,
And other developments only described by the Grapevines of the vixens of the afterlives—
While I loved you in the shadows,
Sucking my thumb—
Wanting to find a way out of the labyrinths, the catastrophes
Of your mother—
While the helium balloons found their own ways towards
The suicides of the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sum Of The Poltergeist

The sum of the poltergeist is in bitter memory,
In a skein of discord plugging a hole in the hidden mountains-
The tramped on spine by black-hole horseshoes worn by the Caterwauling spider-leg devils, the pinstriped ring masters
Of heavy machineries:
The little murders done in the draping mourning
When the yawning globe smells of snot and tears....
What is left? They are selling her off in the harbor of auction:
The vivisection makes two strange sisters in the grinning grass-
They call her mute and her blind, and she is a fettered
Toy wound up to run away, but lost....
Men and husbands are bidding on her with clasped briefcases,
And woodpecker beaks which eat entire forests;
The well-dressed brotherhood stares down at her making an eclipse
In her wooden tomato hamper in the kitchen's gloom.
When they are not selling, they nest in her leg,
Which is given the worthless jewelry of heavy chains,
And pollinate her with epitaphs and fifteen minute
Advertisements which produce snail-like children like bruised caviar
Beneath her swollen breasts. In trails of slime,
The gastropoda crawl up to suckle the irritated nipples,
But they are quickly plucked by stork-like fingers,
Who also steal the acidic lactates to make escargot of disinherited offspring;
Triumphantly they bugle, little fingers between their teeth,
The actuated sounds of a slave ship's abortion,
The coital hurricanes: The symphonic Arian bliss of anteaters
In the deepest savannas crawling with the food
Of patriarchal hyperbole in the suburban subdivisions of dead planets
And bankrupt carnivals;
They are using her ingredients in a lucrative spell cast in
The delicate front yards mowed by illegals and dismissive poets,
Who crumple up their disavowed lines and hang them
In the satanic crooks of cypress, the unmolested love offerings
For the blue woman in the far away window
Of the house they attend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Summits Of Alma's Everlasting Name

Now you have no family; now you have no home;
And all of your loved ones are across so many borders
As to go uncouncted into the earth:
And If you had a sancho, you said today that you would Kill him,
Kill him as easy as pulling the wings off a butterfly
Underneath a rainbow before the unfailing failure of the incestual
Cataracts,
And I cannot get a job outside of my uncle's fruit market,
But I would miss your pretty lips otherwise, Alma:
Otherwise I would not move,
Or it is that I would fail already into stillborn cities of the quieted
Places in the earth unto which the sun cannot even prove;
And I know that if I was really a poet, then my beauty would Bloom unending and carry itself out of the forgotten
Streets that budded itself in my exhausted memory,
Just as the forgotten swings could carry your brown carriage
Up from the sterile romances that gave you
Both of your children already so far lost like reanimated
Pets into the faraway school yards which were just Built because they must entertain me-
And yet through this unjustified catastrophe, I want only your Lips, and not even any flag- or the lighted harangue of fireworks:
Doing this for you after the job, after all of the flanges
Of washing machines,
And all of the weathercocks miss lighted across the tangling
Raspberries:
All of the grizzlies disillusioned into the glitz of their trapezes
Graves,
Almost necrophilic so far beneath the summits of Alma's Everlasting name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sun

In an arching way, like a cathedral's loft
The sun whirls over us and dispels the gloom,
Taking gentle fingers to our temples
And raises us up from bed, sets us
Out into the tumult like clockwork from
His spires on high.

Our sphere, the amber king, knows
Each of us by our ancestors' visages, for
He still shimmers down upon their bones,
And lances down upon them his warm,
Lazy spears, in his strange summer death,
Rarely spoken of.

That man, who shows us how, who
Is the candle in our eyes, who presses his Hot palms against our foreheads, and turns us
Into the panting redskins, relaxes near the shore,
Where the sea is his mirror, and upon her
He is forever the vane lover.

Yet, there are places that remain naturally
Outside of his drunken glass of light, those Deep ways where everything is shadow,
For most of the world swims under the dress
Of the sea, whom the sun makes love to,
Not knowing how to undress her surface,
The strange and utter coolness of her luminescent undergarments.

He remains, though, the conductor of our streets,
The window-man to our cities, a phalanx of burning soldiers
In the sky marching from dawn to dusk,
Blindly through our windshields, showing us
The amber dust of our ancestors, the spores of air,
Inhaled by our lungs, the keeper of our eyes,
Reveals to us the day as we rise out of our secret dreams
He soon has us forgotten.

The Sun Again

The sun is a fine instrument, scalding the earth,
Making it leap and gesticulate, spitting the winds
From its orifices like young boys spitting across the abyss-
And the sun has seen us all awaking in our clays,
Drying us out as if we were swimmers sojourned from
The glassy pools: The ancient modifier, and spittoon of Our olfactory- After school, what a kiss, and the way the Women sway beneath that beam, each flaxen hair upon their Evolved forearms like a forest of matches all on fire for a birthday.
He is the antediluvian pedagogue of science, the foreman of Our architectures rising from the knobby reptilian kines of
The Nile, the priest who swings this censer, chanting ontology
Through the incense of continents: He has watched us divide, Lose our tails and our minds for strange women when he has Punched the clock into dusk: An easy allegory, the sun, the Old workman, the furnace for our clays, the bastion of our Swings, he has laid his hands upon our ancestors in streaming
Spindles, kissing the cragged hills, and grown grapes for wine,
And now he whispers the claret ants from their mounds, and
The picnickers to the field, and thus sets to motion our swift
Exchanges in the Mercado under his skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sun Caresses The Seas

All of a sudden stood up,
The heart at the brink of an earthquake: going to the bank,
She takes off her clothes and Staggers, horned—
A thousand horns matriculating to the summit of a storming afternoon:
There, forever, once in a while, she looked beautiful
Even while she was berating herself
That this was the world that we would have
To live in—
The sun at a slant, the pasture at the foothills of rainbows
And the footprints of the masticating calves
And their always more than ambivalent architectures:
Into the slanted postures of all of the valleys—
And the mechanical natures of nursery rhymes:
Well, anyways, this is where we would forever after have to live,
Always:
Beautiful, but slaves to the sea and always working more and More towards her,
The sun un-burning her head and looking in a thousand directions,
Like a herd of a thousand horses thinking all at once,
And tossing her manes
In the all too many ways in which the sun caresses the seas.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunbeam Of Your Careless Gazing

Jumbling jail rooms,
Brides in a cage- kaleidoscopes of Sea-green caesuras
Washing their clothes:
I want to baptize beneath the pillars of
Your strong knees,
Oh muse: like opal pillars,
And hummingbirds are zeppelins don't
You suppose,
And news snippets feature length movies,
And this is the holy scripture riding
Through your neighborhood
Pretending to sell ice-cream, pretending
To give a darn about little boys and Little girls, when he just wants to find
You out, to smell you half naked reclining
In the natural habitats of your backyard,
Attending to your school books,
Breasts cupped in seashells or whatever
You prefer,
Your father's bought you a swimming pool the entire sea,
This tongue and its senses Jason and his crew,
Your dalliances the golden fleeces of my
Melting pornographies,
The Mexicans attending to your yard's country,
Nothing to you, and on and on,
With more allusions as the lights dim in this Movie theatre,
And the first starlit of morning walks out,
Just as you come out of your bedroom all early,
And sit down at breakfast in your suburban vestibules;
And my audiences, nothing to you, I suppose:
But you eat your cornflakes and seem all happy,
And my world crenellates around the sunbeam of your Careless gazing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sundail's Mechanism

The sun sets gently in the backyard of suburbia,
The pools glisten like diamonds scattered in the grass;
These mortgaged heirlooms smelling of chlorine
And the children's inflated laughter;
On Sundays, lovers tan in their bathing suites,
Let the salt of their affected kisses begin to pretzel their bodies.
Fathers with beers in hand, turn the hotdogs on the grills,
Listen to the football game in the yellow splash of yard,
While the sons are shooting off pop rockets over the Canal, using glass coke bottles of refundable patriotism,
And sisters are curled up with dolls on the teal easement,
Curiously watching the alligators sunbathe and Fart the monotonous prehistory of their reptilian genealogies;
Nothing about it is entirely real, as the red ants
Comb the grass, each blade a green column of its photosynthesis;
While, mothers in their kitchens cry a whispering melody
Into their watermarked catalogue of wine glasses,
And airplanes shoot silver-bellied over the scene, like
Leaping fish, soon to settle on the capricious tarmac;
Something like a dream, wavering to and fro
In the cycles of the sun's authenticating aura, each body
And specter there of, a shadow of comprehensive time
In the sundial's exacting mechanism.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunken Barbarians

See what happens when we drink:
Lonely occultish memory, green locks swaying
As the kelp,
Selky-ish heads persuaded against the pylons:
Lapsing upon the breathings of the sea.
Our heads are persuaded against the pylons
And for a little while, a few feet beneath
The water, we learn how to pray:
Senses bleeding into the beautiful emeralds,
Waltzed into the jewelry shops where
We find it hard to breathe—
I think of you for a little while as the sea finds
Her fancies in her caracoles—
Maybe she thinks she is putting on a ballet:
Foaming dancers who know their children
For just as long as we do, broken apart
Towards the partitions of the breathing world:
And we thank our little gods,
Nymphs who jettison their children in spumes
Of dew-drop ether:
They are gone before your lovers turn over—
As they give a sideways kiss to the Neanderthals
And the sunken barbarians,
Epitaphs with bouquets of swords in hand,
Offerings of an almost forgotten honor to a sideways turning world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunlight I Am Melting In

Lizard- crown of Gold on your chin
Face down on the Pitch-fork pine-
Thank god you can't Feel the sunlight
I am melting in-
With your long tailed Soul as innocent as a blade of Whistling grass in grandmother's yard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunlight In Its Afternoons

Wizards of one or two beers
Making eyes with the dog—all alone at the Edge of some quinceanera—
What makeshift business they make for themselves
Underneath of the clouds,
A little hall-less home
Diademed by Christmas lights and
The fairy-tales of their high school—
Places of lost business
And the pornographies of housewives
Pleasuring themselves against the patinas
Of the copper canals—
With the ancient tortoises wishing for mermaids,
And the cul-de-sacs briefly cenotaphs
For the virulent failures of the sunlight in its Afternoons.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunlight Of Bright Mirage

My eyes are the Saboteurs of blindness.
They work from the back of Sad pickup trucks,
Noticing things basking in
The sunlight of bright mirage
As we head along.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunlit Ballrooms Of Your Continuously Poisonous Honeymoons

Typical Judas with flowers in your hair,
Place foolish gold over my wounds
And drive away.
You have such a well-suited husband,
And I'm busy on the cross,
The lions are crossing the yard and its time
To get the kids ready to school.
Are you prepared for that,
The easy murder of filigreed mythology;
I bet you are; and they've taken me down
Near the lake, and given me a rest before
They start repeating the same old stuff.
The neighborhood looks so strange;
Even the butterflies are from foreign countries,
And my mother is off at the video store
Perusing new leading men, and nothing stays the same:
It is so easy to fall in love with pictures of your Father, if you are going that way.
Having broken the crystal underneath a steady
Foot, and forgotten to use it to cut my wrists,
Leaving me to drown, I bet you are,
And the new names you use like limitless credit
Cards, another proud patriot of the easier
Neighborhoods. Scar less, of course,
Even if the world cherishes your tags;
Its only the soft and perishable amusement.
My dogs will go anyway that I go, and its so easy
To disappear skipping on trains like stones
Across the sound- All I need is the limitless pain,
The jobs I keep secure knowing there will always
Be a payment and travel by foot away
From where you are consciously breathing,
Your body only lacking those things you forget to wear-
You look beautiful: in the names of your lover you
Almost drown,
I am too lazy to resurrect myself in another town
Utterly far away from the sunlit ballrooms of your

Continuously poisonous honeymoons.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sunrise's Necromancy

Cry sometime for the shy turtledove
Hiding in his shell,
And for me, if you still believe I am real.
For I have gone beyond this ancient town-
I have followed the disenchanted cataracts,
And the stumbling tears,
For under this whipping flag is no place for Wounded men to live and hunger,
As I have seen you kissing him without Regret beside the shoreline of tattered lore:
It was then I noticed your eyes were the sunrise,
Pulled up in the necromancy of his bare arms,
And the millenary reservoirs of lips
Muting the tide and rising it in the exaltations
Of pollinated limbs.
This was all I could behold, and I have never Seen anything so terrifying, that you
Had known him again and again,
The way the tide knows the compromising shore,
And wishes for it as clay wishes for its sculptor;
You bent into him like a twist of wood,
Who has lived passionately for its moment of life,
The flotsam, when discovered, metamorphosed
In his hands, and become a piece of breathing property;
It was then I ran, shrinking from the dawn you made,
And the sound flooding with the color,
Believe that my heart would melt like glass in a kiln,
To see you at it again, the angel too close to the sun.
I became the other thing, embracing the part of me
You never found, and in the miniature wilderness
Of diminished homes, I took a soundless wife,
And became the thing you neither touched nor saw.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sun's Golden Curiosity

If this new day becomes unhinged by the Sun's golden curiosity,
Then we will be able to see again from
The seats of grounded airplanes,
Perspiring upon the cerulean canvas,
Her eyes so far away never opening but in sleep,
Her lips the drunken dictionary men call out
Up and down the Mississippi River
To mark water depth and dangerous flotsam,
Her legs the sleeping gazelles on the savannas
Of her humid bed;
If the sun looks at us again,
Opens the growing music box of men's woes,
Our destinations encased in a fabrique egg,
The high schools of our lives' meaningful desire,
The Ferris-Wheel of planets and pulsars trapped
In a tortoise's teal plating
As he tastes the nebula's sweet orchid,
The yoke our protein centrifuge,
The whirligig of rest into motion;
Then she will spend another day with us on
This little knickknack of a home;
The delicate front yard which ants run out into,
Neither expectant or aware of our infinitive connection
Nesting in the sailor's sun doused palm.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sun's Homework

The dream in the enigma
Of unmolded sound,
Passing through the lips
Of the bullhorn
Where keeps the ashes of
A once great fire
The young gods sat
Around, telling the first
Stories with just their eyes;
When ladies were sometimes
Lakes and trees
Sneaking into the unpolluted love,
Like arriving late for class
Without an excuse,
And naked the phantoms walk
The courtyard made invisible by
The sun,
Who can tell them where to go
Now that their homework is done.

Robert Rorabeck

The Superfluous Fare Thee Wells

Interludes of sadness and kindergarten,
But Monday is my day off- her hand is brown
Like a kind of butterfly on a stony, fleshy kite;
Who speaks familiarly with its mind,
As around the corner the kidnappers grow,
And the day gets all shut out like a semi perfect
Baseball game,
And phantasms in the creases of the sidewalk,
Like chicken wire veins sewn tight in my jaw after
My first attempts at flight,
The rabbits in the grass, in the rattlesnakes' stomach
Where they will sleep in the night,
Contended in the weeds around trailer parks
Growing rusty, and missing their waitresses and Bartenders:
But it will soon come to pass, overcome with many Aphorisms, like swords clutched in stones,
The rains weeping for heroes, the cut out snowflakes
And cartoons interrupted by the superfluous
Fare thee wells.

Robert Rorabeck

The Supermarket Of Summits

Bobby, the fairytale is yours: it sings
Through the houses, wilted away: down with the Green spectacle of coffins
In the yard,
The snakes or the dogs
Who have eaten the lovely rabbits
Who were always your favorite,
While your mother was Preoccupied and lactating
A pieta in the carport for the sport
Of her wonder:
And maybe you had already moved away
On that pre immaculate day:
And maybe that was the day
That the mountains flooded
And wept tears over the stones
For their lost soul:
And the airplanes got so low
As to become everything mystified:
And thus spent their fieldtrip of a day in kindergarten,
Spilling their passengers like
Open throated and overripe honeydew
Across the
Alpine swing sets until the wildflowers grew
With the powerful notes and enjambments
Above the cantankerous
Shoulder blades
And hullabaloo
Of the hikers who looked up to find them there,
Smiling as their hearts swelled,
And taking pictures;
But nothing more, sadly,
Before carrying on, guessing themselves
Little more than tourists
Trying to make lunch before noon
There again across
The supermarket of summits.

The Supermarkets Of The Very Air

In totality, the airplanes fly through the sun:
You see, don't you,
They are going to meet angels in a ballroom
Up there in a high school:
Yes, they are leaping over the birthday candles
Of my muse,
While for so long, I have sung to you,
From the useless epitome of my gardens,
As the roars of lions echo
While they hibernate,
And the tourists spin around as if in a bowling
Alley of green swans-
And I think of you, and write this pitiful stuff:
While the fox is in his very own
Fable,
Leaping for grapes and talking to rattlesnakes:
And I suppose I loved you,
But I am growing old, as the girls sunbathe
In the nude,
And the caesuras are fill with heavy-purple
Jellyfish,
While up above, the pilots soar, doing their Stuff and mouthing off,
While the stewardesses seem to skate through
The supermarkets of the very air.

Robert Rorabeck

The Supermarkets Of The Wildlife Preservations

There they go marching like ants through
The green courts beneath the echinopsis where before
Their words were once beautiful and
Read by kindergarteners-
The rains lapped their bodies as they guessed they should,
And the airplanes leapt straight across their Entire neighborhood-
The tigers in their yards- the bears on their streets:
I looked out at them shyly from the windows of My flea market and thought that though they Were going the wrong way,
Werent they beautiful as the produce was loaded upon
The trucks-
And then the housewives came out well after midnight
And bared their very own breasts to the Fountains,
And the apiary of bees stung them, ululating,
And taking photographs like tourists reunited with their Long lost grandchildren in the supermarkets of
The wildlife preservations.

Robert Rorabeck

The Surface That I Need To Survive

The bodies pull their strings hard to the south
And the whole armada turns like boys in pornographic Dreams who still have
To wake up early tomorrow to sound of into the sinister mirages
Of dragonflies and their ululating of Poisonous opulence:
And I pray to the virginita that soon I might die, but that Alma
Can live forever
And take her place in the opulent sky: that she might still become
The clairvoyance of her favorite color,
Or that she might live forever in Ocala, just under the chin
Of where all of the chicken white students will be studying forever
In their successive generations of nothingness:
Because that now the storm clouds have bruised my eye:
And I am too drunken to drive,
But my body still feels warm from the fires of a poem;
And Alma is so close, and almost reaching her is like almost Reaching the surface that I need to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet And Innocently Romantic Avenues

Recoiling in the fairytales who promised to no longer
To share their lips,
I drink to myself and do pushups:
I listen to the rain that is pushing in kittens into the landscaping:
Kittens who will never know a thing of firemen or even the captains
And pilots of airplanes:
While my mother sleeps with my father in New Mexico:
While my mother was a student pilot before our house almost burned
And it was so close to here,
Alma; it was almost on the same road, it was so close to us,
And the major avenues of kidnappers:
And I have slipped outside again without even moving:
To kiss and bless the lucky rabbits who along with the spikenard in
The rock garden are always bleeding like the first protuberances of Virgins;
Of the sweet and innocently romantic avenues by which neither I nor
You may love again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Back Of The Far Flung Moon

You give me some much fun under the Everyday average soirée of the penumbra of Unabashed banana leaves;
Why did you change your picture after all to fit
My imagination;
And now I am dying halfway painting up the sweet
Pepper-jack nothing almost all the way
Up your skree,
Your eyes like glacial lakes who never awakened or Sang for me;
And all I have been doing is no good, is only the Awful runaway of spirits, of nincompoops
Under the rain and all those cinderblocks stoops,
While the bartender puts herself out under the chalk Silhouette of catholic cathedrals all under the Ancient Pentecost of that bi-coastal football cathedral;
And all of my words are worms eaten the Vanquished knights under the witch's tree, doing good Work, getting to watch television, waiting for his Sweet and savage parents to arrive home again
After a full night of baseball, under the witch's spell
Which is still floating around and spitting cursive
Along the sweet back of the far flung moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Brown Promises

I think of you; I turn my head:
The sun is down, the world is in bed:
And all of the night is a fairytale that I cannot stomach:
The ways roll on like a ceaseless zoetrope
Tapping towards the heart of a sleepless paramour;
And everything I have done is wrong and not really hear;
But then I remember how you can really see me,
Alma,
Like a lighthouse who is not blind, and sings even to the most Horrendous night until everything is calmed,
As America becomes even more brightened and more beautiful;
And I think of you in your room, listening to the choirs of angels
Who are speaking the voices of a language I am better to leave
Misunderstood,
As I think of the footsteps of mountains I have been up to,
But who have done me no good:
While the Aspen spend their silver dollars into their breeze,
While I learn to kiss the Virgin of Guadalupe on my knees and think her
For your brown gifts, and the sweet brown promises, Alma,
That even I know you can never truly give.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Liquors She Finally Sells

Oh god it hurts to fill these pains
With solutions that are not real.
Like knuckles playing red down the washboards
Of this brain;
And the rivers are all straight down,
Really classical in their architecture, beautifully harsh,
And all the time Sharon is suckling her niece or some-
Other foundling:
She doesn't care- Her eyes, her eyes what are they doing
But changing shapes and constellations.
Doesn't she know that there is absolutely no way for Us to reach what she is doing-
She is everything in the light of one single day,
The toads are all out singing in the carport amidst the many Types of mints and herbs, but I cannot sing each one to her:
Sharon,
Sharon, she has a godly husband, but she doesn't care how She's hurt us, how she's fixed us in the rock-garden,
A new cenotaph who still keeps his fir, his jaw set and raw;
And there are zoetropes in the desert who bud,
Leaping- Leaping for Sharon is what they seem to be doing,
Far down beneath the end of her splendiferous draw;
And it seems that this is what she's always been doing,
Painting the horses as they move beneath her heavenly
Seesaws;
As we swing back and forth affixed to her jigsaws,
The puzzles only the sweet liquors she finally sells can so Easily solve.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Smells

My mother is back at home, and the canals are Fully filled, engorged beneath the catwalks as they Were billed;
And she is making an annoyance as she tidies up and Eats curious things:
She smells like planted endives smelled by hungry
Hares out in the blearing rains;
But now I am not so alone, and I can crawl back up to
The light and smile as if my head were just sweetened
On a soft abutment while she Read to me by even softer candlelight;
And the world waves angelically, the cars growing still softer
In the distance:
I can almost hear my dogs whimpering beneath the naked
Aspen,
Feral and curious to the proximity of my distance, how My wounded smells still might betray them in the middle of the Night;
And like my mother, I would like to come to them at the end of My body's work,
And lay in between them soft and nuzzled, turning with them
As if on a Ferris Wheel where my eyes were always closed
Having a fare day caracoling again in this gravity,
Not even supposing I would ever again need to fear,
Looking down at the graveyard far away
I was even then returning to the sweet smells she fed to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Suburbias And Estuaries

If the bodies peel softly with joy, they will have us
Scouted out by morning:
They will have scoured all the baseball fields before the fog
Has lifted,
And if they are quick enough they will even catch us in the middle Of the self-infliction action,
The battle wounds of bleeding adolescents, after the girls have Moved up the interstate into their new fertile crescent
To learn how to cook and sew: and how to become housewives
And mermaids
Down the sweet suburbias and estuaries of housewife and mermaid
Row.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Undying Beauty

Alma: I give you this again, this beauty mark, or this

Scar:

And it is funny that I sat in the car with you and kissed your

Mouth even though you said you didn't want to;

And you are either a good girl or a bad girl according to the Different gods, according to their varying seasons;

But it doesn't matter:

You have ruined me for any other version of your sex, or

Television:

Maybe you were just a firework- too expensive, going in my mouth,

Your legs pantomiming the jaws of my soul-

And all too soon you went home again, and kissed your children

Who made you whole;

And maybe I shouldn't be using this kind of language:

Maybe I should be as silent as an empty gun overcome by the enemy

In her deep headdresses of wild-feathers,

But maybe again we saw the male peacock together at the old zoo,

And I held your hand and kissed your mouth:

I was for awhile your albino flag, your feral gringo, or sometimes

Even your newly invented Mexican boy;

But all I know is that I shall not survive without you: these wind vanes are

Uneasy, and the weathers of this liquor most unwholesome:

It is all transcendental: it will not go too far,

And your quiet lips purse in expectation or contentedness that

I should die for you,

That I should so eagerly give my life up to the sweet undying beauty

That you are.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweet Young Candles

This day trims, and I am not hung over,
So miraculously practiced am I am at my sport,
My lonely
Midwestern daydream: Dreams in prison,
And cars exploded down the careening neck of
A beautiful fire-burst cliff;
The aspens higher up seem to say publish this,
Publish this and we will make love to you,
But I cannot truly hear them and the grizzly bears
Have long since gone and been roped away
By the last of the cowboys farming her boudoir;
And even further back the Mexican sheep herders
Worshipping their virgins in the grottos of Chicken-wire and other galaxies, keep penmanship in
The reason of the stones,
Crop grass so fine as to make cenotaphs bald;
Maybe they were the first ones to develop a swing-set
For which to practice their religion,
To let their scars apex over the cliffs and the divides,
The folded pages of butterflies
Skipping across the draws of the prairie where the ancient Indians and their dinosaurish colts are waiting
To blow out the sweet young candles of our Virgin Mary's.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweetest Amusement Of No-Talent Gravestones

Back in the embers,
The flowers are smoldering in their
Tins and lunch boxes:
The little girls are scalding, like a prepubescent
Disaster in a fairytale, hot coals populate
The slope of wilder fires,
What hasn't budded crinkles beforehand
And all of this is a mess. I can't go for Walks anymore.
She's so far away, it is true: Look at her
Kissing in long weekends of
Her professors: This is what I am doing,
Trying to prove myself when
I have no legs:
I live and perform in a sack and it doesn't matter that God is snow blind in his breathy neighborhoods
Of his highest tresses-
I can't sell my poetry, and I'm too far inland
To invest in fresh fruit,
But somewhere the palm trees are swaying;
They sound like all the same things I couldn't
Say,
Women with their friends and fierce dragons,
Fingertips and lips of ashes- They look good
And powerful and have received offers on their Sweet houses the sea is reclaiming anyways:
Naked women in junked cars invisible pockets full
Of cash and diamonds;
And this is another hangover for the weekend,
Getting down on one knee and proposing the natural
Empiricisms washing over her tender negligence;
It doesn't matter, in the morning all will be introduced
To invulnerable pumice,
With elegant walkways and parking attendants making Fifteen percent on the evangelical tourisms who Now abound in the old neighborhoods which happened
About that which was our sweet high school
Before the pornographic eruption graduated all that we Knew into the sweetest amusement of no-talent gravestones.

Robert Rorabeck

The Sweetest Songs Of The Innocent Cars

It happened that I loved without looking at myself in the Mirror,
Or I wasn't here: I had just driven home from Miami and I wanted
To bring Alma fireworks,
But maybe she doesn't love me anymore:
God knows she doesn't want any more flowers or poetry;
And she doesn't know who Octavio Paz is;
And I haven't finished Labyrinth of Solitude, which is just as bad:
And the sea is as yellow as cream,
And as the sun set it turns and grows so much custard that the gulls
Sleep in every caesuras as if they were soft mailboxes,
And the stewardesses stop their planes and come down and coo and Show their breasts: and they all become mothers who spend
Their soft and brown afternoons feeding their young in the flea markets
Underneath the open and soaring overpasses of the sweetest songs
Of the innocent cars.

Robert Rorabeck

The Swimming Skeleton Of The Singing Wind Chimes

Clouds in asphalt, in the graffiti of sweet things,
Swinging their hips to the store to buy roses for Themselves while the rain slings;
Oh, I've been singing out of school early again,
Watching the honeys picking up gas- I'm raggedy
In the brambles all my scars are browned bagged:
Every tender v is higher strung than I;
Oh, how sweet it is not to have to look one titted thing
In one venal eye; to enjoy the reasons of the gainfully
Unemployed- to fart in the litters of death's convoy-
The reptilian monarchy knows better words,
Ruling forever their flamingoes' soft conflagration,
The easy pantomime of frightening flight the housewives
Put to good use in their sororities satin-lined;
Areolas and suvs, runs in their pantyhose, gurgles from
The park swings; I drink whatever liquor I find stashed
Out back in the weeds beneath the clothes-line;
And I swing underneath the brindled palmettos-
I hook my arcs and curveballs far to the corner of where
The better girls have warmed to the infinitely better gentlemen,
Their children mewling like breast-fed kittens;
And I fart and tell jokes to shadows, my eyes ever present
To the swimming skeleton of the singing wind chimes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Swing Of Priestly Censers

Pretty though miss numbered, and taking itself away
At the arcs
To the swing of priestly censers- another genii's bottle
Opens and loses its senses to the Jasmines of the forest
As at first a steamboat passes by and then a
Brontosaurus:
And I say to the cursed day laborers up above
The tree lines in Colorado:
That this is my wedding, not my Mother's,
And the lion's mouth s yawning because
It is hungry underneath the comet's, so someone
Ought to feed it:
But, other than that- I am ugly and disfigured,
But so are the busts from the ancients
And the pre-Socratics who somehow found out whatever
They could whilst the water level of the Mississippi
Changed and changed,
And I crossed the train tracks and crawled up onto
Your roof
And gave your kisses just as with the helicopters or
I did just whatever I could.

Robert Rorabeck

The Swings Of My Kind But Embittering Enmity

I didn't touch her pubis:
There was no ceiling fan, and it happened
So fast,
It was like Easter never existed; but we certainly Dressed down to get up again;
And there was no sky that the airplanes couldn't Reach,
While both my muses were bemused elsewhere
And it wouldn't behoove them to read either of us,
How our bodies met softly like waves in
The ocean malls- They have known the ones;
They have skipped there on and off for days,
And the world has flooded up around us and carried
Us as soft as softball strangers
Nearer our graves in the first antechambers of morning,
Just before all the sadnesses of our faces can be read;
And she was doing this, she said, because she had to Grow up:
Jessica had to grow up with that tattoo on the nape of
Her neck;
She let me touch her above the tree line of our body's Juxtaposed exegesis, but she would have rather Been living with her mother and father;
And it was very sad, because I realized after that there
Was no chimney leading smoke up through the rains,
As if the passes had closed through the mountains;
Though I touched her sadly, she had never been my woman;
And she would awaken into a world far more beautiful
Than my own- Would that all my veins had let up to roses
To offer her lips this once;
As if I had been allowed to return to those freshman,
And played the truer part of Romeo for this once time muse,
This satin entity that carried likewise on through
Her night,
And not once remembered the swings of my kind but embittering
Enmity.

Robert Rorabeck

The Swingsets And The Clouds

When you really get this way,
Your belly gathers its feather weights: you remember
Pissing in your pants in Preschool,
And going out underneath the swingsets and the clouds
And putting your fingers into the eager dirt,
As if it was your own womb:
And building things,
Or kindergarten: while the blue gills swim in and out of Their own kingdoms that you can never explain:
For it is an entirely different world on the Other side of the canal,
Even though you can see the corrugations of trailer parks,
And the stop lights like the stain glassed windows
Of gas stations;
And maybe in the sky is the enormous silhouette
Of a wild stallions rising up as it gets ready to disappear:
But then you remember that your world is Right here:
That you went to college and have a book:
And that you kissed your muse's mouth today and made love
To her three times;
And even though she had to drive away again,
You will see her tomorrow and you may even be able to take
Her out to breakfast.

Robert Rorabeck

The Syllables Of The Heavens

Tables of really un-worked glory taking off
Their skates,
Beginning to see the glorifications of all of
The saints in
The ellipses of the open mouths of obscured lions-
The fireworks filibustering
To the grandeurs of dolphins, hurricanes,
And porpoises:
And this is true: for a little while a fire,
A fingerprint or a hoof print:
A chalk game over the cenotaphs- but mostly
The heartbeats of waves
That know no echoes, but who come repeatedly
Taking the shore repeatedly-
Making a new element of her geometry, so she Floats around in a gaseous nature, knowing new Scars as she does her laundry once more
In the glorified carports where the amphibians
Are making a chorus of her ankle-deep name,
As the rain storms come repeatedly,
Repeating the syllables of the heavens she cannot spell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tall Gentlemen Shading Briar Rabbit

What is Alice doing,
Thumbing her pink
When all the cars are driving to Pie Town?
She better hurry up,
And siphon out that gas,
Because the hay-days are coming:
Vroom! Vroom!
How will she ever get to the Emerald City
In those shoes?
Frank L. Baum never got to the fifteenth novel
Of Oz, but we forgive him,
Because he let us see the ruby heart beating in
The glass cat.
Now all the palm trees are swaying like flamingo
Dancers at the Ritz,
And my scars are tinsel on a Christmas tree,
Or the sawdust under the Cowboys' spurs riding bulls
In Gainesville until they get drunk,
And are thrown in the coolly overnight,
While the ghosts work in Detroit,
And each wave is ringing her doorbell,
Because they have brought the corsages for the prom,
But she is not home,
And still here they come, the cerulean cavalcade
In blue collars and coats,
The proletariat rowdy in their salt,
They've perfected the guillotine, and the pink
Mohawk,
And grandmother is clubbing the rattlesnakes behind
The plough,
Clubbing the rattlesnakes,
As we are taking the rum down river in the trunks of Our Hudsons, me and dad,
Who is also an ornithologist in the Phoenix desert
Where I've seen him standing as still as a hummingbird
All day between the columns of sequoias,
The tall gentlemen shading Briar Rabbit,
Watching his subject as perfectly as the bird is watching
Him, in a studious dream,

Which was how I concluded my novel today
A little after noon,
But will it ever be published? Will she ever know what It is to see a Utopia spoken by the feral tongue
Of an individual truism, for the first and last time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tallest Things Of All

Lowly pageantries in the tangles of a cypress forest
Combed down,
So silent maiden trees lie across the purring backs
Of the mountain lions
Sleeping with the narcoleptic lumberjacks—
Like words in a coil of sleep with other words,
Neither caring how they are spelled as their young
Are raised like orphans in other nests
And classrooms of a jigsaw puzzle all a tumble
At school—
Or your sweet young mother of wife, yawning before
She goes into the kitchen to fry up some eggs
And from her peripheral vision spies
The lonely séance of the starving Christmas tree:
Well then, the long lines of the legs of
The feline huntress will usher up to the very outlines
Of the canals,
And she will bask there in her sorority underneath
The mountains of the moon
Which they say for certain are the tallest things of all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tangles Of Water Moccasins

I am working in amongst the young trees
Dreaming of a fieldtrip of afternoons
As I sell them:
And I look up into what eyes of housewives there
Are
Backdropped by the pretty, lilac sun
In its primordial sport: there it is in its own
Fieldtrip across the blazing yard:
And down beneath him, along the mesh of Bucolic avenues, a housewife who was once
Maybe even my mother does her wash
In the grottos of a carport-
As the strangers steal the citrus from the tree
In the backyard,
And the young rabbits go down to play near
The canal in the silky moonlight in
The tangles of water moccasins.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tarnation Of Daffodils

They drew marmalade and ponies and they wondered
Out amidst the yards until they regretted that there wasn't
Any air-conditioning;
And the flies gathered around whispering like blue pig's
Ears,
Until they somehow stumbled upon the Mexican dance
Where beer was five dollars,
But the yard behind the place just kept turning green and
Greener- filled with strangely polished
Equipment and wheelbarrows; it was a good place,
They figured to cut some wood to build a cabin- and to lay
Seeds in the ground to make the garden grow;
And each by the other sang out loud, and grabbing each other
Where they could, swinging around in the tarnation of Daffodils trying to make even the wolves proud:
They did just that,
As the airplanes took noticed and landed from the sky all around
Them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Taste Of Your Bread

Tables of fruit and spilling wine-
Perpetually the debutant swoons, and someone
Is off in the woods in blue socks cheating death,
And we are either studying or selling trees,
While chanticleer is like a great man up on his roof,
Calling the pilgrims with his light;
And I have cut my wrists in the bathroom which has no
Shadows,
As even the water runs with light,
Runs like baseball players on diamond diamonds:
And you have dogs, I know,
And a sister, and a daughter who has your lips,
While Erin is serving drinks to men she doesn't know,
Who crowd around her perfumes,
Like opals on salt lick:
I told her how wounded I was, and she pretended to care;
But if she saw me, she wouldn't care that I
Was no longer writing my greater proportion of songs
About her auburn ships:
She just wouldn't care. She watches cartoons anyways,
And looks at the waves on the television.
So many boys have told her that she was beautiful,
That she no longer has the space for adolescence,
But loves the store fashioned muscle of otherwise weak men,
Who don't really know how to enter her
Otherwise, with their eyes, or with their pricks,
Or with their flash in the pan souls which leap from woman to Woman as easy as they can,
Like little boys with pinwheels eating meat and cheese
As the stomp the puddles my greater buses have bled from Mortal wounds,
Circling you like buzzards who no longer have the taste
Of your bread.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tattoo That I Wish That I Had

Another motor at the ribs not filling
Up,
Coiling in the cessation of the gullies
And the trampolines:
This is a cul-de-sac anyways:
And while I am here, is anyone
Selling ice-cream:
Oh well, I have been up and down her melting,
While selling ice-cream.
And her children have come,
Like crazy fireworks,
Buy two get one free, and eaten from the strange
Reservoir of my hand:
Or they have gotten up again only to lie
Down and enjoy the shade immediately,
I guess,
Of their most immediate place in the
Hemisphere,
The waves leaping over what we have made,
In the business
Of the children who lay here, freckled,
Like tombstones in the shade,
Underneath all of the trees who go weeping,
But joyfully, as if they were introduced
Into parks,
As the ant-lions promenade- what homes of Adobe exist anymore, and what do I have left to Go back home to,
As she lies nude and with him, relaxing with
The shade, as the waves leap and drown hungrily
Against her-
As the hummingbirds drink sangria-
And she remains the tattoo that I wish that I had.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tattoos Of Angels

Roe in the lost chalices- in the cul-de-sacs
Of suburbia where Halloween has come and gone,
And the truants fart like knights lost from
Their errands-
Looming on swaybacked sofas and lighting
Off roman candles over the canals where the insouciant
Alligators yawn,
Over fed of cats and armadillos- as the busses return
Torpide as if through a housewife's pieta:
There she leans her bosom over the dishes-
Her wine glasses glint like an entire ruby city in the Same hypnosis she knows that she is in;
The night blooming jasmine perfuming outside her
Window, a odor only the Mexican lawn-boy
Smells,
Leftover there for too much liquor and cards-
Splaying shirtless- cicadas shedding in his nipples,
The lightning revealing a zoetrope across his abdomen-
His shoulders display the tattoos of angels
And girls he left behind across so many yards
As he leapt wishing across the borders into places
He knew he could never belong.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tear That Never Fell

As a humanity, we all try to get up above the rest:
Piling out substrata of delta-ing ladders towards the shoe polish
Of the next billboards:
And climbing up past the athletes of baseball games, or Taking our winding buses to the shallows of fortunate and fame:
We seem to see each others' bodies a wreathed in flame;
And the green parks do no good,
And the day laborers of orchards do no good- nor do the copper
Cannons who are above our reach on the old Spanish forts:
Nor do windmills, anymore:
And the horses with their knights just stop and lounge in the pine forests
With the old couches and their hobos:
And nothing truly makes love anymore- or a sound: not even the wind
Is good for listening- and all moves deathly quiet over ground:
And the roses have no smell planted over the murdered working
Girls whose names I cannot spell;
And it or we all go lumbering, gargantuan, as mute as a stone or
The tear that never fell.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tearduct's Metamorphosis

Young had by young
When they had their children: dreaming as if they Lived beside the pool,
When they did not need to have any of this:
All of their roman candles were blue,
But unspecific: and they joined the crowds on their Holidays,
But did not have the capacity to look up at the clouds:
There spores of other wishes turned around:
Yes, narcoleptic Ferris-wheels—
Movie theatres for the blind in the blinding daylight
The airplanes cut through—
Bubbling wishes through the broiling nimbus:
Spume of that recalcitrant garden:
Alms for thirty year old tears shed by Jesus Christ
Still swimming up there—
Yet to be collected by the tearduct's metamorphosis:
Do backstrokes as they multiplied beneath that cathedral—
Children that rode on merry-go-rounds that didn't Have to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tears Of A Juvenile God

Veins of cold rivers burying over the vanished
Gold of young princes
Always on a journey up her shoulders:
Even above the trees
Is where the stewardesses and pilots
Have tea parties:
Where the lightning speaks five languages,
And the bears hold back from the Parks of the gods:
I remember seeing them so far ago- worlds
Intermingled like dead bodies
Caressing in the melting snow-
A jumble of a bouquet with a nocturnal
Perfumes which highlights the veins
In the stones that curse the scars of
Their mothers: maybe they fell from the moon a long
Time ago,
And now they lie here in a masquerade
Of petrified vampires, waiting for the sweat
Off of some lonely hiker's feet to fall upon them,
To touch them like the tears of a juvenile god.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tears Of A Vanishing Valentine

Trying halfway in the shadows,
I promise everyone a passing grade—polishing off the Glass, feeling her naked shadow in the glade
Down the soft rolling hill, like a fairytale sliding off the University—
Struggling up to her nuptials like a hungry whippersnapper—
Licking the grease off her fingers—
Wanting to make love to her in a bed in the most circumspect
Hotel in Saint Augustine—and wake up in the middle of That blue dream, to go down to the water and bend
My lips to a mermaid who I've paid to awaken there—
Pearls anemones around her belly—
Lounging in a caesura of one particular wave—baby blue
And sea blue—cerulean blue—and sky blue—
And the blue of the tears of a vanishing valentine.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tears Of The Rain

Demanding a theft in the shadows, the angels dive
Perpetually—collecting oxygen and gravity in Their mouths,
Trying to concoct a loving substance that brings death,
Like concrete and honey,
So the bumble bees are disappearing from
The orchards,
And the roses from the valentines—
Each earthquake makes us lesser yet nearer to her,
And though we are going,
In her graveyard it rains—
And rockets take off:
They only make it across the canal, but at least
They are not killing anyone—
Paper airplanes that make love to bottle rockets—
As latchkeys, virginal, kiss the rains—
Roses and oranges disappearing behind the house,
As in the heavenly churches sometimes—
God's tears that are not a part of us—
They are reserved for the blessed stars
And we are down here locked into the cars
As the memory of the stars over the empty houses
Bring the tears of the rains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tears She Sheds For Me

Alma's man carries good witchcraft like a saber-
His weapon haunts my wounds for a little while
As I die,
As the numbers of airplanes fly and then vanish in the sky:
Her uncle, leaving for Mexico,
Says that I can never have her as long as he has her:
And I can pay $1,000 dollars for good
Witchcraft;
But I have Alma anyways- and all of these good scars,
The ocean crafts of loneliness,
The iconoclast arachnids in my veins- and words that I cannot know, singing to her over the sky:
I empty my bow- my love descends into an empty fire:
And I swear to her as a disappear that the entire Sea is afire, burning with the tears she sheds of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Teary Eyed Pietas

Tired of the arboretum,
The butterflies disperse with the tourists or,
At least,
The stewardesses:
They can fly over the oceans with them—
They can go almost anywhere
There are ancient pyramids—and the lonely
Battles rage right underneath them in the Carports of the teary eyed Pietas:
But it doesn't have to be beautiful—
It doesn't have to be a place at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Technicolor Of All Of The Saturdays

In the Technicolor of all of the Saturdays of your Dungeons,
I want to enfold you in the crypts of my butterfliesâ€&quot;;
Suffocate you in the corals
Of the jubilancy in a paradeâ€&quot;;
And give off all of the advocacies of a tightrope of Sunshine:
This is the everything I have always endeavored
To makeâ€&quot;;
And I'll keep winding around your memory like a bright
Coil discovered by another scientistâ€&quot;;
Celebrating underneath the candelabrum of your Grottosâ€&quot;;until we can see for yourselves the Jubilant shipwrecks of our highest memoriesâ€&quot;;
When your lips kissed me like matches striking around
The phalanxes of the peaceful armies
I hope we can help each other to create.

Robert Rorabeck

The Teeth Of A Matador

Maybe they loved each other because they all seemed Beautiful and so they went together to festivals near the coral lips of
The sea;
And I did not know who performed there, because I was too busy
Singing in my sleep;
But maybe it was because I was not so beautiful, or that I frightened
Them in other ways,
That I was not invited, and I lost all of my friends as white as the Summertime snow,
But found new lovers in the hibiscus and roses of baseball diamonds,
Blushing with no profession,
And hardly any clothes: They all loved the Virgin of Guadalupe,
And Romero even stopped drinking for three years when, kneeling Beneath her imagine, she told him that he could,
And now my house is warmed from all of this Spanish liquor,
Something to keep the sailors alive instead of going down
Into the cold blue fires;
And I have it right here, the kindling of my words- Even if I will Never have my muse of muses,
While the other lights seem to know my names, it doesn't seem to Matter at all if everyone from that ever greened high school,
Like friends whistling together like candles in the boughs,
Should remember me;
I have met my own soul as red as the daylight that cuts birthdays across
The prows of fearless ships, and she is like a rose bared
Between the teeth of a matador:
Even if she doesn't love me, she knows my name.

Robert Rorabeck

The Televisions And The Christmas Trees

Down to the slow plagiarisms—after the cats get tired
Playing with their mice and visa-versa—
Down to the open mouthed mailboxes of crepuscule—
And the last tags of the fire around the dance—
In the troubling diction that is muted by dinner,
When all of the spent fireworks lie in the grasses—
And housewives go back to pretending to be someone else—
It is the time when the diamonds drink the sea,
And the toy dogs come indoors to bask beneath the strange visions
Of the televisions and the Christmas trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tents Of Fireworks

Oh sunlight of this place clouded into a labyrinth where Inebriated dogs go to drown in the rose thorns grown
Across the pietas made by the armpits of dead prostitutes—
When all of the eons proceed in their shopping sprees
Of calcifying ellipses—leaving the best of their loveliest men
Calcified in the monuments that have no heroes—
And I am left alone—simplified, beautiful even while Burned by the scars of an abandoned playground—
And as you flee, your feet never touch the earth—you become Thirty feet into the air— and so much like an angel
Above the tents of fireworks that I can no longer wonder
What to think of you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Termination Of This Home

Face mottled like an old penny,
A yellowed nursery rhyme she used to love,
I masticate on imbedded wisdom teeth,
Recall the roadside pornography of the Indian
Hotel I slept in one night in Tallahassee,
On the wayside of the fall:
I remember barely standing the reflecting, the Spread puddles of commuting wheels-
How I was halfway home to sell fireworks in
A condemned building beneath the palm trees,
Placed in a game board of tennis courts,
Doctors, lawyers, and dentists offices: How I was Becoming more like nothing, spreading out the Vantages of the harrowing oblique patrons to Long-legged malls, to gas-stations, and too it all:
I think now that I could never escape,
But here I am running on the prisms of an oil-slick, Quilling down another line of poison for the Thrill of the barley mermaid, schlepping through the foams,
Half-drunk on stinky biceps, hiccupping through the loams;
And now I've gone and destroyed the rhyme scheme,
Because she does not read these poems: And I am Fed up, and I full of cornpone, but it has become beautiful to Me the exegesis beside the lathered street, behind the wrought-
Iron grate, the woebegone hound gets stuck,
But I set him free, and the trees whisper to the dead, and
They bow down and sooth their marble head;
And it is such a beautiful, beautiful thing to rest alongside
The creatures known to the earth, whom have become the Past participle to the living, the corruption of the passing form,
The termination of this home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Territories

Caught up in the singing oasis- and everybody looking
For a friend,
As hearts are stolen over the weekend, only to Be sold and sold again:
Words in the dictionary swimming in the shallowness of Our senses-
As lights of a juvenile sun bleed over the surreal
Extremity of our forests:
And this is the only kind of art that I know,
Pillaging the kindness from the senses-
As hooves dance across the rodeo,
Until we see that our cousins are migrating- happening to Tell a story across the land:
First they pack up the fair in a lightning storm,
And then they recede across the Christmas trees and teepees
OF another fort made for trouble-
But they light out for the territories too far to be Believed, and the rest of it I cannot explain.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thickets Of The Alligators

Minnow—dance underneath the eclipse
Of a palm:
Play above the orchards of stolen bicycles—
How you will change for your honey moon—
Silverish rod in the shallows
Down the burry easement of her fancy:
Paper airplanes flying over you—burning,
Burning,
Trying to make across the thickets of Alligators before they are proven to be unreal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thieveries Of Moonlight

Nooses of sky over green pepper fields-
A grandfather and a granddaughter attending,
The coral snakes under hooves of loose thoughts drifting
Away like stolen bicycles,
Or muses that don't reorganize themselves anymore- words that feel
A money changer's scale provide no intercourse for
The senseless at heart,
As the mother I once knew waits in doors, the cicadas
Waiting in their changing rooms of trees
With the schools closed down and the selkies lay
With the fallen oranges molding beneath the trees:
I thought I saw your eyes once, I thought I saw them looking Away while my guardian angel evaporated with the Burning lighthouses kneeling in the senseless day-
With my wonderful mother underneath the roof,
The thieveries of moonlight stealing all that she was away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thing That No One Saw

I chose to become the thing that no one saw.
I went to Hollywood not to aspire to act,
But to play in wrecked train cars that rust like
Flowers in the dry yellow knee-high grass,
Before blowing all my money at once
To return after two weeks to sleep in Arizona.

The last thing I was in high school, which Wasn't for very long and even then I preferred
The muddied easement beside the canal
Where only I and the animals moved,
Where I could use shadows for friends.
I went to school every other week,
And kissed and fondled invisible women
In the low subtle branches of the tart orange trees.

For the past year, I have only made love to mountains,
And those less and less frequent. Soon they too will Forget the feel of my weight upon them. I no longer even pretend
To be with women, for their ghosts haunt me and live Inside little castles in my bones. They cry out to me in The lonely night, asking me to enter them, but I withdraw
And can only look at them, like fading abstract art,
As their beds slide further away,
Like train cars leaving my side.

Sometimes I see my Grandfather staring worriedly at me from the other room
Before he shuts the door,
But I never go to visit him or my dead grandmother
Upon the hill. Instead I drive to a far away town
And pretended to buy a house, something little in a cul-de-sac,
Where my father can't bother me, and my friends would Be very poor and infrequent; we would live in little lives,
All together forgotten, but I return to Nutrioso
After a couple of hours, exhausted and breathing mist.
Dutifully, I feed the mob of horses, assured that I am no one.
Needing to be close to someone for a few minutes, I microwave
Grandfather dinner and he says a prayer.

When my family knew me, they worried for my future,
But now they don't remember that I was once their son.
Nor can she remember, the nocturnal flower who blossoms
In my sleeping mind, how my hips poked her as we made love,
Because her life is always moving forward,
Perpetually being filled with the gears of her friends and Welcomed strangers, as I am deluded by the darkening night of
So many passing years, as melting ice-cubes cheapen
Good whiskey, and when she cries out his name in that Secret hour of the cat, she no longer worries that she might Speak to me instead. For she is sure I never was, just
The shadow of a thing she thought she once saw, before
She fired her gun and then stepped forward.

Robert Rorabeck

The Things I So Often Say

I read my own words like looking
At myself in the mirror.
When I blur, I am beautiful,
And have important things to say.
I stand on the green carpet of my Old house in Loxahatchee, and Catch the garter my uncle flings
Behind his head: I will never marry,
But she will continue to wake up sweating,
Remembering the red Super 88 I used
To drive in and out of the sea,
How I sucker-punched the kid in the Parking lot and then went on to kiss his Bruised lips while the telepathic cheerleaders
Watched. Outside, snow crystals
Fall uniquely on the street lamps:
They have just discovered electricity,
And men come down from the mines and get
Drunk beneath the room I am renting,
Their laughter comes especially on the weekends,
When they present the whores who weary
Filly purple, like lavender, the geodes which
Are worthless but beautiful when opened
And shown for the world to see like a wound.
They dance beneath me, as moths are drawn
To lights: encased in glass, they can no longer
Die honorably, but I catch them when they Tire, and hold them to my lips
And kiss them as if they were my own children,
Telling them the things I so often say.

Robert Rorabeck

The Things Like Swans

Grandmothers in the quicksand of unison:
The marble houses rise and rise triumphantly, but into the Service of exorbitant taxation:
And the marvels of the world take up, and seem to last Forever, leggy, heavily banded and too high to be Reached to be petted,
But away from view, exhausted, won't they have to come
Down to refuel or to at least lick their wounds:
And then the trumpets will sound all as sudden like
The glorious savages naked in the junked pornographies
Of wheelless cars in the woods,
And then they will all come running to beat down the things
Like swans,
Just so that they can be sure that there is nothing left
That is beautiful enough to leave them again.

Robert Rorabeck

The Things We Experienced Together, So Far Apart

Remembering as a child
Silver on the tree, and the furrows of
My grandfather's bell pepper field,
Molesting and being molested by
My two year older aunt:
Corn snakes and rat snakes and black snakes
And red snakes;
And root beer- an entire armada of paper airplanes,
Most of them male dog fighting for the sexy
Female airplane- Hot Lips,
And Hot wheels,
Plastic Indians on green carpet fields:
Shooting Michelle in the tits with rubber bands one summer
Evening a few hours before true crepuscule;
And alligators that never moved-
Never, ever moved- and maybe Peter Pan,
And my true love hanging upside down
From the crook of a cypress tree:
Showing off her training bra, never kissing me with
A tongue as red as an air-plant's pistil:
And then, finally, leaping over construction fires,
Shooting off my mouth,
Raiding liquor cabinets in seventh period instead of Attending history;
And finally going on with all of it, down my ever branching
Avenue- never seeing love again- never turning back,
Or having her look up again amidst the gum-clogged desks
Of Latin class,
Forgetting who I was and how comets skipped across
The rippling sugar canes,
Estranged, out of work amidst the ceaseless cars:
Needing you after a decade's absence, the things we experienced
Together, so far apart.

Robert Rorabeck

The Things You Loved

I click off the men you love,
While the coyote howls after a good meal,
And after having bitten the flea bitten nape of his Mate's starving neck,
Collapses beside the wreck of an exploded car
Down in the staunch valley heading most of the Way to Phoenix-
He farts with the immaculate grandness of nary
A soul,
As two brothers get together and make love:
They don't care nothing about the moon,
Its stages of wild romance, like a fat scuppernong on A chain-link, and maybe you'll come to Realize this, and
That I am not so far away, but I don't even think you can Read,
And yet I go so far as to make fire dance in the sky,
And bring constellations more tighter together to look
Like our old school bus,
And the ways you've forgotten like the water fountains
Like the tobacco stained oasis along the bleached hallways of
The things you loved.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thorns

Pulling the trucks to your grotto: Sharon,
Wont you look at our flags: We've sewn them ourselves
Out all night above our grandmothers'
Graves;
And we peel out to you, muse of milk and pearled enclaves
Where we have found you running down
Like the surcease of roe
Down from this America of salmon, and we saw you
Like a candle held in mass outside of the Alamo;
And you went away like a mariposa in the wind,
Searching for tiles to do your house in
Mexico;
And the night was in green shades interspersed by rivers;
And you made love to gaunt young cowboys
Amidst those perfect easements while we flew above you
Whispering on tin-can star ships:
There you were floating in a sea mist of pagan dreams:
We saw you floating up the intercourse's fine young being;
Where you left us thatched to go and rejoin your Unliving king;
You slipped beneath him, beneath the bend in the river,
Beneath the candle's hooded flame;
And your shift was doused by earth, and so you once Again became this night's most impossible being,
And we worshiped you where we can only lay above you
Our wings tired and torn as if from pages of a living book
Thrust out of its charms,
Hyperventilating and being beaten down like beautiful
Weeds amidst the thorns above your wedded grave.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thorns Of Hemophilia

Once again from the Pacific Theatre,
You went home from school-
In the Phoenix desert, summarily dusted by Haboobs-
In the stain glass of rattlesnakes, like a homeless
Kaleidoscope, hide your eyes:
In this pigeon carriage galloping beneath
The speechless skies:
And if you happen to see the monuments, open up
The windows where I've remembered you:
Remember my lines I gave to you before
I was leaping over canals and skipping schools:
My good words lining up to die like tinker toys
For you in a room underneath a perpetual
Ceiling fan- in that childhood that grew up
Believing in you- and found you in the occult
Romances bled from the thorns of Hemophilia.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thorns Of That Rose

Wreathed in a shipwreck beside the glorious holds
Of the old fort,
With tourists coming around, openchested- pullulating an Orchestra
And buying icecream:
While down in the sand dunes slathered by the sun,
The misspelled novels that will never sell
Worried over by the rose thorns who also cover up
The dead working girl who will Go nameless,
As the conquistadors who birthed her into the loins of the Indian princesses:
Or how you made love here underneath the aloes of any Resorts: how you rubbed your
Wounds,
And looked at the angels in the lees of their angles,
And fell to your knees and prayed-
And when it rained, and the world turned black,
And the olive leaves giggled, and
The planes drew flat-
How the spaces lingered on or folded up and went home
And made love inside houses where the ghosts spoke like the Sea's pestilent foam:
And the Cyclops of a lighthouse was blinded by rays-
And you sat up on the edge of the terra plane and cursed her for Days- until the sunset came down, and the curtains
Drew closed, and the lips bled red
From the thorns of that rose.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thoughts I Suppose I Could Never Understand

It seems for awhile as if I'm Coalesced- that I am in love,
But continually scarred:
My love,
I will have to go to school tomorrow,
And maybe the cemeteries will have to flood,
But maybe you will have to like
Me forever:
Maybe you don't know a thing except for
The sun always arises as
The fireworks always extinguishes within
The boundaries of the yards
Of housewives which I suppose eventually Mean well:
But, my love, you are not quite listening to
Be;
But, my love, I suppose as well:
That is not quite hell: though I love you,
Like a sacred
Dressing room giving of its perfumes
To the lips of werewolves-
This is just another thing I never discovered,
Breathed from the fornications of
The roses-
And it is very uncomfortable for the modest
Heroes to continue onwards-
As it is, for awhile- just as strange to venture
Forward, serving only the bosoms
Of you love in a playground that never existed-
While the blue gills look up through
The shallows, giving off the penumbras of
The thoughts I suppose I could never understand.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thoughts Of Idiots

Tell me you love me, even if I hate you:
Even if you are my most imperfect muse; and yet my muse,
Because I make love to you,
Underneath the light bulbs of the candle wicks and the Ferris
Wheels, while nothing else endearing has to move,
While the lions have to roar,
And each of the most beautiful girls in the sorority has to Touch themselves,
Before almost immediately they must get married and move away:
As the clouds do every day, over the graveyards,
The junked cars, and the pornographies of my childhood;
As if there was entirely another world across the canal
That they will be building up anyways; and I don't Understand the politics of this hullabaloo:
I was best when I was four years old, a wire in my jaw
From slipping on the interstate, my pants wet from daycare,
My sister crying for me, and my mother reading me the folklores
Of my first obsessions through all the better parts of the Premier afternoons that I wish that I could remember:
The cars rolling on, and fieldtrips to wedding parties of topless
Women, and grottos where the ceiling fans purr;
And her hands on my shoulder blades like the sunlight of angels
Weighing me down in a wishing well,
Making me hold my breath until I could arise baptized into
An entirely different situation where her mouth kissed my blessing,
Hiding me by dimming light of the parks that knew my childhood,
As the alligators knew the thoughts of idiots
In whose parades, Alma, we continue to kiss and make love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thoughts You Have Never Thought To Know

You have that much money to die
Easily in the civil wars of Spain, right at the Spot where I got my scars,
Where I left off and became alone, and didn't Worry about becoming popular;
And now I just look out my windows waiting for The cloud to come over the virgins in the Shape of the grim reaper,
So that you can have me rung awakened from your Dinner of green lobsters;
And finishing, I suppose I was never made;
And I was shot dead today all alone in a park in Lake Worth crowded with African Americans and Latinos where one time more than a baker's dozen of Years ago, I saw Kelly at the renaissance festival with
The alligators and platinum larks;
And I went with the girl I lived with and became a Scholar with,
And now she is just beneath me, married on a more
Salient hemisphere;
And love is slowing me down; so you could catch me
At last, if you weren't indeed married
And happier in Colorado; and it is very strange and Dreamy becoming your friend;
And I am not beautiful, and yet I am not betrayed by Your perfectly still beauty; and I cast you
In the overcast carports of my youth, in things you will Never experience, across the street from the cenotaph of My conquistadors and classical pornographies;
And, Sharon, don't I love you;
But I am very strange, indeed; and I am not very easily loved,
But I very easily bleed;
And in my pale wounds lie the almost colorless desire
To be nourished and sustained by the thoughts
You have never thought to know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thousands Of Confections

Kidnappings in the flickerings of the spin thrift features
While they all get up, cartoonish and busy-eyed
And the daylight peels and hides for and until
A thousand afternoons keeping
The most beautiful girls concealed away into the afternoon's
Rainstorms of all of their bedrooms—
This is how it is concealed and how it pans out:
Beautiful upon beautiful echo—homeless and without
The day waiting for the night of the stars-
Beautiful in all of her telepathy just waiting for her to Cry—
As the eyes of wolves and crocodiles pan across all of
The ballrooms of the amusements of rollercoasters
Until they touch their own wetness to the Venoms,
And the earth spins around and around in all of the Thousands of confections
Of its excitable convictions.

Robert Rorabeck

The Three Bears

There I am-
Again, a child in a playground of
Kindergarten,
Remembering Christmas the same way I will
Also remember
My first masturbation-
On the green rug, stripped forever,
Underneath the stewardesses,
A latchkey looking for Certain housewives- as all of suburbia
Nods off in a trance of Pitiful flowers,
Until new avenues glow underneath the Sleep of their eyes-
And for awhile,
Crimson estuaries between their legs
Like midnight churches burning the slender
Rookies that also must Bring their children to them
From the fire houses where the faeries live:
And if you looked into her eyes,
I know that you'd have to agree,
That they were not there too long ago,
Because the cinders are yet
Smoldering,
And goldilocks is upstairs sleeping in bed
Even as the three bears are finally arriving home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Threshold Of A Vastly Apathetic World

Bag of rum at my hip,
Shaded and sheathed by the palmettos
Who are always over joyous to have survived the frost;
And somewhere just above my head the stewardesses
Are floating and serving overpriced drinks to
Their really lost boys;
And it almost feels like a household above my head,
On a heavy line of string something ancient pulls from
The waves;
And there is a motor purring softly in the deeply un-absolved
Trenches, which are like a woman's legs,
Or like my mothers:
She has given up swimming and evolved and just lies
There now with some tremendous blow-hole waiting for him;
And the sky is like the absurd possibility of overpriced
Fruit,
And it all seems to be hanging there waiting for him to come
Home,
And to hold the chalice of her body like rain across the threshold
Of a vastly apathetic world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Thunderbirds Of Winos

Metallurgy of camel dung,
I hold court in unmowed fields-
I soliloquy the broken glass of
The thunderbirds of winos.
Sitting down to lie, I eat bologna
And mayonnaise,
I make love to apple snails.
This is how I've done it, to settle the games
Of beauty before afternoon gets too late
Even while forgetting those better lines.
Where there are no trees to shade the podium,
Young virgins pop and fizz
While I break the wings of a dove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tidal Sea

Unseen, yet to be caught by Any god, the children play in the Gurgling streams which don't know
Any exact language;
Like infants they flow down
From the mountain's womb
To gather and sleep in the early lakes
Where young lovers neck in the Willows' bowers,
And ladies with delicate parasols
Row out to feed the swans
Who gather like parenthesis
Encapsulating the baby-blue skiff;
Though further down where the Adolescent rapids rebel and spit
On the rocks they trounce upon,
Where wayward suicides swing
In the spray,
The white bears' paws like spears
Drag the floundering life out
From the shallow misuse,
And wolves attack the bloated
Carcasses of buck and doe,
Only to fall away again into Gentler, wizening cataracts
Revealing the silver and buckskins
Of lost explorers many years ago-
This fans out like a grandmother's
Hand upon her offspring,
The seepage of a gathering life,
A great wound of everglades
Which tiptoes through high grass
And disappears into the tidal sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tide's Au'Vior

A viper bit me in the throat,
He said he love me but he don't. Now
Here so close to the ground the sky is twirling,
Twirling mad around; and birds, who are little girls
Up to their knees, preening in the crooks of sad,
Sad trees;
And I don't know anymore about what I've done;
My entire family is out of state and on the lamb- When we Used to sell so many things, produce to living souls and Tourists as naked as bed sheets billowing under the sun:
Every day, I suppose, every day until now used
To lead up to a girl, as a mailman to the door. How many Countless times I've watched her smile, like an afternoon
Of game shows just in lingerie, dripping smoke and oil;
But 'taint no more, that's for sure- She gone and flip'n
Metamorphosed into a heron, long and leggy, and in the marsh
She born a baby, an infant of a crocodile, so teal and lanky
And feral smiled;
And now he trills and bites her bosom, just a diadem I am sure,
Just a sparkling hallucination drooling in the tide's au'voir-
There is the last thing the sun proclaims on, the bosom upon
Which he casts his rays on- Then blushing like a mailman,
Or a dusky raconteur, he shuts the door behind him and whistling like a
Day-gone fireman leaves her until tomorrow, and the shadows fill
With my sorrow, but the waves proceed to touch her,
For their shadows tend to rush her: just her, her child, and her letters,
Going into the deeper, more rooted fetters,
So all night long in her dreams moaning premonitions, her jaw unhinges
Like a music box to the lunar conditions, and she sways with a Somnambulist's insouciant precision; or at least this is how I think to Find her, lying out beneath her weather, just a boy in heath and heather;
Or like a gardener with his sprinkler would like to find his flower
Garden and so to tend her, watering her with his spigot, and handling
His trough, and digging her with it; but she has already sent the Pigeons each strapped with her penultimate conditions,
That she has stopped thinking of me; in fact her thoughts have utterly Transcended, and to have ever considered she's resented;
But how the pigeons are lazy messengers, and I feed them cheese
And crackers, just so that they will fail to mention that I am weeping

There beneath her window, listening to her scribble innuendos,
To more fine and frisky fellows, boys who live in grand old castles
Instead of weeping there on her very floor;
But come sunlight I'll have won her, and tease, and squeeze and Fun her, because I'll have donned all the lucent wonder she could Have never much imagined it before:
But it's true that the child, yet so tailed, toothy, and so wild,
I will make him meek and mild, and she will love me sure.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tidiest Of The Most Surreals

Graveyards are beautiful at any time of the day while More beautiful people are enthralled with making love to One another;
And this is the free sport that no one else cares about,
As I grow fat listening in my little coves at the world
So airing above my throat:
I am like the amphibian ululating for his stewardesses;
And all of this can be trusted,
Because it is just as thoughtless as gambling;
As the fish come gurgling in the lines of their bright-eyed
Nurseries into the open air,
As I have things to tell myself when no one else cares;
And I have been to the lips of mountains,
And I have seen by which passions the highways so encoil,
That the wildernesses are minted:
I have received the frostbitten lips into my ankle,
As I have loved a married woman, who is both strange and Sincere;
And she is my muse, buying new t-shirts to cover her aching
Breasts to which I wish to afford more children to cause
To leak of life's milky suckle;
And the world lights up as in a stage of ill-report; and the Ships melt into their docks, the sailors dreaming of girls and Mermaids I am sure never existed except for in my bedroom
Under the ceiling fans churning like milkmaids,
Open-breasted and yodeling like Julie Andrews in the coffins
Of the tidiest of the most surreals.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tightening Cul-De-Sacs Of Good Times

Times of make-believe are really here, and the kissing games:
The mountains who have no clothes on rise up stark naked
From the planes
Except for the garlanding of the open throats of Echnopsis
And the diademing of crashed aero-planes:
The Mephistopheles haunts of abandoned minds, into which
The canaries sang their little skull,
Like the yellow harvest of a fruitless picking time:
The miners and their boys up to their unshaven throats in those Grottos
Making peace with their makers: the clouds evaporating
Across the still born papers of butterflies:
While down there in the unplanted basins, the homeopathic
Cities spun through by the working girls
And all of them kissing in the tightening cul-de-sacs of Good times.

Robert Rorabeck

The Time In The World

So many lives given over to benediction,
Many amputees pressing young lipped over the soda
Fountains,
And the forts rise up clapping for fireworks,
Walls of coquina and rum, with tongues of sundials pulled
From the sea hoary cliffs perpetually
For young lovers as gifts who just didn't care
Stone flower clocks
Broken promises that cannot be Indian given;
But I still love the Orpheus sun of underground heaven:
What you keep like pies under the sheets, when you wake up
And the tide has you enraptured within its briny monopoly,
And you can come out and yawn like a growing cross:
You can toss your hands up and love, Erin, toss your hands up
And love because the world is still ungodly perfect for you.
You have a new car and all the roads,
Swift amusement to the sea you can walk upon anyways
With the sun going down. The mailboxes are panting and I miss
My dogs, and we really miss you under the thumbs of pestilent
Stars, the science of their exhaling space:
They are always good at the perpetual chase; you know what it
Is good for, your foot on pure silver dispelling curses.
You never have to go to the library to find the immortality of my Love, for it is forever happening perpetually on you
Like hungry magnets to your dense mercury curved to perfection
And given all the time in the world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Time Of The End Of Its Day

Eat and run from my scars,
Two hot dogs for a dollar; sit out and lunch
And watch all the beautiful cars,
Thinking of the graveyards too affluent to attend,
And just as assured of the sky that she'll
Return: Liking her better than Jesus, rug burns;
There is a pit to her nature where she can be replanted,
And I've stolen such blue prints to this accord.
In the sky there is some kind of dashing rum hoodlum
Doing tricks, I think they've called him the son-
Every girl is in love with him, and they climb pear trees
And superstitious novels to unbutton and bask in His well-lit offices;
He jury-rigs the top masts of airplanes, he licks his Spindles of light, magnifies conflagrations,
Puts truly young boys' kites to flight:
And I've spend the second half of my time filibustering
About him, even as he is running away:
And upstairs its time to make dinner, the coyotes wake
Up and make love from the lips of trash heaps and flames;
It looks to me that her lip is bleeding, but that's just the Color the earth takes at the time of the end of its day.

Robert Rorabeck

The Time To Recognize Your Glorious Senses

It is sad that she loves her husband,
The only thing who is her light, and checkmates her
King;
And the city rides beneath them, and there is Plenty of empty parking,
Like burnished crèches to place their daughter in,
Underneath the eye lashes of the moon and its Silver satellites airplanes like tree frogs leaping;
And it hurts to know that she has all of this,
The simple minded bliss of a tea party,
Has Alice;
And the wind wakes up all of a sudden and curls around
Her like a snake who is a kitten;
And the light peels all the way down in a cornucopia
Of naked music:
Like it does for holidays and boys who can fly who
Are always played by girls.
She doesn't know what I should be now- That I am one of Them, that I am a real boy, beautifully contaminated:
Sharon,
I have earned my wings, but they are wet with the oils you
Spilled laughing into the bastion of tubs,
The ambergris of planets you choked under water, under Stream that you love as deep as your husband
Who knows as little as love as the element of fighter pilots
Moving so slick over the jungle that they can't even stop
For a moment to fathom the unmolested beauty
Where the natives live,
Where the orange flowers grow as if from the lips of Green-horned skyscrapers;
And now my lips smell like gasoline, but I am still the only
One who can take the time to recognize your glorious senses.

Robert Rorabeck

The Times That We Made Love

I don't want to have to fight you for
The nice color of your eyes: the ants will have it anyways,
And take it to their queen as a nice surprise
Underneath the roller rinks of the downed stewardesses
Thighs,
While the sun will come up and roll around like a marble
In a preschool's game,
Over the avenues of yesterday when I hardly knew my Mother, but could remember her name
And called out to her in the playgrounds of my fear
Where the horses have been so unlucky as to flounder,
Even if it was their own illusions, the ablutions of hummingbirds
Can also be considered to hardly be real,
And yet they come counting numbers and gossiping, Alma,
About the times that we made love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Times When She Was Still In High School

Housewives laughing in their houses
While the alligators say nothing,
But they are happy:
They are in her pretty yards anyways-
And they remember her
How she was
When she was very young- and yet
A metamorphosis,
From cheerleader to stewardess:
And they don't have to look far up
To see her:
Sometimes she swims naked in her pool
Like diamonds,
And the refractions in the water break her
Apart into the twins of her
Sorority:
Into a kaleidoscope of captured memories,
Of the times when she was still in High school- and very young-
And the alligators already knew everything
About what she would inevitably become.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tinsel Upon A Sunday Morning Christmas Tree

How many times will you keep calling
The same horses home,
Waiting for some unrecognized god to Identify you, to swing his Flaming sword as a christening over
Your rusty plough—
After the automatons have stopped
In their holidays of religious love,
And all of the nocturnal animals
Are wide awake at the zoo—
And there seems to be some celestial
Beauty melting down from the mountain,
A divine personification in a
State of devolution—
At first an entire forest of sorority,
And then only a pool,
Then a heart, then an eye,
Then a leg—
Something that the tadpoles are fashioned
Of, the black semen
That have never dreamed of as Pegasus—
And there you are, the product of
An apiary whose wax has already melted
Down the runways of its penultimate sex—
As if by falling, learns to fly—
Beauty in a tailspin sure to meet
The casual greetings of the earth—
The birds of prey above you taking your family
Name—
The Virgin of Guadalupe hanging from
Your dashboard,
The streamers from your handlebars just as beautiful
As the tinsel upon a Sunday morning Christmas tree.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tomb

In a graveyard there is nothing else:
Plastic flowers in a chintzy vase,
Paper airplanes touching
Down across her face:
Nothing else left in a graveyard left to say,
Even though the plastic roses are Pulling up the ants—the ants—the ants—
Before the hurricane,
And the rest of the world so busily gets
Up—and up—and up:
And I cannot remember where I have yet
To find you—
And all of the rest of it feelings like a playground
Lost in a daydream—
But soon all of your busses will be coming home,
And you will step oh so light footed
Outside the tomb—the tomb-
The tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tomb Of Your Hands

In the tomb of your hands,
I look up into highways-
Luminescent creches
Built in the plane language of your dinoflagellates-
These are words I cannot describe or spell,
Accumulating in evaporations over the hills of Your Chinese ancestors:

The professionals are taken low,
Redressed into the Formica growing underneath
The glass boundaries of ant farms-

My sister buys a new house and smiles towards the sun-
Her god addressed here in the innuendos of our father-

Hear the airplanes entertaining the angels.
Take another drink and they become hostages for giants
And then their wives:

And I have not seen you in my sleep for many years now.
My health is taken down from the mountain
And has become so forgetful that I can no longer tell its Fairytale to my children:

Conjoined twins in a bed of aspen sprigs.
The mountain's lactates feed them her minerals-
Their eyes tell me of a gypsum catastrophe,
As the great valley beckons, opening into widening
Prairies where the buffalo run downstream,

Gather into the traffic jam, and the detritus of beaten waves,
Stacked into the leg-splinter of the so many things which Can no longer run.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tomorrow I'LI Never Know

Windmills: windmills of that banal architecture,
While traveling through the hallways it
Seems as if very little else has changed;
But the fruit still falls from the tree
Of baseball diamonds,
And you are still looking up: up, up,
Casually around the world,
Trying to dispel your unusual language:
Well, here it is, while the octopus runs away:
Away,
In the inky censers of what was its yesterday:
Gone with the playgrounds in the albino
Snow,
Gone with the tomorrow- the tomorrow,
I'll suppose I'll never know.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tortoise

Starting out the new day of paper
With a song on the floor, listening to the coquina fireplace
Breathing- breathing with the virgin of Guadalupe on Her perch-
Alma tucked away across the train tracks into her abode,
The princes turned safely into toads in the truck stops of
The aloes;
And something beautiful picked up after midnight, only to Be discarded, while little boys, forgetting they are real,
Roll naked down the blue hillsides towards the traffic
That never stops,
So the rest stops remain useless, picking up the long crawlers
Of crepuscule, as the shadows of mailboxes and weathervanes
Make their premeditated dash across meticulous lawns,
Competing in the race the tortoise always wins.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tortoises' Cabals

I like your eyelashes drunkenly in the carports
Where my mother almost drowned:
The rain listening to my efforts—drowning in
The rebar:
The amphibians all princes pretending to swim
Until they have to go to bed and Take shelter in the aloe:
And other words sleeping like rattlesnakes in the Backyard underneath the browning
Christmas trees—
Subtle architectures of rattlesnakes
Diademing the poor man's forts—where my mother
Comes home and the rabbits die—
And the tortoises hold cabals, trying to figure
Out what it is they love, exactly,
About the butterfly.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tourists Curtailed But Whom

Building up in cornpone fountains:
Building up right here, where the fairies fountain:
And right here, where the rhymes crown themselves, speaking
For themselves,
As all of the night proceeds, speculating:
And maybe my loved ones won some prizes, but the night is Another memorial, because it is always because,
With their knuckles in their mouth,
While all of their wives and pets sit speculating: and then
The city is hard up in its jazz of hyperborean lights right up
Against the hyperborean:
And there it was, while I was trying to strange myself:
And then it was alright while we were all trying to move
Away, upstream into the closets of suicide outside of guns
And the popcorns of your unicorns; and here it is, after hours,
And afternoon, while all of the elves have called their Terrapins, and there they are, while the busses are all turning Around: and there they are: while you are in his house of bodies
All alone- and I just wanted my fair bit of suicide, fueling up
The semis:
There down deep in the highest lowest aeries: and it wasn't very good:
And there it was, just so floating on their tiny planet:
There it was on my cartoon of a planet with no one who could Really change to love me with the soul star of a superhero sun coming
Up just to commit suicide: and
Then there was nothing that nothing was, and the lions came,
As the kittens growled, while the tourists curtailed but whom they loved
I could not tell anyone at all.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tourists In Our Cages

Helicopters float like religious visions
Over the orchards of Spain or my backyard:
That is what they are doing
As cyclones form,
As her eyes grow languid and their lids collapse like
Cerulean tarps in a rainstorm,
Because she's been being a bad girl,
Worry about grammar and going back to school:
And I imagine all of her children in a train waddling like
Cool ducks off to school,
With bits of their animal heritage sticking like chips of Glass out of their road.
And maybe not a single one of them knows what it means
To come from Oz,
But maybe the youngest of them will one day know:
She will look up into the sky after her mother is far away
And the last of the butterflies has gone off
To die in Mexico,
And she will pick up my quiet page itself traveled so far
To find the appreciation of her eyes;
And then she will pick me up, and we will journey together
Like a sack of golden kittens,
Following the scents of perfume, like the phosphorescence
Of mollusks rutting through a storm
To the amusement parks where her mother has lost herself,
Staring longingly at a funnel cloud
Like a heavenly sink dreaming down to the street;
And it will be her own mother; and all three of us will look Upon her together,
Like beholding Mary Conception and glow with the light of Her proof just like the creatures many miles under the Sea brought almost breathlessly up to the shallow light
Of the tourists in our cages.

Robert Rorabeck

The Toy Box Of Yum-Yum

Oh joy in the toy box of yum-yum:
Yes again a tomorrow of tomorrow—and all of that vision:
While you never have to go home without
The television being on—and this being your sport—
The way that the spying birds trained to spot
You for hours—days in the lovely lofts—
Enjoying the spawning of the voluptuous afternoons with Your own children—
And then, eventually—echoes beyond echoes—
And the mentioning of the darkest of crafts—
As my belly swells like grapevines beneath all of The unreachable airplanes—
And you will come home to be swallowing,
Swallowing, a virgin of my amusements—
Willing to live with me forever, and taking all that I have to give to you mouth that envelops
Gleefully all of this petulant joy.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tragic Shoreline Of My Other Venal Muse

Rubbing dimes together,
I cause little presidential fires beside
The train tracks
And little girls come and get caught outside
Their backyard swings:
They think it is neat magic what I do to Cook what I need to survive,
And they attribute the resurrection of their Favorite cats to me,
But it was not me: I was not thinking of the True freedoms of their welfare;
I was thinking of my sick muse, lost in Colorado
Five feet tall in a witch's pony tail,
Skin so pale like opal snow: How she haunts me
And I test the wind against the zinc
Firecrackers to see which way the trains are going
Today,
And I steal the pink martinis from their mothers'
Boudoirs, because even the weakest liquor gets Me so high it tells me I can float
Up like the moon drippy like a Spanish gourd over
The white-capped spine of this country,
The beautiful cords that are bleeding tourism and Wine,
And that I can find her, and spend so much in her thoughtless,
Winter-whipping store,
As to make her remember my name
For a night in a hotel room of short change, before I have To go leaping back again to the tragic shoreline of my other Venal muse.

Robert Rorabeck

The Trailer Park Of Our Conjoined Tombs

Burning in the shadows of Ferris Wheels,
Or their overpasses,
We can't yet say what might still arise from
The sea,
While your hair is blowing,
And your throat is air-conditioned:
And my pulp fiction is just that I want to love you,
I want to go down dying swinging my Samurai's sword against the Bullets, the mirages of school busses
Pirouetting thousands of miles
From where they actually turn around:
Or if we make it to oasis,
To drink until our bibs are wet with honey,
Fat bellied and holding hands
To hold the same illusions,
To run away to Michigan, or wherever you were Born,
Sharon. Where were you born,
And what is your favorite color,
And what do you dream now with the clouds coming
Over
When I am not a beautiful man. I am just drunk,
But I want to ride the same school bus with you,
I want to turn around in the panoply of many a
Catholic institution,
And to fall against my back holding hands with you
In the brightest emptiness
While the airplanes leap to and from their careless
Holidays,
And only then should the winged men recite down
To us all the illusions which bloom like the open
Mouths of lions yawning, yawning,
Waiting for lunch while we seem to sleep together
In the trailer park of our conjoined tombs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tranquility Of My Shadows

Wounded as I am:
Looking at my neck over the fountain:
Try to leap over the mountain—
It is impossible, so have another drink again:
This world's fangs made to speak
Of vineyard, underneath the half-lights
In the garden of her elbows:
This is the uneasy place, placed at the lips of Serpents:
This is the airport of all of my roses,
And I've been getting drunk,
So I am filled with so many excuses, as the world
Makes a bed with the crepuscule of the darkness,
As it gets so late,
And the horses go down to their water holes
After the tricks of fireworks—
And all of the mouths of wolves are hungry,
And all of the classrooms of daylight are emptied,
And there isn't anymore more to say
Than this:
That you were once my muse, but you were married
And wingless:
And now another Christmas has passed,
And I am married—
And I do not think of you, at least in the daylight that is too
Busied to be wounded—
And you go home to him until you are freckled by those shadows,
And rested and easy:
Then there is no longer a carnival in your soul,
And you have nothing to say to anybody—and this is but my last
Light cast out for you into the evening:
And does not know if there will be another tomorrow to think of
You,
As you lie again in the bedroom that has never felt the tranquility
Of my shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Transformations Of Unicorns

Poem of smiling death,
As the cars ride- up and down, in the veins
Of the concrete leviathan that sleeps in
Our home:
Where the fairytale of your heart rests
In the swampy armpits,
And you kiss your husband and say your Various Amens- and the baseball games
Show up on Sundays during
Church-
Where your grandmother died- pretending to
Be in a purple orchard because of
All of the lilacs never minding the sleeping
Bears-
Or the rocket ships, hallucinating above
The ice-cream trucks: there they were Together and performing after school
At all times of the year:
And I loved her- and I loved her even while
She keeps no purpose for me-
But I remember the apiary of her body
Working in the fruit market-
And there is no use describing her to anybody-
The fairgrounds of my heart will come
Around again, but she will already be gone,
Taking the candlelight of her lovely belief with
Her, stealing with the waves
And the transformations of unicorns underneath
The moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Transoms Of The Runways To Heaven

I loved her by the restraint of memories which had Already painted over the cenotaphs of all of these pilgrims,
As the pop rockets spent down over the horned rims
Of conquistadors,
While the big and ruddy tanks ran out of gas; but she gave me
A new gift,
As I sat in the open air of our markets, the doves making
Frantic pornographies right there in the lower rung of heavens:
That the narcissisms' tourists didn't even look so good,
Their heavens tainted, the wheels of their wagons not so round,
Their creeds chick&n sh%t, and not so hypnotizing;
And I didn't need to fish anymore: her Alma sustained me,
And we went together underneath the overpasses into the flea
Markets to see the Virgin of Guadalupe, to whom I crawled
And kissed and crawled and kissed some more;
While the airplanes took away our skies of memory, and it really became Good to go home wherever in absolute anonymity, just to share my Body with her in a rain shower, to lay with her as a poem, or the Death of a butterfly, each orifice of her a syllable that could never Be sung out in the open,
And her eyes the transoms of the runways to heaven.

Robert Rorabeck

The Trees Are Still Yet Green

Call me what you will, I'll write
You another poem, I'll make money off you.
I'll get fat watching you swing upside down
From the cypress. I'll burn sugarcane like incense;
I'll cast a spell underneath the orange blossoms;
I'll wave to the concubines with bound feet-

You have a boyfriend, so I can't trust you:
Oh what a world, this high school world,
The buses the state provides newly washed,
The seats varnished by Mexicans.
The only time I can rest is when they break down,
And then I sleep under them in the effluvious oil slicks,
While the terrapin finishes off his orchid. Somehow
He still wins the race and buys me a new skin,
We all win, and then there is a parade in the oval the Bleachers look down into, like a sunken dais;

But even now its not snowing in Florida, its not snowing
At all but here it is snowing, and at that Catholic church
Where she opened up her trunk and showed me that glorious
Bag full of condoms, and we made love near the cerulean
Crèche; now they have the Christmas tree up
My father sold them, they must have, and they
Are marching pantomimes underneath that and eating
Crackerjacks, but that was so many years, and I don't remember
What I say.

She went up into his bedroom and they got
Out the tennis rackets while his parents read the newspaper
And played Scrabble approvingly;
But I only say this because I still want to be near to you,
And kiss around your mouth and hang out there like a spotty
Bee on his flower, and write my memoirs underneath the Banister of our bed, but it is already occupied, and I don't Remember where I am or what I am doing, but I started
This to be nearer to you, to sojourn like a keen arrow into your Dress, but I have tried that for so long and it hasn't worked;
And I haven't spotted you with blood, or kept

Good time,
And school is over and it is not returning,
And in the wintertime in Florida the trees are still Yet green, but they do not blossom.

Robert Rorabeck

The Trees' Elbows' Song

In the trees
There are elbows
And they grow
Real long
Up into the sun
The trees' elbows'
Song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Trigonometry Over The Baseball Diamonds

Not deserving the soldiers of my heavens
Here they come again-
Night and panthers and night bivouacked underneath
The stars where I
Have already failed the best radios and Disney World—
You go home to him and you are attentive:
You might do this single trick forever and forever, if It is your game—but my tongue is no longer tied
To the pies of your vagina:
You see—I have joined the rodeo that is evaporating;
Silent trick upon silent trick—
Words in the classrooms are daydreams—
The faucets echo—your parents echo of the love
They have for you—they keep for you—
And you fall in love with another coworker—another
Man—at the movie theatre or equally dissimilar haunts—
I don't know what is in the makeup of you game—
I am just trying to survive the day myself—
And echoes of echoes—
Repeating in the formaldehyde forlornly—
Looking out from the glass jars to see their mothers,
But they are already there—tomorrow
When the sunlight rises in the trigonometry over
The baseball diamond and nobody is so amazed
That everybody remembers me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Truancies Of Little Boys

Pillaging rattlesnakes in the Abandoned rooms of hyperborean castles:
Way up there in the accoutrements
Making kissing balls out of their Ankles
In the movie theatres of the clouds
And honeymoons out of Their dungeons:
You see these things with no legs swimming about
In the blindness of their daydreams-
Filled with venom
And egotistical advances-
They come together, forked tongued-
And make holidays out of highways where you can Look down and see the trespasses of the Beautiful sea upon the stalwart forts again:
She is wanting a child again-
But the frictions of her séances is untrustworthy:
She is just happy to be there,
And soon he will be bowing low-
To look at the sea horses underneath her skirts,
And the truancies of little boys ride their bicycles into Her forever.

Robert Rorabeck

The Truancies Of Our Open Mouths

I suppose this is what I've always been doing,
Cool and reticulated into the jungles of the brand new harems,
And even while I bathe I can hear the engines of Satanic windmills who are always chewing their stewardesses;
And if we go too long at this, we get too dumb,
But the liquor makes us feel warmed and less alone, even though
It is that we have always been drinking this

Alone,

Alone:

And I went out into the switchbacks of the sweltering palm tree
City again today, and looked for new work and new meat:

Maybe I was looking halfway pretty,

Erin- maybe I will sing to you again, passing through the unlucky
Cards across the muddy tributaries;

Because I am no longer envious, and if you admit that you are
A bad girl, then you can at least come to me, and I can give you
Flowers

And the calling cards and fish who are too fat to sleep;

And we can lie together beneath the school busses and the Florida
Holly,

Each of us kissing the truancies of our open mouths,

And weep

And weep

And weep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Truancies Of So Many Bicycles

Fingers that play their games over
A plums in an orchard, until the airplanes become
A still-life- that they are so puzzled,
And the moonlight and the sunlight, like lovers on a picnic
Hang around for lunch,
So tantalized- as if by a soap opera; and the crop through
The crenulations of lucky leaves
Just keeps getting greener and greener through their experiences
In the fertilizations of light;
And I think under the photosynthesis underneath the holidays,
Like the wishy-washy thoughts of birthday candles,
Like the songs of the spokes of daisies, or in the truancies of
So many bicycles:
Either she loves me or she loves me not;
Though I love her, either way.

Robert Rorabeck

The Truck Stops Of Lycanthropes

And the plywood
Shoulders
Extrapolated from
The lungs of
The exhausted classrooms—
Lying like the letters of Billboards above
The cars—
Illuminating the Spots for Werewolves—
The truck stops of Lycanthropes
With 24 hr
Stores
Where anyone and
Their mother
Is allowed inside.

Robert Rorabeck

The True Romance Of Pulp Fiction (Or: How I Have 50 Days Left To Live)

She said our relationship was like Star Wars: The Phantom Menace,
The worst of the series:
Flat, without character,
Distant from the audience,
Sexless,

Our house a blue screen we Acted against (poorly)
- not knowing the way to the Emerald City-

She said she wanted our relationship
To be like it was before,
As good as the originals,
The Empire Strikes Back,
The best of the series:

Fucking and what they call:
Making love in a warm bed,
Making love against the italics of Snow fields on Hoth,
Like Luke and Leia
With a black man on the fringe
To be politically correct
And to sell more tickets

With suggestions of incest,
The Freudian implications,

But I was tired of going in and out
And out and in
Of her cave just to end up back
Where I was, with my X-Wing
Sunk in the swamp,

Trying to prove myself to my father
Who sold himself into a computer

For the American Empire:

I told her everyone of his movies
Was just to make $$$ and not art:

To expand the waste of Capitalism's
Glut,
To sell more Tupperware (of course)
And the undergarments and circumcisions
Made in China made by little men
With ancient fathers,

Like Darth Vader,

She didn't understand/
Either did I, how she lives in Boca
With her sister and the hands they've Grafted into the Middle-east and the Ancient religion they turn to when they Need to buy things,

Goyem

We are all the alien species
When we need to buy things and move
Far up north to Michigan's northern peninsula
So we can freeze with a snow beast living inside of us.

Without universal communicators
We make love on the football field

So we separate into Galaxies
Far, far away.

A long time passing,
Sometimes going through Burger King's Drive-thru
We try to remember us
By buying limited time collectible
Watches:
I have all six

The characters in that cold space,
The graffiti of our bones.

Robert Rorabeck

The Truths

People in their getups worrying about their Setups;
And I just want to be a child kicking the sky on
The swings;
This is the only way to make the day go by,
And I wonder if in their aquariums, how much change
Do the fishes dream;
And it is romantic to think of you, to push my lashes
Into the prams of your unforecasted children,
To make a crèche of my soul out in the parking lot
Of your church's grottos:
Fully scarred with bushels full of fireworks,
And the airplanes swinging low like acrobats at my Command,
Like the truancies out in the yards drinking alcohol in
The middle of the school day,
This is how my seeming soul goes about swimming:
This is how I abolish myself minutes before my day gone
Dreaming;
And then I think of wonderful walls and girls with Long flaxen hair falling,
And cabbages and rabbits, and eggs hatching- In worlds where Everything can speak,
In habitats that my leafy gills are breathing playing tennis
And short-skirted sports back and forth across
A super-teal television:
And there are girls I love I don't know anymore, or I have never Known:
There are girls still stuck up in college or budding their Families in the snow in the Rocky Mountains of Colorado,
That I masturbate to to perceive, that I beat myself,
And they come alive like butterflies over midnight seas,
Flaming from the estuaries where my ancient capillaries breath,
And despair like clockwork through
The skeletons and wine;
And still I would skip school at anytime, and throw myself into
The game of make-believe,
To make sure that you win and that you too believe;
And we can both close our eyes far atop the red diamonds of these

Eyes that go on forever like red trains into the night,
The truths that don't have to be spoken to be known that they Are right.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tug Of Airless Need

Tugging at the silver
Orbs of Scottish
Plumbers,
Fixing the pipes underneath
Her copper
Estuaries,
Caracoled like daydreams
She little perceives,
And I am going
Down into
New hemispheres
Places that don't wake up,
And can't be Fixed
And the beautiful fish
Never feel
The tug of airless need.

Robert Rorabeck

The Turning Of A Sad But Funny Page

Maybe you figured that I didn't understand how To love;
Or maybe you just stepped outside your door and sucked
Air for a moment,
Before going back inside your chimney,
But I sat with you and held your hand while you saw the Homeless dolphins leaping underneath the overpass:
And better boys drove above us,
Some that you knew, some that you had let fight your fires;
But I was starring in the ring that night,
And I had to go and practice with that shadows up on stage;
All that dirty laughter that comes
With the turning of a sad but funny page.

Robert Rorabeck

The Turnstile Ballets

Friends embedded in the lines of second grade
Calligraphies: all the lush white faces looking over the Turkeys of Christmas,
Their trailers twinkling, and I doubt now that you can Even love me,
Because you have been astride that fellow too long
To stray apart,
Even if he has been your second hand devil:
You might come over tomorrow, Alma, and we might make
Love,
And we might even die together, spilling our guts,
Should he find out:
But that would just make us prematurely immortal
Too far beneath the beautiful mountains for the remains
Of our love to turn out;
But I know the road it takes to get to Disney World,
And I know the sun will rise,
As I have seen the light of your soul twirling its dun pinwheels
Like felicitous geysers practicing the turnstile ballets
From your innocent eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Twilight Basket

Emptied bottles of otherwise genii wishes,
And lifting my lips to the heavens all fretted by the Passing of airplanes:
The leaping of scams above that suburbia where
The midgets hide in the palmettos up the bank to which I've floated too; and it is easiest to prove these things
When I am alone and drinking;
And otherwise no one: Only that the night is as celestial as
A firework bought on the cheep, and in its frenzy as many opulences,
But finally settles down from its pinwheels and stops
Hypnotizing and the housewives come out into their Yards,
And feel by their barefootedness the grass that the Mexicans have Mowed for them on the cheep;
And nothing else has to move: not the alligators as calm in the Canal as bugles eager for the bugler's lips;
And every day in this strangely mollified frontera, the butterflies
Come and speak through the little angels of death:
Speak of the ribcages of the panthers who don't live here anymore,
Speak through the bars of a cell of a soul, of my Alma,
And all of the ways I have been defeated, like weeds growing up
Again through the very grasses who will continue
Multiplying like the pornography inside the junked cars
Underneath the rootless fornications of the Australian pines Across the street; only knowing that I did it under the Same moon for Alma, again,
Swearing to her that I wanted to know her for as long as I could
Like,
Like an otter slipping out of a creak to kiss a maiden all giddy on Her wedding day,
Or to kiss that very snake who caused the day and the twilight basket
Into which all of men and all of my grandfathers perpetually are Falling.

Robert Rorabeck

The Two Heartbeats

Female bodies flame their eternal milk when they Come into season
And then you can see them beside road courses or in and Amidst bricabrac at flea markets or oh um
Garage sales;
And they slip in and out of doors looking as if they've Stolen watermelons
And the cars flash before them like schools of minnows and Summer whales. If they are lucky then their dresses
Are as elegant as their pain,
While their bodies start out swinging in the motion of Both hemispheres:
It was the female body's dancing which first started the earth
To spinning,
And there has never been another greater invention:
Now they stream by in postmodern chariots and it makes me
Want to cry; and I would just like to do that for one
Of them. Maybe one of them that already has a daughter,
Who starts out every day in her car, and talks all day long on her
Telephone:
Maybe I would just like to start another heart beat inside of her,
And synchronizing, make those two heartbeats my own.

Robert Rorabeck

The Two Worlds Of Mermaids

There I am beginning to weep the usual fire
Outside the working class home, after another father's Murder, and another baseball game:
Words that strike together like the back legs of cicadas in
The mouth of a purring cat that takes it
Home,
Like topless girls wondering in the backyard pools,
Above the eyes of the crocodiles who know that they cannot
Cry,
And make their beds in the stolen and crypt orchid
Bicycles-
Engorging over the holidays, and the castles laid down
And flattened on the train tracks the ivies of so many saddled
Princesses lays over like the alcoholic hands
Curtaining the forefront of senses for another perfect child:
Crumbling, the sugary breads of a cage
Before the vacant lot of a fabulous fairy ground of enamor us
Prizes has fled away;
And the only light bulbs now: the light, the moon- the Stolen gifts around which all the hopeless sailors drown
In a maelstrom of a ruining canvas: in the shoals of the artist's Finger tips,
Drowning without clear muses- the good returns of butterflies,
In the two worlds of mermaids.

Robert Rorabeck

The Tyrant Of This Neighborhood's Illusion

The prehistoric itch keepings feeling like
I should go out and fornicate in the dead-dog
Meadows with absolutely nobody,
Because if not now,
When will the crops grow through the Radiations of failed government policy;
But staring up at the sky,
And staring up at the sky it is all I understand:
That the sun does not reciprocate,
It has no cherished thoughts of you,
And me alone, but swings the earth
Around, and around, and around
Though she might cry for him to stop:
Stop! Stop! Stop!
But he don't give a damn,
Because he owns her and everything
Else in this neck of the woods,
And he'll do as he likes with you
And everybody else, and me alone,
And nobody. Nobody atop the clock
With the secret passage, drinking the wine,
Laughing, laughing, laughing,
Pouring out the time, but not tasting anything:
Laughing, that I should find somebody,
Laughing, that it is impossible,
And the loneliness is unbounded and uncaged,
The sun's favorite pet,
Whirling and leaping, and taking on
The disguises of love:
We all have to work for a living,
And there is his seed, his way through,
Barking at the bones in the banishing room,
And you might find a lady walking the streets
Who you could take home and treat her right
For some years, but in the end,
Even after the children, and the games of joy,
In the end, In the end:
It is only nobody, nobody, nobody:
The sun's pet, doing the tricks of time,

Only to bite your hand, to draw some blood,
To turn and growl and then to leap
Through the window of the next century
That you will never see to warn them,
The people you helped passed through the doorway,
Let out on the streets,
In the dark theatres,
In the licking seas, in the smoky bars,
In the whispering churches, in the jingling
Stores, in the washrooms,
In the sterile offices, in the departments,
In the corridors, down the walks,
Amidst the trees,
And through the crowded cemetery
Where the caroling crows sing:
There is only nobody.
The is just nobody....
With the sun whipping us lavishly with
The time he weaves, his fingers curling
The flairs of the sun,
The ancient man, the old incest,
The tyrant of this neighborhood's illusion,
And all the rest:
Gone,
Echoes,
Nostalgic estuaries that drip their sadness,
Though she will never return to reclaim and illuminate:
You are,
She was,
I am:
Nobody.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ugly Soul

This soul is ugly- but it is my muse, lost in
A church where the rafters are burning-
And water snakes and eels are in
Her grotto,
Junked by stolen bicycles, while I kept nodding off
And robbing things,
Pretending that this was something excellent,
Like a Navajo that I once drove across the reservation,
Celibate for life,
Drinking from the checks of her tits- the ships
Turned to stone all around him-
Somehow believing that they would take him to see his mother.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ugly Trees

Oh to foam, if I were beautiful-
The slenderest trick skipping home even if
Just for the one afternoon,
Taunting the bullies with my slick ways,
Getting published while still half in malaise:
Loving the general gist of the story,
Pretending to eat hemlock and Florida holly,
Forgetting how to operate a car:
Then all the trees are balmy tannenbaums
Beautifully naked without decoration,
While titling my head on the bicycling I can Hear the enraptured lions snoring,
The tourists photographing as if summoned to Honeymoon;
And I'm really strung out on the floor slipping
In and out of reality, eating fried chicken,
Folding paper-airplanes,
Pretending the green shag carpet is Diana's
Forest and she's metamorphosing my renegades
Into reptiles of long-shanked kines;
Oh, to be a part again of that wonderful never-
Mind,
With the whole family absent down another
Root, to sleep alone with my heartsick feelings to Flume around the girls who'd already forgotten
About me, or the pretty heads talking pretty on The color TV;
And I loved her then, down the eerie corridors
Of vermilion coasts, but she's forgotten of me:
Distilled, she is the new weather sun-licking windmills
On her scabby knees,
I am just that ugly ghost tangled and disemboweled
In the ugly trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unabashed Bouquets

Upon the higher back of the albatross
It rains, it floods;
And if I am not beautiful by now,
I will be beautiful by then: I can see by the lights
That my father put in
As he whipped me, as I wrote the novels that no one
Reads,
I killed the dragon by which my friends were sewn
But never fed:
Beautiful irony of the butterfly crushed on the super
Fine roadway;
But I am no longer afraid: I still have my dreams,
By my scars,
By my liquor glass- I still have my friends,
Even if I should have died high up on the wild
Back of the buffalo,
Never read, by the red lips of wild flowers, the unabashed
Bouquets the dead Indians dead in the gutters
Of the old fashioned roadways: Again, I loved you,
Erin, but you are too busy serving the truancies of your Highwaymen to understand my love,
Unabashed and unbred- Aren't you, Erin;
Yet still my sweet love, my dead light bulb by which I got to bed every night- Erin,
Amen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unabashed Heavens

Easy wounds in the creek that is moving down
From the mountain
Side, like a spear evaporating the colors of spring
Up the cinder paths now blanketed with
Autumn,
Whose kiss no rattlesnake will rightly know,
Up the scarred jubilation of her pregnant sides,
The elk go cantankerously like phalanxes of regal
Hungers,
The clouds motioning of washing machines,
And the masses so far away that there is nary an airplane
In the sky,
Or a woman for me to love; and this is the way her book
Opens and closes,
Wishing for, but saying nothing to cause an inkling in My memory,
Passing me up like the slender marble hands of naked
Aspens,
Who hold the moon through the stars, panning
The unabashed heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unanswerable Questions

And if I were dancing drunkenly
South of Spain,
Would you catch me in the New Years of that
Country and across
The railroad tracks
While it all has to happen to us—
In the venal enterprises of the mail men and our
Mothers,
Whilst there is nothing left that is beautiful
That we have left to say—
And yet the sun comes up over the mountains—
Luminescent daydream of a movie theatre—
And those who are the oldest of this country
Cannot stop with their busied menstruations—
As the movie theatres play their daydreams on and
On with out them,
Spilling their gossips out onto the catatonic streets:
The open throated estuaries that wait all
Night for their own throats to be
Filled with baseball and the pollinations of witches—
Until the wind has caught and she has finally flown
Above them—
Casting her spells, she is now a stewardess, something
Respectable if only slightly above minimum wake:
But she has nothing to fear—
Eventually the mountains will weep,
Sending their lactates and melted ice-creams down
Atop of her—
Answering all of the unanswerable questions—until it
Is very, very late in the middle of the night—
And I am guessing that it is finally alright to go to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unanswered Solicitation

"Meet new friends and Become a god, " the advertisement read,
But I was already always Disappearing into the forest across
The street, in the hot Florida
Of that time-line when the Conquistadors,
The action figures with their full movement
And detachable crosses,
Were the fulcrum of the last extinction:
I had recorded the Indians' screams and Compared them to the panthers'
In the Bay of Horses,
When they had their last revenge,
And their painted maidens looked sexy
As they put the heads of their victims
Between their legs,
And busied their knives with the scalping:
Everything was devoured then,
As somewhere in the center,
The two young lovers never written of,
Shared themselves in the great
Sand dunes bordered by the timeless palms,
Created a civilization lost to us,
And unobserved they reentered the sea's womb,
And became the spoken word dolphins
That fetched sunlight for no masters,
Far above where the pirates lay
Blurred in drink and death,
And so, laying down the catalogue,
I could only sigh, as that was
One more solicitation I could not answer.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unbearable Folklores

From each little seed
A candle tucks in
To the wishbones of its
Graveyards
Even while the firehouses
Are yammering for a
Paradise of fireworks,
As civilizations loom through
The forests;
Epochs of miscarriages
Searching for
The fire escapes of
Wombs
Leaping like senseless
Equipages-
Towards another
Fieldtrip to the breathless
Darkness gathering for the unbearable folklores
Of a pestilent orchard.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unbeknownst Joy

In the middle of the dead-end street,
The flower opens its heart to a unicorn.
All of the latch-key children
Are across the canal,
Their parents off selling whatever it
Is they have to sell,
But it is there—the truth or
The beautiful lie.
In the night it will turn into a fireball.
The kittens and the lizards will Watch.
Well-fed, the moon will jump,
Lactating over the houses
That contain only so many cribs—
From them, the babies are watching
With their hearts,
Their eyes closed—
Not one word will cross their minds—
Theirs is the unbeknownst joy:
That they will live almost forever
And behold so many airplanes
Leaping over the baseball games of
The loves they had yet to feel.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unbusied Intersections

Open wounds lying on their sides,
Paper airplanes wilting in the garden,
Beside the carport and beneath the roses:
And all day metamorphosis
As her tears proceeded to show for windows:
And mother and daughter remained in
Their afternoon's pieta,
Watching television,
Doing one another's hair, beneath the mountains
And the approaching moon—
In a little village of ten thousand souls,
Whilst around their borders,
Cyotes and caribu,
And mountain lions played a tin foil game
Of dreams that no man could see,
Scorpions bought their games underneath
Of the red stones and arrowheads
Until dusk—
And then, another sort of pleasure,
Crepescule, crept across the mailboxes
And the road,
And made its amber love amidst the pine trees
Giving deep kisses to the unbusied intersections
Of her limbs.

Robert Rorabeck

The Uncertainty Of Another's View

If I die tomorrow, who will collect my fire insurance:
Some poet on fire island who has never lived past his thirties,
But I'd rather give it all to you,
Alma- you who said to me today that she didn't want to hurt me:
But I want love,
Alma: I want love, like a fire blazes for oxygen: give me love,
And forgive me for using your name another name in the Night entrained to the loneliness of my hallucinations,
While the spikenard grows like lutes in another virgin's grotto,
While all of the houses are no longer home,
While the canals have segregated and taken over all of high school:
While your body is as fine as any poem:
While your body is as wicked and jubilant as any sea that as ever kissed
The belly of any faithful dove and tried to persuade it otherwise,
While I still have all of my loves in my estranged heart,
While you still wear your three rings around your fingers:
My white hear shares the digits of your enamoration, just as I have shared Tongues with you,
While your children look up into your eyes, who are just as soft as all of
The windows of airplanes passing over the sleepest of seas,
And the sweetest of nursery rhymes;
And passing into the uncertainty of another's view.

Robert Rorabeck

The Uncounted Sea

Perfect as a pride of lions and as homeless,
As regal as London,
And as unknown: I cannot get a teaching job, because I stutter,
Because I am as homeless and as woebegone
As the most washed out butterfly, Alma:
And the lions moan as red throated as thrown out
Pomegranates in the habitats:
And I guess you know me less than I know you,
But I am still right here;
And I want the chance to know you, and to teach your children,
To hold your throat and make love to you as your clothes
Dries outside,
As if in the south of Spain,
While your young children grow outside as if in the playgrounds
Of kindergarten who are already counting their times,
As the muses muse like unused genies in their bottles in the Linoleum oasis of the uncounted deserts
Whose mirages haunt me still like school girls counting their Blessings while never holding on to their grandmothers outside
Of the graveyards,
And going downtown underneath the airplanes; and what about this,
And what about this, Alma, if I am certain that you were Always, always, meant for me:
And this is no witchcraft, and only the uncounted truth of the Uncounted sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Undecipherable Lullaby

Bountiful apertures of life
Show off nothing but the Spittooned forklift-
I wanted her for a kind of wife,
But she left me off at the side of Death,
The hermaphrodite turning tricks,
I don't know what kind
Except that they are all and many-
The Universe is in Red Shift,
As various members of the family
Are being turned away and buried
Like meat in a pie a long time baking:
Birds are in the sky,
Black ones circling and the man
In the center, the oldest one
Who is wearing my father's jawbone
Left the used car dealership at doom
And walked the earth repeating
His sales pitches to the unearthed stones-
They have more money now,
The speechless kind who never wither.
Without a religion,
Their home is where they lie
And their job is to spend eternity
Wondering upon muddy banks and Flaxen prairies, firm in their age-old truancies
The lips of wind singing to them
The undecipherable lullaby.

Robert Rorabeck

The Undefeatable Sky

Recorded in the shadows of any habitat- trying to Remember the superstitions of Any high school-
And then all day long, a song that blisters
Without any wonder,
While they haven't been getting along together
Anyway- for very long:
As the cold weather fronts blister
Over the halfhearted daycares and any other Amusements of the tenements of
The trailer parks- and then it doesn't have to listen
To any other song for a long while,
Anyways:
There is but this- while the sugarcane burns,
And the canoes float masterless-
This is what I told you, forever through the daydreams:
And this was all but the final reason before
The cicadas came out and danced in the armpits
Of the cypress,
Singing songs of metamorphosis to lose their skins:
This was just their song in parenthesis-
This is just how they've been excluding themselves,
Waiting for the illusive numbers of the Pandhandlers to survive in spite of themselves
Struggling through the whatever elements of the Bright sunshine:
This is what was left at the summit minus all of The tourism:
This was just the pinkest round in the chambers
They sold to themselves while their skeletons were Yet grinning while the dragons flew perpetually in
The undefeatable sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Undeniable Champion

When our America is down,
Pissing blood in the bushes, and looking
At the asymmetrical pearls of teeth,
Like serpents eggs in the grass....

Ribs bruised and bluish from the new Pugilist, in the heavyweight fight of Emerging super-power....,
Wanting to keep his title,
But knowing just how then
It was all but over;

Trying to recount which round
He had lost his butterfly;
when his lung was punctured,
Filled with fluid

For his sword and shield
And fighter jets have been blown up,
And thrown into the deepest parts of the swimming pool;

What will the rest of the world have to say then?
As the novel king arises, grinning the new machinery-
The savage red twists of the eastern factories:
The completed censorships,
The origami war machine marching like an atomic glee club,

The blitzkrieging waves of the neo luftwaffe,
And the unending sirens of European mayhem;
How will the old queen cry out to her disinherited knight then:
The veteran contender, whose colors faded but never bent,

And will he be able to stand one last time,
Before the arising monsters of the final dénouement;
Will he be able to stem the tide of the utter Ragnarok,
Or be devoured by the conclusive assault,
Condemned to a cenotaph buried by the sand;

The Statue of Liberty's flame a roost for gulls.

Certainly,
He will rise at the occasion
And fight with all the colors of men he knows
Within him, until his legs are knocked from beneath him,
Or he wins the victory of an undeniable champion.

Robert Rorabeck

The Undeniable Textbooks

In powers of unison they die,
The hummingbirds pullulating slowing over and Underneath the inappropriate mountain,
While everyone else has some gold to sell;
And they have been selling it from Different countries;
In the middle of the hallucinations of their deserts,
From the chains of the gold coast,
As from far away,
While their dogs have finally risen up from their Bones and are hunting
And demystified from their fissures I wonder if they Will ever go away; but they go away and this way they Come,
Laughing through whichever pantomimes of daylight
By whichever way they came;
While stewardesses of airplanes grew jealous, as my heart
Was finally lackadaisical and finally finished
With skipping stones or picking the limbs off of flowers,
Just as the trailers finally finished and settled into Their parks,
As my exhausted paramours of cousins finally fell sated
In the uneasy if defeated and called whichever way it was
The undeniable textbooks of its heretofore irrefutable home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Undertow

My Mexican students are my favorite Students
I am going to buy a cake for Hermilo's birthday
Next Wednesday
But I can't love you anymore
Especially with the wind blowing this way
I can no longer hold the birthday candles for all of Your wishes so stillly beneath the overpasses whilst I wait
For you
And wait for you, while you are sleeping at home with Him, restive in his brown tenements
Perfumed in his amens that even the gods don't listen to Anymore, as my words spill out
A cornucopia of over sweetened row beneath
The overpasses, as the angels of our fanfares disappear
Beneath the brightness of the undertow

Robert Rorabeck

The Undiminished Heavens

They keep the rates of the sun.
Even though they've been lamenting, casting dimes
To the bums:
Bums like terrapin beside the concrete rivers,
As the horseshoes
Get lucky underneath the breakfast of
An over easy heavens-
And then I saw you like a fox underneath a mobile
Of your brown skin,
Even though the never game a d$mn-
As the hurricanes echoed like airplanes
Avoiding all of the ballrooms of their high school proms,
As I wrote more and more letters
Misconceived towards you, as the waves licked forever
The ingenious and misconceived skeletons
Of my love,
As you played baseball in a field that never existed-
And all of existence became contorted,
But existed beneath the wheat of the heavens,
Giving all of us a little more time
To make love for real-
As the busses courted the terrapin in the cul-de-sacs of Housewives,
As the fireworks we spent, jubilantly, tried to feel up
All of the undiminished heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unending Shore Of Your Fathomless Sea

Fabricate my fashions and surcease:

If you are building your fort stop and linger down below

At the beautiful riding bicycle of buffalo:

And know that death shall come for all men,

Until her love wakens you again, and all the popular members

Of our sea shine like the photosynthesis of deep sea

Brine;

And I have entered my name in the records for the thieves

That shall never survive,

While the dragons were raising all hell and calling the virgins home

On the triangles of the dinner bells;

And it is lonely at night to sleep without you, Alma;

And it is dangerous, but it is what the angels wanted, and it is

What I decided to be-

For I sleep alone at night in the unending shore of your fathomless sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Uneven Symmetries Of Her Body's Bloom

Oh- the gunman slips and bights his lips
And gets drunk at the traveling show:
I know that there he becomes awake, bitten by the snake
And the lightning throws the game:
I know- the candles in the wake, the birthdays in the cake,
And the footprints or the hoof prints in the snow:
It goes unrecorded until death, I know- it spills into the creek:
It cuts my mother's cheek, and it goes unanswered
Through the day- through the school yards, and the fresh cut
Yards, unanswering: it is all I can do to shame myself,
To count my wealth, to sleep alone my flesh on bone:
My flesh on bone in an empty house without a spouse
With the roof on top and on top of that a moon:
I'll sell Christmas trees: I'll sell Christmas trees and await for
The herons and the loons:
Their special chests of bright unrests slipping through the Cul de Sacs and brandishing their spry young sprigs
Up against the troughs of pigs; and up against the fornicated
Moons: and passengers there will sit and stare as They look straight over the naked shoulders of her dressing room:
To compare the wild blunders spilled across the feral wonders
In the uneven symmetries of her body's blooms.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unexpected Notes Of Your Russet Shore

You feel so close to me; it is unreal,
Like a kite in my bed, like the sea on the shore,
As the airplanes full of steamy stewardesses reverberate;
It almost feels as if you could come knocking,
At any second of this night;
In fact, with your very knuckled flesh, you could pull off
All of these perforated sheets,
And reveal the god awful sun over my little house and its Thirsty landscaping:
You could put an absolute amusement all over me;
And I could sing, and I could rhyme, and I could dance for you
All across the floor:
Alma: it was what I was made to be doing for,
And for lifting heavy things to which to be carrying to you,
Or selling bouquets of fireworks in the rich
Deserts of New Mexico, while even then closing my eyes
And dreaming of you like a spindle of silver-brownness going off
Over the sea,
And catching all of that delight, and holding its breath, and becoming Titillated over the candle, who so suddenly dances over the immensity
That propositions itself by our daylight,
Deluding itself drunkenly along the unexpected notes of your Russet shore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unforsaken Grounds

Put in me this cold cloud—
Like a glass of alcohol passed from housewife
To housewife—
Until it finally finds the one she loves while
She is still warmly hibernating above
The ground—
And Christmas gives new toys for her—
And places where there are still rivers
Slipping around the Mounds—
And daylight and moon light and Cathedrals—
Enveloped like the archaeology of the jublations
That once were forever
A zoetrope dancing forever above
The unforsaken grounds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unfortunate Canal

Tiniest of beauties I will get to see going back to school
Tomorrow—
Blue gills in the canal—I never thought of her—
Beautiful mirage,
Like a kite stuck up in the tree—as the children play around
And around contracting diseases of their merriment—
How long will they have to slumber:
How long will her lips taste the water fountain between classes—
Make believe legs stumbling through the halls—
I think she should be a stewardess- as diminutive as a fairy
Taking a ride on a tight-nosed bottle rocket across the unfortunate canal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unfortunate Offspring

Pretty for almost a day
In his junior year after he'd come
Back from running away northwards
With delicate bruises on his wrists
From handcuffs,
During a fire-drill:
She loved him almost the entire time....

Then he was published at twenty-five,
Obscurely- no one knew,
Scarred, he loved her and patrolled
Her neighborhood,
Exhaling the temporary immortality
His words brought him.

Too soon he laid it down
To see what she was holding;
It took him almost an hour to Test at 155,
But he lived with another
Woman's room

Then the quiet things are expressed
In drunken parks as midnight wanes:
His love was yet unpolluted and deep,
But the way to it
Was overgrown and lost,
So he meandered

Decapitated and mute,
With only his wrists to judge the feeling,
In the morning she went to work
Just as unknowing
His words,
Like the unfortunate offspring would Fade away before him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Uninhabitable Fantasies

Disillusions start out in
A bedroom drinking rum—
In a little yellow house made out of one brick
Of the sun—
The illusion of my greatness once
Spoke of itself to the empty mirrors of
An emptier fun house—
After all of the muses found that they could Roller skate up to the sky,
And secured their delusions without melting away:
They made it so far as almost to evaporate,
And then young upon the pilots that they Found for themselves
By their lapels—
And they never had to come down again,
If they had, they would have landed in the center of My Mandela of sad catastrophe,
And they would have seen the zoetrope of Minnows I'd painted with my empathizing tears—
And you would see, waking up in the Morning—the metamorphosis if little things
That had learned how to skip up into the greatest
Of the uninhabitable fantasies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Uninterrupted Tides

I still want to meet you under the overpass,
In the weedy shade of a homeless dream-
Pass you my bottle and my eyes,
The shyness tugging my lips in a reticent smile:
Meet you where we can hear the sea beating together,
Hear each chorus line of pounding saltwater
Even with the honking traffic conducted overhead,
To share that recognition of the moving east
With your salient eyes, the brown liquors
I'll swim those cherubic cheeks I see cropped in Photos of the obscure cyberspace you haunt me;
Touch your female hands, entwine them with my Masculine fingers, the sneak thieves of this inkless smithy:
In the humid blouse sweating in her peninsulas,
Recognize you as inebriated proof that my Ethereal bouquets have done their job: Just one Kiss is worth it, and I will buy you anything from the Flee market open to us beneath I-95, and the manila
Reclamation plant, if that's what it is:
To smudge your mauve lipsticks against my neck,
Like when you were a waitress and this was bohemian France
Do you know what I'm talking about? To see you in Display with the expensive palm trees bowed like tasseled phalluses,
To watch you walking toward me like a skipping reel
From the other side of the fence,
To have you tug me gently as if your body was a kite
And your desire the wind crawling down from its bed of sun:
I am right to want this from you, and to continue calling
You in the only way I know how, because I want
To be pressed up against you under the busy overpass
In Lake Worth, FL., where they still sell glass hurricanes
Shattered like hollow-boned angels and hummingbirds
Against the sea wall, and the grottos where Mary sleeps;
The justice of the peace, let me kiss you in freeze frame without a shadow,
Let the sun melt us together like candles on the crown of
A god king, like two stones found smoothed together
By the purpose in the uninterrupted tides.

The Unlucky Poem

Tricks of other planets stain her lips.
Even though she isn't far away enough not
To hear the emptiness that I am not crying-
There are no echoes,
But clarifying recalcitrance,
And the astronauts have come to see her with Bright auburn eyes and dimpled chins;
Discovering they can breathe deep-in her
Perfumes, they have taken off their helmets and Shaken their heads:
High school football stars, monkey chested
Valedictorians;
Brushing her hair they think up adds to trim her
Tree,
And I am up there on the grade of roof
Melting like an ice-berg who hasn't done in enough
Ships before the unresigning summertime,
A little glass warming my empty hand;

And you are in your dress twirling with just the First glimmers of grandmotherhood in your eyes,
And all around us the city is busy going out to dinner,
Turning to meet each others' broadsides,
Driving your cousins to the movies, and looking Softly fine. I can lay my head above that banister
Like a saint nobody has the energy to believe in, while
The trains move the business-class hobos out to sea, the waves
Coming in to greet them brush in time-
I'd said before that I love you or her;
A relative, a sister obsessed with rockets, but that was just
The sobering silliness of the pass, because you are all
For him, like a music box revolving beside the window,
Glass still greatly bubbling, trying to make it home on time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unobtainable Heavens

If you are alone and
I cannot hear you—will you destroy my sandcastle
Forever while stepping outside—
Another step misconstrued across a nameless park
To the earshot and corn husks of Alligators:
Lets make a goddess for their love: goddess of corn
And masks,
As the school day grows longer and longer
And keeps on counting the hours
Until it can be released: prisoner in the shadows—
In the hedgerows of the trailer parks—
In the hibiscus at the wild edge of Disney World -
And so much thunder and lightning
And words for little boys to get excited and masturbate—
And then the shadows revealed themselves:
Donning themselves naked and marking—
Each holding a dozen roses over the graveyards—
Like masks of superheroes taken of—
Like the nude pinups in the middle of the day of Shopping malls—
All of the voluptuous angels sing and then cannot Remember the last words that were leapt out
In a desperate attempt to capture the Unobtainable heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unobtainable Travels

As alcoholic as your mother, planes flying overhead—
I will be going back to Shanghai to see you, my wife—
In June—
Another despotic summer, but the first time in memory
I don't have to sell beautiful fireworks underneath billboards
As the cars of America drive by—
Waves of a family's purpose—and I am done with whatever
Adulteries I had, but not with this liquor:
Just a little glass, as the sun tips over the earth—
And she spins—spins, a reasonless goddess until the night
With her many constellations
Representing the unobtainable travels of who we are Meant to be.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unopened Gas-Station Of My Homeless Appalachia

Chicken-wire smothers my Artichoke heart,
She adores her young, athletic organs-
I sleep alone in the park-
A gypsy of fiberglass and Stucco satellites-,
She hangs breathless from the nape
Of sweet young constellations
Perfumed of antiquarian nard,
Like reclining ingénues;
Stormy and drenched,
Up all hours at the unopened gas-station
Of my homeless Appalachia;
She breastfeeds in the restaurants and
The kitchens across the fertile divide, while
The pull strings and wires of my Marionettes go unabused-
I sign the check and tip my
Hat,
Grinning madly at the table in the shrinking
House- With no one to hold my hand,
And carry the other half of the bill
Here at the dinner parties of old news.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unpublished Continent

I'm so ugly:

For instance, I want to join the army
To leave my dog behind in Arizona,
To crush the skulls of Iraqi children
To bleed into the red sea, to prove to My parents I am something,

I can feel it in my gut,
The words which recreate the feeling
Of a repeating sun exploding the first
Birth inside me, I have hands which Cause prints to forever lay on the Carved stone of grave markers,

Everyone has a father, who Everyone forgets the name of,
But they always remember their Business and the gross product of
The year- how people come in,
Growing the fine plants of the sunlight
Which bloom best at the end of the year,

Like fashionable coats or the first
Rainbows to cross the street of your eyes

They take photos of their eyes shiny
Brightly, always like first born neons
Under our tents

You can see them now and always,
Poking out of store windows like newly Born words that wilt after a month because They have no roots.

So, like I said,
I have a perpetual tooth ache,
And a binge to die- I fornicate over the gun
(I'm a good American with a steady brain)
Placed to the temple, I have a place to go-

Far, far away- over the sea they will lay me,
They will lay me

As I graffiti words on the computer,
The nameless man makes love to my ex-lover.
As her face lingers over a fading heart, the Beating in me still trying to escape into another
Century, another heart that is loud and obviously Beautiful with many people who love him,

But alone, all alone,
I must beat on, desperate and far away
From you,
Know I must have you and the words
Which linger,
The bad skin and the eyes on it:

I must go on,

For a little longer,

I must go on

As my arm separates
As my teeth and eyes take off
As my heart flutters away,

I must go on,
Thinking of you naked in the strange
Ponds in the Urban Heart,

I linger,
As the grass grows up to God's Neck,
Untrimmed,

I continue
(toward the unpublished continent
Of the regional band of the regional city
With good tits that perk up when two $20s are rubbed together!)

The Unreconciled Graves

Lighthouses of transom monoliths,
I just want to undo her bra
And walk down this way through her easy mazes
Where the salt water licks into finer things
Are resolved
And to the end, like into a holiday,
Where, equally forgiven, there is nothing left to prove;
And the skylight is a ghetto over against the old
Queue;
And Ferris Wheel waking up and yawning like a swan
Diademed in pubescent light,
Who kisses against the neck of your sky just
As gently as a kite who really does want to get away,
Returning to the ranges of your bosom where it slips into the Wet branches that spindle across the unreconciled graves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unrequited Darkness Of My Night

Pull off this like the string of a kite:
It is free; it hooks over the old factory,
And into the weeded lots of Rabbits and endives- and all the way over my scars;
Like a marionette cut loose of its model
School yard and made to run away,
To turn lackadaisical near the shore side,
To lose all of its riches to cats and foxes
Who speak better to it- to never know the house of Its maker again, the hands of its scrawl- like a letter
In a bottle castaway in the waves,
Curling up to the shins of a dismissive lover, who never bends
To ask what is this:
Already infatuated with the afterlife of her journeys,
She will recede halfheartedly and yet again into her green
Amphitheatres where her paper hearted kings
Will eat their sack lunches across the trapdoors of the floorboards
That hide the truer braveries from her sight:
Because she only falls in love with what she sees: she goes
To work and comes home early, and thus never believes
In the simulacrums of my factories burning their great and openhearted
Institutions through the unrequited darkness of my night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unschooled Moonlight

Ripples of empty bottles
Crenellate across the forgotten tracks
Where the elk have shed their Crowns- beginning to think of death
As a friend across the caesuras
Of the mountain,
With absolutely no reason to believe
In the lighthouse that shines its Beacon forever relentlessly across
The enlightened faces of
The proceeding valley-as the preacher
Gives sermons to the pew of his identity-
The rest is left to misgivings,
As the rains encounter the graveyards,
And the latchkeys run away once again
To the cerulean playgrounds
Stealing forever in the unschooled moonlight.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unspeakable Rituals Of The Game

These egos are playing musical chairs
On a blue marble cloudy with men:
We are trying to pronounce our children
Into the oasis in the obliterating void:
Listen, Oh Lord!
For we have created talking butterflies,
With wings which can weather
The solar pestilence, and humid wombs
Where omnipotent twins wait to be discovered:
This is the aftermath of our folly:
The clattering alienation of familiar suicide,
Where the strange daughters walk out
Beneath the xenophobic moon,
And there behold the unobtainable knowledge
Of the celestial spheres,
Each one further away and more beautiful:
Then to grow mute and opaque,
And to fear the joy of the crowded sun,
The leaping professors in educated tweed,
The dalliances in the gardens of books
And words put down in persuasive analogies:
The scarred men, burned by the truth,
Fall away from the mobiles of heavenly bodies,
Lose their positions of names in deep mauve swamps:
Pushing against the tombs, they swim out
And kiss the hybrids, the reptilian sirens,
The startling aunts who cradle their forgotten skulls
Like speechless infants, as the slow waters
Running down from their jaw's cenotaphs,
Refills the unspeakable rituals of the game.

Robert Rorabeck

The Untravable Hills

I have the skills
To pay the Bills—
I can travel across
The untravable
Hills—
Up town,
Down town
No matter what's
Real—
I'll dance with the Goldfish atop the Windowsill-

Robert Rorabeck

The Untruthful Promises Of An Evil Dove

Impossible leopard laying upon a
Suburban lawn I used to visit midway between School- the sun a torch passing over
The airplanes- my heart beating like a paper
Paperweight:
There she goes, and there goes me:
Flying, flying, flying into things that are dust-
Scars and candy apples left in the trash,
Words spoken by spectators who have paid
Very little to see the dwarves who are Always diminishing, and who used to be Giants: cloudy, high and beautiful things:
But they saw how you cheated on them with
All of your love,
And how you always had to leave them to Go home to him,
And you made them diminish until they kept
Their own hidden cities in each leaping
Cleft of their captive waves,
As you flew further and further away from Them like the untruthful promises of an evil dove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unutterably Green Classes

Trod on unto the racetracks of death,
Having kissed her lips for a spell and then having to leave her
To disappear underneath the open wings of Commercial airplanes:
Everything that has to be said, spoken so openly and wining until
It is sold:
The hitchhikers of fieldtrips molding between the grasses,
When I just want to sleep beneath her in between classes,
To smell the fumes she released like an engine in careless despair,
Or to realize how her senses languish there like a film of Sunlight over the grasses
That the grasshoppers dip their antennae and heads into, worshipping
Her in the unutterably green classes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unwanted Prayers

It doesn't have to end this way,
But it is all that I have to give: this is my Profession underneath the homeless overpass
After midnight, and before
The Ferris Wheel of flea markets begins:
This is my song to the moonlight and to the Pigeons, whilst the ice-cream trucks
Are mouth less,
And you are home with your children in your
Brown reservoir: you seem so far away from me now,
While I have spent the best of my last dimes
Trying to keep time with you
Until I got sick and had enough, or the weather
Came in baying its sick proofs,
And the wheels returned to houses, as the heavens returned
To the throats all of the unwanted prayers which Had inevitably been given up into them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Unwholesomely Sated

Outside, in that yard that turns blue and green
Dressed in the hours of the lighthouse: there, will you let Your dreams
Run, losing hands with your spouse, as all day long the Bodies are on the move:
Fingers and lips you know: touching or hooking on to friends,
Rising up cathedrals from the Palm trees and emeralds grown obese off the cenotaphs of Conquistadors;
And in the back of doors, a full garden: lizards and bromeliads,
And the rabbits sleeping with
The dogs,
Or slowly bled- exhausted from making their saturnine rings
Around a little world,
Like a thanksgiving feast set on a table for buzzards
Caracoling the freshly mowed fields, so enamored with their Beliefs, they are even still waiting for the unwholesomely
Sated to give in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Upcoming Bend

I like the bets your beauty has placed with
Immortality,
Thinking that it should win
Backed up like a knife thrower against the Virgin spring
Where the school bus carried all of the flowers
To their graves;
You make all of my stubble and scars blonde,
And after this rented light is gone,
And morning comes I wish to remember you
With the kind feelings the Best of the lions give to their trainers; and even If you have found some better man which no
Light can kill,
I would like to have felt as if I had found a friend,
And to be trusted enough to be left alone with your Daughter while you go out with your hombres,
And read to her the stories which should Help her escape from being singed as she leaps through
The hoops of fire awaiting her around the upcoming bend.

Robert Rorabeck

The Upside And The Downside Of Heaven

Each line never mentioned in the classroom
Is the one heaven gives a marionette to become real:
A book discovered in the gutter instead of
The library—
A bottle rocket that takes off in the backyard and then Goes down a hole to make love
To a snake or an amphibian—
When, across the street,
Inside junked cars underneath the planes of talking
Trees,
The newsboys of shadows are selling pornography
To the latchkeys and the truants—
And the silver worlds slip away back and forth
Perpetually—
The zoetrope of another hypnotist's perfection,
And a few more words thrown out of the gutters of
The mind by the spiders of the fingers—
That reach for the keyboard and then the booze—
While the angels cry like little girls and then like Wolves in the upside and the downside of Heaven—
And the castles sleep underneath the clouds
With their kings and queens inside of them.

Robert Rorabeck

The Useless Aphorisms Of Scars And Seashells

This is what I want you to do for me,
In the land of the blue cabinets where the Egrets are nesting,
Combing her hair along her bare shoulders
Far down in the syrupy shadows from where
The cars are driving, humming in families, seeming to leap for miles
Where the sun is shining.
I want you to lock the door, and make sure
To scatter my ashes across the back of the Mountain, should I not be home anymore,
Should I fall asleep and not remember how her
Eyes skated the trim of nimbus
Reflecting her semiprecious dreams,
Like daylight on goldfish or serpent's scales
Or loose change in wishing wells;
Or how the young bicycles turned to and from classes
And jingled down hanging lanes of unmolested tobacco,
How her flesh displayed for happy surgeons
As she served them at the café;
Should I not come home anymore, and if the Dogs get too hungry, if it doesn't rain for an Uncertain number of days. Don't cry over the words
I have spilled,
The useless aphorisms of scars and seashells,
but get sick on cheap liquor and
Watch the daytime operas, the little clefts turn red
Or golden, the clean gifts on shelves
For little children where the wilderness comes through between
The commercials,
Where the trees are spangled. I don't want for you to weep,
Or even to remember who I was,
But to lock the door and turn away, clutching her hands
Together, wondering what there is to eat,
While the innocent bicycles hustle through the tinseling mangroves,
And scatter my ashes upon the shoulder blades
Of that mountain, the woman who loved more,
Or just go to sleep.

The Usual Flight Paths

I needed to see you yesterday- just as the airplanes need their Stewardesses to survive,
Without the sunlight looking up through the housewives windows,
Who else will be left to believe:
That the singular fox is sucking the tits of the grapes again,
Like a truant tucked into the student parking lot during Midterms,
His latchkey fingerprints being burned with rum and supplanted
Time,
Like a tent in the middle of war on the borders between us and Mexico-
And all of the gold lost in the first softly frightened throats of
The cannibalistic jungle:
And the tourists going down there, so far away from what made
Them to believe,
Just to get a glimpse at the first luck of the beauty that lies within Yourself,
Like the often seen jewelry bobbling in an over eager wishing well:
And this is you, Alma: and this is how my words find you,
Like the lighter than air cadavers whistling from my throat:
The hollowed bones of flutes that stem from my fluttering wrists
Who picnic underneath the meadows of the usual flight paths,
And stymie you overeagerly there and kiss you there.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vaginas Of Remote Control Boats

Cenotaphs growing underneath the monuments of a
Mailbox:
You are her lying with the perennials, and waiting
For the housewives:
And you rent glorious houses here yourselves to which
You have to sell your bodies to everyday,
As the boys come into you like grasshoppers and butterflies
Wanting to make love:
And they crowd your shoulders and like your skin
With the webs of their spit
As their windows grow foggy until they are relieved:
And you elevate yourself like the dew melting off
The brown shoulder blades of a baseball diamond:
Like hot air balloons carrying tourists
Up through the power lines to look down the bottlenecks
Of churches: here is where your throat
Burns and all of its kisses burn with the fires of a Daycare which fled away into a pet cemetery filled with Plastic monuments and the wax lions and tigers
Which slipped warmly into your hands from
The vending machines of another zoo: like new born
Babies from the vaginas of remote control boats
That you were still too young to make love to.

Robert Rorabeck

The Valentine Of A Firework

As they dimmed over high school,
And the baseball diamond,
And the inevitable wives went home to
Their inevitable husbands:
From the malls as from the estuaries-
I thought of the romance
In the valentine of a firework: very cheap
Romance bought in packs
Like cigarettes- for an amusing moment-
To scare the children,
And annoy the neighborhood- and yet to Come from so very far away-
And to be so profound in their beautiful
Daredevilry,
But too end up not really there- to last for
The moment of a lover's holiday-
A honeymoon of overpriced nonsense-
And that is all:
Not even an echo, not even a sad knock on
A sad door.

Robert Rorabeck

The Valentines That Will Not Close

Joviality in the display of open-hearted
Race horses,
I still go out underneath the moon
Where all of the palm trees
Lay planted—
And the night gets so soft and smooth:
I obtain no jealousy—
My muses who are already married
Make eye contact with my cousins—
The poisons become so soft that
They are almost unheard off—
And death is unhurried—
The beautiful menagerie of gossiping
Poisons takes his time—
Now he is caressing his skeleton to
The playgrounds of the beach—
It is his second or third lover,
Even before school is out-
And the moon languishes over
The bottle rockets of our truancies
Where I once got drunk and threw
Up in the wishing wells of a
Vanishing mall—
Where my reflection had so much
Acne that I thought that it couldn't Possibly be me—
But now another daylight is dissolved,
And the girls I once loved
Have bedded down with their cars,
Underneath the mountains and
Underneath the moon—
Very soon they will have their own
Children, but for now there is nothing
More that can be spoken of—
Just the valleys beside the roadways,
The valentines that will not close until
What they have to sell have all but vanished.

The Valley And Every Time

Cold is the faith of my stream; it wakes up early morning
And bleeds:
It goes straight past the tundra of your permanent schoolyards;
It wets its lips in the chalk of your urchins and spikenards;
And it goes weeping still, past cold
Grandmothers dressed in their cold hills,
Past the rattlesnakes curling in bundles like copper wires stolen
In the middle of lightning fires;
And you keep up your mysterious household, and you even have
The mind to wipe the cheek of your early morning husband,
But I don't mind: the very fact that he has picked you off the vine,
Because I have looked at you across the schoolyard and Down in the throat of the kerosene mine,
And I have traveled up the deadly cliffs to find you, and to have You committed as my secret bride; and I am doing this fine,
Knowing that inevitably you will come into blossom
And then be over spilling in your voluptuousness and Down the throat of my vulpine columbine, who has sat here
And waited for you deep in the nursery and at your bus stop,
With eyes so green as to know exactly when to pluck your vintage
Once again like the egg shells of its lingerie stolen from the shoulders
Of its curling vines, before the collegiate baseball games down in
The valley and every time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Valley Of Windmills

Crawling to the forefront of another misery of Guatemala—I drink my rum,
I say my lines—and I await for another day to splay me open
To the eyes and senses of fishermen—
Or, if I suppose, the sunlight cannot keep you here
From another catastrophe,
Like stolen bicycles sleep walking back to their masters—
Cannot keep you from his love,
Or from the marionettes of his children he Conceived inside of you—then the cave is stolen,
But in its zoetrope still dances—
Laughing under the moonlight for the wolves to come
Into its movie theatre, or for the planes flying above
It to look down,
Causing another catastrophe, awakening—
The moonlight over a valley of windmills—cousins to
The caesuras—they spring around them,
Never bothering to wonder what is laughing at the Same time with the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanished Sunlight Of The Stream

There is nothing to it- the minnows are Shut up and whisperless in the vanished sunlight
Of the stream,
The words for her are curled up or boxed
Up like legionnaires and maps in the attic-
For her one brown man has returned to her,
She has brought him down again,
And they exchange their little fires in their bed,
While the same damned world seems to wake up
For the both of us- Now the streets are Echoing differently, as the same raindrops from Different thundershowers roll down her
Shoulderblades- and she works in the market,
The airplanes touching down blessing over her-
But the tadpoles no longer metamorphosis in
The slow shadows,
Even as her children come home every day
From school to her, growing strangely
Even as she remains the same.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanishing Children

All over the yard, I've placed my
Guns in the snow:
My mother is drying the laundry in the clustering
Aloe,
And Alma is somewhere close to here,
Gossiping to conquistadors while the
Airplanes fly so low to listen;
And the television breaks the news, and the
Kidnappers don't look so bad:
So soon it will be Christmas, which makes all of
The vanishing children very, very glad.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanishing Highway

As fires eventually die over the once
Laughing sinks of your own lips,
And the ships proceed over the banished
Senses of
The lighthouse, I strike out again,
As the serpent peels its own skin over
The knees of the eucalyptus-
And the vanished papers are read to the Vanished pilots,
And it feels okay that the blindest sorority
Is swimming in the perfumes
Of the senseless heavens- and you sell your Own ablutions underneath the mountains,
Where your every own daughter grows
Upright and stalwart like a fire Marshall
Who will not approve me
As I continue to try pretend to try and sell
My very own soul outright and for Next to nothing in the easement of the Vanishing highway.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanishing Sea

I wait for the airplanes of the stewardess who has Abandoned me:
When will they be coming down, spilling like the water falls
Over the emollitions of my birthday:
Heavenly angels,
Soon they will be picking me up and carrying me,
And spilling my bouquets everywhere
While the tall guys laugh
And my parents abandoned me:
But they will carry me into the aerie of my cathedral—
Where I will spark and pinwheel for them, '
As if laughing for the professors in my high school—
And she cries down from the orchards with Nose bleeds—
Shoulders and breasts of chicken pox cured by my innocuous
Amens—
Will she see me tomorrow, running into her on a bicycle:
How will she expect this to end—
And the sun carries upward its many promises,
Emollitions of knighthood and remembered Christmases:
This is not how it was supposed to end,
But it does—my dog howling in his dreams,
Remembering a Christmas that always dies—
That comes into her tents
And kisses her softly, becoming a dream in the morning
That blows across the vanishing sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanity Of The Last Of The Earthmen

I am searching out the frequency
For the vanity of the last of the earthmen:
Before I saw them in their time silver toothed,
Driving in their developments
Supplementing money for love to buy
Survival kits for their two and one half children:
Even then, they were taking off
To cavalier entanglements with the Woman who worked part time in department
Stores,
The languid hypocrisy of unwedded thighs
Taking in for the night the strangers already spoken for.
Note the eyes, the way they tangle,
The bicycle spokes the souls abstractions,
The facsimiles they share with the earliest androids,
And the unspoiled nights awash in nocturnal paradise.
Now, there is only the empty shore,
And the goliath behind sinking into the world.
Nothing moves, but the things which should move,
Those who are given to purpose and secret will.
The things that were left unsold, the clothing,
The skins, everything that was put on,
Though still on display, will never be found,
For there is only in its stratifications the echoes,
The places where the wanting hands fell
Yet fall no more, in reverence for extinction,
Unparsed lips in tranquility say nothing at all,
As the day bows without encore, and in commences
Every night.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vanquished Daylight Of What Man Had To Say

Hills bathing in the blue street lights that the students
Carry home to, uncradling books and classroom covetries-
And from their thimble like studios they look
Out at Lesbos blowing out her candles of the girls who might have Been from their very same high school:
They too were up to no good, but making a recipe of naked gold
Down two stories in the communal pool:
Like wood that had learned to strike fires where the otters live,
And the cars were turned off, so the billboards were selling their Thunderbrush to the very night:
Helicopters and airplanes taxied, stewardesses stripped of their Metamorphosis- and the essence of life floating there, for a moment
Legless, serpentine, but making love in a good way to
Her sisters while the night leaned nearer in its bachelorhood-
And the forces took over, expressing themselves indefinitely to the Then vanquished daylight of what man had to say.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vantage Point Of Their Lonely Studios

Bottles hidden under couches which turn out
To be beds:
Bottles on top of red cement, bottles spinning
Burning with questions:
Bottles the answer to this;
My face bleared with roses and abandoned highways,
And cars abandoned,
And forts except for their mad soldier blooming fireworks:
And Kellies are in the sky,
Rippling as if with banners of all her men,
The kaleidoscope of her delinquent theatre, the rosaries
Of her body's tattoo;
And I am fully scarred and pretty, and I think of her,
Because I have nothing left in who I am:
And she sees her children as dolphins swimming beneath her,
Swimming through the immense greenness of this underage
Garden,
Going towards the sounds of dinner, like bottles spinning
Attune to the whistling of such an immense foreclosure;
For when her eyes are closed, everything is going to Shut down,
And the parks disappear under the stipulation of her closing
Heirs,
And her perfumes leave us just as transfixed as bachelors
Staring down at the beautiful lesbians who are playing just like
The pinkest otters from the vantage point of their lonely Studios.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vast And Infinite Sky

I have hurt myself again
While the herds of sharks come to look up through the Impervious versions of waves where the mariposas are dancing
Like untouchable girlfriends;
If sharks could dream of beauty, maybe they could change;
And start to lay off the loves for the carnivals of man-eaters:
And become celibate and fast dreamers in the bottom sands of all of These selkies to which the sea is always a vast changing room,
And my words are only poor repetitions for the Meanings that she repeats to herself every night as she finds another good Reason to go to sleep and then to get up again
While the airplanes fly so high as to be unable to be proven
Through the vast and infinite sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vast Graveyard Of Red Hearts

In a night of somber cadences people die,
Relatives and gods,
Like out in the middle of a New England forest,
All the wheat fields just skating rinks,
The trees like a luxurious China shop tempting the blistering
Lips of Apollo;
And my grandfather died,
And my father is taking a walk out in a blizzard.
He isn't back yet- He invited me, but I couldn't come-
How could I. I am skimming Mark Twain, traveling about
The pirouetting universe at her fattest middle;
I've got a headache- I've drunken too much coffee.
I've stayed up all night and counted the leaves that are missing.
The librarian is on to me, and eight people read my poem.
Two of them leave. Six who remain sit around and play cards
And then Russian Roulette when they are out of Vodka,
When they should've been drinking rum. Who are these people,
And what are they doing out in the middle of my storm
When I am out in the groves of Spain waiting for her under orange
And perfect orbs, thinking of her breasts and the ghosts of legionnaires
Who transfer their power from one to the next;
Or, outside my window birds peck through the flurries with the Persistency of winged life, diminutive cousins to angels and Devils, and I lay out another line like making a bed
Or preparing a coffin;
These are just some things I've had to say, or to silently scream out
Into the middle of nowhere before the vast graveyard of Red-hearts who've been rocked to sleep by such savage lullabies
Housewarming gifts of the storm,
Like fires in tin horns which slowly keel over, their youth blushing
Dalliances of confection, only to gray and ash,
Blown away by her persistent lips who are always making upon
The next wish.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vast Wind-Tunnel's Void

She drinks; she:

Drinks in a velvet cushioned confessional;
Has ideas strung out under the cerulean cones in
An old forest where copper antlers lay shed;
Passes the bottle around decrepit birdbaths where Bald tires are disposed of, where winged metamorphosis
Farts chirping;
Lanks in Navajo flea markets, buys fry bred;
screws together plywood to sell fireworks;
Erects tents like giant skirts without any animals;
Doesn't read- can't read; swings;
Is undoing herself in stony riverbed- The fish are Scared but not harmed-
The water is veined spittle; the water is cheap gold when
It leaps; filthy, deluded liquors
Flaked in homeopathic minerals- and it is swell, and sometimes there
Are mountains too, at the deluge's vacillating head-
And distant roads always leading into the sky of Lighted fires, as if the clouds are
A smoky cauldron bubbling in spell;
Down cold, winsome ways with
Stranded uptight houses and petulant windmills-
Doesn't think she should go- her legs are sore already,
But in time will go there,
Past where the steeped valleys lay deepest green, and runny,
And always damp;
Far above the bathes of crooked trees,
Fine-spun angels like flimsy vagrants are playing, cavorting with the Stinging sport with other things that she can't Be sure are there- to graveyards of miners
Summited in loose scree, hidden amusements of microscopic
Life, circuses of hardy mice
And centipedes evolved from the Salt of the evaporated sea; and there to listen down through the vast wind-tunnel's
Void, to the lonesome men making love, she used to make love
To; going down weeping, backlit by Saturn's snowball rings;
Stores are closing far away,

But the mortal light yet dying streams; exhausted but sure
She has both seen and heard
A divinity she before fought to disprove.

Robert Rorabeck

The Velvet Throat Darkness

Vaudeville of kindergarten love all to put on
A puppet show to the trained animals in the dark;
But the dark is such a beautiful species for Those inclined to weather bad scars:
Species can be their own things in the dark-
They can be whole with shadows, and make friends of Every bleeding part;
And mothers can be lovers, and widows can have sailors;
And those spaces where you'd think you cry alone,
They are filled up with the minerals of unholy cheer-
And you can swing her around in the cloudy park,
And catch the flinty glances of her satanic eyes on
The cheap merry-go-rounds, and you can pick up one
End of the earth and fold it back as if inviting her
To bed-
And if you can fail you can blame it on another beast,
For there are an infinite number of animals just like you
Shot and wounded and buying unwholesome bouquets
To give to the dark velvet throated darkness.

Robert Rorabeck

The Venemous Homogony Of Their Burry Esplanades

Faces decay in their new enjambments
And I'm supposed to be reading Emerson,
But in Saint Louis no one gives a damn
Except for cemeteries and baseball,
But now there is time for the immense
Worshiping of my father's fireworks,
And we will soon sell something
Along the antique desert
Where there is so much to buy,
All strung out through the venomous
Homogony of their burry esplanades
Where grandmothers looking weeping
Into the disastrous sky into which
Their daughters have leapt before
Their time—
But, other than this,
There is so very little to say.

Robert Rorabeck

The Venemously Homeless Convictions Of Sad Runaways

Apologies,
Because I am drunk- and not fit to appease
Anything else,
Not even conjugating the Old Swedish from the Forever bruised lips of prepubescent vampires;
And, getting to it,
I am not Jack Micheline,
I am not even his caricatures of Baudelaire;
But I am figuring out the silver plane of Midwest
Swing sets over the transplanted thistles,
And I am going to finish this rum,
Even if I don't look good doing it (But I do!) ,
And I am going to move to Saint Louis,
Further away from the transitory migrations of Poisonous butterflies straight over the octogenarian
Deserts of Arizona,
And into the truly boreal Mexico,
Where you wont be able to tell any difference between Me and the innocent lovelies;
And I have written novels to which there
Is no use for,
And I am like Mark Twain's older brother, Orion,
Such the fickle constellation,
And I am nothing better than the working middle class,
And that is where I will soon end up because it is where I belong,
Leaving me to get drunk and to only imagine
The roller coaster amusements upon either coast;
And if I could get to her I surely would,
Because I love her, and the children I could have mined
From plowing her fertile menstruations,
The fine exegesis I could have performed accomplice to Briar Rabbit deep in the purple thorns;
And I am in love with a girl name Erin,
But she's been letting a toned bouncer muscle through
Her fleshy door,
Zooming through her Missouri caves which the likeliest

Of children must soon explore;
And Kelly is married, and my ex-girlfriend I will not do,
And I have poems in homeopathic words which pretend to Heal,
And there are girls in Oregon,
And cousins in Idaho- And in Atlanta there isn't a virgin
I do not know;
And there in the rich fertile rows of orange groves
And sweet-cigarette terrapin, or down
Further south into the sweltering reptilian pens of beady
Eyed crocodiles
I will lie down my pen,
And let my heart ululate in alterative rhythm next to My earth;
She will let her child suckle tight upon her breasts pressed
Up close to the base of Colorado,
The rhapsodies of her newborn and the mishap
Ghost of a Siamese twin,
An abortive novel, half finished in unbaked clays,
But perhaps my pains will skip like stones off the underbelly
Lakes of commercial airplanes
Before I am shut up and strangled by the usurper lips
Of these evil flowers,
The venomously homeless convictions of sad runaways
Fitfully destined to recompose their lives forever
Rebeatingly bilious beneath her
Perpetually blooming nocturnal hours, furrowing the shifts
Of her unjustly weeping desires....

Robert Rorabeck

The Venom Of Rattlesnakes

She doesn't move away: the fact is that she likes playing with Him:
As the plastic cowboys and Indians say their goodbyes:
While my useless wishes are selling their many reasons to the Widest advertisements in the sky;
And when they get on home, deluded by wild scuppernongs:
The soft pigeons cooing on the fences,
Their masters heady from alcohol, and their arcs swaying,
Holding out two by two for the pitch perfect rainbow:
While the animals nuzzle,
Waiting for the first radio broadcast- like a new color to arrive
With unadulterated fanfare through the jungle:
As I make love to anonymous girls through the feverish testaments
Of my burned down youth;
As new words arrive, drunkenly- as if Christmas trees careening into Other holidays,
As the stock still youth are holding hands and chewing the insides
Of their lips,
As if it is heavily snowing at a baseball game where no one else arrives;
And yet I can hear my entire muse weeping for me across
The country of our little hemispheres: or at least across the train tracks,
As she buys things to mark herself
And to make love to the venom of rattlesnakes at least until help arrives.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ventures Of A Playground's Metamorphosis

Kickstands like the long tails of bicycles
Nuzzled by terrapin in the first tangles of the seesaws
Beside the baseball diamonds;
And colorful airplanes kicking starwards- never wondering
Where they are flying,
But going forever faithfully with their arms spread
Like little children no longer afraid, and reverent above
The ventures of a playground's metamorphosis.

Robert Rorabeck

The Ventures The Ventures They Need To Survive

Unkindled, a word waiting for no return:
An empty bottle, rolled beside a church that has no following:
Words that are flat like leftover snakes,
Bushes that landscape an empty graveyard;
And it snows in cutout paper over cowboys who aren't Really dying; and who have never traveled across Texas:
But it is alright, because you are up in your car, venturing to
And from a university,
Long since broken free of my hapless plague- Like a detective
Without any addition glues, I roam mindlessly-
Like a butterfly assured of the freaks of joy:
The houses making monuments to their little wives.
And everything accumulating and taxing onwards, so promising
In the ventures they need to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vermillion Skies

My words—vision of a blind man
In the vociferous shadows
Waiting to be fed from the mouths
Of nocturnal creatures:
As the jasmines bloom over dump trucks;
As the airplanes scream like vultures:
That they should have to say any of
This
Another time through the needing mouths
Over my years,
And into the fire-pit:
The pages burn and dissemble—
As my students will get up again tomorrow,
And I will have no voice for them,
As my wife lives in a house on the other side
Of the earth,
And my pity for her burns down the swans
In the apathetic moods of the vermilion skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Beauty Of My Breathy Song

You walk in the green, like the valley or
A nest,
For Colorado is so full of your ups and down
And contrasts of great beauty.
Like its fjords and red tulips,
You go turning around higher up in the Concealed basins,
Maybe even ones you've never suspected,
And you have so much on your plate
While I was walking around your head,
Like a tiny ant trying to christen a mystical
Kingdom,
While you were getting married and `
Baring children
I followed the hostile traffic, their red lights
Always escaping through the neighborhoods
Of rain that burned through
The oxygen that spilled like magnificent Wishes down from
The summits of changing rooms of the pale
Sisters who crowd around
Your tiny home just to glance at how beautiful
You are for some afternoons while you
Are feeding your child
Aren't you the quiet significance, winged but Calm,
The very beauty of my breathy song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Best Friend

I give and I take nothing, all day long:
No butterflies, and it is funny, funny that I can keep repeating
My desirous song,
When my desire is so far down stream singing out to no one,
Content to go through the little ripples of a
Rain shower, pretending each ripple is its soul,
Sure that it can never drown even as the elfish cannibals surround
The banks of its musical;
And I love you, Sharon, because you are the only girl for miles
And miles: And I am drunk, and you are the only girl in this place,
The only beautiful thing on two legs who hasn't betrayed me,
Or gone home and fornicated in her fornication place:
And I am getting up early again tomorrow to check again
The furrows I have sown to see if they have sprouted the tender
Heads of my so unfortunate friends, and if they have, then I will Call you to them, Sharon; and they will rise up harmoniously
And almost cartoonish and I would ask you to kiss them:
Yes kiss them like a little girl with a basket full of rose petals, Prancing, because you are most desirous; and, yes, even Trans-lunary you are as luscious as a virgin in her grotto,
Spilling full of blooms and loam; and, yes, you are the best friend,
The very best friend I have never known.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Element Of His Tears

Lighting at the paper is repeated:
Folded or lit afire:
I see you now in her eyes,
Dancing, dangerously hypnotic-
Holding a shrunken skull in Either palm
Like a speaking pomegranate:
As, continents away, they spread and spread
To dinosaurs opening wings and saluting
Through the trusts
Of open heart surgery: cotton candy and
Other minor confections:
The things they say to the waves to stay alive,
As the children of his muse bloom-
Get older,
And she forgets about him in a day or two:
How she used him,
As he wrote about her a thousand upon a thousand
Nights,
The horses contacting with the dunes:
And what was in her heart but a movie theatre:
And it is there still, replete and competing
With the estuary of the boys
Consumed by an unnatural will-
And she doesn't care-
This is how she sings herself to sleep- by Blinding the fires that tried to leap
From the very element of his tears.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very First Caves

Sabbaticals of long tailed ponies crossing
The prairie of broken windows
Looking for a promise she stole with her lips
As she looked across the mountains
From the school bus- and all of the beautiful
Girls lay across her,
Brandishing her elbows, and the copper
Estuaries that could not be
Miss given- as the fountains flowed
And the breads were liven;
And you stark naked in your field of baseball
Diamonds, flirting with a serpent
Who floated with the apples: it was the earliest
Thing she could remember,
And honeymoons of dinosaurs- in fieldtrips of Bear claws until something struck across
Her skin,
And she closed her eyes- in her field trips
Of honey moons- the very first of the caves
Ever visited by men.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Graveyards Of Your Very Own Immortality

The body really flexes its muscle; I really flexes it enough:
And he got to you really early didn't he, Alma,
My love,
Even while the airplanes in their pretty bodices touch down on my Chin and now I have a tattoo and all of this stuff:
All of this bright confetti wounds that are open in even Early morning
While the cocks crow and the dragons show their stuff:
And the traffics moves, Alma;
It really moves: for both of your children it moves, and it tries
On it variously pitiful shoe sizes,
But otherwise it eats poison apples, and I suppose you love
Your poisoned man,
Because even now here he is again, touching down and calling
My bluff, but none of it is hardly even real, Alma,
And I shoe the horseflies away,
Because I grew up in even better places than here, and even though
I want to touch you so-
I have been high up in the embittered tree line, and I have Even more rum to swing my lines,
And none of it was even close to here, and if you can hear me now, Why
Then you are too far close to the very graveyards of your very own
Immortality.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Last Time

Coming up through the blue ways,
Looking for goblins and keeping out for butterflies-
At least once or twice I was a little boy, and these were The sounds we made together when we would have Been better off in school- or further away;
But the sun always seemed so close, looking down, and Inspecting us through the parks,
The fireworks we stole and lit off his little helpers
Who felt suddenly wonderful, and wounded-
The houses that they birthed their fountains around just sat
There, and waited for them to disappear,
Like the alligators in the canals waited for angels,
Or to see through the back, back doors when her lips would Kiss him for the very last time.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Picture Of The Story I Sing

The horse lays prone before its mountain:
You see they are in love, and she is praying;
Or in the least the horse is in love
And born many foals, at least four;
And the rabbits are in their narrow caves,
They have shut the door
And gone deeper into the ruby red burrows of churches
Dressed in their pinafores;
And you don't have to believe me, because I have nothing Left to prove:
I have delivered all of my Christmas trees,
I have swung with Kelly on the swings after the seventh
Evening of the day;
And now I am telling my story to shadows in Crepuscule,
Shadows who could be anything, but not you;
And, back to where we was, at least the horse was in love:
The mountain lion as teal as a tennis court
Melted from its tree of wisdom,
The tree of bitter star fruit, the tree of what was;
And this is the still life of dying life:
This is a rest stop in the gloom: This is where you are sleeping,
Kelly, in the doublewide of your epitaphs:
You might as well be in the everglades-
The two lovers are perpetually enslaved, but I am constantly unsure
Of their sexes;
Only that the mountain lion is the victor:
He is biting the summit of her throat, as I took you into my world
Today;
Like a blue vampire taking advantage of the virgin mother in Pieta:
She bending down to nourish such a blooming sacrifice,
And this is, at least, the very picture of the story I sing for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Same Hearts

You can save yourself again
On smoky green sailing boats just impressions
In the way stations of the Fiery forest,
Because you already have a father and a son,
A mother and a daughter,
And you don't want anymore, Alma;
And yet there are so many new ventures and markets
To explore,
And I can watch you basketing tomatoes all day long,
With your pretty, leonine face down cast
Trying not to meet the hard gaze of my father, your Patron:
You are in your own little world as far away from me
As the equator is from the Bible belt;
And maybe I will never mend, but keeping
Pulling my wagons into doom,
Maybe you will become the fire: maybe it will shape both
Of your wings,
As you strike out, immortal and jubilant;
But if we had children,
Can't you even suspect how strong they would be, tied Fast from either ends of the world,
Picking up the best virtues of hoodlums and green parklands:
They could meet the narrow gauge of alligators:
They could sing in their own time:
They would know both of our breasts and languages,
Alma,
And they would be as surreal as to carry the very same hearts that I now carry for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Same Shade

When the clouds go again over the sun,
The flies come out from the echinopsis and from the Purple armpits of cypress,
And they go about in their own fair, tasting the Flesh for two weeks of whomever they care;
But cannot be bothered by the housewives driving inside
Their cars-
With soft lights, going to the Laundromat, not knowing
That their very own concessions have made them
An arcade
For the very hearts and eyes of young boys left from
The school, to enrich alongside the Clever roadway in the very same shade.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Thing It Is Weeping For

Her family reaches far and wide:

They sing, wake up, and make love; I have a little book

Hidden in the hollow of a sunken ship:

It doesn't move: it only weeps, and when the rain comes

It weeps some more although almost anyone will be

Less likely to hear it;

And it weeps without her name, the very thing that it is

Weeping for.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Third Night

It was the first open mouthed
Kiss I'd had in seven years,
On the very third night of our
Gift giving
While her lord was at play;
And it was all she gave me;
And it was all that she took from me;
And it was almost enough
To kill me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Unearthliness Of The Unquestionable Air

Invisibility lactates from the tit of
Your soul,
And I will get drunk every night and walk to
The fruit market for these poems,
For these words I use in place
Of nothing else to describe your utter beauty;
If tonight is a funhouse, if it is your birthday, I can get in my car and shoot up the Throat of Disney World
And I will live forever:
I can make it to the darkest of Africas with no
Better muses loving me,
And I will survive for an awfully long time,
Because the day after tomorrow will be the weekend,
And I will have time off to think of you
And the shapes you take like a heirloom still cooling
From its younger soul;
And if that is all there is to know about you,
It will still take some time to comprehend, for
It seems you are still falling through the sky before me,
And I am enamored by the quickness by which
You disturb the very unearthliness of the unquestionable air.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very Wish Of My Soul

Overtures breathing like uncaged bobcats
Now that they are no longer underneath roofs, and the Walls are short enough to leap:
Long tongued, hyperventilating like the colonnades
Of industry where too much gas has been spilled
From lip to lip,
Like butterflies gossiping, trying to create the chaos that Will end them up in Disney World,
As it got me here- so next door to my next and final muse,
With the limestone and coquina underneath our Little pattering feet,
And the ghosts evaporated up into the air like the saltlick
Riming the underbellies of airplanes;
And I have the sneaking suspicion that I live next door
To a stewardess, because she is hardly ever home
To smell the jasmine that works its perfumes in the night,
Like the delicate ethereal fingers of lovers who were Once here, and the duel mouths that their memory still feeds
The enjambments of odor through which the balmy nights proceed;
And I only think of her, like a curtained wish, a star yet
Discovered, as the busses turn around- and all of the metamorphosis
Gathers to see the first lights of my Alma, the very wish of my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

The Very, Very Best

Lesser names are mine of joy:

That I have been writing all of my life for one single

Boy out

Huddling nakedly amidst the sugar cane rattling his brain for

The rains of airplanes,

And Alma, I think of you, while lesser visions come into view,

While every night and every day proceeds,

Upon the long legged hallucinations of another long winded steed:

And I caught a forty pound king fish

The other night and watched its dying breathes on the floor of the boat

Underneath the carpet of airplanes, while didn't you

Clean your house:

Didn't you: and you, as a Mexican wife, cooked dinner for you husband,

While the rainbows disbanded and I wished again

That I could take my own life, while the lions yawned insouciantly,

While in their cherry mouths your missing rabbits fawned and didn't think of you,

While nothing was new under the sun: and my love was just the drinking

Fountain of a famished pop-gun,

But otherwise I receded with it again into the west;

But as I receded with it I wished you, Alma, the very, very best.

Robert Rorabeck

The Victorious Loser

Me, being the human animal,
Took that as a reproach: her going off and
F*cking some guy,
Even while after five years and some odd
Months, she'd only been f*cking me,
And me thinking about f*cking around but
Not doing anything contradictory,
Besides secret gifts and emails and less expensive
Tack:
Now, oh lordy, how she welted me,
Got my bravery undone, kowtowed me something
Fierce; and by such niggardly revulsion made Me into the poet: huzzah. Made me eat fish and Grow a brain. Shrunk and isolated me into the hills,
Into a pomegranate seed, into a seat shared on a
Train with my dogs, or a strange, misty renaissance Festival smelling of cheep cologne, the rusty tips of Javelins, and smoked turkey:
So now she is married and has tasted the new fleshy tip
Of her wedded monument, time and again gone down and stuck on that;
I am celibate, and fine, and sometimes inebriate,
But I have more money and two dogs, and am looking For a house and an agent, and am expecting both:
So I consider us about equal, for the worldly decapitation
Has sent me down the backwaters of more frightening
Townships, where Colonel Kurtz exclaims the horrors,
And ceiling fans whir like helicopters,
Where by prehistoric teeth of aspiring house-wives and Landmines I've been rejected and made anew and all
The better: I am extemporaneous and sweltering in my corner.
When the bell rings I will go back to pugilists,
And die trying, for I am the victorious loser,
Who through such traditions of holiday slaughter has been Crowned king.

Robert Rorabeck

The Villages Of Emptier Things

When they go down to the bottom of the Well, they blow their trumpets and the blind
Skeletons dance underneath the make-believe sky
Where the wolves and the bears are kind
To them:
They bring them lunches of fire, and the skeletons
Dance brighter in wicked desire-
Like spikenard rustling underneath a tower,
Or rinds of tin of lost knights that shower
In the leaves of the orchards of nameless
Desire: they remain there by the powerful magnetisms
Of banshees of scorned housewives- women
Who needed their ruby challises on bosoms
And thighs- and the moon saddles these brave lost
Men in their semiconscious graves-
While the ravens dance and eat the fields of monarchs
Who cover the fickle plum trees as it rains,
Like the memories of their own lost mothers
Who bled them onto milk weeds,
Until they crawled up to a crystal metamorphosis
On the chain-link fences overlooking the villages of Emptier things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Vines Of Another Sightless World

Awakening onto the patios where the sea has first leapt
And then ran away,
Coming to in the morning of the parking lots and her grayed
Ear lopes:
It is like I have driven up to her later day school again
In the earliest of morning hours
When I didn't know what I should care for, while the world was Still young and wild:
Then Michael was born, and Sharon was still curling warm
Clays around her hip;
And Alma was right here in Florida while the strange jungles were Still growing,
And the stewardesses were still leaping right over all the boys
In their bed, in a chorus line of wishes,
And the house that I am in now was still right here,
And the ceiling fans turned like the weather, like the heroes dancing
With the villains and each of their sisters-
All the bodies giving off their little sighs from the vines of another
Sightless world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Virgin Of Guadalupe

I hear the moon calling from the Throat of a wolf,
Like a pubescent throat ululating from its spitooned horn:
While I was up on some boy's roof in an Arm chair:
Not praying to any god, but spending my fireworks
And growing naked:
Soon I might swim in the canal all the way to the little girl
Who lives in the palmettos:
I might get there, a diminutive conquistador, and show her
Pictures of yourself: Alma:
Like a lapping green zoetrope in the nest of my palms:
If I even knew you in high school:
If I could call you the way that the tender trainers call the Long remembered elephants home,
The supple gargantuan turned into the dancers of spiders webs:
I would caress you and get into your car:
I would wrap my fingers around yours like a crèche for
The Virgin of Guadalupe:
I would take you out to lunch. I would ask you to go bowling,
But you would say no.

Robert Rorabeck

The Virgin Of Guadalupe

Flood of a song—lilac at the foot of my bed: meager art
Wasting away as you do,
While outside they are having fun—they are betting on the Highest stars which are just amusements
That will fade like ours:
As the overpasses come alongside of our bed posts—
Racing headily next to the anthills
As paper snowflakes fall—illusion of a world of foxes leaping
In the lamps of a zoetrope,
Making zebras of barber shops—it rains a little,
The engine idles,
And the Virgin of Guadalupe sits at your doorstep waiting for The cat to lick her feet.

Robert Rorabeck

The Virgin's Everlasting Spring

Barmaids in the sauce of waves- so bosomy and Naïve;
I suppose in the morning they will be collecting themselves from
The lips of dragons,
Or the great white sharks in the tattoos of a
Party forest;
And then the night just glows, like I have seen her eyes do,
Sitting right next to me at the adulterous picnic,
Sitting and staring for dolphins,
For waves;
And she said that I enjoy spending time with you, and that is all
That there is;
But I know that there is some kind of hidden stairway up to where
The hidden room where her father is still held captive
By the serpents of thieves;
And I know I can save him, or at least I can join him;
And I can feed him little pieces of me, like the joints of a rich story,
While his daughter looks upon us in a trance of the bluest bluest
Eyes;
And I just want to touch around her cul-de-sac of so many scars,
While in the darkness I fear to see the lions that are loping
Toward me,
After I have given up on the school bus; and now I know it is my time;
And I have to stop sharing the renegade bicycle with my sister,
And I have to give up on my soda-pop games,
And welcome death beside the virgin's everlasting spring;
And I do- I do....

Robert Rorabeck

The Virtues Of Believing

Foxes with pretty smiles competing for badges:
While the final battle looms nearer- as death has its way
Over the pretty chariots and the purple wedding
Processions,
As I proposition my heart for her, and the maggots turn into Flies, smiling so many ways in their eyes:
As my parents' home is repossessed by the bank:
As the mountain is repossessed by the sea- and it all flies away,
As the strata grows deeper and more mystifying:
While upon the birthday cake I watched Alma blow her wishes:
And for a moment they all must have seemed to come true
Until the dreamer arose
Accepting the inevitable absence of belief: the dead were dead
And un colorful, and the moon had arisen but was a thief:
And the light it was giving to the holocaust of languishing sailors
Was sending them the wrong way,
And shipwrecking the righteous upon the petulance of reef:
The baseball players were harpies, and Jason never found the fleece:
And the virtues of believing were all beyond belief.

Robert Rorabeck

The Visions Of Another's Looking Glass

May the day lighten over my estrangements and Prove me in more ways unreal-
May the ocean curl over these abusements and take Away how I feel-
Lingering in the versions of the green wood
Of an olive tree can only save me
From the sea for so long:
Soon you must come again, and whisper of our Virtues to me- how we became one
Some afternoons on our days off underneath the Pleasure liners of those airplanes-
And all those busy people commuting, leaping as if Over candle flames- We took together in My bed and made love in the soft visions that had Come to pass- until you forgot me still,
And looked away using the visions of another's looking glass.

Robert Rorabeck

The Voice Of Its Motions Towards Her

Places of loudmouthed anonymity
Smoking cold shouldered underneath overpasses
Eating cold turkey on sanctimonious holidays
Rooted to no particular matrimony:
Eyes that first follow feet, follow nothing:
Thought to follow orchards, thought to watch beauty
Ripen:
Now under the traffic of torn and beaten flags
Piled up in an unglamorous concrete valley
In the fugue of lime disease and citrus cancer
The body no longer knows what juxtaposition the body
Once was hungry for;
It still cracks tiny motes like the spindles of a bicycle;
And it still may flag other bodies down just to get a little Further by car,
But it no longer believes its muse was ever beautiful,
Or the voice of its motions towards her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Voices Singing

She cannot call me, and that's all right:
The moon still rises over the park, and her shoulder;
And her beauty reflects in the lake of another
World:
It is not so bad, like the serpent says, and only Means that I have to move on,
Like a knight waylaid for three days in a castle
That is her favorite color,
But is not his- and the world vacillates and sings
Like glass brought to the edge of her lips,
And she dreams about crossing the frontera which she Had to come across long before and long after me;
And her children suckle off of her
As the weathervanes point out the direction of the new Arrivals coming in;
And the little houses are built all around her-
In them she can hear all of the voices singing of people
She does not know;
And then by night, she crawls into him once more,
And goes away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Voices To Which You Pretended To Weep

Erin,
You kissed my neck,
And it felt so good; and it was all I wanted
Erin,
Erin: You were all I wanted,
To fall asleep underneath the zoetropes of your window,
Erin.
When I get too drunk, I still call your old number
Which I know by heart,
But you changed it with the luck of your infinity,
When you showed your one and only man
The open mollusk of my infinity;
And I died in the palm of your laughing hand,
Erin, so how can you blame me,
Erin- I cast myself in your fire, Erin;
And I am just a good man, Erin- no good at soccer
Or any sport.
I just want to run on like a faithful dog at your side,
Erin!
Don't you understand,
I just wanted to be your one good man.
Erin- I've always been the man who was left behind,
And you just added to the fact in your insouciant weathers,
Taking you dates on horseback,
Frolicking through the heathers. Now I've misspelled you
Into immortality,
Erin, and your eyes are still auburn and floating on the currents
Of your chesty abodes.
Erin,
Erin- I am so lonely, and you made me that way.
You abetted in my careworn fraternity,
And now I cannot love a woman again faithfully,
And what happened to all the flowers I sent you;
And where will you be buried, Erin:
Beside what man will you be buried, while I still fly my flags
For you
Underneath the soft bellies of airplanes, while you laugh right
Into my face and watch your bench-pressing cartoons.
Why couldn't you care to love the dreams

I planted for you, Erin-
Why couldn't you lay down and close your eyes
For me in the garden I created for you under these lights,
Instead of casting me further a field
And there to grow even stranger towards the voices
To which you pretended to weep.

Robert Rorabeck

The Voluptuous Gossips

There is a science up in the air given over to Juvenility and lunch trucks—
As beautiful girls are given to their men,
Like the sacrifices at the ends of their dusty roads:
Sometimes individuals amongst them will fall
In love once or twice
But it is never pleasant
And none amongst us will ever have to read about
It—
These words now are the scars I have developed
Sleeping alone in my wife's parents' bed in Shanghai, China—
While there are not enough feet amongst the mountains
And the camels go without water
As the cars go without gasoline,
But I only know so many words—
And it is a shame,
That not a single soul in the world loves me
The way I once loved a muse or two—
Now you can find me,
The King Kong,
The Godzilla of the perpetually anonymous zoo—
Fretting for no one,
Ready to destroy cities,
Learning how to love his infant son in place of A muse, while the blind stars shine down
Across all of the voluptuous gossips of so many TV shows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Warmth Of Familiar Holidays

I have a house that is fully grown:
I have a house that is a grandfather, who I bought from
A homosexual artist and his mother who
Was at least as old as this house:
He painted each room a different soft shade of shell,
And now each room flows around my barren body
While I think of Sharon and fireworks:
I think of the things that will sell, that aren't already venal,
And yet are not scarred like me;
It must take a beautiful being to be not either of the two,
And yet someone who hasn't seen the soft tips of mountains
Underneath the coiling planes of nimbus:
For surely the rains will be blocked up like traffic,
And they will wait for awhile like rabbits in the briars,
Enjoying their festivals until it is time again to escape:
Just as I can write my novels, and think upon Alma
And her warm children
While around me the people who are renting their bodies two one
Another make the sounds of a joyful orchard;
And if I have been away, it has only been to Arizona, or maybe
My soul has been away,
But the planets continue to shuffle their feet. They are getting cold
Waiting outside,
Wanting like little children, like us all, to return home once again,
Basking in the warmth of familiar holidays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Warmth Of My Mother's Eyes

Tadpoles feel the warmth of my mother's Eyes as she seems to sing to me off their warmth:
They are like butterflies riding seahorses—
And they will wake up in nine months in the origin
Myths of their playgrounds, and pretend to Know so many things—as Nature takes off her clothes:
She is stepping outside at the edge of a mountain.
Looking down, it is like a kaleidoscope of bears and Mountain lions, fighting resiliently for trees
And birthday presents—but they pause and they
All take notice as the factories and fruit markets
Shut down—and the woman that they love
Steps off the mountain and into her car and Drives away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wash Basins Of Your Other World

The day dreams feathered by its hosts-
Night dressed in palms greenly winnows until the forests
Kneel before the sea
And tell her how beautiful she is to me:
For these are my messengers, Alma- see how little they move,
But how far they go:
These are my messengers, Alma- like tall men waiting in An unspoken hall to give you these things which Tell you of what value you mean to me,
The way stones wait to speak with the lightning,
The letters castaway in the glass throats of bottles cradled by the Endless sea,
All begging for hope and salvation, like brothers keeping
Warm around a fire that bares what light your gaze can reflect,
Your senses a promulgation of a glorious symphony,
With each instrument throbbing wet pistils like green blow torches
Soldering a heroic song inside of me,
While the trees ripple their reflections into the brook,
Like unperceivable tears into the wash basins of your other world,
With great sorrow fearing that you may never return to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Washbasins Of Mandevilla

On loan from the washbasins of mandevilla,
My scars make no pronunciations of their own:
They are the love letters to the death
And blind who fall asleep through their troubles
In an overgrown nest in the woods,
Where the kine startle them awake into darkness
From the glorious crossbeams they summoned behind
Their floating eyes-
That is where Alma lives and bakes bread on hot flat
Rocks down in the dry creek beds, where she kisses
And sings to rattlesnakes on their Lips,
And tosses witchcraft into the empty cradles now
That her children have crossed the roads into the frontier,
Where her mother spent a month knitting and crying out
Alma's name,
Like a pinprick of a rosary's perfume in a homeopathic
Boudoir she wears around her neck-
The very same diminutive challis she used to win me over,
And to send my ticking spirit over the homes with no roofs,
To create a penumbra for a terrapin,
And to let the sun drip around her as she languorously played,
Heating up and resurrecting things for me to believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Water Parks Of Pure Happenstance

A sheet of paper killed the emperor,
And put the old girlfriends into a peaceful sleep
For the Butcher to do his work; it fed the lions any old
Soda-jerk so their comely fleeces were mottled with rosy
Bits and blushing pieces-
Waking them up from the tranquility of the flock,
It forced the hands backwards on the skeleton clock;
Off work, it got me drunk, and made me look
Such a hunk, on amusing swings under Deciduous trunk- The house was a galvanized shadow
Into which us truants liked to flunk;
And, taking aim, I picked her off with roman candles from
The roof,
Giving greedy alligators such luscious, cheering proof.
I made her remember who I am, with just a gentle
Cursive of my hand-
It smelled of eloquence and marble ham, and laid the Somber bouquet on her mowed bed, a perfume for sand lions
And saddle ants; it brushed its fingers across the spindled
Hips of new romance, and captivated intelligence around
The Sea of France which it filled out of the water parks of Pure happenstance; it read in burrish twists,
There will be consequence, and charmed the eyes of all
The strangers transmogrifying them into telescopic lovers,
Serving girls with dishes of unspoken palaver, each mute syllable
A generous portion of inkish slather,
So in gentling tongues wish to abolish her apoplectic indifference,
Laid out in a bedroom of libraries, ate her oyster and cupped her
Cherries,
Took her down the riddled cataract, proposed to her and stuffed
Her in a gunny sack for the garish moon and unlucky heavens to Harp upon, as across the insensitive earth,
Pouting kisses, granting meaningless wishes, galloped her home
To straighten my stacks and do the dishes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Waterfalls

If you do not love me again tomorrow, Alma:
What then will I have to do,
Because you are the deepest river of my soul, even if my soul
Is misery:
Or if it is a buttercup, or a stammering mongoloid in the bright
Sunny lips of another classroom that it is somehow
Paradoxically too bright for,
Just as if it was too burning for publication:
Just as if it was a fish too deep down for the jubilation of the fair:
Or for wishing; it is still a thing that breathes and comes up
For breaths,
And it is still barbed by the shadows of your lovely existence:
That is was here, and thus it has always been,
While my house lies empty save for the perfumes of your adulterous
Sin;
And this is wavers and quivers, again, Alma- again against
The lines of a bosque in the night into which it is not thoroughly
Cover,
Or that it does not know if it can mine enough silver;
Because, surely, Alma- my brother in law is more beautiful than
I am, all armored in silver; but it matters little, Alma,
My love, as long as you sing to me in water fountains,
As long as your love for me drowns out the waterfalls.

Robert Rorabeck

The Waterfalls The Lions Roar

Illusions in a fluted world practice
All kinds of mimics, while the sad poetess
Weeps underneath her gravestone in a
Record heat wave:
She is neither here nor there, and her lover
Or her husband is swept to a sea of chalk.
The trees use to sing to her,
The churches use to light up blue cerulean,
And their was a voice in her heart
Even though it was a murdered voice- now
It listens to the raw traffic and the whale bone
Utterance of the sea saw- the red and yellow
Helicopters report of a sad nuisance
And then travel on in tandem as if a wire
Held them together,
And she is down there underneath the plastic
Flowers like a gold fish who once swam
In the sunlight who has fallen
To floor,
Like a penny without the wishes of the cheapest
Muse- and the airplanes sing deafening
Over the waterfalls the lions roar.

Robert Rorabeck

The Waterfountains Of Repolished Hallways

In these days are bared their new songs,
Like waterfalls gushing over the open wounds of windmills
That epic heroes have become too lush to Ever fully explore: all of the rich aphrodisiacs spread in unison
Across the forest floor,
And amongst the pallid feet of aspen: flickering like hot blooms,
Like house plants cared for too well to ever survive again
Back into the forest,
While butterflies are too quick, and they will soon be underneath
The leaves;
Just as her lips reinvigorate across the water fountains of a
Repolished hallways that doesn't have to care to remember me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Waves Messing Around

The bottle seems to disappear into the lips of Lonely flowers
And even makes me think to figure that I am doing good
Work,
Even while this ladder leads up to nowhere,
Or just high enough to scratch at planes' bellies;
And if we sold fruit up here imagine all of the nose bleeds:
Imagine the theatre and the fans;
Or the places we could go alone to be floating on banks,
To figure ourselves out and really in love:
To smell the scents of the game, or to just lie on our stomachs
And watch all the waves messing around.

Robert Rorabeck

The Waves Of Your Apathetic Beauty

Inside the socially acceptable cars,
Preschoolers in the backseat doing their arithmetic
And patty-cake,
Looking out at a day of shopping in sunlight,
Or rain,
The easy puzzlement of their yet unsexed appendages,
Everything they need to take them outstretched to the zoo,
Seeing the oily otter for what it is,
Pomadened and clever, cracking its shells,
Accepting popcorn, believing in the one true God
Who seems to hover above them in a true to life mural
Among the trees,
Not yet the pantheists I know them as,
Forever hungrily gambling for the goddess' milk,
The animals they see you in, the metamorphosis in
The butterfly house- In brilliant enjambments what are these Things you come by them, no longer any use to monotheism,
The scrappers in the banyan trees, the lost kite entangled there,
The barbered lovers in the bathroom,
Or the snakes in the heated cages with the lab rats;
You in everywhere abound, free for a day and thoughtless,
Open legged in the grass and calling down your boys,
Crashing ships and airplanes, riding bareback across to
The forbidden canal, trusting the horned crocodile;
And never yet a prize to me, though your neck and things when Allowed feed all the hummingbirds;
Yet thinking that they should call you down from where they Are, the impossible thing by unrequited invitations
That you should come swimming on the other side of the Glass, smooth and surreal, licked clean for a weekend of rich memories,
Thank god you are the advanced vocabulary,
The knowledge yet netted from the wilderness to be brought
Out and exhibited, made to perform like a slave
Yet brought up to their lips,
Something once sighted and romanced upon to which a body
Smooth like a stone in the surreptitious sea,
Never to be unclasped by the waves of your apathetic beauty.

The Waves' Tumultuous Cavalries

Sky enamel the cross with light,
Beside the highway without a savior,
You are for the tourists now,
For little children at their games,
Use you for a May Pole, and dissolution
Your somber dress made for the Benefits of the wayward kings,
Who with their scribes pollinated
The latest continent, and divided it
By the highways of amnesiac business:
They are going so fast now,
And the possible directions are magnified,
Where the dead have more homes
Beside the tombs of blue and gray generals.
Some one of them loved you
Before the day, and held your hand
Even before the conception's glow
In the park's womb beneath the canopy
Until, into this graduation of crippled thought,
You came unpublished hobbling,
The wasted ink staining the thumb,
A transcendental birthmark meant
To signify the deity in her legs' crime,
Instead, left in the manicured lawn unclaimed
In between the ants' parade and
The tourists' picnic, the narcolepsy
Of a priest's vibrations adjacent to
The ocean's moaning choir boys, the waves the spasms,
Edifying only the builder's illusion,
The mosquito's needs inside the skin,
The magnificent cross upon the wharf,
The pestle of apocryphal slang,
Unjustified alongside the numbered route,
Where people pass into the sinkhole's memory,
The mortar of the insatiable pseudopygrapha
And dead girls, ungraduated, perpetually
March about in the darkness, concentrically garlanding
That stemming phallus with unjustified needs,
The garments of their sisterhood's virginal fluidities,

Fitting upon the hymen's stone as hands cup breasts,
As attentive ears drink the beatific noise once
Meaningfully put in the unrecorded day,
The letter carriers upon the tide, bathing
In the calm between the waves' tumultuous cavalries.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way A High School Marching Band Becomes Unfurled

Pall bearers of smoke charms running at a
Distance,
Through the seems and tresses of the pool-yards
And landfills of
Her inherited easements:
Lancelots blown like ashes over the hot coals
Of her windswept doorstep,
Tripping over her schoolyards and the horny heads
Of her alligators;
And she is in love with a doorman, by what is Brought to her:
And she looks up into the eyes of a brown man,
Because that is everything which is beautiful to her,
The days coming like newborns slipping needily into Estuaries,
The herons and egrets but flashes of disbanded memory;
And she drives around and looks good and the Wildlife comes to her though it is all wild:
And she has lost her only child to the hungry minds that Roam across the brackish charms,
And in that scrappy pitch the coos and grunts of the Things better left unsaid,
If they were not truly what she meant:
There beneath the loping shadows of the school yard, she Kisses her own wrist, smelling the perfumes she bought for
The wider world;
And the coital trills surround her just the way a high school
Marching band becomes unfurled.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way A Painter Does

Standing off by myself with the pigeons
Cooing in their shade,
Watching the busses turning around,
Spun off the hips of housewives
Wanting to kiss vampires—
Returning famished from shopping
From their afternoons:
Now look at how beautiful they
Are, open-bloused in the air-conditioning—
Their ceiling fans collecting the
Dusk
Like Christmas lights and chicken wire—
Until they finally cook dinner
When the winos go to sleep underneath the Palms—
And further away the waves caress the shore,
Touching her the way a painter does
When his wife is not at home.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way I Fear

The way I fear
Her hand enjoys being held
In the nest of his fingers....
The way I fear
Her eyes make wishes to See his reflection attracted Toward her,
Like skipping stones
On a lake nearby he lies her down....
The way I fear
The conjunction of their lips,
The hybrid adjective expressing
The way they feel....
The way I fear
The secret compression of love's
Bodies entwining the chains
Of their swings together
As they kiss....
The way I fear the pact
Between lovers
The new seasons in which
She grows away from me
To meet him by the old
Aqueduct clothed in mussels
And green algae
Glowing, the only light
That lies upon two bodies,
Taking a tumble on the whispering beach
The finest sport of humanity
That for its while defeats Death,
The silenced, senseless body
In the coffin
With it's name in stone no one Remembers....
The way I fear....

Robert Rorabeck

The Way I Shall Forever Be Known For Loving You

Okay,
Now I am so beautiful, I can't Even see straight, and I shouldn't be Writing anymore for tonight,
And yet I wonder if my muse is reading me:
If she knows what's good for her, she is,
She is, and its as beautiful as traveling airplanes
To think that she might me, that she is:
Mi Amour; I have a broken jaw
When I was four, and my father put me atop
Of Styrofoam on I-95 in South Florida,
And my mother drove me at 45 mph,
Or so she says: and this is utterly personal
Now, and my body is so numb from cheap rum,
That I recall perfectly the highways of my scars:
Erin, and it is quite perfect, listening to this
Other continent: Can't you see me across
The scars I give to you, utterly, Erin:
I love you, and yet I am whole, even as you go
Down on him in so many ways, after so many years
I left you, and my epitaph is that I love you,
And I've been to Spain and chased the guitar;
And I suppose you've told him,
And I hate you, but I was so valiant as to become
The avenue by which my sister Rachelle
Got married without the mention of Christ:
And now she works for a man who sells the used
Cars of her rosy heritage: I used to come over to her house
With the singular cypress, as if it was a privilege to have A cypress in her front-yard:
But, as I began, so I must conclude:
The glass of rum has surely done me in, and I
Really shouldn't be attempting poetry, because mine
Is full of flaws, buried around the riches surrounding my Youth: I don't know Yiddish:
Ha! Ha! I have all my teeth still, and I love you,
Erin! And f-you, too, because I am coming to my end,
Certainly, because of you- I can hardly see straight:
I have a great uncle who is a retired state judge in Oregon, but he doesn't even deserve my Prose, Erin, and now I am coming to my inevitably Sad conclusion: I have enough money to buy a house

With a chimney and a beautifully sad garden,
And even without you, my dogs will know my smells,
And remember me that way, even as they die,
And the world comes to war:
And thus I love you, while I fear you haven't Love anyone at all, the way I shall forever be known
For loving you.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way It Is

The cathedrals have been lighted across the ships
That are very fine,
And I took my day off and went to see you, and bought you
A rosary full of kisses,
And told you everything that was the truth:
The cars coming in and stopping, and waiting to see what
It might be that you had to say,
As I wondered if you would teach your children your Favorite colors,
Or add my secret wishes to yours; you asked me to paint my House green,
Because I told you Armando doesn't like yellow,
And I got jealous, Alma, of my cousin spending time with you,
But that is just the way it is.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way Otters Shed Tears In A Make Believe Zoo

They broke up and I shot my sister:

It was the eighties and everyone was playing on the Beach.

The waves wore neckties. Writers drank waiting for their Wives in trailer parks;

And the girl was probably blond: She was probably Elizabeth Shue and she didn't bother adjusting her
Bathing suit as she walked away to bathe

With the harbingers of her song:

Her sisters were in the waves, and they laughed together
And turned their backs,

Because they didn't care even while I was trying to Show off:

I picked these roads for her like flowers like tunes
For sleeping grandmothers, legions and legions of entombed
Wombs

That once loved their granddaughters when they knew how to Love;

And I have so many bruises while I give up and go to sleep
Under the greatest penumbras of the University:

You just know I do;

And even when I am done with my canto mime, I still wait
For you at the bus stop, wasting my time;

And when I get on the bus I dream all of the way to school:

I wait for your eyes to light upon me, for you to love me
Just the way I love you;

But I am such a fool, because school is gone and this is Just a graveyard: You are dancing with your knights, or where Have you gone;

And school is over and the lions saunter and fall asleep,
And you are well practiced: you weep like a young daughter in Preschool, and the tears I cry for you shed from your wings
The way otters shed tears in a make believe zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way The Powerlines Keep To The Streets

They sat up and said they were in love,
And the clouds came all over themselves
Until there were churches in the Blue sky
Like scars on my cheeks, and they sang
And they danced,
Holding each other until dawn like the way
The power lines keep to the streets.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way To My Grave

They had some powwow and they made a truce:
She has his initial tattooed on the brown web of her hand:
He used to beat her,
But it doesn't matter: they held hands as they crossed the Frontera together:
I have money and a house, but it doesn't matter:
Her eyes look away, and she asked me not to tell her I love
Her;
And her brown skin is perfect, but my statue of the virgin
Fell and shattered,
Some bad luck, or an evil spell, while serpents curl
Like smoke in the bosque- the inevitable situations of life
Where the monsters win,
While brothers make love to sisters only to be thrown far
A field-
And now I will quit the fruiteria and find a job all by myself,
Or maybe I will write another novel in place of the child
We could have had if she didn't have her period;
And it will carry her eyes and her perfume heavy on my senses
And all the way to my grave.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way To The Fountains

Late at night, or early morning
I dream of falling on my knees as Deeply sniffing
Diana's crotch right there in the Morning of the fruit market,
Holding both of her legs like a wonderful
Crutch,
With my sister and all those buffoons
On-looking:

And she is just standing still, steaming like
A dream taken out of the oven,
Like a fish from its stream, wavering,
Wavering
Like south-Florida crime fiction;

And late at night again, like a zoetrope,
Lapping the orchid in bed, using my tongue like
A katydid,
The aphids hooting on their well-purchased
Stands,

Diana- Diana with her banner flowing;
And the sea is peaceful, and the sea is beaten
Like amusement we lay across,
And I take Diana
Hand in hand
Dripping of sauce and bloods
all the way to the fountains of my love.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way We Believe

This doesn't have to be the way we believe in
For us to die:
I will never at all know what it means to be newly escaped
From Mexico,
Where the snow falls and is pricked right away by Windmills,
And then comes down like camel tears, like cigarettes in the Taught billfolds of coquets,
While the alligators wait by themselves, until all of that summer
Is finally packed up;
And the guts of the tourists are sucked in,
And the treats are laid off for long contemplations of the Cenotaphs fanning themselves in the most
Feral amusements of the waves,
As right this way all of this had to happen, shameful,
Even as the next of the hurricanes was turning around,
And husbands and wives tried to survive together lost from
The perfumes of
The vanishing orchards, their copper cannons once green,
Now emptily venomous and looking out across the definably
Slender lakes of those canals,
And having their way with themselves, and everything else
That I am sure of rotted away,
Like right off the rinds of her green kilns that were even still Trying to remember the luxury of the rhymes of her favorite color,
Even though they didn't have anything else by which to live;
And the conquistadors came, lustrously courting the stewardesses
Who dusted across the sky like luxurious sieves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Way You Kiss Yourself

Even now all the night shines, and you don't call me:
These are my silly wishes to world that knows nothing at all of
Them,
These are the most silent of prayers, the candles inside their Bushels,
Placed to the lips of the grotto where I can here you
Basking,
And doing the laundry, or making your love to your mother
Inside the rose bushes:
And I will wait for you until I starve, Alma.
As all of my art resounds like a single firecracker in the air,
And then comes down in no wind at all over a baseball diamond
Naked of players,
As the world turns its dials by degrees, and the wind chimes smother
The butterflies, the mountains cry their cricks,
And the airplanes kick the dust of the skies:
I don't know anymore, any more beautiful words for you,
And I seem to crest like the fire on a wave just as your brown eyes
Are coming up and are about to see:
The way you kiss yourself before them and then look away
Infinitely.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wealth She Has Stolen

Lost in the bivouacs of a fruit orchard,
Saying goodbye to a make-believe wife while the Sun showers slick the ladders
And the day laborers come down, tanning repeatedly,
And eating golden delicious:
What will they go home with, but gold fish in their Pockets:
Up the cinderblock steps, the house cats and their Wives waiting for them to read golden books
To the soft dreams of their children
Even while outside there is no more traffic, and the moon
Comes out of her mines with all of the wealth she has stolen.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weather In Which He Comes

I can line up things and squinting shoot:
Knights will hang from their trees crackling like clams,
Like mailboxes waiting for the mail;
And I can line up things to sell:
Everyday bodies returning to their mausoleums, bodies of blue
Bells but also pure joy,
Boys in wheelchairs, girls in curls and weaves:
The darker their skins are the smaller the houses, but also the Closer to the seas:
And I wake up on the Gold Coast and listen to the beating of Spears on shields;
And I can look out my window to see the cradle of hurricanes
Because that is where they are birthing,
Curling like water snakes soon to slip across the yard underneath
Her heels:
They go so far away to kiss her mouth, as she lounges outside
Open bloused like a weather vane,
Lips bending like wildflowers smelling the weather in which he Comes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weathers Dressing Their Weddings

Now the bodies are gold and the fish are lost,
And I have my own house:
I work at my parents' fruiteria which spans almost a block:
The cars and airplanes go their own separate ways,
While I miss you, Alma:
So much that I am curled up in a ball on my floor listening
The air-conditioning and the other untrue bluenesses of the world-
While I have been to the crests of mountains,
While you have never been to Disney World: when there are so many Places I would hope to take you Alma:
Alma, I want to hold your hand in mine, as we walk through those Places,
And place my tongue together with your silly places, and call you fine:
And call you mine, Alma, whilst the electricity makes love to the Lightning on the trams, Alma, and we can follow their Sparks all the way home,
And make love in the jubilations muted by all the boisterousness of
All the weathers dressing their weddings in so much rains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weathers Of Better Things

I want to love you in the silence of a bus
Broken down behind the school yard,
And kidnap you and take you back there into
The burned down
Memories of my youth- as a companion for
My truancy:
I want you to have the same scars that
I have, anytime:
And I want to steal fireworks with you, and go out
With you in the madness of the latest darkness
Over the suburbia abandoned by all of your Sisters
Running, translucent ribboned on up to their Universities:
And I want to lie there in the oil slicks with
The alligators grinning,
On our backs admiring the jewelry of airplanes
And other things I cannot find without you-
Even though you don't live there anymore:
For the daylight has eaten you with all of your Fine sisters,
And made evaporations of your confections, leaving
The schoolyard to dance without you-
And hoping for the weathers of better things.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weather's Sorrows

Raindrops rush to kiss their shadows;
On the street, the ineffective weaponry of little tears,
They become something else,
The stanzas to the prism's blush,
And the joy invades the puddles where the Shadows are smothered, and the raindrops splatter
And lose themselves in the crowds of effluvious reflections;
The muddy eddies of the nameless insignificance
No one drowns in.

Then the street is so busy it cannot stop to save
The wavering shadows of indecisive weather,
Though the form of the world remains unchanged,
With neither heat nor frost added, though
The energy changes sides many times in the little wars,
And it is true that for awhile everything lives,
And then for a very long while everything dies,
Then souls are annexed to their secret rooms,
And the bones of kings and serfs grin together
Under the mealy bogs.

Though imagine the mysterious joy I can find in
The weather's sorrows, the cold tips of liquid arrows
Send the sparrows to their nettled roosts;
And house cats meowing to their masters' stoops,
But if I keep enough time outside by the weighing window,
I will see her pass by and recognize what she is;
For a moment, a dropp of rain walking in the shallow sky,
Before she is forever changed inside the over spilling
Buckets of her noisy metropolis;

Coming back to her in a dream,
She continues falling without reason except
That is what she is, a weathered tear dropp in the shallow sky,
An inexpensive joy I must recognize before I too
Am constantly changed.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weathers That Never Loved Me

Spindling its cleverness, the weather of such joy uncoils,
And you can see it through the living room's
House,
How the guts of the world spills like tin trumpets in the Deeply saturated field,
Hoodwinked by brothers who are at war with themselves,
Clouded with passengers,
As the green horns and the coral snakes roil; and I suppose
There is some mountain far away parked straight against
A sea,
And there are little houses up her slopes filled with little Girls who never even saw the weathers that never loved me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weddings Of The Dry And Foreboding Land

Horses drinking down at the river.
Horses of dead men, or you can never be sure
If they aren't speaking to the woman of blue,
Speaking over her infinite mane,
This woman of opulent rain:
She seems to peel straight through the trees;
It seems that they are bowing to her,
And yet there is no story recited of her criminal
Death,
How she cried herself that way and separated the Country from the boys;
And airplanes leapt over her, but they were just Sad little toys;
And no math could enter her,
But the horses came with their saddle bags of Sand,
And she opened up her throat and reached out her hand;
And she ran until she rightly disappeared into the tendrils
Of the weddings of the dry and foreboding land.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weedy Tombs

Sore wounds of hopscotch:
The sunstones blistering their lips only on their cousin
Tomb stones:
The whole world a type writer being thrown-
Roses dying in a bottle of red:
The whole world the scribble of what I wrote,
Trying to bleed forever what she said:
And she drives home again with him,
When she never even wanted to leave:
The mechanical reindeer foraging on the stony lip of
A suburban river,
Their masters far away, tucked behind the garage:
The children returned from school:
Tucked in;
The grapes on the vine that the alligators' grin:
And airplanes in the sky,
As is the golden rule: sky writers proselytizing Jesus
With smoky jizz over the highway
As the traffic streams with their own delusions:
And the tractors in their fields-
With my love lost on her way to work- the mice are Gossiping, the midgets give gifts in the Palmettos down from which the canals yearn slowly
Up from which the buttercups grow,
Attracting the clowns with bleeding souls-
In the unfurling yards which blossom as they are mowed;
As the horses are groomed
Over the weedy tombs of the immortally wounded.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weeks Of The Sea

Made of clairvoyant tattoos in the bitter-hearted forest,
As this way all of the well transvested knight run,
Pooling their numbers,
Blue and purple hearted—as the waves foam and fumble,
Until the last of them is wounded and heartbroken upon the steps
Of the forest,
One time lover of the sea—He goes down into her, tip-toeing:
And she beckons him, open throated,
Throwing her bosoms at his chest,
Never thinking of the times we had together—as the sun burns
His acolytes through the surf, wishing but once that he had a single one
Of her priorities—as she sings to them, wishing to become surer
Towards her—so they swim, salty-throated—echoing men from their Abandoned ships—and she catches them and knots them
And gives them all of the weeks of the sea to amend their love
For her—smiling as she does all the time at me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weeping Offspring

I love the playoffs in the sky;
Its where the popular kids make their name.
Bottled, her lips taste
Like red lightning
The last day we saw each other.
She kissed my neck, but not hard enough:
Alice is in the hospital,
Surrounded by the weeping offspring
She is still going to die
Of stage four cancer.
There are many things that die
Which go unseen from the stage
Without a jot- The Abyssal Planes
Hold a multiplexed neighborhood
Where her legs never sweated
As they passed me by Like peppermint candy
Swizzled by my honey's lips.
If she doesn't love me,
I should not cry,
For there is someone she will love
Who will bear her children to see
Her out one day
In the afternoons when I skipped school,
And it is my fault I was never good
At equations of this certain kind.
All I know is I have seen her from afar,
And loved her as I should,
Sweltering like a mirage in short shorts
Before the curtain fell
Without an encore.

Robert Rorabeck

The Weight In Me

She said that she would say she loved me:
He has two children anyways; and she lives with seven other Family members in a house no smaller than mine,
But one that they cannot afford: and this is the New America,
Sung to by a ghost who can never live again;
This is the petit mort of my new art,
In its casual catastrophe who by the twilight of whatever fireworks
There are left to spend is always ruining my liver;
And I can, and I have made love to her; but who ever thought
Back in high school that I would ever be making love to
A real live Mexican girl, light enough to fly- the fulcrum for
The existence of my inebriated poetry: I don't even need to drive:
She is all that I have to pray, and she feeds me the overpriced
Food that I buy for her, each of us indulging in the self involved
Mirages of our glimmering eyes: hers even deeper than my own;
And come tomorrow I will see her again at the fruit market,
And the coppery meat plating her bones; and sometimes when we Don't even know it, we sit relaxing in the same air-conditioning
Of different theatres in the same movie house;
And we relax together like hunters in the colonnades of an over manned
Forest which always tries to sing her away from me; but she is
My art, as little as it is: she barely ways a hundred pounds,
But Alma is all that is the weight in me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Well Viewed Sighs Of Beating Hearts

The foreplay of young lovers
Dances before the moaning tower.
The ghost in despair can see
The courting in the silver glade-
His eyes are the daggers which Reveal the flesh of his focus.
He would tear down the tower
To fly free,
But his form has no power,
And all that is left for him
Is the subject of his purgatory.
When the sun is just a cut
Bleeding through the woods,
And they lie cusped in pollination,
Then in ceaseless perambulations
The specter exercises his punishment.
All is useless but his eyes,
Those that he can ever see but never touch
The living world pressing flesh
Into the intimacy of reproductive feeling
When his body lies in a restless place
Like a crocodile's skull
The sterile cenotaph of metamorphosis,
Now the futile incarnation
Imprisoned by the unobtainable breathing,
The well viewed sighs of Beating hearts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wet Lips Of Strange Storms

You asked me why I had so many candles, when I don't Even know all of the saints,
But I've been decorating for you, like the pretty colors under
The naked belly of el arco iris,
To try and call you home across the yards of a far away
Deminsion,
Even though I cannot speak fluently in your language:
We both have seen Christmas trees and made love in different
Sorts of penumbras,
And we both hide creatures of shells in our room because I bought
Them together at a thrift store,
And then separated them for us: And the same rainstorms share our Houses.
And your children play through the caresses and scabbed knees of Your carpet just as I still turn plastic stewardesses out tumbling on My paper jets:
And I can look over my wall and see a sparse statuary;
And I can breathe in the places that you have walked and told me
That you cannot leave your children fatherless,
But you left all of Mexico on the bus like a welded casket down a
Stone river;
And now how the nameless hills weep for you, the rattlesnakes
Striking out at the looseness of your shadows
That disperse under the wet lips of strange storm clouds that are Now so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Whale Bones In The Harbor

By the jeweled crown,
And the whale bones in the harbor:
The way the crow looks up,
Perched on the stones- and hold their Eyes like cold
Jewelry the children walk underneath
Unassuming of the words
I might use for her,
To fill up coffins- to flood and Hold over;
And shadows are in the park;
And the dog has no master, but it goes
This way, and eyes the waves as they loll:
And they seem to be coming back to her
From far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wheeling Transoms

Through the playgrounds of a sibilant school yard
We say things about who we are:
The cars come together as if for communion, their bodies
Growing older but with no more wisdom,
And the tired salesmen collapse into the entry ways of Graveyards
Even while the day seems to be hooded with a cap of Gold,
And all the big pictures are playing in the cool and the darkness:
Alma with her children in a silver dream,
Like the phosphorous veins that spindle through a disrupted
Sea:
I would reach down to keep her body on the surface like a brown
Leaf:
I would metamorphosis into a paper boat just to come together
And kiss her ochre ridges,
And to smell her through the sounds of airplanes,
All the way from the soft forests of Mexico- all the long and Embarrassing ways she came by bus, pregnant with Michael,
Her eyes looking through the wheeling transoms, seeing so
Far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Whispers Of Her

Naked apples and candy canes- No one is going
To the fair,
But the clouds are not gone- they are hanging there,
And the road down beneath them, reflecting their Shadows,
As she sheds her skin- and then goes to sleep underneath
The overpass,
While the sea brushes the whispers of her to him.

Robert Rorabeck

The Whispers Of The Butterflies

Down in that chasm where the dragon remains
Nameless,
Wasting another quarter- the willow sprigs buoyantly
Expecting to save another man:
Well, we made love a week ago, but I wonder if
We will ever have the chance to make love again:
The levitations of bread across a window,
The flight paths of the unseen- Still, she levitates
So wonderfully, dreaming the undream-
And I stand still to caress her, my muse of the hapless
Deficiencies:
I stand here in strange unfamiliarity of my household
Waiting for a kiss from her,
Waiting for the ice-cream to melt for dolphins,
As the traffics drive around her world- spirally,
Echoing as if call girls at prom- soon they will be married
And then divorced: soon they will be calling up the Echoes of their misspent wishes,
And I will follow them like the footsteps of horses
Through the castles where the whispers of the butterflies
Still come and play.

Robert Rorabeck

The Whispers Of Their Birthdays

The foundations of your barcodes look good
From here- they seem to be sleeping in their windowsills,
Just like the wives you have chosen
While the traffic drives all night, especially the trucks
Of housewives,
But I have fed all of my bread to the lips of
The sumo goldfish- I have fed all of my wrists to
The orange angels who arent even a primary color:
I believe there are only two or three primary colors,
As the midnight comes
With its blind sun, and swims in the rugs of my
Kindergarten
Like tulips falling their during night time:
Falling their, trying to figure out whom I love,
Or what love was stolen from me,
While in their estranged grottos, the dolphins play
Their games beautifully,
And the virgins light the candles in the whispers
Of their birthdays.

Robert Rorabeck

The White Mountains

Roads into narcolepsy:
Returning into that land after all of the fireworks
Are sold,
And their holidays forgotten in their fashion:
Even the birds have Migrated,
Eating the ferris wheels of butterflies along their Way:
Going here where arrows lie amidst the Silver mountains
Where Geronimo used to smoke in golden rings:
Where once there was so much trouble,
But now there is only movie theatres that show
One movie a week under
Green lights
And the sundials of the cliff dwellers and their Dried sun in the canyons of human sacrifice:
And tourists, sometimes,
Who don't want to get as high up as Colorado:
Yes, they come here too-
Taking their children amidst the faeries' woods;
And the bears lick their lips,
Wondering if they should talk to them- it is where
I spent five years of my post adolescents
And felt myself in the vanishing woods
Underneath the stolid graveyards where my Grandmother is, underneath the white mountains.

Robert Rorabeck

The White-Washed Sea

White bread and white maids,
Marmalade and sugar tarts: stick me
High atop the citrus tree,
Like a paper airplane, paper nose pointing
The way to the white-washed sea:
Pretty dolls and forget-me-nots,
Ivory beavers slapping dams,
Lover-boys in snowy trams making their Procession to the white-washed sea:
Tourists there, Mickey-Mouse, and fricassee,
Conquistadors jounced on vanilla poles,
Saints and crosses like Spanish scarecrows on Concrete atolls, bleed anemically towards
The white-washed sea: Hills of windmills are Picaresque, lovely cherries on her white washed-
Breasts, bones of birds and pica ninnies;
Aunts sing cantos at their nieces nurseries,
Pale and freckled and on their knees,
Girls who'd been roller-skating as if on foam,
Stop and pray to the white-washed sea;
Pick themselves up, adjusting their silky delicates,
Before rolling home, to sit cross-legged smoking
Candied cigarettes and gossiping underneath the Sky's crenulated dome, eyes so lost and hopeless,
All fair and so lonely, yet well-perceived,
Searching for some solutions across the white-washed sea.

Robert Rorabeck

The Whole D@mned Sky

The clouds are happy to have Both their ears,
And they rise up, rise up
Like kings-
I have delivered pizzas under
Clouds,
Gossiping,
Ringing doorbells,
Spuming rain-
I have run with my dogs and Howled,
And practiced witchcraft
To gain you by the pitiless clouds;
Sat and powwowed,
And become possessed
By sweet water demons;
All to no avail-
I have failed under clouds because Never once have I kissed you or Even held your hand underneath
Any cloud in
The whole d$mned sky.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wide Open Correspondence Of The Sweet Young Earth

Drink while you're awake-
And don't forget to spell, or bring your love
Bouquets.
Soon it will be science-fiction: soon it will Be unreal.
She'll be a unicorn- narcoleptic in an office
Building; she'll be a literary agent for romance
Novels,
And I can only remember that I am doing this Because I have seen my reflection in the mirrors
Of so many humid rest-stops
In states I had never been to; and to tell the Truth, pirates are really beautiful with candles
Burning in their beards,
Even after they're captured and garroted and Made an example of, they are still beautiful-
Even if every last one of my novels should fail,
I can still cross the low bridges where soft-shelled
Tortoises are sleeping, escaping from the zoo:
Haven't they, and the wildlife is so close, and the Fact that they have pin-ball makes it all right and Quite beautiful that you are out of work, and scarred,
And not made for friends- You have three decades
And a record and you are just now getting around to Reading The Jungle Book- Cheap rum does this to you,
Makes you soliloquy sugar cane fields and comets
Newly tossed from planets where her venereal diseases
Are still burning: The paciderms still remember
The otherworldly hemispheres, every roller coaster
In the world where the gunpowder sweethearts, the Girls from antebellum cannons are still roaring,
And like naked waves they go exploring mindless,
Like the things you think to feel from the roots of your Finger-prints:
Your short lived pets, dogs and foxes, querulous friends,
Noses pressed to the dirt of dead ancestors,
Tails wagging to go and explore the wide open correspondence

Of the sweet young earth.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wide, Wide Canal

With my dogs so far away,
I really want to commit
Suicide:
It seems the most angelic thing to do,
Surrounded
By these cars and vultures.
There is a gun in the back of my father's Diesel truck,
Isn't there:
That f%cking truck cost him 50,000
Or something,
And he wanted 50,000 from me for his
Horses
Or he was going to kick me out,
But I only get paid 100 dollars for a 50 hr
Day,
And I really want to get out of this Truck into another one,
And shoot myself in the mouth to slide
Down that other
Holy river of razor blades,
Because it seems so much more glorious sitting
There rich and full of goats
Basking on the other side of the wide,
Wide canal.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wild Flower Graveyard Of Your Mother's Womb

Centrifugal
Esplanades-
The land turns like
A reptilian hum-job;
Seasonal amusements
In outer space-
Some of them have died;
But the others' filaments
Burn so brightly
You couldn't tell:
That we are even now
Dying-
But the Universe is a rubber
Band, once snapped
The dead will walk
The earth backwards,
And we will play cowboys
And Indians
On the green floor under
The ceiling fan
Until you are so innocent,
Blessed to disavow any of
This-
Returned to the wild flower
Graveyard
Of your mother's womb.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wilder Beasts

Then they have friends who make love too:
Over the house- over the zoo:
While the winos nuzzle, and the mountains blue: and then the nights
Get real cold
And I think of you: Alma- all warm in your body,
As in your soul, slipping in your dreams down into the unnamed
Reservoirs of Mexico:
While I try to do good work for you, licking off my wounds,
Sitting in the graveyard or my living room:
And the rains have stopped- and the traffic doesn't make a sound:
A girl stood beside me today underneath the tent
And talked to me where the Christmas trees stood:
But I could only think of the absence in your brown eyes:
Of how everyone was moving away, accounting to themselves,
While the overeager swing sets of my childhood were Being taken down:
And your body verily swam- like an otter in the lust of the sea:
While its favorite color started to take the shape of a novel,
Or of the effortless kite that your father gave to me-
While the horizon was just beautiful: while conquistadors were Eating themselves; and either the lions yawned or roared-
And their young multiplied beside the roadway
That the tourists adored- and the wilder beasts kept track, and Took account of themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wilderness We Abandon

Lakes abandoned to the afternoon,
All humanity having left the wilderness
Leaving but the contemplative basins
Reflecting the verdure
Almost on the verge of a past emotion,
Like the tear kept in the eye of a dead man
As he is buried:

I like to look at you like this
When my wife and child are out walking
In the last of the afternoon
And a melancholy sunlight sweeps through
The knees of this house—

Ethereal muse,
Now you consume my passing art,
Stealing my senses away from empiricism's habits—
I enjoy lingering on the edge of your Abandoned habitat
Until the humane desires, re-entering
With slothful pursuits of night

And I put myself to bed amidst the Stagnant shadows,
The crypt that lingers upon your nature,
The promise of a never unfolding kiss
Kept inside the wilderness we abandon.

Robert Rorabeck

The Windchimes Of My Girlfriend

There she is like a seahorse attending bar-
Underneath the halogens of the football stadium like a Lighthouse:
She trawls through the night laughing with her brown
Eyes, serving drinks to freshmen and Poltergeists- while my wounds get out like zeppelins from
The rose bushes, and they pull themselves like
A red wagon across campus- the wind chimes of my Girlfriend mutely perverse, and I sing to her
To the library and to the other places that I think do not Want to let her in.

Robert Rorabeck

The Windows Of Concrete

Returning to the purple ness at the end of the show-
At the noose of the cul-de-sac,
Into that beautiful teardropp that is turning around to Reintroduce the eye-
As the alligator watches, as the canoes slow step:
Across the soft shells, and the blue gills,
The sugar cane is burning where you cannot go,
Not because you cannot get there, but because you
Think it is impossible- and there are no
More windmills to keep turning on unfathomable
Hills-
Or the Indians beneath them, sloshing gin-
Beside pregnant coyotes- where the sky is all white
And dead, and the airplanes fly through the shrouds
Like ghosts changing clothes;
And you go down, but it is impossible to remember the Last breath you made, the angels hiding behind
The windows of concrete,
The estuaries devoid of still beating hearts, or Anything that can move.

Robert Rorabeck

The Windows Of The Women

Broken into the windows of the women that
Are so open hearted,
They wished, they hoped
That we would condone them—and open them
Like tourists departing a graveyard to arrive at Disney World
So swift and thwarted:
But I have seen the islands: I have seen the Keys
And they have birthed before us,
All bended bowed and subtled kneed:
And I have almost wished to kiss you,
Though my open throat had been so filled with Roses and the day and the night so Filled—filled with
Their sweep supposed,
And so this midnight burns in seething junctions—
Even in my ghosts have to sell bottle rockets from their primal decompositions—
I will be alright for another mile or two:
I will carry my own death's head to the picnics of your
Graveyards,
Even if we have to stutter our own time or two—even If our own fiction numbers are rubbed off—
At least it will look pretty
A time or two
As the rainbows in their own tennis courts—
And then, eventually,
Even their own numbers have to fade—as the ribbons shed off their near perfect elbows—
As in a ribbon in her own dream of spider webs—
And this becomes my lesser know dream in her European Fiction—
It yet proves that my own shadows can dance, perpetually
And alone in an unseemly ballroom of their own Benediction.

Robert Rorabeck

The Winds Blew

She, muse, tried so hard in the diligence of Heterosexuality:
The makeups she put on when she didn't really have to.
Girls name
Sharon are always beautiful, under the ceiling fans
Of the emergency room,
Their families blown to the four corners of the bedroom
Like crippled lovers;
And the sun flared up like a green science-fiction,
And she brought her lover to her like an heirloom of a broach;
While I passed the liquor around belly deep in Waves,
The traffic hurrying over head, and the sky masturbating;
But I was alone, and she was thoroughly affixed to the cantinas
Of the roam,
And the university spilled over and gave her a greater séance to Choose from.
I could have had any of my aunts, or the ladies who love
Arbitrarily in the gardens of mailboxes after crepuscule,
But I wanted the sweet little dark haired girl
With pinched nerves and thigh-high tan lines; but she was always Casting up river,
Spilling her roe into the pollinations of evergreens;
And she found her man all skinny and tight roping the Appalachian's Skree,
And loved him there forever as I wished her forever to love me;
And the moon made love in the snow
Across the gentle slopes where the horses whispered
And the winds blew.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wind-Thrown Bottles

Warm as the cantaloupes rolled from Beneath the trees—
Sweltering there, somewhere abandoned
In the upper armpit of Florida—
Perhaps in the dream of
A crocodile that was never born:
Somewhere now,
Wayward latchkey—
Perfect in his abeyances lost
To the billboards of amusement park,
Assured to over ripen in the weeds,
Virginal, never to taste the Caresses off the lips of housewives:
Lost there to the serpents
As to the flies—
Like a bachelor in his lonely studio
Filled with an overabundance of sunlight:
The joy in the room bloating him until
He awakens,
Scourged and overly sweetened—
In his final moments enjoying the reflections
Of sweaty rainbows,
The prisms birthed from the slanted and
Stolen refractions off the wind-thrown bottles.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wings Of Beautiful Grasshoppers

As a course, these people spill their desires far beneath
The sun:
This is the way they've been doing it since the world was Young,
And none of it feels anymore sincere enough to be
Real,
But it is the only way that I still know how to feel:
And the sun has been coming up and kicking itself around,
Attended by its harems of Clouds and supermen: while through it all most of us all go
Through it all but anonymous,
And we breathe our wildest dreams away at the movies
Until the night comes and we can lie all together, all the many Now faceless breathing in the deepest shadows underneath the Overpasses of our cities;
And that is when the real joy blooms, when we cannot even See to feel our bodies:
And we make love, and the angels watch us, as the waves
Caress themselves on the other side of our shoulders
That we rub together steadily like branches of the wings of Beautiful grasshoppers just to keep warm enough to survive.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wings Of Long Necked Ghosts

I grew you into a child that had no whim,
That light refracted everything I had broken you
In,
And the customers came in like animals into
An arc
In a super swift sea of cars,
And old teachers who were always tired or Forever sick,
And your knees conjoined like a Siamese
Lime tree
Where the herons galloped and the sea caracoled,
Where a super special secret was buried beneath
That no one neither thought nor cared to know,
But then kindergarten was over and we were Forced to rejoin the rivers,
Fast and so-
You graduated into a harem of a god that all the Little tales cry over,
While my sour tree whispers, whispers with the Wings of long necked ghosts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Winters Here

I will write another line as a salute to you—abandoned
Muse—where are you now,
But across from here, missing your weekend boy as you
Miss a new car:
You have lost both and I am married:
Your man rides you like a spark—sharp wheel
That turned with you out from Mexico—
What kind of utility you keep together I cannot know:
I only had to bring you one Christmas tree
Before it was time for life to move on.
And when it doesn't snow in the winters here
You do not feel so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wiser Of The Few

Epitaphs prick with blood,
And each dropp is a hidden chain,
Woven by the puckish goddess,
Who chooses her men whimsically
Back when this hemisphere was just a nebula-
In the shapes of O'Keefes' glorious
Floral throats, exploding,
Saying the hidden name repeatedly,
Like a gun going off over the mysterious hills,
Killing the glutinous wolves one at a time:
And putting the orchestra back up in the air,
The harmony of the new born kids
Who have yet to choose the color they will be:
The pastoral bloom of the unconscious genius
Drooling on his goose down pillow
Before the army comes to burn the house,
And requisition the livestock of his bucolic nocturnes:
Against the attic's darkened window,
And the blown out candle a waxy antimatter,
Absolving the absence of faith limpidly;
About the heavens' nightstand,
The scientists patter like ghosts, or albino mice;
And she is still there:
Sometimes a nightingale, but more often a housecat,
Tamed by the durations of eons,
Like a grandmother, weary but still in love
With the sleepers who lie down beneath the sill
She cleans herself, and occasionally remembers
To make a meal out of the wiser of the few.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes Of Little Boys Who Enjoy Leaving This World

While on their honeymoon they eat honeydew and buy
Fireworks—they stop for a while and eat lunch
On a hill: they are filled with the premonitions of nursery rhymes:
And they are coming forward to go back again—
Aren't they so beautiful, like wishes swinging towards those things
Which cannot be fulfilled- What a glowing species
That spill their children like caviar and pearls onto their front
Yards while the housecats sleep in the aloe—
It is a beautiful place they can remember to live in—with an Orange tree in the backyard—and churches across the canal—
But they can only escape to here when they have vanished
From everyone else—
And the houses of light stand along the road like soldiers on Point, as the rockets slip above their crowns—
The wishes of little boys who enjoy leaving this world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes Of Lucky Change

Wounded in glorious battle on the cheek
Like a star fruit in some anonymous class in the middle Of a round robin high school-
Failing gym, and slipping from the trapeze of her eyes,
Remembering her there in the yard where the cenotaphs
Breathe,
Like petrified men embattled in the summer landscaping,
The busses turning around and taking away behind them
A youth they will never see again-
As youngish lovers sweat like blue jays in the afternoons
In their beds,
Collecting there in the sports of a wishing well,
The wishes of lucky change metamorphosed into goldfish.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes Of One Or Two More Birthdays

No longer negotiable as if from the summer pools:
All the paper jacks of autumn crescendo and blow away the papers
Of resolved news:
The billboards are bit by a plague, and the world continues on a journey
Of enamorous gravity: while the sun expands like
A yellowing wolf fighting traffic:
And maybe by this time next year, Alma will have forgotten me:
Run off with another man, her brown skirts skipping to and from Mexico underneath the out of work constellation that gives so little Its many: maybe she will no longer fear my love at This time next year, or by the wishes of one or two more birthdays.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes Of The Lighthouse

In these last hours while the flowers enfold, or in fact
They die into new bodies by morning,
You lay down with him, though tell me that you love me:
You've had two children from his loins fitted like fireworks
Or paper craft into yours,
Like airplanes who conjoin in the outposts of Titans
Atop of mountains in their beds of corporeal love
Above the universities
Into which you never strove; and I get a good look out at you
By drinking my bottle every day, by which I sing my songs of
The grave;
And everything falls down a little more: the trucks coming in
The middle of the night down the wrong way of a one way street:
And you make love to him:
You have his initial on your left hand, where you now wear
My ring: and I think of, Alma, and try not to drown, hoping in my Last desperate throws to see the wishes of the lighthouse
As I strive to sing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes Of The Thieves

Newest stem in the garden:
Arisen—centerfold: don't worry that the airplanes
Will never look down to see you:
They cannot see where they are going anyways:
They are just taking off:
Be a senseless joy, and pricy—
Like fireworks:
This is your route up to heaven and no one can take
It away from you—even my own ineptitude
Cannot fail you—
For, though my senses grew you—I am lost in
The labyrinth:
Even though I do not watch television, I see too
Many movies:
And I love you: I love you just as if this was my Birthday and from the wishes of my lips
I grow you like an ember—
Like a center of the pyramids—this becomes your geometry
Until that is all there is to look forward too—
And though the fair becomes gone,
And the streets swept—I linger for you— and wait for
You like a prayer of the last wish until you
Come out and perfume the night as a birthday present
For the wishes of the thieves who continued
To linger.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes That Lingered

Comely failures who fade in time,
Bent with her soft skirts, brown stems in
The street-
What ribbon of what handlebar do you come
From, tasseled- brown skin,
Muse of honey- laughing dulcet:
I knew of the visions you planted in me using
The teeth of coral snakes-
Soft poisons, you took a year to mollify me-
That is what it takes,
While the sky curdles as the flies take to Abandoned venison-
And the memories of your coital skeleton overran
My lamentable garrison- we failed each other
Together, as your family
Burned for a little while like a lighthouse crippled
By the sea- just as long as I remember you,
Until the wishes that lingered were finally so wished
Out of me.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishes That Never Was

Thirty three years to divide all of this stuff:
Burning up the newspaper of my open wrists and armpits
To keep warm,
Or to be recognized by the mermaids all curling in their Pits,
While I've made them underneath the overpasses:
And, recognizing their perfumes,
I call them all up from the over priced rhymes of orange
Fields,
And undress them into baseball diamonds- while my Mind is gone,
And the field is not blue- the field is not blue,
Because my muse is being turned out by another man,
And all of this is the day gone Shakespeare out on double Display in the dime store courts of another man's Ferris wheel:
And there she goes, and there she comes again,
Taking off her cloths, and putting them on again, and yet
Singing so sweetly, as the world slips around my ears,
Taking off her clothes again, unbudding her roses,
And swearing up the streets that the airplanes wish they Were stamping
That she will be around again, only so that her gardens will Finally have to lay off of her long hallucinations
And have to take final rest in the long and glazed fields,
Where the butterflies were superimposing- if only if because They are always lighter than air, and only if because
That was always what they hoped they would one day asked
To be changed into,
While from them the days turned on, piling up their roses,
And giving up their wishes even to the wishes that never was.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishful Face Of Our Forgotten Florida

I am trying to feel good-
The way a bird must feel when laughing at kites,
The way kindergarteners must feel on a really good fieldtrip:
Newly weds in bed,
A blushing bride- A teenager with braces and freckles who Gets her first bouquet from a boy:
The same goodness for me was walking beside you through
The middle of high school- Going across her face
Where the teachers parked their cars:
Feeling taller than you, and feeling your eyes along my Tallness and my jawbone: Feeling your approval,
Which was such a flighty thing:
You always had a boyfriend, and now you wear a ring:
I am trying to feel good- How I remember one day we had a fire Drill and all the untried students went out together along the Esplanade before Green View Shores
Where the alligators barely moved and the storks came Like tatters of white before the sea shelled nimbus;
And you saw me, and left your boyfriend; you left your boyfriend
And sat by me while I was under some sickly newly planted
Tree: and it comforted me in a way I haven't been comforted
Since; You could never know who I wanted to be for you-
And now you are married, and I haven't seen you since:
But you comforted me once, like a fairytale that is awfully,
Awfully far away; and that is the way I am trying to feel,
While the storms continue to blow the comely tatters straight
Across the wishful face of our forgotten Florida-
You could never know....

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishing Wells Of Glitter

Pink clouds on
A fieldtrip in a nude museum-
Tourists on the island of West Palm Beach
Take fieldtrips into my childhood-
Taking snap shots of nude shells
Images up in those imaginary things,
The superflous aspects of things
Which captivate scientists:
These are the objects of my study,
Out of reach,
Of another realm: Platonic yet
Broken in form
Not worth a coin
Thrown in the wishing well of glitter
Or up to the ceiling her eyes once
Brushed,
Turning to greet the patrons on
The shores of her makebelieve-
Shadows of a corporeal form
Belonging to another man.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishing Wells Of The Dimmly Lit Amusement Park

I cannot love in the shadow of mountains,
Or the neon glow of fast food chains:
They are the same thing,
The moonlight falls upon the valleys, advertising:
Like the winos who go on begging:

My father sells fireworks for a living;
Like him, I sell things:
When the day goes down, the night clouds,
And the air-condition goes on humming:

Beautiful birds fly up to touch the wired joints
Hung in the sky:
The chicken wire hung there by the stars for
Christmas:
The beautiful stewardesses who metamorphosis
Back into women as they melt back down

Into the penny canyons
And the wishing wells of the dimly lit amusement park:

Rubbing our eyes, thinking the poem is over,
Turning over in beds and then having to wake up for our Livings:

The best children caddie for the astronauts,
But don't have to ask them for favors:

Here in the stucco and chicken wire valleys where Dolls play where we are lost,
They awaken, animated for the morning
And then, costumed,
Disappear into their familiar and Radioactive haunts.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wishing Wells Preternatural Heavens

Underneath all of the popcorn knuckles of
All of the Christmas trees,
All of the knights fell- too busied from Kissing the eerie serpents
In the bedchambers of all of their own
Motels,
Underneath all of the lights that had Forgotten, in their advertisings,
To think of me:
As the sea set out over the very shells
Again,
Remembering only their own aunts
In the euphoria's
Of their very own amusement- they became
Another world again,
Entirely, dressing their wings for their Very own casualties-
And the world turn, throwing its
Spitballs- and the clause heaved uproariously,
As the lions cleaned their coats,
And then fawned bashfully- until very soon
The hummingbirds settled down over
The wishing wells of the preternatural
Heavens and seemed to dance into the very ballrooms
Where I already supposed they could never learn.

Robert Rorabeck

The Witches

Nothing yet to do but to distill
My bone:
Sweaty on the concrete the young
Skeletons fart at their game,
Chewing on the soft candies of their conquest,
Out back on the basketball court of ruleless rusts
Wanting to nip their teeth on harder reservoirs:
Only freshmen in the gravities, they can see
Those swervey females about to graduate from their cleomes,
Their knowledge floating in sad bellied cloudbanks on the Backs of woven broomsticks:
All the pretty witches awakened from their ditches,
Their long black hair, their dark swaying eyes,
Circling, circling, in their kind of spells:
The young boys can barely drive,
But they have a cherry red Super 88 Oldsmobile
Leaking fumes they fumble guffawing like loony-tunes
To the sea, to chase her down, the shadow
She left behind her moted over the waves like
The darkest complexion of a gaze inside a tent,
The way the moon sneaks a peek through satiny pantaloons.
They smoke in the grotto as the waves slip in,
Each one a little bent of green, the claret crabs on their backs,
The pallid fish out of their element;
Next year there will be a cabaret of vodka,
And the deformities of black snails hiding under concrete benches,
Leaking their slicks like bodiless sex:
They will smite, and they will run, and through the Classrooms chalkboard crypts cause they their sophomoric pandemonium.
They will hypnotize chickens, and sleep under the broken
Down bus when it rains, and tight rope across the canal
To shoot of fireworks atop the milkmaid's house,
But never again can they ever see the fortuitous entrails
Of those lips, the higher educations of the state funded ditches,
The long black tassels of the hoary bitches,
Already married to their tree of hung knights,
Who crawl out of suburban windows when the full moon bites,
The tomfoolery damsels, the busty poison apples,
The rich housewives in dark new engaging parades,

With their spotless tennis shoes pressed down on the gas,
The swirvey females graduated from their cleomes,
Forgotten in the sad lights invented by a celibate scientist,
Their bodies in a bed of cleaned stitches,
The prettiest young things, the witches.

Robert Rorabeck

The Woebegone Nature

Moon dust in the tears of your own god—
My cup is cracked, wanting to be a bowl
For your vanity of seashells—
How about you going home to him day to day,
Young body awash in the browning fevers
Of another dusk,
Day lost behind you, like a terrapin vanishing
Into the trailer parks or orange groves
Slickening in the woebegone nature of Such blinding variety.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wolves And The Woodsmen

Now they've shown this architecture to their Queen they are going home,
Pony-eared, long stemmed:
Leaping, giddy sensed over whatever fields
They find,
Fitting between the fences, the pinwheels
And the monsters in the cliffs
Until they have to return again after midnight
All of their heroes metamorphosed:
And when they get to the spots of danger they Have to hold on for their dear lives
As the stories become unfolded like the hoods
Of uncountable cobras:
Like vixens on the highways riding up to the Heavens: a Ferris Wheel of two many chances
Coming around,
Dousing in the fanfares of true believers,
As the stewardesses sit in the bleachers sweating
Of their perfumes equally to the wolves
And the woodsmen who she guesses will make Good use, equally, of both of their turns.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wolves Are Still Hungry

My liver laps up this fire like kittens do milk
Like vampires:
And I knelt on the other side of your vehicle today
Alma
And raising your pants leg kissed your ankle
Which you somehow made me believe was the suppliance
For a brown fairy:
And you wore the gold that I fixed for you after it broke
After the first time we made love:
And I bought you roses clouded with the clouds of Tears the woodcutting angels sawed:
And the airplanes went down to sniff and drink your burnished
Hair:
And it was not real- that you wear size extra small,
But your eyes drink the world, and your two children have been Weaned off your two brown nipples;
And the rabbits have disappeared, but I am so sorry,
Alma,
Because the wolves are still hungry.

Robert Rorabeck

The Woman's Revolutions In The Dusky Park

Revolutions in the park at dusk:
There is nothing neat about this,
Except from a distance it looked clean,
And her eyes lit up like soft bulbs
Waiting for you on the swings:
Walking toward her,
There is a black man in the shadows
Against her back applying pressure,
Humming things you can't remember
That you wrote last night:
The best way is to forget,
But with her tattooed it is not easy:
You can piss in the mall's wishing well,
But it will not take out the promises:
This is where the juveniles sway,
In the used lawn of well-trimmed clichés:
Between high school and the rest of life,
There is where she met you long ago,
And held your hand not knowing
How much like a bird's wing your grasp was:
Fragile but able to fly,
And she said your name several times,
But did not know it:
When she went away, it was inevitable,
For there are places that stream in work
Down the street with busy neat men taking charge:
There is her encouraging religious sea she swims:
Going away, her eyes are in red shift,
As the zephyrs' lungs take you upwards
Higher in the supersonic gusts
The energy giant who flew too close to Helios:
Your mothers flit here, and kissing you
Take away the troublesome memories
Of the woman's revolutions
In the dusky park.

Robert Rorabeck

The Womb Of This Immortality

Lay upon the earth
against the ancestors' remains, hear her molten dirge,
the womb of this immortality,
a garden of human consciousness flows the civilized spring
a result of many experiments of life
now moves your new fingers along the open page.
All that you see she breathes the ethers that cloud
the rising continents, in her memory echoes the footsteps of creatures whose energy now roams the thoughtless exploration motivating your skeleton;
In the beginning, you were on fire
until she made a wish,
blew you out and formed
you, cooled you in the sea.
Now lying like a frightened soldier amidst the dead, a somnambulist in occupations of self denial,
upon the weedy bossom,
she closes her eyes as clouds
mount the sky;
You can feel the struggling evolution, your future's brother kicking his ascendancy
there amidst the nameless shoots of withering emerald,
the womb of this immortality.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wonderful Ending For This Poem About Her

I want to sound like a good man,
I would like to be, something dressing down for Summer,
Conjoining with bodies that are so talented they make
The rented sea envious,
Going up, going down, the elevators of blue somnolence
The easy mysteries,
The ways that they sound coming and going, like
A brotherhood of airplanes, and I wonder about all of those Sororities of stewardess making fun with their Lascivious occupations, looking up their beds so swell and Unmade, as good as they'd always been while going
To classes on their bicycles;
While I keep doing this, thinking about them all alone,
And doing this now, like a tourist in heat, but never touching
Myself anymore, laying off of that- trying to become the better
Man the specializing scientist, the voyeur on Florida
Cruises, the lion tamer in need when she comes scabbed kneed, Wanting someone to whip her good, draping down the from Everglades as I'd already written she would come,
Glass in hand, smoking an invisible cigarette, lonely and thinking
If only I was a better man, her pilot, or her pimp,
And the world she lives in is so wide and amazing with colors
Following her like a brilliant dog who can still never imagine how
She sees the world, waving for long instances to relatives
She never hopes to see again, just following her and wagging,
Happily homeless in her steps,
Forgetting anything else, especially the wonderful ending I'd Saved for this poem about her.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wonderfully Awesome Skies

And now this all is a tongue who's just been starving:
And anyways I don't care;
While if the whales had much less bellies, they would be leaping:
Like mailman at their rare and common song,
Like sommeliers at their keeping of the daycares of the petulance
Of song:
And I haven't so readily been tasting meat, while I have been out inside
The forest of a thousand feet of sleepless sleep:
And now I am here, and all of the way gone: while all of the day gone,
It has been reading,
And calling out of the coos of anyone spilling their way:
As all of the housewives away sleepy eyed of their yokes, while all of my Day has been young, and gone and gone:
Speaking for themselves like growling cars: mewling, and mewling said
Atop of the hot kitchens of their hooves:
And anyways I don't care;
While if the whales had much less bellies, they would be leaping:
Like mailmen at their rare and common songm
Like sommeliers at their keeping of the daycares of the petulance
Of some:
And I haven't so readily been tasting meat, while I have been out inside
The forest of a thousand feet of sleepless sleep;
And now I am here, and all of the way gone; while all of the day gonem
It has been reading,
And calling out of the coos of anyone spilling their way:
As all of the housewives away sleepy eyed of their yokes, while all of my day has been young, and gone and gone:
Speaking for themselves like growling cars: mewling, and mewling said
Atop of the hot kitchens of their hooves:
And anyways they are all right here: and here they are all here right
Now speaking for their wives, and speaking of their sorrows:
And I've been waiting for you, anyhow:
And in all of this land of plenty, and in all of this land, anyhow,
Calling through the venisons through the young colors of their Young country: and I just want to spell, while all of your colors
Are all smelted and I am made unreal anyways: while I am just
The colors of your sea: coloring their diseased through their Friendly skies: and this isn't even gentle, anyways; this is just Anyways, dying, speaking for themselves through the kitchens of whatever

It was anyways, speaking, speaking anyways:
Lying slantwise through the better ways of the often often awful
Beautifully freed freedom of the wonderfully awesome skies.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wooden Theatre Of My Miniscule Amusement

Might I go on in whatever many axioms I find:
Spooling, but also spendthrift- pennies of whizzing fires
That amuse her like overworked fire-wheel midgets,
Blowing my mind out like candles who blow lips;
And for awhile she has a funny time,
Brindled in her whorish habits; I don't know how long
It's been since I've road a bicycle, or had a thought of My own, or money of my own: I do it all for her,
Her brown ochre eyes, her honey sweet dun eyes,
Her apple dumpling cheeks, her plum pudding thighs;
But what is this, what is this spell I am trying to conjure;
And something is wrong, because the storm clouds are no
Longer lanky, but fat like fed heifers beneath the trees,
Pooling, and shooting off lightning bolts below the knees:
And what is she doing, as beautiful as she pleases,
But smiling as she'd first done. She don't even sneezes:
Oh what a farce, is there something wrong with my brain;
Are my wrists too juicy, do they need to be drained?
She looks so beautiful because of this, but it's as she chooses;
She stares, she drinks to my tiny fluoride body; it's buzzing
Sweetness- and when the phosphorous is done hissing, and I'm just a piece of Chinese paper flickering in the grass,
She will turn and kiss her bruin, some bearish legionnaire
Who's come trundling through the forest now that my Cheap act is over- they're to get down and hibernate in
The balmy rhythms of his fire-truck stuck like a red finger down
By the farm house; and she blows me out like a birthday cake, wasted,
Hoping that I won't notice that she has wished for this Other man's business, and getting it, resigns from the wooden Theatre of my miniscule amusement.

Robert Rorabeck

The Woods They've Never Known

My heart stops cold in a naked blue glade-
Even the naked sky is cold, and whatever imagination lies
In the sky,
It is being taken away: as streams run the other way, taking Down the metamorphosis of a springtime
Birthday
While the slender white towers of this boreal sorority
Sway,
Eventually losing their golden arbor to the stream,
While the silent bodies in her soul fight to climb
Up the other way-
And some prince of kind, newly metamorphosed,
Stands upon the saddle,
And thrusts the horns that used to be a crown up
Toward the sky- there airplanes sojourn filled with Goddesses- where fires and foxes leap from Each other,
Eager for recognition from the woods they've never known.

Robert Rorabeck

The Words I Send To You

I thought it would be a pleasure to Meet another connoisseur of Latin poetry,
Except for the fact that he was
From Venezuela and born
To go down to school that way;
But all it meant was that I wasn't
As precious as I thought,
So I got drunk and swam with my friends,
Pedro and my infinitely better
Brother in law, Evan:
We played darts until ten thirty,
Right when the bartender was getting ready
To come onto her shift,
But it was her old, old number,
Which was a good thing; and now it is Seven thirty in the morning,
And I'm just as gone as a love sick unicorn.
I go outside and the traffic watches me
Like an insouciant and obese tiger,
While I want to stroke myself.
I count the money and remember the flowers
I sent you,
Just like all the words I send to you that you Cannot use.

Robert Rorabeck

The Words Of An Anonymous Wreck

Tossed away from this, you have made a sport of My soul,
Even as angels, weeping, take picnic and
Pieta on my shoulders:
But they are borrowing bicycles and have stolen
Little boys,
And the clouds ink my cheek bones
Like the poisonous snakes there at the races to Bite their lips at the ankles of
Race horses:
And another holiday is approaching:
Some other holiday, while I will take an airplane
Like a rain cloud to some other muse,
Even as I am becoming terribly,
Terribly lost- even after I should have already Drunken myself into whispers underneath
The chicken legs of the house of the witch-
As the young boys are still playing basketball and Football,
And some venal muse is still serving drinks in
The armpit of Florida:
Well, my words swell out the doorways of middle-class
Cathedrals and travel down the perpetual hill:
My dog still sleeps at the feet of my body-
It is a tomb in the stacks of rain clouds and purple
Bowling alleys,
As your lips are red or they are brown-
And these are the words of an anonymous wreck as it
Is going down.

Robert Rorabeck

The Words That Their Poets Came

Words that burn infinitely burn for women:

Lochs of women, virgins breathing and snorkeling both

Above and beneath the sea:

Women of green and amber eyes, like the resins of super holy

And Christmas trees:

Women I was afraid to share the stares of, so I skipped

High school and listened all day sweaty and hyperventilating

To the lions choosing their mates,

Just as not much later the women chose theirs:

Then they jumped through hoops of fire in the street lights of

Their carnival ling bars:

And when it rained, these women stepped bare naked out into

The rain and fell in love, open mouthed,

Their bosoms bared, to the words that their poets came.

Robert Rorabeck

The Words They Never Had

Perturbed for awhile, and then there's peace:
The wise men follow the stars out into the East,
And even the illusions bend and Pray:
Bend and pray like praying mantises over their Lunches of today and yesterday:
While the mountains rise up, and clean the clocks of
The clouds,
And the mountain lions upon them grin so
Blue, so blue and proud:
In that metamorphosis, and in its spring, traveling up
The weathers
To the hidden spring- where the animals diadem
And are glad,
Lustily gamboling and sweetly unperturbed by the words
They never had.

Robert Rorabeck

The Workings Of Their Darkness

Chrysalis from a glass blower's hypnosis;
Under the tinkering roofs, underneath the sun that is All about metamorphosis,
The queasy feeling in the stomachs of little boys
At the moments of take off;
And the stewardesses who comfort them, half undressing
With a smile;
And then it is for awhile in the clouds, the chateaus
Gallop high-nosed above the arid plains
With the vineyards of dessert wines puckering the noses
Of salient foxes
When there isn't even a lighthouse around; and I just keeping Doing this,
Turning, and turning and discovering for you the limpid
Abandonment's of fool's gold,
The latchkey children left to marvel at the canaries minute
Graves all down the slope's side, like feathery clockworks that are just Beginning the workings of their darkness.

Robert Rorabeck

The Works Of Mark Twain

Everyday going home to that burning drum
Thumping in a glass
While Israel the Mexican sleeps with his family underneath
The overpass;
And it is such a bright world- so bright that I cannot really see,
Or know the words how to define its most ancient of Tranquilities;
But it would be something like spending all day long with Alma in a movie theatre,
And groping her like the deer do glades: deer who were once
Princes, metamorphosized,
And never wanting to go back home again to castles without love,
For they have followed the secret corridors of her eyes and found
Her here, and found her good:
Like today I craned my neck inside Alma's car and kept her there
For a better part of an hour, out back of the fruiteria where I was no longer the patronsito, and my father was already Driving fast through Mississippi,
Making his own shapes out of clouds, never having finished
Tenth grade,
And never needing to finish even one of the works of Mark Twain.

Robert Rorabeck

The World Anew

Departing into the Amazon,
Women fly over my shoulders- disconnected
From their captains,
Their authoritative fathers- and they go up
Through the world of seas
And lay amongst the clouds where the golden
Chickens lay,
And turtles evaporated from their shells
Made into the soups of long ago:
And I lay with my lover here as well, before
She has to go home again.
She is after midnight and changing into so much.
Her body is a smoking censer in the church of
The bosque- I bought her a five dollar
Picnic basket to take with us to the zoo,
And when she flies over head,
Spreading her brown wings,
She whispers secrets to me you never knew-
Even though she goes home again,
She lies with me as the rain showers come down
Again, and kiss the world anew.

Robert Rorabeck

The World Even Before Your School Day

Green lakes underneath swing sets barren of Apples,
Where I have moped and moped far along into the twilight
After the last plane has flown away, after the final
Beauty has parceled the field,
Or the last copper canon ball flown:
And you went up to school and made love,
While I kept on eating my lunch alone, and dripping my Lines like a snail quivering for home,
Cutting paper into snowflakes to make a weather for your Wherever town,
In syllables falling down between your knees, waiting for you
To salt, to go into the changing room of you mind and to Remember to put on something truly beautiful;
And these words that wake up inside of me like a fire of Celsius in a mailbox
Cannot be contained by mellifluous hands: by your father's eyes,
Or the trucks of his carriage:
And I might go down with so many strikes against me:
I might even sleep unbeknownst in the penumbra of sunken
Stewardesses, even into the boudoirs of alligators; but at least
I gave it a shot so that you would know how to find me,
And who I was made by these welding thoughts of you;
And that I had swung just as cheerfully without any other
Thought in the world even before your school day had begun.

Robert Rorabeck

The World Is So Sweet

So young as to be in kindergarten;
Or so young again as to be here and mouthing off,
And lighting off fireworks,
While Alma falls down to sleep again with her man another
Night- the man she says she wants to be with,
But I will see her tomorrow
And get to show off my new Virgin's of Guadalupe;
But I already know what the N on her hands stands for:
I already know the answer, and the world is so sweet,
But it does not belong to me.

Robert Rorabeck

The World Of His Browning Arms

If the rain comes in the afternoon again
I will write these words as I pretend to hold out for You, as I gather these things from my body like
The leeching of poisons I exhume while the stewardesses
Look away- and when they are not watching me,
I vomit and I tear, and I think of the day I pushed you
Underneath the swings, and underneath the helicopters,
While you enjoy his brown arms around you
In the bed beside your sisters and the television of your Children: I once traveled in search of you and slept
On a nearby roof: other travelers said you had made
Your grotto of Christmas presents in the next cavern
Over but when I got to you, you said that you were Already moving: that you were buying a house together,
As the mountain lions and wild cats climbed the hills,
Following the slow lusher of an insouciant wildfire:
As the blue jays flitted and ate the slow moving robins
That only wanted to lay down as ribbons in your hair:
And whatever I thought of you, you took away from me:
And the wishes I made for you, you took away on your Birthday- so all of the towers overlooking the Communal pools underneath the highest mountains burned
Away, and the lighthouses turned blind, and the guardian
Angels which once arced their circuits over your Naked shoulder blades stopped leaping- and you turned Away unceremoniously and made love only to him,
And you gave up your shadow perpetually to the world of His browning arms.

Robert Rorabeck

The World That Has Killed Itself So Many Times

Pantomiming the clouds, what strange verbiage of Mercury poisoned haberdasheries
These words become, hardly recovered, though they Are gathering themselves from a battlefield of plagues
Halfway to Saint Louis or Egypt,
And the dogs wine up to the night, the coyotes bellowing,
The mother possums bighting their lips,
As the rockets of cosmonauts continue shooting off:
Shooting off as all of the stars of their nations die,
As half eaten horses get up, but do so little good,
As the enormous and poisonous centipedes dance
Halfheartedly with little girls,
As I call my best friends from their newly dug graves and we All stand like a chorus of flighting carolers outside
Your bedroom's parlors, singing of the night's holidays,
The banshees of misshapen housewives beating their Unkind hearted knell into the roof; and it rains broken horsehoes
And hardnosed pix-axes;
And the gypsies come like cold hearted butterflies and steal
Everything, so in the morning our tree is gone, but your eyes
Are still burning holes straight through the world that has killed
Itself so many times for you.

Robert Rorabeck

The World That I Was Meant To Believe

Playbills in the dusk of my romances- as old
Lovers overeat at the movie theatre,
Growing new children like cantaloupes in a field of Busy ants that the foxes cuddle,
And even once or twice the airplanes found spaces
To land,
To rest and look at the comets- and I with my stolen
Bicycles on the flip side of crepuscule
Made love to a zoetrope with the bullfrogs-
And the real girls in the translucent romances slipped
Across the yard and into bedrooms of Noisy musicals,
While the kittens mewed on the steps knowing very little
Of the world that I was meant to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

The World That Was Already There

On fieldtrips we go, slipping into the murals of Catastrophe:
Our five year old hearts beating over our five year
Old feet,
And our tennis shoes we didn't tie: and after the Movie theatre or the communal pool,
We will go home to parents who are still growing
Up too;
And our mother will bathe us and shampoo,
And in the schoolless afternoons,
She will take us to the backyard canal and show us
Tadpoles in their busy school,
And tell us how they will change right beneath our
Eyes,
As rainbows peer down at olive trees, showing
Their promise to serpents bundled there-
As conquistadors cenotaph across the street with pornography-
While all of this time, the roads we knew stopped
At the canal, the very edge of the world,
And kidnappers repeated back and forth underneath the Anonymous airplanes- until finally there were graveyards
And tomorrows and tomorrows of yesterday-
Somehow metamorphosed, we went back to there- the street
Was widened and paved- it went straight over her canal
Without stopping to look both ways,
And the rock garden our mother planted next to the drainage
Where the puppies the butterflies enchanted were Not there:
Were not there on either side of the street: it just continued
On, and on and I am afraid straight into
The world that was already there.

Robert Rorabeck

The World You Thought You Had Made

They say you are beautifully written,
But they don't come home: They leave you with A beautiful daughter
And cartoons;
And the kitchens are all stacked and the pool
Is rippling like the fortified spirits
Of a present that is still alive;
And if you go out to the backyard and sit down
In the mowed stuff,
And really feel around, the conquistadors might
Be conjured up for you underneath the poisonously
Gibbous honeymoons of those Reckless airplanes- the alligators might even Line up for you, and shed one great unifying tear-
I don't know where you wife is,
But the pearl of her is in your daughter,
And she is asleep on the couch, in the alabaster shell
Of the world you thought you had made.

Robert Rorabeck

The World's Longevity

Another summer in the World's longevity-
Folding
Paper airplanes,
Giving plastic
Cowboys and Indians to the Fire,
Masturbating to
The muses,
And playing hooky
Inside a canoe-
The canal an
Unbusied street
Filled with narcolepsy
And somnambulence.

Robert Rorabeck

The Worthless Majesty

Saboteurs are right beside where I left
Them,
And all that is Christmas: Alma is taking the day
Off tomorrow,
And I wonder what she will do:
Looking in the windows of baseball diamonds,
I remember girls who are not altogether
Real,
Who are like you, Alma, but from different states
Of the world;
It has been for them that I've been kissing the Empty promises of serpents
And poisoning myself in the worthless majesty
Of fool's gold.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wounded Baseball Games

Songs in lines flung by hands that cannot fish—
And, maybe, do not love, of course—
Except for the little fairies on the cliffs,
That come in jubilee across the reddened saddles
And dig up arrowheads and diminutive
Ferris wheels from the earth—
A tiara over the savaged garden my father's Thousand horses trampled—
Where my scarred aunt now sleeps, wounded in
A kidney disease of amusement parks—
This gentle flood I send as a model from my hands—
A taxidermist's fable—Without eyes,
Look at the parks,
And lead the pretty girls past the cemeteries of Their grandmothers—
And high into the basins of ice-cream trucks that sing
Like angels in the breathless afternoons—
High above the wounded baseball games—
And the flea markets shelled by interstates.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wounded Lovers

I think about coming towards you, like a shadow
Back pedaling in the sunlight,
Going by a dog who cannot stand to see me weeping—
With the light house arisen on the hill,
And the orchards still smoking—
Pollinations of my artwork, like night blooming jasmine
For the cadaver: you go home to your husband,
Through the secret keyhole of a waterfall—
Airplanes fly in the sky until it is thoroughly taken over
By them—Thinking they are angels,
But they are not angels—and mermaids fall asleep in
The canal, hearts lost as if barefoot maidens in Trailer parks—and in the throats of clams at the bottom
OF the ocean where pearls should be—
Only emptiness—even if there was sunshine, there
Would only be emptiness—
As the bodies of the wounded lovers move as their Work proceeds.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wounded Trees

Fish speared by a wounded dream, taking her
Away from me-
The cost of hours upon the house, whose dousing
Charade sinks into me-
This time a wound singing up the fire,
Frightening the angels from the weeds:
They'd sing so far away-
Evaporating into the nature of all human beings:
The baseball players on their knees,
Calling to her nature through the wounded trees.

Robert Rorabeck

The Wrong Side Of The Mountains

If you don't wish for the job then I am here to help
Proposition you into vagabonding
In the penumbras of the most god fearing summits, where the Over zealous bones of the hikers who knew no fear are Still lost
And cenotaphed into the enjambments of a fearless dinner party
With the same looming grins of the foxes who leapt up to Feast of their discombobulates-
It is here that there is some kind of resin that has escaped from
You, Alma, driving home in your car-
Where are you going, but into a world that knows not the Feral calligraphies of my adulterating cartography:
There may even be new species under your bed, as you turn around
And make love to your man returned from Mexico and decided up the fact that, in fact, there was no better
Woman that you: than you, my muse- my vida:
And it is true, and I happen beside you in the darkness, like an eel Caracoling through the blindness of the corals that can Still feel under the boot heels that make up the jubilations
Of pestilent and green tenements,
Of wedding parties of old muses and their friends; as all of my Unction slips across you again and again like a blind man breaking his Own hands with hammers and nails as he tries to build his own
House on the wrong side of the mountains.

Robert Rorabeck

The Year Of The

Your love is doing the action—but who is it doing it to
And where—If this is Valentine's Day,
And we made love on this day last year:
But you were married—and now I am married,
But it is something of the nature of revenge—
Because—before—my bones used to ring on your Bones, but it wasn't enough:
I bought you cakes on your birthday—and crawled
On all fours,
But no luck: So I travelled across the world
And found a little girl who would love me without any Tricks: This Valentine's Day she got roses,
But she wanted lotus—and I am so wrong—
I sent her ten thousand dollars for our wedding:
She was born in the year of the chicken
And I was born in the year of the horse-
But it was to you, once again, to whom I Wrote my song.

Robert Rorabeck

The Yellow Brickwork Of My So Young Tomorrows

In a cave of Ganymede we have to rest our bones
And then everything after that is poolside
And not even fireside and I have to take a piss:
Why then I am only a peachy heirloom:
I am only an inflatable conquistador and I cannot proceed
And I rest awhile beside the sour tit of anywhere:
In the reststops inside the armpits of the peninsulas
Of anywhere
Squinting any old eye toward the whale to proceed
While underneath the sugar sheets of the airconditioning of Shark bites it can go anywhere to proceed:
Pissing my pants for fireworks and for the pinafores of All of Mexico and then for all of this anyway:
Just trying to cut my throats like stone just like all of the pinafores
Before all of the opened throats
Of the stone monuments who opened up ice-cream shops
Across the streets of our heretofore yesterdays
In the yellow brickwork of my so young tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

The Young Couples

The days peel out underneath the power lines;
And it is so disgusting that I finished a bottle while the Time changed,
And I wrote the most heinous of things that I can't Even remember to young men who are not real:
I cursed and put down my sick muse, because she was the Only one I could write for:
And then I gave it away like serpent poison to little children
To use in their milk,
When outside the store the sky grew angry and picked up
Husks of corn and made them dance in the sky:
It was a hypnotic dance that can never leave me, the kind of Thing my grandfather was known to describe to me,
If I was ever listening: and afterward the store was silent
And a chicken came by and danced for soldiers who laughed
At it until they found their women
Who were coming to them from the other direction;
And then the young lovers embraced, and kissed and petted
Tattoos;
And I noticed a jackrabbit in the grass across the ditch:
It standing there beneath a rusting mailbox, its ears perked up
Like bottle rockets, and it did not notice me,
Gazing as it did at the young couples who were now dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

The Young Mother's Nocturnal Eye

Hard tables waiting the brittle hand,
Going down like resilient trees meant to burn;
And the wolves leaping- leaping,
Singing Christmas carols to her smoking hair-
High up in the open wounds,
The bloody noses carports carved from the sports
Of whispering screams-
Those empty pools where the youngest of gods
Once meant to reside,
Like flamboyant tadpoles- evaporates, made into
A pot luck: road kill
For a silver truck, and the moon glows wide and speeding
Over the bones lashed together of
Families that can never be separated, tourists all together
On a somnolent parade- going this way quickened by
Their lathers- and the sports provided by the comely
Nature of the young mother's nocturnal eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Young Mother's Nocturnal Eyes

Hard tables waiting the brittle hand,
Going down like resilient trees meant to burn;
And the wolves leaping- leaping,
Singing Christmas carols to her smoking hair-
High up in the open wounds,
The bloody noses carports carved from the sports
Of whispering screams-
Those empty pools where the youngest of gods
Once meant to reside,
Like flamboyant tadpoles- evaporates, made into
A pot luck: road kill
For a silver truck, and the moon glows wide and speeding
Over the bones lashed together of
Families that can never be separated, tourists all together
On a somnolent parade- going this way quickened by
Their lathers- and the sports provided by the comely
Nature of the young mother's nocturnal eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

The Youngest Of All Of Alma's Young

Bodice at the windowsill,
Bodice at the sea: starting at a poem this way,
Remembering the white cliffs of those bucks
Who now diadem the whitewashed walls of her admirers
And Tom Sawyer,
The boys that had to drown to learn how to fly:
And all of the drafts before this, in all of their pettiest of ways:
The way that the dog barks along the lonely clefts of high altitude
Though abandoned highways:
And now even all of the school rooms could teach me this,
As I am still teething like a fox after his luscious grapes,
Like a paper airplane folded over the ceiling fans over the graveyards:
Something that is hardly worth remembering,
Something that has many numbers but not a single name:
While in the fruit market Alma told me that, yes, she did love,
But just as readily bent back down into her familiar game:
She comes from Mexico, and speaks a languid only lightly
Brushed my tongue,
But now I know that I will not survive without her, for now is the deadest
Of all of the weathers,
And I find that I am absolutely the youngest of all of Alma's young.

Robert Rorabeck

The Zephyrs Brushing Your Hair

Too many unabashed trails going one way:
Trying to keep in step with the mountain ranges receding in Twilight,
Going to cuddle your soft little town and peep through the Transoms of its arcade.
Now you have a home and a child: The continent divides
Beneath you,
And the traffic quiets reverently, while I wait out in my retinue
Smiling absolutely breathlessly
Feeling like the sweetest thing tinkering around in an empty
Chest of your ignorance,
The zephyrs brushing your hair and whispering most reverently.

Robert Rorabeck

The Zoetropes Of The End Of The World

Caladium is a name for a flower with ears
Big enough to fly,
Around the footstalls of houses where the amphibians
Ululate until they are picked off like canaries for Singing too loudly for housecats:
And then it rains, and the housewives disrobe themselves
In the familiar grottos of their carports;
And they change there vespers in the washing machines,
And are stung barefooted by open electricity chords,
While the angels of their young boys are lispng open
Mouthed with the yellow jackets battened down
In the impulsive orchards,
While even the kidnappers stop to sleep along the gurgling
Drainage taking all of the toy boats of the tallest boys
To the gulf stream and thus off away
Or finally to the Gulf of Mexico, with streams attributing
To the candelabrum's gushing sunlight's perfidy
Down from the sky; while inside the sparest living rooms
Nearest to the sparsest Christmas trees,
The oldest and least luxurious of black and white cartoons
Plays and plays in coyly feral snouts
That her children imagine wait for them beyond the echinopsis whose red bulbs decorate the rock garden,
And flickerings of the slashing forest and tangling dunes
Denote the zoetropes of the end of their world.

Robert Rorabeck

The Zoos Of Thier Highschools

Fake people standing against high rises,
Paper dolls lashed against the gates:

Little girls that once were have gone missing.
The metamorphosis of paper boats have gone away
And forgotten them to their lovers-

They are grown now and gated in their habitats,
Transformed by the zoos of their high schools-
And sated by the dinner dates from the seemingly worthy,
Six-figured knights-

Unknowing ghosts who raise their children to grow
Into the calmed frenzy,
Their city a cloister of narcoleptic army ants,
Playing football in a hive of decomposing proficiencies:

The hurricanes come in answer to someone else's prayers-
Lovers who have been forgotten in their windswept youths-

The daylight is reduced to embers- their high schools go into hibernations-
Their ancestors watch their ascendancy's televisions go up in a cloud of Smoke-

And the beautiful girl rests hypnotically beside the canal:
The princess's toe is touching the water where the alligator breaths inches apart.

Robert Rorabeck

The Zygotes And The Marrionettes

The sea by the waves of nowhere- -
I am a corpse,
Drinking rum and eating pizza,
As the night fans out,
Above the playgrounds of the zoo
And the highway—
And there is something else
That can be believed,
Even though you haven't
Read the text,
And the fire trucks have crashed
Into brick walls—
Their little fantails fading,
Pretending to be beautiful
Even as they go out over the Overnight counters—
Hallucinations in the brick-a-brac of
Their delis,
And how can I tell her that I am not
Here- I cannot even spell her name,
But this is how I will pretend to Survive,
Playing my little movies while nothing
But the zygotes and the marionettes
Are around.

Robert Rorabeck

Theatres Of My Childhood

Pillow books of my lonely metamorphosis, or
The way I remembered her in her
Barrettes bought in the afterwards of the thrift stores-
And airplanes flying in the sky
As if torches of the messenger gods- in that Perfect beautiful a long ways off
But in the mirages of our circumference,
The same way the foxes believe,
Or the migrant workers- to touch the vineyards of
The middle class- to touch the stewardesses
Floating there in a mirage of sisterhood:
But I ask myself, won't they ever go their own way:
Won't they ever find someone else to love
Underneath the drive-ins of the heavens,
Even after my mother has gone, like the very virgin
Disappeared from the grottos and movies theatres
Of my childhood,
Until all of my loneliness fills up the drainage beside
The highway, like a nest full of abandoned baseball cards,
Or the ghosts already matriculating into the classes I will have To teach tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Theatres Of War

I am not afraid of you because I have been sleeping
By myself for so long,
Listening to the wisdom of serpents and masturbating;
And you cannot save me
Even if you own a gold mine, because I have tasted lips that Are golden brown,
As I have fed her lips lunch every work day and Saturdays too-
And I have thought of names of our children
Even while the airplanes were touching down, and I am Going to buy her a bicycle:
Now the trees grow tall: they grow very, very tall,
And there is no use gossiping about them, because they hear
Everything- around the water cooler and the drinking fountain:
In those spaces where our eyes meet and make love,
Alma, and tell each other the very things that you are too
Afraid to tell me:
Your family will love you anyways, Alma, but not as I love you:
My education comes by the slender ways of the highways of Your bluest jeans;
And I am here right now kissing the lips of the Virgin of Guadalupe,
Because I have promised my gifts to her, and asked her to keep
You and your children safe,
But to be given to me as gifts; and I love you, and I will give You the passenger seat:
I will give you all of my blood and scars, if you will keep beside Me and gather up all of my loneliness just as the most faithful
Of lighthouses gathers up all of her navies until the Nights are closed and there are no more
Theatres of war.

Robert Rorabeck

Thefts Of Nocturnal Thievery

Canoe of the lavender gut in the tight rope of
The canal
Spending words into dusk when it should have Gone to school,
And underneath it all of the soggy fireworks:
And in the shade truanancies of panhandling
The blue gills look up to like
Cardboard preschoolers: what things do these
Wilds know,
Brushing the simulacrums of suburbia,
And the things coming home with the traffic
Listening to their music. Do they really know
How to wonder where they belong,
Or perceive the telltale signs of their children
Linger half naked in the Faberge oasis of the Well mowed yard:
Well, for them the moon is just the goddess of
Their adolescent loves,
But she will never come down for them,
High in the thefts of nocturnal thievery.

Robert Rorabeck

Their

Bromeliads underneath a kleptomaniac
Sun
Stick their claret and filigreed tongues out at the Bruised housewives in a space of
The backyard which might as well be their garden
That slopes away past the
Chlorinated veins of the suburban mines of a pool,
And down to the shallow estuaries
Where the fanciful otters are pretending to be in
Some kind of fable,
The housewives coming to them for gifts,
And the alligators smiling, wordless, floating with
The messages of conquistadors stolen away so many
Years ago,
That were surely once important, but now, mutely coy,
Not even these favorite green thieves can tell what
Might have once been their absolute purpose.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Abandoned Sacrifice

Forest fires engulfing sunshine,
Blinding tourists like the immolation
Of waterfalls-
And blue spruce hiding cadavers forever
Lost beneath the hoods of the summit
Only ever visited by the shadows
Of airplanes,
Lighting upon them like the dark cousins
Of hummingbirds-
As their jewelry is weathered into the
Earth
Mute and beautiful in their abandoned sacrifice.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Absolute Purpose

Bromeliads underneath a kleptomaniac
Sun
Stick their claret and filigreed tongues out at the
Bruised housewives in a space of
The backyard which might as well be their garden
That slopes away past the
Chlorinated veins of the suburban mines of a pool,
And down to the shallow estuaries
Where the fanciful otters are pretending to be in
Some kind of fable,
The housewives coming to them for gifts,
And the alligators smiling, wordless, floating with
The messages of conquistadors stolen away so many
Years ago,
That were surely once important, but now, mutely coy,
Not even these favorite green thieves can tell what
Might have once been their absolute purpose.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Absurd Fingers

Ants around her lips try to be
Obnoxious, as the airplanes clouding the sky
Like queens in an apiary:
Making up there so much love,
So much weeping, while the tourists lay in Them like
The confections of piñatas, or in their Classrooms bloom for
Angels moving their houses of clouds over
The great herds of buffalo or antelope where
The mountains rise up, aureoled and Delicious- aggrandizing their nourishments
Down the slopes
And through the snouts of unconscious reindeer,
All the way down past the train tracks
And cars
Where the dogs paw at the rattlesnakes
Who have already given them fair warning
And now point their absurd fingers at the exact
Point where I am afraid lightning
Will eventually strike the earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Beautifully Dissolving Dreams

Grasshoppers under the bridges of the same colors
Of the favorite colors of her eyes:
They are dark and dreamy and they go away;
And I don't live here anymore: my words are for Graveyards, and besides that Defeated heroes
Who even while lying down look so good,
And deserve so many gifts of care-weary flowers,
As they are divided by the strange mathematics of train tracks,
And the silent years where the rain is beautiful and veils
The shotgun houses;
And the housewives are all poor but very beautiful,
And they all come out in the middle of the storms where their Lawns and mailboxes are waiting for them,
And they look up together at different times through the deciduous night,
The weepy canopies garlanding them in the maiden hood
Of their beautifully dissolving dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Beds In Mexico

Mobile of rum—this is how sleep comes on
A Monday night
Listening to the trucks and the disappearing shadows:
The children will get up from Their beds in Mexico and dream of marionettes and Ride the trains to find her—
Her parents who have fled to pick from the orchards
Of America—
And they following them like the wet afterbirth,
And the ashes of fireworks
Leading up the hills where the foxes sleep in either
The sunlight or the snowdrifts—
Into the churches where there are wounds in the blue windows
Looking out onto the campus I disappeared from Fifteen years ago
As my father enjoys riding bicycles in Michigan—and my Mother follows him:
And my mother follows him.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Blind Singing

New evaporations do little enveloping the clouds
With tulle'
With hearts of evaporated shell, singing of Ghost mothers and ghost girlfriends,
As little feet get lost on the road to sunset again'
Stumbling amidst the cenotaphs of Conquistadors amidst the orchards of Pornography again'
What will they ever tell their mother'
Of what fireworks will their blindness sing,
If they should ever make it home?

Robert Rorabeck

Their Brothers To Forget Their Names

Enmeshed for Pocahontas in the Bible Belt Underneath the breasts of Colorado:
Doing my thing by the canoes pulled like lucky
Feathers by the harvest
Moon,
While the rabbits get out and make eyes
And eat endives,
The larger and grander boats smoking around them,
Gossiping- and gambling afloat
With so many working girls in their steaming
Weathers-
Eyes like cats hungry for the nights of wings-
Who can let them leave the Ground,
Even while their bodies are like orchestras of
Graves:
And they can take off over the bosques, and the colonies
Of witches with the failed
Knights like wind chimes in their trees:
They can go where their father still keeps them as little Girls- climbing all upwards
Catching looks from the gods which metamorphosize
Them
And help their brothers to forget their names.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Cadaverous Buffet Of Sweeter Than Sweet Meats

The night pulls me back towards the doors of Prostitution:

In the pit of some fair damsels body, a tiny spit of fire burns,

And they keep saying I am so cute, so cute:

And it cost me so much less than a housewife's spindled

Shopping list written on Eucalyptus in

The boxing theatres of Telluride:

Those boys she enjoys with soft green eyes lapping all the way

Through Christmas and Easter,

Until the house is empty save for the paper airplanes who

Are softly gossiping;

And then I know that I will never make love to a stewardess,

At least not in this time that is my time:

And I don't want to make love to Erin anymore: don't want

To send the despondent barmaid anymore bouquets,

Simply because she knows who she is and her pleasures;

And she simply isn't enough for me,

Because she is beautiful in a semiprecious sort of weird:

And her nerves are pierced,

But all she is allowed to sell the sweet little girls who come shopping

Inside her doorway are the spirits of tiny little dears:

And red riding hood comes knocking under the jubilation of a really

Thrilling castle, and they lock horns and make pillow fights

And love with moths on their flesh

And in their early morning years they have loved better sorts of

Boys than me:

And they have had to send me away shoplifting across the graveyards

Of the days,

But I loved them still and whistled to them while I was on my feet,

But found out that there were better sorts of girls dripping like bones

Sweating their cadaverous buffets of sweeter than sweet meats.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Care Weathered Bones

Promenades of good intent, and I have a house
But no occupation except for
The daycare of my grayed adolescence, as Alma is not Alone in the house her father promised her,
As the green cannons ring with her favorite color;
And I am not coming down until I have to go to sleep
And wake up,
While some trucks will move in the night, and the Good people will make money,
And the kidnappers will nap in peace, like the Mexicans;
And I will not have to do anything more until my Blood settles,
And the taboos recede again, passing over their cerulean
Estuaries and back into the courtyards of school,
Where the good girls are playing across the Landscaping and Cobble stone: where they will still be Playing,
Far into the cenotaphs of evening, after all of the butterflies
Have drowned,
And the moths shroud the pallid estuaries of their Care weathered bones.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Cats In Perfect Time

Getting sick and sitting on my globular throne,
Watching all the rock-stars prancing with their Dorothy's
To their red riding homes;
And the sky is a brick arcade, you've seen it before;
They sky is a loom on fire, and it is so wide
All the airplanes pirouette,
Pirouette, like tin man body builders for their Luscious Pegasus;
And I am reminded of a house that isn't real,
A home in horny ivory, a chimney of moist, slow smoke;
A perfect man inside, perfectly grayed:
A man such as I should be if I could have followed Virgil
All the way further into the dank sweet paths of His underwater spheres, and to have seen all the luminosities
He would have shown me-
To seen his eyes as I would have seen mine to be;
And that perfect love in low bodiced rood, driving in cars
That sing,
And children who go to bed on time; and all of us slumbering
Quite a few feet above the mowed earth,
While the clocks keep their cats in perfect time.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Childish Neighborhoods

They had friends who made love for
A little while arm and arm beneath the cars in between
The middle of their classes
Like turtles eating orchids- and they sang to her of Their romances, dark eyed,
Scarred with fireworks- and they hungered for her
In the sea, even though all of her waves came Imperfectly - flooding their living rooms,
Making their mothers dance in the Filtered sunlight of their kitchens- until they went Outside where their little brothers were playing
With dye cast cars, and what were they saying
To them, as they started across
Like the debutants of ghosts- imagining the pearls
Hidden in the rhinestones of snails,
Going back again to the reflecting glow of the Slumbering chaos of their childish neighborhoods.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Coffins And Their Tombstones

Come in with your coattails as black as gypsies,
And I will jerk off as if I am tipsy;
And I am not macho enough for you to finger yourself
Like the foreplay of horseshoes,
Which is your man's sport; and I sell so many fireworks
First under the full moon,
And then under the blue moon,
That I should have to resort to this penance
Of unhappy tears,
I have been to so many places, I have leapt
So many years
That I miss my dogs in Arizona; and I have so many muses
Who don't love me,
Who sleep under the sad mountains and under
The happy lees;
That I should have found love by now,
I should have crept up upon immortality; but only my Dogs love,
Only my dogs love me- and I don't know who I am,
And your father has died,
And your grandfather has died: and their coffins and their Tombstones are as equally beautiful as their creeping
Immortality.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Damp Brown Touch

You didn't know how to swing:
Like a good knight deeply enchanted with his fairy queen,
I swung you:
And we were both so good and out of school:
You were illegal and beautiful before my eyes,
And the airplanes swam up in the blue strata of the sky of Skies,
Beneath them the helicopters like bees sniffing over the Orange groves,
Their carefully orchestrated apiary, as afterwards you
Picked your children up from school-
Alma;
And my flag remained green in the movie theatre of your Good news,
As I read the captions of all of the ecstatic truth,
As I pictured long roads covered with rain but enjoyed with you;
Even as you went back home,
And my art failed out of doors, like a planted put in the wrong
Place of yard,
Wanting for sun, or receiving too much, but remember your brown
Lips,
And their damp brown touch.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Deep And Desirous Way To School

Maybe we'll live together once the sky collects
Itself and remembers all the famished wishes of the rain:
And the highways finally have presents to Tie up underneath the deciduous holidays of more than Lonely Christmas trees:
Or if any of this was possible, I would have a good woman with Me right now,
Curling up like a Siamese blue in the fog that is forever
Rising in the early mornings,
Like surrendered flags, or my mother's dreams of flying airplanes:
Or the way that Alma's eyes looked at me today,
So far away, like spindles of bicycles that had become lost
Upon their deep and desirous way to school.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Emerging Yesterday

Crumbling green pigeons dive for the afternoon
Above the avocado tenements; it is a humid pistil
Who chinks the atmosphere,
Drapes it on the shoulders of little girls pretending to Eat what comes out of the earth;
They can pretend all weekend in their little corners
And not have to worry about class,
The presumptive eyes of boys who are eagerly waiting
For their first hint of bloom;
They would squash it if they could, and their shoulders
Grow vermilion capes,
And on the concrete numbers trees move in invisible
Groves,
And they can leap through them like robbing Samurai
And say to each other whispering in curls better words
Than I could imagine,
Things that only little girls know latchkeyed for the weekend
Waiting for the slow tumult of the drying universe
For the heavenly bodies to emerge and pulse over scar-
Less lips- They are a post-Victorian novel, and right now
In an emerald dusk where all the hues of this color go to Sleep on the back of molting insects,
They know everything- And they can go on like this perfect,
No matter whatever happens, they will have the secret rhymes
Involving one another's names,
And the very quiet peep shows of subtle green birthmarks,
There a teal inlet on the sleeveless shoulder,
Or along the running backyard stream of a softly skipping thigh,
As their eyes fall along through the drowsy copper of ancient yards,
Of what will come to be their emerging yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Everyday Lunch

Paper birds sweat through the sheets
Of adulterous armpits;
And she seems to sing with all she's got,
Waiting for the mail of drowned soldiers,
While the waves come in,
Counting coo and dying like all of that stuff
Which seems to make up this nonsense-
Further inland there are tables with still-life
Moping,
And little boys of all ages are quite happy and Masturbating,
Waiting for their crackerjack prizes,
While their women are shopping or looking out
Of hurrying windows
As the day goes by recreating the colors of Its cereus constellations-
Soon beautiful Latin women will be bringing Us our lunch,
Busily trying to decide which one of us they love
The most;
But it will hardly be enough- The continents
Float like sweet young terrapin, and if I've never Had the chance to think up anything else,
At least I saw your eyes seeming to float like Something bluebird and somnolent- Surely something
That could never die,
And maybe even love me- married, and yet so
Lonely with me, when they were supposed to be Enjoying their everyday lunch alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Fairground's Verdant Yards

Space-shuttle looking nice in its place above the trees
And palaces
And movie theatres—
Over all of the forgotten parts of the world—maybe you
Haven't even completed your mission,
But she is here:
Floating over the forests—
Over the mountains that lose themselves and their
Summits in the daylights—
Even with the most gentle of slopes, the little children
Become lost upon,
Become foundlings of beavers and bears—
And their fingers linger in the spotlights of the orchards,
Hoping that the angels and the genies will place
Whatever delightful jams upon their finger tips,
So that they won't have to linger for much longer—
And they can lose themselves in the daydreams or wherever it
Is they can find for sure
That the lighthouses and the windmills talk to them,
Spinning in the sunbeams—and apexing in the buzzing apiary of
Their fairground's verdant yards.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Fairytale Homes

And there they lay sleeping
So lost and so nude in a pile of limbs
Like discombobulated and Bled roses
Being covered by snowflakes
Underneath the mountain—
And, as a rule,
The sled came to collect them
One by one—to take them
Back to their fairytale homes
To their families
Who worried about them—
And in the summer they Melted again—
And their eyes ran like pinwheels over
The escarpments where the arrowheads
Were lost—
And they looked so beautiful running
Together,
Running to the bitter end,
Where they leapt to the clouds—
And basked there, fawning in those Unbelievable gardens
Straight over the heads of the Indians
And the peddlers—
Where entire families entered into Supermarkets and disappeared—
And joyriders slipped to movie theatres
Just to enjoy the kisses of tongues—
And it wasn't their world anymore,
But at least they wouldn't have to go to School—and if they were Found out by tomorrow that they
Never existed—
At least they wouldn't be around to care.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Father's Tears

There will be no more days that flash in the yard,
The orchids in the trenches getting bigger as they grow-
The cicadas in the jugulars of lime trees,
And the chorus of young kittens up there all but learning to Climb,
With the last prizes of the Ferris Wheel's gold fish
Decorating the kaleidoscopes of armpits and leaves-
Gifts from the fair that has already burned away-
Windswept newspapers cluttering the grottos of the housewives,
While the washing machines revolve and fibrillate,
And the sky writers scribble so much promises over the perpetual
Lactates motioning in the sea, while mountains rise the other way:
They go up a good distance just to get a look down:
They see a world of tourisms beneath them, but before they can Cry, their sorrows metamorphosis into the auburn joys of the gods
And the stewardesses they have captured in the mazes of Aspen spangling their laps- an adolescent and silver cloister
Grown up there after the fire in whose knuckles the Grizzly bears gather, opening chapbooks of mouths,
Having hibernated through all of the Starry-eyed neighborhood's fireworks, waiting for their father's tears.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Favorite Pilots

Comets long in the tooth
Shooting curve balls over stolen bicycles—
Here they are peppering the earth—
Graveyard of adolescent boys—
Alligators and iguanas crawl over them
And pitch their tents:
Bottle-rockets and paper airplanes fly
Over them—
And then underneath the silver—toothed moon,
And werewolves—they are gone:
School is out for the summer again—
And mothers have forgotten their missing children:
Girls in a kindergarten sorority send their Love letters up to their favorite pilots—
Blowing them kisses,
As the otters swim through the chains of estuaries
That keep the housewives separated and Perfectly contented.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Favorite Show

The reindeer who look like sound systems
Entering a closed down store:
Smells of grass, and the promises of a false sea:
Or anyways,
Words that play their own accord, superfluous
Luxury items:
Men reaching out to hold the hands of the women
Who never come in-
A dense menagerie- a swing set up against the Bicycles sleep
Half naked tourists in softly lighted rooms,
Terrapin
And seashells: old favorite dollars somewhere in the Forts of coquina-
The smells suceeded off the road- the nocturnal
Orchards that bloom like movie theatres,
And the long forgotten arrows in the limestone crooks:
They will go anywhere,
And remain forever abandoned even as the children return
Home and turn on their favorite shows.

Robert Rorabeck

Their First Footsteps

When the day is saying what it meant
And ultimately lying down for the unctions of Jasmines, what fairies will play with the cats
As their owners work all night at some carwash
Or roller-rink,
And the stewardesses take all of the time
To the skyâ€hopping and gallivanting like tree frogsâ€;
Like knights with copper wingsâ€;
I wonder how many corsages have bloomed for them
At so many airports underneath the moons:
Sometimes they must feel as if they are upon other Planetsâ€taking their first footsteps out into
The neophyte citiesâ€their wings drying in the background:
They are in high school again,
Their heavens have touched the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Forgotten Chests

Another carnival taking down
As the sun goes too,
Clipped from the pages of better men,
Men who know how to wink and
Throw that ball,
Whose brushes with her lingerie seem to Stick to the roof of my mouth,
When they leave me for bedrooms to Tramp,
And I know the signs,
And the ways they lounge in insects' moats
All day,
Enjoying the ravages,
Never letting off their playboy grins,
The forensic teams with hair lips and Flashbulbs who voyeur them like conquistadors
With boxes of glazed donuts;
And I carve my stick,
And kiss my dog,
And it should be the last day for me in this
Bed,
Because I'm moving on, leaving on my marks
In wooden doorposts,
Leaving only the cenotaphs poached from more
The steady traffic of professionals off the whale
Sea- How easily they are taken,
And given flowers to, and tin horns which do
Nothing as the wind blows across the mowed
Grasses
As across their forgotten chests.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Forgotten Memories

You morons,
while the night was leaking peonies,
I strutted to the castle.

In bad repair underneath the moonlights, the skeletons were baking breads they could not eat
and placing them on the tables-

I do not care
how many butterflies came down from the moonlights,
or how many lovers were interred
in the drive in movie theatres;

or about the hungry, toothed creatures who cannot speak for themselves-

I have rewalked the catacombs of that eerie
high school-
I used to work there, but I was not paid to leave:

From there, the busses turn around in their casual migrations:
with the sun rising upon her virginal shoulderblades, Closing our eyes now, we can almost pretend to believe that this is
Disney World:

I have seen prettier girls married there only to awaken hungered, classified,
The feral conquistadors pinning corsages with Crossbows against her door:

There she is a saint we have forgotten
Taking broken metals to the scrap yard:
While our eyes left her, she awakened beautifully for a moment, but while she yawned and budded a sleeping garden,
She awakened a grandmother,

And the skeletons of her once presumptive bachelors gathered with thorny stems of vanished roses, pressing their forgotten memories against her eternal door.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Forgotten Shore

The dragon beat his wings and said,
&quot;All I want is a loaf of bread.
Give your heart to someone else
Instead.&quot;
As the wind blew over the ocean
And looked at her—
As the feelings in his heart
Began to stir—
The tourists all perched upon their Amusement rides
Looked askance—
The angels drank glasses of
Her tears
And danced—
As the fireworks gyred upon
Their forgotten shore....

Robert Rorabeck

Their Forlorn Cacophony

Unfitted, the zoo sleeps well concealed;
The bachelors are moaning their ghazals,
Their lungs are wheezing like sick balloons,
Since they can see her through their bars;
She is that opulent moon,
Fully formed, the distant transmogrify,
Who delights in making love in front of their lonely cages,
To everything else, and in that nostalgic expanse,
She whispers to them she whispers her tugging form,
Where the sea rises in sharp nipples,
And laughs with her in their pornographic trauancies,
Dancing in the drunken bolero beneath her armpit
Until they are trapped in the flowing penumbra,
One part of her thighs which lays across their Foreheads like a feverish hand,
Touching them with her distant interests,
Until they learn her name,
The hoary spikenard come aware in their throats,
And cry it out in their forlorn cacophony.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Games

Fingers that play their games over
A plums in an orchard, until the airplanes become
A still-life- that they are so puzzled,
And the moonlight and the sunlight, like lovers on a picnic
Hang around for lunch,
So tantalized- as if by a soap opera; and the crop through
The crenulations of lucky leaves
Just keeps getting greener and greener through their experiences
In the fertilizations of light;
And I think under the photosynthesis underneath the holidays,
Like the wishy-washy thoughts of birthday candles,
Like the songs of the spokes of daisies, or in the truanicies of
So many bicycles:
Either she loves me or she loves me not;
Though I love her, either way.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Gold Through The Skies

The Latin classes have new hopes they pass around:
It is supposed to rain this weekend,
But I hope to see Alma, chalk smeared on the playground:
And all of these words like tulips sprouting cantankerously from
The grave:
Alma's sister's coronation, churchyards of glowing hibiscus:
And stewardesses coming into the yard,
Showing off in their heels so high that they can reach up and Stroke the fireworks bellies of airplanes:
They breath so smoothly, but I can sell them anything,
While the unicorns have amnesia: just like Alma forgets who
She is or where she belongs:
Alma wishes that she could go back to school,
And the traffic comes and the traffic goes, and the airplanes leap,
But the bird cages are empty,
And the little Mexican children are holding the sparklers
As green as the colors of Alma's flag,
And the virgin is in her grotto and clouds smolder like recluses
Counting their gold through the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Golden Fears

Rhythms in the creek of gist, foaming airplanes,
Open wrists: the body takes its times going from the leaking
Flea markets,
Sashaying to the navy- heliotrope is the desert of its Forest, where the wolves hunt
Outside the damp patios and Astroturf that zoetrope
Cantinas;
And if you were lying low: as if you were lying right here:
Down enough to be the eking devil of my abode,
Why then I'd swear we could go together into that kind of Necrotic Disney World:
We could go all the way down, with the moans of cenotaphed
Seashells in our ears:
With the same type of feral rapture that her tiny brown wings of Lips gave to the lieutenants of my senses a couple weeks a
Go;
And now holidays and fieldtrips- like bagworms crawling up
Walls trying to make it to the pawn shop
To see what they can get for their golden fears.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Goodbyes

Alphabets in lines of pleasure,
The colonel on his boat;
Fried chicken and waffles,
A tourist of a girlfriend or a princess
Surrounded by her moat;
And it only takes so many gazes
To look up into
The skies,
To see all of the fireworks: their hard works,
Their praises; and, finally, their goodbyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Happenstance's Gold

Impoverished bodies- you roam, as wolves reintroduced
Themselves into your abandoned home:
Your wives, your daughter- forgotten and swimming inside
Pools,
And sloping down from there: canals, and canals-
Lost toys floating away-
Cenotaphs of conquistadors half dredged up- languidness of Pain and broken chastity:
Girls on roller skates who once hoped to make their own
Music in the rain,
Now with scabbed knees, weeping weeping, head down
In the palmettos- taking sips form flasks of the Half escaped dwarfs:
Latin graffiti on their broken down bodies- tattoos of never Found boyfriends
And windmills:
And looking up there, funneling across the soccer field
That some poor Mexican just mowed:
More of the horror coming down the yard, souping up the song
Birds, killing away the hours,
Peeling away their innocent flowers, their happenstance's gold.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Homeless Tears

Airplanes like school buses leaping above my house
While I hide deep in the burning armpits of these palms,
Listening also to the roaring of lions,
And then to the pedaling footsteps of housewives returning home,
Arms filled with so many packages
Until they can finally let go, as pale as the sheets of ghosts
Relaxing in their air-conditioning,
Into rooms like mine where I would like to bring Alma and Make love to her through the flash and rattle of the Rainstorms that come over the places such as these
And leave their homeless tears on the soft green bellies of So many leaves.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Hungry-Eyed Epicurian Way

Truncated and made dumb by the silence's
Everything,
Made to stand like a soldier in empty rooms,
Hoping to be first noticed from a
Distance,
And then passed quickly over and left empty-handed
To judge for myself
My celibacy's saturated empiricism,
The topographies of walking alone, the heedlessness
Of trying to find the flower's bloom,
The staunch and saccharine rigidity that apexes my Nature's causality like a stuffed angel on the highest mast
Of a three ring circus;
And the women have come, kissing their crystal balls,
Pushing their cornucopia of trams,
And I have saluted them from the waves, their sailor boy
With a farmer's tan,
But I have never called them over, knowing that they would Much better enjoy the freedoms they have to peruse
In tanned and dancing windows out in the open of an esplanade's
Mall,
The Mercado that lays wandering over the seas, like an un-pinpointed
Ghost,
The seafarers who grab what they need to feed the husbands of Their evening, though it is just as well that they do not linger
With things to whisper to me,
But to be quickly upon the soft back of their hungry-
Eyed epicurean way.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Immortal Station Wagon

Gold digging serpents,
Where is your gold not that the fourteen karot
Day gold is over,
And broken its mold. When the art teachers had Sweet tits
Like treats,
Tits like for candy for trick-o-treats;
And the traffic is over,
And she's just waking up and beginning to serve
Her yeasty liquors to her slurping pups:
And college football
And meatballs,
And things that last forever because they don't Feel a need to die,
As I realized today just exactly I was:
I was not beautiful, but I was dusty and properly formed,
And I could make my way through Kansas'
Corn:
I could make-believe I was alive and fine,
With nothing but the silver-fisted moon occupying my
Time,
Saying these things like the truancies of bottle rockets
With the windows open,
And the sky opening up to angels,
To little insignificant angels in brown paper bags
Like hidden things brought home from a fair of turns,
Or taken over from dark closets and lit to Burn
Anonymously on the darkened stoop while the feverish
Cat is always watching the young lovers so tightly
Clenched and dripping the first conceptions
Of their immortal station wagon.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Incalculable Blessings

You met me with your bullet holes across the Sea of fences-
Or at least the sea horses were here, anyways,
In the tiny architectures of the
Dear maiden's defenses- and she fell down for Them, crying in her lactates
On unsuspecting holidays- they leapt up
And mended her,
Pulling her down into the salts they were Masticating-
The airplanes roared like the thunder of the racetracks,
As the cars beat in mockery of the waves,
Who kissed her, and changed her into whatever
She was by the crescendos of their incalculable
Blessings.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Iridescent Memory

Failures of the every day and of my songs:
Box cars stuck alongside the highway
That even the tourists don't care about- weathering,
As the forests curdle,
And my dogs with long tongues talk about
A park they've never been to:
As you are up there again in your sweet peninsulas
Flying kites or lactating over your children,
And the fields are wild over my dead cousins:
The poets whose hearts were too big
To live without their muses,
So the dandelions grow as rich as lilacs, and the Butterflies come with their pornographies
To fornicate and steal away the perfumes of
Their iridescent memory.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Joysticks Of Crepuscule

So many ways of crying home: waxy of bosom—
Making the foxes foam:
And the will follow you just as long as there is
Day left in high school:
If you go out into the courtyard: If you go out onto
The baseball diamond, you will see how
The yellow tombs—
As your mothers corsage in the daydreams of Their suburban ballrooms—
And the truancies of your little brothers awaits up
On the rooftops for you—
Pretending their joysticks of crepuscule—
The alligators smiling gallons for their primeval tanks—
And your fathers coming home,
Picking up girls in roller skates and languishing with them
Atop of the grassy tombs.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Kaleidoscopes Of Offspring

The prettiest numbers are keeping pace with
Graveyards
And I do not know who you are,
And you will never know who I am—
While there seems to be an entire dinner in
The sky,
But what of the luxury of the sea—
At the same time recording memories for ourselves
In the amphitheatres of our playgrounds,
Knights ringing around the rosses
As the planet melts—
And times get better attributing to the beautiful
Diseases which can be found wherever alongside
The roads—as the princesses get too heady
Kissing forever their princely toads—
And on Friday nights, pool parties—
Languishing in the angelic neighborhoods of
Far away,
As faeries get pregnant and prepare
For their kaleidoscopes of offspring—
As the unicorns are kept prisoners by the waves.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Kites

Trains in my ears
And I only have nine fingers, and I wonder who
I will be loving until then:
Driving home after
All of the pacifying fire of another day
As the light is parceled out into
The gullets of the wealthiest
Men,
And the skull grows, and the rainbows unwrap
Their ribbons
Into another daylight of some other god than
Who is always here:
Why it parcels out, and the sad light seems to transcend
Forever, skulking primordial
Across the sheaths in those fields of planted
Knights,
But after them, the young virgins come out
And read my poems
And try their tongues and fly- and fly their kites.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Littlest Kingdoms

Full with the shadows that never fall:
I will eventually get up my body, gray, boyish,
A premature cenotaph: get up and draw my body across
The graveyards of mailboxes,
The open throats of airplants, the cars resting there like Panthers,
The quick digging of ants- that the ants can dig, and
The sand lions under the fuselages of their roaring gods:
That I can get up and go out in the roaring day,
Watching the conflagrations of clouds pushing one another,
Falling like the cataracts of vanished lovers,
Slipping somewhere on the other side of the hedgerows,
And basking in the tanks of greenness, as the little things dig
In their little dreams upon their backs,
All the way down the singing throats, go these littlest kings
In their littlest kingdoms.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Long Shows

Traffic burning like arrows, like runways for airplanes;
And touching down, maybe congratulating, and going to sleep:
And I still have a bag of fireworks,
And visions of her leggy body stepping both forwards and backwards
Through the sharp mouthed allow that has reasons to suppose Underneath the rhymes her bodies has no reason to give:
It does, and I skip school and watch someone else's older sister undress
To let her body press like an extraordinary creature in the backyard
Sun:
And it is all undone: the bicycles move, and science is explored;
And another politician is voted for, while she unnoticed for a second moves
Away, and not just across the street,
But entire states of street and finds mean love in the snow, collecting fishing
Hooks,
Perhaps finding reason too in the luminescent curves of other carnivals
And their long shows, to be in love with another man.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Lover's Home

I am walking through a field of hemlocks
And everyone is picking some and Committing suicide—
All in rows they fall like ripened fruit,
And worms wriggle and giggle just the same,
As their murmuring lips blister,
As their eyes exclaim—
In high school, everyone dies a little,
But they don't look good doing it—
Sophocles never went to his classes,
As he skipped out and jumped around the sun,
Trying to figure out why the girl in Second period never looked at him,
But he fell dead just before he was done—
And, just to the east, in her burnished suit,
The sea is longing to undress as Lost children throw themselves into her
Throat and proclaim that the world is all
Too much, while behind them the city is building
New finer buildings up to the sky,
And the highest windows are like diving boards
For high diving suicides,
But their bodies never reach the places
When they fall, the places they were trying to get to,
Their lover's home....

Robert Rorabeck

Their Makings Of Love

Cane fires from Barbados burn me,
Back from the movies-
Waiting to fall asleep in a house that moves,
Like airplane gibberish overhead-
Long stanzas that aren't yet dry:
Her eyes are blue birds only for seconds;
They are indescribable, but sometimes written of
By Baudeliare:
Drunkenly he saw her in one of her bosomy stages
Of evaporation smoking out of the chimney of
A incandescent bar;
Maybe there were pirates coming in off the Sea of France,
All giddy and ambidextrous at the thought of taking her.
They'd left their torn ship behind, auburn,
Its throat cut on the prettiest reddest of corals,
And water snakes were coming through,
But they didn't have the time, being stuck in the middle Of the canal as they were:
Here body was a hermited mirage vacillating at the edge
Of that perlescent lake;
And even as they came in, I waited for her, and attended
To her orchids while children whilst I listen to
Their makings of love.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Men To Bed On Time

Bodies curling in their beds as strumpets,
As their tits are curling
Upwards like Christmas ornaments, and listen to all the many Stories that they have been telling:
Like I used to sit with my parents on Easter in the Gun Club
With the car salesmen and it was a beautiful America:
At least all the prettier women were beautiful,
And I and my sister could go and buy cat food and feed all the Vagabond felines and not really have to think about it:
Now my sister and I both have beautiful houses,
And the ocean teals, and the sky pearls: Sharon, the sky really pearls,
And I wonder when the last time was you played with yourself
In the high weeds along Military Trail; or I doubt that you
Ever did,
And the terrapin misses you; and at least you haven't had to see all
Of my new scars;
And I will sell fireworks and miss you: maybe I will climb in Colorado
Again just to look down your blouse or up your skirt;
But if you really need me, I will be there, like a super hero who is always Drunk:
Now stop thinking of anything and just remember how beautiful you are:
How beautiful your daughter is, and that because of you the day can go on Forever musing,
Trumpeting and petting the swans: and because of you man can go on Forever selling all of his stuff;
And most importantly I don't have to rhyme; and the housewives will Always serve dinner and get their men to bed on time.

Robert Rorabeck

Their More Familiar Men

Making tomfoolery with wet paint
Every midnight,
And I have to ask myself if that's what I am
Trying to do now,
Like an awful twin, the shadow of the sun:
While houses are going under,
And the sea is rising like your best man under Your skirts,
And maybe you are either auburn or dun.
And you have a school bus named after you,
And even the Grand Canyon isn't anymore
Beautiful,
But easier to get down to the very meat of:
And when your eyes look up from your books,
What do you care
To think up, the strange astrology which dictates
To the pillow of your drugs;
And I have two names for you, like a snowflake
Who has a strange twin,
And the both of you are waiting for me to open
The door and let you in,
To make an ice rink of my living room
When I am homeless, and I don't have a daughter;
And I want your daughter even while
The stars are moving away,
As if Hollywood was the new occidental,
Because our real-estate is expanding,
Even as the wooden boys get to enjoy the bonfires of Mortality:
They get to eat and gossip at restaurants on their father's Birthday,
And they enjoy going down like that,
Like a fish caught on a line being given some slack for Awhile,
As if the galaxies were all of a sudden returning
Like a reunited sorority,
And there in the blue foyer sharing eager gossip
Before setting down and really getting into the meat of
The constant graveyards where they are sure to

Dig up some dirt on all of their more familiar men.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Most Abscent Wives

Maybe they will feel beautiful themselves tomorrow:
Maybe Alma will touch my face with smiles,
Even if she wont allow me to touch her, until we grow big again,
And she gets naked into my own rooms:
But it feels alright, otherwise: that I only know how to paint when I am drunk,
And that I have spent my life slipping into presupposed graveyards:
My feet are all wet and naked,
And the airplanes are low and curious, while the waves are Tasting themselves in too many caesuras to be counted;
The housewives just smile,
And some of them are touching themselves while laying eggs:
Soon they will have names too,
And Mickey Mouse will come out and bless them; and then their Eyes will glow so brightly, like lighthouses who Enjoy shopping while their sailors are drowning, defeated
By the hydras, defeated by the sirens,
Defeated by their relations, though even as they pass by the Saturated anchors, they look good drowning, in the forgiving lights
That their most absent wives have been so kind to spend for them.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Mothers' Jewelry

Bodies doing pushups know tricks
And high carols:
Alma wants a new bust for Christmas, but I
Tell her she looks beautiful:
She also wants a new bicycle, and I think
I can give her that,
To give her an incentive to come over to my yellow
House
As old as most grandmothers more than once
A week, to tiptoe past the mausoleums
And the statuaries that smell like the bones of
Her neck,
Because her man is leaving again, going to California
Looking for the fleece;
And I get down on my knees and beg that he gets picked
Up by harpies, or immigration:
And I have the tattoo of the letter N on the web
Of Alma's hand,
Because Alma is a good girl, and she doesn't believe in Witchcraft, even though her aunt Meirna is certain that she Is under its spell:
But either way I can remain Alma's friend, under the fox-
Tailed palms,
As under the fuselages of nocturnal airplanes who look
As they are taking off as if they are wearing their mothers' jewelry.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Muses' Glories

The airplanes speak to me like
Lions evaporated into
Their ragged circus: theirs is a joy of much
Fertility—
Virile from the stewardesses they swallowed
Inside them,
Each of them living as if in an opalescent
Estuary,
Each one in harmless pieta,
A tea party in the belly of a wave
That knows the night
Cast in his sling across the waves:
The homeless men, on-lookers,
Holding up their empty cans like hungry
Instruments begging
For even a pittance of their muses' glories.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Naked Lights

They made their invention like feeding
Apples to their children:
A soft boy and girl lost in the forest filled by
The names they had given them—
And their minds in a curl, like weeds up from
Graveyards,
Or the similar stuff—like shell-fish made of Glass in a museum:
And the sea that wasn't there persuading them
To likemindedly dream of
The Ferris wheels casting their naked lights into
The impoverished trailer parks—as if
To say, come look at me: spend your last dollar
Bill to remember the cretinisms of my midway:
Now that I am gone, and you are with Another love.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Once And Future Kings

Prisms in a pragmatic antechamber—the beginning
Forgeries for a new world that only awakens after everything is Closed—
Dwarves with battle-axes stealing clothes for bearded infants—
Pixies the same consistency as sugar
Hijacking alligators in order to travel to the epicenter of
The zoo,
Elves who steal the poles of firemen—you know who I mean—
All of those kissing cousins who you've read about
But can never quite grasp—lonely gentlemen on a road of Espionage, or shadows outside of your windows while you
Are watching television, listening into a world they cannot Have—teaching of the plagiarisms of our reality.
While beyond them, the castles of crystal
And the unicorns collect the moonbeams of the heavens at Every angle—and spring them back across the rivers—
Thoughts arise as rainbows—as knights gallop for
The epicenters of their heroic curiosities—
Gifted with the exploratory thoughts,
Or sent outwards, embodying the exploratory love letters
Of their once and future kings.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Open Hearted Displays

I drink from my living room—
It's as small as a shell—
With the television off, and all of the Lights,
No one can tell—
And the fair has moved away,
And all of the beautiful girls have Dimmed—
And it just so happens that
Even now
Even all of the dolphins are asleep
In the bay,
But when tomorrow wakes up
Tomorrow it will just
Be so beautiful that Everyone will have to go out
And buy fireworks and
Christmas trees
So even all of the cars will have
To stop
To see how beautiful are the gifts
Of their openhearted displays.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Otherwise Oh So Charming Way

They say if you are published
You can have anything-
Well, here I am in a paper snow storm,
Caressing you pitifully
So far away,
A pest of homeopathic fireworks,
And I want one wish,
One ugly thing from you:
To have you stand for a minute as picturesque
As a tree coming up along
A sidewalk,
Just as beautiful as any innocuous or
Grand thing in suburbia,
Or at the edges of a mowed lawn,
And give to me your shadow
To close my eyes under and breath,
To bask in the philosophy of your thighs
Milky way,
Your pitiless glances the stars,
Your limbs the tracks of those senses that for
My wish will cover me
And I can look up and breath such smoke from
Your volcanic virtues:
That you are a goddess and that I took Lunch. I ate a soft boiled egg underneath your Planets,
Your naked powers and soft monuments
Before you gathered up and went on swinging
Your sweet mammalian censers along their Otherwise oh so charming way.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Own Ways Home

If mothers find themselves carrying the broken
Colors of their children at their elbows,
These mulatto children
Given gringo names
if they linger all out of doors
At different obsessions,
And they stargaze at the different truly colored
Insects,
Or feel the smoke rising from the little grates
Of angels,
They will wait too long- their metamorphosis
Will not evaporate,
And nothing will be done: and their lifetimes
Will belong to the lessons of the parks,
And the busy streets what amusements they find
Standing on the corners watching until the shadows
Regress, and the cars pull around
And the clouds, skipping like wishes of evaporated
Stones, go along their merry way
As their children pool across the sweaty mirages,
And eventually find their own ways home.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Perfectly Contented Ennui

I have frightened you because you are actor,
And I am a poet,
But only one of us is anything good enough to feel reality:
Only one of us will live forever, even if he is now dead,
Even while the spitting young ingénues swing delightfully at your hips,
And my popguns blow smoke alone across the barren foyers;
Only one of us has folded so many paper airplanes
As to make his fingers bleed:
Only one of us has heard the cars whisper, the crickets sing:
And I could write the stone words above your resting place:
I could give an everlasting fever to crown your superfluous soul;
Because you have never loved a girl named Alma,
And you have only gone with the other tourists to the bellies of mountains:
Never even gone far enough to smell the perfumes above the lights of The venal innuendos,
To let the silly yellow light of the foam of girls kiss your dimpled chin;
But that doesn't mean you are beautiful,
When I have blinded myself by the nubile sun: I have climbed four mountains
In one day: I have been atop the two highest points in Colorado in one Day, even while my old girlfriend was making love to her freshman
Love,
And I came down and the tourists could have made fun of me if I
Chose to stay anywhere around them, but I was already gone,
John;
And this is not yet an epitaph to the truancy in my ever loving park,
For I will sing out so silently for some time to come that Only the dogs will whine: For they are things like me, sensing the world Through the grayness of others, loving me as unconditionally as Instinct,
So far away from the cowardly glow where all the glass wildflowers
Are cheering around a grinning window frame
That looks out into the dinner party whose wine glasses are singing
Such a feverish eucalyptus that they don't know how
The end has already gone, grinning as he drinks in the deep bliss
Of their perfectly contented ennui.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Present Perfect Superlatives

I am doing a much better job underneath the airplanes
Without my father here to correct me:
What am I doing, being lit up by the careless and yet
Absolutely sure bombs—
Combing over the parapets of their memory-less jungles:
And there is a new word left out in the open
For you—
And giving you the newest of securities that we so
Uncertainly are left to enjoy—and if I've failed you laying Down my last catastrophe of a heirloom into
The mementos of a movie theatre where the blindest
Of spelunkers proceeds—spreading his wings
And searching out a careworn alphabet—then again
There will be another summer—
And I've been starving—starving—and waiting for this
To happen and fearing linking verbs
Or their present perfect superlatives.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Pretty Mirages

Bodies of airplanes moving over
The house again—the same place where I've been Drinking my rum,
Where the sunlight is growing in spears over
The emptied space of my kidnapped
Mother:
Right next to the washing machines is supposed
To be her Pieta,
And I go there to dance and to weep,
But not to think of other things—
Outside, the butterflies are following the highway
Like gypsies not giving a pretty d#mn for the Forests—
And I wonder how long it will be before they have
To give up,
And go back to the arms of their windmills who Give them all of the time all their pretty mirages of love.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Pretty Umbrellas Whistling

Crawling up to its belly, milky with the lactates
Of spring: it coos, coos as it calls for it again: the hungriness
Spent before any mother like a ball of unwound
Rattlesnakes mewing in the darkness until
They are fed the kittens who have run like marbles down the steps
Until they are soft and white in the corpuscles of the darkness;
And all of the campus is lost, and the thieves have run away with the Bicycles and it makes for a rude awakening to the premature
Aphorisms that are sparkling quite nude in their Pools everywhere, and just about anyone can stop and mouth off
To the ultra bright crenulations that stamen for the housewives
Who have so much time to spend with themselves
While the bottle rockets of their short toothed truants go off in their Backyards and or overhead: and they make their pretty umbrellas whistles
Above the torpidly sojourning alligators- who are going just about Nowhere, and overhead.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Promises So Close To The Sea

I want to love you, so I paint you on a canvas behind my house—
Beneath the infant orange tree where the ghosts get stuck
Like kernels of popcorn in a mouth—
And the clouds hang over, building up on this side of the canal
As if she was a mountain,
But there is nothing there—but maybe it is the sugar cane the Haitians and the Guatemalans are burning—
Bringing tears to the eyes of the bus driver and the crocodiles—
While boys who play baseball from middle school are no longer
Sure they exist,
And I can look back upon them—
Reverence, as if my senses are the divine incenses of a Ferris Wheel of zoos—beautiful brothers get on the road again—
As airplanes take off above—
Neither of them are too involved with the actually spellings of Things, but when it rains, both take shelter,
One in the heavens above the clouds—
And the other beneath the concrete overpasses that keep
Their promises so close to the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Purple Canals

Juvenile loves who've grayed,
Shooting at a turtle in the river in the morning of a blue
Trail,
The bicycles riding together as precious as our two hearts
Overlapping like how waves disappear
Traveling up the bottleneck of a grotto; and I have found you,
And felt you in the few ways that I know,
Alma, and give over to you entirely all of my failing instruments
Like uncut gems gossiping in the wound of a tree
The otters peruse with salty mouths from all of the sea life
They've been at feeding,
And of the mermaids they've been at kissing, skipping school,
And laying on their oily backs in the favorite torpidities of
Their purple canals.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Rarifying Dooms

If I'm so cute you should probably Kiss me,
Like the duchess who plucked one of Those geese to
Make the headdresses for one of those Chiefs;
And you know, the lights are finally all out
And the traffic has run down to a trickle.
I believe the canals have stopped
Entirely, they are so shallow.
We can go to sleep together after our lips
Are done playing football,
And the sport of our sexes' spawning sagging
Like cerulean tents badly beaten in an Appalachian rain storm:
We can pretend to be hiding out in the Washington Monument like two young skeletons in Cahooots giving each other Pyle driving glances,
Knowing that maybe there is a way to get through Lincoln's beard,
Leaving Virgil and his rotten slaves to the ice fields
Over the lawn
Where the crickets are momentarily not breathing:
Even the flags like the trees are unbending from the coat
Of a revolutionary morning,
But all the patrols are tucked softly into beds nearside
The tourists,
And in the morning they will be going home, snug and fattened
Into trunks of trains,
Returning to the carports and washing machines in the blue
And crystal grottos where they are still growing
Like our misfortunate dreams,
Like goldfish agog at the curling irons and little sisters
Petting the gray cats of their rarifying dooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Red Yards

Whole days dying- kaleidoscope of glass houses from
So many days ago,
As the parks swing and the Ferris wheels go,
But it never gets any busier than this-
And the children are never Found out:
Where they've been going, and how it comes down
To them:
They've spilled across the sands in their
Make-believes,
But in the busy ways of things- they'll soon be
The housewives of middle-class kings:
While I've loved you in these spilling yards of Roe and
Fake diamonds: even as you go home to your Children in their red yards of baseball games-
I've said how you make me
Feel, even as the song birds disappear from the sky
And I go off to find another love,
Leaving you to wonder why.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Scents Of Unrequited Reason

The rivers are pretty here, and the drunkards:
The lesbians like coy tortoises in their chlorinated pool,
Get entirely naked
While the freshmen never slumber, and this is where
I once lived,
But now to be bedecked by you, and to really cream,
To really get out and outline the nubile savages in my outlawed
Dream:
And that this is real, and able to be hiked too:
That I have kissed those lips, and plucked from you, Alma,
Everything that in this mortal hemisphere is able to Be salvaged from the fabulously living,
And that you have thus so become my ultimate muse:
Both making my drafts more cuneiform and lovingly less inviting:
And I drink from the bottle of the stars,
And ride on the ill-equipped equipage of wild horses,
Drawing insignificant blood
As I try to outline in such an inopportune stride everything it is That I can possibly sell like bohemian presents
Caring their scents of unrequited reason about you.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Secrets

Your secrets laugh in secret—Their gardens are fully overgrown:
The rabbits are entombed in their gardens,
The labyrinths of evaporated giants lingering across the loams:
And this is my avoidance in which I have kept an Eye out perceiving for you:
If a Cyclops, I am not jealous—let both you and your men boast
And jest around me upon your sea:
I will be utterly surrounded—The princes will ring me as if Areolas—they will sing all of their songs while piercing their Instruments all together into me—
Until it will finally be time to wake up and remember—Another school
Day beckons all of the dead children underneath the other sun
And ill-omened space rockets—as the dogs that you pretended
To light off fireworks towards bear their teeth and C@ck their guns—
And the water fountains run underneath the daylight underneath the sea:
As the monuments lift their heads into the dusks,
Trying to remember whatever it was that whoever happened to live
Here had ever said to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Semiprecious Boudoirs

Every word that I have done, unexpected and unwise-
Listing there like a legless pet begging for her eyes:
Rhyming like winos bending their lips to a bottle exeunt of Geniis or stewardesses:
Their hoary Adams apples cursing the skies:
Bending backwards on the scoliosis of tattered weather veins
And fossils of coelacanths of backwoods roads:
Down where your mother tipped over pregnant with your Little sister, drowning with her last breath in a blue
Carp upturned like an electronic terrapin whistling underneath
The mud and the brambles
Like a bump on a log, like an entire hallucination- a wish
For a birthday of a child who has never existed on a day that is Not counted, underneath a sky that doesn't go so far, but makes
Its contributions as the girls return in before their echoes
Who are always halfway dressing or undressing in the half light
Of their semiprecious boudoirs.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Silky Bosoms

Traveling that way was troubling handiwork,
Like a kite whose tailfins are on fire, who tries
To make love to the sky
Even after all the pilots are down and inebriating
With the Navajos on some dry creek's bed
Full of beer cans and bull frogs:
And the stewardesses no longer shave: they go inside
Caves to make love with bears,
Who feed them honey and take care of them all Winter; but scar them from their love-
and if there were resorts of snow,
They would all melt away, and fill up the canyons
And the grottos of cemeteries,
Making love to the chiseled names of the people
We once knew and who sold used cars,
Who now lay down at the lowest part of the valley
Far away from the mountains where the aspens
Grow like a kaleidoscope of yellow
School girls gossiping of wildfire as they are perfumed
By the pollens that hush down the toolbox draw
And into their silky bosoms.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Silver-Purple Bodies

Spot on—the little immortality of the fairy nymphs—
Living like barrettes in your hair,
As you take them to school—even as you cannot figure out
What is happening,
And even as you shake out your long hair—
Even if the classroom is full of bullies, and the flea market
Underneath the overpass is filled with echoes—
This is your place:
All of the stewardesses are watching you and serving you
Drinkings—
As I think of the quieted places that must follow you home:
They are becoming more quiet,
As you become more forlorn—and the purple dragon-fly,
And the purple bowling alley—
And the purpled star in the sky hang over you like cousins—
It doesn't mean your safe—
Only that you can rest for awhile underneath the ceiling
Fans, to the grin of your Cheshire cats—
As the world of luminescent simulacrum spins around you—
Spinning, spinning—taking what is their's,
And with their silver-purple bodies, drawing what they know how.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Son Of Suns

Please, I need the possibility of fireworks or Anything else that isn't real,
While the unicorns smell the pollens of little girls
In their bedroom merry go rounds underneath
The prepubescent windowsill;
And it throws me in the parasol when it rains,
The ship is in its bottle, the rose is in its vase,
The grandmother is in her urn,
And the hypnotized serpent is just coming out in case
That there is a light at the end of the movies,
While the plots are all reconciled and vacillating through
The webbing lights throughout the arrowhead planes,
As the lion yawns chastising the bromeliad tourists
Who walk straight out through the orange groves
And the green cannons,
And into Disney World; as this is they make-believe Florida,
Selling its shares it another seeming amusement
Vacillating for a little while above the streets,
And then turning down, and meeting themselves out underneath
The hungry cornucopias that cop their pleas to the Cannibalisms and incest's of each and every one of my smiling
Cousins
Who've had their bloody day out underneath the blood moneys
Of their son of suns.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Stewardesses Baring Wine

Your bedroom of skin lays across the railroad
Tracks,
Alma,
Lays underneath the vast, immeasurable plans of the sky:
While the earth cavorts,
The sun spinning it around like a magnanimous child,
Easily assured of its games:
While the airplanes take off, and the rockets flame:
Until your skin is done with the hypnotisms of blowing glass,
And finally the ghosts of your ancestors have gone
And past my home
At holidays, and at Christmas, long before I could have second
Thoughts which were not my own;
And you promises me, Alma, that that was the last time
You would tell me that you loved me,
But the sea did foam; and the dogs got up on their hind legs for Awhile and pledge themselves to the pale word of Their inebriated gods;
And they roamed around the hillsides, and made love to foxes;
And this is how it was for the longest time,
The airplanes fermenting, their stewardesses baring wine.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Stolen Wives' Blood

Sun of an obnoxious quarry as we seem
To be laughing—
Open throated frog princes all of the way
Up to the chandeliers—
While my mother waits in some awful
Mockery of a Pieta—
And the lamps bloom in the gold dusts of
The mines—
Another song mimics the song bird's,
As the traffic becomes utterly confused—
Losing itself into the darkness—
The mailman apexes, but he is no excuse
To me—
Lamp posts lining the streets of my adolescents,
As wicked men travel home after
The fireworks' pageantry—
Licking their stolen wives' bodies of
An adulterous
Apiary.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Striking Loves

Jasmine in a summer creak, pin wheeling,
Perfume as blanketed as if some snow lingered there
Invisible in the vermilion dew;
And tiny brown footsteps wimpling the grass over strewn
With the twin bodies of your sisters, somehow having escaped
From their bedroom:
All of Mexico seems to sing down from the mountains and
The cantinas,
And there isn't a car in the world, as I can feel you all around me,
Looking through the curtains of the trees,
Migrating through them as the last of the dusk falls upon the mailboxes
Satelliting the houses further down and never seen,
As you give an insurmountable beauty to the tranquil ferality of A romantic scene,
Your eyes batting whispers up into the rhinestone clouds, as if wondering
What should be growing there,
In the orchards slip away across the mysterious hills whose emerald
Bossoms no cartographer's map should ever rightly feel,
But who come down like mockingbirds over my bacheloring rooms,
Sometimes telling me of their striking loves.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Sun And Their Moon And Their Stars

Lying as yet unbeknownst to the unicorns
The homeless men and petty thieves take turns
Playing cards and eating canned ham underneath the over pass,
As it rains,
As the sea whispers to them as some sort of anonymous mistress:
But there they are,
Bearded and blue eyed, never having tasted fifty dollars worth
Of lobster,
Their world in a fifty cent can, burning tires—they become
Their own museum exhibit—
They became their own shanty city beneath the moon,
Beneath the concrete—and some, if not many, of them
Die regularly,
Beautifully gapped—toothed, broken—
Clocks that cannot tell time—and I have not known a one of Them, but I have known their sun and their moon and their stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Supposed Surrender

Loose angels in the park the wayward mermaids have Discovered too lately:
Now they are husks underneath the slash pines
And the carpenter ants mount
Them and take their nipples off like jujus- as the serpent
Surrenders to the sun,
Giving up its dog-tags to the witches moaning above
The baseball diamonds:
That this is their art, while the high craft girls
Tan in the red diamonds:
And school is extinct all summer, and the alligators
Forage,
And nothing else changes:
The dentists grasp for retainers, and the knights become
All lost through the different color choruses
Of the long highways blinded by the nights of
Their supposed surrender.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Throats' Conjoining Spring

Open vases in disguise peering through her
Glass blown eyes,
As the buses all return on home: returning home now,
The children joy,
Look up into the sky and so employ:
Their hearts, their souls there
In visions spring-
While the lions they have never seen drink directly from Their throats' conjoined spring.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Twins

It isn't hard here living with my dog:
Like a turtle, I can never look up, but I get to go home
Whenever I want-
And my head stays dry: I can hold out through a fire
Or a flood,
And I can think of girls who have come and gone,
Sweet little lavender dishes,
Serving delicate and April songs- how they sometimes Float over my shoulders
Like wishes blown from across the broad shoulders of
A Ferris Wheel,
And they keep on coming- a delightful apiary that Spreads through the night
In franchises that never have to sleep:
And they lay me down against the brushing tide, and their Children beside me:
They come and they go, revealing the nature that they Have slipped from-
They go after the sun: In the morning, they bring their twins.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Unconscious Surrenders

Your friends are in the trucks
And they are going higher up the mountains and swinging
Underneath the taillights of the moon
Which brings down the most beautiful
Girls; but we cannot even tell whoever they are, or Wherever they come from:
But they dress out for physical education- and they wear
Braces as silver as the beams which birthed them:
And the track is oval and red,
And returning their legs back to the off centered kilns
Beside the lunch trucks;
And everything that is there grows and comes up:
And the life comes around, headily, pubescent and sweltering
Yet having figured out where it has come from,
Where it is going- and the Universities loom
In a fraternity of dreams that are easily imagined:
And when they yawn, and are filled up by that way-
They go straight up like instruments of levitation,
Even past Disney World and all of her
Princesses: and they make time again for awhile down the Hallways cleared between the woods,
And the animals wait around them, for their turns to drink
Of the students who, collapsing, so become diademed
By their unconscious surrenders.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Usual School

Leave me alone and
Dancing at the playgrounds: leave me alone while
The sun discovers
The empty ground-
And my grandmother has died- her eyes have become Empty,
But filled with the dreams of sea life,
And I swim alone thinking about her
While the steam engines of rocket ships take off:
They go far away to play baseball games
Underneath the moon:
The grow up underneath the heavens,
And collect the tears of golden baboons:
But these words are here for you,
Outside the burbling cauldrons of another
Emptiness of dungeons:
They go there to serve their wishes away,
And to kiss the heavens:
They use up all of their rocket school- and they fly
Over the playgrounds-
And the disappear across the luckless daylight
Of their usual school.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Very Habitat

Unkempt cars filled with nude women-
Now I walk barefooted across the empty shells to Get to them,
Petroglyphs cutting my feet that are only five years
Old,
And escaping the sound cave of my parents making
Love:
Maybe I will finally get away from her to be
In those woods,
Warmed in the browned caesuras and nesting atop
The engines that are no longer any good,
Filled with my midnight of scars and ferris wheels,
Doing tricks underneath Saturn,
And the extravagances of the theatre,
Knowing only so many words to please me muse-
Knowing only this alphabet for her,
Until she spills, fainting from her acrobatics from Her very household, and then they will remark about
How she has fallen,
And I will remove myself from their very habitat
And help her before she can metamorphosis,
Before I may again evaporate.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Wants For Nothing

I don't have to worry about it: it will come anyways,
As gravestones arisen over night and the museums and the cemeteries
That talk about them, but not I,
Since I haven't been doing that great of stuff,
Just making my rounds beneath the cradles of far away nebulas
Or wherever they are:
Great motes of almost nothing pillaging in the void,
While down here in the insignificant wealth all of the sweet girls
Who are calling for more sweets,
Or they are out riding, and trying to call our bluffs:
The mountains over them like a castanet, the great bays and deltas
Their bibs: the airplanes their jewelry:
And they go about with the bandoleers of cowboys and stick up men,
And I crawl into their earth praying for the fractions of warmth
They spill and let waste from their overabundance,
And great feast of life, like the dog of an aboriginal king,
Hoping for but one petal of a rose in a garden that swarms with
The stifling mirages that make such sweet honey attending to their Great loves and their wants for nothing.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Weathers' Metamorphosis

Feral children in motor home crumbled around the stony Skirts of some treeless mountains,
And the sun coming down and making the noise of the infinite
Ruckus of lotuses and crickets:
And there is a zoo that I don't know, but I saw an albino
Alligator a month ago
While I kissed Alma's lips in the dark hutch, until it was Time for us to go away,
Or swim: and school was over, and the sky looked so good
Diademed by the airplanes,
And the helicopters like bees, while the ponies and AWOL
Soldiers developed in the secret lines of the Orchards overlooked by the green cannons of
Long ago:
And Alma has very favorite colors that she loves, and Ways that she amuses herself by me:
And I go towards her everyday, while the storm fronts meet,
Kissing in the brevity of their weathers' metamorphosis,
And yet always fearful of when they must turn away.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Wounded Shores

They stand at the sun tanning brink
When they should be sleeping:
They French-kiss in well known vocabularies:
Each on of them makes a sound in
Their throat,
As if they wanted to say something more,
But they dropped out of high school,
And now sell the perishable oddities
On the slender border
Of reality and feral fantasy:
In the premature morning without flesh,
And the eyes that can only see shapes,
The lovely people who read to them
Of the massacred school children
From the first world war
Laid out in a unplowed fields like cut flowers:
Groceries in paper bags on the kitchen floor:
Two friends from early childhood,
Watching the kittens climb up and Down the carpeted stairs,
In a new development they came to know each other:
Their fathers bet their lives away
At the race-tracks in bottles of booze,
And the divorces which gave them more time
For tête-à-têtes in blue tents on green grass:
The gentle stares under street lamps,
And the furtive kisses which felt out wounds,
The blue diodes of laughterless cyborgs
Made them feel better pressing
Their scabby knees against wounded shores.

Robert Rorabeck

Their Young Corals

My poetry is as alive as the things you say to me;
It is as alive as the newly green car horns,
And the fishtail palms that smoke straight up from my newly Forgotten
Window;
Alma, and I put your name into every new poem I write,
Because otherwise you won't find yourself- Alma,
My liquor bottle is almost empty, and I swear that the fires have Already been fought,
And the night and its windows, and all the illusions of misfits
And comets
Have already been taught into the classrooms of gringos,
While they already have their bedrooms and bicycles
And just right now I have my old teacher's new Car, and I wonder why none of his other younger students have Enough love for him,
And I wonder, Alma, if I am the only true poet that has ever
Come and been to him:
While the elephants nod and the poets proceed,
But it takes so long to make it through all of the illusions of
The Kalahari, while you yet remain so beautiful and so young,
And the bodies move right to you singing with their young,
Like the yellow buses like the mariposas as if out upon some milieu
Gallivanting,
And whatever else they are doing I wish I could remember how
The other muses burned for you,
Alma, but I mostly wish to see you tomorrow, while the sea
And all of its architects continue foaming awesome phosphorous
And sulfurous out in the open, barbecuing so green with Their ever-loving Pentecost, as if they had never known you, or had Quiteforgotten how that awesome providence had brought you
To me, like something precious and yet forgotten sent up
From the sea- Alma, Alma- A beautiful chest of Conquistadors and their video games like a gift basket sent up from Their corals as a sweet and as everlasting as a young gift for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Them All

Prayers kept in the cool sunburned gardens atop of Mountains
Where mothers boys die passing under the whipping bang of Lightning an the ungodly soda fountains:
Then I will take off my baseball cap and bless you and kiss your Body,
Alma,
As we make love: and when we awaken there will be the sound
Of cars and war drums:
The days will go on forever like they do:
We can take your fair children anywhere you want to:
Alma.
The days are long and needful; the bodies creep like the shadows in
A zoetrope through the deserts of these spheres,
The oceans leap like cavaliers, and I really wished that I could Know better words to pass through the elements for you
Alma:
But if I had been a professional, deep and brown eyed dear,
I would never have known you; and oh what I loss I would never have To fear
Alma: now I only want to spread the gospel of remote control boats
For you;
I want to flag down beneath the over passes for you, Alma:
I never went to high school with a woman as beautiful as you are Alma,
Now believe in all the rough cadences from my throat,
Alma:
And all the rough silhouettes of paper boys skipping over their moats
And disavowing all of the castles of their woebegone schoolyards
For you Alma,
Passing away into the oblivion of many promises I hope to keep Them all for you-
For you, Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

Then A Whisper Of A Sea

Subterfuge of romance, because what other sort
Of subterfuge is there: all at once running away from war,
Running into France,
Looking at her gondola underneath all of those soft lights of Romance:
Looking up her body like along the soft pews on Sundays:
Looking along her body and seeing her secret rosaries; and kissing
Them,
And speaking to them as if they were a soda fountain of your Unborn children,
While the sky just fumes: while it is packaged by cool jets;
While its bodies of seraphim divide to multiply, like schoolyards
Of tankards of jellyfish in the sea;
And I wish so many times that I was better at these amusements:
Wish that I was really taking off all of her diamonds of her old
Times and speakeasies:
And this is all she is, folding down like fresh laundry in the dorm room
Of her freshmen,
Trapping her like the innocent nuances of all of my neophytes:
A dime of blood, a ruby seed, a blushing point and then a whisper of
A sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Then For Dinner

Housewives like naves,
Like low strung truants sleeping in their backyards
Of days,
Strung out and as drooling as mastiffs on the pretty
Easement,
Until they become cleated with the neat patterns of Floritam:
Which is the greenness I brought for them to rest like
Easter and with bottles of wine
Undouse themselves and remember the sun
That rose like a clementine from
The gardens of am:
How it crackles like an artist on her bankrupt jaw:
Her eyes as open as transoms that are sure that they always
Saw such a thing that rises over her sprinklers
And her little garden every day;
There quite naked she has become the better accoutrement
To her uncounterable landscaping;
And she is purer than the liquid body of the grass snakes that Encounter her like a pink ribbon high in
Their greenly firebreaks,
And she yawns and quivers through the freckles of
Fire cracken and hibiscus:
The bougainvillea that ride up the side of her house like fish
Net stockings;
And the flotsam jungle of clouds that ride over her bared shoulders
And make her nuptials shiver even before the bicycles come
Breaking home to wake her up for afternoon and then for dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

Then For Dinnner

Housewives like naves,
Like low strung truants sleeping in their backyards
Of days,
Strung out and as drooling as mastiffs on the pretty
Easement,
Until they become cleated with the neat patterns of Floritam:
Which is the greenness I brought for them to rest like
Easter and with bottles of wine
Undouse themselves and remember the sun
That rose like a clementine from
The gardens of am:
How it crackles like an artist on her bankrupt jaw:
Her eyes as open as transoms that are sure that they always
Saw such a thing that rises over her sprinklers
And her little garden every day;
There quite naked she has become the better accoutrement
To her uncounterable landscaping;
And she is purer than the liquid body of the grass snakes that Encounter her like a pink ribbon high in
Their greenly firebreaks,
And she yawns and quivers through the freckles of
Fire cracken and hibiscus:
The bougainvillea that ride up the side of her house like fish
Net stockings;
And the flotsam jungle of clouds that ride over her bared shoulders
And make her nuptials shiver even before the bicycles come
Breaking home to wake her up for afternoon and then for dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

Then Mexico

Gilded into the cauldrons of
A ferris wheel,
And starting out while the fire hydrants
Sing that another day has gone
Up in
A place- as the specks of nothing turn out
Really Beautiful,
As the housewives fold into themselves,
Making love with their fingers
And to the harmonies
Of their televisions
Within a hotel:
It all seems for awhile as if
To be in a pantheon of Zeotropes;
While she remains in the over hang,
Like light in a bowl,
Like a goldfish wise enough not to Escape,
While I am singing, while
I am counting down,
As the light falls across my faces
And the disney world,
And then mexico-
And then this;
And this.

Robert Rorabeck

Theory To My Devotion

If I could write anything let it be you in the cathedral,
Hemmed in blue, holding the pet turtle:
Someone has punched you on the lips, I know not who,
But your pain and bruises only serve to make you
More beautiful;
Unseen, the saints descent and, gossiping, lend you
Their halo, but
Already your legs go echoing, and you leave the door open,
Letting the leaves and wind through.

Postscript: I have become an America citizen, and eaten
The sweetmeats of unforgotten caribou,
And when I go through Wisconsin with my window down,
Letting the storm and rain in, I care to think about you,
And how if you are now so near another man, watching his Brow furrow,
How can I stand so close to you, and listen to your absence,
And study how freckles pattern your cheek bones, and thus Levitate when you grin, captivated by the Olympics.

For now it seems as if you should be holding me, curious
Of my recluse; as if Mary in her Pieta kneeling in the fertile grotto,
Feeding me bottles of wine, and the fatty breast while watching
The hopes of the Spaniard's armada dashed like domestic violence
On the impolite shoals,
Like blistered knees of little girls, if I hold your eyes' candled in
The darkness, would you walk corporeal to me in the fluid apoplexy
Of a rainstorm's kinetics,
Your legs the philosophy of universal motion without a constant,
Your pumping organs the antecedent, a theory to my devotion.

Robert Rorabeck

There Is Always Something On T.V.

Give to me more of your esoteric
Delights, basking in cauldrons
Underneath the sweaty trees-
Throw your dead soldiers of love in
With them,
And see how they grow, even as the Day swoons, and the birds clap their Wings over the inland driving traffics;
And, see here, a snake has bitten my cheek-
A harmless garden snake run to escape
The mowers,
And I'd been lying in the grasses watching long-
Legged kids removing themselves from school,
Without bell tolls, the sack lunches emptied,
Especially the girls;
And as the last shadows of the neighborhood
Caracole around these pretty sweets,
Baptize me in the canal under the multi-lidded
Eyes of prehistory or whatnot;
And give me liquor or sue me, because I am
Just an animal, and when there is nothing else
To do, there is always something on t.v.

Robert Rorabeck

These Playful Enigmas

Into those playful enigmas where
The poetess always find out that they are dying,
The fairgrounds come and then are passed
Away, asses and clowns passed
Down to another part of America—
As I, scarred, teacher, tread through the remnants of Another high school—
As the planets come down like humming birds
To kiss and bless off the tits of the mountains,
To steal the lights and moon off the tourists—
To partake in their usual transgressions,
As the stolen light bobsleds off the glittering seas—
Made up like some Christmases to Amass and play,
Just like the memories I jail in my heart—
And I don't want to say your name anymore—
For there are so many waves—altogether,
Just enough to hide all of the fishes in the seas.

Robert Rorabeck

These Quiet Lovers

How awful I should appear,
If I tried to sing like Lorca, hidden child
Of a civil war, buried somewhere through
The braided opals of Spain I went through
As a child. I got a tattoo in Barcelona
That has faded, and so many scars; they too
Begin to fade, but I keep them still, like
The blue tenements of lonely citizens;
And the crickets whose movements serenade
As expectantly as every tide; like the flow of Blood, and the raise of fluid when two hearts of
A species enjoin in furtive romancing:
I should go that way while they are asleep,
My footsteps clapping expectantly as her scents
Waif like a heliotrope orchard, where carts rest
Unmanned and torpid, and she lays open chested
And ghostly, bosom heaving beneath the scented
Orbs- If I should find her, and lay there beneath
The leaves the moon has painted, so closely that
Our senses combine and swim in a vacated theatre,
Where our limbs may enjoy the oppositions
Like thespians rehearsing unlit before an audience
As private as those who gather under the pool of These quiet lovers.

Robert Rorabeck

These Sisters To The Heavens

Better feelings are the Indian givers of the divinity of Consciousness
Who set out like beautiful girls on their bicycles going a long
Ways out across the city
With bodices spilling like poisonous chalices
Ropes of apples and centipedes;
And if they were even more beautiful they Would surely run straight away,
Like skiffs of yellow taffy pulling underneath the rainy gray:
They have been up and down their great uncle's hills;
They have listened to the monarchs sing like wet paper over the Graves,
And at night while they have laid their machines down and had No memory of sewing,
They have pooled their resources and sang together reflecting themselves
To the soft bellies of airplanes,
These sisters to the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

These Sweet Things For You

I am famished by liquor and see how I swim out
Past your jetty:
See how I destroy the laws of society; and you are in bloom:
You are the luxurious cream on the lips of the void:
Everything about you is blueness; and it is unavoidable;
And I am well done; and I am being shot off:
And you are in Colorado in your desirous nooks and crannies;
And I am just the lispig rose of a blown out carnie:
I am a hobo dying in his little spaces beside those usual
Canals, which are now engorged:
And I am wreck; and your child and your life are beautiful,
And they are singing to me from so far away,
But Virgil could take me to you: I know his phone number,
And what I need to say:
You are a goddess, an absolute goddess out upon this earth,
And I haven't yet kissed you, or given you the chance to betray me:
I know you would, if you ever allowed me to kiss you:
So don't do that: don't do anything to me, just let me rest underneath
Your cool tresses, and when your husband comes in say to him
I am nothing, as I am: Let me be a trinket in your storeroom,
Let me be nothing to you, but let me be as near to you as all your liquor
Bottles,
And let my eyes hang upon you like on the portrait of a lady:
Let me hang under the Mona Lisa like the penumbra of a daydream,
And let me keep saying these sweet things for you.

Robert Rorabeck

These Sweetest

Alma, the planets move and the make love beneath their Windows. As I know that you have made love, while my bowels move,
While other people get married and have sex;
And the wind breathes and evaporates, as if just for a second it knew:
Alma, I dream of you in the brashness of our habitats:
My lungs burn, and then by the deepest hours of the night my father shuffles
Off to buy produce:
He is like a ballerina who can never believe who he likely was;
And what about your bosom, Sharon- my sick muse; isn't the entire World growing dark like the red lines around the scars of some tattoo:
And the city yearns for so many more fine young upstarts
To overturn and parlay:
The city yearns for the very essence of what I cannot say, while the moon
Looms, and the sky balloons and the house follows the housewife home
Like a faithful pet blowing up the entrails of its choicest of balloons;
While your daughter is getting ready to read her favorite-most of Words,
Sharon; do you or don't you read my poems: Erin says she reads my poems:
Maybe that is all that she is good for while the ethereal bodies loams,
And I have a sweet, sweet home;
And the answers happen outside the envelopes of all of these sweetest and Choicest an secular and insular of my poems.

Robert Rorabeck

These Things

Thieves in the dark bosque, counting cards down
The eventual runoff of the ruddy mountains, and all of Life clinging on,
Suckling at the tit of the water fountain,
As the possums grin ferociously underneath the balls and Cannons of fireworks, not really understanding at
All what is going on:
And one day soon all of our little sisters will have to Come on home,
As the house is cauldronously empty, but warm:
And we can watch gray cartoons together on the vermilion
Rugs,
And what will it matter if eventually we will have to learn
How to spell, and then set off to find professions.
For now we can fold paper airplanes and share our dreams,
As the alligators pullulate downhill from all the vacant
Golf courses,
And we don't have to know anything at all of the lost virginity
Of all of these things.

Robert Rorabeck

These Unobtainable Delights

The city pulsates with the need to blow its excuses;
A spider worships vermilion from deep in the contours of
Its web: the whole world is vermilion and the cars
Are just the dreams that cannot be caught:
Nor would it have a desire to; but it sees the housewives as pink Clouds that come out onto the yards sometimes and remove
More of their thoughts,
While the silver cars are away: then the spider stops its Eviscerations for such awhile, and it almost has thoughts of drying
Clay:
There the housewives sit out strumming like stringed instruments
Across the green planes
Until the airplanes leap and seed the rains; and the spider
Holds its little spider breath and almost perceives of what it can never Say,
While these unobtainable delights slip through its yards of sky.

Robert Rorabeck

These Wildish And Feral Gifts

The sun moves around like fingers knuckling these cornices
OF rubbed down teak:
And she has been my forever constant, by whose vacant lips I pass
The week;
And I move with the traffic that I wish somehow could be Undressed,
The way her eyes take off my troubles, and I smell her coming nearer
My home as her corneas engorge like the hearts of A tomb:
They are twins, like night in both hemispheres,
And her lips are wet and open like a grave inviting in the hungry
Pistils of these wildish and feral gifts.

Robert Rorabeck

Thesky Always Knows

This body is so voluble that it explodes;
The busy intersections of the street do not have a notion,
While the day travels long ways,
And the pretty girls enter into it smelling of their potions:
The pullulating of their bodies along their less than average recourses,
Listen to the pats of rain under the hooves of race horses;
And I have no better ideas of their ancient men,
Though I knew that almost always that they were beautiful for them,
And now the monuments rise up and decide themselves of the sea,
While I fashion my distillations of bamboo sweetly underneath the overpasses,
While everyone else gets married, and then I mouth off and sell fireworks
In New Mexico, and the sky gets cantankerous and I hope to touch
Alma where the sun seems to slip between the pistils of her Chassis
In the places that only my dog can smell,
If I only had them again, but otherwise the sky always knows the best.

Robert Rorabeck

They Go

Orchards in the high towers that a glove is reaching for,
While a chimney smokes
And the oven employs its implore;
This is an exemplary machine meant to weep, and tell you
About what it is that I mean,
Like ripples on a lake, and creases in the sheen:
Like a birthday cake brought out before a church of ruby
Glass filled with animals that are in love
Or at least hypnotized; and I suppose that I have reminded you
Of those fields atop of which the airplanes fly so low;
And where they are going, I suppose even they don't know:
But look at them: they are almost gone,
So make a wish as they go: they go.

Robert Rorabeck

They Just Turn And Turn Like Clockwork

Jewel heart and throat,
Crenellating the excess, the mewling rind
That effervesces
And down your savage eyes:
Maybe the sea is pell-mell or just uneasy,
But it make it that way by bathing in it,
And the hat racks are the cliffs.
Aren't I sad this very instant, and going down
While you are birthing from your bath for my Father,
For just about any man as the turnip trucks turn
Over.
We all throwing rice over our shoulders, like
Blind pitchers:
And you make love like spice on meat and your Wine caracoles all the water spirits,
They just turn and turn like clockwork,
As if we all could be doing so fine.

Robert Rorabeck

They Never Once

There, just south of me- acting just as strange
Marionettes against their pool,
She lays down with him- she who used to lay down
With me-
They have a new house to prove their love;
Their workaday charioteers have me well defeated,
While the mosquitos suckle my instep and I obsess
Over goddesses from high school-
Maybe I will lose a tooth and be forced to start this
All over again-
This reckless untruths I have little knack for:
I am the long shot chomping at the bit, hoping to finish
Strong and get these sad things over with.
Maybe there are girls who dream of loving me;
Maybe they think of me when they have a sugar tooth,
But if they were ever to come up against me,
Bumping elbows and broadsides it wouldn't be too long
For them to glean that there are greater fidelities of Sport waiting strong armed for them just a little Deeper on the horizon- so they must go, leaving me with Good cheer,
And I watch their backsides swaying like somnolent
Pugilists, like alley cats on Christmas morning:
I just wanted to kiss them forever, but already I can hear
The knock and saw of the new houses like bright cages
Rising ever and ever upwards for them,
With so much going on in their immediate vicinities,
They never once think to look back unrequited my way.

Robert Rorabeck

They Too Are Changed

Forever wanting to build up,
Because of gravity,
Human beings are still a low level creature:
Our bones are not hollow and yet we fly,
Even though now and again we fireball just Like mythology into the sea:
And there are no more verdant islands rising
Like white corks from the oceans with singular
Talking pools, and a white horse prancing about,
With perfectly definable days and nights;
But now we have suburbias and washers and Dryers which tumble our flesh into clean and Warm, and viaducts of eyes which run in Stages over shelves of imported specialties:
The greatest symphony where I am at is the traffic,
Which keeps tempo with the traffic lights,
The constant wear of the tires as they break against
The natural order, as waves dash themselves upon
The shoals like kamikazes, leaving offerings of Ruby urchins, and secretive anemones;
And after all of this is over, I will drive with them
In that river back west to hibernate and play video-
Games, or go back to college: but I have loved
Her from afar while I was here, and open-mouthed
Watched her leaping over the earth in her idealic jaunts,
Or like fire ants coming out doors to be punched into Work for their queen, masticating on the finest liquids
Until they have it fermented and caking their jaws;
And we seem to walk here like shadows stealthily surveying
The womb, not yet realizing who we are, still trying To jump into a brighter world, and floating for a little while
Like a festival of balloons in Albuquerque, NM,
Surveying the stars, and the icy necklace of the Keiper Belt,
Until she pulls us back down again,
Makes us wearied and senile, and licks us like a little Girl with her ice-cream cone as she preambles the zoo, lazily
Surveying the surrounding habitats, until she has lost her Parents, and there is nothing of her sticky treat, just our Bones in a fine pulp yet around her finger tips:

She nods away on a bench in the butterfly house,
And all the butterflies come down and cover her in a Fleeting coat, unwittingly poisoning her, changing
Her yet into something else, as they too are changed.

Robert Rorabeck

Thieveries Of Words

Placeless joy, like love birds—
Little hearts beating like a quarter's prizes:
Wishes leap from the wells inbetween
The malls and beating forever—
Making love over the heads of shoppers
And well wishers and gift-givers:
The fly around looking for anything they can Steal for nests—
To fly away and have children, pets for Stewardesses—that will eventually leave
To other swamps and forests
And cul-de-sacs—
But in their busy hearts the banks of their parents,
And the trophies of their lovely thieveries of words.

Robert Rorabeck

Things That Are Impossible To Move

Mute as the clouds, I hang over your body and Pretend to be important:
I puff up my giants in great coloring books, but none
Of them coalesce and maybe it was real at A point,
Or maybe you just go on lying in your bed
And counting the numbers in the trees;
But outside is another world, running away,
While I have been counting the impossible steps
Between the unending trees, while the wolves
Know all of the grandmothers of your breaths, and now
Even though we made love yesterday,
It has all come down to a honed point, and you are sleeping
With your man, who left you, but returned from Mexico to steal you away again- and now your eyes
Are the deepest epitaphs directing the traffic towards
Things that are impossible to move.

Robert Rorabeck

Things That Need

About the milky rind of the green hills,
The low song plays-
And the girls come out and dance atop of
The comely graves:
They lose their feet in the slow heartbeat of Grass,
As the sun is a troubadour above
The sunken overpass:
And they sing to kiss the sweat, and to smell
The nocturnal rind:
They step out barefooted and dance to see what
They can find,
As the streets pool out beneath them far
Beneath them, like ribbons in tangles beneath them:
And the sea listens to them, and eats
Their echoes like pie: and takes their echoes
To the other shore for the men there to listen to them-
The men there who want to die for want of them,
And the sea laughs as they leap into her:
All of them into her, and she sings to them of Things that must soon die, but she also sings to them
Of things that need not ever die.

Robert Rorabeck

Things That No One Will Ever Think To Endeavor To Be Disproved

What have I to say to you that will hold you still:
That will captivate you right there like a stamp quivering to my love
Letter:
Alma, Alma: all of this all is right here for you:
All of my soul is pressed like a crazy butterfly to your name,
And I cannot move;
And you called me a great man today, but it was only because your English
Is so bad and you didn't want to tell me that you loved me:
And you languish beside the pools with your sister;
And she are you are like twins,
Like silent pools languishing to the side of the river, and yet you are
So indescribably deeper:
And the fireworks mouth off over the forest;
And maybe we will conquer America together, underneath the underbelly
Of airplanes:
Oh teach me how, Alma: kiss my mouth, and live together with me:
Alma,
It doesn't matter: I just want to swing my weapons: I just want to steal
For you,
And fill your mouth with sweet lies who have no shelf life
That no one besides you or I shall ever read,
Which makes us as safe and wonderful as the deepest esotericisms of the Finest things that no one will ever think to endeavor to be disproved.

Robert Rorabeck

Things That She Can Steal

If you lie underneath the playgrounds,
How will I find you so far away from school,
Hidden from all of the unreasonable
Classrooms,
And chancicleer already fried upon an orange
Plate that is beginning to fade-
Losses of thought echoing where your footprints
Have already left-
Like your own memory for water parks,
Or the way you held hands with your sister
In the middle of everywhere:
These thoughts are for you, like the small disturbances
Across a baseball diamond abandoned in the afternoon-
After airplanes have made nests of the highest sky,
And the moon talks them into becoming
Things that she can steal.

Robert Rorabeck

Things Which Must Yet Be Spoken

After dusk, the sky is so blue and quiet,
Like a fair shut down
Somewhere near the sea,
The clouds so white and thin like prayers of Little girls who do not know any better,
Who are still waiting for the waves to bring Back their vanished fathers-
I read some Gwendolyn Brooks from a
Norton Anthology,
I look at houses in the tiny greenesses where
I think I should belong,
And a picture of my grandmother smiling
Cobwebbed in the shadows
Doesn't know anything- Doesn't know
How much more beautiful her sons and daughters could've
Been without her matriarchal influences,
How people can change into beautiful fish
Swimming in the sky, if they know their own languages for
The things which must yet be spoken,
Even as the waves return and disappear,
And the cars travel down the highway, their bright beams
Like lighthouses searching
For a home which cannot be explained.

Robert Rorabeck

Thinking Of You

Canals are plenteous for reptilian angels,
And the moon smears,
But the grass goes all the way down, unafraid-
Not even just a little bit,
And I have slipped my thoughts over to there
Where the trailer parks of coffins reside
And they are so showy,
And they just keep going back and on and on
Through the generations,
Grandmothers and grandfathers of sharks teeth;
And my aunt is here,
Blowing ash on my wrist;
And I am wearing a baseball cap made in Mexico,
And it is all mad stuff,
The serpent breathless in the scarred field will grow
No more friends,
And my mother does the wash, and sighs
And wonders when all of this will end,
But I just keep thinking of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Thirst For Sand

Lines in unsteady distillations ripple
Fornications halfway out to sea. I can only cry
For help with the few words I know,
And pretty soon no one believes me-
In mass, the words bundle, the traffic drives away
Like red pepper entrails,
The buildings nod like encephalitic gods
Out from which the business men stumble.
I always knew she'd put me on a bus- she'd make Me crumble to the words I know like a pitch
Of salt, over my shoulder- The lions on the shoulder
Of the road feed and nod off. She drives home from
The schoolyards of work,
Everyday is a spindle of her race, of both man and Beast. She has a new house like a sharp pig in stucco.
I build a sandcastle every night by the sea,
After the tourists have left from the crummy storms,
Seagulls and little league herons prattle;
And in the morning I awaken effervescing, curling in Foam and ruins- My elusions melt like cockroaches.
There's a hole in my bucket,
But I only thirst for sand.

Robert Rorabeck

Thirty-Thousand Feet In The Air

I have a green note
Book-
It is a light green
God
Kissing my fingertips
Anonymously-
Today I don't have to Buy any beer-
I find emeralds at
The doorstep
Instead of dead
Kittens-
In August, I will
Be flying back to America on
My sister's birthday-
And as I sit here Wednesday
Waiting for my wife to Come down,
I have a premonition of Meeting a beautiful
Tourist at least 30,000 feet in the air.

Robert Rorabeck

This Alma

Windmills revealing the avenues of cold air,
The streets of the unfortunate bellies of my songs:
I work for seven days,
Perspiring in the traffic, the loose sun like
An egotistical god above,
My dog sleeping in my shadow- and then these Words of strychnine yelping my loneliness:
Disproving nothing,
Revealing my distemper of a tree- my throat
In the yawning hollows of Mexico-
And the whispers of love from a grotto of un cherished
Cenotaphs- from my monuments of dead yearning,
Spindling outwards the garish entrapments-
The sadly un equated forlornness that this is All I have to give:
Spent into the joyless epiphany, I am returned again
To the very same motions that I wished to escape;
But they resend my love on an unproven soul:
This Alma to whom I always fall from singing;
And they are happy to accept me.

Robert Rorabeck

This Alma Mater

Stored here the lazy emporium of her
Salt, moves slowly undulating like waves
Of a discombobulated bathtub:
Inside the college town of new remnants
Where the cats are the cleanest thing,
Where even the professors are dirty and candy
Tongues twisted up in adulterous philologies
For splits of punk girls with pink Mohawks
Still sucking on the tit of her iconographic parents,
The streamline cows in the suburban stockyards:
How, look, sure joy, how the traffic flows
In and out, each car like a necessary cell bubbling,
Air-conditioned and narcissistic:
Somewhere in the chicken wire and warbled slums,
She lives like a busty diamond,
She lives like a thoughtless reincarnation,
Each day a record put to the needle and spun:
The beautiful pricks who come out erect and blushing,
Popping steaming plums on their thumbs,
And she goes around ready to split apples with her tongue,
Around and around this, some kind of garden,
Full of galloping horses on tasseled poles,
Monkeys on leashes, organ grinders, and the spices
Of after dinner sex, the stolen guitars imparted to guests,
And ceaseless processions of inebriate friends, for Their while they drive and pollinate the musky grottos,
The chicken shacks, the bowling alleys,
And the wharfs of the regal Hassidim: Slowly, slowly,
She spins to a conclusion, dizzy with horniness and a new Pet, while about her the sagging monoliths protrude,
And the beer cans pollinate like the forest's tap,
The aluminum stones making a trail all the way to her
House in the woods, and voices sing-song drunkenly,
Though in the morning it will take a few seconds for
The sun to intrude, and for her to remember where she lives.

Robert Rorabeck

This Americaland

One thing bought the bottle,

One thing bought the scar,

One thing bought the other thing
While driving around in a car-

The sun is setting quickly,
The teachers are going home,
Her hand is resting like an opal trough
Deep in the rose bushes
So far into the musky gloom,

Her brother said he loved her,
As he tipped his hat and set out to sea,
While the euphoria set out to sting her,
Deep in the mouth,
The spume of bumble bees....

Her eyes crossed over and hid in
The fortunes of his cupping hand,
And when they have been long since married,
And bedded like treacle contemplations,
They sang of their immortality in Americaland.

Robert Rorabeck

This At 9: 43 Or Whatever

I finish my second book of CS Lewis today-
Arizona time, and there's flying saucers in the sky:
They are sailing ships in my glass almost out of rum
And cayenne pepper which keeps me awake,
To pay the bills or jerk off;
And the sky is empty, but it is almost blue.
When I first got my dog, I'd tied it under the rusting trailer
From which we'd sell Christmas trees:
But I didn't name him- I haven't named any of my dogs,
Because I am not a master: I am not a Christian,
And I get all my books ten for a dollar at the thrift store,
And my aunt is dead,
And my grandfather is dead, and there are black men making
Tough decisions,
And nothing belongs to me-
Now I can feel my breath like a storm,
And I have scars, and soon I will be selling fireworks in New Mexico- Digressing,
A few years ago a Mormon made fun of my complexion
After I'd already gotten my Masters degree at 24
Or whenever,
She used to live on University, but she never loved me;
Still, how the waves are beautifully breaking,
Even some years ago- Back to the blonde Mormon-
His first son was a stillborn, now look at me-
Today is Christmas, or whenever,
And the sky is turning, there is silver on the tree,
And soon I'll be setting up for fireworks in New Mexico,
Amanda Breen, Erin Adamson,
Do I have to keep giving out Christian names-
Is anyone listening to me:
The sky is scarred, the work is hard,
And I can barely even breathe- I've got a car,
And soon I'll drive East of here: I'll have a beer, or Two or three: I'm Arthur Rimbaud, or his shadow-
I'll drink lemonade or beer- I'll toast the housewives and their Class, I'll drink to them and buy a house which will make Me impossible to see,
Because I've had enough, life is rough, I've been abandoned

By the sea-
But that's all there is, and I am drunk,
And this is the end of me.

Robert Rorabeck

This Avalanche Of Lost And Melancholy Time

In all this pain the mundane reasons for Getting up and going to work,
Neverminding the old reminiscent tugs of
Gravity
To bring you early to the graveyard where
Your kids will be playing with vapid ghosts
Until they come out of the misty shells
Of your woman's showering fjords,
Like magic tricks of roses;
And you've been doing this, and laying low,
And telling yourself that this is how it's going
To come for many years:
How your skeleton will be remembered and made
Into a bandy legged cenotaph they will name new Brands of fireworks after:
And you've been doing this for the sun and the shadows
She makes all down from the slopes of your sweet
Muses, finally realizing that is how your time can best
Be served,
Refreshing in those developments, making love underneath
The impositions of titted matter:
That she has her swelling daughter strung out on a cliff
Face above you, parallel and even still to those cars;
And her days are turning above you,
Unreligious, and yet like a sanctified mobile:
And, yes, dreams of marbles and bouncing balls and afternoons
Matriculating beneath the breathy caracoles of all of those Ceiling fans; and the days of leaps and bounds
That never quite found sure footing in your mind,
And it goes out like this muddling like a fisherman unsure of His lines, of his love for a muse he has never known-
All the time just wanting one good muse to paraffin his soul,
Casting up his hope like throwing sweet change into the Crooks and teeth of a pantomime's graveyard
And spitting to see which way is up, to finally escape from
All this avalanche of lost and melancholy time.

Robert Rorabeck

This Beautiful, Beautiful Of Times

How comical are your eyes: birds of pests,
Utterly surreal and insincere,
Like the waitress who served me the buffet today;
And I am dying in a lark of masturbating boats:
Kelly, if you read this,
I am dying, like a newborn off your breasts,
And my neck has been bitten by a werewolf or a vampire:
Twice bitten,
And once more and I will no longer need to feel the Fibrillations of the gills of a blue gill:
Kelly- and Erin doesn't care: My venal muse all busy
And like a crown of thorns ventrillitating above my head,
The first and the last of my muses:
And I drive up and down the sloughs of Clear Water
And I dream of her as I return to the estuaries of trailer parks;
And all the nuns sing that all this liquor will make
One slower,
But I don't believe them because I have never felt any better:
And the faces of the people I have seen today,
Repeating softly as softer breasts on pillows:
And I am dying Kelly, dying for the juxtaposition of my Comparable fellows;
And I need someone who can save me in the carports of Unfamished camaraderie- Kelly:
Your nights are young and pushing up daisies; and I am waiting
For you nude and well-hung in the glittering slopes in
The back streets of all of this tourism:
I would never think of drinking wine or eating clemintines
While I am waiting for you, Kelly;
But I am waiting for you, while the housewives proceed like
The sweets of the greatest giants of the gods who went before us;
And I have been waiting for you passive in all the tenses
Of this beautiful, beautiful of times.

Robert Rorabeck

This Broken Mirror World

Softly, displaying what it means—
