Robert Rorabeck(04/10/1978)

Sometimes with the one I love I fill myself with rage for fear
I effuse unreturn'd love,
But now I think there is no unreturn'd love, the pay is certain one way or another,
(I loved a certain person ardently and my love was not return'd.
Yet out of that I have written these songs.)

Walt Whitman

I SHALL NOT CARE

When I am dead and over me bright April
Shakes out her rain-drenched hair,
Though you should lean above me broken-hearted,
I shall not care.

I shall have peace, as leafy trees are peaceful
When rain bends down the bough,
And I shall be more silent and cold-hearted
Than you are now.

Sara Teasdale (1915)

Success

I think if you had loved me when I wanted;
If I'd looked up one day, and seen your eyes,
And found my wild sick blasphemous prayer granted,
And your brown face, that's full of pity and wise,
Flushed suddenly; the white godhead in new fear
Intolerably so struggling, and so shamed;
Most holy and far, if you'd come all too near,

If earth had seen Earth's lordliest wild limbs tamed,
Shaken, and trapped, and shivering, for MY touch - Myself should I have slain? or that foul you?
But this the strange gods, who had given so much,
To have seen and known you, this they might not do.
One last shame's spared me, one black word's unspoken;
And I'm alone; and you have not awoken.

Rupert Brooke

" Look here; there's one thing in this world which isn't ever cheap. That's a coffin. There's one thing in this world which a person don't ever try to jew you down on. That's a coffin. There's one thing in this world which a person don't say - 'I'll look around a little, and if I find I can't do better I'll come back and take it.' That's a coffin. There's one thing in this world a person won't take in pine if he can go walnut; and won't take in walnut if he can go mahogany; and won't take in mahogany if he can go an iron casket with silver door-plate and bronze handles. That's a coffin. And there's one thing in this world you don't have to worry around after a person to get him to pay for. And that's a coffin. Undertaking? - why it's the dead-surest business in Christendom, and the nobbiest."

Mark Twain's Life on The Mississippi

'No Protestant child exists who does not masturbate.'

Mark Twain, Letters from the Earth

The Meteorite

Among the hills a meteorite
Lies huge; and moss has overgrown,
And wind and rain with touches light
Made soft, the contours of the stone.

Thus easily can Earth digest
A cinder of sidereal fire,
And make her translunary guest
The native of an English shire.

Nor is it strange these wanderers
Find in her lap their fitting place,
For every particle that's hers
Came at the first from outer space.

All that is Earth has once been sky;
Down from the sun of old she came,
Or from some star that travelled by Too close to his entangling flame.

Hence, if belated drops yet fall
From heaven, on these her plastic power
Still works as once it worked on all
The glad rush of the golden shower.

CS Lewis, Time and Tide

Danse Russe

If I when my wife is sleeping and the baby and Kathleen are sleeping
and the sun is a flame-white disc in silken mists above shining trees, —
if I in my north room dance naked, grotesquely before my mirror waving my shirt round my head and singing softly to myself:
'I am lonely, lonely.
I was born to be lonely,
I am best so! '
If I admire my arms, my face, my shoulders, flanks, buttocks against the yellow drawn shades, —

Who shall say I am not the happy genius of my household?

William Carlos Williams

The Sleeper In The Valley

It is a green hollow where a stream gurgles,
Crazily catching silver rags of itself on the grasses;
Where the sun shines from the proud mountain:
It is a little valley bubbling over with light.

A young soldier, open-mouthed, bare-headed,
With the nape of his neck bathed in cool blue cresses,
Sleeps; he is stretched out on the grass, under the sky,
Pale on his green bed where the light falls like rain.

His feet in the yellow flags, he lies sleeping. Smiling as A sick child might smile, he is having a nap:
Cradle him warmly, Nature: he is cold.

No odour makes his nostrils quiver;
He sleeps in the sun, his hand on his breast
At peace. There are two red holes in his right side.

Arbole, Arbole

Tree, tree
dry and green.

The girl with the pretty face is out picking olives.
The wind, playboy of towers,
grabs her around the waist.
Four riders passed by on Andalusian ponies, with blue and green jackets and big, dark capes.
'Come to Cordoba, muchacha.'
The girl won't listen to them.
Three young bullfighters passed,
slender in the waist,
with jackets the color of oranges and swords of ancient silver.
'Come to Sevilla, muchacha.'
The girl won't listen to them.
When the afternoon had turned dark brown, with scattered light, a young man passed by, wearing roses and myrtle of the moon.
'Come to Granada, inuchacha.'
And the girl won't listen to him.
The girl with the pretty face keeps on picking olives with the grey arm of the wind wrapped around her waist.
dry and green.

Federico Garcia Lorca

Meditations In An Emergency

Am I to become profligate as if I were a blonde? Or religious as if I were French?

Each time my heart is broken it makes me feel more adventurous (and how the same names keep recurring on that interminable list!) , but one of these days there'll be nothing left with which to venture forth.

Why should I share you? Why don't you get rid of someone else for a change?

I am the least difficult of men. All I want is boundless love.

Even trees understand me! Good heavens, I lie under them, too, don't I? I'm just like a pile of leaves.

However, I have never clogged myself with the praises of pastoral life, nor with nostalgia for an innocent past of perverted acts in pastures. No. One need never leave the confines of New York to get all the greenery one wishes-I can't even enjoy a blade of grass unless i know there's a subway handy, or a record store or some other sign that people do not totally _regret_ life. It is more important to affirm the least sincere; the clouds get enough attention as it is and even they continue to pass. Do they know what they're missing? Uh huh.

My eyes are vague blue, like the sky, and change all the time; they are indiscriminate but fleeting, entirely specific and disloyal, so that no one trusts me. I am always looking away. Or again at something after it has given me up. It makes me restless and that makes me unhappy, but I cannot keep them still. If only i had grey, green, black, brown, yellow eyes; I would stay at home and do something. It's not that I'm curious. On the contrary, I am bored but it's my duty to be attentive, I am needed by things as the sky must be above the earth. And lately, so great has _their_ anxiety become, I can spare myself little sleep.

Now there is only one man I like to kiss when he is unshaven. Heterosexuality! you are inexorably approaching. (How best discourage her?)

St. Serapion, I wrap myself in the robes of your whiteness which is like midnight in Dostoevsky. How I am to become a legend, my dear? I've tried love, but that holds you in the bosom of another and I'm always springing forth from it like the lotus-the ecstasy of always bursting forth! (but one must not be distracted by it!) or like a hyacinth, 'to keep the filth of life away, ' yes, even in the heart, where the filth is pumped in and slanders and pollutes and determines. I will my will, though I may become famous for a mysterious vacancy in that department, that greenhouse.

Destroy yourself, if you don't know!

It is easy to be beautiful; it is difficult to appear so. I admire you, beloved, for the trap you've set. It's like a final chapter no one reads because the plot is over.

'Fanny Brown is run away-scrampered off with a Cornet of Horse; I do love that little Minx, & hope She may be happy, tho' She has vexed me by this exploit a little too.-Poor silly Cecchina! or F: B: as we used to call her.-I wish She had a good Whipping and 10,000 pounds.'-Mrs. Thrale

I've got to get out of here. I choose a piece of shawl and my dirtiest suntans. I'll be back, I'll re-emerge, defeated, from the valley; you don't want me to go where you go, so I go where you don't want me to. It's only afternoon, there's a lot ahead. There won't be any mail downstairs. Turning, I spit in the lock and the knob turns.

The Little Girl's Dance

DEDICATED TO LUCY BATES

(Being a reminiscence of certain private theatricals.)

Oh, cabaret dancer, I know a dancer,
Whose eyes have not looked on the feasts that are vain.
I know a dancer, I know a dancer,
Whose soul has no bond with the beasts of the plain:

Judith the dancer, Judith the dancer,
With foot like the snow, and with step like the rain.

Oh, thrice-painted dancer, vaudeville dancer,
Sad in your spangles, with soul all astrain,
I know a dancer, I know a dancer,
Whose laughter and weeping are spiritual gain,
A pure-hearted, high-hearted maiden evangel,
With strength the dark cynical earth to disdain.

Flowers of bright Broadway, you of the chorus,
Who sing in the hope of forgetting your pain:
I turn to a sister of Sainted Cecilia,
A white bird escaping the earth's tangled skein: —
The music of God is her innermost brooding,
The whispering angels her footsteps sustain.

Oh, proud Russian dancer: praise for your dancing.
No clean human passion my rhyme would arraign.
You dance for Apollo with noble devotion,
A high cleansing revel to make the heart sane.
But Judith the dancer prays to a spirit
More white than Apollo and all of his train.

I know a dancer who finds the true Godhead,
Who bends o'er a brazier in Heaven's clear plain.
I know a dancer, I know a dancer,
Who lifts us toward peace, from this earth that is vain:
Judith the dancer, Judith the dancer,
With foot like the snow, and with step like the rain.

Vachel Lindsay

The Sick Muse

My poor Muse, alas! what ails you today?
Your hollow eyes are full of nocturnal visions;

I see in turn reflected on your face
Horror and madness, cold and taciturn.

Have the green succubus, the rosy elf,
Poured out for you love and fear from their urns?
Has the hand of Nightmare, cruel and despotic,
Plunged you to the bottom of some weird Minturnae?

I would that your bosom, fragrant with health,
Were constantly the dwelling place of noble thoughts,
And that your Christian blood would flow in rhythmic waves

Like the measured sounds of ancient verse,
Over which reign in turn the father of all songs,
Phoebus, and the great Pan, lord of harvest.

The Venal Muse

Muse of my heart, you who love palaces,
When January frees his north winds, will you have,
During the black ennui of snowy evenings,
An ember to warm your two feet blue with cold?

Will you bring the warmth back to your mottled shoulders,
With the nocturnal beams that pass through the shutters?
Knowing that your purse is as dry as your palate,
Will you harvest the gold of the blue, vaulted sky?

To earn your daily bread you are obliged
To swing the censer like an altar boy,
And to sing Te Deums in which you don't believe,

Or, hungry mountebank, to put up for sale your charm,
Your laughter wet with tears which people do not see,

To make the vulgar herd shake with laughter.

A Flower In The Rain

I want to fall on you like rain
upon a wildflower
Opening new reason from you
Scaring all the old bees away from
Pollinating your bed
Scaring all the fake men off who
Can only stand the sun
So it's just me and you in the Meadow
The rabbits in the hole
The grasses are wet and beginning to bow
The forest is damp and sleepy
And in the meadow
I bend down and kiss your petals wetly
Falling all over you
Letting your pistil slip into my mouth
Sucking off your honey,
Almost plucking you
But not going so far
Just pulling you so that you can feel
Your roots leaving
To let you almost taste
My world in the sky
So afterwards you can go down
Believing
The words on my lips
When I fall on my knees for you
A flower in the rain.

A Quick Poem Done In Time

In the amber woods, the beetles call-
The rain falls upon the school.
The cats and the children awaken from their sleep;
Their eyes awaken to the moon-
My children alone know the spells
The rewind the mollusks into their shells,
Upon the soft, smoothed stones.

A stolen twilight plays across the backyards
Of the middle of America
And her graves:
Even the dead look beautiful in the middle of the night,
With all of the schools closed for the Summer;
And water falls upon the flatlands,
Curling from the busted lip of Michigan.

This is the last verse we shall remember,
Before we have to awaken and go to school tomorrow:
Look at our acne- the fairies with wounded wings
And the would be starlets who are wounded
In the heart moving in a homeless exodus to Hollywood:

And Disneyworld-
And Disneyworld-
Above her paper dungeons, there is a listing kite in the sky:
Blinded school boys who are done playing their videogames
Gape and mew to look up at her-
The lamentations of wordless sitcoms fallen into their wide
Open eyes-
The castle they look upon is a piñata made of chicken-wire:

Therein lives the giant of their catastrophe,
A rotund bachelor extended from classical times,
He catches stewardesses as they fall,
And handles them above his fires: the parking lots of Their skies are alight from the confounding thefts of gasoline:
And the emollitions of their thefts spread twenty feet
Above the suffering peninsulas where we advertise tourists to their beliefs.

A School Their Souls Will Never Attend

Mobilized into other parks farther along- buying
Her flowers and sending them to places
She no longer works anymore:
Streetless cars losing their clothing and pornographies Never making a sound anymore in castanets of Australian pines-
Ripples in shells and areolas- the tiniest sea otters
Laughing on her chest,
Mermaids whose mascara never seems to stop running,
And little boys flying away from school:
Flying up into clouds to see airplanes populated entirely
By stewardesses,
And giants who look into their windows and seeing them
Like foxes and sword fish in zoetropes,
Turning around with their arms raised
And laughing
Exulting in the showers of the sun, their noses bleeding
From the altitude,
And kissing like magnets on refrigerators, and always mothers
To be
Conceptualizing their children across the mowed grass
As the busses turn around like chartreuse butterflies
So far down beneath them, and in front of
A school their souls will never attend.

A Secret Color Named Alma

Like an otter come out and into her own:
Outside of classes, and outside
The impenetrable bosque:
She is now selling fruit to speaking
Dragons:
While the traffic shuffles unhesitatingly over her Shoulder:
She is an angel that doesn't even realize.
And her eyes are darker and more perfect than the Known seas,
And the creatures who live in them, delighting in the Caesuras, have known my heart,
Even if they do not care: and when she drives home
For the day,
She puts me in an unmarked grave- headless, without Flowers, or smelling of the Blown gas of industrial lawnmowers-
And I go home too, and get on my knees and Pray for this muse, this soul: a secret color
Named Alma.

A Single Kiss

Well, it is raining, and the raindrops make Furtive areolas in the puddles of muddy bellies,
And their mists are like nebulous shrouds,
And unfertilized thoughts of maidens dreaming of Weddings and fine bachelors in their highest high towers-
And I am warm, as down in the valley the safe cabins
Huddle against their pines like satisfied lovers,
And I read my book once more the way a captain checks
Over his ship preparing for embarkation,
For I will be published mutely and celebrate with my dogs
In the consolatory monsoons of this lush season;
For it is what I can hope for, and my smiling mother's eyes,
And the way the doors lay sometimes half open letting
In the glows; but I cannot love her anymore, when my Words grow tangled about my mind like weeds and skeins
Of my dead aunt's yarn the kittens have playfully disemboweled,
For on the swings so far away she is moving in her arcs
As the policemen patrol her, and the apex where her legs grow
Up together and into the seat of a tall ladder placed below
Her window where the work is finished and she leans outwards,
Her eyes so maple and October, and she sighs never thinking
How the rain touches me, as if the kisses from cold little children,
Never once desiring her match-head, and the humming bloom
Of a single kiss....

A Single Pine

Single pine
stranded upon a sandy hill here you remain in a haunted crèche of coniferous rises and valleys, lost in between the stony caesuras at the bottom of a maze of unwound lovers winnowed by the disenchantments of time

So far away from the suburbias where the milkmaids walk clothed only by sunlight unforgettable center pieces of nature's strutting architecture

Where the tourists take their summer loves,
returning to outdoor movie theatres that cool in the dimming visions of sepia's dust,

single pine,
haunted by the sterile poisons of the past's unremembered dreams, as far from the sylvan evergreens whose dew-sapped boughs entwine in nocturnal yuletide wreaths comingling with elves and hares in an unending boreal table of Christmas

Not even a poisonous serpent unguates closer to inspect such ghastly loneliness-bones of master less dogs and the pottery of extinct tribes ring your salted mound, embittered in the boreal maze unspoken of by brighter and more well known fairy-tales that yet flutter above this abducted entanglement.

In a coffer of needles stretching pointedly towards that thieving moonlight, a man disavowed of his heartfelt trust metamorphosed now, yet trying to grasp the sunlight stolen from long ago reflections of your love.

Robert Rorabeck

A Single Tear Drop

I own two bicycles because I still pine for you
Alma,
Even while you make love this evening, even while you
Turn out all of the hope in your lighthouse,
So you cannot see my beauty drowning,
While during the day your eyes seem like brown
Maelstroms swirling with your breath,
Devouring the young heroes far more beautiful than me;
And still you accept my dreams and my bouquets,
While now all of the flowers are getting smaller as I too
Shrink,
Soon I will be so diminished as to be in danger of drowning
In a single tear drop,
Which is all that I wish from you.

Robert Rorabeck

A Siren For Truancy

An acrobat in the high numbers:
Rainbows that taper and billow in
The towers of trees.
The land swelters, the maidens sweating,
The paladins that we all once knew
Are taking a knee:

Mexicans, boys and girls,
Playing beneath the overpasses-
Terrapins digging holes in the sandy armpits
Of the lees.

I see you now, beckoning as a mirage:
Lingering, a siren for truancy,
But good boys and girls go from and return
To school:

They are looking socially beautiful,
But ignore them. See them as a mirage,
Pass the traffic going busily and in both ways:

Come to the greenest side of the canal,
To where the cats can talk,
And childhoods linger in the ill-begotten pornographies.

A land where your mothers are still beautiful
And housewives are in chains.
Float above the mountains-

Here is Ovid's metamorphosis- turn into a bird.
Migrate above the color changing parapets-
Calmly hallucinatory,
And in the midnights which douse crepuscule
Linger,

Observe the broken virgins,
The pietas mass produced in infinite number
In their cradles of industry.
They have all turned into something

Expectantly:

But, aside the green cages,
The lions are yawning,
And boys as old as Peter Pan are Touching down from their infinite slumbers.

This place is rich with football players,
And the creatures whom have made themselves
Are at a standstill.
The entire scene is a still life awaiting the joy

Of an erstwhile holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

A Siren Who Has Forgotten All Of Her Songs

Tonight my muse lies in sleep with him
Like a mermaid who has come ashore smelling the rose
That will become her grave:
There is her bed between the dunes, and her eyes
Have already bled all of their tears:
And now what is she doing, held over like a prostitute Underneath the biggest neon cross underneath the Biggest all night supermarket
While the convenient stores are getting robbed:
There she is with her nightgown slipped over her
Brown shoulders in the middle of the orange groves
So far away from where she belongs.
But she was so far away anyways- but I linger there
Still listening at the bus stops, the lions lamenting
A siren who has forgotten all of her favorite songs.

A Smile You Had Never Seen Before

Like the dissected rainbow of abused starlets
Like the beginning or the end of my misappropriated
Hope
That I cannot see the outcome for, and yet the sea
Is certainly some busy yard of beautiful graveyard and nursery:
And my parents are going away,
And as I jogged alone for you, I saw the first happenstance of A prism leaping like a colorful gazelle from the asphalt:
And my mother couldn't do any better than loving my Father,
And I love you this way, like a gagged symphony, like the last Stripes of a fish who knows she will not survive even while She bares her young to the unthoughtful spectacles of the Deep,
As you bared yourself for me maybe for the last time,
As I lamented the loss of the tall swing sets
And then I brushed your lips and yours to mine in the hidden
House beside the albino alligator who seemed to smile
Up at us a smile you swore to me you had never seen before.

A Thought In Their Bones

Pains in an organ, open to the trees,
Exposed to the sun:
Cadavers of little boys bathing in the shadows
Of school buses:
Words resurrected off their mollusks tongues,
While all the pretty girls like blue jays Ate their lunches of Nectars and other boys,
And then went straight out into the sheer field,
Like kites stuck to the sweet whispers of what they Could find there:
The ants marched underneath them, their little ant
Hearts beating like drums- the suns stroking them
Like cats:
They marched on the straight edge, the alligators
Watching them without a thought in their bones.

Robert Rorabeck

A Walk In The Wind

I am the only one who Orgasms
An origami jungle
Screaming in papier-mâché
Vertebrates
Where the sun is a paper
Plate
Burning orange-flamed lips
At the picnic,
Turn to curling ash in the whispering
Grass,
As something like 10,000
Army ants march past,
The pomegranate armored conquistadors
Of a luscious past,
Looking for the fabled city
Through the bladed forest,
All that wealth fallen from my sticky
Splayed fingers, piano players
Stretching out from my slumbering palm,
Made entirely from sweet vermillion
Watermelon
Which glistens in ruby pyramids
In butchered geometry toward the sun,
Circled by gossiping horseflies
Who are taking a walk
In the wind.

A Wedding At My Funeral

The time has not come before
And this is new.
The light is opening for the day
An ingénue displaying her bosom
To man's face-
I remember when I was young in following her.
Her tassels feeling through the trees
And drinking roots,
She laughed even while Alone;
Giggling,
She rode her bicycle across campus.
I staid up all night and prayed for her.
When tired, she slept
In the shade of a house-
Eyes half closed. I came to her,
She yawned and turned me away.
She said she loved me
Only when she was drunk,
And it was yet that time-
So long ago, yesterday....
Then early this morning she came to me
And offered me the quaff
Of lips.
Dripping nectar on the limbs,
She said, "Never before now, old man, "
As they lowered me in the grave,
Her light budded
A valleyide of rubrum,
A wedding at my funeral.

A Woman At My Door

I need a woman at my door to drive home to some long honey momma who will love me simply and cook frijoles for me a woman I can lie down on the couch with and just love appreciate her silhouette a red earth woman who always wants to sleep all night long careless in my arms a woman who miraculously will not look at other men to judge them sexually or not sexually worthy a woman who likes my face and the lines and briars it takes and doesn't mind that the paint flecks from my truck when it gets up past fifty-five and doesn't care how long my hair gets a woman who can show me new ways to religion and introduce me to this world
again the right way this time and might not care or be concerned that I write poetry good or bad about her or question my questioning of capitalism's excess waste and this fucked up interpretation of Judeo-Christian religion that supports it a woman who will work beside me breathe and live on my ribs kiss me deeply with her pretty lips

show off her self only to me in new lingerie look good forgives my atheisms shows me how to light candles for Catholicism reminds me of those old great saints who saw god in everything wet comes at me like bright news like bathing my eyes with light and doesn't come until I come lets me use my tongue longs all day for our bed gives me head rides horses with me in those green sea washed valleys that split the land like a woman when she takes me back to the classic forest to let me swim in the pool the moon birthed her in and then to sleep all night inside her flesh when she sleeps with me entwined in a tree.

Above The

Here, at least, we have new monuments and Times for the dollar—
And checking the minute hands of all of our Scars, at least different times to survive:
While we have our few minutes,
And the earth ticks off its monstrosities across
The heavens-
While, then, at least and un ceaselessly
We can at least count of her different times
For her,
And in at least invariable speeds—
Try to pretend that she lactates just as beautifully
As all of the heavens:
And, at least in this place, this seems to be the First and the last of her—

While monuments build, hugging to the first and
The last of her,
We continue to continue to build for her from Somehow,
The first and the last of the monuments making for
Forever
Their few minutes above the clouds.

Absent Without Leave

Close set the stores and hide
The abdomen of my laziness. Feed chickenpox
To alligators,
And go outdoors, brown bagging liquor and fireworks.
Go to the head of your class and stink
Up the place.

Look at pictures of the amber roadie who Fauns the chestnut eyes of her shallow Conviction over the muscular tattoos of Bouncers, of Jews- Make fun of her conviction:
Show her how you can be a swan too;
By holding your breath, turn it green,

Go out into the middle of the school,
Get dizzy and scream- Look down the crinoline
Blouse of the harpsichord substitute-
On your free time bight your tongue and scribble out
Novels to her freshman joy,
But otherwise tell her she should be working concessions
At the roller rink,
With those legs, with those legs!

Misspell to her three times in once sentence,
And wait to hear a mouthful of her wildflower convictions.
She will say that those boys are rowdy swans to her,
Like big, meaty hibiscus; and she goes to them the way a little Princess goes to sleep with her frog princes in The aloe of the carport of drowning cars;
So don't tell her how to fly,
But sell to her things she doesn't need, pointed obnoxious
Poems she doesn't need to hear,
And tell her you'll be right back- Go over beneath the Australian Pines and use the crumbling pornography
Inside the junked cars to pleasure yourself.
Range into the dunes, converse with cenotaphs of confused mermaids,
The awol GI Joes praying down wind of
The bright copper crosses of conquistadors

When you are back, don't tell her a thing.

She won't even look at you; and smile-
Feed the gold-fish to the swish-tailed cat,
Because you already knew she wouldn't finish
This anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

According To Death

With others old and gray,
Or not so old at all—Maybe they will
Mostly be fair haired and young,
If it should be a tragedy. Who knows?
But this is known, I will die some day
When Death comes to collect that part of
Me that he sees fit to remain,
To gather me up— a silhouette
Of the somber procession upon the hill
Backlit by a tired sun— The busy insects will
Eat what is left, the scuttling carnivores,
Nature's vacuum cleaners which God created to
Keep things cleaned, so there are no leftovers
As everything is satisfied—
Away from the anthills and plaguing swarms we
Will go, being grinned out by our own death masks
As we leave, bidding adieus—
Those heartless grins ex-lovers put on for show-
Go down with that orb if Death leads us there,
But who knows where Death goes, except that
He will take us with him to the other side,
His black robes billowing importantly, for
He is the herald of our great king, his
Skeletal hand pointing ever onward like a compass, onward in the Shade which is so very quiet where no hearts beat,
No blood flows— And maybe our procession will never
End. We will just keep going down in some great viewless stairwell
Beneath the world until we forget that we ever knew the pains of settlement.
In that abyssal fjord where Death will ditch us,
And leave us to the tricks of his shadow as he dives back up
To collect some more....
But this is known— that one day I shall die
And so shall you. My mother will die....
And on that day of the week people will be born
And the people already there shall live— People will go out and make love.
On that Friday a movie will come out you will never see
And there will be a book written that would have made me cry....
And the sun will come up afterwards like it did for us,
But not really so similar all in all, for our sun will be dead,

And this new sun rising is only for the living. Perhaps,
Though, we shall not care at all, knowing that these gifts are
Laid about to gladden the living, as we find newly indescribable
Things to attire our naked souls, or maybe we will not remember
At all. Maybe we will be like the egg in the nest in the crook of a branch
Of an expansive tree. Laying there in our nooks waiting to hatch again
To be filled with new thoughts, like the river's changing gown,
We will become again something we never before were.
But one thing is certain,
That one day you shall die
And I shall follow you, before or after,
It matters little as we shall all accord to Death.

Across The Open Mouths Of Your Starlet Constellations

Your lips taste better than this bottle

Alma:

I know because I have tasted your lips today.

And how is that possible when you are more beautiful than

The most beautiful woman I have ever known:

What are you,

And you don't believe me, but you have a beauty mark,

And you were right here today,

Telling lies and moaning; and I love you, and all of my other

Muses pale and turn to jealous ghosts,

And now the bottle is empty, but my windows are filled with the

Zoos of your eyes,

And all of your kind animals, Alma. Move into my house and

Bring your family because I love you:

I worship you, Alma, and any other possession would be most

Contrary:

Your world is a breathing portrait which would elevate me

To the cockpit of a fabulous daydream; and I am right

Here, Alma, holding my breath and counting steadily for you:

I am sorry that all of your rabbits were unlucky;

And I am sorry that my dogs are still in Arizona, but I don't

Have to vagabond anymore: you are right here and fluctuating:

The movement without movement of your body is a

Carousel that really turns me on, and

I am glad that I don't have to go anywhere, because I have already

Slept on the roof of your house;

And I already know that you really love me, while the comets

Burn their graffiti across the open mouths of your starlit constellations.

Across The Orchards You Abandoned

Busy visions of a childhood and her ghosts,
Words that linger in a poor man's clutch, as she looks Away perpetually, browns stems quivering over
Her children, but she is out of leaves and warmth-
Sexy vision of catastrophe, how you loved my gifts
Of flea markets for a year, but could not entirely give Up your sailors of Mexico, and the pretty cannibalisms
You put into your bed across the train tracks at night;
While he still doesn't satisfy you, you are the personification
Of any soul, but it wouldn't be right to say your name again,
Not on anyone's birthday- though I will not be waiting
Anymore like a rabbit in his green hutch or rock garden
In the little yard I remember bordered by rattlesnakes
And aloes- Like the urban legends that exist in the Highways of gossiping sky: I showed your aunt the hickies
You gave me as we made love for the year that is over;
I gave your sisters and more of your cousins fireworks.
And now I am left counting other butterflies who migrated
Across the orchards you abandoned, while my mother
Falls down in some mock Pieta, a wasp or some power
Cord stinging her foot again with its preschool lavishing,
As she dries the clothes of my childhood underneath a thunderstorm
That is already passing.

Across The Promising Remains

Anthropomorphic conquistadors
Bending, bowing to
The prettiest curls—
Blond-curled, but not accounting for
Their less than perfect
Aerobics—Sweltering in the pistils of Their daydreams—
Without a single echo lost to them—
In an apiary of singing topiaries—
In a surplus of breasts and racing legs
That remain idle even
As they are waterfalls down from heaven—
Every boy's sport
In their exuberant yet tightly buttoned
Pornography—
Another way that desire languishes—
Across the promising remains.

After It Is Almost Done

If the day yellows, it sings to her as it curls up,
Winnowing its airplanes who are coming down
Like whippoorwills of dreams
To fasten to her hair, and sing to her of secret springs
With epiphanies of animals lapping there:
They are all there, like a zoetrope of astrological signs,
All the possible loves of her life,
A rest stop up in the woods my mother took me to,
And never once while I was there was I thinking of her:
This new girl, this thing or muse that I have made Love to for these last eight months, who sings to Me from so far away and then, like another animal
Migrating with the sun, and happily distracted from her
Way home, goes out of her way to put away my fears,
Coming over after it is almost done, and makes love
To me.

After School

Trying again, the young children yawn,
Hatching beneath the tombs- as all of the day is haunted-
But your body blooms-
Driving all day in its loneliness, and yet so Happy with what you are-
Advertised beneath the billboards,
A muse diminishing in her car, and I have to think of
You,
Terrapin in the shoulders of the sunlight looking down-
Angel clouded by blue and Purple cobwebs-
Sunlight melting through you, another ghost
Haunted on holiday
My famished dictionaries try to perceive,
But it doesn't last-
The loneliness of playboys- the guts of unicorns
On display in the museums of witches
Casting spells,
As it takes a long time remember, but we try
Every afternoon, after school,
Touching ourselves.

Against His Brown Skin

Physical imaginations of a poet—
I dream of picking flowers now that I am without you—
I dream of slinking away to the Avenues of Venice,
And disappearing with the inevitability of these sentences—
The vines bringing about the strangling contaminations of These crypts,
As I wait for you—eyes and senses filled with rum—
Having trouble breathing—
As lost as the Indians—as wayward as the tourists from Their homes—
And the purple unicorns—
Like someone with emptied pockets outside of
Disney World—
Satellites falling to earth as she lies in bed with him,
Bring her brown body easily up against his brown skin.

Robert Rorabeck

Against The Carports And The Misspelled Hotels

They will make a sound at the doorstops of your Castles, even if you never drive this way—
This is how it will turn out:
You will get around the end of my old neighborhood,
And collapse next to the antlers of a chinaberry
Tree,
And then say to all of the forgotten woods that it not Alright to be here,
And the blue gills will burp and hiccup in the canal—
And all of the children will seem to move
Sideways in the canals of their high schools—
And their mutual bereavements will continue to Pretend to be so unreal—
And maybe you will find her past out one night while on A delivery:
Maybe she will be collapsed next to a watermelon in Her negligee:
Maybe she will have collapsed in the middle of a game of Battleship,
And in her dreams made it halfway up to State College
Where she inevitably messed around and Played with herself—until the summer came,
And all of the sororities rode white ponies and continued
To gesticulate to their continually pregnant grandmothers
Who were still luxuriating in their confederacies—
But, otherwise—the moon got out early and shone over
The hallucinations where the busses were turning around,
And you spied them like an eagle, like an osprey,
Until your true love got out of one of them—
And she touched the ground herself—and disappeared like
An angel in a sea of burning promises—
The fuses disappearing into the maelstroms that consume
All of the bones of the wayward marionettes—
As they still struggle upwards from the sea—delighting in
The nocturnal perfumes the lighthouses have bought and Sold to them, giving them the vanishing luxury
As the sea swells against the car ports and the misspelled hotels
That become so filled that only the virgins of the streets
Are allowed to enter in.

Airplanes And Night Blooming Jasmine

Child, you are lost and you don't
Wish for me to find you "climbing up through the Strange spinsters of the night"
Looking for apples in the arboreal bosom
The stars chickenpox but dancing
Beautifully "your memories on a bus to school,
The alligators in the canal,
And your parents in bed together while the moonlight
Is dancing in the pool like a toy sea"
I left fireworks in a bag underneath the night blooming
Jasmine
That you will never find
And you know, there are so many airplanes climbing
In the sky and leaping forever across the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Airplanes Touching Down

With the sun going down I think of you—
Linger, nearly unperceivable heat
Which once flooded the highways, blinding men:
Poisonous light contaminating grottos,
Like the franchises that have turned
This country into
A land for well-fed zombies:
Parasitic, you infect me, but I have all but Shaken it off—
I allow you to surface as the day cools,
As the housewives get ready to receive their Children once again—
Families coming home, airplanes touching down—
I sit and drink and open old wounds,
The painful craft of trying to recombine with A woman that was no good for roses—
You languish as the day proceeds, rejoining the night
With its habits—
And tomorrow and afterwards—life and tombs,
Made of the same stuff—a togetherness that Separates for eternity.

Robert Rorabeck

Alexandria

I have seen you lying under the sky
Like the Great Victoria Desert of Australia,
Your body the milky smoothness of Oasis,
My eyes come to drink with the animals off
The streets, to cool on your body as it yawns
Up to the night—So I toss my head up and Howl and laugh on you with the speckled
Hyenas, as mysterious goldfish swim like
The reincarnations of mute children
Through your reedy shoulders; As your hair
Ripples the auburn banners of its nature,
The aboriginal flag of the forebears of this Mystical continent your body relaxes upon,
Estranged from other women you drifted away
To become the extraordinarily distant place,
The exhaustive study of man's science;
As your thoughts coalesce in the stratosphere,
Each of your memories a winking constellation,
Eerily distant and indiscernible from all others,
Unreachable by our lips as by our fingers,
Though we sate our lonely thirst upon your body,
As our eyes drink in like throats your soul the Length of the earth in dusty dress, you who rises
Before us like an Aleutian well in effluvial waters
Which spray and mist the night-lit desert,
As your eyes are sometimes seen relaxing in Camouflage in the folded places you purposefully
Shadow, until the sun emerges like a bannered king
In the bright conquest of thoughtless empires;
Then you turn yourself away again, become the Settling earth, the crisp red earth, the dry talking
Earth where we hunt upon with naked spears.
We feel you beneath us, guiding,
As we long to lay down beside you, to sustain
Our bodies on your streams and otherworldly portions
Which crouch and pant with us, as we become but An aspect of your indescribable nature,
When you lay down your body, the Oasis in
The desert, sustaining and defining.

Alice And The Spooks

Little girls in little blonde curls
In reddish frilly messes
Eat their lunch alone,
Served by brunette waitresses
The eyes the color of Burnishes doors,
Their thoughts slipping from their dresses.

A six year old Alice Finishes her chicken and waffles,
She goes outside, screams,
Grits her teeth, unloads her guns
The bullets bang
Onomatopoeics.

There are boatloads of boogiemens
Eating the streets,
The gangs of vampires kissing
The sweet coeds' necks,
While the Goth chicks take Snapshots like Japanese tourists.

Her mom and dad are out there too,
Dressed like Ralph Lauren and Lash LeRoux,
But they are not who you think they are
As they moan to her, "Why aren't you
In preschool? "

But school, she knows, is the worst
Place to be,
Because there's a hole in the courtyard
As deep as the sea
Out of which the Big Bad things churn,
Not unlike a scoop of ice-cream soft serve.

Down at the end of the street
In the atmospheric light of a terminally ill sun,
Someone is whistling like Clint Eastwood.
She sees who it is, all the old gang,

Death and his boys: Pestilence, Famine, War,
Frank and Jesse James.

They're all smoking as they come
Out of the brothel.
They just killed all the gods in the sky,
So the heavens lay like breathless still-life—
Like the black apple and the brown pear
They made her finger-paint in art class;
But all she really cares about is that
Her chewing gum is getting tasteless.

She steps forward, our dear young Alice,
Her little blonde curls tied in red bows,
In tumbling, frilly messes.
She swears, she curses, she gives
A useless Jesus the bird,
Then she takes her little foot
And draws a line in the dirt,

She blows a pink bubble,
Cocks her gun and gives all that's Evil
Ten seconds to run.

Robert Rorabeck

All A Little Deeper

When I drive for two weeks,
I don't survive very well: I grow new scars
On my cheeks like plants in sunshine:
I drive down a corridor of ruffled clouds, like
A bridal party's frilly suicide hung out over the desert:
I look at myself at strange, furtive angles,
Flitting away from it like a frightened bird too
Thirsty to leave off it: I look in angles like Sylvia Plath, and I think up wonderful novels to write
Over her entombed carriages, but once I reach the destination,
I scare off the easy boys who have been suckling all over
Her like flies, and I grow sedentary, and just lounge
By that corpse. Instead of writing prose to praise her in languid, Scrawling lines like the phalanxes of a bedecked army,
Victorious and out on parade, I instead write lazy poetry I Will never look at again. I don't even meet her, or revise my Fingers across her waxy brow, or grasp her ankle to squash the Ants: I watch the clouds douse the sun, the scattering mothers who Will soon again sow their winter. I feed the horses moldy hay, and They greet me in little manner at all, though the dogs leap and Nip and grow muddy and truncated until I hose them off. Now
I lay on the sheet-less bed with all three of them. The German Shepherd is new: I had two others, brothers, who have died. I have Been here for half a decade, in fact, and have so much hypothetical Ink under my nails as to resurrect her if I could match her gaze for Any amount of time; but she just lies there as the horses do,
A carriage of a girl gone away, a scarecrow, an easy trick:
There is laughter on the cusp of the hills, and maybe it is from people Who are not real at all. And I listen to it, and wait for the falling of Snow, which will imbed these scars all a little deeper.

Robert Rorabeck

All But A Child

And the words are thrown away,
Like tourists over the desert which has your lips-
The buses are greyhounds,
And they take your golden dollars of wishes like Wishing wells:
Over which your reflection seems to hover: Alma,
Showing off your brown skin to the sun:
Like motes of amber angels making me sticky tongued:
So that my words are glued
Like stamps
Like horses hooves in a deep forest or a swamp:
But when riding beside you as we drove Down to Miami to get the official documents:
Why then, it
Felt for almost all of the time that could be counted
That my changes were done,
And my motions just a zoetrope performing for children
On a merry-go-round:
The lush numbers of the fairytales with cobweb wings in The aloe-
Already stolen from the neighbors citrus before the old
Neighborhood was developed
And paved: when the cenotaphs of the conquistadors
Still sang and looked through the dunes
Of blue pornography: - and all of it was about something,
While the waves rolled in from off the gods' breathing;
And you were all but a child in old
Mexico- Alma, to whom your mother, Rose, was yet singing.

All But Nothing

Sick and on my knees,
Throwing up
A half digested God,

I am pregnant with love
Who cares all but nothing
For me.

Robert Rorabeck

All I Wanted

I wanted to hold your hand
While your mother was away,
Bringing back sack lunch for her
Little birds:
To hold up that slender portion of Junoesque gravity;
As if I had become your moon,
Receptive, stuck and dizzy like a crippled
Bee on the dumb lip of a sated terrapin:
To solder a new crèche for your hungry
Digits
At the edge of the carport of
The Catholic Church;
But you, already mystified, socially husbanded,
Given to the responsibilities of a flash-epoch,
Goddess like, yes- lactating with a vine
Of children at your hip;
You had become disinterested long before,
When you saw me take ecstasy at Disney World,
And I lost focus:
I lost my train of thought, became lethargic,
Bound to sleeping in lavatories,
Green smoke doing calligraphies out from the Pullulating landscapes:
I couldn't feel the rides at all; demystified in fast
And modern trips of coming ups and goings down,
My eyes something nocturnal and sated
With nothing much to do:
And in body, you went away from me,
Red-bricked versatile, but forgetful to the needs of Wet clay;
Tremulous afterwards, I could never fully realize,
Hobo in my transient rooms I tried to conceive the flood;
I teared ankle-deep; but it was no use:
All the animals were safe,
And you in Colorado, stabilized, ocean-deep couldn't Know-
All I wanted to do was hold your hand
While your mother was away.

Robert Rorabeck

All Of My Lamentations

It comes up to this, and then it goes forever away:
Lapping and making love and counting the strokes that is necessary
To acquire each color,
And I have lived alone for so long that it isn't even necessary to Matter;
And the girls who I once loved before and during class,
They too have ceased to exist, for now my palate consists of only
One name and one color,
And she has reconciled, or whatever she has done, and she is Sleeping with one man underneath the carpentering waves
Of the burnished sun;
And maybe she remembers his name as she sleeps;
And her name is Alma- and she is my fatal muse,
For it is for her that all of my lamentations
Weep.

Robert Rorabeck

All Of The Airplanes

Dying to begin,
Just as any angels underneath the weathers of the Mountains:
This is how we sing out, waiting for the caracoles
To finally sing again,
Rising, at first, up above the weathered monuments
Into which we cannot possibly hope
To believe in,
Falling out through the ashes of the water fountains,
Even while all of our parents have finally Decided to grow up:
This is just another sad number, while you are just Another ghost I presupposed to Believe in;
And this is just another element into which
Are presupposed beliefs
Have finally decided to believe in:
This is a settled calm, and this is just another Way to distinguish ourselves, multiplied-
But our gardens sing to no one, pretending that They are, perhaps beautiful- as another night
Proceeds to fill up, all together, the Habitual loneliness underneath the leaping pages of
All of the airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

All Of The Brilliant Stores

I can tell of things saddened in the park: things
That never have to die
After they have run away: words drooled from
The lip,
As they drooled from the snail:
Lactated off of Colorado, and gone through her
Aspens and her key stones
After the lightning storms: they have followed
Me down,
And I have whistled to them through the darkness
And brought them into my truck to sleep-
Residing there gradually serenaded by the rushing
Fixtures in the subtle trees:
Each wind a blessing tearing off her clothes,
Scratching carvings into the sky
And caracoling the light form the heavens that I
Swear to god doesn't even belong there
Anymore: while the creatures hibernate anyways,
Waiting until morning for all of the brilliant
Stores to open in a hexagonal flood.

Robert Rorabeck

All Over Us

I'm sorry—but she looks like she knows
That I love her,
And she is my wife—and I get up every day,
Evacuation,
Becoming the art of archeology—and the vanishing
Indians end up misconstruing and vanishing again
Into the heart of an emptied airplane:
And this, at least, is the place I have dug:
Waiting for all of the rest of the armies to finally come
Out from the jungles and fall over us:
Peace in her eyes, just like a corpse's peace—
And a bouquet in her hands but for a dead man,
As the fireworks play out in a dance hall that the angels
Once danced in—but long since have moved
Out—as the angels leap and leap about across
The uneasy ululations of a Ferris Wheel from which we've Had a falling out and this is the all and the last of What can be said of whatever we had to say of our amens.

Robert Rorabeck

Alma

How you accuse me on this beautiful earth:
How I pocket the emptiness that needs to be mended:
How I strut out and turn around and faint, for every element
In this yellow day might as well be a beautiful woman
Breathing and bosomed as the clear, blue sky:
And if I said I wanted to die in Disney World, then you know that
It had to be true,
And I drink liquor, liquor, rum and liquor, and I curse and Think of you;
And I wear out all of my Alma's, which I think means souls:
Both of my feet and of my body, and I go down into the valley, following
The tresses of an infatuated earth:
I pass up all of the arrow heads and unicorns just to get to the bottom of Your worth;
And as it turns out your mind is flooded by a sea, or by a bloody river;
It makes no sense to me; all the firemen are climbing your trees,
And the pitch-fork pines are raising their necks like herons up from Your melodies;
And your body working; and your body tired out smells like perfume
And your eyes are transoms: they are the carnivals that move in time together,
That make the sweet music that both delights and hypnotizes the Breath in my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Alma's Favorite Color

Alma makes love next to her rabbits:
It rains and the canals engorges: cats dance like the pages of A zoetrope,
But she never thinks of going outside to see all of this:
Alma will never be a suburban housewife;
Alma is a Mexican housewife who I just gave a bag full of Jalapeno peppers to tonight:
Alma is little enough to fit into a sack, and Alma is pretty with Satin red hair filled with shadows;
And Alma has curves that she shares with a window shopping world
Full of gringos: but she doesn't love a single one of their Pasty faces:
She only loves her husband, and if not him other men from Guerra,
Mexico;
And that is why I must convince Alma that I am the tallest Mexican
She has ever seen;
So that I can sing to her tomorrow and give her flowers, and make Her accept these privileges as if we were stuck together up in the Andes looking at the Plaedes far beneath both of our homes;
And then striking together like matches in a green bedroom,
Alma and I, as if we were on an Arthurian journey,
Looking for the immortal blueprints in an important cup;
Except that Alma doesn't even know who our king is,
And she never looks outside when it rains,
But watches her two children who I have never seen;
And Alma's favorite color is green.

Robert Rorabeck

Alma's Fruiteria

You gave me a humming sound—stringed instrument
Going down on her,
Always vanishing over the rivers, and becoming a
Mystery for her knights:
The clouds clouding over the telephone poles,
The brindled neighbors making love like cats:
The fountain continuing to sing of Immortality,
But the prettiest of song birds refusing to drink from
Her—
And now, where are you caught up,
As I dance in those echoes you never recognized,
Your car repossessed—
And your patrona stealing your flag—and nothing about Us remembered, like the colors
They keep bringing to the disorganized patriotisms—
But we kissed
And made love day by day,
And I brought you music by these fingers—they are Still singing
As I try to teach school, stringed instrument in Your echoes—
Men who cannot cross from the borders of your heart—
But I remember how
We played
In the sandy lot of both of our hearts—
And I watered the petunias, getting ready to move on,
As you pretended to flirt with my cousin,
In the fruit market our dreams have left abandoned.

Robert Rorabeck

Alma's Song

You showed me your children today,
Alma, and found out from Pedro that the N
Tattooed in the web of your left or right hand stands for North America, or the man you love:
I can't remember his name right now: I keep imagining
You out in this one front yard in all of this
Florida,
Standing like a pinup beside an open throated mailbox;
Oh, Alma,
Aren't you such a bird: Oh, Alma- that you would love me for More than a month or two before going back to the man whose Initials you have tattooed right there on your hand;
And I have been so diligently faithful keeping this up for you,
Wanting to pet the brownness of your flesh,
Wanting to wake up with you in the butterfly house where the sky
Is always smoking upwards like tresses with the young and virginal
Angels swinging their legs on the top wrung:
Oh, Alma, I have another song for you that no one else has Ever sung.

Robert Rorabeck

Almost Nation

I have the Almost Nation in the back of my throat,
All the armies gathered and defeated who would once
Have rallied forth to capture her, and to tell her those Voluptuous words which grow in fair gardens or hang upon
The delicate flesh of the youngest women,

All those failed ghosts are caught in me, all the fish
That Jesus forgot to catch in his nets before the Romans
And the Jews caught him, his father forsook him,
And he realized the terminal mortality of all men
After the Spear of Longinus made a river flow
From his side, and his eyes became dim, rolling like
The sea one last time upon Mary Magdalene.

So, I grit my teeth and make my home far away
Deep within caves within caves, the farther back you
Go the bluer the blackness becomes, so
I have returned to my mother, but nothing is made
Up, for inside here is Plato's Ultimate Form, the illusion
Of illusions demystified and ugly in its nudity; this
And all that she saw when she hung up my phone
And crawled into his bed.

Now I swallow my soul and grit my teeth,
And from this porch I can see the revolution of Far away spheres, their small orbits, when they turn away
From me, and when they come towards me; and sometimes
One of the delicate night's decorations will fall, a Blazing fire shot down, a God dying, and I will watch it come down into me, for me to swallow it,
The thing that once was but now is lost,
Inside me the Almost Nation.

Robert Rorabeck

Alphabet Soup

Ferris-wheels of diamond mice run
Around the salty pan,

Laughing men as tall as houses
Fold themselves in the squealing wind,

Ginsberg is back in the mutinous queue,
Toting lead for the Adonis biscuit,

While harems of uncommitted tumbleweeds
Flaunt in a species of cartwheels,

Slowly, slowly then she sees us,
Feeding her the alphabet soup of our wanderlust

Served up from the dregs of an abandoned high school's Knickknacked Library,

So she nods Atlantian, and goes back to bed in His crook, drooling a species of mollusk distended from Her hyperventilating womb.

Robert Rorabeck

Altogether Too Beautiful

It doesn't take so very long to surrender
Yesterdays echoes the very tit teaming at the very gates
Of another echinopsis of Disney World—
While then, all of the boys are already dissolved
And making a Peabody out of our very own imaginations:
Here is the very strange swill that they are left to Suspect without the nights alone or the admirations of Anywhere;
It is a very beautiful journey across a void where the Voluptuous ships seldom often have to correct themselves,
And that is why that out of anywhere I have to end of here:
Even if it is strange, enveloped in the graduation of-
Your young night—it doesn't always have to end up
That way—a million volumes of echoes mean the same Thing—that the baseball team or the football team
Has won, eventually—and you are so busy,
Enveloping yourself into the echoes that fall so far Beyond my fingertips, that the other world also all of A sudden awakens and spontaneously
Becomes altogether too beautiful to be explained.

Robert Rorabeck

Always Awaiting You

Bodies really tumble, Tumble,

Alma:

When they feel strong enough, they get up and dance next to

The fading eclipse of all of the seas,

And it doesn't matter if I have enough quarters to share my time

Equally with my car and with my sea:

Alma,

Alma, I have lost my dogs, Alma, and now won't you look at me:

Alma, I will never know what your kids mean to you,

But I may one day know what they mean to me: but, Alma,

Alma, my only wish is that I was more beautiful

For you,

My Alma, Alma,

And that I hadn't been away to school for so long so that I might

Have wooed you sooner, and had a sooner chance at wooing you:

My Alma, Alma:

And the night dances, and the ships ship,

And I think of you,

Alma, Alma:

And I pray to you Alma, Alma,

While the sea casts away again, rolling its dice, trying to make its

Body into your favorite

Color,

Alma, Alma; it is all we are ever trying to do:

While the rabbits wait at home for you, Alma, Alma;

Under the green sun and the green moon:

Alma, Alma.

They are always awaiting you....

Robert Rorabeck

Always Kind To Me

Passing myself down into the emptiness,
Like the snake that has found the concrete sheath,
And so tired of tricks descends,
While the hummingbirds demote themselves from flowers
To clovers,
And not the lucky ones, and the waves descending to the shore,
Fashion their kisses by the demonstrations
In the viaducts of her vanishing gown; and now she has him
On her mind instead of me,
And her children come lurking, wanting for milk or Trouble,
While more and more of the gold she wears is purchased by me:
I bought her a silver rosary today and told
Her I was Catholic,
And promised her that I had written her this before she'd Ever met me;
And Alma this is always for you, so you should take it:
Take it, and be
Always kind to me.

Ambulance

When you are on the highway going down the lines like words of the poem pull over for the ambulance her red light district swirling, but she'll only take in her wounded men with poor hearts and gaping chest wounds watch her like a red elephant on parade like a Christmas tree lit up her automobile is the speedy whore of service-here she comes, pull over for her- it's the law so she can get to politicians quicker- she is about to engulf a injured man, like alcohol- she is about to resurrect the dead pull over and wait for the gory scene cross the lines and put your eyes on that mess listen to her scream the ambulance screws toward you a battle cry a rebel soldier charging a blue hillside let her through don't let her see your rusty underside, don't let her get a whiff of your potential wound, or she will take you along let her whine on through let her come and let her go and then put your foot on the gas collect your thoughts note the angulations of the sun begin to think again about the movie you just saw, let her slip on past, trying to forget dead love no longer think of the ambulance she's picking up another man worse off than you how she bled past you for him and didn't but notice you how she screamed on this valley through the mountains how she hummed murder, and didn't hide her lust for her job do not think of the mess she is going to pick up to rush to the hospital to replenish him in her bed, or to send him on the further journey to the morgue, packing with him a new marble color/ think instead of the parts the doll's head down in the pasture the forgot arrowheads in the red earth in the hills do not think of Vietnam just Drive on,

Drive on.

Robert Rorabeck

American Classic

What can I do for you,
Beautiful snag?
The still virginal tatters of
A promised gown
Stripped on a snare
At the river's high-water mark.

The gem of the world could not Hold you nor buy your wealth.

Even drowned,
You mix with the richest silts,
As the ghostly bellies of glaciers
Bump against you.

Your eyes are speckled with 10,000 lakes...
Each one no less deep than a soul...

And, like the rest of the Country, you sell cars,
Because in this economy,
It's your beauty's worth.

An Agnostic Pieta For A Mexican Fairytale

It was the madness that is always here, raining hard
In the afternoon,
While the morning was a litter of sun; and I strutted in My diminutive foyer like chanticleer yawning into
The bred basket of morning:
My heart being swung and bled by a sieving grievance
That harvested my soul without anesthesia:
You were late, but you came in your miniskirt-
Your shirt had a blue ribbon in the back,
And I wrote a poem while I carried you into the bedroom;
And we made love: it was happiness for awhile:
It was the end of your period, and you wanted me to Pull your hair-
My fantasy for a little while, breakfast before I leapt into My car and to another day at work at the fruit market:
You were a time saver, something immortal with a Family who would not tell me she loved me,
And you grew distance when I finished what we had started,
Spilling the frog-like perfume into the slender ballrooms of Your wildflowers;
And grew unreasonable, though I reclined on my knees
And pleaded- an agnostic pieta for a Mexican fairytale;
But later on when I saw you, you were like the sea on a calming Fieldtrip, and I invited you into the cooler and gave you
A hundred dollars to spend with your two sisters at
The mall, Alma- until the world spun around again, just a joyride;
And now you lie there with another man, delicate crafts of Soft brown dreams protruding from the afterthoughts of My daycare, while the liquor mollifies the little wounds
You left on my entire naked body,
As you come to me again, my eyes closed, in your mini-falta,
Your tiny brown knuckles as soft as the dun snow-bells of angels,
Inquiring pleasurably on my tiny little door.

Robert Rorabeck

An Even Greater Disaster

Now I have this joy- this silent feeling apart
From me,
Underneath all of the advertisings, I've begun to Smile:
Words on my vision, in my pearly skin:
Water moccasins in their basins curling like Ribbon above the stolen bicycles:
And I am not lost, as the fair rain begins to fall-
I will remember you as well as when your Young body struck across the hall:
You haven't fallen yet- it is yet perfect,
And I've just been drinking
Underneath the eyes of a goldfish: and I am still Right here in perfect unison with the afternoon that Is about to unfold,
As it has done before to so many countless other men:
Men who now if they are lucky have become Cenotaphs- while the airplanes proceed across their Numberless gardens- and it all looks somewhat ghastly
As the houses melt down the streets of the Phosphorescent traffic: yes, why aren't they going faster:
As the beautiful women without any husbands sell
All that they have to sell underneath the overpasses-
As we wait for the clouds to pass and pray there won't
Be an even greater disaster.

Robert Rorabeck

An Untried And Untrue Song

If I was so incredibly young as not to have this constant
Passion to make love, to grow bigger and so forth,
While I could just get up and go out of here, and make it all the Way to Colorado,
And then answer all of those reasons why you've never even Thought of me:
The school yard like so many places where haven't we forgotten
How to belong,
The belladonnas tucked away- and by and large we have forgotten
The beauty of the fields, how she answers to no one;
How she at first becomes a colloquialism before taking off all of Her clothes and then slipping away underneath the flight plans of Airplanes;
And I wanted this to be something great, but this just turned out to Be another roller rink with all of the rock candy gone,
Another field trip with all of my misgivings, the warbling of
An untried and untrue song.

Robert Rorabeck

And Anyways

There are—are castles from
The finger-tits of the mountains—and while
I am not here anymore,
While then you don't have to believe in anymore of My idioms:
In fact you don't need another home anymore:
While I am pretty sure that you will Be doing all right—
Fed by the aphrodisiacs of narcoleptic housewives
And the stewardesses who don't live here
Anymore—
But then you are here, anyways—lost to transgressions
Of the vagabond teenagers:
While I have been telling them everything that I have Tried to teach them, even though
I am almost lost anyways:
Then there is a new kite—a new kite in the shallows
Of egrets and herons and blue herons—
Like bobcats made to serve the carrion out beside the Busied south Floridian
Highways of anyways—and just because
As if you didn't know—as if the billboards couldn't advertise—
We serve this Disney World—anyways—
As all of the beauty of the butterflies go to touch down
Dying upon the sugary pastures of the forlorn housewives
From all of Mexico—and any—and anyways.....

Robert Rorabeck

And Even I

Even this house doesn't sadly wonder
Of all the creatures with eyes:
Eyes,
Who are wandering, fixated, opened eyed,
Open lipped,
Drowning or starving by all of the elements:
Fix hooked in their gut or stamen:
And all of this, a hand of nothing:
Girls, girls in cars, and girls in planes,
And girls on merry go rounds:
And all of them looking up into the sky:
Ants and fish, and flying fish:
And wishes on their birthdays that leave to say
Goodbye:
And blue gills in the blue bells who are taking their Last breathes,
And ants, and blue ants blown from the lips and Stamens of tulips in games of love into
The canal:
How long do you think it is that they can swim before
They too have to say goodbye:
Just as stewardesses leap through the sky, like Jacks
Off of hot candle wicks, leaping like nursery rimes,
Like busy airplanes of mobiles above the vast infinity
Of newborns:
And cockroaches in forgotten cabinets:
And even you. And even I.

Robert Rorabeck

And He Was The Playground

And they had another shower
While they pretended at loving—
And the sea came in Spinning and spinning
Just like the wheels of the helicopters did:
And she could never—never
Love anybody else but she loved him:
Coming to him on Sunday mornings—
Well, the sun pretended to cough as it got up
And made ready for another day at
The school yard:
In fact he made the whole place get up
Until there was never enough rum for
The last man
But he said his prayers anyways
And got up
And up
And showered naked in the sunlight,
Because he was the sunlight anyways:
And he was the playground
And it felt good.

Robert Rorabeck

And Then This

It doesn't hurt when it rains: it sounds
Repeatedly staccato- daydreams in a classroom of Freckles,
The old joys of kindergarten: and now I live alone,
And take strikes off of this While sunshine works all night on the other side of
The road,
Doggy style, smelling like road kill,
But making some other man's flowers happy:
Landscaping,
And the secret terrapin of incest: the failed boys at play:
Wet like paper in their pants:
Defeated baseball- ropes that lay impotent in the grass
Near the footstools of half nude Madonna's and their Ugly sisters:
Like snakes without backbone, slipping their tongues
Into the singsong elbows of greenery:
And giving off dismissive promises all night
For which they never receive the right percentage of Compensations:
And then in the morning: hurricanes, rodeos:
The sad hibiscus who knows what happened to the little Girl: rattle snake clutches as soft as abuse;
Lost tricycles in the corrugated drainage: and then this:
And now this.

Robert Rorabeck

Animal Pain

The birds fly over my house-
I don't know where they are going, probably south,
And they look beautiful under-belly even though
I don't know them;
But I don't really live here- This is just a dream-
I have never seen the birds, and I don't believe in God,
Since you laid down with him,
Or whoever, combining your fingers through the fireman,
Caesuras through sunlight just as through snow-
I am almost done with the last chapter,
Before the class which will be my execution-
The f*cker said he was an atheist before he found pantheism,
And unicorns,
And stole away my mermaid before I could paint her,
But she had nice breasts, successfully areola-ed by Ulysses
S. Grant, or somebody-
Now these long aberrations, these stints of death looking Up through the sky-
The stewardess who gives him the wrong number, and I can't Go through with it,
Because she's changed her name and is in love with the tallest
Cross in Florida,
And I would like to name my children after her,
But I've forgotten how to ride a bicycle,
And I don't believe in God anymore-
Still, Mickey Mouse has a strong jaw, burnished by the East coast- He rides a Harley on weekends while his wife
Takes the Lexus shopping with their two kids;
But I am not warm any more,
But a tourist on the job- I am not asking for a handout,
Bu it is so cold,
And I don't believe in G-o-d.

Robert Rorabeck

Anne Sexton

So you've written poetry,
And have beautiful scars, like
Burns in the pie-crust of American:
And I'll write your introduction,
Even though we've sold all the trees
And I don't know you.
I've seen one picture of you,
But I will not stare when you come awake
Again under my tents, swooning like
The damp laundry, or the birds
Picked from the dunes by the sky;
And I would lay my arms down beneath
You, to be christened or knighted,
Though you might not think to speak of this Until the depressions of the next millennia;
And though I should be the dirtiest man
In the bookstore, I will smile even as I buy
Those things they forgot and have fallen into
The vague quarries of such professions:
Though I cannot see it anymore, I am
Published in mutations of sky, and I love you.

Robert Rorabeck

Annie

I spend all night living in exile
And dreaming of my beautiful sister in laws
Exhumed by the flames:
There they are, continuing up from their High schools,
And looking as if they could be in charge
In their little bedrooms
Without any shelter-
Wont they ever set out again, lingering
Against the vanishing
Jasmine just like the spells of their folklore,
Or the songs that I sing:
There are the waves hurrying against the moon
Light: and just like them, she too will Grow up and get her part in this world,
But I wonder if she will ever know
Who she really is,
As the dragons sing and loose their teeth underneath
The pillows, and smile innocent
As she holds her auburn head up next to the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Another Drive-Thru Heaven

In the morning the sun
And other things—other things all around
The avenues of their places will unfold
In the mechanical ways of the petals
Of their diurnal births—
Pretty women diademing their Cul-de-sacs,
And rotten boys in their canoes
Going either way as long as it isn't straight to School—
The world was made to be this way,
The housewives shut into their smoldering dins,
As the angels on roller-skates float through Another drive-thru heaven.

Robert Rorabeck

Another Poem

I've never used the adjective
Gun-metal until now.
Because, thinking about it,
My p*ni$ is, in fact- Gun metal blue
From the savage arteries like Hebrew
Slaves building for my libido;
That forever-object of phallu$, my forefather's
Springtime monument
When erected vibrates, finds out water, salutes the stars,
Zigheil$
Fires its bullets around New Years,
Is highly speculative, and well drawn:
A cerulean tarp without any sag;
A cavernaserai into the sea,
Perhaps with a sense of smell and not just
The taste buds of the icky-groin;
A radio-active spelunker which when exploring
The lie of her Plutonic cave does away with
The senses of any other motion,
Begins the roil of the sea of two bodies
Exploring through the cliched poetry of Chinese Fireworks. She can write me a single word,
Or walk by the whispering traffic with her legs
Showing off and and I become patriotic especially for Her and such polished color engorges
Though when expelled, shrinks into the white
Ghost, the capless octogenarian, a terrapin tired and lazy on its orchid,
Sleeps under the school bus and my scarred chest,
Like a hermit, beautifully retracted into an oil slick,
And I have written this for her,
Who in my dreams has eyes and lips of matching
Gun-metal blue; she stands like a wingless herald
Beneath the troubled sepia skies,
But I've already told you
This in another poem.

Another Way To Believe In Thus

I get these words while you were dreaming,
And then the sun doesn't have to come up over the Elbows:
and here we are by the same places anyways—
And if Mexico awakens: while then, there she is,
Into a million possibilities of all of her haunts—
And she isn't feeling so certain,
As this I her death right, and her song has been sung,
And her angels have been flown—all over the armpits
Which were the right places for us to live
Or to remain anyways—and so the accordions
Of our jungles fill—And yet we don't get anything done—
According to our junk- - or the detritus of our Most beautiful hemispheres—
While then we happen straight into the happenstances
Of our hallways—and the jubilees filibuster:
And this seems to be the double "b" trust between us,
And then all of us fills—AND the world, all of us fills in—
Prettiest pictures at the nuptials—and another year
Dissolved into her shoulders—
Another way to believe in this-

Robert Rorabeck

Antique Haircut

Filthy lies are unstoppable from
The holes in my flesh,
The decanters of weevils turning around
Like the striped sign in a barber's shop-
My sister is an angel they hung in
The store window, brilliant snow,
And when they take her down she will Be just as beautiful-
I almost forgot who I was, when I remembered I was lost, another
Car leaking gas from the bullet holes
Stolen in the blushing hibiscus-
The viaducts of dentists dissecting my childhood,
Like an amputee I take my childhood with me,
And down into the easement of mostly teal
Gentlemen we refuse to look,
As we catch sooty brook with our cane poles
In the easy greenness of the afternoon's veil,
Where the earth is still crumbling like the Crust of a blueberry pie.

Robert Rorabeck

Any Aspects Of Your Eyes

Struggling into the whispers of the night—
Pretending to remember the rocking horse of
The merry go round that brought us joy—
That you would not ride, as your children
Were at home,
As your husband was just outside putting a new Trim on the car—
Until the horizon turned red and, yawning the Grin of a yellow cat,
Somehow leapt down and partook in your
Grin as well—really only a smile,
Like a promise of springtime and butterflies
Across you laconic exterior—
And now you are not around forever—
It is as if I have lost the soul of my little sister—
Somehow you disappeared from These bedrooms
Where the mechanisms still move, steal jointed
Through the lush foliage whose tourisms
No longer hold any aspects of your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Anything Close To A Lie

When you don't see me, I love you:
And I have been with you so many times you don't Remember or many other lives
In the incestual high waterfalls of the high Andes:
And it is hardly ever enough,
While the white people make love, while you make love
To,
To your other brown man, as short as I am tall:
And I guess he satisfies you fully in your bedroom without Any other dreams:
And I am sorry that I am scarred, or that that cannot do
The many other things for you that you want:
For example, I can only ride the bull for an unlucky seven Seconds,
And I am not the father of your children, or maybe
I am not even here,
But maybe I will live forever even while I am not Even home:
And maybe now you will live forever, Alma: and you will Become the homeless fairytale for so many Pilots who will leave this place, licking you on their lips,
And the solstices turn for the other Christmases of dog years,
While I felt the contours of your ear like a car,
And never once had to turn away for fear that all of my Loves you's were anything close to a lie.

Robert Rorabeck

Aphrodisiac Hypoluxo

I missed you on the elevator;
But I was wrong, I wasn't really there-
I was sitting in the sidelines getting older,
Waiting for it to snow;
Witches fly like imperfections in the eye
Of a hurricane;
I thought I saw you there, and in my Grandmother's last smile,
But I wasn't really looking.
People get to know each other in their cars:
It is the fastest way known to anything,
Or by watching cartoons on Saturday morning.
What is yours? Hold on, we're almost there;
But mostly in their cars, parked on the wrong
Side of movies; and the leading man takes you
Like Count Dracula, a stone cold bride swooned beneath
The alders and the high camelback of the dark overpass.
Oh my god, would you look at his eyes;
Those are really something, and
There is a store of syrup in your neck,
But his fangs are as good as the Spear of Longinus;
The silly straws of a rattle snake?
I wouldn't know,
I called your name out the door, but it wasn't
Your name. I opened the door thinking it was your Car, but it didn't have the new you smell,
And it drove away with me hostage inside, and only me.
People get to know each other in their cars,
But who am I to know. Now all the weather is falling,
The trees are fast undressing, and it looks like Sherbet snow;
But this isn't even your boulevard,
You don't even drive around this town and the lights
Are brilliantly cold and I just go on and on....

Robert Rorabeck

Apiary I Can Never Have

Unicorns under her feet and this is how
It plays out in the penny ante labyrinths that she fears:
The trucks build their shoulders
As her children grow up numbered to the nameless heavens—
While I have thought of her to the ghostly playgrounds
Underneath the overpasses as to all of the heavens—
She goes to her carnivals once a year,
But she becomes less and less amused, eating grasshoppers
When she cans—and filling up the lapses in her
Amusements with the echoes of my barks—
Who was once a pretty muse in the amusements of my Disenchanted biceps—where is she going now—
Reciprocating once again with the clouded hemispheres—
Her amber skin as rich as an orchard at the moment of Closing time—And nothing else is real—
The sun returns to the earth as I remember my grave—
Maybe now she will lay beside him forever echoing—
The carnival filled with the overabundant sweets lactating from An apiary I can never have.

Robert Rorabeck

Apiary Of My Heavens

I cannot befriend you, as if I were some Token to a wolf,
Even though we live around each others houses,
And the world is filled with Such familiar
Stuff:
The rains have stopped that we both felt:
Sometimes the same raindrops might have fallen
On either of your houses,
While your mother Rosa's rabbits have long since Disappeared,
As you are surrounded by your beautiful sisters
And your beautiful children
The way a stewardess feels surrounded by Such passengers approaching the apex of Her flight:
Even though she is sober, she must feel up to Her bosoms in libations,
The heavens laughing and multiply like starfish
Over your honey-skin, Alma:
For there you are dancing, a goddess in the zoetrope
Of the orchards outside of my window,
An apiary of my heavens on the other side of my world.

Robert Rorabeck

Appomattox

In bed with the early morning shadows bleeding the night into another killing where glorious colors like afterbirth flows in nebular jets into the horizon's bowl, revealed, I have the presentiment that my life will fail, and rising against my Northern dreams, I secede against their human impulse of hope, and the cities inside me scream,
"You will never have her. She will never love you! " and through me a million men suddenly charge into battle, slamming into each other like tectonic plates mounting inside my body; after a few bloody seconds there is a fissure running through my forehead and over 650,000 of them fall dead, and my deep southern thoughts fall down like sweat to the oppression of my continuing hope for her; many of the confederates are hanged, the remainder forced to sign their lives away in indentured servitude in the back of my mouth, never to be spoken out loud; and so I go to sleep in the North, victorious, the day beginning its bloom in the low cut bodice of a harlot, my last words being, "She will be mine. She will love me."

Robert Rorabeck

Arizona Lullaby

Again, the hollow night is knocking against
My fiery eyes: This sun does strange things to the earth,
As it sinks- No one escapes the depths of the night,
After all the sun is just a sliver of glass in the west
Cutting between the pine bows and my tired though insouciant wings-

The dogs are with me as we begin to sink in unison.
The little one howls, the big one yawns, and I ask them
If they can smell her in the distant perfume over the lazy hills:
Her eyes, her eyes like moonlight in a dream's pool
When nothing exists in the mirror but art,
And I cannot really say who she is, but my primary sadness,
The constant of the dirge, and the well which maintains Words in me-

When night is fallen and she is asleep, or as the day is yawning
The drooling dawn, and I am asleep in an Arizona lullaby of Hooves crunching in the last of winter's crinoline,
With my ancestors up on the hill swaying not a lick,
Remaining the constant puzzles of the livings furtive pulse;
I search for her in the cool valley, in the lines of shadows
Beneath the quiet cliffs, and only the footsteps speak before
The fiery motes awakenings, and when I stop to listen
If she is my predator or my prey,
Then there is not another sound at all
But for the knelling of the day,

And the postures of arrowheads like fiery directions which Once tasted the hunted ribs,
And if one should slide into her like a growing pain in The middle of an exam, then my eyes should linger upon the Eastern plains and tear, because I imagine all I am
Is but her untouchable wound.

Robert Rorabeck

Arseny Tarkovsky

The mad-eyed bloom of the Fiery Russian poet
Incinerated by eternity's fist
And fed to toy-sized sharks in the Oversized aquarium
Of the studio apartment
Where the old-style yellow
Phone sits voiceless,
Without fingerprints for Evidence—
Yet, by shivering moonlight and Vodka on the lonely lips
On some 21st century kid
In the pale-horse light
And singular footsteps of
The hallway,
A reborn poet can test the Depths, a bee-sized phoenix
Coming reformed for a few Minutes,
Inches of hand-signals from the Clock,
To be published in the middle of the Sea
In the calm eye of an Apoplectic hurricane
Which fortunately dies before
The drunken scientists can think up a name.

Robert Rorabeck

As An Empty Highschool

Oh, I've looked at you from your window again:
Like a still life jogging by the fire hydrant:
That you never left the boys from that university:
Never got scarred into married lives:
Bosomy, as brown as an eternal flame, a lighthouse making its Tips off the sailors it brings in,
Dragging them over the bones and pompadours of the Cenotaphs of seahorses and conquistadors;
Until they can smell the boudoirs of you and yours sisters orchards:
And they make believe that they are dancing
Under the homeopathic gravity of the stars: they make believe
That they are well, and that you are already home,
Your bicycle sleeping nose first into a bouquet of grass;
And I am feeling myself in the darkness, the world spinning
Like a knowledge filled fruit falling down to sleep beneath
Her mother, anyways: the thinker vacant as an Empty high school, the philosopher never even entering that town.

Robert Rorabeck

As Far As Moving Pictures Go

There you are underneath that grave in the Middle of the shadows where I saw you undressed
And every dog sweated
And the heavens unclothes and the great men
Shed their tears like fireworks,
And the lizards panted and the cicadas took off
Their skins,
And it all became some kind of busied metamorphosis-
As if it was all a plan for September,
And the canoes of lovers passed the sunken fields
And saw so many pretty sights that even I didn't see
As far as moving pictures go
But it lasted for a little while, but after that I do not know.

Robert Rorabeck

As His Expressions

Pale are the feathers the sun plants
In the everglades—everyday he goes over her
Fawning:
First hunting over houses as a soothsayer
And afterwards, unimpressed and losing his Dignity,
He forgets how to say the things the School of heaven thought to Teach him—
And he goes down on her like a child
For a million miles—
Each wave of the sea a rolling pearl around
Her neck—
And she laughs and smiles a last warmth
Burying his love with the nocturnal perfumes
Her true lover the moon steals
As his expressions.

Robert Rorabeck

As I Dream

I'm passing through my day on a blue bed sheet:
I can hear the birds and I'm directly underneath the Flight plans for airplanes leaping across
Palm Beach:
The vegetation is resilient green cutlery but all the rest
Is a jungle in concrete:
And I dream of a girl so brown and so sweet:
That she torments me, so brown and so sweet,
Soft little fingers the spindles of drift wooding teak,
Eyes as dark and strong as the coffee of a Sober dream,
While the cars move and the workmen tussle
Building up higher the hustle and bustle;
But it is only for her that I dream:
I dream for Alma as I dream.

Robert Rorabeck

As If A Lion

Downed in the pantheon like Christians making
Love to lions,
Something triumphant as it dies into a bigger universe,
The headlights of cars,
Mismanaged into the many shops of songless birds:
All of it equated by the strange ribbons
Garlanding her wrists in the bathtub:
The gifts of peasants- the atrocities of garish airplanes
Trying to circumnavigate the Christmas tree:
The misspellings of my soul
Who has to awaken again and get up to work tomorrow
In a world that doesn't know how
To receive- a father flying up to his son who Burns him like a forest fire of lighthouses-
The exfoliations of many legged angels upon the barks of Cypress until we get down to here:
Until we get down to the bosom of nature, and sing to her Throat like a hidden fountain we drink from:
With the foxes, and the silent turtles:
Debased in a soul of forest fires: this Alma from Mexico,
Trying to cross and re-cross the borders,
The fronteras teaming with the mismanaged jungles of Serpents and fireworks- like chickens and dead
Bodies telling jokes across the railroad tracks,
Smiling at the flea markets of cerulean madness:
Just to sojourn into her castle perilous,
To sleep on her roof housing the brownness of her perfection,
Until she awakens again,
Forgetting us like a dream of a healed scar- and the sun
Rises, and leaps as if a lion in its perfections of flames.

Robert Rorabeck

As If I Was

Light falling through a keyhole as a voice
That echoes of the airplanes it has passed—
Under the skirts of stewardesses that I imagine smell like roses—
Falling down through the highest bivouacs—
And across where the boy scouts have fallen to Their deaths:
Corpses in the green crops where the elk
Have shed their antlers—
Pick them up and it is like the sound of Katydids brushing against the bare naked mountains,
Or another ululation for the plagiarists—
Giving up all of their disingenuous gifts as if that Was all there was to give.

Robert Rorabeck

As If You Were A Pilot

Pitiful, yellow, and untrustworthy- but buried in the Ground, you bloom like the best parts of your Youth,
And the tiniest uncertainties of the earth flock over
To investigate you-
Brown eyed poet in the earth, buried as if in your little Mine- Knowing words a hundred years before
My own heartbeat,
So many words like currents that the river can take-
Beaming in the shadows:
Are you holding your breath, waiting to be resurrected
In new colors?
Can you tell me anything about my wife, as the traffic
Excretes over your chartreuse shoulder blades-
There isn't anything that hasn't been done to you-
Your teeth are a pick for an angel's harp,
And that is your hotel that the prostitutes and stewardesses
Cry over, bosomy, lactating alcoholically,
Anointing you as if you were a pilot, as you have Touched them.

Robert Rorabeck

As It Did To Me

The hedges crawl up further around the stewardesses,
Like unruly rinds around their ankles,
While my parents were kicked out of your fruiteria today,
Alma- and tomorrow I might be without a job:
I might never even see you again, while I listen to the sleeping Angels who pass carelessly above me like the purring of Airplanes- they pass above me,
And today we jogged and ate together and played like instruments
In a stove:
Like golden instruments- like diamond instruments,
Like instruments who by themselves defeated the unjust kings and Laid down to kiss and play and otherwise be by themselves
In the gardens which they sang- in an enamored melody which I truly believe meant as much to you as it did to me.

Robert Rorabeck

As Long As The Early Part Of The Century

When the moon lit up it
Swung around the apartments,
Seven times
Looking at the boys and the girls—
It was mad since it had stolen the light
From the muse who didn't love him—
Stolen the light given to the Bosom of the waves,
To the girls upon the merry-go-rounds,
As the deer fed themselves in the Pussy-willows,
And the grasshoppers fled off from Leaf to leaf,
Missing the bare, tanned legs of the Indians they used to have running among Them—
As the Earth spun and spun
Like a wild pony trying to give itself to A blue lion it found itself in love with,
But who refused to wake up
For just about any one—
As the blue eyes of just one angel bled
And bled through the sky,
And last as long as the early part of The century—
And for a while after the beautiful
Automobiles began to awaken and purr.

Robert Rorabeck

As She Comes To Me

I read my novel when no one writes to me,
And I go to sleep when there is nothing left to complain
About. I dream that my father doesn't sell fireworks;
I dream that he is an ornithologist in an irrigated desert,
With marble benches and low gravity to increase
The longevity of hummingbirds- What lies!
What lies I tell my uncle as he ploughs beneath the Corn silo, while little nieces laugh between the rows
Of raspberries, which, like costume jewelry will be
Their heirlooms: I think if I saw Rimbaud reincarnated
In college, I would not hesitate to turn his chin up beneath
The ceiling fan, and kiss him reverently, the breathing gold
Cups beneath both of his eyes filling up with clever tears:
Oh, what are the sad things the knitting circle brings to Gossip on: The manifestos of alluvial plains in the Salinas Valley: Steinbeck as a boy on a red pony,
And the tender please of innocuous driveways curling up Through the rich insouciance to the gentle knuckles of an Older lover. What lies! Now in a week, beautiful women
Will be dressing up for Halloween, and after midnight test in
The tight grips of a lover, and there should be rain,
But she has nothing else to say to me, and so very few Costumes to choose from, that when I go to sleep it will Be very easy for me to recognize her as she comes to me.

Robert Rorabeck

As Something Else You Cannot Have

Bullying on the grass with the gnats,
And the bees:
Words that bask in splendor sticking to your Scabby knees;
And you never read the words for you anymore:
Not anymore, Alma:
While I study over simplified Spanish in my House all alone:
The aircondition a place for you, the airplanes of
In the sky as if children running to an from School;
But your words are on their lips for you-
In the aloe the faeries play, as my mother kneels in the Carport:
And even the most slender of rabbits has a soul:
Its Alma, running and leaping through the junkyards of Pornography, as through my childhood,
As something else you cannot have, which I would so
Eagerly have given over to you.

Robert Rorabeck

As The Housewives Caught Their Own Rides

A Disney World—Flatulent—
Buzzing flies all blue and glossy underneath
Where the airplanes fly—
Where the tarps flap, something grotesquely opulent—
I haven't drunken in years: now make believe
Dolls are in the morgue,
Crying—beautifully silent, breathless—
Filled with a thousand bonfires extinguished
And upon their shelves,
Pestilent—the sororities I'd left behind all of them
Making love beside their graveyards
In the houses they could never own—
Lights flashing off and on—
Placing themselves in harm's way and the lands
Flooding elegantly as the housewives caught their own Rides home.

Robert Rorabeck

As The Lighthouse Closed Its Eyes

Now you have here a blue Cadillac without any Angels in the carport like a
Grotto,
And your mother is here, barefooted and still very Young,
On the other side of where your muse now lives:
So if she was still living there,
We could, together, envelop her in an ellipse,
As she considers her two children
Who mean more to her than any of this:
Than any of these promises of romances sent to Her in bouquets of red wheelbarrows
Cultivated from her gardens of forest fires
Where she seems to live alone,
Her deities hung with fishing line and hooks
From the palmettos and cypress:
Paper angels and piñatas- and I just wanted to Say that I loved her one last time,
As she drifted from me like the sea from a defeated
Fort, as the lighthouse closed its eye,
And all of the tourists went inside to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

As The Waves Took Breath In The Tide

It snows in the coquina forts,
And the fox roots wither like tourists in their Shorts:
But what about the glassblowers in their Hypnotizing art,
To which the chickens are attentive, and the Heathenish flames flicker and dart;
As you lay down your finite body, and its infinite
Soul,
Down across the brown slim tresses of your world
Quite literally across the railroad tracks;
And I don't want anymore dreams after you:
I told you that I would kill myself for you, and that Was real:
And the switchblades glisten over the foreclosed
Hives,
As the otters dunk into their homes,
And the stewardesses leap like nursery times, at least
Two or three times,
As I say your name and extinguish all of my wishes;
As I have blow your hair out my window as we drove Next to the sea to whom I compared you to,
Gasping like another fish to your soul,
Or singing like a drowning butterfly you name
To a laughable star: Alma, Alma, Alma,
As the waves took breathe in the tide; as, heedlessly,
The wives collectively came inside.

Robert Rorabeck

As The Windmills And The Heavens Turn

Pageants of their blood
Sleeping like crickets in the sun;
Upon any day as new as this,
Colors of her flag flowing
After midnight and
Fireworks,
Tadpoles waiting for metamorphosis
In the tidelands of her hair;
And now I have something Else to believe,
As we all go sleeping into the Beds of the promises;
The day laborers, and the Wiving loves:
The donkey carrying its savior and
Its gods,
As the windmills and the heavens turn.

Robert Rorabeck

As Useless To Believe

Will you still be with your man in
The summer of the fever of your unrequited wedding—
Will I still have to slide down the banister of your Church and into a graveyard—
While my wife talks drunkenly on the phone to Another relative in China—
And the other fashionable existences have to believe
That the sun is coming up tomorrow—
And you have new men either in the bull pen or
Up your sleeve—
And it is new years—and the bottle rockets that We've sent up the mountain can just lie there and Never have to come down
The mountain to see this side of heaven or Anything else that is just as useless to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

As You Do

Hard noses of airplanes sticking out their Proboscis above the clouds where the giants go snoring or Taking their gifts
Of blond headed fairytales who eventually become their Fables, if not their housewives:
When all I wanted was a kiss from you, Alma:
When all I wanted was for your brown sense to turn my way
With the same admiration I show you
All day long in the fruit market my poor, poor uncle owns:
And look at my good luck,
As if angels knew my name, as you reciprocate:
And the heat of your body sends out its waves as you do:
As you do.

Robert Rorabeck

As Your Lips Are Red

Tossed away from this, you have made a sport of
My soul,
Even as angels, weeping, take picnic and
Pieta on my shoulders:
But they are borrowing bicycles and have stolen
Little boys,
And the clouds ink my cheek bones
Like the poisonous snakes there at the races to Bite their lips at the ankles of Race horses:
And another holiday is approaching:
Some other holiday, while I will take an airplane
Like a rain cloud to some other muse,
Even as I am becoming terribly,
Terribly lost- even after I should have already Drunken myself into whispers underneath
The chicken legs of the house of the witch-
As the young boys are still playing basketball and Football,
And some venal muse is still serving drinks in
The armpit of Florida:
Well, my words swell out the doorways of middle-class
Cathedrals and travel down the perpetual hill:
My dog still sleeps at the feet of my body-
It is a tomb in the stacks of rain clouds and purple
Bowling alleys,
As your lips are red or they are brown-
And these are the words of an anonymous wreck as it
Is going down.

Robert Rorabeck

Assertions Of Torpidity

If I stare at you too long,
You may be mistaken that I want something,
But even though you represent a beautiful
Object going nowhere with a busy background
Of traffic,
I am only waiting like you, for things to come
My way and then depart;
Or maybe you are waiting for the bus?
Or on your mother, or the ice-cream truck?
Did I tell you I'm attempting to finish my Fourth novel this year? It should be my last,
For I don't want to seem intolerably desperate,
Though its quite easy as long as you shouldn't Be bothered with publication,
Or that I saw my dog drool on a swarthy
Caterpillar, which sounds vaguely romantic, but Turns out to be rather gross, like most Acts when they get down to the nitty-gritty.
Are you like me, preferring tomboys to bimbos,
And find it rather sad when flushed women graduate
From one to the next, and then on to grandmothers?
But now the sun is slipping upon us as if we Were displayed under glass in a museum, and Even the insects are torpid and crawl upon your Neck like tiny cerulean motes, or tree frogs,
And their insouciance of farts and quiver chirps
Accentuate how callous is your beauty,
And immutable your heart, such baggage of Chastity you take with you standing in the Middle of nowhere, disproving such philosophers
Who assert that movement is a possibility.

Robert Rorabeck

At The Very End Of My Dog's Life

I should be writing novels about you:
You, you who never read, who's done nothing to Help me stop doing this.
All you've kissed is my neck, and by doing so
Made it the most cherished portion of my body,
Do it so again and it will spontaneously become a goblet for Spilling cheap fortified wines
For the hobos in my castanet way up in Michigan;
Catch me with your feral dew filled eyes,
Collect me and make my body a corrugated runway
For the arguments of your evolved necessities-
How in bodies by and by we look the same as our Contingent of species, but how sometimes I might suppose for Your soul to flutter vibrantly a long ways down different
Multidisciplinary pathways- all the way back to the hidden
Greenness's of my forests- where you might settle down
Anywhere, but be assured of your protection- Oh, there,
I would misspell my love for you in so many different ways;
And you would pretend not to care, but you would listen,
Restive to my rhymes ringing pedantic but not truly instructional;
And we could go back further to where our mothers bathed
The very waters of the mountains' tears,
Or I could drive straight for you void of introspection through
The vast monotone of our continent, catch you unawares
And let myself become a vase for your nebulous politeness,
Let you serve me and tip you well, and then disappear into
The educated night, pissing like a dog in that Florida University,
Dreaming of you despotic but wisely, never seeing you again
Except maybe at the very end of my dog's life,
A wayward latchkey to the masters I no longer believe in,
The gravestones then very ready and presumptive.

Robert Rorabeck

Automobile Explosion

Don't worry- I will do
Circles around you from Far away, and crash and burn
Somewhere where it wont interrupt your dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

Away, Away

Your lines are the fleeting Clips
That you try to advertise,
Rounds for the rosy gun
To sell more than your adversaries
Across the street,
Those little things you say,
Syllabic stings you pin in her chest,
From miles and miles away
To compete,
You sell yourself in the dreamer's
Marketplace,
Knowing though that you
Can never reach her,
Even if you learned the travels of Light.
For there she is already hung
Upon him,
Her eyes already half asleep
Against his arms for all
These nights you've tried shouting
To her,
Spent yourself in her mouth.
No matter what you say,
Your lips splattered with blood,
Those things that die on midnight roads
To be eaten by granite vultures in ovens of sunlight
Before a single soul drives by,
The bloom of roses in a deep forest,
Speaking to no one the gifts you would hand
Over to her,
The vowels of wild flowers dewing on
The velveteen fields, nourishment for newborn feelings
Arises bravely from their hiding places
To be collected by a ship of sunlight
Disembarking across the daylight's sea,
The communications of matter through space,
Your whisper to dock soft and restive
Through the sheltered bay of her eardrums;

But her body is too far away to feel this tide,
Though you might explode to communicate,
She can't hear what you say, and like the earth
With the moon, she ignores the pull of your gravity,
For her universe is always expanding
Away,
Away.

Robert Rorabeck

Baby

If we were all Angelina
Jolie, and Brad Pitt,
We'd just spend all day fvcking,
But it would be the way Susie's
Palms slap puddles;
I mean, real shallow,
Tabloid weather, like two Nuns mucking

Baby, you must understand
The pain is yours,
The scars the evidence that you are Here, and let them pass by you
In a victorious cavalcade,

Let them win in court,
And give them all the room they need
To go home to better structures
Stepping gently through the purple
Lilies and burping frogs,
Into the portico where they will Watch t.v. And have sex,

Baby, I will be yours until the sun
Falls into the sky; Baby, I will be yours
Until my echoes swim in the sea,

And in the atoms of waves the theory
Is proven, an entire metropolis of shrunken
Men, cuckolded and brought there on the Stem of a dandelion spore....

These are some ideas I have for books,
And a gothic romance where I help Snow White
Escape Disney World;
She laughed at my writing, until the werewolf
Leapt up and took her like a cat takes a mouse
And did away with her behind the couch,

When I went to Hollywood
I never left my truck until all together I was Arrested,
Spent all my quarters at the arcade, graduated in lesser faints,
And took her hand and lapped her taint,
But eventually, she took to being what I ain't,

But, baby,
Look at this place, where the land rolls out
To where you've never been, the jobs roiling on Endless sea,
John Wayne laughing as a cloud,
Fred Astaire pirouetting on the bow of our Ship,

Baby, we are all broken,
Incapable men, and under the moon the eels
Are black and migratory,
And I should never touch your salt, but Give into you the throb of my story,
My pain, and the prodigious scars,
I open up to you and smile
Like the sun on the day that it dies.

Robert Rorabeck

Baby Blue Behind

Diana is the goddess of the hunt and in her
Lunch truck, talking all the time on the phone, she has Amble beauty:
She magnetizes the earth, and she has tried on the baby blue
Lingerie I bought for her, because she wanted me to
For her birthday;
This weekend will be my birthday, and all I want to do is take
Her and her daughter to the zoo,
To touch the same animals all at once, to feel the same existence:
To make the mermaids jealous in their topless pools,
And to look at my aunt's derelict car parked in the irresponsible
Forest in which a careless cigarette has already started a cheerless
Fire;
And if we can find some swings that are high enough for the playgrounds
Of Diana's body,
We can pretend to fly in the censer's arc: with her daughter,
We all can be glorious waves over the graveyard, and we can laugh
While the traffic checks us out,
And all the boys and all the men there swear that they have seen a goddess
Swimming over them on their drive home,
Something they can search forever for afterwards but never find,
When it was only Diana humoring me on my birthday,
Though ever after even I know she will be almost impossible to find,
The common reason for our male truancies, swinging with
A baby blue behind.

Robert Rorabeck

Baby-Doll

Hey, baby-doll: Tomorrow will be Saturday: and it will Be Saturday's sunshine that shines her way across the canal:
Kids I don't like anymore will light off fireworks across the Canal—
Kids that were always will be too good for me, will take Down stewardesses from the midway rooms of the afternoon sky
And stick them to the roofs of their mouths like Sacraments for Easter: see what they have found in their Eternally suburban rooms: they think that they know so much—
But everything they pretend to know disappears before
It blooms—their fireworks are duds—
Their minnows never metamorphosis—and their greatest loves
Vanish in the evaporations of their unexpected ballrooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Bachelors And Howling Dogs

These are the painful errors reflected from my face,
As if I had been in a knife fight instead
Of going to prom, and bled in the swimming pool
Where my luxurious sisters had planned to swim,
And I am left injured in a mirror where my friends
Have been cutting coke,
But feel so bad about it, they make me promise to Keep it a secret, but I am so far out here,
Down past the bustling rapids of cars, where the Waters begin to pool into the everglades,
Where they burn sugarcane
In the celibate shadows where the caged lions pace,
Where not even games of baseball intrude,
That there is not a soul to tell, swimming in the higher
Clefts of palm trees, skipping like flat stones of sunlight
Along the underbelly of aeroplanes;
Thus, I thought my disease could be an aphrodisiac,
Like a trilling call, which would thus enunciate myself to her,
The way a grandmother may sometimes fall in love with A young musician,
But she is too busy pouring the liquors of preoccupations,
To listen to a drunken demiurge, the first desire of a greasy
Teenager to become a god of the fallow classrooms,
To write love letters on the chalkboard as if a universal answer
To the indescribable equations,
But she has a real artist cutting her hair and Walking her dogs, buying her ice-cream dripping in sweaty
Cherries down at the parlor- a groupie of the pretty boys
And their polygamy, thus I remain the scarred and chased,
Dreaming of the weedy paths first brushed by Conquistadors,
And the house I might have one day in the humid island of Bachelors and their howling dogs.

Robert Rorabeck

Bachelor's Row

Look stranger
The women now are moving
Over the stations of the cross,
Like moonlight on silver,
Like an assassin's blade, like
The stinging barb of the wasp.
To the east they dropp the fags
Into the sea,
A funeral pyre for the man
They just lost,
They cross themselves and sigh
And kiss their novel knight under
The cherubic harems of the old,
And his whispered lies crawl up and cry,
Pollinate the conjured wind with a
Banishing storm,
The wet strength she finds suites her
In the city of the brand-name heart:
They F— and fart, laugh and smoke,
And piss and defecate over those Murdered bones of yesterday's business card
All rolled up in a bed that
Has been thoroughly washed,
After he was kicked out.....
They found that his scent did not Smell right,
So they sent him down the road,
When all they really needed was something
Unexpected, the stranger unloading
His bags at the door and spending
The night to move on into a different estuary;
They keep him for a year or two,
Sniff his armpits
And say that this is one c-ck they might Not marry.
I pretend to love her and her end,
The tail of the addictive fiend
The lubrication of my tongue skating around
Her ring and

The way her eyes strut unafraid through
Her gardening of men,
As she waters and tends to them by
Her various plots;
But I do not love her, my vindictive spot,
But only need her to unload,
The posy from my spindled wand,
That expanding mollusk which smells her
End like the rich earth where our children
Lay buried in waiting,
But I will not be defeated by her,
And her nature the nether wind:
She will move on as fast as she can,
Because her life is in the two weeks
Of an insect's vacation:
She cannot sin, because she does not love.
To love is to understand,
And that is not a part of her receptive plan:
She is the lioness in heat on the savannah,
Moving on from one King's Harem to the next,
The ugly Lisa waiting for her second place:
She only worries that her crotch is Waxed and shaved thoroughly at Both ends.
In the end she hits the spot
And cries his name in pretend.
Sometimes she gets it right,
And sometimes she calls out the tag
Of some john she has not so long ago
Sent packing down to Bachelor's row.

Robert Rorabeck

Back In Mexico

Birds lying low in the scars after fireworks
Waiting to make love to other birds
As the serpents approach through the doorway
Of flaming swords, as I was thrown out of Her gardens in the trailer parks at the edge of The orange fields- as my muse makes love
Tonight to her husband in a bedroom beside
Her parents, and beside her sisters:
They make love as quietly as they can, as They made love back in Mexico- they will continue
Carrying on as they can,
As the waves will recede with the moonlight that Has not her own face- as she is pulled to him,
Like an echo lost from my lips,
Like a warmth shed of my body, as the trucks
Pearl into the darkness - deaf and blind creatures
Sleep as they are awakened

Robert Rorabeck

Back Into The Graves

It pains me to say this,
But I am done: a morgue of ancestors- a morgue of Come,
And words that fill up the pockets of a superfluous midway:
And pretty verbs who sell themselves throughout the day-
And pretty things:
And things that linger through the green tatters of a
Anyways:
While bodies in the shallow waters pray-
And take account of themselves: these same shapes casting their Shadows equally,
Unperturbed- luxuriating in their vessels anyways,
Riding their bicycles across the blood vessels of their forts:
While the cenotaphs lay spreading arms
In the waves: and the conquistadors muscle- and the children
Return to their graves-
And she wears her gold again, while the mockingbirds
Proclaim to the old recording over the supplanted swing sets,
While the flea markets make love over the waves:
And Alma turns her conscience away: fleeting like a song bird
Who doesn't get paid:
And the night warms its perfumes of off colored sacrifices
Telling of their bemusements straight away-
And right again back into the graves.

Robert Rorabeck

Back Into The Sea

Here is the washing machine, turning around
With the sun going across the street-
About like a pinwheel on a journey- rum on my Lips,
Failing into the night, like the death of songbirds
Into the mine:
Singing with their bones that their muse has gone
Back to her husband,
And they will never be up to seeing her again-
And all that is preposterous will just Float over the earth,
Never having to touch the earth- breathing like a
Jellyfish up there,
Imperfect, while the insects make love and die
So many times within the long and beaten
Necks of the aloes-
And the housewives make their usual sacrifices in the Carports besides the toads and rebar-
Either with the sun coming down,
Or the rain- a kidnapper patrolling the street
While the kittens inspect the rattlesnake in The ditch;
And in the back yard, there is one perfect orange
That will emolliate before anyone will ever see,
And the pilot, while daydreaming of
The finest stewardess, will crash once again
Back into the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Back To Work

I love you in your whispers,
And the fact that you have a hard time breathing;
I only look good in select shadows,
But I only want to be your flag bearer:
I want to stand outside your tent and listen to the coital
Trumpets of your and your fellows heat,
The elephants right next to me,
The mountains above;
Because if we aren't going to go right now and Conquer the world then you are not realizing your Full potential,
While the airplanes fly so close above,
And I get back to work.

Robert Rorabeck

Back To Work On Monday

By sweetened virtue I start out, dashing as the cavalier

Knight:

The butterflies cut from the paper from the womb of a

Beautiful girl's diary:

And I read her out under the sun, as I wait for the bank robbers

To drive by:

This night is pillaged by lucky horses, while I have never

Been by Sarah's grave,

Or my grandfather's grave, but I know that my one good grandmother

Is buried atop the hill underneath the welded cross at the northern

End of the summit of the Springerville Cemetery:

Sharon, she is buried just above her little house, across the churches

And the swings that I have articulated back and forth on the Other side of her;

And you never even saw or knew her body's warmth, Sharon:

Sharon: but your body is still sparking like a wish culled from

A cloudy day:

And I wonder what is was that made you choose the man you love;

And if I had just one wish rubbed from the gilded belly of a genie,

Then Sharon, that wish would be for you love,

But I still have to go back to work on Monday.

Robert Rorabeck

Back Up Against The Breathless Rosebushes God Knows Where

It feels good to finally settle down in a lawn chair
After a long day,
With a harmless green snake wrapped around my Sweaty leg,
Everyone gone and done calling me sir for the day:
I guess it's better than nothing;
If they could only imagine who I were,
What a star thug I am out amidst the slash pines
Watching the steady unperceivable line of traffic trying Forever to disprove Zeno;
Proving him every time,
Just as the swing set arcs like the day,
And the housewives come in sweet smoky parade,
Like legged censers, homeopathic crosses tucked into Their salty bosom;
And with the lights turned out, and Romero away buying
More beer,
I can be assured that I am the handsomest man in the Darkness,
And no one is playing golf; and no one is losing their Virginity
On the back nine, or in the front row:
And though the ingénues are as seamlessly pretty as they Are unfaithful, there are none around for miles to disprove
Me;
And I don't think of them, anyways: How barmaids so Easily disproved me, unrequitedly disproved me:
And I am the cotton mouth captain of toy boats, and I work
Next door to the sleep otter,
And I don't have to prove anything to no one: I am just Another creature in the zoo,
And all the proof I need is in a sommelier alive and well
Back up against the breathless rosebushes god knows where.

Robert Rorabeck

Bad Luck

Searching for the right words tonight,
By the television,
By the campfire- The coyotes up to their Sleep-walking tricks,
And me up to my own too,
Like tawny black boys out in the sugar cane,
Smoking Cubans,
Waiting for her ankle - Trying to find her out,
To spy on through the knot hole in the fence
As she shampoos in something early,

To drink this prescribed auburn liquor and say a sad testimonial to my Grandfather, but I wasn't there:
My sister was there and her new husband
So free of scars and unnecessary words resulting from,
And somewhere in the country they are playing a night
Game, and the boys are randy and they stink of the Worm.

But swing the bat, Johnny.
The dirty ball's arc over swing sets and trailer parks-
The scabby coyotes moon long-tongue through
The green copper-fields

Johnny and his cool gang running around half naked on the dusty diamond;
And the teeth are yellow when once they used to be Beautiful, and their cars used to be beautiful,
And my words;
Or my dreams used to be beautiful,
And I could turn off the radio when I was driving past
World famous amusements and listen to my dreams sweat in that Darling humidity, because I was going up to meet her,
Because I had a chance,
But I blew it- The same old tragedy, the knife in the ice-chest
Beside the fluting copper eel;

And I could cry tonight underneath the bleachers looking up

The skirt of the universe,
That it is beautiful and see how I try to polish a dictionary
To mirror its perfect scars,
But I am neither a debutant nor sommelier:
I don't know how to taste without swallowing:
Afflicted by loneliness, my Existence lies further out than anything you could possibly Imagine,
The aphorisms of the ostracized middle class,

And I can only give it little impossible sacrifices that no one Cares about:

I can resurrect my childhood and stand with it on the easement
Skipping concealed shadows down into the canal,
And spit slang at blue gills and alligators,
And put black cats in the creases to see how fast I can throw
The awful luck,
What I have made of myself across the teal bodies of Torpids slumber to disappear around the knees of the pines
And red holly on the other side,
To say, why am I here if I can't share my sorrow with my Loneliness,

When even those two don't know each other it's Going to be a strange weekend,

And what I have will never be looked for to be found,
But in the morning the novel spit of dew,
The dripping fags surveyed by cerulean dragon flies,
And red blistering of industrious fire-ant mounds,
The repopulations of great cities overnight through the Suburban jungle,
Who never think to look up at the greater thing and say
Now what is this,
Even as this shadow falls upon them like a monolithic body
Floating festooned through the dislocated movements
Of the ever present void.

Baking Your Cakes

Baking your cakes,
Your crocks of clay in Colorado:
Can't I come?
It was where my mother was born.
In golden.
In aspen- She looks like Colorado,
Her hair silver, not gray:
A black woman came in and talked her up
For hours,
Because this black woman thought or hoped
Or figured that she Looked like my mother,
Or wanted to look like her according to all the Daytime talk shows and game shows
And soap operas
She spent her life on:
And I don't blame her. My mother is A very beautiful person;
And she is very simple, and loyal:
But it is you who I am thinking of,
With your raven hair
And mascara and your daylong job:
Better suited for the evil though beautiful witch,
You still have more friends than I've Ever had,
But I find it hard to believe that you even care
How many friends you have,
Or how beautiful if Venal you are,
Though if there was a single black woman in the Town you live in,
High up in that stony cleavage who'd been Fed off the very same licorice stuff,
I'm sure she would talk on and on with you
For hours just the same.

Ballad Of Ecstatic Truth

The days feel good coming home with no darker
Thoughts sunning in the grass- just the opal palms of feminine
Flesh testily over crackling wheat,
Farmers of spikenard and cormorants unwieldy in their Turns, sell their poetic stock for a saccharine carnival;
And all throughout the night it yearns very sophomoric but Upright, pacaderms of gears trying to throw off little gallant Men- Girls with hidden sores and holes for snakes and Hummingbirds- The true feelers of the world always branching
Outwards, always reflecting in like gaunt and garish faces
Rippling down into the wash basin's porcelain;
And right about now, as my feet go stomping by on those roads
Of sparking time, realizing how the beautiful lies spend off more Perfume than an entire pyramid of dry good truths- I would sell every Button, every leathered soul to forget the delusion of memories
Myself extols to swing up there with the forgetful menagerie
Bought by the high mountain's vacillating fruits, guarded by
The irreverent farmers, now insouciant and rhymed-eyed,
Clapping together all across the stone-gemmed waves, a
Ballad of ecstatic truth.

Ballroom

Two abreast in the morning tombs:
Two abreast like pallbearers
While my dog sleeps beside me
And my belly widens:
Engravings of the tabernacle, of a hot
Lunch on a holiday:
As angels braid their hair and put in
For a touch of an adolescent
Whore, plastic barrettes,
And in the secret society of their wings,
Reach down and pick up the tortoises
To kiss,
Or other strange young men beside
The pestilent canal
Or other waterways that are not so
Pestilent:
But, oh, how I loved her beside the Green rivers of a romantic
Way- or just as much so beside a
Bowling alley:
But I will remain here tomorrow,
Advertising in my sadness,
And doing a rain dance with my broken
Body, until the green swans fly,
And the tadpoles swim into other
Ballrooms,
Dancing a metamorphosis of forever,
Or at least until the not so heavenly sky makes way.

Barefooted Through The Grass

My life is as insignificant as a grasshopper hatched
On your shoulder
Blades,
And you could crush me with your freckles,
Or you could gently blow me off
And have me seated beside you in time for Breakfast;
But that is how little of life I am in comparison,
While you kiln your bowls and ferment your orchards,
And all of that given to your Sweet daughter from the mouth of your breasts;
And you could be so generous,
And I could be your lucky friend and give you tips of Apple-orchard wisdom,
If you set me down beside you
And sometimes French-kissed by spider-webbed wings.
I wouldn't imagine or mind that there Wasn't any special holidays for that:
Just take me up with you when you jogged.
Or set me up on the dash of your car when you
Wanted to get somewhere fast,
As the river walked.
Your husband wouldn't even care,
Because I still must be the most insignificant of things,
Like the wisdom of a kite lost to some Kindergarten,
While the beach is so needy and populated by Underaged tourists gotten lost from older fieldtrips;
It would save me entirely
To be baptized beside you in those little pools,
And who is he to care to know
The homeopathic taboo I wish to choreograph in An acre of a centipede pinioned
Along your ruddy clefts
Just as wholesomely as a snake running along
Barefooted through the grass.

Barking Dogs And Crying Children

This is the manuscript lost in the woods:
Peter Pan before the head hits the pillow—
Woebegone thought tossed to a wave,
And then the night proceeds
To lose little boys into it—
Visions in procession—
Cuckolded husbands and spotted dear,
Forts defended by fireworks
And deranged soldiers—
Zoetrope of ancestors turning into a zoo
While the night is out,
And the ocean calls down the moon—
Places that are lost,
Kidnapped children—
Teachers believing in what they've taught
To no one, while the rain extends—
Hobos vanish with unicorns,
Housewives make peace with their loneliness,
And the poet panhandles for a crackerjack
Prize—what these lines are good for,
What they can be used as—
While she makes love to him,
Technicolor prisms lost to the blindness of
The night—
Words of love over-spoken by barking dogs
And crying children.

Barking The Thunder

Those things were once beautiful
When they were young and holding hands.
Now they are speared at the sides
And give little struggles
Though it is never in the direction
They once laid down towards.
And far, far above
The sun still burns, like a lantern
Keeping watch in the loft of a barn
Where a blonde angel sleeps out of the Rain in the place where inhabited lovers once joined.
Here, her quiet light lingers
Wavering like incandescent waves
Of the desire now smoldering over muted
Flesh, the pearlescent avenues curious
Fingers strolled for hours upon
And lips pressed furtively searching for A definite meaning. Now her sea-curved Limbs only wear the bucolic lingerie of Her surroundings, like a virginless grotto
Painted without meaning,
The landscape of a lonely plot.
Wings clipped and darkened,
She searches for a deity as chaos
Swirls blacker, barking the thunder.

Barren Room

I shall never feel her body's rush
the long slow pain she has inside her it is no longer for me
she is now the strange vegetation
the distant pornography again the lady on the street that goes down the way without brushing me
she no longer yearns for my body's heat
she left the furnace unlit naked she goes out of my house into the snow to die or find another she does not care which only that she is through with me
before she started she is the startling ice on the lake
she is the fog on the mountains gone before I awake her heart is ethereal on another man's plate her eyes hiss for him her body is a heat mirage for him when I have gone onto the frost pasture to follow her she has gone down to him and the wind has covered up for her leaving me to stagger lost, orphaned to the night and the loneliness,

my barren room

Basking In Her Pollens Of Her Wake

Holdouts who are so finely implored
Pullulating like moths up in the ancient gutters-
I could have sworn this was the right way to
Her fancy,
The pitter-patter employed in layers to see how Much she drinks,
The pills and constabularies she keeps so rich
On the nightstand by her bedside at midnight;
And if I could take her hand,
And have her to agree that I should be able to Drink her liquors,
Then all of this squalor should burn away so that I would become the full-bodied rehabbed gentlemen
On the cover of the magazine;
And through a bit of hard won faith and osteopathy
Rise her from the sheets and take a few practice
Runs following the trade winds of the ceiling fan,
And then off to jubilee, past all the hollow secrets
Of the hearted oak trees,
Past the silently drifting cars, and all the squash-
Past the tennis courts of teal and drooling lawyers too-
Going past the bits of absent murder,
We would never leave the cool anterooms beneath the Deeper atmosphere, for that should be our zone,
Slowing imbibing until we understood the full exegesis,
And learned to do a good job without even broomsticks;
I could kill her alcoholic father if she wanted,
And then we'd just skate through canopies, selling
Sparklers on the fence;
And when it finally came time for her to fully change,
I'd sit out on watch and masturbate over the sheer delight of Her chrysalis;
And when she'd had her time and forgotten me, I'd let Her float straight off through the next archway,
Basking in her pollens of her wake.

Robert Rorabeck

Basking In The Heartless Urbane

Monsoon season,
So when comes the rain:
The forest is dying,
Its lost its brain: and 13 people
Read my poems today,
But they didn't say anything-
They just shrugged and showed me that
They their pockets were empty;
And they went right into the bookstore,
Weeping,
Because I told them that you were serving
Drinks right next door; and you were naked
And beautiful, and Catholic;
And they believed me- They said,
They would have tipped me for the experience,
But I didn't believe them;
And I parked where I wasn't supposed to,
And I had a fight after school,
But no one was hurt, because we both left off early
And made love on the swings- I swore
Afterwards never to get into a fight with a girly,
Especially my cousin,
Because her lips were beautiful, even though she was My cousin, or my second cousin-
And I am not good at baseball, and mathematics don't Mean a thing,
And I have to bike home early, because its supposed to Rain;
And I want to be Vachel Lindsay- I want to know what Its like to kiss Sarah Teasdale, to hang out around her
Cemetery smoking cigarettes, basking in the heartless urbane;
And I want to be Rupert Brooke; I want to be Arthur Rimbaud, but I still have both my legs;
And I have to get home early, because its supposed to rain,
But so far she holding out for a man with better promises,
And I haven't read a thing.

Bathing In Their Throats

Said something beautiful to the windmill
That lost its place
In the hapless orchestra disorganized upon
The hillside overlooking the sea-
Like place for you in my heart,
In a miniskirt and knocking on my door:
Seances of broken love
And noses-
While out in the coppering yards,
The ants continue to mound for their Queen, whoever she is,
And the monkeys play baseball into the Sunsets of Halloweens,
Where the witches fly, but jealous of
The stewardesses,
And the frogs bathing in their throats,
Washing their armpits illusively,
And still swearing one day they to be princes.

Robert Rorabeck

Baudelaire On Everest

Bivouacked in outer space,

You eat your own words
Just to stay alive.

Robert Rorabeck

Beaten In The Sun

Perfections that are not there,
Hunting through the backyards of High school girls
Metamorphosed into housewives
Who stay at home and drink all day
Beached upon the suburb's roads,
The twinkling tar beneath the Spinning wheels,
Prick your fingers on the Quarter acre field, the tracks of Land- Her eyes say it all,
The forgotten avenues of
The young jogging legs-
The embryos still within them,
Hibernating like bumblebees
In the rosy caves of seashells on The brink,
Their lips part now,
But they only subtract, take away,
They cannot feel what they say-
I'd like to think there was a time
When they could,
Naked in the storms off the eastern
Seas,
As I stepped nearer out from The pines and the junked cars
Shouting,
But this is a misrepresentation in
The stringing lights from day to day-
I have always been too far away
From the girls in their backyards,
Putting the glasses to their lips-
Their eyes glaze, until they go to Bed and wake up with their few men,
So I remain in the burry dunes
Beaten in the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Beatific White

What am I doing placing some words on the Beatific white again?
Trying to appear before beauty as something Similar,
A mote of sunlight on a cypress,
Seven ants weighing down a dying bee;
But these things I've tried to say slur with the Inebriation of a certain mind,
Like a child of snow waiting at the bus stop
Down the street from where the lions are caged,
As the mists are unfurling from the grasses,
Putting on their second form;
And all of it is beautiful, yes, beautiful,
But neither fully discovered nor understood.
The sea is beautiful too, but much deeper than
The excited tides of its flesh, pricked by the distant gentleman:
I've seen these things, and would like to become their aspect,
To draw down on the pages the lines I am able to remember,
And make love alone in the afternoon atop
The roof of the geometry class, while all my peers
Go on to the greater professions, being led with their blinders
On, but now there is only blindness, earth and sky,
And road kill on the concrete river between the disappearing jungle-
And that is how it must be, and nothing needs to be Said about it, and I am made lesser for saying so,
And lesser still for failing in brief interludes of free verse.
There is no service in the lonely existence of fateful prose,
The ego's doggerel, the famous gift of wiser men,
And the young Shakespeares already half asleep in their grottos'
Wombs;
If in failure, you fall further still, stand out like a red thief,
A stuttering performer, a griot who cannot remember the Stories of his ancestors,
Then it is indefinitely better to say nothing,
But to get up with it all and, silently, remain an aspect
Of the greater poetry left unwritten on the beatific white.

Robert Rorabeck

Beating Its Soul

From her body the brownness stems, youngish, quivering,
Dancing into the light of the yellow world,
Like sailors into a lighthouse,
Or snakes of smoke up from the lavishing ruins of Empty friends:
This pillar of my love transcends the opened hoods and doors
Of cars,
Or the laughing violets of my adversaries, the canary tourisms
Of the peppermint mines, the unicorns on the make:
A motherly reason who I have intruded and wish to tattoo like
A windmill into this flesh,
The perfumes of her overworked body she dismisses as anything
Sweet;
Her eyes open a jewelry store of disregard: she says everyday
That we will get married tomorrow: I dream of her like a cross
In an otherwise feral mind;
Her sisters mature her divinity by means of ripening sorority,
As I wish my body to pantomime the metamorphosis of Rain back again into the sky,
Into her body, heart gathering wings, beating its soul, its Alma.

Beauties Parade Through The Otherwise Lonesome Dreary

This is what some ladies who are doctors
Diagnose me with,
The unearthly desire of a heavenly kiss;
And I fail them every time,
As pretend arrows knock me off my broom-
Stick horses- It isn't getting better,
Fighting windmills as a matter of course-
Pretending I have x-ray vision,
I let the water overflow, so busy masticating
The bones of the surreal:
Even if I lost the contests of this earth,
I saw them all, the sorority in their beautiful
Girth, delinquent though Junoesque:
The waves could almost reach them, the spirits
Of the sea wished it so,
And it rained so hard that day, you couldn't Know: The alligators went on parade
And heroes started to show, dead comrades from
The easement with their dragon tooth-hoes;
I wanted to help each one up into bed,
Or lay them beside glistening middle-class pools
Where they would be easier staid,
But they got up themselves and went along their Way,
And the storm went on teary-eyed and dreary,
Each marbled nebulous flashing its proposed
Rings to their derrières; the complexions of the gods
Started signaling, hoping to enrapture their somnolence,
But they just went straight home after school,
As was their way, and talked long and insular to Their boyfriends of a better fairie- For so was the Way and nature of the beauties parade,
Strutting and busy through the otherwise
Lonesome dreary.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautiful And Lost Out Of Doors

My days are numbered while your eyes will Always stay brown and childish:
Paradoxically, your children will grow and say things of your Own,
And you will still not know how to swim, but maybe you
Will remember how I carried you into the sea and cradled you
Beneath the diademing airplanes:
And crooned for you just that day when we were both playing
Hooky off of work:
And the sun was both of ours, and it shown down on our Bodies, and the kind angels sang the goodest of news,
And we both admitted that we were both too nervous for our Interviews;
And you dabbed my lips, and I dabbed yours; and we Were both so free and ours, beautiful and lost out of doors.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautiful As Each Of Them

Peaceable sailors with candles in your beard,
How your eyes shimmer like drunken caminos to
The stars;
Every day you don't bath, another working girl
Falls in love with you,
And they crowd the docks so, like eager shoppers,
Like birds on a wire;
And the wind gets so salty licking off their sighing
Busts,
All of their backs to me and cracking farts as I lick
My lips like a starving dog and put my pen to anything slow
Enough to catch,
And write about their hourglasses while the shadows
Move and quiver like succulent steam off of each
And every wave,
And the clouds spindle, yes they spindle straight up to the Moon, pregnant like the thoughts off all these going women,
And they keep their senses pinned to the duck pond
In the east,
Where hurricanes stew: it is the biggest thing going,
And none of them scientists, they always wonder about their Hoary men,
Otherwise they would have figured out long ago,
Like I do, that the earth is as round and as beautiful as each
Of them.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautiful For A Minute

And you looked beautiful for a minute—
Now the minute is up,
The airplane as flown—
The fox has flown the coop—
The children have all gone home—
And penniless,
Diving to the recesses of the most Nocturnal of architectures,
I can only write yourself this way
Well after the nights and the nights
Of stolen bicycles—
And the moon seems to make sense,
Hanging from the chicken wire—
A mouthful for foxes—
As the excitable beauties, winged,
Make a noise through the pines.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautiful Playgrounds

Beautiful playgrounds, aren't your memories
Here in the ambushed bushes,
And the latchkeyed children are yet beside the Road—I cannot remember the rhymes
I've used to give to them,
And Arthur Rimbaud has been gone all week—
I still keep him smoking on my wall of My windowless compassions—
As I still pretend to be a talentless freak—
And I am here, dying—
My firstborn son will come this April,
And Shakespeare is immortal:
He has won the lottery, and I keep complaining
To all the prettiest princesses in Disney World
Who are too cold and unreal to listen—
The world is melting,
Soon it will be an ocean within a week—
The portables where they teach the windowless Children bend and creek—
Maybe my wife really loves me,
Maybe there are diamonds in the bed of the Crick—
But I know the busses will turn, and turn around
Tomorrow, and the love of my blinded muse
Has been gone all week.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautiful Silhouette Who Doesn'T Feel

Everything fails this way; it is all I'm doing,
Crying out to you in the bent censer of swings:
These trees, long armed, beseeching don't Care- The cherry of my cigarette an ashy searchlight-
The ghosts of little sisters on the merry go round,
The runaways sleeping upside down in their stolen car:
But I don't care to find them;
I am only looking for you, trying to perceive the flight
Of green eyed angels who can spread their capes like
Superman above the Nordic foliage and go anywhere:
And I am an old man, drunk on soul, who has been caring
For you for so long; since kindergarten when I saw your Eyes vacillating as I stole plastic bicycles from the paper
Pirate chest:
And your name is the sweet water that gives vampires tooth-
Aches,
And I love you, but you don't care- You are not here;
You are not even in the trees, but alone with your daughter
In the mountains, sharing your eyes with a bespoke dress
That turns you swiftly around, granting nobody wishes,
A beautiful silhouette who doesn't feel.

Robert Rorabeck

Beautifully Venomous Revival

Alma, the suns of liquor burn my throat:
I am wearied and undone, just an illusion now on the Deserts of my bachelor's domesticity:
Your elephants hang above my head across from Monet's sailboats,
And everything I have ever done has broken and turned To the cinders
Of a careless match in the once green mountains:
And pretty boys still go out to make love to anyone Even through the audacity of sudden and Violent rain,
But all by myself all I can think of is touching your brown
Skin,
Of squeezing it for a little while in my imperfect hands,
Of rolling you across the cotton caesuras of my bed;
And my desires of having my own wife and children
In a sea that only knows your eyes and senses:
That I love you through the concordance of this chaos of motion,
While all of the heavenly bodies spin and lose their heads,
And I keep settling down to the bottles of a fermenting metamorphosis, While the monarch butterfly or its imposter flew over my Shoulder today,
While I was just around the corner from where you attended
Your register,
Punching in the beautiful numbers before sending all the strangers
Outside the tents of your
Beautifully venomous revival.

Robert Rorabeck

Beauty Lies In His Troubled Dream

In the absence of lies lays beauty:
She is looking up at Midwestern sky,
Just a palette, unhemmed by the artist's verbiage:
No power lines distending from house,
No flickering news from windows,
Nor leaping of dogs from porch-
And she is not moving, but not to pose for him,
To let the temporary imprint of grasses thatch
Her bare shoulder-blades,
Her tan-lines fragile, exposed:
If he were there, he would say that wings
Could hatch out of bone, and she could float,
And that her lips were choking and black
From huckleberries, where she went naked
After bathing in the mellifluent river,
Because he liked her that way, and he paid her,
So he could say all these things
And she pretended not to know, lying down for him:
Now in those silences, she is:
The cornucopic space of empty sky,
Or the light of it through the loose quilt of branches:
She is, when the crickets come out
And the night steps out and darkens:
She is, the anticipation of another turn,
For a moment, she thinks she knows
The pungency of the sporadic earth clinging to her,
As the streetlights turn on like moon police,
And the last of the tardy children turn in:
Then she thinks she knows that she is this:
Alone, quiet, anticipatory in closing-
Quivering in the disbelief of freckled motes,
She almost sees herself extending in the fields,
But on the periphery he is there,
Carefully jotting her down with his eyes:
They are flickering the rapid succession of Unconscious romances in the park,
Because she is his troubled dream, and he is well asleep.

Because

You've got bruises on your body:
Like rain clouds in the sky,
The opal trunks of aspens
Quiver in the afternoon's sorrow:
The wild flowers are suppliant
About the dead oak
Halfway up the draw:
If you came to see me tomorrow,
And your nails were painted red:
It would not matter,
I could not love you, because
You've made me pass the time alone.
I still see you like ancestors
Rolling across the prairie
In the briars of the lightning storm,
But if you came to me tomorrow
And your lips were painted red
It would not matter,
I could not love you, because

Robert Rorabeck

Because All Of The Princes Have Gone

Beautiful as the nuisance of traffics along the Highways,
The scars of eagles drying like wet paint upon my Face-
And I remember that I was not here,
And that it was the legless words that ushered
Me upon their belly
To see something like my dead grandmother in Those weeds:
Hung out in the cathedrals of reptilian young,
The rains doing nothing to the fattened bellies of Their mothers,
As they cool alongside the hapless re bars of Car ports,
As the virgins sit atop of washing machines,
Listing in their gyre,
Waiting for the amphibian throats to flood and Sing that this is no good- no good,
Because all of the princes have gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Because I Have Yet Anything Else

I forget to feed my deserving adverbs:
I go through the drive-thru for breakfast,
And the Chicana who serves me, like a tiny
Bell-shaped flower, has indigo an inch deep Into her wrist; a perfunctory epitaph that
At night is perfumed and more or less naked.
I look like an old man to her: thirty-years old,
And gray, and proud of it, because I have a Publication in my backroom I cannot take her
To, and now the world is filled with sharpened
Ironies: And inside, it is easier to smile;
But I would rather be a poet; and I have dreams
Of resurrecting yellow dogs, in procedures
Which cost five grand, and when I wake up the Yellow dog is staring at me and whining, as if she Could smell that I had dreamt of her.
She licks my face in her fidelity, as I remain
A part of the unspoken fraternity who continues
To dream every other night of those fine girls from high-school;
And we should dream of them until we are old men,
Liquored into a room so quiet it roars like Niagara Falls, the yellow dog underneath the table with the Daisy patterned table-cloth, her moist black snout Twitching intelligently, like nerves on the temples of A genius. I did not share the poem I wrote before
This poem, because its lies were easily found out,
But I will put this one down as a public notice,
Like a wanted ad in the fading classifies, like a lost
Child's photograph stabled to a telephone pole,
Because what is has spoken of are the finite truths
Which deserve to appear for awhile in the empirical happenstance,
And because I have yet anything else to say.

Robert Rorabeck

Because It Was No Longer Any Holiday

It is happening right here, under the cockspurs of dreams:
All night long where the landed maids are going down into the Ghostly corals of my mother's rock gardens,
To sleep with the sleepless songbirds and the coral snakes;
And the moon turns as if dancing before the mirror
Of the minnow's sea;
And it all seemed to be quite beautiful to the conquistadors
In the sand dunes of missing kidnappers before exhaustion took Over and the blankets ate all of the army men;
And childhood slipped away through a forest of junked cars
And pornography: it became just as series of images happening in a Zoetrope in a house where only the cats dreamed,
The Christmas tree blinking in the Morris code of forest fires,
Until the shadows turned in under the sun, curling like aloe that Had already had its ecstasies,
And people returned to their hollow jobs, because it was no longer
Any holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

Because Of A Happiness

Or a day of rowboats out on the lake,
Seen through the beaded curtain:
A new day, bright as seeds- there was a whole
Room for her,
And the colors of flowers needing her
Fingerprints-
She almost felt she could be naked under the Sun, off from
School,
The mallards and swans swimming around
Her asking for things,
The brown pines like knights standing watch:
And she bathed
While around her was joy like footsteps
Their echoes
Entrancing the neighborhoods until they fell
Away-
And she swam, the sunlight milky upon her
Nipples like beads,
As we all watched her from the slats of Dragonflies; we could tell that she smiled
Because of a happiness.

Robert Rorabeck

Because Of Lightning

Angels sell prisms above the lunchroom
As the children argue for half an hour—and their thoughts
Wander in a tangle of strings: that night
The baseball or football game will be cut short
Because of lightning—
And the woman who runs naked through my heart,
Will get off of the horse she calls by my name,
Forever abandoning it to the outdoors and
To the amusement parks of others—
And she will walk indoors—
And have an easy time of it, with her children crawling across
Her brown skin—Then, by tomorrow, she can wake up
Any time she wants too—her cousin or someone else
Will already be cutting the grass—running the glass
Snaked and the metamorphosed princes to their borders—
And the mail will arrive—from the beaks of storks
Or evaporated from mail trucks—and she will Sit forever peaceful on the cinderblocks where she thrives—
Knowing—half-contended that she will never again
Receive another message from the very man who used to be
Who I am.

Robert Rorabeck

Because She Thought Of Me

At the window the pretty flowers
Underneath the airplanes:
It rained all evening, but she came to Me: and we made love,
We made love, we made love;
But she is back home again,
Though she promises very soon to be
With me,
And I think of her in the lion's mouth,
And I think of her in the sea:
Tossed through her wild nights
In which I rhyme for her-
In which I rhyme for her-
And she thinks of me: underneath the Ceiling fans of her slender room,
And the man there who has never Properly loved her;
She told me her father put a gun to
Her mother's head in Mexico,
But it will be alright- alright,
Because the stars are falling-
And I love her,
Jewel of honey- insect of nectar stings:
And she doesn't forget who I am,
Even as she meets her day faultlessly,
And my words come as the pretty happenstance
Of the garden she grew because she Thought of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Because The Angels Were Lost

Billygoats in the maelstroms of their youths
Think about crossing bridges:
They don't think about baseball games or Football games,
Or any kind of sort of that kind:
The tadpoles are beauty marks beneath their Cloven hooves,
And when they get to the middle of the bridge
While the alligators have been taking their Time thinking about laughing at them,
The old troll gets out of her slumber
And jumps like a purple soar to
The middle of that arc
And demands a toll- and demands a tax,
While the truants and the children of those Truants play in the shallows with the marbles
And the jaxs-
And the sorry old boys are lost out into the world,
Thumbing for rides, or panhandling on the Islands amidst the sea of cars-
And if you were me, or I were you, it might Be alright to rest for awhile and to take a trip
Indoors-
Because the angels were lost across the canal,
And now their wings were wetted, and their slips
Slipped:
Unfortunately, I think they must remain there
Forever, underneath the holy and the airplanes,
Kissing the riverbank like burned fireworks,
Because their beds had burned,
And their ships had shipped

Robert Rorabeck

Because They Never Give Up

Birds go somewhere in the night.
Because they are afraid of breaking their wings;
They disprove the river theory,
The way your eyes have been looking back and Forth between the boys,
So frenetically, or whatever that means;
As long as it is spelled correctly and all the lights are On,
And he has at least one good side.
The rest of it is numb and four limbed,
And you think that it can go on forever, like the sky is
The biggest organ around the earth,
Or either the biggest shroud,
And even now airplanes are failing or Touching down,
And either your palm foretells that you will live for A good many years,
Or you are already sleeping beneath the earth, inconspicuous
Beneath so many feet of sated tourists,
Because the as$holes never give up,
And yet because of you all of this is so beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

Because You Are Not Real

Rubber trees are shivering like stretchy men
Undecided as to where they will be going, waiting for The extinct show girls to blow in:
Girls on dynamite motor bikes their turn of the century
Engines caracoling, giving off into the atmosphere
The unreal power of mythical birds,
Each engine block a phoenix caught and held and Perpetually resurrected under her sweet as$.

It's just that I have nowhere else to go,
And thievery is so much more beautiful near the seashore,
Now why are you coming in swimmingly or up in the air-
Why don't you love me, if only because I am not
Of the flock of other men in your immediate vicinity,
Or it is because you are not real.

Robert Rorabeck

Become

It's time to leave now,
Before the last Christian dies,
The way I am dying; it's time
To take up all the few things I Know and walk away—Sylvia
Plath stuck her head in the oven
And turned it on, so I can do it.
I can't stay here with the last
Christian after the sun has died
And all the lights are turned out,
Still waiting for Jesus, still Believing. I have to work these Bones, because she never loved
Me, and I always was alone,
So I must move upon this earth
As the days grow hotter and
The tears run in floods, I must Go toward her and forsake
The ark, the forgotten
Goddess who hears my name
As the wind whispers through the Leaves of trees still high upon the Mountains. I must escape the cities
And find her there, alone, naked,
To make love one final time
To a truth no one else sees, there
I will disappear near the summit
Of the highest peak and become.

Robert Rorabeck

Become A Flower

If this cascade tumbles to where you
Hibernate, it will wash over you until your sleeping
Lips become a flower:
And when they yawn spring time,
I will carry my lunch to the valleys beneath you,
And partake in the sunlight pouring across
Your threshold,
And bask in the ecstasy every way that I can
With you
Looking down and yawn—
Carrying me in a basket of your meadows
As if I knew something about being a child
Of your heart

Robert Rorabeck

Becoming Just Another Beauty

They spend all day riding this song:
They go up through the low heavens, and give their Tender blood to
Freckle the shoulders of midday grandmothers-
As all of it is a ride
Singing through the midway's loneliness,
Because all too soon they will have to move along-
As the glass boats sing through
The orchids bleeding together- as I have tried
Holding your hand,
As you turn away and drive home through the Misanthropic shadows, becoming just another
Beauty I have more and more trouble
Believing in.

Robert Rorabeck

Becoming The Moon For My Daughter

I am married—married. Let Sunshine fall upon a waterfall,
And let the otters play in her cerulean bosom
That sometimes flashes like a spear
Coming from an orchard
And over the forts
And over the sea—Herald of the fountains
Calling all tourism, like Disney World,
That they should know
I am married—married—and the park is greener
And the little girls swing even higher:
Higher,
And if one should fall, and come out of her dreaming
And into my life—I will catch her
And call her daughter
And watch her eyes like pools with deeper pools,
Like wells that other things have dug
Shrinking and growing larger:
My child—epitome of a heavenly flower
To which I have become the moon,
And my wife the sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Beds Of Concrete

Her eyes the Deep deep aqueducts
The sunlight skated on Like water spiders
And beautiful couples
Never revealing
The murdered love
Down so very deep

The skeletons peeling
Inside
The rusting landrover
Flipped over against
The bed of concrete

Robert Rorabeck

Beds Of Forever Midnights

And once within a pleasant carnival
I lost my heart—
I gave it to her who was looking at Him—
As the fish had to swim and Swim
And swim—
All of the time in a glowing bowl—
In each thrashing vein of Each fleshy soul—
And above—metamorphosis—
The evaporating
Carnival—
Dancing in all of the secret
Spots and Grottos—
Emollition—
As fireworks kiss
The lips of
Kites—
And the stewardesses,
Ever leaping,
Fall down into the
Beds of forever midnights.

Robert Rorabeck

Bedtime Story

Here is a canvas I must destroy, for soon the lightning
Will be on the peak, and we will need to scramble down
Into our graveyard before we are struck by a juvenile deity
Who is angry we have been playing outside our gray rooms;
But before I go, I wish to leave this for you, where you are Just a glowing insect in the East, burnished by the waves who Leap up to greet your hips like happy pups.

Where the air is thin, I breathe for you, light my eyes like Kerosene so that they burn over you flickering like the scene
Of an early stage, where you perform your life like a bosomy
Role, far away in the inebriation of a pretty set: casually you Tromp across it, extending your lips and hips for the Patrons of your pinkish stores, the vertebrae silked in flesh
Which chimes when someone enters.

But now the storm is upon me, and the red devils are cracking
Their whips and flailing swords, and my house is an airy dream
In the small suburbia of a green yard, and your sailors are all
About you like flaxen tattooed waves, and oh how they attract you
Like a magnet on their staves. So, I must leap and tumble like
A nursery rhyme back into the trees, where the graves are sunken
In the lime, and virgins on their knees pray for me that I make it home in time.

Robert Rorabeck

Before All Of The Stores Are Closed

Around in the hairpins of another lonely fiasco:
Fingers moving toward what they will- like car doors and Unicorns,
Apple pies and the shadows of little girls on the windowsill
Underneath the maple trees and the American Flag:
And the journey of short cuts,
The little league fracas that don't get too far: the leaps on
The sojourns of green velvet fields just crenulated enough
To feel the warmth of skipping flight:
I wonder who they are going over to see, while the red holies
Grow, and the sun tattoos the blueness with its over eagerness
To get to her before all of the stores are closed.

Robert Rorabeck

Before Another Christmas Falls

Un wonderful in the night, each pine a silent lady—
Orphaned words beckoning me as I've run away
Beneath the swing-set—
If there was a joy in your lake of tears,
I could see all of the way to the bottom,
To the coral
And the mermaids—to the chandeliers of
The filthy rich—
But now my time comes in the weekend—
Your take off your brown skin to hang across
The runways of your lonely man's bed—
And you have bent to him in every way,
Taking the meanings of your silences as you can—
My face and soul a wreck for you,
Otters cracking legumes openly in my neighborhood
Where the birds fly west and south
West and south—
Going to see the virgins and the drug cartels—
Going to kiss your aunt's lips
And your sister's lips before another Christmas falls.

Robert Rorabeck

Before Christmas

Up in that calling where
You make new friends,
And I can still hear the neighbors complaining about—
After you have walked away—
Before Christmas
And another new year
With our baby crying outside,
And my wife lactating—
I haven't seen you after I've been to China,
And I wouldn't want to Even if I said so—
Tomorrow is your birthday,
And you are far away
Even if you are down the street—
And my little boy has some lungs,
And when his mind runs off into dreams
Without language—I cannot possibly imagine
Where he goes,
But I know he gets there—without even having to Think of you:
Places I haven't been to:
Fruit markets of moons, sleeping in jumbles
And heaps—the cars in cathartic stasis—
The wolves fallen amidst the nurseries,
Their long-snouted senses pollinated
By the night blooming jasmine
We once smelled together,
Hold hands,
As we both tried to walk away.

Robert Rorabeck

Before Going Back To Sleep

Killing myself like the overindulgence of flowers eventually Does to bees,
Drinking Guatemalan rum while the other and all too rich families
Go down to sleep in their downy wells,
I glance out of the windows of my mausoleum's shell,
And wonder what Alma believes as she dreams in her bright
Man's arms,
And her children, and her missing rabbits: She is all the proof in the World,
As the cars drive in the pinpricks of the rain,
As the children rush over to the flipping sides of the carnival:
But today I drew her a line in the dirt that she would not cross:
She is going to save herself instead of knowing a better and more
Lonely joy,
And the world slithers away across the imaginations of the desert,
And the genies wake up without any wishes,
And pet the fabulous though make believe horses in Ocala three Times before going back to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Before Her Uncountable Lair

I lick store brand rum from the hair on my Forearm; it is sickly sweet, but I must do it; and tomorrow
I will look at houses,
And I will think of some sweet thing or another,
Who I will beat my drum so softly for she can never hear,
Especially if she cannot read English;
And I will buy a house to live in alone while I still wait for her,
While she makes love to her more professional men,
Or her train robbers,
Giving her children guns so that they can learn early too,
While her matchbox of a house swings underneath the muddy
Bottoms of bamboo:
And I have written entire Bibles for her; I have resurrected
Strange words to press onto her body, and I have revisited old
Parks and thought of the places now emptied that I would Have liked to have swung with her;
And I am think of her even now, and destroying my most Precious materials into pumice, anonymous and Priceless,
Giving over all of my guts and escargot as if to a litter of hungry Puppies, calling the unhinged serpents away from their Hampers and wash basins,
Setting fire to even castles of army ants: all for her,
And sending up signal flares of roman candles, stopping traffic,
And showing her just where on my heart she need to barb her arrows;
And I am laying bare, hopeless and despondent,
A speck of a man before her uncountable lair.

Robert Rorabeck

Before I Disappear

The goldmines are filled with random flies,
And the evidence laid still in the prehistory of trees:
I keep writing her, from my sadness dripped into
The eclipse where the rain has drunken the excavation;
And this is nothing new, but now no one reads me,
And the world has moved on in a funny way;
She never thought that she should lose me: she never Thought of me at all, and now he is open in her lap
Like a new dictionary, even as I think of coming to her
By so many ways, now that I am drunk and so beautiful
As to steal her voice. She doesn't care. There is no way,
And the bicycle thieves ride away with their new finds,
The spokes of high-elements receding like a Mandela
Through the trees: I thought I should love her,
I thought I had the voice that would carry through the trees
And disturb her even while she was making love,
But now the rain has stooped the bows, and the evidence
Is fat and lucid that I only know so many words; where in People are driving expeditiously from their suppliant rendezvous;
I have nowhere to go, but already they are cheering, and making
No room for me to leave: There is a new sunrise happening upon Me, but what have I left to say, before I disappear?

Robert Rorabeck

Before It Has To Again Diminish

Even by myself, my body feels warm tonight for
I have drunken so much liquor by these thirsty lips,
Searching for a muse
Through the holy grounds of a bachelor's afterlife,
And even though all of it was a failure,
I have continued breathing tonight, and overcome by Your cloy spirits, I was possessed,
Like a girl in the first night of her sorority;
Or like a young mother experiencing the first night
Being tugged upon by a newborn,
Like the flag of a new country stuck to the wind,
Victorious knowing that it will be so long before it has to Again diminish.

Robert Rorabeck

Before Our Time

All calmed and cooled like classes that are Over and found to be insignificant as the loves I had before
Her,
In the daycares of third grade- all the waters on their backs
In the drainage canals cracking legumes;
All the teachers as hot as wax and then made to cool wherever They fall.
Not a deciduous tree to be found, and in my mind only the Eroticisms of substitute teachers,
Nothing truly scarred, the moon bleached of its patinas and Palls;
And I have only read Encyclopedia Brown, I haven't yet missed
You or follow the scent of your echoes down the halls:
Little patrols as vibrant as greeting cards; and the grass as Green as lavender bathing suits: and all the insects uniformly Green like lush young girls in preparatory school carrying their Books of slither and drool;
And the day starts out as a song; and then bullies blacken it a little
Around the robustness of its rind; but it is made even more beautiful,
Like a penumbra glistening on a coal pile in the deepest of winter,
Grandfather smoking a green forest;
And your eyes closed and soft as Easter brail, because
That was before your time.

Robert Rorabeck

Before She Could Fall In Love

She'll breast feed and we'll Finish off the bottle-
The world will tilt a little,
But nothing more than it does,
And we'll end up at the dead ends
With the signs that tell us so,
The weeds and smoked engines,
The working girls like slave fairy-tales,
Uncle Remus with his cane pole
Casting for blue gills;
She'll live in a blindingly rich house,
Attended by waves of light
That will do a dance from room to room
To the cadences of money reports
And the gurgling of richly milked fountains
Harrumphing off her teats,
Crenellating each mastiff areola the way
Minerals slobber down stalactites in the Still fertile Carlsbad Caverns,
Beautiful Venus flytraps of tourism off the Crisp highways of New Mexico;
And we'll end up somewhere further away
In the mountains of inebriate Navajo
Teeth aching from the poisons used to ferment
Our souls dreaming of that self-sustained woman
Glowing with the incandescence of a deep sea
Ballroom, always attended by the behemoths of Said grandeurs, having no need for the more
Airy sorority of heavens to which we sacrifice
So much infertile howls, and unconceived
Ululations drunk in midnight parks,
Station wagons crumpled softly into nearby trees,
Horns bleating while she fixes plates of Immaculate beef; Remembering the bleating of Such slaughter, her blood mixing in the creams,
How much material must we steal to fill up
The sinkholes of compromised limestone
To keep on the affluent palliation,
While we cry outdoors in rainy crèches of palmettos,

The first born ba$tarads who had her virginity
Only to be abandoned to the doorsteps of a feral
Church,
Wounded at the far corner of her neighborhood
Before she could fall in love with our first word.

Robert Rorabeck

Before She Touches Down

Sybil in her wreath of cones: I don't even know what
She is,
But I pray to her in the little square of jungle kitty-cornered
To the fire hydrant,
Where the infants sleep underneath the rubber bands of her
Swings,
When they are in the mood; and the slash pine colonnade
And gather the bed of hushed brown needles
Where there are no more lions, and from whose room all of The alligators have crawled back underneath the Ceiling fans of orchids
Turning with the pirouettes of their molestations;
And I collapse here, and grieve for her,
Removed for my bicycle, my feet the balderdash of Hyperventilating butterflies:
And the figures in the sky of a movie theatre revolving with
The reasons of a beloved silhouetted by the moon;
And I don't even know who she is, or how long it must be
Before she touches down.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Creeps' Parade

Before the party reaches climax
And suffocating home makers begin
The desperate groping
Through the adulterous treasure chest
Of their neighborhoods' keys,
Proving their eyes' covetous
Fetish for the flesh they see every day
Walking out into the muted sun
From chintzy front stoops so alike
That they sometimes forget
They are different people,
Fools' goldfish in the drunken tombs,

I cut my teeth on my wrist's open shell,
Realizing, like Sylvia Plath,
I am not new anymore/
I am not in her heart/
My cheek is scarred like a Great Poet
..... But not,
For the marble bust of her immortality
Is already taking up the Crawl space under her mother's stairs

Out under the open night
And I am not doing so well/
I cannot make up my mind,
As their laughter fulfills the wishes of their hearts.
Secluded and beaming, in great strides
They copulate
And fill up their shopping carts
With their religious beliefs and New children birthed under
The propitious neon signs....

And if they vanished?
And if they move away?
But it is okay, because this is mitosis,
And, decided, fixed, assured,
They are one and all.

What is broken can be fixed.
Insured, they can never die.
Socialized, they will live on....

They are the multiplicity
Of good capitalism/
If in a shattered mirror
See
Exponential suburbia

All the same
Subtle changes on the Surface of pleasure

If the economy is healthy
They will continue to grow

From the self-ostracized shadows
I watch them walk out into the cold blindness.
Already they are beginning to feel-up
Whoever is closest to them,
Their lips drunkenly cradling
Lusty sale-pitches. They will get into cars.
They will drive to homes which look so alike,
To wives and beds and rooms
So alike
That they cannot be blamed if they make
The small transgressions of their class' bliss.

I see her in them and I want to cry....
But she has already taken his name/
The great salesman, a man of her faith.
They bless the mezuzah on the threshold
And follow through.
Soon children will come and a larger house
With many guests their eyes will pass around,

But they will never see me again.
She will never say my name again.
Already she cannot recall the hour
I walked outside and lost my way
Pallid anemic hope of the lesser word.

Agnostic and fleeting,
I remain the juvenile scholar,
The half-assed philosopher eating fast-food,
Imagining the average woman naked
And versatile,
The greater lesser man with his dogs
And his traveling case,
A wanderer's identity slipping
From the show early
Before the creeps' parade.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Dust

Best to be alone in this
Listening to the jackdaws of a skull-ravaged
Thesaurus,
Thinking of no particular aunts,
Dreaming of touching delicates on rain drenched
Clothes lines,
Having trouble once again looking at one side of My face or the other,
Having trouble reciprocating with the sashays of Tides
At the prom,
Building toy cabins like frontier castles underneath
The ceiling vans
Vacillating like smutty hallucinations over the Come stains of
A vermilion carpet: gem-like beetles making another
Conquest through the house,
Six pillars standing out front like Mexican sisters
Who turned to look back.
Now there are Match-box cars in amidst the cenotaphs
Of pop-rockets,
And little girls who don't drive around here anymore,
Because they have all forgotten who they are-
And the sky is as colorless as a torn down movie theatre,
With all the beautiful people moving
On before the dust can burry them along.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Monstrous Cognoscente

Carried into the room
Outside the eyes lies all imperfection-
I should have never taken off my Hat to step outside,
For soon the dog had killed the cat
In the geological guts of the rock garden,
Though almost inchoate my father
Came home for Easter
Trailing behind him the sad hopes
Of the waves' Diaspora
And we siblings grew up failing
With the natural lips suckling
Nourishment from our fingertips:
Until we grew faintly anemic
To a downhill graveyard where
The new Cadillac's park
And the living suffer in the structure
Of the inevitably departing-

Standing up
With eyes closed I can see
The world I left.
The way she looked back in high school,
Untouched and nicely stratified.
When I lie down alone
In a bed nothing yet knows me in
I can almost return to the time
Before the monstrous cognoscente
Isolated in the gardening before the apex
The fluid sky hoping in a pin wheeling
Sea of yet optimistic comets swimming
Inside the unawakened consciousness
Where yet defined my fortunes continue
Breathing in the unmalleable
Cornucopias of inner possibility.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Mountain Begins To Cry

This is a wound that an arrow cannot cut:
This is a sleepless place basking amidst the hills:
Where the young wolves drink
Forever from the throats of starling foals:
And then they are gone
In the moaning sunshine, where the fences lay Down and naked,
And useless,
And the pools are so supple and shallow,
That you can dip half of your fingers
In and pull up a beautiful fish
Big enough for your lunch- and it is for awhile
A song,
And then into midnight it is a church,
With so many somber amusements and fallen trees
You have to step around:
And there is snow white in her glass coffin
Next to the spring my mother used to take me to
With the dogs; but you still have to figure
Out if you love me,
While the airplanes fill up the sky, as if
The wings of airplanes in a carnival of breathy
Gardens- as if incestual twins multiply
Perpetually,
And clouding over the final results that this doesn't
Have to be forever:
That just has to be in the print of this heartbeat
Before the mountain begins to cry.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Reaper Could Own Him

Do you realize even now, Kelly, that you are playing with The Grim Reaper:

This savage scythe who will pretend to never touch the Harvest of your legs until called upon,
But you have already awakened me; and if I am not beautiful,
I still come;

And I will eat your boat:

I will eat your canoe: I already know the way, and I write these Things.

And I meet the president and congratulate him and then they Put me on a coin but I don't care,
And now all of these things are in a zoo, and maybe they think they've Captured me but I don't care:

I am Houdini: I can set myself free, even if I don't know myself:
Even if your mother is a lesbian,

And there are all these free formed sharks in the sea:

I am not a beautiful man, Kelly;

But still you kissed me; but still I have this need to die:

Maybe I will awaken tomorrow and be the star suckling like a little Scar from Sharon's bosom,

And maybe I will be quieted for awhile, maybe I will be perfect for a Moment in which you cant hope to know me,

And then I will steal your sister away to Mars and make to love
Her and infect you brain with forgetfulness so that you
Fall deep in love with you husband again:

Deep, deep in love like Briar Rabbit in the thorns he always wished
To be thrown in before the reaper could own him, own him.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Resilient Gazes Which Never Move

If you put me here,
Then this is where I'll live;
And workout,
And shave- And hang my things out
To dry.
I will be the only ant in his new mound
Across the canal,
Whistling industrious
Where all the tattered things from your Brighter new homes are blown;
And I'll make crèches out of the loosened
Things you have forgotten,
Or misplaced purposefully over here,
And though there will be no swimming pool,
No ancillary bath to sing with those white
Birds who are exhausted from their Expensive habitats,
I will run my eyes with the minnows and Plasticine toy boats sunken all the way
On my side of the canal:
It is a funny thing,
That they have made it this far in their voyages
To me,
Like scraps from a dictionary nobody has read,
And the first star for me appears under My left eye,
But it isn't a star at all,
And I have come to realize that there isn't life
Anywhere else,
No matter what the scientists suppose,
And there isn't anywhere real at all except
For where you have misplaced me,
And it is a beautiful world the conquistadors never Awakened,
A song of the superior Chelonia basking in the Deadfall before the resilient gazes which never move.

Robert Rorabeck

Before The Zoetropes Of Cats

I like the sounds you make that I cannot hear,
I try to fathom your shadows like cats purring in the rain,
The pets who are not afraid and who are the queens of men:
And I have slept on your roof,
And skipped school to remember you, but the days do not Get any easier,
Like the hard worlds like cairns on the bare naked mountains
Who summits always seem to slip away out of view:
But A-, you are here, and I know there
Are paths leading up to you that I can find,
And sometimes I can still smell you in my house, and remember
The appropriate verses to call you down from the sky,
And away from that faithless lovemaking you must be making even Now in your house,
With your soul so far away from your body:
For she is here, looking over my shoulder,
And becoming my muse in this glow from the lights in the sky,
As the rain comes down through the street lights before the zoetropes
Of cats prowling and making love in the street.

Robert Rorabeck

Before They Can Even Take Care To Step Aside

Empty alone in paganistic band-rooms;
But you know there is something about that
Which is not right,
Like these words the way they fret for me
In banished playgrounds overlooking the Great lakes of catastrophe;
I should have bought a house, or told Diana
I loved her myself,
Sharon- but this is how it goes:
The people in wanton throws, picking up
Stray baseballs, the cats looking at them with Glassy eyes- I suppose that like Mexicans,
They can really speak English,
Or they know so many ways through the weeping
Mangroves;
And I have done so much of this,
But what about time- what about recognition
And blue ribbons: Now main street is muddy,
And walks with her legs. She is going to the candy
Store, Sharon- with her husband, with her children;
Or she is going bowling,
While the mountains drool with all that lightning,
And put bullet holes into horses before they can Even take care to step aside.

Robert Rorabeck

Before You Fly Away

Ubiquitous, salty women
Tremulous through the highway of souls:
Why do I keep on doing this
For you,
Sweeping out the theatre no one attends.
Then at night,
I can be either man or woman for you;
I can be an airplane running with my dogs free-flowing
Through the woods.
I have no occupation, but for your love,
For it gives me summits and lightning in clear
Blue vases of sky;
And, didn't you used to paint, long tongued-
Didn't you used to own the high school of fire-drills and Blonde boys, like me;
And I got drunk swilling ripple in bathrooms:
I could barely look at myself, but now I am almost Beautiful;
And how many hands did you need to count your Boyfriends, I don't know;
I got lost one holiday driving out to the airplane club,
Thinking I should like to leap nearer where you
Live,
Where the greater men keep you in their gilded nimbus;
And how many children you've had by them,
Growing on vines in drunken ennui,
I don't know- but would like to hold you in my hands for Awhile, and revel in your crests and sloughs,
And tell you the names of hypothetical children I would Like to have by you before you fly away.

Robert Rorabeck

Beginning To Make Love

Inkless, I expose myself-
I am just a shell pressed to your lips:
Drink my flesh,
Gnaw on my elbow I toss to you
Like a bright hinge where all is naked
And living in yesterday on the dry rented Lawn, in the deep aloe and the Chain-link fence where the Old neighbors are smoking and drinking
American beers distilled from
The smoke stacked refineries of Denver,
Letting the sun into them so they crinkle
Like a mouthful of raisins on old newspaper:
Let the waves caress you as you feed-
They would not be near enough to you,
Except that I am carrying them now with My one remaining arm,
And setting them at your feet:
Where they wash you as Mary washed
Jesus and anointed him with frankincense and myrrh
Eat, eat.
Your eyes are so beautiful,
I wish that they were pearls, but then
They would not be so precious: Naked,
You are the dawn, and clothing you become
The dusk-
And you are the best thing I've seen all day,
Even brighter than the budding hibiscus next to
The old door to the trailer driven down from the north
Where I once lived-
I can see you getting restless and touching yourself,
But do not go away where you think
You must be- He can wait,
Remain with me now,
Even if you feel that you must look towards him....
From here we can smell the sea past the darkness of The woods, and there is the failing light glinting
Off the small white skulls of forgotten animals
Across the canal that is made iridescent

With the purple perfumes of oil and refuge,
The air above it blotched by a persistent pallet of Gnat and mosquitoes:
Come closer now, and I will quiet these waves
Into a lull, and we can remain here and become the blur
Of shade, feel the day sliding off of us with Its worry and light which reveals
What one might own:
Now in the quiet, everything is yours:
I am yours and I have brought the dusk unto you,
And in the time of transient dreams
I wish to kiss you only this once and Never again
To bring on the crickets and the little lights,
As the clouds jumble the promises of rain,
And from the little house whose yard we're now in Comes the sounds of my parents
Beginning to make love.

Robert Rorabeck

Behind The School

Teeter-totters behind the school and stewardesses
In the sky:
Reckless drivers newly busted underground,
And beneath them, conquistadors whose patinas
Bleed into a bed of restless
Indians,
And the still grinning sabers of cats:
And above that the universe, bright and spinning like
A firework that is still going off
Over all of those highways going back and forth
Between two seas,
Who are making their own rounds, great washing
Machines
And carnival rides with so many fish-
With Jupiter and Saturn in matrimony above and
All of their uncountable satellites of frozen
Seas and volcanoes
Wedding guests- but no where between them
And us a unicorn-
The imaginary creature, like our love, like
A turtle without a shell cannot exist in this world
Where both you and I are both separate and Both real.

Robert Rorabeck

Believing

All open and epitaphs to graveyards,
And now all of the dead waiting open mouthed
For the sparrows to sing,
Brightly and presumptive out from the mines,
While all of the time
I tried to love you, while even my dog or fox
Left off to panting-
And all of the sparrows curfewed while I went to Kill your father or some other murdered,
And while all of the other bright numbers
Rubbed together and counted off to themselves;
And even though it was not even they who
Rubbed together and found new warmth in the boxcar:
And found new warmth altogether
Even though it was not that all the pretty birds sang together
In their bathing:
And even though it wasn't so that the thieves all together
Founding what it was that they were saving:
It was that the sky was so yellow that it was
So beyond believing, even as the buses turned around,
As the trumpets echoed through the newest baths of sky
Upon whatever it was that they were believing.

Robert Rorabeck

Believing In A Wife From Mexico

The song ends like this—don't you understand—
They don't open their lips again—
On their mascaraed of a parade, they go down into
The shrinking land,
Of mothers' lips and nursery rhymes—
Housewives in the nourishments of the feathers
Of their headdresses, go out into
Their front yards just so that they are observed by the Sun—the forever voyeur—
Or for at least as long as they live—
Climbing those higher than high daises—
Drunken on the spirits of the denouements of
The earth—as the littlest of people follow their own
Personifications,
As the kings light off their retarded fireworks—
And until it is just a jungle of anybody's worth—
Spirits that flit light palm fronds above the earth—
Come down as dying wishes over
A Mexican fair—
Languishing in the bereavements of traffic jams
In the everyday consternations of how life
Ever so happily brings you down.

Robert Rorabeck

Bell Jar Of My Current Inventions

Venal breath marks on the tears of windows.
New air-conditions which cough like sad gentlemen
On your cheeks and perfumed neck,
But you can never see what they look like, and you
Are just about to go outside to first take in the weather
And then go to work;
The cypress trees are hung over, and would that they Were filled with so many lost kites from little boys,
Like tiny little trinkets from the beach,
But they are not;
And this is your world, and it is not filled up with the Beautiful joys that you have never thought of,
That I think about every day, that I put there all the same,
Crowding in the amusement, trying to cover you up
With festive cereus even though I haven't beheld your Liar's frame in so many years,
To disavow who I am not to you, to smother a careless muse
In a bell jar of my current inventions.

Robert Rorabeck

Belladonna Charade

This fever is from alcohol;
And I can't spell-
I am no samurai-
I have no code of honor, no greater ideology
Than to sneak out after midnight and Kick my heels up on the swings;
And I wonder if alcohol makes me a lesser man,
Gives you a reason not to think of me;
Makes me gray:
Yes, I am dying- dying for you- dying for you
All alone, the spit of flower in the crook
Of the mountain's bosom higher up than
Your head- you will never see the spot
Where I die: I will die, and my color will fade,
And my belladonna charade will wilt-
Not even your sister will pick me up,
If I choose to move nearer her;
And it is all wrong.
The alligators fart in the silt- and I never buy
New clothes- I never go to Disney World,
But I love you,
And why that is, I suppose, is because I have a spot
In me which likes to migrate nearer the beautiful
Highway which has your eyes,
Which is so long and dangerous and never-ending
Which is the moral of the sad fable,
I suppose.

Robert Rorabeck

Bellefontaine

Midnight passes against me,
And Sara Teasdale sighs,
Her lips have touched the gloom again,
And the fairies of her eyes have dowsed their Wings under the blankets of a breathless poem,

And on the street it snows a mile
Wide, but for the first time the lamplights
Glow, the new inventions an epiphany,
And she is but a child again, in the Carriage slow,
And for once her soul should laugh
As it carries through the snow,

And though I should never look upon her
As her husband or lover so long before,
I might struggle into the ink-stained river which Poured from out her door,
And lips so red that they made a garden of roses pale,
And mind so sharp that it made a phalanx of legionaries
Seem dull,

Though her throat be sunk in a graveyard,
And her luxuries given to wanton's whim,
Her beauty is the endless ocean,
All lovers must baptize in.

Here she rests, I can see her now,
For her passions have blazed away the night,
And Chanticleer is crowing, and the thieves should Run in fright,
And though my eyes should close, and my body become
So calm,
I can still hear her singing to me the melodies of
Her sweet psalm.

A religion of a subtler grace, and a chorus
Which burns and sings like coals,
And as the winters harshness approaches,

Like waves leaping the hoary shoals,
To her singing I should cling to, like an affixed beam,
For there is the perfect avenue, the ever flowing stream.

Robert Rorabeck

Bellefontaine Neighbors

I beat the Lord at his own game,

I snuck into the graveyard before my shift,

Saw the pawns but I let them live;

I kissed Sarah amidst the awful tulips,

And my aunt applauded and swung her hips.

I proceeded him blindly down into my crypt,

Where he lets me live;

And above it rained and the shadows moved in

Fawning and jubilant, playing bare naked games,

Paddy-caking and hop scotching the red faced tenements;

Sometimes I might hear them whistling feral when the day is Particularly clear and the cemetery grass like follicles of

A bassoon's ear brings it to me;

And the Lord just stands there knowing

That all the old masters are dead, and the city is held up

By liquor and inanimate dreams, and murder;

And we are where we belong, just a little further down,
Under the quick-witted feet of ants, and the pullulations
Of the sweaty parade grounds;

And My Lord, what is he going to do about it?

Robert Rorabeck

Bellies Of Rattlesnakes

Proud filters of cowboys and Boyscouts moving the herds and mowing the yards,
Crushing scuppernongs into wine,
And watching the terrapin disappear, retracting their Senses into a mossy rouse,
The cormorants down the rows from them like mailboxes
At the hair lips of caesuras,
As the gladness of overeager foams- and the girls
Ride the ponies far back into the storage rooms of Orchards until they find each other kissing Themselves and spilling over the Variegated paper cuts that lay corrugated like nourishing
Crops upon which the fat and sated bellies of rattlesnakes
Make indistinguishable patterns,
As if the spilling of discarded foreskins or weathervanes
Through the anonymity of the loams.

Robert Rorabeck

Belonged

I've cried upon the rusting shoulder-blades
Of the airplanes that
Are not here—
Going back and forth—
All a glow in the statutory hallucinations
Of a bivouacked—soldiered all together
Of a dream
Of a murder—
Words whom are rolling off an inebriated tongue—
A million miles and
On top of mountains—
Going, or trying to go,
Like rose bushes where they should have Belonged-

Robert Rorabeck

Bending To The Lamplight

Going down the aisle into a fun world
Of rabbits in their favorite briars—recounting all of The words I know and reusing them every night—
The world a geode on my shoulders—
And in its prisms, turning around—the beautiful
Junk of flea markets—and my muses who live on
The other side of the canal—
Tortoise in the soft sand planting her roe—
My mother weeping in the cathedral, nowhere else
To go—airplanes in the sky never touching down—
A king bending to the lamplight to reveal his thorny crown.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath

What will they say about your children
After they've gotten onto the bus in the middle of A sad rainstorm,
And you've driven off to sleep in some other bed
Than your husbands,
When the dogs are crying over the cats they cannot
Steal,
And the cats are mewling beneath the clocks
For the boys to come and step down the hidden Corridors and down to the sea where
Some other maiden is waiting:
Some other maiden, as wonderful as the sea
Of a broken heart:
A woman who is not their mother- and she is not
You: they must take an airplane to reach her:
They must go over so many canals,
But eventually they will find her-
They will find her,
But then, they wonder, what they will do.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath All Of Us

You need to come home to me from the Offensive legions:
Because this dusk has no eyes, and no
Juliet—
The airplanes cannot see by this, words
Underneath an overpass—
The cars pass seemingly like roses collecting
To the sea—
Each one being thrown away into
The grief of those caesuras—like feral
Bosoms rising from the old phantoms—
Pantomimes of the storms
Trying to catch up to her, their hearts in
A lonely place trying to leap to breathe
From the city beneath the sea
Beneath all of us.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath My Trespassing Overpass

I like to run my fingers down your extra
Small ribs
When we were in bed together, when we weren't Suppose to be,
Just to feel the little thefts that you have Given me,
While your daughter slept her day away,
And your son burned things in the grass:
And your body moved so deep and brown, and moaning
Beneath my trespassing overpass.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Banking Snows

I told her,
"I'm the man who shot Jesse James."
She said,
"Poetry don't work on whores."
Her lips moved as little as a virgin's womb,
Early in the spring
In the young town
High in the furs before the snow.
The place doesn't exist any more.
She said,
"You cut the head off a snake,
You can eat it,
But never become
As friendly as pigs."
I told her,
"I have never seen such well shaped limbs."
She said,
"You can move into me now,
But go away before I give birth,
Because I don't want him
To know your name."
I had already killed my friends.
I said,
"Now in your bedroom,
The omens promised bad luck,
Which moated and dungeoned him."
Afterwards, I grew a beard
And walked away
Like a faded lance buried in the stream.
She grew into red dresses,
And hung around the child's eyes,
Though never thinking to search
Beneath the banking snows.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Clocks

What will they say about your children

And you've driven off to sleep in some other bed
Than your husbands,
When the dogs are crying over the cats they cannot
Steal,
And the cats are mewling beneath the clocks

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Footpaths Of The Mowed And Chiming Grass

Gunfighters and dancers not knowing who they Are,
And I kissed Alma inside of her car, while all of the graveyard
Waited,
And waited, because that is what we finally are:
Not giving a damn about the institutions of learning, or
Of the green bordellos,
And the colors of lovers who bleed like first graders practicing
Letters over the lines,
Spindling and sweating and making a mess:
What is left is the dimmest brightest things of us, who keep
In touch with the ghosts of stars:
And grow at the ends like glass blowing cenotaphs,
Who flute for the winds, and curl and succor and call
Out for seconds beneath the footpaths of the mowed and chiming
Grass.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Ground

The dog looked at me with eyes of Happy oysters,
While the road was too busy going both ways:
And the barmaid slung the alcohol
Across both her brown and brindled
Shoulders:
Where is she now? Where has she fallen to?
Like a geode kicked out of school—
Like an unrecognizable park between two Houses lost in the forest on the other side
Of the road—
The beavers build their dams between her
Breasts,
And the mountains weep their lactates
Beneath her eyes—
And comets are barrettes in her hair,
Speaking of the beautiful luxury bedding in Her future:
I can tell her nothing: when I step outside,
I vanish in the sunlight—
And the traffic vanishes both ways in its individuated
Crowds:
Going somewhere to games and churches—
Little boys hold on to their delusions at the bottom of The slope,
Like hypnotized chickens riding atop soft shelled
Turtles—the grave open to them at both ends—
Their ancestors in the amusements parks above the sky
And beneath the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Haunted Lights Of Man

Horrors of character can be ascribed to nature,
And if you are eaten by wolfs,
Know that they only do this to feed their young,
And it is neither cruel nor gluttonous;
And they might howl over your bones then like some Starry pale way post, and circle about in A feral ritual, as they transcend, and Pass down through such hoary valleys,
Where the dead float and whip like tattered flags of Destroyed and scattered armies.
For, after they are gone there is no more crying,
And the only movement is from what the wind does
Through the crooks of barren trees, that which is a Kind of an illusion, and overtime you should disappear
Entirely, spoken of no more by far away lovers,
As each wave bores into the earth, boring it through
A pinprick, as if a hole in an egg; until all these are perpetuated,
And woken up, and started over: and then the lights should Flicker, and the doors should open, and all kinds of man Made anew out of spittle and clay, and walking up from The earth, from the Appalachians, as from all parts,
Go down from the forest, and from the valley, into the locis
Of civilizations, and weddings, and into supermarkets to Buy those necessities which put more flesh onto the bone,
To fill in the hollows, the recesses, the valleys;
And gather together, forgetful, and indoors, paying no attention
To the vulpine patters, the hungry footsteps that go through Temporarily abandoned parking lots on four legs,
Quickly and under such godless lights,
Open mouthed and fanged, but speaking not, as the wind guides
Them beneath the haunted lights of Man.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Horses

Grasses sweating beneath horses
That are standing asleep the night in my father's Pasture
My son's grandparents having irrigated this day
On the other side of the planet:
Horses better known and Better loved than me
Beneath alligator oak on the verge of the Pasture,
Fat bellies painted by stolen moon light,
And about them dancing
Along the borders of the hill hides,
Pretending to crush the last of the misplaced
Arrowheads into diamonds,
Coyotes and elk
With minds constructed the same as Peach pits—
And I am but the boy drinking the bottle
His feet dangling at the end of the house
At the edge of all of this, somehow seeing a strange movement
Repeated,
Like a wild merry go round—
Like a card game in the hands of the elements.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Infinite Trees

A little bit of rum with my grape juice and I'm feeling fine: I am a child actor with
So many girlfriends,
And paper snowflakes falling on my death scene.
My grandmother smiles,
There are stars on the Aristotelian popcorn
Behind my ceiling fan,
Plastic stewardesses on my folded airplanes,
A cat purring in my lap, little brown bunnies in the forest of Cactus in mother's rock garden,
Cars on blocks chock full of nudie magazines;
And in the yard, isn't it Easter, and the snakes are Laying colored eggs:
Girls who just learned to walk with painted nails
Are going to get their photographs with Roman Polanski- Most important of all the it-girl
Is giving me falacio, trying to tell me the truth
But her mouth is full,
And I smile and pat her head- It feels as if I've eaten
A steak dinner, or written something very good,
And my soul is buzzing around its feeder, jumping out of A body too vibrant to understand,
And there are all these tourists who have left off the foot ball
Game to come and see me next door to the otters eating
Their clams off the naked breasts and abdomens of Housewives fresh from the mall,
All of us in a house so full that we know we should never Be alone, even as the ghosts sing with the throats of empty
Swings down the hillside out front of our trail her home
Beneath the infinite trees.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Moon

Bountiful rainbows of blue glass going home,
Traveling with their rucksacks across the schools,
Saying their prayers otherwise:
Baseball diamonds silhouetted in the skies,
The Pegasus's turning around,
Catching the wax from the sun that the light houses
Have been so studious for,
The waves pulverizing at their door; and my loves
Opened like letters before the sea,
Asking for love, but not asking me- They're bottles
Like cradles whose joys I have drunken,
Who sunburn in the yoke beaten by airplanes,
As the yellow slants through the stalks of green cathedrals,
And the little boys come, calling a hullabaloo,
While you can be seen but never touched through the Ethereal transoms of your bedroom,
Blushing and brown hooded like a cobra so deliberately
Charmed by another man,
That I can only use my rope tricks to go above your locked
Doors,
And there sleep like a mountainous cat above your bed,
Alma, and beneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Skies

Before days of empty pallets I toss these words like Stones,
In empty classrooms where the girls have gone:
The have gone to sun in the green and Alma's favorite color
With their preferred men,
And my world is left in the chicken yard to feed the ghosts,
Soft and blue, but whose colors our out of date,
Whose chances have faded too: but I remember them, like a Virgin grotto in her dark and far unremembered eyes:
These are the placed that you lived in when you were young, Alma,
When mother and father sang you asleep in arid adobe
Or wherever it was you made your home near the thirsty creaks,
While I colored on my desks all alone Alma:
And when I drove by your house tonight Alma you were not home,
But you told me during lunch today that I should be quiet,
Because I having nothing to lose, while you have everything:
Yes, you are as rich and as many as the wildflowers in the Spring,
And I want to worship you and suckle you in the private estuaries of Your shallowest of brown wells:
I want to paint your wish there spoken in the crepuscule of awakening Pantomimes,
Where the wooden boys can believe and become real;
Alma, Alma- you are all the gold in my eyes, and I come awakened and Moved, and I dance for you while the police put their colors
Like merry-go-rounds across the streets and beneath the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath The Traffic Of The Stars

Life is full of failures
In a sky of light
And the hangman runs
Through the classroom
While the housewives stay
At home weeping
Before the jewel eyes
Of an alligator
Looking from his palace
Beneath the traffic of the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Beneath Your Effluvious Floating

If I killed organs for you, and to slowly
Seep out of this country and make it past all the Round titted sphinxes,
Then would you consider me a warrior and unbutton
Your thorax:
You seem to be singing softly as pumice around the Juicy oranges,
Protecting your breakfast:
Cadmium and chartreuse as the rule of the tiniest of Deadliest serpents,
Spending your ankles in a cornfield silver feet off the Earth,
The sun is glorious; and they are all talking about you,
Given up into the lilacs of happy meals,
Overturned in the soft shells of crepuscule,
Or in the vestibule of the church of counterintuitive,
When at night you go to bed in your favorite nooks,
Like a song bird snoring:
You've never even read but a single word, and thus you can Go by happily over spilling,
Not knowing they were all written for you by the dictions
Of men who end up quite lesser beneath your effluvious floating.

Robert Rorabeck

Beside Another Man

All the night is unreal; it has snuck up all of a sudden
Again and is pedaling its nocturnal fruit:
Of course the ghosts are dancing, as if diademing over my lonely
Head,
As I am remembering all the few days spent with Alma,
Casting our souls like nets across the silent green exposures
Of the world that is numbed to my desires
So now I even wonder if she can even feel it: that it is so strange
And necessary;
And I have built up every which way I can to be with her,
Even though our house is perfect and sings with the uncanny unisons;
And it makes me a pitiful man, when I am alone:
When I am here trying to partition myself away into the art,
A genie in a bottle in the woods underneath the reindeer
Who move so beautiful,
Or they never move at all, while the cataracts fall behind them,
Delusions with the tears of poor grammar,
And she falls asleep beside another man who she says will not even Speak to her.

Robert Rorabeck

Beside Forever

Now the quiet intrudes on the silence:

Bodies lay as restive as hummingbirds who have stopped

Breathing:

All of your offspring are lying beside you just as most

Of them will lie beside you in the ground somewhere

Where the sky is weepy;

And your mother is downtown kissing a fiancé;

And the place you used to live is up in weeds and rattlesnakes;

This is just my poem to you, something I promised myself

Against:

This bad habit, because I am ugly, and I am afraid that you

Once kissed me and afterwards went away forever:

And I don't want you to read my poetry to you, because how

Can I take that back from you

When it will be and is even now someone else you will lie

Beside forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Beside The Brink

A joy in the sweeping shallows, in the emptied
And broken throats that once used to hold

And thus pronounce diamonds:
A store of loitering thoughts
And manticores and unicorns and
Other stolen though immortal things:

Cannot you hear me breathing now,
So close and so lost there beside your schoolyard—
Quilled from the beautiful accoutrements:

Inebriated besides the banks of your forbearers
While your beautiful thoughts go shimmering
Like misplaced coins and wishes
Beside the brink.-

Robert Rorabeck

Beside The Glade Of Vampires

In a little wood, beside the glade of Vampires,
And blue faeries, up turned, flaming
Their waterfalls
For weddings of the passersby—
There lies the woman who makes the hills,
Her thies the weave of caesuras—
The moon a child of her bossom,
With airplanes and jets in her weedy hair
For barretts.

Robert Rorabeck

Beside The Sea

What is the space underneath a swing set—
It seeming forever at leisure in the park beside the sea:
Underneath the sun in his days—
Becoming a fenced off illusion where the grass grows
Above the knees—
There was my childhood in no places good—
Finding a way of getting around her and climbing up her
To sit there like a bird in its nest,
Cradled in her arms, sucking upon her breast—
And now I drink liquor in some form of illusion—
Bizarre and orgasmic,
As other children come home weeping—where
Are their mothers,
Who have for so long forgotten them—
And I see them forever leaving from our places
Beside the sea—

Robert Rorabeck

Beth Law

They turned her into dust
Because they didn't believe
She could survive-
She was their first daughter,
Conceived before the Conservative renaissance,
But they had no faith
In her;
She could not live
Forever.
And it was cheaper to Bury her
Like a kitten,
Or an infant crocodile,
In a shoe box rather Than a coffin.

When she wakes up,
Like softly singing bees,
How will she tell them
What she knows....

Robert Rorabeck

Better And More Glorious Men

I'm going to a wedding in Colorado,
Taking the highway which snakes up the plateau,
While in the west first rise the Sangre de Cristos and Then the Front Range; there where all the dells
Are nestled waiting for tourists to come with Skis and dollar bills after the first of the snows;
I went there when I was a child, and cradled in My mother's bosom as by the resounding basins;
And later on, scorned, I summited there alone,
And saw her spread infinite by ghostly wealth;
There are girls who sell wine I know from high school,
And I will salute them the same as the ones I used
To salute when I knew the alphabet of their homesteads
Riding the dependable bus into school;
And I will go until in my sister's house, and then
The next day we will practice, and then the ceremony
Where she will change her name, if not her habits;
And, perhaps, when the strangers and relatives see me
There alike, they will think that he is wounded, so wounded,
And they will think that I should stay wounded still,
And I must, but if I were to show them pictures of Steinbeck,
They would agree that, yes, he was wounded, and Whitman,
If not wounded, queer, and Bukowski, yes, wounded, proud
Of it, then I should be justified and thus prove the theory
Of my relations with great men; and they would say,
Why then are you not also great, if you are so wounded,
But I should say not a thing, but walk down the aisle and Take my place, and wait for my sister to be given away
By my father; and, yet, say not a thing, looking at them,
Knowing I am wounded when they never shall be, and That is good, because not everyone should have to suffer so,
And then drive back down alongside the new homes of married
Women, grateful that they should not have to see me,
But should think of me still, subconsciously, along side better
And more glorious men.

Better Princes Than These

Tenderness in the vagabond, going about his lost Routines- in his ways to worship on
The side of the road- hunting for the shade with the Panthers- waylaid from the tourists off
To busy in the storefronts of shells: like pollen who finds Asphalt to kindle into-
Looking out at the passings by of the enthusiasm of Housewives:
A stream of lottery pearled in skirts- their strange gills
Swim in the sooty alcohol by which they feed
Themselves despotic dreams;
And go about their ways, their suits getting dirtier,
Becoming even better princes than these.

Robert Rorabeck

Better Suited Romoes

Recitations are fed up, engorged on the conifered
Wilderness,
Heady from all its echoes, but what can one sing
To the ears of no one who loves it;
And I will drive my car and let its wheels perambulate
Caracoling the great stony heart of this country-
I will go down into the great Precambrian jungles and Steal their folklores,
And get stabbed in the eye over false gossip,
If I have to, but I will never let off dreaming about
You; and this is all I mean: You are a feather in my cap
When I am such a consumptive dandy,
No good at mathematics or teaching the social classes
Anything- Everything I do is but to puff myself up
Next to the bouncers and he-men you enjoy-
I know, because you buy their cartoons: and soon you
Shall be married and baring children,
And looking fine all strung out and humid beneath the Palmettos, and if I could I would conduct all those waves
To cry out for me, to censure everything about you that Wasn't concerned for my pity; and the air-condition is making
Me sick, and I bought a watch at the dollar store to keep time
About you, and I still look for you on campus, which Is silly, because this is my new University and you are not Here to serve me free beers, or to look anxiously beautiful
As you show your teeth, waiting for other romeos who Shall enter that lacquered stage. Watch for them now, your Barrel-chested Popeye's,
Better suited romeos than I.

Betting On Her Races

Then I will laugh at the old voices
Who seem to be coming out of
The radios in the basins of the mountains-
To the tourists, they are just the old heat
Of elbows or birds that once ate
Lunch around them, singing into their eyes
As if echoes of their own voices;
But now lighted out, spent from cars like
The off-giving love of gasoline,
To settle near the nipples of angelic cul-de-sacs,
To give aspens hallucinations,
Making them disrobe- that love is unspeakable
And ill rendered,
But beneath there is perfectly collected another Gunfight- all the loud hurrahs of mom and Pop heroes going out on the town again,
Or taking their ill perceived children
To another penny arcade- to buy whatever souvenirs
They have, or to ride the narrow gauge railroads-
When high over their shoulders,
Feral and Mongoloid,
Nubile headlines spilling from the cracked lips of Geodes fingerprinted by grizzly bears,
And angels fully unclothed in sport, tossing liquid
Coins in each others hearts,
As the streams are running
Down her naked body,
Giving her throes, betting on her races.

Between Her Overpriced Pretzels And Cheap Bananas

I look like white Tennessee with These scars on my face:
It's great, and it's gory: somehow through the Appalachian gin fields the prettiest girl
These breathy atmospheres,
The punk idea of torrential butterflies thriving
Around in the constant migrations of her
Refrigerated dinner truck:
You could store bodies in her back seat:
And that is where I want to go when I die,
To be cut up in choices of cheap and worrisome meat,
To be tinkered through her caracoles through the Bad parts of the neighborhood
Where there are very few white families left,
So that my eyes can stare at her sweet culito in pink
Sweat pants:
This Diana giving new definitions the functionality of Female beauty;
She says with her eyes that she loves me,
For she stares at me for some time, and I always drink
Her chocolate milk even through heavy bouts of influenza;
It's like beating my head against a warhead-
This luscious Amazon: I have no greater wish than to be Parceled out on her delicious slab and sold
Between her overpriced pretzels and cheap bananas.

Robert Rorabeck

Between The Mangroves

Honeycombed in the loneliness of a swell diatribe,
My heart is half empty and a long
Ways from home-
And, if you've slept in all three of my beds,
How come you still have
A hard time kissing my mouth or holding
My hand-
And you still won't be here with me, as the ghosts
Float across the earth of tattered waves-
And it all seems like a golden coil of a serpent Echoing- echoing over the wishes of A sacrifice:
As the gravitational pull of a lonely satellite coaxes
The waves again over
Her exhausted body between the mangroves-
There seems to be a twist in the plot of her roots,
And a Barrett in her hair- snowshoe crabs
In her eyes-
As she remembers that her wishes are gone,
And this is how she spent her honeymoon-
Loneliness of a Ferris Wheel without any friends
And with nothing to believe in:
The no longer distant curl of death sneers her lip- as another
Woman has been making room in her house-
As her wishing wells are cleaned with bleach- and all of Her penny candy stolen by kids on bicycles-
So her zoetrope doesn't have to turn anymore-
The extinction of a species never thought about by Television,
Like seahorses underneath the caesuras- or latchkey
Children underneath the monuments of Another thing I don't have time to forget anymore.

Between The Sand Dollar Leaves

The day is good on Sunday before noon:
No church, no gunfights: I will just touch my troubled face
Again and then I'll drink,
I'll slug my buffoon while my starfish is not there:
I cut her in two like a paper cut in snowy weather beneath the Migrating wings of commercial airplanes,
And she said her insouciant thrill, and did her insouciant thing:
And now she is in love with another lover according to her will While I am closing on my first house on Wednesday,
Erin,
And if you still are heady from the bouquets of my swill,
Then I am still just as empty as the boys who build upon you,
Like a Disney World invading the reality of the sandy dunes,
Obscuring the pathway of greasy haired cougars,
And the key deer which flit
Like latchkey children playing games between the sand dollars leaves of The coco plums.

Between Work And Home

At my uncle's fruit market
I told you your eyes were so dark and beautiful;
And you said that my eyes were also dark and beautiful,
And then I bagged for you for the rest of the afternoon,
And we seemed to reconcile
Even after you said we could only be friends even after
I had made love to you;
Alma- and now it appears as if I want to die,
But everyone does that anyway: because of you, I think I will Go on forever,
Somewhere curled up in your shadow, forgotten but where I must belong,
As your dark eyes make decisions down the road that is always waiting
For you to come and take its ribbons in your grasp
And travel its familiar and forlorn path back and forth
Between work and home.

Robert Rorabeck

Bewitching Eyes

The sea and all its planes has not as many colors as your eyes;
Wines of uncertain ages and uncounted times-
Vineyards collected and stamped by cherubic
Paramours- they have put cool storms and tennis
Courts into your soul,
Windowed high-pitch songs which draws the sailors and Purple tongued dogs
To the rocky shoals of your proof;
I just want to sleep beneath them,
Breathing the fumes of your pistils arisen;
What are you doing now, but kissing your French
Soldiers down their musket lines;
When did you come to this country so long before the trappers
Came after you; Or you leading them,
Words bent around the spores floating freely never quite Written down; but my spry ancestors following your languid
Tremulousness: You have two breasts, one for the child,
Swinging, censer to your fire-brand, the other for my mind;
The spindles of these planets, like young lovers on a swing:
You are bitter sweet and I wonder how many men you have Gone necking with at drive-in movies; and I wonder too, when I will have my time: I will not give you up; I am quite lazy otherwise,
But I have heard your song; I have graduated from the same state University as you, so we are brothers of a kind: A brother I love
Neither ubiquitously or plutonic, but I love you unrequited;
I am a petty soldier for you, and if times get tough I want you to Feed me to your child- it s*cks titty that you haven't yet Seen me looking in,
But that is all there is, my message of strange friendships harrowed
Back to life from the fangs of the dragon I have slain;
Because I have written so many things to you, hypnotized,
And put them into bottles and tossed them into the sea,
And slept beneath the windows of your hearth's fire,
All of these the same colors as your bewitching eyes.

Beyond My Window

Beyond my window
The sky blooms in a voluminous garden
The sun attends,
And there my childhood goes wandering
In the thick forest of nebulous—
There is no time on me
And there are no scars—
Gravity is a funny thing that still spins
Like a top in the palm of my hand....
My heart is not lost in a panting jungle
Of her red fingernails and long, curling locks,
Like chains made of unbreakable feathers,
For now she stalks me without even thinking about it,
A filmy poltergeist doing her life
Five states away near where the East Ocean breathes.
She eats its salts every day and doesn't even think about it,
The way the world tastes inside of her....
Inside me, she is the romantic acid
Spurting through my soul, taking turns with time
And gravity to bed decay in me....
My house quakes with her and I am coming down,
Though beyond my window
Where the sun gallops, my childhood still plays.

Beyond The Veil

All the fish who seem more beautiful in the rain,
Running silently,
Leaping in the shallow rivers, just know that you are Coming soon,
From the rush of pantheisms they are waking up;
For that is the weather you disappeared in,
With your daughter, and your ship never came up;
The quaint little voyage of tourisms, see what trouble it
Got you into, and now there is no more discovery,
No more quarrelling or worrying over travel expenses;
Now it seems as if the fish that you new are yellow
And despondent, and where they are really going is always A mystery;
It still hurts to look into most mirrors, and the world is almost Dead since you disappeared down that seemingly tranquil Avenue,
Leading your daughter down toward the tourisms that had Made your rich; but it is easier like this:
I can get up in the morning and go about feeding my gray cats,
And don't have to worry about hurting the feelings of my Ferris Wheel gold fish;
Or that I might wake you up, or see you across the shimmering
News, or the other worlds of the canal, since I know that you
Are gone, and your husband has gone on to his other ways.
Don't think that I don't keep on trying for you now;
Your river remains so cold, for I take its temperature every day,
But my chicken coop is full, and my dogs are well groomed,
And we lie together listening to the digestions of interstate Traffic, keeping up with the news, thinking all together with our Ready senses how empty it all is, the misfortunes of the world,
The re-animations of the disbelieving orchard,
Not understanding how its best muse could pass beyond the veil.

Bicycles Stolen From Their Own Children

You sit down next to Me and we
Watch the boys loading
Trucks-
They were half donkeys
Anyways-
And as the sun rose
Their ears
Grew-
Some of the dissapeared
With houswives
From view-
Lost mothers who insisted
Their freckles were Birthmarks
But kissed them anyways-
And played hooky from work
And gave them
Bicycles
Stolen from their own children.

Robert Rorabeck

Bight By Bight

Where are you? My heart is cold and un-pure:
I will like it to stop before I got to the top of the apex
Of the house which should be ours- Erin?
You don't care- I am a terribly asymmetrical boy,
And the money I should have by the end of the year is
Of no account:
I just want to put you into my car and drive as fast as I can out into the wildlife preserve to show you what History I can find,
Because here is where my parents fed the elephants the Extra lettuce heads when they were only teenagers:
Now it is almost all stampeded, and I shouldn't know if I am cute are not: and who have you been spreading our Pedals for- who have you let steal your bicycle time and Time again- and I am really, really not doing very good,
Even if I've buried the witch under the blown out candles,
I didn't really give her much of a chance:
And all of you girls are so beautiful- Kick up your legs
For death, show him what you've got, and put your children
Out before you like presents on a satanic Christmas,
Show him what he might else take before you;
But he will come none the less, sucking in all that light- all the Skating waffish wishes;
And the moon will stare down, like a policeman out on his Watch speaking Spanish to himself,
Too afraid to come, even as death consumes you with his heavy
Uninsured teeth, bight by bight by bight by bight....

Robert Rorabeck

Bikini Atoll

We make love in upright coffins:
The sun protrudes and harasses the skeletons
Of the day like umbilical hernia,
As the students sweat to and fro from their Portable classrooms:
Their teachers carrying books they don't cherish
Anymore,
Like exlovers sent like paper airplanes across
The canals.
The weather vanes kick start, as the albino alligators
Fart in their zoos underneath the flight paths of Stewardesses who are passing through Perpetually with the bronze wings of their Pilots on their boisterous minds.
They wonder if they wonder if they will reach
The newfound beds of their destinations on Time- as the cocks crow from England,
And monsters rise in the early morning hours
Of a disastrous Japan.

Robert Rorabeck

Bildungsroman

I do not know how to love her properly;
My mind sparks words that have no fear,
The heart-strung knights
Who leap upon the world. Like entrepreneurs,
They push back the devilish borders
Of scaled and undulating beasts
Who have a taste for virgins;
But alone at night I hear
Myself crying,
While the wide world creaks
Like the bowels of an empty ship,
Utter less, adrift at sea;
I don't know the mathematics to control her.
I can find no direction in the stars which Churn above in briary paths which only Lead me deeper in.
Set adrift on a drunken ship who is my master,
I can only cry out madly to her safe on shore.
A paraplegic traveler, I am stung
By the great beauties and terrors
Of the deep world;
As she sometimes turns me on,
Laughing at the show.
Not knowing how very close to death I am,
She enjoys a snack and then Turns to give a salted-buttery kiss
To a casual lover.

Billy The Kid

And so we spoke of the time of angels—
And Shanghai became the kind of quiet that you can barely Hear:
Translucency of echoes that come on winged carriages
That take me to another place:
To graveyards above Sara Teasdale,
And to imagined perfections where my words can Stand on there own,
Coming inside so many warm libraries,
Like birthing trinkets inside cemeteries, to transform
The into amusement parks:
See in this little lot of dust, some kind of poetry is Also formed—a dust devil delights in the opened palms of Star fish and dances for awhile
Besides the barren canal, and the over turned carriages
That conceal the bones and rosy cemeteries of Billy The Kid.

Robert Rorabeck

Birds Of Paradise

I'm tired of bicycles,
The still tinsels of spokes;
How she rode away her ass an Apple, bobbing, a carnival game:
It wasn't even drunk,
Like pumping coins
Along the asphalt river of all
Those immaculate green lawns,
The sprinklers spitting water.
Lazy husbands come out after high school,
Kiss their long haired sons who Go down underwater to role-play
In the sleep that forever comes like
Seahorses in popular spotlights,
And mermaids who striptease and jaywalk,
Eat fried chicken until they become just
As greasy and grinning after midnight,
Pet the sleepless cat, and then steal a Piece of chocolate cake from the birthday
They will celebrate after daylight;
Short-changed, they will wear paper crowns,
And laughing at the dress code, they Will fire their popguns smoking into the Rumba of ceiling fans, swig Champaign
From chocolate eggs, then sit restless
And cross-legged, as the living room spins,
Watch their youngest cousin color out of
The lines in a long list of super-heroes,
Clap and play toy guitars, as their eyes
Look up, imaging they have crossed the borders
Into Spain, and that there are rain clouds
In the rafters, where grandmother swims
Laughing, waiting to see her young husband
Step foreword and propose more cake,
And alligators sit watching the sun on patios
And tennis courts, supposing in languid
Torpidity that it is all mostly true,
As the young boys swam in the chlorine
Stitches of the vanity club, never supposing

Who they might marry once
They towed off and, dry once again,
Grew up impressively,
And moved away to other green yards,
Both beautiful and sad,
Where newer mermaids swam, distant
Sisters to the others mentioned in passing,
As they jaywalk, awakening the dinner
Party from the symbolist's ennui,
And the beat-red lobsters jumped down
From buttery bibs, clicking their Claws all the way again into the waves,
Like hip-necked troubadours, and other
Nonsense;
They joined the stewardesses serving cranberry
Juice and gin on the red eye,
The last flight of a poet going to sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Birds On A Wire

They make love in the east, but they
Sh! t where they eat;
While I play baseball alone, a dusty boy
With a cap and scars; it is not easy to laugh,
But convenient:
Matzo balls, gefilte fish, potato latkes:
They have two stomachs, a synagogue,
And a pool that sparkles like Herod's spit:
I went to school to be close to her, and didn't Try for an occupation, so now I can feel myself
Sing with or without rain:
I am the chief of my own nation,
Though it is so very sad I didn't listen to the Doorbell's warning, and the way her eyes swung
Like censers around newfound men:
I loved a girl named Sharon, and jogged around her
Hood, but she shook her head and farted,
Said, "Oh no, this will do no good, " because she Was to me like Clint Eastwood, and I didn't Even know her, and she wasn't altogether sure,
But one day she will wake up and walk outside her door,
And let us go with her down to the tilting barrooms,
And sit beside her like a piece of a dream,
And watch her bosom whip up something sweet while
Her boyfriends play games of darts, and the fire crackles
The way it does when it ends empires outside,
And the city rolls out its red bricked ghetto the way I've Seen it do, and the lovers swim in pestilence,
Gnawing each others salt from the bone, until Pinpricks of children are shot into the flume, and then Ignited like gasoline, an entire field on fire,
And we will all sing together, all in neatly rows,
All just like birds on a wire....

Robert Rorabeck

Birds Who Will Never Fly Again

Out front in the houses of hibiscus,
The rain engorges like chariots; and I touch myself,
And I bleed- I want some of it to be beautiful;
And I want it to be published,
But this is just how the nights proceed like careless enterprises
Way up in the space of what they proceed;
And the traffic doesn't care where it is not going,
Back and forth like a beautiful gown;
Can't it even see that it is dying, that its words and paint
Jobs are ugly;
And how does he fill filibuster your mouth,
And why don't you have children yet if you are so beautiful,
While I buy pornography to fulfill myself;
And I wonder yet how you were wounded, after you lost
Your virginity to guitar playing spikenard;
I wonder yet how you have become who you are,
And yet you are weeping deep, deep in the crepuscule of those Yards who aren't even yet who you are,
Wounded like birds who will never fly again....

Robert Rorabeck

Birthday Of My Latest Muse

Lamplight like the soft mother of a zoetrope
Looking out into that yard busily mowed during the day
Now vacated save for the lizard and the lazing
Hummingbirds: but across the street, and stacked around
The bluer dunes, such a thing:
A unicorn has made his nest in the tree—
Like a sailor on the mast of the very tallest of Australian Pines:
What he is doing up there, but pretending to be a look out,
Trying to figure out when the birthday of my latest muse will be.

Robert Rorabeck

Birthday On The Keys

Sleep entails smoking hideous white,
Getting married in a horn of a snail, reclining
To the green zinc coffins stamped up the hill,
The mad processions recalling your little sisters
Moribund- Almost beautiful forever asleep:

My sad confessions to the since dead priest:
I've been trying to emulate Rimbaud, the evil young Boy; and I've been lying-
I've been looking at the back of her neck, and smoking Inadequate things beside the musseled viaduct of My crimes:

And if she is a lawyer, she is still beautiful:
As petit and beautiful as her onyx-banged crimes of High school: And she has since gone and married
A fair haired lover,
And they keep a dog without any cages,
And let him dig frivolously down beside the sea:

Where, I suppose she's never seen my mermaid weeping,
Even though I hear rumors she still weeps twice weekly for
The boy I was,
For my promised suicides, my dry-wall abusements;
And the sweet innocents, as the jaybirds sing I still Can't drive a clutch:

I still don't have a yard: Though, my mother's cut my Hair: Its turned gray. Crow's feet and apoplexy shirk my looks,
But it won't stop me from going back to school:
I'll skip out to sing with weep-some lions;
I'll feed them my same head; and the alligators, I'll Cry for them
Just the same as the punch lines for sincere young crocodiles

All in a swampy chorus line underneath the blush armpits
Of Bromeliad Tillandsia, where I once stole a nudy magazine,
And went back to the excruciating hotel room and stared longingly into Your eyes who were still so young and human and having a birthday

On the keys.

Robert Rorabeck

Birthday Presents

A joy that they taught themselves while they Were folding airplanes,
And their mothers slept upon the other side of the Canal-
Now how did they get here themselves, I wonder-
But the sugar cane burns,
And the song birds sing- they light up the candles
In the heads of the mine,
As the brave men go down to kill the witches
And dragons, and to dig you up birthday presents
That you pray they never find.

Robert Rorabeck

Birthday Wishes, Of Course

Tired rooms in opulent boredom,
And today I drove through the Zuni nation:
Our tax dollars had bought for them a hash of Repetitious houses,
And I thought of you: Oh, Erin,
My flower of evil, as I ate sweetened popcorn
And drank guava nectar,
And dreamed up new dire novels of incest and Witches,
And waited to get all the way home into these High brushes to get drunk safely and to think
Of you;
And Monday is your birthday,
And all the boys know the road courses of your Flesh,
And I am just doing this to put myself to sleep,
To sate on the fermented sugar cane what you
Would not give to me,
That you would not settle down upon my bed
And bare my name and your breasts,
Because even now I am sick and I am dying,
And the day is long and hung over the canals like
Dirty folded sheets of laundry,
And the blue gills are eaten by the alligators,
And the fallen cypress don't lead but to no where,
And I've said I love you, Erin,
But no one reads this anymore,
And the seasons are obsolete where I used to find
You in, the feverish pornography of junked cars,
And no one gives a damn,
When the words are mortal and not fully hung;
And I've already said I loved you,
But my pitch went foul and you were too beautiful
To swing, and waited with baited breath for a
Better artist and friend chiseled at the usual gym,
Blowing out your candle with his tongue,
Knowing which way you come,
And the words I've told you,
You couldn't possibly care to know.

Biting The Hand Of A Beautifully Careless Master

Dogs can do as only dogs can do,
Just as man does as only he knows-
He prays to the mother starship, or he picks
Apples down south in neat and tidy rows;
He makes love, panting, tongue lolling on
Her salt-water belly-
Keen to the pungent swelter, decorated
By the persistently winged blueness,
All twisted up in a sweet-fire pose;
And god knows that raising a family takes
A lot of money, but I've had enough of this Bullsh! t- Seeing fire-engine red everywhere
I look,
When I'm supposed to be colorblind-
This is why, so scarred in the forest of my night,
I almost killed myself when I told you I loved
You and there was no answer,
Just the persistent crickets in the darkness,
Which is as good as nothing; I almost starved myself,
Became another ghost inside my truck with
A dead battery- The same one I've had since high school,
The same one I once picked you up from your royal House, with its rain-soaked cathedrals;
but you don't remember; Now all of This goes away, painfully leaping like an Illegitimate fairytale right out of the stain-glass of Our irrefutable belief: I've gotten a new lease on life,
Buried those precious bones of you where I can't Remember, I've bitten the hand of such a beautifully
Careless master,
Like tearing a wing off an awful butterfly, auburn eyed and drunken lipped,
She went swaying with her fraternity of pirates,
Leaving in her titillating wedding gown, gently whistling
But me unfed, though now better realized,
My tail is wagging, for I am the brand new four-Legged man, now leaping through
These neat and tidy rows,
Fetching only for his own knowledge as it ripens,

Weighing down the spry boughs until it becomes Very easily enjoyed.

Black Cat And The Ruby Birthstone

Put away that sun:
What is she doing now,
Crawling through the cupboards?
Painting her lips after some midnight hour,
Erasing the sums of the daylight:
Does she think that I still love her
When she knows that without a doubt I still do?
What could she be doing now that she's graduated?
Is she trying on his tweed eyes,
Brighting his pipe in her intelligent teeth?
Filling the bath with bubbles and joining her dogs?
What could she be doing now
Since she's worried back home after midnight,
And stubbed her toe on some stoned toad?
Should she be caring that I'm curious,
Curious, curious like a cat on her fence
Scenting her tasseled bicycle in the little hours that I live?
Knowing that I'm just a boy stashed away in some High mountain, but when I come down I'll be a man
With his pockets full of cash, running around
With his dogs- with sophisticated streaks of gray
And his hands full of firecrackers?
Could she even remember what direction I'll be Coming around whistling away the clouds, tapping
My feet like a dancer feeding the hungry reindeer:
I should call her, but she'll be busy eating and Playing with her Atari. Maybe she'll be a cockroach
Now that she's graduated, completely unexpected
Except by flaunting Russian authors:
What is she doing now? I don't have an answer,
But certainly she is at the open graves dancing,
And laying out the flowers, preparing for the early unions,
Forecasting: Either there will be sun or foul weather,
But I don't know- She is a roller coaster,
A fortune-teller of relaxing aqueducts and the lilies
Which grow there, like murals of the minds of young Women floating patiently for their princes,
And I am just a cat pacing the stone shoreline,
Curious but too timid to swim out and taste her....

Blackbeard

You were my fiancé
And I loved your cleav-ge
Milky in the phosphorescent
Hiss of kerosene lights
Burning like a fuse
So close to your flesh
But the night when Blackbeard
Came in, you swooned
You left me and straddled
Him at the bar
And served him
Rum the color of sunset
Dripping from the inlet of your brea$ts
Shallow waters where
His black lips swam
And you let yourself drip
Down his long unruly beard
That frightened the men
And tickled the women
And all the lights turned out
In my head
Like a ship sinking,
Cut on the rocks,
I turned very grim
I resolved to kill the pirate,
But when I came up to him,
Fists clenched, face set,
He just chuckled heartily
In a motion like a drunken sea,
He twisted around and gave me
The boot
And made you laugh and squeal
When he pinched your flesh
And kissed your cheeks
He sent me rolling out with
The other artisans
Into the humid salt air of
The night exhaled from the sea-

I made to go back in but my brothers held me back-
When I looked, you were already Topless your flesh open to
The famous pirate who only
A week before had capture the Port of Charleston-
You were so impressed,
You undid your self for him
And slid like a salacious mermaid
Between his thighs-
Completely devastated,
I went across the street to
The Dry Bean
I got drunk on cheap rum
And crawled down to the docks
To drown myself,
But I fell asleep instead.
In the morning the gulls flying
Through sunlight awoke me
And there you were Walking in Blackbeard's arms to
The Queen Anne's Revenge
Your eyes were hostages in love
And so pressed against his body,
His unruly black beard fell in your Blouse, coarse hair scraping against Your softness,
And I knew then that night before
That he had had you many times
Slippery from rum and coconut butter,
Feeling you like the steerage of a new Vessel
Though you had said to me with a kiss
That you were saving your womanhood
For the night we were wed-
The hung-over sunlight of that new Terrible day showed me how you had Changed for him in love,
A devilish cutthroat who had plundered
You out from under me-
I did not stay to watch the ceremony

On his ship
I went right away to get drunk
And then I went and signed up for The Queen's Navy,
But my brothers told me he did marry
You that day on that ship, and then he slipped Into you, making you swoon as he took
You to his private quarters
He made love to you for two weeks in port
Only to leave you compromised,
In a needing position,
Stranded, immobile,
Helpless and weeping as you watched him go
Did he promise to come back for you some day,
To steal you away once more?
Your belly crawling with his ba$tard
Seed
I suppose you broke down then,
Tore at yourself and meant to heave yourself
Into the natural force of the sea,
But the other whores pulled you back,
Though they were weeping too
To see their captain leave
Word around Nassau was you
Came looking for me, a far second
When only weeks before I'd been your first,
Wanting me back
But I had joined the naval forces
Under Governor Rogers
Whose sworn purpose was to hunt down
And garret Blackbeard
They gave me new clothes and a pistol
They ordered me into a new life which I gladly took, since you'd Destroyed the one I left with your frivolity
I became a sailor in Her Majesty's
Armada,
My heart pierced from you infidelity
From your one lasting night with him
My eyes a stormy birth
I left your needing for the sea
Chasing after the man who had forever

Stolen you away from me for two week's game,
For the rest of my life,
Hurricanes, my wrath,
I would end your love for him and stop
His for you with a bullet plugging his heart
I would take his scalp and go home to show
You and his child the prize I had made myself
From your cheating, but when I came
To his frigate he shot us down with cannon
Bucks from his broadsides,
And I nearly drowned,
Sinking to the coral deeps
With your anchor chained about my middle,
When I emerged I was a ghost,
Fretful, destroyed, I threw down the Badges of my past
Hearing Blackbeard's laughter,
I walked far inland away from your sea.

Blackman's Backbone

Best to let yourself go so far to where it doesn't matter;
If you shoot your sister in the eye, make sure she's good and shattered:

To avoid the gossiping repercussions,
The steadily swelling lines queued up for holidays,
The way your lovers looked you in the eyes,
before they looked their other ways;

And if you must go to where there are celebrated days,
Then turn you back and go down the easement of yesterday:
Down to the teal basements dredged out by demiurge,
Better to gather the poisonous boughs and sprigs
In the venomous cenotaphs that foundation in the dirt

Than to swell up all the higher riding caesuras of spit and flirt
Where children are uncorked and braided from unsealed sorts of Domesticated climates,
Like secrets spilled from the backyards of flirts and firemen;
And if you were to see from the fiery window that woman
Supposed to be your wife cleaning dishes in another man's kitchen,

Smiling so finely out the window, know then too that she's been Told to buy those things by which she might be more finely censored;
And the girl she once knew has flown so near the forest that she is Not herself to mention, but a twitter tattered in the branches,

Better to do your penmanship by unacknowledged midnight,
To sough your friends in furrows under the red lights of the Martian influence,
And to call them rightly when they develop fully bodied out of circumstance
And leap upon one another in a regalia of unclothed pugilists;
To kiss and slap them bleeding in the painful cuts of such a friendly reminiscence;

Or if this is not the thing to do, well at least you get the gist of it.

Blame

Blame causes the sun to fall from the sky—
He is in love with someone else.
The sky is his wife whom he does not love—
She has gone shopping leaving him
To the suicide—
The bosom of the sea is his muse,
What gentle allusions she gives him,
Showing off the jewelry she pretends to Steal from the thieving moon—
The night proceeds over their love making,
The messenger of blind men
That raids over the university with the dawn,
Or other places nearby where I look up,
Pretending to see you in, the cool air
Filled with the valentines of vampires—
Or whatever delusions that leak like the runaways
Outside of theatres—in the avenues of
The casualties' soldiers, and in each wave
A vanished kingdom that crashes
Against the playgrounds of her bosom
As they descend once again into the marriages of Evermore.

Blanket Of Laughter

Dandelions have nothing to say
As the wind puckers and blows them
In the meadow,
The Diasporas of springtime,
Lovers on a honeymoon,
Kids on a fieldtrip—
Trapped unfairly as car doors open,
Some die airconditioned—
Umbrellas over a sea of grass
In no time at all float a mere eternity.
The sea is so green
Upon her verdant eyes;
Some sit in the shadows cusped
In Buddha's palm,
They grow crimson yellow
In the blanket of laughter.

Blessed Ablutions

The light happened on the kid in his time:
The class stood up and listened to their named and Then brushed their heart to the flag,
And I eventually and for evermore fell away, and started
Thinking of you quite depressingly:
My wick so full of tears it would never light, so I
Just sat right there alongside the mother lode of beetles
And listened to the ripples of airplanes in the grass:
It was a sad show like guts of a three ring tent that all of The animals have left;
And when the summer rain blew across the school yard,
It carried your eulogy to me as if on the wings of a Really champion paper airplane,
Even though you had taken so many lovers as to have your Good smells rubbed off you: and you had finally settled
Like an exhausted tourist down in the apathetic bosom of The Grand Canyon,
And got married just to have something to sustain yourself on While you wondered aimlessly,
Though I have already forgiven you and even dug you
A grotto where the waves come in and crowd the pews of limestone
Where my cannons sit with the make believe crocodiles
Like true believers waiting for the day hikes of your body
To give them blessed ablutions in your penultimate flesh.

Blessed At By Fireworks

Repeated as the day consumes- wildfires trying to Kiss hot air balloons:
Words on an uneasy stage, unicorns overused:
My parents on the highest parapets being kissed at by
The incarcerated waves,
And every day is beautiful for the beautiful slaves:
Wounded, but charging up the hill-
The beautiful boys will go to fight one last time:
They will go to fight whomever they will,
Until the ticket booth is even closed, and the even shows
Its evening shows,
And ticks off its monarchs into the west, passing from
Our America, being blessed at by fireworks,
And being drowned again into a Spanish forest-
Sunken like leaves in coital metamorphosis- what do these Fine acolytes say as they talk to themselves:
What do their little minds rehearse for a lifetime of a day:
Being tossed to the arboreal gutter like paper corsages:
Never going to taste the lips of her prom,
But savaged there, made to court in the dusk, shadows-
As beautiful as the illusions of roses to the dead prostitutes
Anonymous beneath the old fort for tourists- they lay;
The waves rush an anarchy- their bouquets an illusion of Bones eaten by wingless horses,
While the tourist can only rise up and think about in their Ungodly cathedrals of what they must be having for breakfast.

Robert Rorabeck

Blessed By Seahorses

Impossible fume this heart
Reading new lines—sweating— sweating—
Blessed by seahorses
And things that don't go so well with the light of Day—
The windowless room swings above the Labyrinths into which we will finally be going home:
And a Mexican rides my bicycle to the supermarket
Tonight—
You who I can no longer write poems for—
You who no longer reads my poems.

Robert Rorabeck

Blind As The Music From The Holidays

What do katydids do when they whistle in the Grass,
Naked and anew and metamorphosed as the airplanes
Fly past:
I have not learned the words for what they do—
I fold paper airplanes and light of Roman candles and wait for you:
The traffic sounds just as distant as the lions yawning,
As the traffic enfolds suburbia,
As the sun goes to rest—
All day long, truant, hapless—a terrible infant lost
In his canoe—
I have tried calling to towards me—down from The mountains—diminutive crescendo
Above tree line—
Where the stones speak of angels—
And the gods step in their nudity—
All throughout my childhood, I have wanted you down
From there—
Tried to figure you in my neighborhood—
Tried picturing you in my mother's naked aspects—
And sometimes when it rained,
Even pictured you inside the hallucinatory confines
Of a car—taking off your clothes to get warm,
Lying in a bed of foxes and reindeer—
Your eyes as blind as the music from the holidays that Cannot hear.

Blindest Gold

I've tromped upon the blindest gold.
I've made myself into a fist,
And grasped her as I was told,
The angel hidden high up in that clasp:
She smiled and drove away with her kids;
But you will not see what I have told,
I've tromped upon the blindest gold.

Blinding A Better Man With Your Kiss

Reading too much Walden to have a jubilee:
Thoughts about that lake just go on and on, but it's Not a pretty lady; it's not sex, and I skip chapters,
And I would have a hard time summarizing: I bight
My cheek- I wonder if spiders have scars, like these Walls, these villages with legs, and dimly lit eyes
For windows: Walking up some hill, walking down:
Walking, walking: I read Of Walking In Ice,
The window is slightly opened, like a cracked shell
No one is home, so intrude, but it is cold inside
And on into dreams the letters continue; they have been Crossed out, corrected. Remarried, they parade. I am
In the middle of a great rainstorm; it never rains,
And I breathe in these newly painted motes where ghosts Should walk. I walk underneath the ancient pillars for Railroads. The grass is mowed here. There is a quarry
Fenced off. I don't believe in my parents anymore, though
They sometimes call: They've always had it in for me-
That two headed monster in their bed I should never go Back to. The horses have killed the trees, and if I slip Away it will be to the other side of the Mississippi,
To culture and slavery again- Postbellum promises of Better fairytales just in the vicinity where you are blinding
A better man with your kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

Blindness's Feast

Bats sleep upside down
Sacked into the moist air in the womb of a cave.

You sleep horizontally, I imagine west to east
In accordance with your street-
Unaware of the gentle lull coming from
The waves of the ocean-

And the creatures trapped there in,
The mythologies they could not pretend to know in school-

Awakened blindly, the sun as a guest upon your shoulder,
You are guided by the awareness available to you-

Sirens increase the volumes of the atmosphere,
Traffic roils as fish-
Progressing in a haze of comingling shelters,
Artistries are crucified into religions
Houses molt or burn down-

A market of insects happens in a flash
That is eaten by a cloud of wings:

As a maggot on a beautiful rose remembers the earth:
A womb furrowed by roots-
A school yard that is in essence a grave carved
From a once unmolested orchard-

As blindness prepares a feast, so dines the wetted
Snouts of such a romance.

Robert Rorabeck

Blissful Bigotry

To mention you
Without knowing you
Is a bigotry-
For you have sensitive ears
And missing ancestors,
And nightmares in your sleep,
So do us all- My dear,
Though we are not allowed to weep.
When I come calling
In my distant sport,
Perambulating in the mad gardens,
Please do not be afraid,
But look up from where you sit,
And offer me your eyes,
And feel me on your lips,
But do not stand up
And come towards me,
What shame!
To mention you is bigotry,
For I do not know your name.

Robert Rorabeck

Blissfully Across

Parks are chirping in sweat:
Parks with mist in their swings-
They don't ever have to worry about getting home,
Or having strange men mine coal from Their bosoms;
But they sigh underneath the reprobate mountains;
And there are already so many stewardesses on their Swings serving drinks,
Tourists in their lees waiting to get married
Through the open corridors and the perfumes of Unabashed skyways;
And I don't know what I am saying,
Because I am not a pilot- It has been some years since
I've been to Colorado:
Colorado,
The breasted centipedes, I want to hike your legs:
I want to get going up and up past the things the venal muses
Should only sing,
To eat my ham and cheese up above tree line,
To not have to worry about the suspecting eyes over my body,
To enjoy my scars above the faces of the world
Where everything is a light air vertigo,
Where angels cut clean,
Where all the birthstones grow: If you are my muse,
I'll meet you there in the clouds of make-believe,
And above the trains.
Otherwise I don't know what I am doing,
And I am just a liar who made you believe the sky is coming Down blissfully across your bare naked shoulders.

Robert Rorabeck

Blistered In Your Carnival

Over the eyes of the stomping
City,
I bought you pearls and then set out across
The waves to marry a witch
Who lived on a Christmas tree
Floating in the center of
Forever:
I wanted her to take my head- and to Take my lips,
And put carnivorous wings in a
Masquerade over my eyes:
And this is what she did,
And this is what she is going to do;
But you are still right there,
Softly blistered in your carnival, wondering
Which boy you can cheat with Next, as the blazing contraptions flow
Like electronic dinosaurs in a wilderness
Of unstemmed traffics that just goes on and on
And back and forth.

Robert Rorabeck

Blistering Of The Hot Brigade

A blistering of the hot brigade
Makes youngish girls swoon and kiss and Gasp for love in the sweltering shade—
Their eyes hung over from mad delight
From the houses they have fled
To the meetings of each other at the end of A starry metamorphosis:
As they kiss, the horses kiss too—puckering
Across the fences speckled from the shade of The apple orchard—but soon they will Be off again: girls riding to the sea or the sky,
To become mermaids or stewardesses—
Who once held our hearts like throbbing pomegranates
In the crèche of their fingers—and we might Swear to ourselves that they loved us,
But they loved one another all the more—
As they disappear from our eyes holding one another in theirs.

Robert Rorabeck

Blond-Headed Solar Flare (Or Until The Cows Come Home)

Vibrant green acrobats who touch my lips
At the end of their Catholic censor- and Then pool away just as gleeful as sunbirds:
And if you think that is sweet,
You've never read Baudelaire,
Baudeliare- anoint his feet with ambergris
And valentines: Stick fat pedaled to the crèche
Where the immaculate brat is sucking with the Cerulean diamond ants at the end of the pool,
And Jordan's sister is taking it off: Like a pornographic
Raven in love with the grateful dead-
And the lawnmower breaks off the steal horned cenotaph
Of some prehistoric Pedro or Don Juan:
And you don't want anything to do with me,
Except to put me up on the shelf of your bull pen,
Raisin eyed: I don't even think you like having sex with Mortal men; and I don't want anything to do with you,
And I laugh at you from the sun-splintered roof of My genetic truancies, all my flares taking off at once,
Hoping to be saved by a blue shift, by prettier girls from Saturn: So spit in your tin and ring your bells until the cows
Come home,
If you read me but not Baudelaire; it's all you're worth,
Blond-headed solar flare.

Robert Rorabeck

Blossoming In The Emptiness

Daylight unifying us as our bodies
Move- this species
And its baseball, the failures of my words:
The empty cadences of a busy hall-
The grass in the sunlight moving as she Whispers:
The soft fall of sunlight perfuming our Senses,
As we continue to desire blossoming in
The emptiness-
And further off mountains and forests
And the nomenclatures of the beauties
We are too deaf to describe.

Robert Rorabeck

Blue Collar Schizophrenias

If I could live forever somehow
Rectified as a psalm,
It really wouldn't matter that all my Best friends are dogs,
And that my latest complexions scribble worry
On my belly,
The stillbirth of my isolated karmas,
And that my poetic images are really not Much more than blue collar
Schizophrenias:
I love you, I love you-
Isn't that what I was supposed to sing,
To pull up next to her and rev these engines,
To put my eyes on the cherry sport of her
Jogging legs:
Her name is Erin, and sometimes there are Storm clouds in the afternoon,
Which wet the equine bodies between the trees,
And I should have my own house sometime
Soon after July 4th,
Where I will begin to daydream beneath the Stain-glass alders of a new classroom;
And isn't that absolutely strange: That I should Be thirty-one and going back to school
For a Ph.D. in Saint Louis, Missouri; and how long
Should I make it before they call me out,
And smell the cheap liquors on my breath,
And find out that I can barely even spell,
That I might be the real reason for the holocaust;
But these lines aren't nearly even publishable-
They are the sad infatuations I've carried on since Junior high- They are cheap grape soda the fox
Drinks, plump bellied under the broken school bus-
They are her eyes carving caracoles
Like pulling tricks through the despotic cumulus
Over the thorny heads of the grinning reptiles:
This is my thing, my little sport of lines casting into
The freeway's river: and her name is Erin,
And this is all about her, even as the traffic crowds

And better faces turn to meet hers: These lines
I remember,
And recite just as one of my ancestors getting off
The boat under the burning torch of Lady Liberty in New York Harbor- Only but the Freedom of alliterate; and yet I boastfully remember,
Riding a new bicycle through the distended ghettos
Of the reawakened suburbia,
My chief lines- Her name is Erin,
And I am cheaply drunk, but it is love.

Robert Rorabeck

Blue Eyes Crying In The Rain

I love you, but you don't weep like
Extinguishing amphibians in the car port,
So azure underneath the burnished stars,
And I don't need new clothes;
And I don't need a dog tag- It's you I want-
You my war, to piss stain cops,
To show my parents a real good time,
The Satanists- the beautiful cesarean crutches
Who would never have surmounted without me,
And yet they refrain:
And I want to show you fireworks and superhero
Powers,
And green stars and lamps and holidays I haven't
Yet the willpower to explain;
And if you haven't yet loved me,
Don't answer- the flower is delicate between the tresses
And the leaping airplanes;
If there is a god, then I will see you again....

Robert Rorabeck

Blue Faucet

I am killing myself for evil causes.

Like the rest of it, I often wonder
Who the boss is,

But don't we get the just of it,
Especially when we're lit,
High flying, agnostic,

I wanted to love her, but she was already Wearing my closet:

The dogs are circling the bush,
Or they are making a deposit:

I wish to god I was on an airplane being Entertained by a stewardess,
As we leap together, mostly inebriate,
Over the inextinguishably
Blue faucet.

Robert Rorabeck

Blue Omen

I'm going to kick his ass,
The blue general with the feathered hat;
The bootlegger who keeps you in his silk tent,
Like a giant cocoon on the green prairie,
A stash of alcohol with all those lips and legs,
The new campaign over spilling Manifest Destiny;
Because your c*nt makes me woozy.
Never mind the crown of diabolical Indians
Thorning this vermilion canyon;
And the imported swans bloated in the river's urine:
They will find us in their time,
And line their satchels with our eastern skulls,
And say we are now the new fetishes
For then there will be no telling us apart,
What was yours now is mine once was his.
Even now they are slinking amidst the fluted reeds
To where the willows bow, like giant ants,
The segmented torso and sunlight, the hybrids
Of men and wild horses and the spotless sunlight:
This is the novel territory we meant to invade,
Though halfway to the ocean is nowhere at all;
The Spanish ghosts are even now spilling from the dunes,
Their ancient rusting heads trapped shut and echoing:
A line of festering insects pontiffed and crossed,
The claustrophobic dolls and neurotic tortoises.
Will I find you there if there is still time,
Nude and bathing in his luxurious decanters:
Filigreed by all the stolen opulence, a transient gem,
An exotic still-life, like the ones half buried in invaded museums:
You legs the knobby trunks for my arachnidan fingers to saunter:
You lips the bulbous muscles of nectared aphrodisia,
The clever metamorphosis we could give our souls,
Before the savage war cry rents the breathing walls,
And tears our organs into meals:
Too late we have learned to fly, an apparent metamorphosis
Of coital enjambment hazardly punctuated with his blue ostrich
Feather perched like an hilarious omen at the foot of the bloody bed.

Blue One

Your children are the most important things,
I know not even college is important,
At least not right now:
And now where will you live, as neither of us are Getting along with our Father, Alma,
While Saturn and all of her rings flicker and wink for Unicorns,
As I do for you, Alma; and I am just turning away for A moment to bury a nail,
To kiss a wink,
But when I am through I want to nod my head underneath
Your seat:
I want to sit for a very long while with you,
Alma,
And hold your hand under the roof of your car as the Sky starts and finishes its rain,
Just like in the ways that we used to do,
While the candles leapt like little boys over their beds,
As I shared a blue one for a moment of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Blue Windmills

Red fountains
Over blue windmills
And then there be
Cadmium swans burning into Vermillion swans-
Won't you see how they change,
How they awaken for us like
Fireworks spewing their two minute
Guts
In the frantic dance of their life
Crying sparks over all of those things
That seem to want to change,
Turning around frantically,
But never changing-
And thus living while they live,
As we- those swans
Become those things that were
For them.

Robert Rorabeck

Blueberries

Salient solution in Ganymede's
Ablution;
I have been up and down the Grand Canyon,
Up and down
Three times, brushing against her side,
And candy canes and rainbows-
Lonely men doing lonely jigs in between the bars
Of their favorite barbershop cemetery;
And I don't know if I want to wake up tomorrow
Here in the clandestine halls of nothing at all;
And I wanted to ask Kelly, as a friend,
If she thought I was not insignificantly beautiful,
But I thought she should really like to lie to me;
And I thought they would all always like to lie
To me,
Going back and forth across the blue jay
Colored rug, where all the eggs had cracked into the Scribbles of shallow water estuaries;
And her favorite color is blue berries:
Her favorite color is always blueberries.

Robert Rorabeck

Blued Kindergarten

If you know that the nights fall hard on
The spikenard monuments, then you know nothing but Your letters and of footballs
That the balls are round, the oranges orange:
And America is beautiful, while my muse has come so far
Across the hills and the plateaus
But this is not her country: she is just trying to make money to Survive:
And that is how she loves me; because she has never yet been taught
How not to love me;
This muse, my Alma: my last and fatal and beautiful thing:
I hope, like a firework, to reach up and find her,
And spill into her unison all of the boats of my milk,
And into her the other words I cannot even hope to find,
But which she deserves that I should find,
And so for her I go out searching before the mailman and through the Yards where the cars are still at home
For the beautiful reasons that come up through the Early jubilation of daylight, transforming, and turning around
In metamorphosis across the gardens where all of the pornographies
Who are so like her, but who are none like her,
As if in a blued kindergarten, keep on lingering and linger
Like misallocated statuaries holding their breaths.

Robert Rorabeck

Blueprints To The Banshee

I cleaned myself in the shower
And thought of the sea upset by
The hurricanes cast outward from god,
I followed the blueprints to the Banshee-
To where the rocks part in the Unreachable kiss of two things always Moving away,
In that isolated throat where there
Is autumn,
And she is always there, her
Breasts the twin mounds where Rome
Was founded in the dropping twilight
Where her pups play and nip amidst the Shoals of the falling ocean around
The tree that is also falling,
Phosphorescent leaves the Crippled angels of dreams for her,
Shot and clipped they surrender into
The pools,
Waiting around my feet
As I stare into her across the Gulf of the dying storm that is Wildly blowing eastward and
Away.

Robert Rorabeck

Boarders

There are people in their rooms
Above my wilting head.
As my thoughts shed like tiny fireballs
From the horse's ears in a lightning storm;
Their voices are colorful vowels,
Like birds singing, like Rimbaud's
Poetry in the perfect juxtapositions of Pretty sounding things laid vulnerably
On silver platters—
There is an azure maiden peeing
In a opal vase filled with gladiolas
The little crippled boy picked from the Newly painted graveyard where all
The dead soldiers are sleeping—
There are people talking in their Separate rooms above my head,
As a Red Indian walks into a bar and Trades his mustang for a bottle of sour whiskey—
Outside, an electrified snowstorm is falling
On Alaskan pastures, and fiery snowflakes
Prick themselves on barbed wire fences,
Like candles offering delicate flames—
From the window, a murdered woman screams
Purple threats, as she is backed up
By the whippoorwill's peppermint trills on
The vermilion steeple—
Listening, the dying man takes off his boots
And then follows his brother's shadow,
Because a phantom has promised him a
Bag of cunning gold he hid in the quietest
Snow covered meadow
Where frostbite waits in hoary amethyst furrows,
Where the den of amber foxes sleep
Mortally exhausted, their skeletons half exposed,
Like anemic waitresses flirting with time
And customers,
The sounds of her bare feet crunching the Frozen pasture as she moves from table to table,
The angelic specter in black violet tassels

Serving them the cold bulbs of winter's divine
Harvest the dead man's brother made love into her,
As far above, people laughed boisterously
In their separate rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Boca Raton

Nothing ties me down:
I am loosed into the world.
Strangers come out of straw shacks
With used knives
And say hello—
Single women I once sat next to
Are getting married,
As I continue digging deeper,
My hole.

The land is a planet of Gargantuan size, I crash landed into:
Between me muder's thighs—
My father is a golden Sheriff
Marching down the street—
Whistling, he struts and
His feet rattle ready warning....

There are rich females swimming
In the concreted watering holes their Husbands dug for them.
Like fine yards, they are well owned,
Manicured, trimmed and blossoming....
Amarillo panthers

Fine yellow jackets,
Belly-fat, abdomens pulsing,
Circle around them,
The invisible instruments
The immaculate watchmen
Sleep in the webs of
The green lady palms

To this the sea shushes
As the traffic continues
As lines of hungry soldiers,
Silver-gilled mercenaries,
The carriages for the middle of
The line aliens

Imbibe imported gasolines

Proceeding across the land,
The ready suntanned herd:
Forages, the city's latest generation,
Bulking at the slightest thing:
Herbivores, land-owners,
Hypocrites,

Exonerated murderers....

Robert Rorabeck

Bodies And Parts

I only slept two hours last night,
And in that time dreams of you filled me up—
Your legs which scissor in a blur of liquid sun,
Your eyes that take off from your incredulous face
To land on my ruddy shoulders
To sing like opera stars who bat their Lashes at me, corpulent premodonas I feed
Bread crumbs to until they are tamed and become My faithful satellites, circling one after the other,
Petit versions of Phobos and Demos—

I have you in my head, and little ten year
Old bits of you are stuck between my ivories. I leave you there,
So once in awhile a vintage sliver becomes dislodged
And I can taste that part of you before it goes down,
The bouquet of a rose petal shed from your eye
As you bent down to tie your shoe, and I saw your Cleavage and pocketed what I could, so when You looked up I smiled sheepishly before pointing
Out something random—

Did you hear I'm likely getting published? Over
In England I may become quite famous, but I worry
You've come to some serious trouble without me
There to cloth you. You can't rely on anyone else
But me. I will send you a bouquet of daises to cheer you
Up and a first edition, and if I see you we'll shake hands.
If you allow me to grin like a sheep, then I will allow
You to grin like a wolf, and in our mouths' parting
Gestures, the precursor to the devour, we shall begin....

Yet maybe it's that you've fallen in love
With a dashing young professor of antiquity and Even now he's driving you through the drive-thru
For a burger and coke with love in his eyes and his pen
In all those scholarly journals with titles that circulate
The world several times before running out of gas,
And acidic essays which peel the skin right off the eyes.

If that's the case, I see you've found me out for the hack
I am, Plato plus one chromosome, and the only thing to do
Is to get in line at the hardware store and try to shoplift
A big axe to chop down a tree in your path, to hold you
Up for a little while, so I can return your flowers from my Throat, to give back that not so old kiss you once gave my Neck.

Bologna And Bouquets

Yes, you are looking beautiful, dear,
But I'm just here to buy my groceries;
And when at night, I run my laps and grade
Those papers, I might think about you,
And the way you looked grabbing each thing
With your painted nails like bruised Easter eggs;
I suppose, the way your eyes were winged like Bawdy butterflies, I might have told you I'd Been published quite drolly, and then when you'd Made love to the everyday boyfriend, I'd come Upon you like an asymmetrical headache, and That little silken brush I gave, what passed between Us besides our commerce, I could not say;
I am in my studio with my dogs, and a slight fever,
And it rains outside engorging the pool, who too
Is hungry for lovers. Thus across the weedy fence,
Frat boys fart and light off fireworks, and a stray
Hound is stuck between the rough iron of the cemetery's Gate. I don't know, but beautiful blonds are already Trying on outfits for Halloween, and it isn't yet
April. Do you work on Sundays? I don't care,
For I've just come for my bologna and bouquets.

Bones Of Swingsets And Conquistadors

Understand that silence is better than this,
Translated from the German,
Or the hummingbird- and grandparents are passing
Away:
Working class soda jerks standing outside of Glass windows up here on the bluffs above the great Mississippi,
And Mark Twain was down there but we didn't see
Him;
And the greater and lesser professors parlayed,
And I went on campus and stole a novel, something
I couldn't write for the life of me;
While I was gone my dogs got into an argument:
They almost ate each other,
Starting at either end; and it's a long ways to Christmas:
No so long to Halloween.
They put a hole in the air mattress,
Now we all get to sleep on the floor, our working class
Dreams: big cities,
Bones of swing sets and conquistadors in the desert.

Boniface Shadows

Boniface sanitariums, oh how I love you-
People who are in the next room over,
Live in a different world than I;
Sometimes the shadows turn like playgrounds,
Prehensile- Shushabye- Shushabye say the scars
Peeking in the sleek corners,
While outside what a world moves,
On long, gunning legs go by:
Young things move through a green space some Darned gods molested into being just to Captivate their truancies- Oh look at them go,
Not real enough to touch,
Fingers fall through them like steam rising-
Their thighs are steam highlighted by great blushing
Landscaping; but if they are dead then so Am my- Mighty steam track trains coil through the City- they've eaten everything, yet they still seem to Be moving,
Shushabye, shushabye goes these trains through the City of trains,
And her legs running like water over a place they never Saw;
Down in stony clutch where other birds gather,
And I drive by as slowly as I can, slow enough to keep A butterfly- but it is never enough: and then
On and on, never to see them again, but oh their lips,
As if the cradles for the ears of little children, sing:
Shush-a-bye, shush-a-bye

Bonnie And Me

You could say to Go on changing the Deputy's plans
And we could continue
Fooling with the law,
But I am riddled with Bullets and Growing tired.
The Hudson is out of Gas down in the valley
Under the oak tree,
And you are seeing
Other men—
You say you don't remember
Where you buried the Money,
But that's a swell new Dress you're wearing.
I don't want you to swear to
It on your mother.
Now come here close to Me and lets kiss, so
I can feel the warmth of Your cheek,
And hear your heartbeat
Fast and reckless
From the cocaine;
But, listen, I hear it going
Away,
Like a car's engine,
Receding like the tide, as
The sea lifts up her skirts and Begins to follow a new sun—
I'll just lie down here
In the front seat and Stain the upholstery with My final breaths,
As you steal my gun
And run on.

Books By Dante Alighieri (Censored)

Somnambulists cutting hair with sexual charm
Walked into the student barber shop on 13th St., Across the blackface cops raise taxes in the ghetto,
Say I look like a writer: I, look like a writer, shooting range
So Huck Finn drifts down the river, Jim
Stop me before I piss in the street.
One night I got all drunk over you,
I got all drunk over you and went back to her-
There is a yellow studio apartment in the 2nd story:
I don't live there anymore; She is married
Under the oaks with one headlight out,
Because I didn't resist their badge's lavender authority-
But I only do cursive with my d-k out on the handlebar,
And then its all in Old English allegory:
Because the opal virgins are on their way,
The Green Knight's mistress gives me a girdle
To save my neck, accepting I lose the challenge:
I'm no good at French, though
I wouldn't turn down a rimbaudian kiss.
Doing liberal arts, the red queen is naked bare breast
And solving coital arithmetic with an associate professor,
Also not her husband, though a suave card player-
At the top floor of the library, there is a living dictionary
Then the University is the abandoned prairie- 12: 01
With the Indians out, sterile: the game is fixed- chickenpox:
Extinct, everyone is going to the planetarium, the widow
Is left over from holding her breath,
And the healthy young carnivores are learning business
With pie chart shooting off middle-class trajectories-
She might be standing under the network-lights
Tentacle the Church, as if she wanted to get hitched-
I see her now whenever I go out,
She permeated the horizon, an unknown chemical element
Fulfilling the atmosphere's solution: all persevere,
I jogged all night for her, I jogged all night for her,
And now I go through hell: at the end the devil's windmill
A trifecta of betrayals in his mouth: Judas, Brutus, and Cassius,
Amen- In the seventh concentricity there is a forest of suicides.
If you break a branch, the dead girl's soul with child

Scream out and escape, spilling something valuable:
On the hills in winter walks Augustus Caesar
Though we must not now hesitate, runaway
For Virgil has a woman's soft hand, and your pre-Socratic face.
He has told me behind the greatest evil, there is a Way out. There is a way out, but first down the crimson hall,
The straight track breaching the school, the fast night
Where the children are deciding Between books and sex, all night the faces swim,
Who they will be with the rest of their lives
Will not be the one they're with:
So their bankrupt parents can't complain
And there is only one way out,
And there is only one way out
Hanging with the wolves on the green
After the football game.

Robert Rorabeck

Books Of History

She had a silver moon cusped in her bosom,
Like a second hand trinket traded
At the flea market:
Or was it blue. I meant to ask her,
But she wouldn't talk to me,
How she rippled in the waves the baseball
Players and giants wept for her:
The basins they watch her in, her nudity
An insouciant television show which just ripples:
And I see her from outside the window,
The curtains blowing like negligee.
And I am out on that yard, but I don't belong,
And I cannot hear her speaking,
But her lips move with the homeopathy of Shrunken mollusks, move like the whispered thoughts
Of gravity: I could knock on her door,
But not enter there, her home the shell which clouds
The bay where the conquistadors disappeared
From the books of history.

Robert Rorabeck

Boothill

Now the words are thrown out
Ashes of the dead beloved to scatter
From where the breathing look
Across the desert atmosphere.
Here, where petals soon come to wilt
After the crowds of distant families
Disperse, the words lay thirstily
Upon their backs with open throats,
Waiting for the generosity of the Universal bartender, but it does
Not rain for them. They are laid
In the row of tombstones jutting
From the jaws of Boothill,
And their ghosts do not speak to them,
The way their mothers once did when
They were still young and learning their voice.
They are the empty center of this town
Which moves the way ants do— never away
From their work, the forgotten dreams
And ancestors their unattended to garden,
Beautiful bones that once displayed lips left to scatter by the Elements, the cold things, the only
Things that bother to brush them,
Scraping away the entirety of their meaning,
Until they are caught up in the earth
And twisted under the boots of the workers,
The only things to remain, marching, accounting to
The government, and the words, the unblemished
Memories that once touched the fingertips of lovers
Lay barren and muted, scattered upon their dry hill.

Robert Rorabeck

Boreal

Through their anemic wonderings
The family drives by the Real unicorn on their way
To Disney World-

There, above the power lines,
Is a yellow kite bobbing
That will never know again
The tug of the human hand-

From the east,
The sea is vulgarly lapping
The shore like a beast for affection,
And her eyes

And her eyes turn away
To him,
In the red bricked garden
Where professors tell stories
Just before nap time in kindergarten-

They sleep together
Nuzzled by their dogs in another world:
Contented to see no more,
She drifts away into the soft matrimony

Never to be thought of again,
The way our eyes hit like
Light surviving from two ends of An impossible forest.

Robert Rorabeck

Bosom Of Humid Secrets

Jesus- blasphemy this disease,
Here I am out cursing underneath the beautiful
Trees:
Every evening doing this while the greater public
Shoots off to baseball games;
Watch my mouth, feed my dogs, and pray,
Tell god about who I loved today-
Stewardesses served me drinks, and showed Me leg,
But it was all but a necessary game; they were Just hungry, they had children and wolf pups
To feed-
They lactated their honeys for dimes and jobs:
All sorts of jobs, the women undressed beneath
The eaves,
Getting suited up for better offices,
Skipping across the canal, the underworld,
The pornography molting in the junkyard under the Chirping overhang of Australian Pines and palm
Trees-
Lots of changes with meaning: blue birds out in The open, the storms, the hurricanes, the sugar canes Burning; and if it is beautiful, then it is real and the Wildlife worth feeding,
To steal and show to god and let run across the Green carpet where you've been quietly bleeding,
Waiting for me to come home from the show
With your bosom of humid secrets waiting.

Robert Rorabeck

Boston, Massachusetts

I happen to be real and in the pains of my immaterial zed novels
I birth the stillborn beliefs of my sterile beauty and religious Beliefs;
But for tonight, Alma, I kissed the lips of my broken Virgin of Guadalupe
And it rained
And I wanted to bring you fireworks: the fires arced over the emasculated
Sea as you sank into his arms:
And the grass grew up around your house and above its roofs the sororities
Of clouds basked:
While you never made it up the steep avenues to college:
You never even got out of high school in Mexico, but you are still someone's Favorite student, even if she wasn't a good teacher:
And now I am doing all of this as my irreconcilable failure,
Remembering how girls once loved me, and how I held you last Thursday
And led you to my bedroom and undressed you:
Your feet are so small, Alma, and I weigh twice as much as you;
And you have never been to Colorado, even though you claim to have Take a plane all the way up to Boston, Massachusetts.

Robert Rorabeck

Both Of My Hungriest Arms

Yes,
This night whispers up and down into
The shadows of love makers,
And even the lights of the windows are dimmed
Behind the palms;
And it is really beautiful, and I don't Even feel qualified enough to tell you how beautiful
It is,
But it is as beautiful as the one armed woman with
The pretty face shopping for palm trees I knew Nothing about:
I was just standing there in a slice of sun out
Amongst the Dominican pottery thinking
Of Sharon,
Because she made pottery in High school,
And she even tried to trap me in art class,
While even then I was all about hiding one side
Of my face or the Other from beautiful Sharon,
Thinking that I could run so far away from there,
And the woman pulled around
And smiled so brightly and so demure,
Her eyes wanting me to keep looking into her eyes
As she motioned outside the van
That she was just showing her husband what beautiful changes
We'd already made to the place,
And when my eyes fell down to her missing limb,
As I guess she knew that they must,
I wondered if her soul diminished a little, and ran away
Too:
For her hand was clearly missing, though it made
Her no less beautiful;
And I wonder if that is how you might think of me,
Considering all that I have which has gone missing like
Bits of knights cut from the round table to go
Searching for your sweetly everlasting liquors in high basins and Aeries,
Far from the trains and the systems, like the words from my stolen

Liquors I send out every night using the Advantage of both of my hungriest arms.

Robert Rorabeck

Both Of These Things

Peeks clouded in ennui: I don't even think they Could even be real,
As schools are closing, and teachers are going on vacation,
But eventually all of it clears and maybe I can make love to
You again:
Alma, maybe I can write the lines that will keep my love burning
For you forever:
And you'll never even have to go to Washington DC,
Because as they start out they will begin building all of the monuments
Right around you,
And the lifeguards will baptize you and you will make love down where
The truants smoke in the high velocity sea
Over which even the most steely of airplanes seem like wishful feathers,
Because I love you, Alma, and you are beautiful,
And both of these things will always be....

Robert Rorabeck

Both Our Virgin And Our Mary

My hats are off in support for the congratulations of This country:
And to the forts who have been saved, or who have been conquered
Brawling in giant squares which dwarf the tenements
And the trailer parks with their brisk fires and Cauldrons of beers:
But I have stolen my hats anyways during the Mondays when we Were all right here,
Waiting knee deep in the torpid estuaries of semi permeable
Fairytale- with our knuckles
Clenched around the tangles of mangroves and jungled fairies
Through the torn down wall
Where even our best men were defeated by your dimpled brown
Breasts who'd hiked so far from Mexico,
Your fingers the forks of snakes curling through the water breaks
As they tasted the vines of our hearts:
And reach up, tore us down like weeds, as the overeager wind
Tares down the tents over fireworks:
Making us work doubly wearied, so that we could only come home
To you, just as with what happens to unrequited beauty at the Summit of gravity:
Baring our muscled forearms and our wind milled tattoos,
Admitting to you that we were your day laborers, and the whippoorwill
Songs from our throats were not contrary- and on waterparks
We had walked for you, as if coming down from the parks of soft hills,
Seeing your soul through your unmarried chest:
Alma- For you were the only woman for us: both our virgin and our Mary.

Robert Rorabeck

Bottom Of The Bottomless Sea

Torpedoes in twilight
With the mosquito biplanes,
And the polygamies of ire- the spotter
Marked the Bismarck, and you were over
That like a galloping cloud, a nimbus of ill refute,
Riding high a kilter on the steed with a Florida
License plate,
The busy parks where failing lawyers dine,
The initial casualties who got us caught up in this Kind war- The sun cuts a dividing line across
The mellowing yard, as if to say it is now your Time to step forward, to disembark from your Virginity, to lay down your maidenhead at supper;
Thus, you performed well for your distended family,
Of which you swelled out from the infected wound,
The vermilion spore at first beautiful like a beam,
Though steadily more irksome and unsettling,
A condition of unfettered laughter barking in the Parking lot as the footsteps approach the room;
The spotter marked the Bismarck, the greatest ship
Of its century, but the trusty sopwith with its discerning
Eye dropped the charge towards its belly;
Skipping waves, dripping with the semen of its advance,
And sunk the powderkeged behemoth like an apoplectic
Bloom, a harem of gasoline, and the young German didn't Even have a chance,
But he is still storming through his life sleeping at the Bottom of the overpass
At the bottom of the bottomless sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Boudoir's Memory

Pocket words,
A thimble full of fruit:

The cross is strong and well held still
By the eyes of heavy weight tourists:

I haven't been to that town for years,
Nor the Spanish, nor the British;

But they owned it once,
And I owned it too, and write letters
To its waves through my scars,

And the women who work there serving
Lunch, fluffing bedrooms for little girls:

I have written about them south of them.
I have written about them northwest of them,

But east is the sea and it is too grand to write,
Too verbose in ferality: a thousand legions of cheerleaders
And sororities, and all those flavors of that crush;

They comb there as if trapped in a boudoir's memory,
And wet and swim in scissor cuts;
They think none at all of me, basined in swells
And caesuras;

And I think I should drive that way and sit and lounge
Just as well as forever where they play;
Or buy a house on a burry mound
Over looking their selky playground;
It is just as well that I do.

Robert Rorabeck

Bouquets Of Liquor, Bouquets Of Lips

As this liquor begins to cool,
I first pee and then will Ejaculate in the tall grasses where
The bizarre snow has been accumulating:
Pretty soon,
I will be selling fireworks with the real descendants
Of a trick rider,
And there will be whisky,
And maybe a few high velocity bullets,
On highway 66 where I cried your name
As the competition fired mortars into me,
But I didn't care,
As I try to figure myself out,
And where you are, and how you might be called,
Especially who you love,
And the anonymous hillocks and mountains
I named after you, as if you gave a damn:
Who do you love,
And if that love is real, make a paper airplane
Out of it and toss it across the canal,
For soon there will be a fire all over here,
And nothing can be saved, Even though there are still graduates,
And strange declarations leapfrogging across
The celibate rivers,
And the wishing wells, the lucid estuaries
Of our childhood high school-
I am only pretending to be drunk, Erin-
But I am every bit the lost child of the gold spined
Story books, and if you are a good women,
With the fermented yeasts stirring beside the breasts
Of mothering cows, do not forgive me,
Unless you dare to believe what I say is wholesome,
And your breasts are the fulfilled dewdrops of the Pasture outside your home.
There is no secrets to this flawed text:
Every word is for you, dearly longing,
And though I may have to look at unfamiliar women
Tonight in order for me to exacerbate my need to seed the Earth, and thus nod to sleep in chainsawing snores,

You know every word of every imperfect line
Has been for you, Erin.... If you love me or not,
Inside my little books, I keep on scribbling you
A library which will one day disappear,
Though I am no killer, and have nothing useful to say,
Though everything has been lucid, especially your brown eyes,
And if you feel the need to forget me, do so,
Because I am not pretty,
But I will be around,
And even though tonight I will look at other women
Before I become exhausted, remember you are the only one,
And my hand on my flesh is only for you,
Wishing it was your flesh spoken in warm spittle,
And the engorged strangenesses of your bouquets,
And me saying the pledge of allegiance is for you,
And the flag swaying in your hips,
Which is all, if you gave a damn, surfing in the enunciations
Of your poor but perfect heaven,
In the cypresses and gaudy pastures of Her uncertain amnesias.

Robert Rorabeck

Bouquet Of Eels

Wishes in the daylight as the wounds of ourselves
Spill over,
And coagulated with the nurseries in the afternoons
Where my love for you disappears,
And I find myself alone reciprocating to the echoes
Of the vineyards far away from the mountains
And no longer busied by Christmas:
Just my pitiful art, held to the moonlight in the shallows
And tied by a bouquet of eels:
While your passion finds another chariot to ride upon:
Up and up again, past the stalagmites
And the industrious mines where all of the cherished
Knights are buried:
So, eventually, the mountain gets emptied,
And the dragons, in clusters, consume the fires of heaven
And other pretty verbs that used to be tied up in Translucent or indigo ribbons in your hair-
As the elephants wander aimlessly, as the airplanes leap into Air.

Robert Rorabeck

Bouquet Of Empty Songs

Unbeknownst to the vanishing castle,
The highways all but vanished as the sun did,
And put the egrets into the cypress.
And put the waves away, as with a brush stroke:
Put the mermaids
And the manatees into the somnolence of the bay:
And shushed the cars as well,
And closed the fruit markets- and emptied
The daylight's well: and my love for you was gone
As the waves crested waves in the darkness:
But all of the things I thought I'd thought
For you- I couldn't even spell-
And I could no longer open up to you the things
I'd hoped to sell- and the many feet of
The echoing throngs disappeared like the octopi
In the depths that spread of like roses from a
Bouquet of empty songs.

Robert Rorabeck

Bouquets

Standing in a blue abscess, wounded around
The eyes:
The nocturnal pugilists countingimps,
And the gates awash with freezing water
The blue spruce cried-
And other planes coaxing down: inside their Golden necks, their stewardesses all
Asleep-
The weather about them a blanket that pulls
At them softly,
The sea, a mother waiting in the deeps-
While each pine tree rises just for them,
Nocturnal spectators in the senses of the hills:
And they go over them, nodding in
Sorority,
As the hillsides sigh, damply drunken,
And holding up to them bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

Bouquets Of Seahorses

Making airplanes to land in water fountains—
As the days slip like cowardly serpents in a bouquet of Palmettos—
The keys of my soul dancing out another canvas—
Like strange spiders doing what is natural,
Skirting across the surfaces of some juvenile god's Drinking fountain,
The beautiful women drunk and nubile and beautiful—
Just halfway through all of the world,
As the sculpture of a palace slips into the tears of All of her inescapable daydreams—
Mermaids glimpsed between the caesuras—smelling of Bouquets of seahorses and other lands not so
Far away from her that all of her teachers say do not exist.

Robert Rorabeck

Boys Who Are Doves

And boys as light as doves,
Who are doves,
Swim in the nimbus,
The kidnapping rainstorms
Who curl into homes
Nestle in the backyard swimming holes:
The deluge of their mothers' soul
Broken from the eyes;
But they are gone
And ever will be young,
Until their memories stain the creek
And their mothers' tombs/
They are there in the future
Playing in the white field
As the new city builds its crosses/
And they are there swinging over
The abyssal planes,
As the phalanx of sunlight
Lances the bosoming waves-
When they congress
They play a ring around the hurricane,
And the laughter is the prick of the spine
Along the beach without a shadow
Where the men in the ghost less cars
Can never observe,
Returning home to careless wives,
The weightlessness of their lost brothers.

Robert Rorabeck

Boys With No Name

Words who like customers come in Awfully late,
But who are they to say: they are looking beautiful
And they have mistaken the halogens for
A baseball field of sun:
And one team has one, and the other has looked into my Eyes,
To see that I am scarred, and their eyes know
And will know forever as they look away,
As they turn to Africa and all that cliched darkness:
As my old teachers come into the fruit market and Remind my mother of tattoos I got in Barcelona my Junior year of high school:
The last time I made love was in a Spanish orange grove
Overlooking the cliffs,
The perfumes of citrus and suicide,
Like a super sweet commercial:
But even girls in Colorado don't care- When they yawn,
When they stretch handily in their taught yard
The tickle the simple vertebrae of airplanes
And make stewardesses dream too of boys with No name.

Robert Rorabeck

Brand New Home

Bums work and engines burn,
And I am traveling through time: Today Alma asked Me what color my hair was growing up,
And I want to take her on Monday to my backyard where the lions Still roar and
The alligators promenade,
Where the comets keep their sororities of dimwit light bulbs over
The green fields and the sugarcane:
I want to burn for Alma:
I want to really light up for her, and turn her around and show her every Last aspect of her reasons,
Like an alligator newly aware of her blindsides,
And I want to call up stewardesses from the dank alleys of canals
For Alma,
And I want to lay Alma down in the sweet young aloe beside my Mother's carport,
And I want to sing until my throat is a pitchfork glowing in A fire of burning monsters for
Alma:
I want to start a ride in her name that I can never get off, like the river walk
At the Alamo in
San Antonio Texas, where her ancestors defeated mine,
And called them gringos and tramped on their dead and bent trumpets,
Because Alma is a butterfly driving to and from her house
Into and out of her two worlds of work and home,
As I imagine this same situation is repeated in so many routines across the Country,
The casual strangers of the workplace hitting and discombobulating
Home,
Only, Alma, you don't know me, or how bright my tomb is,
I can be your anumbis- I can be your gentle throb: I can take you to the Movies when you are not home,
And I can do this all night, and give you the same voice as the rainstorms
Of wildcats that will pick you up and displace you into A brand new home.

Branded (Censored)

Anything can be purchased
Inside 7 seconds:
H-rd-ons, hangovers,
And Happy-Meals
Here in America's Drive-thru (Dear God)
We are all up for sale
Our love-lives are commercials
Selling our lo-n's lettuce,
Product placements
We drive around with our children,
We remove their heads early and cheap
With pacifying machetes /free trade genocide/
And tattoo them with the Billboards of our
Gods/ Headless, driving over the land
The tin herds run on
The sheer surface under the sun/
Everything is the constant motion
As this sphere is sold,
Bodies moving and pretending
To succeed in getting things done,
Like trees playing around
In the storm

The marketplace trembles
Opening 24 hr. systems of thought
Dedicated to the cycles of deliberation
We work and celebrate under,
The categorizations of the day to better ourselves:
The gated community, the name-brand
Purchased and inspected by the well-manicured
Hand moving around and around like
A pair of roller-skates under the sparkle of Dead skins draping our shadows in a
Pretending light.

Branded:

Spread across the c-ck as it shoots and Stains, wasted in the cement when Bastard things continue to grow
Neon lights blazing the filament garden,
Our heads beginning the steady drift together,
The tide of buying and selling,
The natural selection of this community
(And I so God-damned estranged to it!)
Taught to us, pitched into us like the Spear
Of Longinus from every angle available:
The hideous beautiful torture available to us,
Like bolts from Medieval crossbows
Quilled in skulls, like eager housewives
Warming to the false brightness, the gentle
Death of the shopping mall, the flytrap-
Middle-Class concentration camps

Their men fat, balding,
With great flatulence from
Sunday afternoon chips and guacamole,
While they watch College football,
The useless education of the State that Schooled them,

Propaganda in the kitchen:
Their women the beautiful shells,
The plastic dolls
With multitudinous curves,
Like a highway shooting it's Body northwards along California's Coast,
That allows them to slip down
The road like silver-gilled
Fish
Their bounding bo-bs
And fat blue lips
Catching my eye

As they crawl in and out
Of their shells.

Brave Enough To Tell You

I drink rum, I am so amazed that the plastic
Remains of cowboys and Indians still populate the shelves
Of toy stores;
Or that you still are my candy store: Maybe this weekend
I will forget about you as I shell out,
As I start spending a half hour's worth of time near the airport
With a girl from Spain:
They all come from Spain, originally, girls:
Even blue eyed and milky skinned, they were all birthed in Catalonia underneath the milky clocks
When I was just a young thing in high school and not a single One could teach me a thing:
That was the when and where girls have come from,
And I am glad that I could remember enough and also that I was brave enough to tell you, my love.

Braving So Many A Nightly Storm

If I am sailing now to even the heights
Of Tenochtitlan
It is because even now my scars are golden,
And I have a flag of your hair
That my lips are always blowing;
And it seems to be the very energy
Of the part of you
That can never fail; In fact, it is the very part that You cannot remember,
That used to leaven you and took you up past the Quagmire of leaden stones which Played havoc with your compass;
And why I am always writing love poems about
You,
It is because of this homeopathic spell I hold
In my gut or in my heart,
And the fact that I cannot spell it with any certainty
Only proves it even more:
The coral snake that went to a warm place in my beer
And pierced my Adam's apple going down,
Just a small reminder that Satan knows who
I am:
The horned devil who lives in your cellar,
That you don't suppose to deny, because his fruit is so Sweet. I just want to move in there with him,
Next to the wine bottles
And cenotaphs of the usual conquistadors
And listen to your noise making bed above our heads,
Like the halls of a merchant ship out
Braving so many a nightly storm.

Brea$t Feeding

She looks dynamite.
She feeds her baby apple-sauce-
He wants teat-
There isn't any worms;
It is in the middle of the summer solstice:
She has an athletic figure,
But she isn't getting any jobs.
Romeo loves Juliet,
But their love bombs:
French-kissing caught them too many
Germs a good week before midterms.

The apothecary carries hemlock,
He doesn't have any qualms;
The lady is in the lake. She looks
Beautiful raising both her arms.
The knight goes cantering over the Drawbridge-
The drawbridge is in a figure eight,
A skating rink where the priests
Are punting psalms.
The hermaphrodite's displayed in the Tank, he/she catching cold and Qualms,
But we go down to the sea to watch
The turtles hatching, little blackish daubs;
And the albatross amongst the seagulls' glut,
Brings us hope of good luck,
So we kiss, and cross the feeding mother,
The infant, ruddy cheeked in the sauce,
Seems to understand hunger's shrieking song;

But it still wants teat,
And now it wont be long-
The woman has an agent
And they are negotiating over lunch.
Romeo and Juliet sleeping in the grassy
Foreplay without a hint of hunch,
The knight galloping to the clink,

To save his misinformed brothers from
The green ax's knick.
The sea-grass' lady raising arms,
The infinite teenagers tracing her gifted charms,
The fine young priests selling pop-corn and Buttercups get paid in alms.
The albatross resting on the marble cross
Seems to stop and reason over the both of us.
The hermaphrodite, he/she is left to be,
And so we watch he/she swimming with the Fortunate young amphibians deeper out to sea.

Breakfast And Then High School

Green unicorn replete in the snow fields,
Nurses her foals
Under a massing nursery of clouds- as the horny toads
Watch
Underneath the alligator junipers
Down the hill from my father's house-
A blind man, he sees nothing,
But hears the wolves at night-
And when they leap to the second story,
To steal away my sisters on their Hoary backs- no one can tell which Way they are going-
The moon closes her curtains- and the Vulpine shadows coalesce:
They go to hidden brooks were tadpoles are Married,
Where slender fires burn through the Sisterhoods of aspen,
Like a serpent selecting which one he will
Love,
And give his clandestine knowledge to them-
As my sisters are made brides
After midnight,
But are returned home in a metamorphosis of
Breakfast and then high school-
Nocturnal things that somehow survive during
The day,
Smiling, but no longer believing a word
Their blind father tells them,
As he nails his own thumb to the door-
And they try not to make a sound.

Breathe Someday Haiku

Like the flowering
Of Water I am going to breathe someday.

Breathing In The Echoers

The pageantry of her eyes calling
Like a crisp dollar bill
While the sun and the ceiling fans are snoring—
There she is in a clip of stars
Beholding the fanfare of her sisters—
Girls in the silky forests and the crenulated waves—
I think I know who they are—I've seen them
From the fort even though they always
Seem so far away—
Taking up all of the space that they please,
But hidden—lapsing in the shadows—
Brilliance of copper bodies reanimated—
Their bodies like fans—
Breathing in the echoes of gills and leaves.

Breathing The Water

Glittering fish of our world,
Weren't you won at a fair in the middle of
Some newly past year:
A prize not even for Christmas, you weren't supposed
To survive this long,
And that is why we have to forget about you-
And sing our song of death over your cold,
Bright bodies:
And sing to you as you proceed through the unusual
Merriment of your glass rooms:
We won you without a care- and you have no
Name- and you are going nowhere.
But there you are- on the eaves of some house
Underneath some stars and a moon-
Just as we are:
Without a care, breathing the water, swimming in Air.

Bright And Coital Philanthropy

Daydreaming of grazing on a god,
Heaven seems almost possible:
Strange indescribable eyes are caught in
The teal bosoms of someone's mountains,
Her armpits the concavity of insouciant chalices
That could drape her body over my own,
Like riding in a cloud bank on a fair holiday.
All that spirit the traffic couldn't arrive at,
Hunting for her, but going home without Her womb,
A hutch of flowers some rabbit tongues and nibbles,
Making the sky squeak like a well used bicycle,
Making the moon change colors like a chameleon
Anemone,
Like the epiphanious ornament crowning the Christmas tree,
And then she coos to her child like banks of snow
Sliding down from the altruisms of all too red institutions,
And we go to sleep for awhile,
A kine drunk in its blistery meadows, sated and tonguetied
By what it supposed it should never have
The lay of the land shifty with snoozes and avenues
Of concordant wills supposing in common shelter
Underneath the mobiles of this gift basket of Suddenly bright and coital philanthropy.

Bright As The Brightest Bright

Oh, you night- you poof up sirens,
Finally to uneasy capsizing bed you keep me from Remembering to look at and worry
Over my face,
That I didn't continue school- that this is my mausoleum
Of consternated chrysalis;
And I really like you, batwing cenotaph shuddered in the lake
Of your mascots:
All the teachers and students have come off of you now
Like water off a duck's back, but you're still up
There counting in your zoos,
Like sitcom on so long it now has nothing to prove:
So many fans and harems and country boys with their Electric guitars:
You shoot your mouth full of soap in the arcades of Catholic Schools,
Because you are so in Charge: and all of this has been a fable
For me that has casually rhymed,
I've forgotten the girls I've slept with, but for you I always Turn out in rhyme:
And the cities, and the buildings of our species are like waves:
They are like copies of hallucinations:
They are the same of the same; but this definition of love
I had to steal from myself,
As I would take you down and give you oral pleasure stolen
From your shelf:
I would do this for you and turn you out into the night, and plug you
With my flesh, and make your lightbulb as Screaming and embarrassed down the hallways of our promised
Highschool as brighte as the brightest bright.

Bright New Cars

They decorated the star-well
Until they became the center
Of gravity's loose attention
And all the eyes of their peers
Shone toward them like Cadillacs
Falling headfirst down a sinkhole
Through the highway/
They went to bed naked and
Had ceaseless love until their Sheets became like the heavenly
Layers leading up to God,
Stained and bleeding

Who promoted them to Squad leaders, put a down payment
On their house in a gated and well-lit
Community
And bought them both bright
New cars.

Brighter Than Any Fireworks I Have To Sell

Dancing on the plebian shores,
I can pretend to have all the answers without knowing all of the words,
Like Shakespeare smearing the bones of pigeons to all of His dogs,
Like water coloring above the grand canyon and all of the words
She carries to her graves,
The out of print and apocryphal hymns that grandmothers never had
To give in church:
And this is what it means to be out of print and singing to my Spanish
Turtledove:
Singing to you, Alma, from my drunken coves, trying to meet
My quotas for your spent though ageless love;
Because you love me now, Alma, and you've said it before driving home,
While I still have so many fireworks to sell,
While your eyes light up across my body brighter than any poems that I have to spend, and again, brighter than any fireworks I have to sell.

Brilliant Fraternity Of Knavish Satellites

Maybe I remember the time when you
Were here,
Like a sailboat underneath the moon,
Ferris wheel in my heart-
And the heavens flagged around your Superstructure,
Like the lucky housewives at the supermarket:
All of them beautiful sights,
Made up as they go, being pulled as if Waves and their husbands
A brilliant fraternity of knavish satellites.

Brilliant Roman Candles

In a sad world of brilliant roman candles
You get your picture taken in the middle of the school day—
You've had so many boyfriends you cannot remember—
The candlelight goes out over your birthday—
And then you go to sleep
Underneath a fake Christmas tree—
And while you are sleeping, I enjoy you while I've been Drinking—and the starlight comes out and shoots off
At a safe distance—I am sure you will find your love
Tomorrow, wherever—but there are just so many places
Left to live—sometime in the spring of next year,
My wife will give birth to our child if she Is lucky—
But until that happens I have nothing else that I can Give.

Brilliant Survivors Of The Dark World

Little boys run in blue shirts
And black shorts on brown walls,
Of rooms of missing girls
In New Jersey
I want you to come on a run with me
To Africa,
Where the animals can talk
With Alice's primitive ancestors,
Even though she is dying
Of stage four cancer
With her daughter in Vermont;
Old people in newspaper houses
In the subway,
Come upside on Christmas Day
To sell things
For show and tell
In the elementary school of Bavaria
Where girls hide dolls in nests
With silver chalices and mirrors
Rocking in the wind,
Towers above the land where Wolves are circling,
Circling all they control,
Their tongues lulling in
The armies of the moon surround
The outlines of men of chalk,
In forensic work books
The bright girls can finish early
And leave for home
Skipping through the springy trees,
Reciting Latin to the woodsmen,
They are eclipses in the night,
Brilliant survivors of the dark work.

Bringing In The Sheep

Forlorn characters migrate and forage
Upon the open planes of newly printed
Novels;
Their movements, the paradox of reflections,
Imitating our own,
Gives us pleasures and minor erections
To see the author's mimicry, how she Has refracted what she has learned into
A spiny meal;
Close to finishing with the first part,
I think about her in New England, my fingerprints
Now all over this crop she has grown,
Doing a good job of mimicking Dickens,
Sowing her petite mort into the product,
Once marketed will buy her meals, but this
Is one dame who will never feel the cruel
Job of the cutting tools, the self inflicted wounds
Baked and sat brightly dysfunctional at the Dinner tables; for her tastes is for the novel
Gentry, picnicking far from the bitter,
Though bravest stones, and yet shows me how much further
I have to go; for it is a sad dance one must do
To cross the perilous mountain in the snows,
And it is a lonely kiss one must know,
To bring their children out from the senile mine,
And parade them in melodies until they Molt, and are revealed in unchallenged recitations,
In lines in fealty to their owner's soul,
Shepherded through the burry forest, and then Brought into the revelations of their acknowledged home.

Broken Glass

Broken for so long without any glue,
Like glass on the short arch of the bridge leading home:
The color is beautiful but dangerous to touch,
For it has been hording sun, and the edges are sharp:
Down stream in the insouciant evening,
Where almost every color mingles, and otters,
And alligators, the vivacious foxes in the shallows courting
Water moccasins, their young's red feet tracking
Playful mayhem in the loose anthills,
Cords of wood floating in blue clouds of sleepy midges.
The lights are coming on from the little houses amidst the trees,
But I cant still go home, for I am shattered though cooling.
How her eyes lied to me across the street in the classroom,
How my skin failed her in the moment our souls would touch.
The delicate breathing of the quieter things, the fruit
Bats who come out in a cycloning math from the plate of The bridge, the bicycles which ride by frantically,
The skunk which lingers, the turtles which bobber like
Molasses in the darkening cools; but none of this she'll ever see,
For she is in a home across the way being fed by her mother
Who is on her third glass of wine, answering innumerable Phone calls for her daughter, afraid they will distract her
From the homework and the game shows which like company;
The moon is out and she is bleeding the silk which traps the nights,
And the bridge is in the crickets' orchestras, and I am all alone watching a cottonmouth move the fluting reeds
Like a slight gentleman.

Robert Rorabeck

Brontosaurus With A Blue Hair Lip

Brontosaurus with a blue hair lip
Trying to kiss the stewardess over the river
That is really a stream:
There, she seems to bend in towards you though
She is truly disgusted by you-
And I wonder what game she is busy at playing-
And the sunlight is the color of Silver and as busy as bees over the still open
Coffins over the still open graves,
But over their shoulders they are having some kind
Of carnival in the careening valleys of
All of Mexico-
And the skeletons are dancing with the skeletons
Of the horses-
The pinwheels are leaping with the worms and
The lips,
And it is crazy, crazy how I was not invited-
Because surely, if I was, it would have put an end
To all of this.

Robert Rorabeck

Brown And Agile Child

There is nothing more than this,
To say that it is enough and now to lie down
In my agile drowning,
While newer birthdays come for the paradoxical
Old,
And it takes something more than just being liberal,
When her eyes are so deeply auburn they hurt,
And in all her pictures with her lost boys
Who she pretends are just her friends,
She is always showing a bit of tongue, as if in quiet
Sexy challenge,
And it is the organ best used for verbs and jests,
But not for the quieter things
Which come out and slip through the suburban Trees after midnight, slip into the easy lakes and Concrete streams which really are just yoked curbs;
And I could say now that I would love her,
If the seasons fell over her, and her eyes swung like Leafy estuaries Thoreau would have liked to move Into,
And the clock is silent, and the crocodile approaches
Silently too, and that is why there are so many things
Who are dangerous,
And her eyes most of all, even after we have packed up,
And the sail is over where the moon is quietly skimming
The neighborhood's canopy—Her eyes will look over Us silently, supposing,
And there will be a greater intake in which we will find
Our young reticence being filled and looked upon
By someone so beautiful that she is deadly to be alive with,
And there is nothing we could say that would challenge
Her to move closer to us,
To say anything more with the rich, deadly eyes,
Who have already won for her everything we cherish or Would have taken upon us those selfish gifts to steal.

Brown Bag Of Reasons

Night fills up the yards: all of the yards, bottled into Their uncertainty:
The penchant for fretfulness, which the airplanes try their luck
At escaping:
All the words made for abuses, starting the fires, or the first Words in the throat of an abandoning letter:
The lions separated like two dogs done with a fight,
Halfway way eaten
And whispering with the foxes under the grapes:
The new lines that start like waves then and carry out towards Their haunts of those destinations,
Like manless ships going out across the night, the fertile orchards
Laying in their séances of ghosts,
The universities attended by the shadows,
And then the rumors of tears, cousins to the rain, which makes
The world fattened, fertile,
And gives her a brown bag of reasons to come and season again.

Robert Rorabeck

Brown Embers Of Your Children

I cannot remember the points of your country—
Of how many star-fruit you put into a basket for a Bitter easter,
Everything twined about your brown shoulders—
Brown rabbit made it all of the way from Mexico to make love and hurt me for A year and her embers
Until I decided to disappear because I kind of knew how—
Into the middle class into which I was supposed to ascend—
Busied at nothing,
And I found a wife whom I rode bicycles with
And fell in love with,
Even though I could do nothing about you—disappearing,
You left a scar
That contributed to my alcoholism and my afternoons
Alone troubled by what it was between you—
And the two brown embers of your children—
That would not allow you to leave-

Robert Rorabeck

Brown On Brown

Saturday schools of canals, of wild otters playing with Rolled grapefruit,
Of star-fruit and snails,
Of the wicked fairy-tales of water-moccasins twined
Like barbed wire on the rood:
Elizabeth teaches everything that is good,
But once her light fails,
I still want the underbelly of airplanes, the venal escargot
Of your beefy entrails:
I want to say your name and invade the country of your Caves:
I want to paint your art and lick your slaves:
Oh, living cadaver of darts and valentines,
Brown, brown eyes:
You who love all the boys and go out onto the basket courts
For dinner time,
Spend one down struck evening with me:
Unbutton your blouse like you've done for every Mouse in the entire infested house,
And lay your eyes softly down in the crèche of my own
Brown:
Lay your hands and body brown down into my Graying town,
And we will hold out while the oil leaks,
While the rivers creak, while the sun is going down over all of This playground-
By our anonymous things unrequited prom king and Queen,
What a luscious venal scene:
Brown on brown, sand dollar-otter,
Sugar cane burning town- with the sun going,
Going, gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Brown Shoulders Of A Muse

We'll share our own portions with
The forked tongue of a king—
He has come into our garden while we were Kissing toads and lucky rabbits feet,
While our mother was doing the wash in
The grotto underneath the orange tree:
Where some kittens died,
Pressed like beautiful flowers against the Stacks of rebar we pound closely into the Ground at Christmas to sell Christmas trees—
And still, even now—the sun is Burning—blue ship going down—won't it
Still be cerulean—it wasn't long ago
That we lost our identity—
Going away upon the brown shoulders of a muse—
As she travelled up the highways with her family—
Now the airplanes sound overhead like golden
Arrowheads shooting into the heavens—
Going to spear the other side of the world where I am sure you will find my wife waiting for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Bucolic Pietas

I need to get out of here
As fast as I can,
And surround myself with the personifications
Of nature in the tallest of forests
Innocent of patriarchal gravity,
Or mothering worries and caveats:
For, if I followed the tresses and the bounding
Play of my hounds, I might find an open meadow,
Like a theatre or green mouth,
And lay back inside that sloping throat, as
The clouds passed like insouciant thoughts
Where there were no ghosts bigger than my hand,
Where truth ambled with happy lovers perpetually
Unjaded by the higher catastrophes of people
Bound by obligations and savage business habits.

Robert Rorabeck

Building Up To Snow

Desiring to runaway
Between the Places that move,
These airplanes have Cold feet,
The clouds are
Not long enough
For their tails
In their theatre of
Sky
Building up to snow.

Robert Rorabeck

Bull's Eye

Spinning and a trinket of colors,
Maybe somewhere still in the young valleys in the middle Of adolescence,
When it was all sweating but demure;
And I held your eyes, if not your hand until my Bicycle took me away
Until the dreams were gone and things had migrated
And we made love,
And your eyes were so brown like butterflies with infinite
Pictures of themselves on their Wings;
And your body meaning everything, which was the very same thing
As your name:
Alma,
Which is your soul, scoring on me bull's eye.

Robert Rorabeck

Burning At Both Ends

Home of kitty cats and blonde headed housewives,
I just want to be in the absolute darkness with all
These bandages and scars:
My heart needs a darkened table to survive;
And though the daily mothers are very beautiful,
They are as migratory and borderline
Eye candy:
I cannot get through the day without thinking about
You,
And the way you peel away through the night,
Listening to the bold crickets of your high circus
Night- and you've already married a better man without A sliver of waste, who is more skilled at technical Climbing,
But I still want to share bloody and rare cuts of meat
With you, if I should ever evolve and become a pugilistic
Journalist brave enough to climb the magical beanstalk
Of highways up to be with you in your swell shops
While the bilious lips of winter solstice finds no surcease,
And the paper crafts keeping piling up over the avalanche
Of wet clay you've forgotten to bake;
And even though our high schools are far away in another
Fairyland, we stave off the reintroduced empiricism of Wolves by keeping our candles burning at both ends.

Robert Rorabeck

Burrowed Ground

I am the king of remote control boats,
In my little unnatural habitat off to one side
Of the show-
Past the peanut-ed pacaderms, and the orthodontine
Lions:
Giving of my good side beside the unlucky carousel,
Like a teal mold,
Like something dashy and cheap from the other side
Of the earth:
And I have everything I might want to control
Stuck to my thumbs like a joystick;
And there are pleasure ships and destroyers and even
A real live
Fresh water otter I stole one evening while skipping
School from the bust of a housewife
In her aimless come and go;
And he squeal and cracks chirping farts with his favorite
Barbie up on deck,
Enjoying a thimble martini; and the housewives
And single mothers come in with their little boys,
Their important though permanent treasures-
With fingerprints on soda pop and ketchup;
And they put in their quarters to my sideshow,
While the lions roar and the wild horses bray and the Fleas dance atop all of us,
And I conduct them, grinning sideways, my eyebrows
In a mad genius corkscrew and for Their little while and their little ways they conduct their Invisible crew through my giant bathtub,
And the elephants sound a primal revelry,
And the lions show their teeth,
While the great and long winded terrapins take their luscious
Orchids and little deeper into the shade of the Burrowed ground.

Burying Words

Christian dogs recalculate how Much money they brought to the rodeo;
But they don't really know what to do with her
Beautiful eyes in the sun,
Or what they may say as they go about telling them
Everything with out a tongue;
Or so I've seen or heard say before:
Now I lounge inside of house without a wife,
And poems come like little children with butcher knives;
But they cannot reach me from where they are with Scowling lips that cannot spell:
They do not know the words they say, and that is Why they lay down without supper by the end of dusk:
All the unpublished schoolyard boys lay down as if in a kiln,
Not able to be sold, not a single word, the freckled pests:
Not even outside near the fort next to the ice-cream vendor:
They are my scars, the little imps- And no one loves them,
And that's just the thing, because I can drink and keep them
Bottle up as upstairs someone says that was a good movie,
But it wasn't; it really wasn't-
And I should move away now- I almost can,
And forget to record how my day went lonely and unspoken;
And somewhere else she is married, but she doesn't have Any money- I have money and I can lay down and say
My simple things, say to myself now here it is
And take it; and if I do, and buy myself a plot, then
That entire yard will be mine, so green and tranquil that my Words can lie across it like paper-airplanes now,
And I can say to them without speaking- Here is the thing for You children. Lie down here and be at ease while your Father drinks his liquor. Just be quiet while you can,
And when I get done, and my gums are bleeding,
And the dogs are howling,
Then I will get back to burying you as I will; and then
They should be just as quiet as thieves until I come for them.

Robert Rorabeck

Busied In Your Lost Joys

Word is the jewel in the throat of
The prism—
Lips are the arms of the sun and
There you are Growing as distant as a child running
Away,
Diminishing from the school yard.
I can see that you do not want your Beauty to overstay its Welcome,
So I have become all of my impotent
Weapons—
And when I become lost from the Hunting of you,
I can pretend to understand myself in
The wounds of your absence—
Beautiful attire,
Brown skin a frock of gold—mestizo,
Unrequited,
See me burying my face into the Casks of rum another night—
Waiting for the heavens to bloom with Fuses—
To spin in concentric occultisms
That make themselves busied in your lost joys.

Robert Rorabeck

But A Poetic Lie

I try to ink these lines. See that I do,
So you will not turn away, and the sun is the promise
You never gave sinking. But you,
How many poems have been written to you?
How many Dantes have written to you, Beatrice?
And I travel by myself in the park looking up at the empty libraries, weeping:
I have gathered grinding stones around me to build a cairn,
To pinnacle the summit where you could tell me of traditions
Forever, taciturn folklores set in books of strangers, and we would never sleep but watch the Whisky Migrations of homeless men traveling beneath the cuckolded overpass:
Each one goes towards, and then away, stripped of all societies,
They are imitating the sea beneath us, and off to the east;
They are but the feral cadences left off of war and dead children
Drowned in the Somme and the Psalms.
Standing right beside you, I fly toward you, things which cannot be escaped but how does it happen
That you should not see me staunchly decked:
An officer and if not a gentlemen, a wolf making room for your Scarlet tallow;
If perceived, I would be a knight and you could send me out
From your boudoir's loci of honeymoons for three Things you wanted the most, and such trinkets, I would bring them back to you.
But on the third night, be warned: I would deceive you even as you listened
To the cars rushing outside the silken lace whispering upon your comely window.
I would come to you like a charm, removing your girdle,
And lay those projects upon your weeping openness which I had found or Made for you, not matter the price;
and with my fingers let you know how to wear them;
But the third thing would be the parts of my own blossoming drizzled upon you, confection's foreplays, soon knocked and entering: See by this now,
The gentle line the rains transcend, the storm into the glimmering streets:
I've walked where the alligators smile, and smelled you in the fields of sugarcane.
Now do not tarry for what is coming in the east, a strange eclipse captured
But once, a somnambulating photograph, and if seen again will be but a poetic lie.

But A Star In Its Shell

I am nothing but a star in its shell—
As the plagiarists and the tourists return home—
As the lost kites get stuck in the apple orchards
Or the orange groves—
And there is a dragon or a kitten about,
As it is the same thing—
And the grottos of the obnoxious selkies that I have already told you that I have seen while I was skipping school—
That there isn't another rule to this road—
And the only unicorns that exist are handled by Blind men—
While, there it comes, that I have travelled home
To her,
A girl whom I've figured out will never be my muse,
Even while she is providing milk for My child—and the winter sings—
As the fireworks hibernate in their caves, as your eyes Populate all of the green billboards
Until this way comes again.

Robert Rorabeck

But All For Your Pleasure

My fingernails are dirty,
And I am sweating pot bellied on my love seat:
I cannot hear the song birds,
Alma, but my grandfather wrote my mother a poem for Mother's day,
So that must mean I am doing some good,
While all the night swings perfumed on its censers, and all the waves
Come like tender little girls who don't yet know who they are,
Except that they are the first kindling flames soon to burn
Out upon the muted tattoos of the shore,
And all the sting rays- and all of the water moccasins,
That, Alma, I'm sure don't know what for- but for your love,
Alma- but for your love:
I told you today that I don't know who Sharon is:
Alma:
Your body swings out in the open with pleasure, like a letter opened
Obscenely, but for my leisure, while all of the pretty poets dance
So nakedly out in the heather:
Oh, they dance so nakedly, Alma, all breathing like wildflowers
Galvanized up in the hot-saucer slopes of Colorado,
But all for your pleasure.

But Another Huckleberry Finn

So you start up by pulling some machines by the rope
Around their necks.
And the lawns get mowed, while I am sure that I can fall in Love with just about anyone as long as they are long hipped
And female:
And the words come like fires burning like rest stops down
The interstate that we skip off like
Stones or wishes;
And don't you bet I want to take Diana to Disney World
And swim with her and the lucky gold fishes:
What is she doing right now, but kissing her opulent gentleman,
His fingers around her throat, and he in her hands:
As the bodies make love underneath the prancing ceiling fans:
Bodies that traveled to see one another by so many means,
The fates of the fleeted dreams of clever jeans:
Bodies moving and filibustering up the jet blue and jade streams:
She is having a birthday, or she is getting roses:
Their lips are parting for creatures like marsupials or terrapins:
The little freckled boys are escaping mostly down river;
Maybe they are her children and they are lost into another
Tributary of the songs of rich folklore I have been singing,
Seeing that for her I am but another Huckleberry Finn.

Robert Rorabeck

But Another Lie

You are burning- you are a tip of gold,
And I am just a lie in a nest,
A lie of alcohol,
And there are swings:
Even in Colorado there are swings,
And old forts and forget-me-nots that young children
Can attend,
Wishful with pockets full of buffalo nickels;
And I wish I knew the proper names
For things,
I wish I had a father,
And that time might slip like your hair over and down
Your puckish ears,
Slip like wine into lips while quiet enfolds before
It finds me,
Your flesh quiet and refusing to be tremulous-
Your thoughts kindled in
The downs of so many years in soft sheets,
Hooked to your name, just like that other man:
Wish that I could be him,
And believe for awhile in the beautiful lies
I make up about you rather than having
To go outside,
To go to school- to anywhere without you;
And the mountains have a name for you,
But to describe it would be but another lie.

Robert Rorabeck

But One Fortunate Day

All of the joy of the athenaeums cut from the field
And made to enjoy the holidays of dinner tables
And left for awhile as the forest fire burned and all of The animals had to run away just to be safe:
Except for one ever so lucky and unworldly unfortunate
Key deer who slipped through the keyhole and Right into her bosom just as she was about to make love
Again to the man sized and radio active centipede
Who held an entire pinball arcade in the exercises of his Mandibles: well, anyway, the poor little thing distracted
Her and they made love- and it was the most fortunate of Unfortunate loves, and he took her away with him for The day underneath the airplanes and the burning sugar cane:
Took her to the dog tracks and the race tracks
And they placed their bets on so many- oh so many Four legged things who all seemed to run away only to Come rushing back to them, the way the surf moves
In the sea, giving hickies to the sandcastles who only
Unfortunately live to enjoy but one fortunate day.

Robert Rorabeck

But You

It is better said when all the beauties are not
At home;
The way the sea sometimes comes in answering;
Oh,
The sea,
Giving its little works to the feet of men and Indians;
In its dress partakes the recreations of our time,
And dolphins;
And the sun peeps through through the clouds and leaves:
There is a blond haired girl making love
Upon the shore:
A girl I once adored but can adore no more since
She took my heart and gave it to her lover next door:
And words fail me in the darkness:
You know they do; and you have a candle right there on your Lips,
But you.... But you....

Buy One Get One Free

I suppose I am selling again,
The words that come
On my lips after midnight,
And everything has changed
Into shaded hypocrisies:
You can have me for free,
The few that even care,
If you can find me.
Packed up and on the road,
My possessions slung over my shoulder,
I might be anyone along
This dark stretch
Whistling amidst the pines and cypress:
Bankrupt and smiling,
Without a ring, but I have my dog:
And he doesn't lie,
Unless I tell him to-
The daylight gives me a chance
To find a job,
Because everyone is working
In the land of opportunity:
The wealth you recommend
As your drive by in definitions of Distended Capitalism
There your are:
The adulteries hung up in
The store windows beside the lapping shore.
A parking lot of married couples
And their growing versions:
Stream by,
And I will scream at you,
Here is something else I am selling,
Because it's something you haven't got.
Step up and take a listen
To my miracle cure,
Placed in your ear, you can hear the sea,
And the first words your mother
Told you-

Today is the busiest day of the year,
But tonight you have found me
Alone on my corner
Selling you things
As you pass by.

By Another Icarus

Tiring hands on the sounds between the grasses,
Motes of the slenderest estuaries of light,
Beacons of the microcosms—
Every creature here diminutive in comparison:
Looking up, jet planes shooting like arrows
Across the hemispheres of crowded buildings
Going to the heavens where some Pine trees struggle to grow up just to peek at Leggy stewardesses through their elliptical porticos:

I should like to climb them in pursuit of you,
But there is no job title for this: no way to make money
While looking at the sky;
So I stopped closing my eyes in school and drive
A truck across the earth for a living,
Above the grasses, beneath the clouds—
And thoughts of you retreat with the mailboxes
Whose trunks are ringed by everyday daisies as crepuscule
Proceeds

Chasing night into the neighborhoods again,
And the houses of milkmaids and housewives become like
The grottos of darkened aquariums again
You fold into this like moistened origami.
Your children bedecking you
As you go about your business, both night and day,
Searching for something unrecognizable,
Your society already reclaiming you in bits and pieces

You do not dream of the little boys who grow
Up just to find you,
Nor do you turn to see the sun dropping beneath your feet
Flung like a golden disc by another Icarus who tried too hard to Draw your attention,
Who flew all the way past the moon to steal your memories away.

Robert Rorabeck

By Another Mourning

Lost poem on a rope
So it is not really lost:
It is just a child not allowed to Stray-
Airplanes I once knew are leaping through Her bedroom;
The sky is Grey anyways
And my imagination has turned to buying
Another house-
There she is in the yard where you supposed
She was-
The lantern's light slips.
The heavens are clouded by another morning.

Robert Rorabeck

By Both Of Their Legs

In little places of poems
And shadows that don't have to move unless
They hope to be destroyed—
Just the way I remember your eyes like sunken nebulas
In the darkened bed before I moved Away and had a child—
And now the places are not so condemning,
And maybe your father will be out of the hospital tomorrow—
But for awhile,
We will remember the hinterlands, and the other softened
Dolls that could only make it half way to Alaska or Colorado before soiling themselves—
And then in the morning:
Morning—moonbeams and omletts
And other movie theatres that moved away by themselves
From here,
Carried away by both of their legs.

Robert Rorabeck

By Candlelight

Filling a coffin with rum—making a sea of the graveyard:
And I remember in the middle of my thirty Years, skipping work and playing hookie with you in A hotel:
After we made love, I took you to an art museum,
But you were bored: This is after we both kissed each other
Underneath the eyes of the albino alligator,
And you pretended to be jealous, saying that I was making Eyes at the gringas: but you knew my heart was wild for You—even as you made house for your husband—
What relationship we had lasted long enough for the last
Of the paper airplanes to touch down over the wet breasts
Of Miami and to be burned up with the fireworks I was Selling for my father—
You want more and more free things—to captivate my love
In the somnambulant cages of a Ferris wheel,
Even while your eyes were kaleidoscopes filled with the broken
Hieroglyphs of your children:
They were filling up your sea, even while I called you the fairgrounds
Of my heart—and then he was home with you again,
Illuminant—matting you onto the pages of a tattooed soul,
Leaving nothing left for you to remember me by—
Until I eventually drove away, as
The animals I did not know the names of boarded the arc by candlelight.

By Graveyards Of Baseball

Belly fattened by graveyards of baseball—
Another startling blue jay out on the battlefields underneath
The Christmas trees and all of their weeping monuments—
Why does it have to come to this—
As the cities lactate cerulean exegesis into their canals—
And the gods that they birth the alligators are arisen
Underneath the airplanes and the ceiling fans—
Another way to lose himself is here—
And my parents come home too late to see the strange trees
Bloom over the pignosed rattles—
As the cicadas come off like confections, and the only mermaid
I will ever know loses herself in the canals and the Detritus of my backyards as the Sugarcanes burn and burn—
And I get up too early again to remember my childhood—
Strange, spinning monuments to those who know the Cremations of the dusk of another baseball game
I never saw with my father
As my estranged wife buries plastic flowers over the Mounds of ants and ant lions—and I wait for another weekend
To extinguish—filled with plastic dolls
Losing all of their dresses over the playgrounds we were never Meant to extinguish.

Robert Rorabeck

By Heavenly Tears

Baton twirlers play until the lights are blackened
And someone's alligators sleep for eons;
How can they do that?
Like bears beneath the purplish aurora borealis—
The land steams in hot beds,
And still the girls play until they suffer blindness,
And in their blindness spend their time caressing
Trees in gardens their loved ones assure them are safe—
Where they can hear the cars from a safe distance—
And the empirical illusions of bottle rockets and Roman candles—sparking off the god's knee caps;
As they can hear the sea filled with the illusions of muses
Gone feral—like a great winery corrupted by heavenly tears.

Robert Rorabeck

By Her Insouciant Perfidy

Her husband's little boy's little fingers
Making plastic ships do sarabands on the couches
Underneath the virgin by the doorway
Of their highly mortgaged house,
As the wind tries to defy the vespers, as I know that it Does,
While even into the canals of south Florida some sort
Of autumn comes.
But the words still go away like leather tramps without Stanzas,
Like feelings without Mickey Mouse:
The conquistadors disrobing and chasing mermaids
Through their prayers,
The first pornographies brought to this country;
While I sat beside Alma today for breakfast: it was all we Could do,
Because her insides were bleeding, realized from old Mexico,
Her bare arms as copper as revelry horns
And good hood ornaments speeding towards the cowboy
Shows which seem to be coming up like dusty flowers
Over the higher basins like velvet fireworks which Make tourists crook their heads until
They get too hungry, and crawl away for ice-cream;
But I disappear with her all day, wherever her thoughts are Leading me: the light in her eyes all turned out so that it
Is too dark to tell if she lies when she doesn't say
That she loved me,
And I think of being nearly beside her, and how she likes
Feeding me;
And it becomes the job of my art, savagely needing,
Waiting her to forsake me, so I must immolate like forest
Fire on a birthday with all of my singularity of wishes
Betrayed by her insouciant perfidy.

Robert Rorabeck

By Her Own Amphitheatres

Oh fantasy while I haven't been sleeping—
Another mirage of a muse I haven't know
Starts out her own way in the
Sky—
Happenstance of a bottle rocket over
The university
Doesn't have to be cheaply beautiful
Anymore,
As she disappears from my life with
The sendoff of one hand—
Even sophomores have taught me how
To fold her better:
There she is, creased and folded
Beside the left behind armor of the katydids
Up in the combinations of cypress,
The sky of burning sugar cane creating
A florid tapestry behind her—
And I guess I cannot describe any better
For the little while I have seen her—
She will be gone tomorrow,
The commuters will go along without her—
Her husband will love her blindly
Never even trying to believe in the Metamorphosis that she escapes from us in—
Amused by her own amphitheaters,
Leaving the fuses to their graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

By How The World Has Turned

An epiphany occurs above the used cars:
The sun turns, a pinwheel, glowing over the girls who stand
Like spectators before the traffic,
Hoping absentmindedly for a parade
Until night washes its tide through the once kindled glade,
And moves back and forth like a ball of silver snakes
In a bath,
While all of the birds twitter excitedly in a colony up in one Corner of the ceiling,
Altogether so very unhappy by how the world has turned.

Robert Rorabeck

By Its Fireman

When the night gets really busy with its loving
And all of the cars are parked with their houses:
Then you are dancing with your sister
Like double scoops of butterflies in your tenements,
And all of the cypress is in a foggy sorority wishing too
To join you;
And it has become so beautifully dark, that I am almost Beautifully too: then I want to step out and join you,
While the rivers sing in place of the homebound traffic,
And the topiaries are rich with the verdure of Your surplices, those things you've traded in for his arms;
And they are so big as to be thought over:
And pressing into you, as if making a crèche for you,
Aren't you so relieved and you feel just as safe as a kitten
Being taken down from a tree by its fireman.

Robert Rorabeck

By Laying Our Courting Eyes Back And Forth Upon Us

Terse lips, though soft, say nothing,
Such pensive sadness;
And if they saw me, adjoined to the senses of Speedless boats;
They would not smile, but they would love,
Quiet and unmystified,
A good exegesis for a young and leggy grandmother;
And if you came my way
While the grave was still yawning its yarded lay,
We could quietly spread the blood of Roses between us,
And there would be no football teams or switching
Sides;
I grab you with my keen mind, my well tuned and Inebriate instrument,
My drunken sword and I'd put you like a cannon along my Copper broadside;
I'd explore you and buy you a double wide to stash
Between the splintered wings of Orange groves and commercial aeroplanes;
And I'd dress you up every night as my stewardess and I'd undress you just the same,
And drink with my tongue the salty mercury of your Hallucinatory compass;
And we would not starve, with sweet shopping malls of Children to feed us,
But we wouldn't say and think; we'd buy and sell each
Selection of ourselves we wanted using absolute
Telepathy,
And we'd play tennis out on a greater teal esplanade just
By laying our courting eyes back and forth upon us.

Robert Rorabeck

By My Early Forties

In the land of the green rolling hills
The green dragons live,
Smoking in renaissance, snouts curling:
As their steaming caracoles rise to the armpits
Of airplanes:
And my wife cleans the pimpled floor-

Forget-me-nots have, perhaps, forgotten about her-
A Chinese girl lost to the malaise beneath the clouds,
Wimpled by the diamonds of social espionage,
The games playing in recoil perpetuated between the socialized slaves:

But she saved me,
A mermaid for a werewolf, in a space where there
Was no one else to believe:
A ghost-town-drive-in-movie-theatre,
An abandoned lot with a naked stem of a rose,
And an arcade in its electronic grave:

she saved me after all of the false chances had relocated Themselves into the walls of the childrening cul-de-sacs of Their married unwater caves:
All of the beautified damsels already distressed and Trapped within the surfs of their inescapable,
Beatific waves:

Perhaps once beautiful women demystified,
Revealed green snouts unfurled, trapping for diamonds,
Wounded by quotes of insincere boys,
But no words of their own from the forked tongues
That serve them well at dinner parties,
Pretending that they can escape from death's parties:

There she is, sincere, floating as a billboard, angelically
Advertising, a bodisvatta
For the blindness of men she never has to save:
In life, a promise for a wounded thief-
A promotion for baseball after the end of an abandoned game:

Upon her bosom rests a cornucopia of mandarin apples:
My one year old drinks and tugs:
Her poets drinking too much wine, dying before
Their teenage years:
Virginal and sincere:
Their mythological bridges noted in their epitaphs of Literature:
We have crossed them holding hands,
The sun in a mote of its dallying séances:

And now our children play half-hazardly, interrupting
The soldiers of another drunken poem,
Proving that a loneliness is broken forever,
And political movements, wherever, have no grasp upon
The ethereal heavens.

The cadaver is retrieved from its high school that
The gullibility of her boys will win forever.

By My Nocturnal Tears

In the fieldtrips of demigods of cartoons
I keep going on and on while the day is spent and my peers
Get older and older until they become reprobate—
And this lands becomes a mutual fairytale
Too obscured for me to understand—and the busses turn around
And around, like solar powered marionettes that Slow down after daylight—
And the same reason do exist for no one—
As the arrowheads re-emerge like fossils—
And the places of our joy cannot like off,
Because the wicks that I can never fear
Are wetted by my nocturnal tears.

This is how you made me feel—in this poem by Pablo Neruda—□

And it is not the right way to go down laughing all by myself
Upon the hind end of all of those canals
Without any stilts or fanfares: this is
All I have done—blemished into the promises
Of the caves,
As the stage crafts of the airplanes crashes and all of
It becomes some kind of another bad news:
This is all you have deserved into the hinterlands—spelling out,
That you have left some kind of husband upon the Playgrounds while the mountains are still glowing—
And I am left playing some kind of ketchup even though
I am not good enough to stay alive- and
The child that I have effected will have to determine itself
Into Shanghai—growing itself into another religion
As if into another five thousand years of
A text adventure of all of those disaffected dreams
As your brown skin awakens upon the palates above
Disney World—kissing its brown tomorrow-
And swearing that it already knows all that it needs
To know—for tomorrow and until all of the yesterdays
Until it is finally young and falling out of its nest—
And safely besides the highway before it can be curated into A nothing that has to take care of itself.

By Sunlight

Now I'm sure I have another angel of my soul
Swallowed up by sunlight
And keeping hours:
This is how it feels making love
Beside the rose bushes,
And the sunlight storms
And it feels for awhile that there isn't
Any other love,
But the daydreams are here and you
Are smiling across the fields
And this isn't even our house.

By That Hidden Date On The Calendar Of Injured Gifts

Now here is another thing for you,
Imperfectly fleeting:
Words which would have stayed as if in stone,
If they knew their older brother's wiser crafts:
These are just dalliances
For your eyes,
Chancy rainstorms which dry up on your lips,
The leaping conjugations which need
Your hidden moistures to survive:
That is all,
And do you not know when they come out,
By that hidden date on the calendar
Of injured gifts:
The eager tadpoles-
They would serenade as if in love,
If you had a spare moment to listen:
They would crowd around you and mew,
And look up into your eyes with awful needings:
They care nothing for me,
Even though they come by my hands-
They have nothing to do with me,
The silly things:
They would deny me if they could,
As you have proven in unrecorded history:
They would walk out and leave me right here,
Without a chance of domestication,
If they knew you would let them in,
But it is such a long road to where you live
That they could hardly get halfway to you
Before beginning to dissolve
Into their fancies' impermanence,
The lilting melodies of the street-singer's
Rhyming panhandles;
They are the cheapest thrills of the fairground's
Calendared visits,
And even as you are about to look up,
To listen, and to perhaps believe,
They, like you, are soon distracted by the closer
Things:

The bright colors of the fair lips,
The auburn stares which answer beckoning;
So they will forget you now,
And you embrace a closer friend;
Dissolving, they will become a reliable truth,
Until tomorrow when I wake up,
And think of you right off, like I always do,
The constant dream of awful distance,
And then we will set to sophomoric work again,
Going one by one across the field
Where the fireworks are lined up and ready to go off, Showing you in brief expulsions of Colorful truth,
The patriotism we keep in our chests,
The lovely propagandas our fingers shoot-off
Like harmless wands above the driest field,
A display thirsting for your attention.

By The Day

If it works: but it is broken:

The apple trees in the orchard, the virgin's token-

And the airplanes upon their wings:

Fly straight over the forts of Anything, where the tourists mull and the sky crumbles-

The sharks perambulate the sea above that which the sun

Mumbles:

And bumble bees, and silver colored tuna going back

And forth underneath the motor boats in the loch:

Strange delusions of our ancestors going to and fro

From home to work-

And the plans of housewives coming home in the crepuscule,

And the street lights like dimming birthday candles

On the streets of cake whose wishes never end:

Sweet daughters entering in to their boudoirs they must

Soon leave: to find husbands and lovers,

And then children to milk, and to defend: and Christmas trees

In their engorged parlors,

Like the secret but open stings of so many winged fiends

That their friends are allowed to see:

After all of their fairytales have tumbled down their

Curtaining hills; languishing broken and then sweltering like

Kilns into the morning in a valley

Of suburbia- in a hidden graveyard that grows more sweeter

And more cherished by the day.

Robert Rorabeck

By The End Of The Pep Rally's Fortnight

On some dark valentines,
I molt around the eyes of a pristine high school-
The words give birth to a beautiful cadaver and We all lay around it on the floor
And let it tell us about the flight plans of a dying
Autumn; and the flies work briskly on my friend,
Though I wish I could say what I want about
It more succinctly;
Instead, while going to the bathroom, I am propositioned
By the venal muse just hopped off her paper
Airplanes, smelling like dead lilacs;
Maybe she supposes I am her grandfather, I have Been looking so kindly lately- Looking as if I've Been pin striping windmills;
And this is just the gist of it, the way model soldiers
Die in tin meadows bemused by guts of paper streamers
Popping the jubilancy of a Sunday's fornication;
And I hate to think it has taken me so long to get a job
Of beauty, to feel her punctured breath rise like a swamp
Against my neck again;
And I suppose there are much more beautiful young boys
Fighting fires or getting tattoos in jingoistic regiments
Marching off to the east, but she cannot catch up with them,
Seeing as her umbilical cord is vined to the grave-
So she saw me out at lunch under the crawl of moons, and we Decided to be together and run track, and learn spells
To make a brood of enriched golems; and we rode saw horses,
And she looked pretty once the maggots were picked
From her thrashes, and we watched them metamorphose into An entire colony of erudite fireworks who were not frightened,
And I don't know if I've said it right,
But it does not matter as their beauty was again dead by the End of the pep rally's fortnight.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Hungry Day

There are maggots in the stars, and underneath those Filthy heavens I have been jogging again:
And the sea lights out like an infinite drawer of unruly knives;
And they seem to be trying to kiss the brows of the Sleepless sheep that I've Been counting,
As the airplanes are falling down the stairs, and forgotten relatives
Are never coming up again for air:
This infinite regress, and the birth of crypt-orchid hair:
It blooms in the night-time caverns underground
Where we find that so many of our friends are sleeping,
Gloriously:
In their trailer parks they sleep and play their tin horns and their Forgotten eyes reflect up to our souls the great distance into Which they have been away,
And they continue their dour reflections until the sun is eaten
By the hungry day.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Knowledge That What Is Unreachable

All of the different gods have the same love,
And hold to it by the metamorphosis's of the day: they go along
The racetracks of the dogs,
Or of the milkmaids lying golden headed in the hay:
They have been gone so long, that we have become latch keyed:
And just look at all of the minuscule folklores that we've Had to bleed:
But I found you today: you knocked on my door, like the secret
Thrust of a genie wanting to breathe again in the outdoors;
And I have walked beneath the prominences of opal stone,
And I have wanted to kiss you and hold the brown flesh
Over your bone: Alma:
And I have: and I have, and I have held your troubles next to my Chest,
And I have seen halfway into the secrets of your eyes,
But the rest of you I will never know, like a creature of its own
Limited element,
This is all I can believe; but I swear by the knowledge that
What is unreachable in your tiny body of flesh and soul:
Alma, Alma, is infinitely more beautiful.

By The Movie Theatres Of The Graveyards

Poems of racehorses in
The snow—or anywhere—
Even star-crossed over my once-
Muse's abandoned household—
And will she still have To go away tomorrow—still because
She is married
And now I am married
And expecting child—
As a little blood is drawn from the Wounded playground—
As I get bored and blind myself
From staring at the pornographies
Of sunlight—
And she will have to go to him tomorrow—
As their shadows will swim together
After midnight—
Until the fairgrounds of my heart have been Packed away and are gone—
And then another summer of another sorrow—
All told by the movie theatres of
The graveyards—appreciated by the naked
Yet beating above the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Sands

Before there was another sound
Bivouacked into the tree tops, the moon sang
To us:
Pretty echoes, like friends she had pulled up
From the ground,
Albino crocodiles who watched us kissing at the Zooâ€™s;
The last lines coalescing across the spaces
Over which the airplanes flyâ€™;
Their wings the thread of stitches bringing together
Our wounds to be healed for Christmas- into just another afterthought
In the life giving day-gone oasisâ€™;
Where I once kept dreams of touching you until They were buried by the sands.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Sweat Of My Proletarian Brow

There is no subtlety, so this is not art,
The pornography of a greeting card can say
I love you as coolly as an apathetic banker,
Thusly I greet you again, like a stranger out
In the humid woods, perhaps next to a queue
Of terrapin in a teal traffic-jam:
There are tadpoles in the sludge, their flagella
Ululating with the squeal of metamorphic atrophies,
And the muses are the butchered canvases,
Leftovers for the fine young forensic teams,
Their eyes now gone the way of heliotrope flies,
Gossiping as they go about their janitorial duties,
And behind her not a grotto glossed and brushed with Micas, but a junkyard of abandoned cars up on Cinderblocks, their vinyl stabbed and holding not Passengers but stacks of nudie magazines which started
Molting when the rain blew through their abandonment,
And the bejeweled spiders began their trapeze acts:
Now I love you, but this is where I take you to make out,
Telling you I am someone famous with an intricate disease,
But you have turned me over and seen that my belly is Tapioca and my navel the indication where someone stole
The cherry- I am very utilitarian- You can send me
Out to the store and I'll come back expeditiously with a carton
Of chicken eggs, not one of them broken: Or you can hand me
Your mail, and I will walk down the street whistling, passing
It out, making sure to return the love letter you mistakenly Disavowed; but it is not proof of any genius I hoped To exemplify, nor a pretty lake I hoped to entrench you near,
But the spittoon of a muddied furrow, along a slender track
I laboriously plough by the sweat of my proletarian brow.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Sweat Of Your Brow

Giving me too much time to consider that I am not going home:
Snails on my shoulders in their little houses:
Roman candles pointed earthwards toward
The canal-
And I am in a place they thought may not
Have existed-
And they burn effigies of broomsticks until the Candles become sauce and gravy,
Until, sometimes, the midnight works,
And you can float underneath her as a little boy
Going up and up into a chimney
While yards of aerobuses circle beneath you
And the magic is in your armpits:
And the magic is by the sweat of your brow

By The Tattoos And Other Bruises Of The World

Open theatre on the hillside of a graveyard of A campus:
Purple bloom: there in the student ghetto of A tomb:
Wasps and werewolves
And watermelons: the sky looks up into a
Birdcage of gigantic skeletons:
As the world continues selling around us
All year, or all afternoon:
And I will have to get into my classroom tomorrow:
I will have to unlock the door
An answer in the morning to her and her
And her:
And it will become a sparrow lost in her nest
Of doorknobs:
And it will become another firework in mimicry
Underneath the space shuttle,
As all of the doors close in, and the beautiful animals
Retreat, and you look into his eyes
Forlornly for another hour- your soul
Disfigured by the tattoos and other bruises of a world
That will never close.

Robert Rorabeck

By The Time It Got There

Your empty eyes are socked with your Husband's heliotrope fist,
And Pedro is talking to me in Spanish:
And what is the night,
What is the night but the other side of the World,
And Antarctica and girls who habitually touch
Their faces when they see me.
How I've been trained to avoid the rush of Traffics, to sleep
Underneath the overpasses and dream of Teal
And the antics of playground balls under the Sun
Where concrete tunnels perform the initiation
Rights of Preschool flirtations,
Where cats trounce nine-lived up in the bunny-
Trees,
Their spinsters and gamblers asleep in their Furs in
The pet cemetery down the street from the Elementary school where in Second grade I brought tulips for Denise,
But didn't have the guts to hand them
Over myself.
After school, her parents were fat, and I wondered
If she had been adopted,
And the buses turned like corpulent honey bees,
So that stretched out the entire road
Was like a black orchid playing in the séances of An ineffective heart,
Who then rode its bicycle home, but
By the time it got there was very happy to have dinner Waiting.

By The Waves

You get home and take a
Shower trying to wash off the Molten day, how the sun has made love
To you and is now done with you;
The way it flooded around you:
The swarms of eyes and tongues
Directing with noise and implication
The thoughts, desires, and rejections.
Each day awakening,
Arising up from the oily bed
Into the old but always triumphant furnace
The body aching: the teeth throbbing
In bloody gums, the skin chapped and Burning, blemishes under a mask of Promises, the joints twisted and rusty,
Squealing like old gates and rodents,
The flesh weak and changing,
The simple, repeated needs of the Animal repeatedly thudding like your Heartbeat
Getting dressed, moving out of the Door and into your car,
Turning the keys in the ignition
Deliberately starting the day,
Remembering the faces who wait to judge you,
Driving on the mercurial sphere, drowning
In the rich and disgusting layers of Polluted gravity and polluted oxygen,
God's hands pressed upon you,
Knowing Religion is the cheep out
Of a weak mind
Who follows it's own shadow
Down dead-end caves-
By the time it comes back up,
Everything is sold and everyone has Gone home for the evening;
Your father deciding to have a Son, so he f@cks your Mom and out you come,

His ascendancy, his hope,
The successor of grief and the Family business
With the eyes scrutinizing hard upon
The flesh, your mother the very worst,
The knuckles flickering white-hot
Around you,
The undertow taking you
Further and further,
Stretching you until you
Become the dissolution of A self broken apart
By the waves.

By These Monsters

I busied myself with cutting wood
Until the men braver than me came with glorious Instruments as well as women enamored on strings;
And they invited me into the labyrinth for which there
Was no answer save to proceed: And they gifted me with Battlements and miniature forges worked by industrious
Insects and clever bats and their ilk;
And there was one strange instance where they sat me out
On a gun-deck in a green field before I went underground,
Like a driving range, and I sat in the seat of that gun and fired
Off heavy charges into a swarm of balloons, like jellyfish
Let loose before the rows of Australian pines, swaying like Rootless dancers, trying to convince us the highway wasn't
Even there, though it could be heard streaming in both directions,
But mostly southbound: Afterwards, we dived like Beowulf into
The first fitt, and the door closed behind us and we drank as We dried off, but then I was alone, with my selection of arms,
And the tattoos imprinted upon me by lasers upon joining the Company. Beyond this, it is horrible, for after each sequence the Door is closed. No one told me this: there is no going back,
And the water is over spilling so all the time you are about to Drown, as the monsters become exponentially more terrifying,
With greater and more sympathetic back stories the readers get no
Chance to hear save for in the denouement, which is never gotten to.
But I must confess, these scars are my own, these brilliant regalia of Pain which makes the eyes flit to, and the mouths to dropp with the Morbidity of dead ancestors. Underground, they provide the only light, Save for when my bitten blade sojourns along the plate necks of Dragons and alligators, while above tender house wives drink expensive
Liquor and masturbate like teenage saints crossed upon a fourpost bed;
But I don't know any of that, but must keep heading downwards. Soon
I will meet my father and his gang, and the hungry windmills pin wheeling
In the frozen lakes. Soon students will crowd over me with their bicycles,
Swarm like ants, and professor will ask me why there ain't no stanzas.
Certainly though, coated with gore, my old skin hung upon a coat rack
In a far distant dimension, it is true what they say now: That I can only Know myself by these monsters.

By Way Of His Chili-Peppered Tongue

Snakes leap like dogs,
Comics & games at my bare feet.
After one a.m. Everything has changed and Real, except for the cops. I think About fu*king my aunt every chance I get.
Ants bivouac between my toes. Copper-headed
Serpents, bearded try to sell me apples
On my way to the plastic bathroom draped
By the crumble of concrete irrigation, and Florida Holly. Just last week, robbers got away
With the till from the sub shop- I suppose,
They are still hiding out in the latrine: I cover their Heads with immaculate worms, as I c%ck my own,
Lilting backwards like a marvelous captain and saying
A wish: I slide down, just like the banister on her Wedding in that rustic museum: Her husband is A cripple, but I fill her up, her nightgown like the hood
Of that car, chromed with incest or that creative Dysfunction which moves these lines anonymous,
Troughs the depths of the fermented mind, even as galaxies
Pinwheel and do their thing, until I too am done,
And stepping back into sleep have to listen to the little Mexican Boy Pedro call me a fagg%t by way of his chili-peppered tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

By Which She Can Never Be Found

Another word thrown like a rose on
The tomb:
My heart is the tiny echo of one tear
Sliding down the entrails of A funnel;
And all that I love is married, and taken up
Like prospected land,
And spoken for;
And the Indians are whooping and
Every last one of them has a chubby-
There is no more room left between the clouds,
And the seashells beneath them are Creeping like crustaceous ghosts back inside
Her dresses,
Like little orphan children who are so shy;
And I am going to finish off my last drop
Of sun,
And then I am going to buckle myself in and ride
Underground inside her
Roller-coaster coffin; and I am going to feel
Again the ways and avenues
By which she can never be found.

By Which The Fires Came

Troublesome mind make the fingers play
Giving amusements as tall as fairies
To her glowing, entrepreneurial eyes.
When the tornado warning is over in
The middle of the day,
And school is over except for tomorrow,
But then for good—at least for those
Such as me—
What reason is there but for the tripwires
Of dusk—
The shed skins of crepuscule over the Mailboxes,
And those that light the zoetrope are put Onto the back burners—
And foxes, long tongued, turn toward the River,
And she to the forest, trying to look Back up at the mountain at the scars by which The fires came.

Robert Rorabeck

By Your Makebelieve Heavens

You make all of your love at the dry cleaners,
Waiting for the bed sheets to dry out, but you are so
Near the sea—the waves sound like
The wounds of animals echoing—and you are so
Near to me, but you don't come over—
You wait in the closest of spaces for him to come home:
He haunts you, as if this were still Mexico—
I place the Virgins of Guadalupe inside my house,
Trying to tempt you—but now I am married—
You go home wandering where you will find
Your next lover—you keep better men locked up in The toolboxes of your breast—
I think that even once or twice you made love to one
Or many of your uncles—but your sent is yet sweet upon
These walls, and I get drunk for you—
And the liquor burns through my increasing body,
Passing through my joints and down near the baseball diamond
Where my dog sleeps,
And when you awaken tomorrow it will be a luxurious journey—
As you make friends with ghosts and skeletons—
And enjoy the illuminations of the disasters of all of My hopes fall down, astonished by your make-believe heavens.

By Your Moon

All of Sunday I was in your land while
You were not home.
You were out getting your nails done,
Leaving to look up at the stars while I
Was alone:
But the primordial skeletons came out
And danced for me,
And brought me two petal roses and
Three legged dogs
And some syllabled curses, but it wasn't
A big deal:
I preferred to lie famished in your front
Yard, waiting for the mailman to come
As if to resurrect me from the sunny
Open tomb-
When you came, you laughed and stepped Over me, and helped him across
Into your little hotel room; and made love
Up all night,
Until in the morning you flew away again,
Using some chariot or broom-
And I waited for the spikenard to pierce
Through the gut,
As I lay there as if all of my light had been Stolen by your moon.

Robert Rorabeck

By Your Side

Sharon,
In my trailer park gloom, you are the lightest of Shadows:
Your soul floats over the net like a cone of badminton;
And I am sorry that you could never be a councillor,
Or something just as professional,
Or that you haven't climbed more mountains to see your Reflection laying across the land as if an entire High school of angels had sprung a leak;
And I am sorry that I couldn't have been a better and More forthright man for you; and that I had to mess
Up my face deliberately,
And that I had to hang my flag upside down because I
Figured that I was in some kind of distress;
But I used to figure you out most weekdays when I skipped
School and got drunk and lit off bottle rockets:
And it really meant something when I finally matriculated
To your state college and saw you once or twice,
Even if it was kissing your soon to be husband in the line of That Chinese restaurant now demolished just so they Could widen thirteenth street:
Sharon, you've never looked like Jodie Foster: And you've Never looked better,
And I just wish I was your bicycle, Sharon, something for you
To sit up and ride, ride, ride, over the mountains of your Colorado countryside; and I don't mean that in a sexual way,
Sharon,
But in a friendly way, the way that lions are supposed to lay down
With the lambs and share snow cones or something deep in The esplanades in the state fairs of Telluride or something
Or somewhere,
Just as long as you are there, Sharon, and I am by your side.

Robert Rorabeck

By Your Very Flame

My heart, my heart:
What is it doing: it is dying into the emptiness
It expected you to be;
It is a day laborer mindless of the beauty of the deeper
Mangroves;
It is out cutting your lettuce, satcheling your citrus;
And it is a beautiful if curious world;
And cartoons rule it,
And sharks who cut their fins like paper cuts like
Middle-fingers into the air;
And I want to touch myself and wear what I cannot wear.
And what else do I want but to turn of the television while
You are still there,
Sharon, while you haven't turned away to your paper families,
To the dolls you have erected from your own creation:
I wish for you to remember me,
And come to me as if a boy in a ballroom and really come
To me,
And touch me like something still in its cocoon, if you
Can still believe and hope for me in that way,
Then we can both leave the movie theatre together,
Holding hands and touching the bodies of our luggage together,
Helping me survive
When I have been drowning for a lucky seven years, hoping
For a girl like you to remember my name,
To reach out and keep my light kindled by your very flame.

Robert Rorabeck

Cadmus' Amnesia

Even when the sky is full of disaster,
Tell me, what can they take from you-
When you have hidden the hungry mouths
Scattered in the silken forest,
Tossed into the hyperactive rivers,
Furrowed with the serpent's fang
In an opulent blanket provided by the needing moon:
So early in the morning from this
Your friends up sprang, bellicose and frightened
Born decorated in the instruments of their careers
Already they began maiming their old fellows
The clanging, persistent greetings killers give,
Until like a woman unjustly wed,
They fell back to slumber pell-mell
In all parts the catastrophe
All this the red lizard watched
Tasting the act on his budded tongue
Not far in the forest, curled about
The top most coned bows of a fur tree
Like smoldering garland draped there
By a wicked woman who sang nakedly
The promises which whisper in wells
To little doe-eyed children who bend over
To give their ears a listen
Further and further
Until down and down they fell.

Robert Rorabeck

Cadmus's Hounds

The unicorns are striking above the airplanes-
It is because the airplanes are lying down, creches into Green valleys-
Into which cerulean cataracts fall:
This is the beautiful place of your childhoods, where
The heroes fell your public schools have made you forgetful of:
Looking up, the motes in pinwheel blindness,
The hummingbirds touching down upon the shoulders
Of a boudoir of roses:

The dogs have run their course- they are celebrating,
Cadmus's hounds, on a dinner of fried chicken,
And you have your hand on her knee in
The drive in theatre-
Watching that one note play; it is as good as making love
In a cemetery-
There you see the ghosts of fireworks in her eyes:

Tomorrow is Thanksgiving, and I will go to work,
But it is as if I am retired- the apples ferment in a tangled Orchard hidden in the Everglades:
You will see your favorite teacher tomorrow and he will Tell you that you have gained too much weight,

But you have beautiful children in either hand to show him,
And sometimes, after sleeping, the airplanes will leap so high into
The sky after dinner that they will metamorphosis-
And they will become the swans and herons who come here
Every year in the wintertime on their wayward trips into Mexico:

As the country yawns and rises up into the basins of
The tallest of mountains, you are not fit enough to hike into Tomorrow-
There will be a peace for a moment- and a flower, like a weed,
Will bloom amidst the cracks and the recesses
Of a high school that, after the holidays, you can no longer
Imagine yourself as ever having a belonging.

Caesuras Of The Out Of Work Sea

The tents will go up in New Mexico
And Arizona:
They will rise higher than the fires,
And we will sell fireworks in their penumbras-
And the cheap dragons will dance inside them,
Curling around their toolboxes,
And then they will steal the moonlight from the golden moon,
Who itself is a thief
And a voyeur of stewardesses and the ways home,
And the few words that I cannot even describe will leave my Body like a eulogy, like cheap science-fiction,
Like a rose over the anonymous grave of a prostitute,
And somewhere else in this country
There will be a song sung better than mine, and it will Rise for awhile above the conflagrations of Mountains in Colorado,
Making the tourists stop to consider, before even
They get back to business-
And the kidnappers will arrive at their destinations;
And it will be another sad story
Told through the lips of orange groves and pressed forever
Against the romanticized caesuras of the out of work
Sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Cage #9

Your panthers kiss in the dream of helium balloons:
Their lulling tongues drip the sweat of last night's carcass:
And I can see you reaching up your forearms,
And the vase of your breast inside the loose shirt:
The pearly meat is like a perfect anthill in summer's sleep,
Your eyes are smiling like a plastic doll coming nearer,
As you climb the chain-link fence that keeps us
In the separate habitats: You will not go unconquered,
As the peacocks fan behind you the majesty of the jade crocodile:
When you leap down in your fevered panting,
And wrestle me into supplants amidst the sticks and mud
Where I'd been feeding on the penny candies:
Then you take us back to where we were first captured:
In the hot sand dunes in the cradle of the early peninsula:
Where we spread out naked in the nape and the winds,
And you bit my wrist several times in the same place,
Signifying that you were growing tired and soon wanted sleep:
Even then we had no other language,
Except in the engorged junctions where our bodies merged:
And you called me with your needful pressures,
The flowing areolaed press of your lenient opal stems
Before we were both captured and were bound for domestication,
Feeding the tourists' melting pleasures,
And the unblinking eyes of curious fifth graders out on fieldtrips.

Robert Rorabeck

Cake Delivery

Rainbows of ski-lifts looking into her eyes,
While all of my nights are alone
Learning how to spell in the overgrown grass,
And the pornographies of misspent fireworks
Beside the canal,
While the teal, teal heron eggs are cracking:
The sugarcane is burning,
And we look up together, the sugarcanes burning
In a truancy of a shadows-
Mailboxes whose lips are unpainted, and the day
Goes like this,
Rising over the limestone, and the birds who lay
Here,
While the carnivals turn around and around,
Repeating the fallacies of superheroes-
Then we sell Christmas trees into the dust, and in The night we collect marbles
With our hands in our pockets in our bedrooms:
The moon arises, and the grapes
Grow pregnant, with the foxes beneath them:
Their fathers, braying, and licking their own coats,
To clean off the cockleburs,
And to remove any of the tears that may have been Placed there by the fieldtrips that sweat off our tomorrows,
And burn off our little yards of tomorrows,
While the wives that we once hoped to know kneel
In our carports to the kisses of sad toads,
And kneading their hands into origami over the seals
Of frogs in the rusting rebars of the rains,
And pray, and pray.

Robert Rorabeck

Called Her Home

Traffic continues on like four-legged sorts
Of galaxies pin wheeling away,
Traveling home, or to gentleman's clubs:
The pretty girls pick up bouquets in the surf,
And they never look at you-
They never pick up books written by men with More voodoo than you:
The terrapin sleep in the crux of a misspelled log:
They watch the women nakedly down
In the surf:
The most resilient flowers bloom in the sloughs,
Tourniquets of roses they pick for the darkest Pirates with entire cathedrals of candles burning in Their unruly beard,
Who lay the maidens on coquina slabs and make Them sing like ornaments,
In the short days time traveling to when the first conquistadors Saw the teal lions near the flower shops in the Waves and called her home to dinner.

Campaign For My Scarlet Letter

Campaign for my scarlet letter,
My love, my love, my dinosaur:
And I'll come back and be your lover,
Your first crush, your index finger,
Your older brother:
And we'll bask our heads into the evening's Pillows,
And dream of magnanimous plums,
And sugary super heroes: I'd love you for
The day, like a field trip,
Like a scar that goes away-
And while I'm doing this, you can shake your Head and say I don't know you,
And I'll quiz you to make sure; and to see how Well you do: You do so well at things that do
Not matter, and I am even worse than you,
Because before you left me I stole your bicycle and Danced so the rains would fall so no one else could Come out and steal it,
And then I caracoled your university because I like
That word especially when I can use it as a verb,
But by the time I was done reciting the sharks were Busy just off shore,
And the ice-cream parlors had closed their doors,
The conquistadors had either crucified or Christened
All the poor dead Indians,
And the dog had masturbated onto the kitchen floor.
My mother whispered that she wished we'd
Been a little wiser, and then she shut the door,
And we closed our eyes and hit the pillows,
So far away broken up one into your expected migrations,
And I into an entirely different metamorphosis,
And yet dreams of you hit my pillow like a pile
Of cinderblocks,
A city full of busted bliss, a curse and a
Rhyme anonymous,
But I didn't love you anymore.

Campfire Tale

Cars are running on fingers of diamonds and loose change.
The woods are humming a catchphrase you don't know.
Down the easement on the left,
The forest-blue barge is taking a young Adam to a new affair;
He is out on the deck filling his pockets with sunlight
And the skim of water lilies-
Without long hair, you are less attractive than you used to was,
And the pugilists have made you lose the fight,
Evidenced in the dark mask around the rim of your gaze;
She has taken the yacht of his sleeve and doesn't care.
The petty thieves purloin the embarkation of the naive heart.
They are in there now sowing the city as white as Damascus;
This road is the downward vein attributing to the sad populations,
Where pricking corn grows like ruddy children around the hem of pines,
And the sky whistles the silky knives, the silverware which pullulate
Like throbbing moths pulsating from the yellowjacket's joyful barb.

Robert Rorabeck

Can You Imagine?

Can you imagine,
How many lawyers and doctors
There are in South Florida?
I can see them, crapping in their toilets,
So close to the Atlantic, in their Upper-Middle class homes so near the Sea—They never think of the sea,
Because their wives are beautiful,
They have no use for the sea....
But I have no wife,
So the sea is mine and I lounge with
Her and slip her the tongue,
And we play together like Bonnie and Clyde—
We rise up and rob and make love in wreathing,
Vengeful fits.... Can you imagine,
All those useless professions scheming,
Accumulating wealth and accomplishments
They use to dress their cheap lives,
Never thinking of the masses who move beneath
Them, the limestone that is rotting away beneath
Them.... They have no time for such things....
They are making grand additions to their lives....
Their walls are clotted with plaques and honors,
And every single one of them has a picture of Themselves with a famous politician....
Is this what you want? Is this what we were made
To become? Never mind the advertisements,
Or what your parents tell you....
Listen, is this really you?
Is your soul there, walled up in a high-rise office,
Asking your secretary to take notations....
I can not think. I can not see....
There are homeless people without names,
Without identities walking like shadows on the street,
But they are angels, they are the scholars of Jesus,
And they come to her shore and watch us swim
Like a motion picture backlit by the flickering sun,
The ancient Hebrew who denotes right from wrong,
And here there is beauty and infinite change....

They cannot see this.... They cannot know,
So let us be very quiet and pull a curtain over
Our love making, and move into one another
Very quietly but with much passion,
Because if they knew, they would want what we have....
But they can not know, they can not understand...
They are mystified by the Pharaoh's gifts,
By the slick promises of dead emperors and sad presidents.
They cannot imagine all that we have....

Canals And Ballrooms

Retreating by a trail of lost words making
Their way across the
Vermillion apertures of the continent- as if,
Finally, Mexico had really one
And even the angels had changed their names and Appetites-
Going more naked over the clouds, like schools
Of dangerous fish,
And fighting all of the time: and never going to School,
But hanging out in the hallways riled up by the Tornados the victorious gods sent to
To lavish over the land:
The trailer parks made of adobe- the wild cats
Fitful, blue- sabers preferable to guns,
And the conquistadors now all of our mascots,
Resurrected, done up
And trundling with the fanfare of our darker
Redder skin:
Skin of fire, and the cities burning with the movements
Of their dance- so many lovers prowling
Through the yard, clutching fireworks- spinning
And making duels- the canals and ballrooms
Doused and burning gasoline.

Candelabrum For Seahorses

We happen outside into the world again today,
Fibrillating, saving our grandmothers- open mouthed with the Fireworks
Leaping at first underneath and then over, over the great Inner states;
As all of the world is collected, and put right here,
Candelabrum for seahorses,
Shrinking, then growing big again, like little kids underneath
The heavens of Christmas trees:
What it feels like as if to be alive in the traditions of make-believe:
A grave of wildflowers hissing with steam,
Realizing from the upward motions of the blue miners
And swift constructions of transcontinental railroads-
Laid between the comely passing cars, the heirlooms of ripe fields,
As all of it goes passing both and either ways-
A wound in the heart where the ghost of your mother can live,
Passing forwards and backwards, like a zoetrope without any foxes,
As the groves in the desert wait and wait
To give and give.

Robert Rorabeck

Cannibalistic Daylight

The empty page of silence flumes,
While my mother corrects her face:
My mother who is more than fifty years old,
Who just asked me what Kelly's name was:
And soon she'll be going to bed like
A fish.
Just like a lucky fish, who'll never see the lips of Liquor or brushed the lips of mountains.
Then on Sunday it's Valentines and I can't even Spell;
But it will be beautiful to suffer through all the Reflections of stage lights and false lions,
The penumbras of great amusements that
Are already leaving,
Those things that I have already loved that will live
As many lives as cats,
That will have as many children-
When the night is already cold and turned off into the Avenues of her dead husband, I will turn her around
By her naked shoulder,
And ask her to come back and touch my cheek and ask her
To make my neighborhood again as luminescent as the Fish who live so far beneath all of these affluent
Trailer parks as if to be from another planet
As far away as we are,
And as beautiful as never having to take another breath or Having to tell my mother again the name your parents
Decided to give you;
Then you will be just as wonderful as if there weren't another Person beyond the two of us,
And the dreaded occupations of the immersed daylight
Had gone away into the bonfires of another truly tragic
Lullaby of cannibalistic daylight.

Capital Punishment

Wept the Lord on her doorstep,

“But I loved you for
A burning summer;
The lonely feeling lasted:
We laid naked on the barren field.
There the speckled serpent curled
In the grass in the Warmth hugging
Of an unexplored tree,
Promised evil
While I was fertile;
Laid off,
Then I could only look
Back on you,
The little girl hiding
In her woman’s form.
In the mute chorus
They harvested bitterness
In the meat of sweet dreams
Up and down the rows
Collected by Nubian grandmothers:
Unfeeling shadows,
Unborn children:
You drank away
With your luxury
While in the background they Paid their quarters to hear
Our song,
The illegal mariachis;
What would it have been?
Baby, do you know what
You did today?
Baby, do you know what
You took away?
I don’t believe in capital punishment,
Baby,
But, for something like this,
You should have been killed.”

Robert Rorabeck

Captain Stormfield

You believe in God
And you live in New York City?
You deserve a blow-j$b
From the Smithsonian:
Space traveler- How you wake up early
To flirt with your god before cartoons,
But you don't make much out of a
Canine's four legged flatulence:
I wouldn't presuppose much on what you think
Of your own,
Being that you are a yellow dog,
But you are not scared;
And I know you will live forever with Captain Stormfield satirized, but I'm too Busy making money to help with your Ranks of flagellated logic:
You are married and there is a new ring on Saturn-
In the end, you are better left alone to float
With the angels deep in the throat of your Wonderfully fabled moan:
Everything is beautiful when animals can speak
Of the moral of the story
After twenty minutes of selling cereal:
And so I love you- but I am just a hobo who isn't Real,
On the swing-set of censer knowing I can go back
And forth without any real power,
But I can never get again to where you are,
Motor-powered, righteous and surreal,
But that's the true game-show of my dysfunctionally
Empirical ordeal.

Captains Of Their Bedrooms

Adolescent tears stolen to the ravaged
Cheeks of crocodiles:
Look how they are smiling, slanted on the bank:
The whole classroom is smiling,
Even though there are no windows,
Or roses on my desk:
This is the time they are in now, pretty finks
Like adolescent jasmine:
They will bloom like canaries into the carnival,
And then they will disappear-
The metamorphosis of the juvenile stations,
Captains of their bedrooms,
Matriculating; but what will they change into:
What hope do they have
With their ships melting or, who will they hold Hands with
Will they ever make it outdoors to see has
The charade of their tears,
To see who blooming for them ceaselessly
The emotional clock that makes no room for Tardiness and he is smiling,
And shedding their tears, though their hours are Still so young.

Captivated And Alone

The sun is crawling through the sky—drinking and singing songs:
I lay in my bed alone,
My lips pressed to a canal of rum—□
And the sorrows of the flesh overflow and overflow—
The fish are tender-hooked—
But it seems alright to believe that they will survive
For a little while until they are ganged up on—
And for the while that you live in your window above
The clouds—can't you think of me,
Swimming four-legged and with a tail beneath you—
Trying to sing you the songs of a prince along his journeys—
Trying to captivate you until the airplane that I am sure
Will take us away touches down—
And all of the lights go out—
And all of the fake tourists leave their theatres
And stadiums underneath the mountains
And I can spare enough time for you—
Imagining that both of our hearts will remain
Captivated and alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Captivated With The Giants

Dun by moon-side,
By pool-side, by beach side:
All of the children missing
From the merry-go-round that was meant
To be beside the sea:
All of my exploits of my later years
Cheating my face
Through the open windows of the Hapless desert,
And upon above:
Saturn invisible, and Jupiter invisible,
And Pluto mostly invisible-
And the children were all supposed to be Right here,
As the blind men build their houses on
The steep side of the mountains
Where the cars are always crashing
Down like tears
Into the empty bedrooms where the lovers
Were meant to be:
Estranged, though fleshed,
And now walking somnolently through
The waterfalls of carwashes,
The airplanes resting thoughtfully above
Them, captivated with the giants who are
Also looking down.

Robert Rorabeck

Careless Though Divine Providence

I have no more choice but to continue my either or Torment through the zoetrope of my breath:
There we go flickering beside the people we know so Little about
Seeming to dance like animals search for truth:
The parade comes in over the waves into which the Amphibic airplanes are touching down gentle enough to Kiss but not unsettle the water moccasins
Who live in the stone rainbows underneath the places
Where I still try to breathe:
Alma cannot love me, but she is all that I see,
As we wake up together a stone's throw away; her in the Happenstance of her husband's arms,
And I alone in the pitilessness of careless though divine Providence.

Robert Rorabeck

Carelessly And Long Ago

Seagulls on trams of busy rides;
And she has her new inconceivable family:
See how we all proceed, leaving like the migrations of The fair,
Or the butterflies who move from pages to pages of Fairytale;
But now they are all married and have silver slippers,
Or something new:
They can go anywhere, except they are as calmed as Lions with their chalices:
See how the knights have returned with bushels full
Of pomegranates.
Some of them even made it past the flaming swords,
Some of them are still swinging upwards;
And the light is just the trick of starlets in coffins,
Still shining on through the zoetropes of movie theatres,
Like my love dancing in the shadows of the desert;
It is just the motion of families of cars reciprocating
With one another in far away neighborhoods,
Fully sated and off to bed, their light skipping somehow
Along the materials that also makes
The reptiles slither and quicken their tongues into the buds
Like beautiful women through the spines of the city
And into the defeated forts of vanities and wine racks,
Where tamed rivers flow like family pets,
Where lovers too can go, and be as becalmed as if everything
In the world was made of glass, and singing from
The echoes your fingers or your lips placed upon it
Carelessly and long ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Carelessly Precious God

Over and under Rivers
Indian givers are Precious liars;
And I always wondered Where you
Disappeared to after School,
Because it was as if
The day was ending
And my bullies
Existed in a void
While I awaited
Always for the return
Of the education of
A carelessly
Precious god.

Robert Rorabeck

Carnival Of My Soul

I've been out on the reservation but known nothing of Its sorrows:

Across the muddy streets trying to move further

Away from my father's horses:

Into a corrugated teepee

Where I can believe that the airplanes are still angels

Or bottle rockets he cannot sell:

This beautiful world alone with the coyote

Who scents amidst the bricks- where sometimes

A flower will grow, just the beautiful armpit of

A weed the wild dogs love

And the Mexican girls lay across saying that they

Are broken and yet float down the reservoirs

Into the carnival of my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Carpenters And Stone Masons

First off,
I can't sing, even though
I want to be beautiful for Jesus—
I want to praise him—
From a distance you might say
I am beautiful, but you have not Lived with me. Just ask my girlfriend.

I want to be the best shot
I can be—
I want to own a new gun—
Polish it ever day,
Morning and night,
Engrave His name on The holt—

I am a fan of carpenters....
Several good carpenters built
The house I slumber in;
I praise them,
But it will be someone
Altogether different who Builds my mausoleum—

Who is that laid
Hands on my eternal resting
Place before I even got
There?
A stone mason—
I hope I can shake his hand
Before I get there—
Praise him as well—
And when I die he shall inherit
My loudest, most deadly weapon
And use it to engrave
My name in stone,
In shifting permanence laid on that slab
A marble blanket for my bones....

Carry On

Overly puzzling lovers out on the open tarmac,
And it rains:
Which makes it safe, because it stops the airplanes,
And the dogs from racing,
As I have held you a couple times this way, the landscaping
Rattling with tears of green
Which peel down the houses: the beds are warm,
The horses sleep standing, and after it all, the clouds still Pile up over amusement parks whose astonishing bleachers
We can drink and then pass out under;
And let the butterflies land and nap, drooling homeopathically
On us,
Or at least let us dream that they do this, as the baseball players
Come like ruddy wedding processions, and carry on.

Cars Dancing With Waves

cars forwards and

In back of

Me.

This life a road

Of

Cars

Filling up my child's

Dreams

And my dreams

Too:

A parade of Humanity's invention

Each engine's

Combustion

Empirical,

Energy from

Friction.

Cars lined up

And juxtaposed

Next to

Each wave of

The sea...

The fanfare quieting,

My child held tightly

Next to me.

My heart is his

And the waves come

Beckoning to the cars,

Wanting these

Cherry red

Inventions

To come dance

With them.

For all of Man's

Realized inventions

Such as these

Must disappear
Eventually.

Cartoon Of Their Delights

Giving up the proverbial children for the offerings of Speechless faith:
All day long in a cathedral mimicking the human race:
Pestilent and song-wearied,
Trying to close my eyes and picture a sea of whales:
And entire roadway of these beasts in catharsis;
Or a glossy Mandevilla or some other flower that Chokes itself into the sun of merry go rounds,
While the great beasts are talking guttural and surreal -
And the mammoth echinopsis sticks out its tongue to show
The tourists and their doctors, that not everything
Is made to be a cartoon of their delights.

Robert Rorabeck

Cartoons In The Afternoon

Tortoise of the skies and butterflies:
Waking up upon an airplane
While looking at her in the mirror:
Another way of
Remembering her unforsaken architectures
While all of the knights I know flow
Into her—like toads serenading in her busied carports—
And then they are dancing in a place
Of unsold monsoons:
This is how it tends to be—after high school,
Walking past the mounds of ants and the dens of Ant lions—
As my sisters and I watch cartoons in the Afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

Catharsis Of Filth

Catharsis of filth
Woebegone in the mountains—
The cars drive by the closed
Burger joints
As the mountain lion
Eats a blue bird for supper:
As a little boy,
I don't look up—
I don't want to look out of my window
To see these things making love
In a movie theatre
Beneath the pines—
I don't want to send out flowers to the Open winds,
But if I know I open my eyes
I will have to—
So I live right here,
Truant slipped classically out of High school
With the cadavers of alligators
Before graduation—
And I write you another line
Just before the dead end of narcolepsy—
Necrophilia
Is your name,
Muse whom I exhume
Like a puppet
From the roadside—
I don't want to touch you but for
These words—
They fall upon your stamens like
Hummingbirds and bumble bees,
As like wise upon your Cadavers as red ants and
The larvae of inch worms—
Each one the same diameter
Of each of these petty chimes—
They sing out for you,
Your soul an infinity in

The convalescence of your marriage—
Even after nothing is left of you
To survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Cathedral

These are the different worlds we bring together
Touching in forgettable cornucopias which only live
For a small while:
Say, her sky is purple, but her eyes are green,
And turned down anyways- as they watch her youngest Child fallen from the swing set-
The horse eats from the yard across the street
All of the black men live around her.
The tortoises have turned into themselves- or I
Have walked down to the canal,
Turning my back on her- maybe she is hurt-
But her brown skin is a cathedral-
Jasmine perfumes midnight, and I think she will survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Cat's Cradle

A fly in the liver drinks
The worm.
The knife with no
Conscious can see
The translucent arrow
Barbed in the flesh,
The shaft out of the Abscessing heart cavity.

Stop her now,
The thief in her house
Disguised with a
Ring and his last name.
Her auburn curls
Cascade,
Because she has gone
Down on me—
I let her play my video
Game.

The lawful charade
The court conspired,
And her stock-broking
Fathered footed the bill.
From another state
They bound me in Barbed wire and Turned on the electricity.

Pulling the catgut to
Her heart,
Like a cellular phone,
She shot through the core
Like an apple,
The organ that sang for her
Is now harpooned.
In the midnight hour
I can feel her power,
As the dish ran away

With the spoon.

Cause For René Char

Rene Char died at 80- I keep getting empty
Searches for him, scars of constellation on a bleary night
Of street cars. It has been so long since I've walked with A girl, held her hand and she didn't apologize, or look away
And think of pools dressed with other women,
Swimming like gold leaf to the somnolence of the satellite
Garlanded by commercial airlines: Renee Char in France,
Long entangled orange groves beneath the Roman forts twith the cloven
Footsteps of goateed wine drinkers,
Sommeliers on the hoof, ritual of stony vineyards:
I was virginal, hopeful- A Spanish artist, a mother and housewife
Just in Port Bo, kin to Salvador Dali, loved me when I Drew caracoles of lavender on her son's desk- When I'd Never read Rimbaud, when I went out tramping for a copper Cannon, she called down from the roof with her friend that she was In love- In love- Oh, to be in love again- Oh, if she were to read
My poems about her; if I could find out more about Rene Char,
Or have the chance to skip summer school again, to in my mind
Envision punching the principle in the jaw- To have a good and Steady job far away from the lunch meat horses, the sandwiches
Of my upstairs parents- To rearrange the common occurrences of Neighborhoods of dead ex-girlfriends, to imbibe the beauty of a
Two week youth again, to time warp on swing-sets in a boreal Seventh Day Adventist Michigan, to water-ski to the lucidity of Minor saints and professors enjoying soggy crackers and cheese,
To perambulate the cemetery, giving cause to wild blue ants and scientists
To explore, to get married and published, to live in Spain as another
Soul, another prick in the constellation, a lesser light to Rene Char,
Who isn't even one of my favorites, but I'm doing him a favor tonight,
Giving him another séance amidst the foot soldiers of his elite cause,
To go down misspelled and speechless in the Somme,
To awaken metamorphosed, a gifted birthstone kept around her neck
As she goes out on her bicycle with a basket of varieties of pain,
Breathing around her neck, a cenotaph rimed from the sea, sighing
With her cause.

Robert Rorabeck

Celibacy Of Housewives

Celibacy like a bubble bath in the sky,
Effervescing these springs of invisible rooms
Where no one pays,
But does his time look up at ceiling fans,
Predicting disasters purposefully,
Inventing the light bulb; and if I could love my Mother, I bet I could; I bet I could be asleep
In five minutes and have the stewardess'
Uniform ablaze in a controlled burn;
And all the way down to the hemisphere, nothing
But thigh, a pink ribbon of outer space ending
In toes that splashed jelly-fish,
Gar, and cheap plastic minnows; and for the houses
Asleep in their cost, the women who live in them
As curried as palominos, like poets fortunately Lost, bullet-ripped to feed the olive roots,
The peaceful trauancies of curved and dangerous
Routes; Or, to carry on with this line of tinkering,
In hurricane season housewives bickering,
Fully busted in blouses cut short, thighs un bemused
By anything unfit for a tennis court; and their Eyes upon my wicked holidays, I'll sell them pumpkins,
I'm make some bread, and hang them like trophies,
Or stockings premature for Christmas,
In my private self-satisfied library, well-fed.

Robert Rorabeck

Cellar Door

Before I grow tired and die,
Like a sickly infant before it knows this language,
I want to look up and see the world metamorphosed
Into a single thing, a word spoken in a whisper,
Like the blurred shape of a blue bird lighting
Too fast against the sun to be sure it ever flew—
A word of unrecognizable sound, yet irrefutable meaning—
The finest chorus in a single thing,
A dove of peace sent through my ears
Conceived from a true realm where I am not alone—
A medical stone that has the power to raise the dead,
A healing word— The word of a faithful lover.
A word mothers use to conceive and birth flawless children.
A word when spoken creates perpetual daylight—
A word when echoed resonates fertile planes and singing Rivers into being—
A word that I could use to whisper upon her lips,
To take back the shadows, the ball of adders growing
Twisted in my heart— A word to cascade into her,
A word that she could recognize me with
And be sure that I was right. Before I grow tired
And sleep....

Robert Rorabeck

Cemeteries Only I Can Remember

Warm beer and I can begin forgetting this night,
Like all the girls who long forgot me on roller-skates
And infinitely swell legs:
Norman Rockwell girls whose time has come
And video games:
The traffic is a centipede going on forever:
Stopping and going,
Ignoring the park- Perhaps even hating the park,
Because it was not made to those proportions,
And somewhere out there amidst its peeping
Segments young beautiful lovers
Who stop in to buy Christmas trees, who actually seem To like me:
And I toast to them and the waves,
The somnolence of a careless god whispering to
A gentleman, the devil, underneath the what so ever
Palm trees:
And girls I knew, and coral castles, and promenades
For forever better and even immortal poets,
This being the last thing I have to say to this humid hour,
For my clocks are changing into hearts,
And yet I still try the ever familiar illusion upon myself:
That I will live forever,
Solitary down the hallways of high schools and Cemeteries only I can remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Cenotaph Upon A Tree

Snow angel like a beauty mark next to the nosecone of An airplane—where will you be swimming
Come Christmas with the Sea boiling over with ducks headed south—
After the hurricanes have lain their havoc and then Evaporated, and the truth smokes like a phantom of The truth—
A world that is almost done surviving gets over one
More time—paper airplanes and dead fireworks
Lying upon the other side of the canal—
And then nothing else can be said that is any good—
What was once joy in the echoes of the harmonies—
Remind me of you, shell of a katydid lying star naked,
A cenotaph upon a tree that kissed your lips
That never knew the truth.

Robert Rorabeck

Centaur

Touch him now if he cannot move
The legions are marching between them,
Dragging the sky behind them
Like a curtain torn down from the theatre,
The red secret draping the early morning
Woman's lips.

Then she rolls over and plants her kiss on him,

Those petals trough like mollusks,
Leaving their trails upon him.

Daisies grow up from behind his eyes,
But he does not blink.

He cannot move. His body is hiding
The forensic evidence of so many years
Separated:

They were hooked and when she stepped

Away, her two legs an entire Calvary-

Subtly she tore him down,

Gutted the sky like an entire beast

And cast him off her shoulders,

A meal for the earth. Afterwards,

And for a little while

She was so ashamed.

Entrenched in the storm,

She steadied her steed and cast her

Sorrow in the furrows he was

Turning into,

But with the memories quickly

Meeting their end,

The sky curled and turned into

A beautiful rainbow,

She encouraged herself to follow.

Quickly then,

Dragging the sky behind her.

Centrifugal Offices Of Young Tom-Boys

Centrifugal offices of young tom-boys
Laughing in the sacrifices of wasted times:
They go tilting upside down in a strange
Eclipses above the highway,
Their light-bulbs honking,
Areolas winking with waving gasoline-flames:
And too, down by the zoo,
Swimming with the aquatic crew, I've seen them
Doing some of the same time, smoking peanuts, tonguing
Limes:
And they have not yet manifested in a harem-
Or a club: they don't bake pies of take delicate sips of some;
And they make no social sense,
They just go leaping backyard fences like exactly wavering
Hurdles,
Stealing apples from the polished senseless;
And you might say that they aren't worth your time,
That they go without getting dolled up,
And do not diadem the affluent jerks of railroads
And beef jerky- Heck, they don't even know how to Carve turkey,
And they're just wasting time, laughing in a roadside
Show like crimson diamonds, wet and pouted-
Their filaments burning in full blow,
Free for a lark, like honey mustard on shark,
They are my sibilant holiday- and I don't want them
To ever get out of my mind:
Their legs straddle my vane purple temples and squeeze my turtle-head
And without their bosomy infection,
I'm sure I'd be amidst the well-suited dead.

Robert Rorabeck

Certainly Sure

I havent dressed out for so long,
But I'm great at the arcade:
I'm really great after hours and all alone
With the vespers and Ghosts,
Pretending to have god and paper snowflakes,
But now all those mountains are Undeniably empirical,
And you are so lonely in between their Creches, aren't you, Sharon;
And I cant understand that, because I
Am no good at any sort of science,
And your father is dead, and where does your Mother live.
You daughter is beautiful, Sharon, like grapes
Upon your breast,
But I suppose you already know this,
As the weather comes, and all of this is real,
And you can barely stand it;
But whatever they do they are inventing for you,
Sharon- and I hope you can understand this:
That you cannot ever be undone,
Holding out all men want to become a service in Your army,
Even if you get sick and fall out of love,
You will reawaken again, even if this page is given over
To the age-old fire,
You can't blame me for trying, Sharon,
Because my rum is weak but flowing, and my dogs
Are to me as I wish to be to you,
Beautiful and needy, basking in the lower slopes of your Shadows well before the grave;
But those are the best places to grow,
Well before the graveyards- Maybe my name will even Hang sometime not well beneath yours and your husbands,
And your child:
For we all must die, Sharon, and I am perfect,
And must die before you, to clear the path, but my dogs before
Me,

And the tourists all around us basking in your Wonderful jubilees;
But you have made it all so much more possible,
So when we become like the dinosaurs and the grinning
Sharks whom you've been weeping for,
I can stand up and declare that you made all of this Passage way so much more brighter,
Coming down well lit singed briskly by your flairs,
For you are a full blooded debutant
The wings of ever careful airplanes encircle,
And every good government and all of their orchards
And cemeteries
Are yours, Sharon-
I am certain,
Certainly sure.

Robert Rorabeck

Chandeliers And Candelabrum

All of a sudden to start and finish—I hear airplanes
As terrapin and hare,
Tortoise and jack rabbit race—
The same as the fables they carried from deep,
Deep Africa—
Africa of golden eyes and nipples—or serpent tongue,
Forked, cannibalistic, evangelical—of so long ago—
Calling up to her parapets again—
Languishing, cracking knuckles—almost older
Than Christ but sophomoric Romeo:
Give me the reciprocations of pinwheels, of windmills
And Ferris wheels—and valleys and valleys that Believe in my madness—and girls filled right there,
Spilling with wildflowers and aspen—
Paper airplanes and longer jets flying around their Hair like barrettes—and other places that call and Call on us—
As all around us they sing, light prosperous in the Chandeliers and candelabrum even though we are No longer here.

Robert Rorabeck

Chandeliers For Their Kings

All the chambers of the heart are filled with Roses:

And your lovely bedroom is filled with lovely poems
That wait for you to get up for breakfast
Even after all of the airplanes you were always in love
With have gotten up and left you—
As the perfect angels continue to sing in their perfect
Choirs—

As the beautiful rabbits continue to linger in their Beautiful briars—
As above them, like a winsome king—the sun is singing
And singing—

The waves break unabashedly and upon your hand you
Wear my ring.—

And the ocean is ringing and ringing—
Like an ocean of beautiful girls calling to the heavens of bright
Chandeliers for their kings.

Robert Rorabeck

Chaos Of Thugs

The likelihood of petrification
By the level 5 monster
Is astonishingly high.
Then again, he will turn you
To stone near the Sea,
And, even defeated, you can Stare off
For miles,
Though the waves will have
You,
As you must concede the ratios
Of rose petals
In a game of love
Fall much higher in your favor,
Than the actual matter:
Of her eyes remaining perceptive
Unto your being
Through all the chaos of thugs.

The decades of eternity pass as minutes,
As the ocean carves you indiscernible,
The tragic hero defeated by monsters.

Robert Rorabeck

Charlatans Of Playboys

Never figuring how it started out—all of this union,
Contraptions in an animatronic
Time—my wife humming while she is washing her Face: I never imagined she would be the Girl whom I loved,
But she is the only one here after all of the conclusions
To the baseball games which happened out of Time—and the words which my fingers palaver
Like water spiders skirting on a dime—
And the rainbow being somewhat akin to the midnight's
Apertures—
When the best boy finally strikes out—
And home runs are given to the unoccupied bedrooms
Of nuns and the charlatans of playboys—
And only this weather permits—
Filigrees of plums,
Silhouettes for the last time out of doors—
And then long truck rides into darkness—
Into the places where the cities can never survive.

Robert Rorabeck

Cheap Laughter In The Affordable Sunlight

I have found an affordable ghost town

(not in her eyes, as you might think)

But on the east coast south of the first home of Conquistadors,

Where they have buried all the sepia nuns,
Whose bones have lain virgins for so long,
Awaiting the salt of Jesus on their root
Enjambment crypts:

Palm City is up for sale: Houses fat and immaculate Going for $150,000 or less, homes for entire Families and for kids skipping school,

Bright blistering yards all in rows like costume jewelry like
Where I grew up down the road from the wildlife estuary,
Cinders of dreams which once blazed north
Of Daytona Beach:

I imagine living there, the only house on the block
Not foreclosed, stepping out my door into the easy dimming
Lights of dusk,

Expecting to see beautiful housewives out jogging with Their carriages, legs like glossy lips, like swimmers in the Humid air,

Blown away like kisses given to relatives in fleeting departures,
The skylights all ablaze over those winsome ghosts,
A place for myself to tease my dogs, to vagabond from house
To house, and drool upon unfamiliar carpets,

Chasing a woman who doesn't live there anymore,
For she cocooned into a fine last name, and had to migrate,
And now those houses glitter with for sale signs on

Each green lawn needing a hair cut, like dog tags on corpses

Who have yet to lose their glow,
A sight built suburbia who went up quicker than a boom town
For Mickey Mouse,

But there wasn't enough bread to spread cheese for the clicks
To cut the mustard, but I have saved just enough to buy a fair 2,000 square foot crypt outright,

And live on a whistling block where the wind pirouettes
Blowing the tumbleweeds,
Where I can follow her for hours and never know where
She is,
And then lay out in the middle of that suburbia's road

And wait famishing for days for the Pavlovian
Melodies of the ice-cream truck,

And for the sea to come in like effluvious retribution,
Filling in the shadows, and drowning the geometries where
There was once cheap laughter in the affordable sunlight.

Cheerleaders Of Inner Or Outer Space

I'll piss as my dogs piss,
In the night in the snow, heedlessly as the traffic moves
I'll think of Elisabeth Shue and karate;
And I won't care how long it will take me to get Back to them.
My back will be tired and no females will love me,
But I will find my dogs again and they will love me,
And then there will be time enough for stories to Tell S-,
And pirates, and the lisps of waves and light houses even
When there aren't no more conquistadors,
As we left them all back through high school,
Worshipping at the drinking fountains,
And I am just a boy who wants to live forever
Who doesn't know any kungfoo;
And I just want to live forever, but it is still so expensive
To even begin to consider leaving this casual place
For the sweet cheerleaders of inner or Outer, outer space!

Robert Rorabeck

Cheers

Out again in the high altitude of this Self imposed prohibition:
There is nothing saintly about my sober condition,
I've just been trying to save more money for My neurosis,
Wondering in the red eyed daze of dry and thirsty Liquors, the spirits I inhale with the airing of Her season's show, out in the spores and Floating motes high up in the anemic mountains,
Far away from any touch she might on a whim
Encroach into me, and thus awaken the flow of Blood and search of eyes through the bones and Body of my ghost town;
And let again spirituality build up along the shores
Of this mortal river, and I will give up
Putting off my hobby as if it were a chore,
As if this here line was difficult algebra,
As if I had a profession and a housewife to play
Scrabble with, and to lounge near the chlorine
Pool of her disinfected eyes,
And never say another world like this, and her likewise:
To stretch all out as if in one long day,
And breathe out children and exhale my grave,
But eventually I'll sneak down into the valley and at
The supermarket buy 750 ml of $10 rum,
Because even the cheap stuff can put the hair of the Dog on my tongue, and that will let out a poem
Or two moaning from the circuitous doors of My wounded tomb, allowing for a few hours to Dance alone with you in my high altitude room,
Knowing even though that it will not get me buried
In West Minster Abbey, in between Percy and Mary,
Nor will it unimpose your coffee eyes from me,
The flirting organs that swim like lighthouses through My sober sea.

Cheese Sandwich

Pugnacious wit of the settlers' blood
Eventually paved America:
Discovered Wal-M*art, invented presidents,
And cold turkey with mint jelly;
All the glassy men have fallen in battle;
Broken jawed,
Even the brightest were scalped by/for the prime minister's Male pattern baldness,
And I stand now below my major professor,
Blow him a tuna kiss from my ass;
Out of Chaucer's trumpet, erupting not unlike Dante's Inferno,
Notice he has a photo of himself and Bobby Bowden,
Signed in the red bricks of Doak Cambell Stadium.
My pillow- on the 50 yrd. line with a box of wine.
If I was a better poet, my IQ would summit Everest,
And I would experiment with Verlaine
In the Montemarte district of a bankrupt airplane:
Punch my wife in the belly, and cut off my ear
For the stewardess with the saline park bench;
In this time of year, the wolves are hungry;
They've only had a cheese sandwich for lunch,
And the foals are crying like horny virgins all across the Windswept valleys;
It is fifteen years too late to meet Rimbaud,
And Baudelaire is too busy hang-gliding upon the Glued clitoris of my infantine high school's ferny courtyard;
The novel incumbents are grinning for photographs as they Release the hybrid wolves into the gated community
Of affluent used car sales men and failed Olympic gymnasts;
And now I am out of time, for though these words are free,
They are part of a curse, and, like everything else I sneeze,
Will turn back to pumpkins and rats,
As soon as the clock strikes midnight, the skeleton drinks
His wine, and Dorothy pulls back the curtain on the emerald humbug.

Chelsea

The uncouth rhymes of consciousness live in the harem of the noun.
In kindergarten
you learn the alphabet;
you put dirt in your mouth.
Half asleep,
pull up strands of yellow and orange carpet,
pretending you love her,
singing the song of the south;
After school,
In a house above ground, mother and father are not speaking.
Language is sound.
The white hound kills a clutch of rabbits in the rock garden
God strolls around.
As mother dresses you in a grey suit for Easter,
Death keeps a hole in the ground.

Cherie Currie Or Another Feral Young Thing

The wind lays off its blowing and starts
To clap,
Wipes its mouth when it sees the movie is Over; it didn't realize,
But was dreaming of the savannah so svelte
With ibex and koala bear;
Then shuffling out on pretty legs, rips the Soft satin of well-supposed roses,
She tilts her head back and with a gleam
Takes the hallucinatory substance- day trip in The afternoon while housewives are getting Their cartons of milk- one for each breast,
And their husbands are getting the same thing
But from an entirely different store;
And a different maid, she refuses ice-cream-
She begins to trot, goes on four legs between the hills,
Houses like coffins with doors nailed shut-
One for every yard, and I try to keep up, but she Didn't like the movie I was in, sayings she want to Keep the company now of her fellow troubadours;
And she's switching sides, and running any bases
That she finds- The umpires wont be around until
The morning,
And she can go down to the lake and puncturing it,
She can ride its alligators to the sea- she can think up
Stories to tell, and scoop up the feral orchids
And bow, and bow, and bow.

Robert Rorabeck

Cherished Sorority

Turning into another day of low catastrophe
Where lunchrooms are Banished into Cadillac's or it becomes Another peaceful sound
Of engines
And locus and hummingbirds while my veins
Feel cold,
And there is someone else galloping
And even backwards across the bridge of my spine:
While, looking up, won't you believe,
Another blinded angel is spinning
In freelance fireworks,
While another day laborer gets off early and Pretends to shuck his duties-
While telenovelas parade across another
Day's screen,
As the fires spread across the mountain,
Marching-
And the aspens say their prayers and continue
Looking up to the jovial moon,
So happy with all of what she has stolen even While beneath her all of that cherished sorority burns.

Robert Rorabeck

Child In Your Orchard

I have proven that the world is my dream,
But my dream is my death,
And I don't even have money to spend at the racetrack;
And I can still hear the traffic and your name,
As he lights into you under Pike's Peak,
As he gives you the juice to turn on all the scientists;
And what were you thinking:
That it was just your time to become a mother,
Or that common fairytale they serve almost everyday
In lunch rooms all across the country-
And now the world is bespoke, it is being talked to;
My dogs can understand more of it than I can.
I get nervous in restaurants. I am afraid of things that I appreciate; Like death, I wait for you,
But unlike him, you should not come- The moon is runny
Like yoke,
Like a chariot of reindeer,
And now I have thoroughly deceived myself;
And very soon you will have another child in your orchard
That has no business being named after myself.

Robert Rorabeck

Childish Burn

A new day goes over like this,
Like Jack over his candle, and what am I to Say for this,
Only that I am not any more than yesterday unless It is contented;
I certainly don't know you anymore
(who are you- and why do I sing to you like a Dying soldier in his basement meadows?)
Mostly, it is about new things now, and the repercussions
Of holidays, and the good music left unresolved,
And your legs? Your legs? Let them run for other men,
Let other men put their fingers down their rivers like Little boys and their slaves.
I don't care. Who said I ever cared? I am only this,
And I don't mean to brag. I have a book published no one Reads, and I am thinking of buying a house full out and living
In it just like the afterlife of one of those Egyptian Pharaohs,
And I can walk to and from the humid green yard
And the air-conditioning, to intersperse the ululations with the Hums; and what of you by means of this? It is not a thing
But a childish burn, a birthmark: Something that can not Be taken back, like a murder the sun almost has solved by morning,
And I make my omelets and look out my window
At the empty yard and all those bilious clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

Child-Land Of A Place That Has Moved On

Kindergarten of muses, of tinker-toys:
Little girls on the sherbet rug,
Pulling up day dreams, already know who
They are going to marry- Premature
Leave-alone,
I am outside on the swings, censoring like a
Smoky bishop in a pointy hat:
I can only move diagonally this way and
That underneath the slash pines.
My mother's cold noodle soup makes me
Want to throw up-
I want to kill that queen, but will have a hard
Time at it,
Lollygagging, Shetland ponies, collecting shells
On the west coast of Florida,
Pensive on Sharon, and I am already so old:
Look at the cereus, look at the dog show:
Pantomimes leaping on the half shell of airplanes:
Sharon beats them all,
Beautiful bone structure, tan as a pearl,
Baking her cake in the kitchen of a house of cards;
And I am just about no one all dressed up
To leave for the moon-
The day is almost over, my lips and hands covered
Only with mud,
My little sister weeping to be with me-
The pine trees weeping houses down through their Lees;
And I don't know Sharon,
But there is her sun crinkling through the lilac trees,
Already baking my prepubescent pottery;
Pretty soon mommy and daddy will come for me,
And I will get to dream of her more
Into the corners of darkness- spiders looming about
The refrigerator,
Giant teddy-bears stolen from the trash;
And all of us wanting her, wanting the first rounds of A child-land of a place that has moved on
That will not exist.

Children With Another Man

Up in the woods where they keep our Grandmothers:
Where the prop-planes have crashed,
And there are
Not even one or two survives:
Where I have run with my dogs
To try and taste lightning,
Feral tongued:
Up those hills where the Indians
Preached
And down those hills where the beaver's
Dammed-
And your children are sick, but they Can be healed- if not tomorrow,
Then the next day- And the wild flowers
Are truly something to behold:
Drive your truck here while the airplanes
Are far away,
And the fires are jumping like electric
Current across her bosom-
And you and I were just growing up-
Seventeen- do you remember that Time where everything inside the movie
Theatre had to be real-
And we hadn't made love to other people,
And we still thought about each other
Before you moved to Colorado and had
Children with another man.

Robert Rorabeck

Children Without Us

Growing where we fall
Beside the glacier, beside the waterfall:
Beautiful foundlings outside of
The ballrooms-
Near the summit, where I guess we have to look
Up at the stars, disgusted:
Above tree-line- our dumb luck:
We can never grow here-
The witches and angels will browbeat us they Come around in their games:
We will turn to midgets, stunted beside the Glacial lakes the size of minnows:
And the girls we want to love we will not Even see- and they will have
Children without us:
And you will never think of me.

Chinese

Now this is nothing
Special-
Asian girls are Yawning-
In the evening I play
Chinese chess-
With my father-
I don't know his name-
Whatever his name
Is,
He wins most of the time-
I've won three times-
He cooks frog legs,
Liver, and duck tummy-
Afterwards,
At night,
I make love to his daughter
In the bedroom he has Given us to Make love in-
Sometimes I wish she was
A better lover-
Sometimes I think she
Is just right-
And in the day the sun
Is made of Chinese characters
That seem to be Trying to describe
Something to me
I cannot understand.

Chivalrous Aphorism

Every day's a new day,
But I've been dead so very long
That all my songs are just Echoes of songs.

Chorus Lines Of Jumping Jack

I only fell in love because I bought you flowers;
And I am alone because I drink beer,
But now we are together in state sanctioned borders,
Which greatens the odds of running my fingers
Through your hair:
Maybe we'll meet on another planet in Disney World,
And I'll use roman candles to divert your Candy cart off the tracks,
And I'll overthrow your knickers and unhinge your straps,
And eat all your salt water taffy while the munchkin
Automatons do chorus lines of jumping jacks.

Robert Rorabeck

Chosen Insanity

With the rest of us
You are living well
In your chosen insanity;
I know because I sometimes
Cut your voice into my Wrist.

Then ordinary veins become Red lips,
And you speak to me,
You speak to me of him,
Your ordinary husband.
You describe the affluent
Sex and say,
Say you are doing well,
Quite well
Like an oracle
Sleeping in a red well
Somehow much deeper
Than my wrist, so I cut Deeper still
To hear you crying
All that you own living
Inside him: The house
You rent,
The car you drive
Somehow fits
And you dress in your Ordinary insanity,
Your influence.
You are doing
Quite well
With the rest of us.

My father is digging up
A hundred acres
And putting in water spickets
Every twenty inches
So the earthworms
Don't grow thirsty

As the Queen Bug
Insists.
In the trenches,
He is fighting his hell.

My mother is doing
Everything people are asking
Her to do for them:
She is doing the work of
An army of prostitutes.
She puts her prints
On the pricks.
She washes dishes
And encores, she bows
To her father's wishes.
In fact, she married
Her father,
As he insisted;
It is her particular insanity,
And she is doing quite well,
With all our compliments.

For three decades
I have run away and Chained my fists against
The backyard fences.
Where the dogs live,
I live under the house
With them. I refuse to Change. I bark at Strangers,
I follow their scents.
Across state lines,
I hunt fugitives.
I check for ticks,
But down deep in night
I still hear your Heart beating in my Wrists,
My ordinary wrists.

I am living with the rest of us

And we are doing quite well,
Ordinarily,
In our chosen insanity.

Christmas Of At Least

You seem to think the stewardesses I paint
Are so beautiful,
But so much for your mouth or the way you've Been daydreaming
Right beneath the faux teardrop of another
Disney World
Whilst I've been drinking from another rummy
Fountain—right there are the ends of
The world and all of the prettiest fairytales
That you know—and it doesn't
Much so matter that you've lost your job—
And my own words fly to their own
Cathedrals—this is just the imaginations which I love,
All burnt out and trying to recover to
The steam-engines upon the patios—
You can fire me,
But I will still awaken, upon Christmas or Whenever—
It doesn't seem that I am going anywhere—
Even with all of your seas so strung out,
And the dogs of wherever licking the bones off my Foot:
Don't you think that it happens to be beautiful
Anyways,
At least until there is a Christmas, a Christmas of
At least, anyways....

Christian Truth

Whose c*ck do you go sucking now? :
I do not care,
I give you mine
To delay on until I get you there:
I can not stop you from playing in your Nursery rhymes:
Your bare-ass exploited like a rental car:
You are as confused as a dislocated kine,
But I will find you in the end,
I swear:
And ride you like a bucolic Ferris-wheel:
If you bleat, I will mention the stars
To distract you while we reproduce.
Alongside the highway,
There are many neat men going by,
And they might try to net you in a business-suited Deal which sounds too good not to,
But don't:
Because I am still here,
Doing my best cursive to get you to strip:
My smile is never insincere,
Even if I am unreliable, I know your zip code,
And I will never apply to law school,
Even if I am as lonely as my friends who do:
I will get you in the end,
Because it is the best conclusion:
Like two unrequited lovers who seem to drink poison,
The clichéd Shakespearian tragedy,
Only to wake up healthy for Christmas
Surrounded by their children:
This is Christian truth,
And I will undress you there
Beneath the garlanded tree on four legs,
In a house without a mortgage:
I will take you ever time,
Like a cultivated garden:
All you have to do is believe,
And I will trough you like a reawakened army:
You will put your head in that pillow

And cry my name,
And I will supplant this poem inside you,
And reawaken the names of our children
In all the fine rows:
And you will smile in the morning
For real and for the first time.

Christmas On Jupiter

A gorgeous bowl of teak,
But I don't understand- There isn't Any trees,
But a grove of cairns some devil's
Field, all the skree is broken pottery:
The junkyard Indians are out right now,
The gentlemen are lighting their cigars,
But I am on the wrong mountain.
I am on Jupiter,
And all I have is cheese and crackers.
When contemporary daylight falls,
She will be alone with him; he'll have Brought over his videogames,
And she will have cleaned off any traces of Our domesticity;
She'll have renamed the cats,
And sent the mercenary lightning storms calling after All my scars: And all I wanted was to Be beautiful, to junk up the breathless sky with My name;
But this range is apathetic,
My tent is blue and torn, and all the stones
Are gossiping,
And I have gone down the drainage of the wrong
Basin,
All the wildflowers are evil,
And they will be making love in our bed,
And by the time I've found the narrow gauge
Railroad and refilled the canteen by its creek,
She'll have boxed up my Christmas Presents,
And hung a crown of her new name;
And the foreign exchange student working the service
Car will look at me appraisingly, but
Have a change of heart, and by that she will put
A new lock on her bicycle,
And I shall disappear amongst all these tourists
Before we should make it back to Durango.

Christmas Sea-Shanty

I've gained weight,
But its mostly muscle,
Because with these Christmas trees
I like to hustle:
Two Chinese women come in and they're Very thin and beautiful, I'm not
There to greet them, but the boys are
And with them tussle just as the females
Who work in factories building silver bombs,
Their forearms, too, are well muscled.
Now the days are through, and I'm neither
Italian, or Hindu: I've never built an igloo.
Well supposed, I love Erin,
But she could be one in a million of Erins,
I suppose: but this one doesn't live in
The mountains, the secret crèches or double-
Adjective. Maybe she water-skiis:
She fits nicely into this,
She is an allegory for the sea:
And now I sway, my cheeks smooth from rum,
And tomorrow we'll sell two hundred trees,
And daddy will smile,
And then I'll get some....

Robert Rorabeck

Christmas Sky

Sunlight has its new management again in the sky:
You were kissing her:
I could not describe you
Again in the sunlight of the cul-de-sac of another
Honeymoon-
But I saw you again in the ferris wheels of
I don't know-
But I saw you again in his arms and across the Train tracks even though nothing else of it was Anything special:
And the daylight seeds over the teeth of dragons,
But anything more from the classical Literature is lost to me-
And Johnny Apple seed has burned down my throat,
And you are still climbing up the latter to him
In the stars-
My uncle is still selling grapefruit and calebasas-
The ukuleles still sing across the yards
Like the hind ends of Locusts-
That this is the very end of summer, and the fireworks
Have burned,
And all of our greatest loves have disappeared beneath the Rose bushes-
As the fish still try to leap to kiss the tattooed lips of
The angels bending down in the constellations of A less than Christmas sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Christmas Tree

Good men love bad women
And visa versa—this I know- as I sometimes Kept the feminine serpents
In my house—
But kept my ears to the sunlight, listening outside
To the serpents who measured their bellies
By the ways the grasses grew—
And yet somehow serpents never learned how To grow fat:
They had bulges when they ate the rabbits—
And the sunlight made new sounds around them
Until they shed themselves,
And then became the failing sunlight around
The carports that only sometimes existed—
As the planets turned inside the ballrooms of their Satellites—
And she followed her husband to the very ends of The earth—even though he beat her—
She dug herself out of the grave every morning—
And painted her nails for the mirages of Skeletons—
And then, even though it wasn't enough—
She pretended to love me, as she left her skin
Underneath the tree for me at Christmas,
As some kind of present she meant for me to have.

Robert Rorabeck

Christmas Trees Of Oh So Far Away

Places lost from treasures, and crystal, mathematical labyrinths
Bled around the perimeters of likeminded castles—
Girls who have wondered so lonely from the isometric holidays,
Who have burned away from those cages—
And enjoyed themselves, collected to the hemispheres of
The graveyards around the lakes—and are silent
And as wholesome as mirages whose younger brothers
Bicycle to the penny candy stores—
And steal jaw breakers and licorice to feed to the ants before
They burn them—when the sun lays in the meadow like a rhinoceros
And seems to develop beneath the infinitely cerulean
Debarcation of sky—where angels evaporate from the silent
Thoughts of another summer's Christmas trees of oh so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Christmas Trees Or Video Games

Consumed upon the terraces of the Ferris Wheels
That are turning from the evaporations under Their streets:
Girls who have gone away never come again
To the same place—
Metamorphosis of cheap carnival into
A water wheel
Conquistadors lie down their granite crosses
To hear the whispered
Gossips of- and butterflies come and lay
Down beside the recesses where there
Once used to be fixed
Carnival games—
Where I once set the piece of my flesh,
Like the center of a kaleidoscope
Because some cat or
Some fox would have said it would make Me rich,
But she didn't return—lost up into the Castanets lit up like
Christmas trees or video games:
Only the waves returned, beating themselves
Like hungry beggars against the pedestals of Bars and churches the same—

Robert Rorabeck

Chrysalis Of Bull-Sh-Tters

Covered in the chrysalis of bull-sh-tters
I see how you smile to woo
What are you doing now but calling
In the same old weather fronts over
The used car lot,
The pennants are flapping
The gossiping of clucking throats—
Now everyone has one
And are being noticed, the beautifully
Needing eyes—
The lovely women in the glass vase
They taste like the sweetest things as they Tease swimming with their tight legs
Over the unmowed grass and weeds;
And the trailer is fading on cinderblocks,
And no one here has been to school in
So long,
And go leaping in the trolling dusk,
Their adam's apples bobbing the sweat
And bad skin of the truck stop's colloquialisms,
And the women are so beautiful like little Unschool'd fairytales bighting the inside
Of their flushed cheeks all their unwashed children
Following them like ugly gosling the Beautiful swan, their hands around the sticky
Things never quite bothering with What they must become.

Robert Rorabeck

City Of Red Slumbers

I suppose you are lying- the sky so wide
It drapes the rivers and the places
Where people lie
Beside the traffic where light is moving;
It is a zoetrope of businesses- haven't you
Seen it before in this kind of light.
The antelope are stargazing- they almost Seem to be frightened
As they stumble out of the forest covering
The arrowheads- as the planes tip in
The sky,
Soon they will be touching down in a
City of red slumbers-
And the people will come stirring out,
Swearing that they will do some good.

Robert Rorabeck

City Of Their Daydreams

Place me in the salesroom of another
Gypsie's queen and I will moth off for you—
I will throw my own father underneath the buss—
As the most beautiful of women still try to survive
In the exact middle of the country,
And as the school children get home today
They try to watch cartoons—
But the tortoise has lasted as long as the Dinosaurs, so what is his spell—
What does he have that we are missing—
Now that the time is almost gone underneath
The airplanes—
And the same illusions become lost underneath the Zoetrope—until the space explorers are finally explored—
And the zoo has time to touch itself beside the sea—
And the rest of our reasons are left over to time
And perpetuity—in the kindergartens of the day-glow
Recesses where all of the other mountaineers have already failed,
And these are the last tracks the mountain lions have already Pretended to caresses—so the night is already lost beneath
The immense tourists who come like winter to a daylight
They mean to explore—perpetuated by their unawareness
In a daylight where they become as meaningless as the City of their daydreams.

Clarity (Nov.9th,1989)

Let me be clear:

The sun before it goes down

Has no home.

There are still people inside

The earth

Who have never held the night

Sky-

Around the corner,

In blue lamplight,

She dresses and serves

Strange men her eyes

(Their atmospheres merge 9 to 5) -

Inside a room, talking,

She is more lovely than the sea

Breathing;

I want to take her shift Sunday,

So she can go to church

And pray for me,

But she cannot say clearly

That she loves me nor does

She remember how her lips felt

Press into me,

But I see her with perfect

Clarity....

Like the sun in his bright house As the world lays sleeping....

Classrooms Of Stolen Lights

Career for knights
In a playground where the perfumes
Of damsels remain:
But they have gone, matriculated up to the
Sky
And college- terrapins out in the open weep
At stages-
Tinfoil thunder with lightning creases
Across the cars that will not stop
Because they think they are going home to Something real-
As the grass struggles underneath the moon
That gives nothing but illusions with Its classrooms of stolen light.

Cleaved Needfully Into Weedy Tennis Courts

Slash pines coming at every angle,
Like stiffly exploding vermilion tinsel.

My mother cut my hair today,
Out back of our new produce market,

Or I shouldn't say,
Because you were not there:
You are not here,
And it has been so many yesterdays-

You have never seen my mother cutting my Hair,
And yet Florida is such a beautifully wimpled
Esplanade,

And the slash pines don't so much care if they Grow without the thoughtfulness of your Senses;
It is a sad park, and yet they grow so beautiful,
Twisted and bent
Like swords that would never have suited you
Cleaved need-fully into weedy tennis courts.

Cleopatra Of The Atlantic Basin

There are cabarets in South
Florida,
In West Palm Beach up and Down Military Trail,
Entertainment for the army-
Girls in high-heeled parade with pink
Fingernails that smell like Industrial glue,
Dead horses and dollar store
Glitter sprinkled in tatters
Above their eyes-
They go around tables with Love handles, overweight Barbies
Picked out by strangers from the gutter—
Like naked panhandlers
They are working....
There are cabarets in South
Florida
And dark corners where
You can pay, but walk
To the East
And you will find the sea
Spread out the wreathing bed
Pearlescent in the seducing moonlight—
She will let you swim all night
Through her salt—
Her waves undulate like terrific steeds
Rearing along her inner thighs,
Her breath, the wind moans,
Motivates the passion's tide—
She will take you in and Play with you as the moon's pull heaves
The waves of her bosom over you....
She will never tire nor lose interest
And when you are finished,
You can lie against her
Shore as the sun rises,
Smoke a cigarette and
Get a tan all day long

While she caresses your fingers
With her tongue;
She will never stop-
There are cabarets in South
Florida,
But just offshore to the East
Is where She lies,
Unashamedly bared,
In perpetual motion, going nowhere,
Over-spilling from her dress
As the traffic goes by like metal fish,
Glinting on her flirtatious eyes,
Cleopatra of the Atlantic Basin.

Cliff Notes

In all its ways
The land goes down,
Goes down falling as children
Float and laugh in the waves,
To the sea in the sun,
And everything is inevitably real:
The beautiful and the scarred,
The amphibious life
Which takes no surrender,
Though always eventually
The heroes die,
For they forever create the better monsters:
The unconquerable things that
Have her eyes,
Things left undefeated with no last name
But their own,
In the mist, in the park,
At the edge of the all too real continent,
When you went alone
And believed it could be true,
Though afterwards you crawled home
Licking your wounds,
And she walked on down the hill,
When another man became her king,
And sailed off with him into another land,
In the space across that is leading upwards
Far away where things carry new names
And children are born
From the golden caesuras,
Pauses between the lapping waves.

Climaxing The Rhyme

Slit my wrist on sabotage-
Just learning how to feel- The words are Real or they're not; they won't
Make you young, or feed you hot twat;
I really think that they cannot,
But they're my fun anyways: Better than baseball,
My words, the game,
Sluiced enough with rum they can give you
A day job out picking fruit,
To whistle to the girls speeding along on their Route;
And, yes, I've loved- loved airplanes and dogs,
Love the girls spinning, spinning Cadillacs from frogs:
But it gets cold here restive both day and night,
Spinning my words and smoking my pipe:
I cannot remember the last time it was I've read
A good book,
And even when a really good poet dies, he overshoot
By consumptive actors, the baby-faced paramours
That I know that I'm not;
But I find myself singing here anyways, my fingers and Toes tasting the grave,
Needing to shave: And the girls who love their Athletes are spinning in time,
Hooked altogether a mighty fine catch on a fine
Fishing line, making an easy mobile for guys on their Line;
And I find myself rhyming, rhyming for food-
And I could start giving the Christian names for the girls
For whom I'm casting but that would be just rude;
Instead, I'll try to wrap up this thing,
Burning with a match and a squirt of gasoline;
That seems much like the best thing to do,
To smile sincerely hearted and burn down this zoo;
And meet her under the bleachers if she's got enough time,
And caress her so that she climaxes this rhyme.

Climbing My Usual Mountains

So many numbers reveal,
The divine platitudes to the ear-
I want to live beside her and whisper
And reveal my scars
And have her accept them;

So I care nothing about math, and skip out
Over the canal, and wash myself
In the alligator's dribble,
And swing upside-down under the warming dykes cut up
By palmettos

Now the days are dripping,
And the horses stumble far beneath her
Contemplative gaze- far away on
New savage continents too busy
Getting drunk
To be able to walk a straight line:

All my lines tumble.
They are no good, and they are hungry
But we are out of food.
I would lie and say that I am standing here
Waiting.
Rather I am sitting-
I have eaten my lunch and thrown it up again
To get a goodly poetic look at the inside,
And now all the flies come prettily like
So many crowds fallen winged too high
From all those rollercoasters....

Blue mothers and their offspring decrying
That they deserve more prizes,
While choking on the influx

Waiting for the traffic to bypass,
For some surgery- a year or more since I've seen
The ocean I used to flip casually nondescript into,
To piss warmly, an exurban bachelor in that truancy

And now I thirst for her briny lips,
And her brown and kelped bosom.

Tonight I will get drunk and pretend to go into Her again and steal things which are precious to her,
Which she would have me steal;
But not on Sake, because I live in the far west,
And the best I could do about it was Cheap rum, the kind I drank as a tip for Christmas-
I will see the barmaid who in my dreams
Is a raspy DJ mostly fading,
But I should not go on about that until I am goodAnd drunk,
And have gotten well started climbing my usual mountains.

Close Your Eyes

I finish off my last beer while Romero is outside
Walking around in the last of crepuscule;
I remember that there is a swing set in the black apartments
Down the street from the produce market,
And then I get out of the truck where I sleep and toss the Beer bottle into the tall grass;
I come back inside, the textures glossed with rain
And try not to brush my burning face: Somewhere there is a Beautiful woman for me- Somewhere like a Disney Movie,
There is a beautiful woman- There is, isn't there:
And the traffic comes and the traffic goes,
Vertical indentured traffic, never touching:
It is so impossible now- and I sling the last of my words like Tossing colors onto a weary palate- like finger painting
In kindergarten, which is still maddening from the Girls I love;
And pretty soon I will put my head to the truck's bed
And go on a fieldtrip somewhere vast,
While my lips drool and my snake bleeds:
I want to go all the way out into the sea and meet you on
Some very grand atolls and kiss your lips,
And troll the depths of your shallows and hang my head between Your clefts,
And sing like a prisoner running free until morning's red lanterns
Enthrall me and with its hateful dogs brings me back around
To capitulate with a reality that cannot be refuted until You close your eyes.

Closer To Me

When did she lose herself after shop class
And maybe barefoot in the crown of thorns in some part
Of the off centered diamond
In the landscaping of middle school:
Where she went to instead of going to lunch is where
She has always gone to,
And we will never know, except that we already know:
And she has made beautiful things with her body, marching,
Played out under the sun
Where she can actually relax for awhile while her
Kids are playing;
And then her eyes have to wander, because that is what she Is made of, and I can only hypothesize that is what she is Always doing;
And at night while her trailer makes the sounds of ghosts
Too impossibly large to be there,
I think she is moving again, her body softly breathing:
I dream that she is getting closer to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Closer To The Sun

I drink gold fish
Like a girl;
I look at you
Sideways
With your guys.
I wonder how many Clouds live in
The sky,
And how long they live.
I want to find your Secret hearts
And survive.
And I want to build a
Castle of chicken wire and Papier-mâché
Light enough to float enshrouded
By airplanes;
To steal your beautiful days
Away with me
Into the sky;
I wonder if I could:
What shapes you
Might take
Whistling in the kitchens
Closer to
The sun.

Closing In Colorado

Girls in dormitories in Spain,
Religious girls,
In curls, who sigh in the rain:
They go to school in Spain.
Maybe they are near the sea,
The ancient terrapin where ghosts who Have no home go to collect salt,
And I love my horses
And do not have enough time to watch
The beautiful girls swimming away
In short skirts,
Like tennis players,
Their bones as light and well-mended as Drift-wood.
Where are they going; it is as if they can hear
The song I cannot hear,
While the sea bolsters the meatiest of storm
Clouds,
Like entire racks of ham, bloodied, dudgeoned,
Going up and up like Wedding Cakes
Circled by buzzards;
Like the gowns Sharon wore when she took the Name of another man,
Outside near the river that eventually formed
The Grand Canyon, oh-ing and awing
While my snowflakes fell melting too high for Her to know to care,
So by the time they touched her special picnic
They were only but a whisper upon her
Bare shoulders as she danced in the seeded grass
With the man who would soon bare children
By the upright womb that can always be found
Walking home after closing in Colorado.

Robert Rorabeck

Closing Your Eyes

When you try to run away from school,
As the alligators yawn
While the princes try to feed it apples, hoping something
Will change-
You get away and find the overgrown paths up to
The clouds- there seems to be some hallway there,
Evaporating-
Leading up to the promises of a three ring circus
With you skin so brown and lying passed out beneath
The Christmas tree
The chimney coming down to you- and at midnight
Your body is golden and so rich that,
Closing your eyes, everything you've ever imagined
Is all at once stolen.

Robert Rorabeck

Cloud

It may have been cloudy
When the clouds sang one afternoon:
They really sang,
And evaporated dryads crowded in the Ephemeral visions, cried the tears which did
For the allegory of a sun shower:
So light above our blooming heads, we Couldn't even tell:
But you came over to me, just as well,
And we studied Latin. I was already becoming Scarred, and I was surprised when you asked
Me what was wrong, and you couldn't tell:
I loved in the only language germane to my Tongue: stuck like a fleshy spelunker to the Roof of my mouth when confronted by you:
Can't even speak now, but lays quietly hostage
Against the classroom of my skull;
In the quiet classroom abandoned by an eerie
Tide. The seat you occupied now empties,
Like a liquor bottle; your legs no longer echo,
Laughter no longer fills the adolescent halls,
The language quiets and the clouds pass by as Casual as strangers who do not remember how They passed their tears down to us,
And you didn't even know.

Robert Rorabeck

Cloud Of Vapor And Heroes

As a cloud of vapor and heroes,
Floating over the keyholes where Alice disappeared—
She seems to have metamorphosed with the Sunset,
She seems to be burning away into tomorrow—
And an upset jubilee stretches herself out
Where ever you might find her—
Maybe she even becomes something utterly
Beautiful that cannot be remembered—
And then they are making themselves up
To be presented to the beautiful theatre—
While the Alamo lies surrounded—
And the tin man and the scarecrow lie together
Underneath the narcolepsy of forgetful rainbows—
So when the moon arises she offers up
Her unconditional surrender.

Robert Rorabeck

Clouds Out To Lunch

Wasted dollars out to lunch,
Words left on the bank like dead flowers.
She takes herself to find new love
At the roller rink amidst all
Of the glitter—
To forget about backyard swimming pools
And the school boys that can be found Sometimes coming home in
An almost hedonistic rain.
We all have a price to pay
But our time is up.
Clouds are built to fly away.

Robert Rorabeck

Cold Beer And Web-Pages

Derelect of friends,
I look at beautiful pictures of Fit tourists in Colorado,
Half-Asians and the Jewish Boy I remember sleepovers with:
Street Fighter, Cathy Ireland,
And ballrooms of ineffective light
Over the backyard pool-
His sister dating a kung-fu artist,
And the first time I got drunk
Watching Alien 3,
Girls in high school fully clothed
Who are now lawyers and Sommeliers who sleep at the Neck of the woods but go no further:
In the pictures there are self-effected
Smirks, eyes sealed shut from Greenish smoke,
And all the undeveloped afternoons
Of videogames, the eventual
Slip away from college,
Quiet expulsions; he never had
His bar mitzvah, in Telluride they Ride the ski-lift over her new restaurant:
They make raids on banks,
Have snowball fights. I am applying
For my PhD. I have a published thesis,
But I play videogames in my parents'
Basement most afternoons when I
Am done feeding the horses; I remember
How the lions roar, and the tourists
Sweated. I think about reading something
Academic by Auden, but his rhymes are Routine. I write insouciantly;
They fall in love the same way, and
In the casual meetings order burgers and Fries. The world is a wonderful scar-less
Place which rolls over in the sunny grass,
Panting without abstraction:

His sister eventually gave up
On martial arts, and married another Banker from Poland. They have Never read of Sylvia Plathe;
He designs web-pages and drinks
Cold beer.

Coloring-Book Conquistador

Are you still doing this, or are you too busy
Stealing bicycles, the spoken fauna of the student ghetto;
I know, and there are trailer parks further out in the brush
And people who live in them sometimes
Dress up and go to work at Renaissance Festivals:
I've been to one or two,
And just down the block a little toy airport where my paper
Airplanes are always breezing, mottled in the rain,
They still taxi with hidden appreciations in their spectacularly
White fjords, with plastic stewardess serving drinks
To your painted fingernails: Rub my belly like a lottery
Ticket, see my magic rabbit hanging in the cactus garden,
These images I have for you, like pornography not So deep in the woods that a little boy can go easily for Awhile, a coloring book conquistador, find out how you
Lay your legs around every fire-hydrant- a sure thing,
Tomboy; and once I live nearby the sea, won't you come and Visit, and watch me spill out my guts into the fine, fine
Sands, like a toy chest itself, cowboys and Indians and great Presocratic heroes spilling out; its what they do,
Because I've brushed my teeth.
Because I have inside me most everything you can pickup
At the dollar store and walk right out the door with;
And I don't know why I am doing this, bequeathing my Genuflecting art into the night, the penny candy the werewolves
Eat like after dinner mints after feasting on the neighborhood's
Cats, and then always returning to doorsteps and toady
Carports. Restive on their burry haunches, half-man thinkers, Reciprocating with the waning gibbous, down they salute
You whilst you drool like a creamy mollusk across the downy
Pillow half a body's length above the saltwater good atrocity
Of that aromatic maidenhead.

Colors Never Known By Our Previous Families

These are the gentle scribbles of my childcare
While I hear new cars,
And I don't want to go to New Mexico and lose my job
Fornicating over you,
A-, just to sell fireworks for America, which isn't even your Country;
But early in the morning I wished that you heard my words like Going out barefooted in the dew to pick strawberries
And sell lies,
Because I have been busy articulating for you, because I want to attend my tongue to your sweet rind again:
I want to take you out to eat near the sea, underneath all of the noises
Of the flags and the airplanes,
And then I just want to lay you down in bed and kiss you everywhere
That doesn't count until you can hardly stand it,
And then I want to make a bright gallery of you that cannot be Turned off:
I want you moaning symphonies of special elements and light parades:
Then it would be our amusement filled with horny caracoles and new Colors never known by our previous families,
And I would keep you so light in your fancies, that you could Never come down without apologizing and getting off on me.

Robert Rorabeck

Color's Ransom

Underboiling in color's ransom
Three sisters courting
A cavalier sea
His waves go cresting
Handsome
Caressing the subtle knobs
Of six related knees

On the indefinite horizon,
Merchant ships go trading
On him,
Following the roads of Whales beneath them
Sleepy leviathans swimming
Through the gloaming
From home to home they're Roaming
Through the current he is
Breathing

Earth, sea, and sky are weaving
Translucent borders
Upon the day,
Like the lips of Three young lovers
Sunlight leaping across
The rocks defining the bay.

Come Another Wonderful Morning

I meant to say something beautiful, tossing the bottle up
To taste my lips,
While I thought I saw the coral snake underneath the trailer
Some weeks ago:
Yes, wasn't it mother's day: and I can't remember if I had yet
Tussled with A-,
But it seems to me now as if that too was a dream,
For surely I can never do that again:
How close I go to her while even then the icecream trucks were Getting up and not even yet dreaming about their Songs of ululating;
And then I think that there are so many statues of the Virgin of Gaudelupe

Up and down Cherry Rd and where her uncle Romero lives:
I was in his house tonight even though he wasn't home:
Mierna fed me dinner,
And then I looked at her collection of Virgins and thought of A-:
Then I went to Walmart and bought a Mexican baseball cap,
And now I am at home drinking without air-conditioning,
Hoping that I will be all sobered up
Come another wonderful morning.

Robert Rorabeck

Come At Me

Come at me
In cadmium waves
The fateless albatross aflame
We suicidal whalers
Ignited with gasoline and Roman candles—
Come at me with
Hissing torches the survivors of Shipwrecks see
The ruby hearts of angels
Flying aces, saviors
Like Jesus' words penned in scripture
The catcher in the deeps
Wearing a red hunting cap
As he pulls them kissing
From the saw-toothed waves
Come at me, my Ship of bedded breathing,
Disrobed in exultations,
Swimming breathless
Our love moving,
Make a
Growing garden
Bobbing and blooming,
Leaving a wake of phosphorous
The finned Fates circling—
Come at me
Like a wave cresting,
A high heeled viaduct
Blushing and wreathing,
As she steps up,
A Roman legion marching
In crackling wheat in silver slips
Jangling,
Come at me—

Robert Rorabeck

Come On

Dark and blue satellites are around my eyes-
I would almost look beautiful
In a mask for valentines; and would the petit
Nocturnal orbits,
These ellipses of ochre proof attract your eyes?
Would you come dallying like a curious serpent
Through the grasses, before my time was up,
To share my cup and show your teeth?

But, this is just one of the pretty things I think
About when I am concerning you-
I want to put your chassis up on cinder blocks so
I can drink lemonade shirtless next to the sharp
Thicket of weeds which I know will come
And explore you-
The namelessly ba$ard wildflowers:
Oh, obsessively bloom

Anonymously, in all of its glory,
With the sun laying his hands on you, a
Positive general; and even if you rust you are kind
Of beautiful;
But now I must go to Saint Louis to become a Doctor;
If I blow my whistle, won't you come?

Robert Rorabeck

Come Sail Away

If I came to you now, wouldn't you stand without
A dropp of sympathy:
You might even laugh outwardly at my scars,
And that would be okay as long as you served
Me beer.
Rimbaud was laughed at too, and he lost his leg;
And you could get your bluer boys with anchors on Their biceps to rough me up a bit,
And then swing lippy into you to show me how it
Is done, if I was brave enough to drink from Your venal crèche; but my body is constructed for Hard labor,
So it might surprise you that after I knocked their Lights out and dragged you past the cheery
Buildings of your favorite University, thrashing up
All the not so wild flowers along the way
As another useless gift of suffocating beauty,
I would keep my balance and stamina, and it would Only hurt a little, coming up out of the sea
And losing your breath, and saying such names
That I suppose, after awhile, we might name our children.

Robert Rorabeck

Comely Furnace Still Round With Grace

The day slips good- I try and read Carl Hiaasen,
But I don't have the knack for it anymore:
I play with dolls in little churches with thimble blue
Crèches,
And matchbox cars that have crashed belly-up through The hedges. Lawrence's tortoises go at in a way that They make it clear they see no need to finish;
And she is upstage in her play, later on making out with The same actors that I have seen in outer space-
On cherry wood floorboards covered by smoke curling
From slightly opened, pensive lips; and it seems as If the world has gotten stuck. Perhaps it is,
And only the clouds move and the trailer parks ripple
As if trying to come out of a long standing social dream,
But otherwise the hands superimpose on domestic beers-
The baseball caps are dusty and have attracted the occasional Fly. The baseball diamond is looking down the rows of Softly sunk canals where the alligators freeze, their bark skin
Run over with jackets of tough ice; and now neither team will Win; the finely outfitted boys just standing there, chewing Their lips, bats in half-swing, runners in half-slide-
The brown eyes curiously unafraid as the balmy sun glides
Its pace, a comely furnace still round with grace.

Robert Rorabeck

Comfort Porn

Serpentine scars are better left alone:
But I'll do all of this for a dollar
Out in the desert of some war, and Christine has a
New friend,
They have long conversations together when I am not home- Subconsciously, they have a family
Together;
And the best thing about the family is the pool:
Here is the concrete slab they'll pour the water in;
It will be so clean and new,
And their children and their dogs will bathe in,
Fidelity and affluence esteemed by the pool;
And down the green easement, mowed, the canal
For more obscured things to swim in-
The language of the ground when it rains is a funny
Thing: They make love when the kids sail away to school,
When their thoughts are away at work, drawing paychecks;
This funny thing, the woman transformed from the girl,
Who kissed my neck, who stared at me in brilliant shades
Of sunlight out at lunch, who I caught wild fish for
And petted, and named for her; and let them drown and Think for awhile at the end of my pole-
Gone away now, some awful war, another girl in a deck of Nude playing cards manhandled at the businessman's association,
Or by grease monkeys when they're done hooking up cars:
And on the streets I can hear no guns or bombs,
But young Mexican women eagerly pushing castanets and prams seem to Be doing well for themselves; perhaps their husbands are even now Working and trimming and dying in those fair yards of The girl I once knew or women like her.

Robert Rorabeck

Coming Around

They didn't like what I said:
I told them they were going to die,
And after the patterns scattered like
Seeds blown into the earth by time's
Autumn wind,
They would never think of her again,
Nor see her glittery gown
Strung out like New York addicts
Copping for tricks on their street,
The way the Indians died early in the show,
Butchered by the Spanish knives of silver,
Their bows no longer arching after the divine does
Through the splay of sunlight through the palm fronds.
So they too will go,
Some before and some after their mothers.
They will recede like the tide of a salty sea—
Their pains will not linger. Their thoughts will not stray,
For time does not tarry upon men such as these,
But sets to work cleaning house for
The new guests and the new lovers.
Everything they ever learned will be cast out
And found to be falsehood,
And their old neighborhoods will gradually
Fill with strangers of another race
Of the same socioeconomic class....
Where other men will say of them what they will,
But it will make no difference,
For death does not listen but goes
Straight for the ending. He takes their wives,
As he takes their lovers.... With no remorse,
He takes them down, and he will not listen to anything
They say,
For even now he is too busy
Coming around.

Robert Rorabeck

Coming Back With The Rain

Oh my, but my pedestal is empty:
She must have stepped off to use the bathroom,
Or go shopping-
She must have gotten tired while waiting to Inspire- my art,
But you should have seen her fireworks:
They were all leggy, a chorus-line of shaven
Gypsum- She was taking time off serving drinks on Airplanes,
Leaping the sea, so handsome;
So all the Bible salesmen blamed me on their Descent in,
Their hands empty, their glasses thin,
And their lips were so hungry for her eyes:
I'm no good at explaining,
But everything she was selling was buy one get one
Free,
So the boys queued in her meadows: the bouncers,
The baseball players, and me;
And everything I did for her was extemporaneous,
But nothing I had to show her was original:
She said she would have liked it better if I was more toothy,
Feral, like one of the boys she'd heard mooning on the Radio- Handsome, at least in general;
But all that old gang had done too much howling,
And they were so good at their husbandries and grooming,
They'd gotten married well before her show was over,
Prowling;
And she had nothing to show for it,
So busy was she in her cabaret's preening:
Her entire career was empty, the bees had already knocked
Up their particular flowers;
And so I persuaded her up here into my Moony studio; and then down into my gutters, and swung the neighbor's Galleries and swimming pools in to accentuate her,
And I climbed up some mountains and nearly died
Just to give her an example,
To remind her of her powers;
And I bought or stole her entire shops full of flowers;

But all of that only bought me an hour-
And I don't know where the heck she went,
But my mind was bent, cause it knows there's a billion goodly
Boys out fetching on their red diamonds,
Spitting tobacco, punchy, and well-versed at busting
Hymens:
But I'll sing for her still from my open window, as
The empty sky feeds the corn field,
The defeated heroes hoe their friends with the serpent's
Fangs;
And I draw her allures with my fingers, invisible,
Auburn bangs;
And pray that she comes back with the rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Coming Down On Us All

Now they have a place for you too:
The same place where they butchered the unicorns:
I suppose you cannot remember:
Underneath the shade of the overpasses—or
In the luxurious orchards that made up the long shoulder-blades
Of the forts that stood beside the sea:
They said they took away the bride I could never have had and Stranded her in a place filled with day laborers above
The Laundromats of Disney World in the center of the state: and I suppose it was A beautiful place, if I had to believe in it—
But then all of the while the sun was coming down, touching off,
And melting the ice-cream of the ice-cream parlors
Where there wasn't any ice-cream anyways—
And the banana splits became like naked stewardesses
I drove around in sometimes, trying to reciprocate myself with Them,
Like a dying butterfly trying to have a good time at a party
Outside of the Laundromats
When all of the carpenters were passed out—and I could not Belong anywhere outside of the graveyards even though
That was the only place to shelter in
With another god-d#mned judgement coming down on us all.

Robert Rorabeck

Coming Up Going Down

I've seen you now,
Your mystery,
I've summited and found out your Elevation,
Through my proficient scars,
I junked your cars,
And took accurate triangulations:
Smelled your lingerie like prayer-flags,
Whipping reverentially in
Your laundry room
Underneath your gods
Where you keep yourself
When you are falling asleep;
And as a favor to you, I went back outside
Wet, and on the take,
I mowed your grass,
I cut you a break: and smiled, and smiled,
But took no pictures
What I learned in your eerie elevations,
Manicures above tree line
Where lightning strikes become especially Dangerous; it
Was all incredibly beautiful, you belong on
The cover of magazines;
And what I took from you,
I couldn't take from teachers.

Robert Rorabeck

Commercial Pilot's Longing No Longer

Yes,

The Heavens are beautiful, but I no longer care;

And yet I stare, and stare, and stare.

Robert Rorabeck

Common Courtesy

What does my heart feel like now;
But it feels like a long poem wanting more the Poisons of my muses of putrescent Janus;
Looking both ways from the doorways of these Awful purple valves,
While there are little keyholes of vision,
Then the crickets and golf balls, and the wickedness
Of water-breathing reptiles in the tall grasses of Head-shaven cannibals:
I awakened this day of my third decade and asked a
Girl out for the first time,
And she said she couldn't because she said she was Not mine;
I asked a girl out for the first and for the last time,
And the candles melted under the pillow of unanswered
Virgins,
And I slouched off to the sea alone in my diesel truck
With the amphibian airplanes leaping above the ankles of These almost vanished Titans;
And I thought of my muses, but paid to be laid by a little Ballerina in the marmalade shade;
And it was so wonderful, and it was almost surreal for a Second to lie to myself and to almost believe in the Statues franchising in this dusk,
That I wasn't a man so alone that it was just a common
Courtesy to fail.

Robert Rorabeck

Comparisons With Auden

I read a hundred pages of Auden for a lark.
I really want to like him, but what a jerk,
Addressing Lord Byron as if he were the Queen
Of New Denmark:
Keeping to his clever ways of rhyming, eyes
Closed in the dark- I think he should live forever,
Like a unicorn, or some other phallic faerie
His humor as quietly insincere as canine flatulence,
Tipping his glass and toasting to his own upper middle-class,
A real fine Mary; young Rimbaud, I'm fearing,
Is gravely more sincere, even one legged than that Pickled herring. Even though some critics are fond Of comparing those two alike, in such sentiment
I shouldn't be sharing- It would be like coupling gold with Bronze, is such a paring; or,
If we were to take a fieldtrip down the avenues of Later day debutants, juxtaposing Charles Bukowski with Silvia Plathe in a damp cellar is less crass:
One checks the oven, the other his liquor glass,
And it is up for the reader to decide what's more worth sharing:
The celebrated letter-poor or the subject of this evening's English
Class.

Robert Rorabeck

Con Quien

The bodies peel out and Make friends while I
Have been languishing here
For a
Diatribes of angels;
I guess it's true that I hate
Your cars,
And the ways that you
Drive
So insouciantly past
The Mexican family playing
Con Quien underneath
The overpass;
But they are just as Happy to be ignorant of
You.
And this is just a game
I tell to myself while the Airplanes recede
That way to the ocean,
And your reflection
Recedes back into
The antique diamonds
And prisoms
Sweated from the Epidermis of the Thoughtless pool.

Concerning Our Great Divide

Mark Twain's a great genius-
Spilling of boys, has fine numbers and
The arithmetic of condors,
A Midwestern steam captain, pipe teeth-in-clenched,
Brow molded by a draftsman trough,
A Zoroastrian of the fable fields;
Look at how he goes, skipping the wake after
Other steamboats have exploded,
Given up on the race, and his younger brother
Has died, sacrificing to Twain his innocence,
Giving inspiration and zeal;
And all the better man has to say for it is that he Is but a Machine inspired by his master's impatience,
The same as a ant or dog or pachyderm;
And underneath his circus comet dare deviling still,
Skipping a sand dollar over the earth's astonished Atmosphere,
I am but a small boy farting out words, like messy
Fingerprints, while Death is handling the lions, laughing
From the caracoles of gasoline fires, as he will have his thrill.
Flustered by Clemen's victory, the Great Rectifier will Glut with the flies, return my mottles into the reveal ivories
Of a discarded bouquet, if I can't bight my tongue tighter,
And figure out more of the mysteries of lackadaisical genius
Of the bathhouse and smoke-hall,
If I can't learn how to simply spell before its all over-
Because this isn't kindergarten- Twain is palavering with Satan in the garden, those two great despoilers don't care
An inch for this anonymous roil, and Death their faithful
Hound, excited by the broiling elements of the hoary field,
Will have a handy soul for lunch, a basket of pullulated sweet
Meats to enjoy the show, regardless of Sunday School morals;
I can see my mother and all the ladies calling in their Skirts from across the canal, but it is the only vision
The world has afforded to me, and there is nothing of it
To which the world now recalls.

Concessions Of My Language

Call me by something better,
A golden word,
Not by my Anglo-Saxon utterance,
Something long ago conquered by France:
See, even now she is following
Him into the gym where he will sculpt
Himself like a Mandela of sweat and Grease. Even though he will never Last, like David, he will only
Come into her see-sawing for this semester,
She will moan his name, and rejoin
Into him the way the ocean gives Its crests and caesuras. Rather, I would Like to be a great author who doesn't
Have to prepare for his time,
But rides on in primary colors making
Lawyers and politicians fade, but
This can never be true, because people Need their heroes, and the park is Lonely, and the moon has its pull:
I should go to her even tonight, walk down
An empty street that two lovers forgot
So long ago. There is only a shadow
Weeping for me that takes her outline,
And in even the faintest light
She is barely real, but accepts
What little talent I can give to her,
And is so polite as to not even mention
My name at all, and hides when drunken
Traffic comes by, conceding that I Should be alone.

Confectious

The interstate is beautiful:
See it going both ways, expeditious and Almost free of cops:
I've taken her avenue so many times
Between West Palm and Gainesville,
Before I had a scar of a job:
You can go to Disney World and kiss a
Plastic princess in your palace of chicken wire:
You can be a fox,
And put the needle into the red:
Put the glorious weed into the vein of your left Arm:
Or I can forget you and all the roadside distractions,
Remembering the call of the sea and helicopters
Yearning,
The coral beds of otters and spacemen:
I can take the courses all the way to Colorado and Continue up:
See where she is lying translucent and open in a
Mollusk shell,
And I can imbibe her while she isn't even looking:
She is cocooned in her extraterrestrial,
And soon she'll be extending like a earthbound
Plume down to the lips of
Her careless man,
Leaving me only with the graveyard,
The empty carcasses of woodpeckers and coyotes:
Already identified,
The scientists don't care if I become extinct:
Just another Christmas tree sleeping in the intercostals:
I would have liked to touch her flesh, coming in like
Storm fronts over her raspy androgynous:
I would have liked to have worn a fine cap denoting
Me as her hero:
And planted rose bushes over her sleeping tomb,
But she was too salty and confectious, and I loved her still While she took her child to the library,
And I crawled into the casket and died.

Confrontations If Immense Sunlight Over Stalwart Gravestones

The body of my being only knows so much,
How to write silently but with much ferality,
How to caress long distance after 4 am,
And the traffic streams like vibrant electricity
The squeaking of its joints like the yawn of a Misplaced jungle. And I used to dream that there Were so many places to go, even with all the Eyes falling down upon you, but not hers;
Now I know there is only one or two in this body
And its streams; and the brain cannot tell the difference Between reality and a television program: In Both situations there are things to sell, and primary Colors, and also the sea rippling like a ballroom full
Of trapped women, or a polished and buffed gym
Converted for prom, and the yet mostly virgins are Sweeping across it hesitantly, clasping and unclasping
Hands and sometimes lips, just as furtively as bees upon
Their meadows: and I love them as we keep plot
In a movie with scenes of long families, and confrontations
Of immense sunlight over stalwart gravestones.

Robert Rorabeck

Consecrated Roses

This is not fair: what I want:
Breathing without lungs
Over consecrated roses: if this is my art, it is Blind and infantile
Listening to words it won't understand,
While I gave her everything only to watch her
Make love with a serpent-
Beautiful in naked purple
And other lies- and I didn't suppose that it
Had to happen so many times
In trailer parks underneath the singularity of the moon:
While the scientists reminded us there were Many other worlds,
But I could only remember this....
And it was a lie they told us to believe in,
Which I supposed was just about enough.

Robert Rorabeck

Constellations Enjoying Themselves

Mouthing off a pace in the proximity of Hoarse sparrows
Who should have already flown off:
Looks like its going to rain again, and looks like
The power lines will be bedecked in icicles
For another while;
And why should I be doing this while the world is Flooding,
While cars are piling up outside of auctions and Drive in movie theatres,
While children are piling up outside of school and
Some in sand boxes;
And you have your little castle doublewide in the Weeds,
And you were mouthy to me yourself just once
The way the most precious of pollens pincushion the Sky;
And I can hear it like lions cry before a feast;
And then your friends come in the yard and there is a bonfire
And so many trucks,
And eyes fill with the light of other eyes, none my own,
Because I don't know how to do that to dance like nothing
More than constellations enjoying themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

Continuing To Slip Away

She relies here- shipwrecked,
Under another bus at lunchtime: so many words
From high school,
Allowing ones self to survive
Under whatever colors are flown by the flag-
Mouths mouthing in unison,
Opened to the windows that aren't so bad:
Barely even surviving,
But running away from all of those haunts:
Lives without bodies burning in their fonts-
Concreted as well into the joys of their epitaphs:
Slipping away,
Repeatedly- waves of blue marble nuded before
The eyes of preschoolers,
Runaways- innocents dancing in ridiculous
Pantomime,
Foxes back upon two legs, leaping at the goatees of Giants
Who themselves are flagging down the tall drinks of Water,
The sexy legs of stewardesses who walk through The clouds, serving drinks,
Talking boisterously to their sororities who all together
Continue to slip away.

Robert Rorabeck

Convictions Of Dawn

Dark dreams and intercourse-
The highway is empty except for you
Driving into the cities, but the sea beholds all,
And the night is busy hiding its addictions;
There is the salt leaking through
The crack in the window, as the radio sizzles;
Off the avenues the metric pleasure
Seesaws beneath the bangs of palm trees,
Where tawny alley-cats leap to and from
Their ochre nests, purr and clean;
They have relocated the heart of the homeless
Stonemason, who built her a sundialled fortress
Of coral slab fingerprinted in his blood,
But she never sailed to him,
And in the high rises of the anonymous night
Her banshee still tosses the fluted bones,
Dissatisfied by the room service and tiny bottles of liquor;
She falls from the balcony successively,
Only to find her loneliness butchered again
In white sheets of innocence she does not recognize,
The noir of her appetites curls tenebrous from
Her red fingernails,
As down beneath her the ragged gypsies set up
A tent as pink as shell, breathing in the humid circulations;
They will sell fireworks for New Years as their Children pickpocket early into the morning of Another resolution, as the schools of fish go leaping
From the anonymous masses of fletted waves,
Never breaking from their private shadows for as long
As night persuades the convictions of dawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Cooing As She Does

Desperadoes fighting the good fight:
I cannot go to sleep at night without kissing
My mother before hand,
And maybe you saw the light by our window
While you were out jogging,
Excited by the prospects of your new husband,
While he was coming home that night, his plane
Touching down on yours,
Great engines roaring in a bed you'd prepared
And turned the living room into a picnic with tulips
And ground orchids
And another song of merry-go-rounds and little sisters
Who are always into trouble;
But I must confess I was thinking of you,
And hoping my mother's lips would one day be your lips:
I put on a Liverpool fetish for so long for,
It sort of became the guarantor for all of my new life
And everything that came after it;
Yes, I couldn't teach or make love again to any true woman
I might find in my heart,
But I did put you on my swings one time and made you kick
Up your heels in the very same spot where that Very same night I conducted
The moon to ladle the sky as I wished to conduct my body
Into what refreshing pools you allow your husband to imbibe
Daily and nightly,
As he is always touching down on your sweet body
The places my mother will only allow me to dream upon Cooing as she does, cooing.

Robert Rorabeck

Cops And Robbers And Cowboys And Indians

Lights in the clockwork of Ferris Wheels,
Or in the Christmas trees over mausoleums; or in the things
That they turn on in kindergarten-
Soft cooling promises like waxing window shades to fall asleep under;
Something so beautiful, but so tranquil that it doesn't Have to be disproven,
Or woken up: it can just be a little girl forever, hibernating:
It can keep its thesis, and its plans to move anywhere:
From the graveyard to the trailer park,
Like marks in an exodus that the blades of the grass keep like
A metronome;
As her body folds over me, moaning until it beads in sweat:
And her soul becomes my soul: my alma,
And we swap names and spit:
We kick the ball around after work in a friendly yard, or in the warmth
Of a carport as it rains- and her husband calls her home,
Doing away with cops and robbers,
And cowboys and Indians.

Robert Rorabeck

Corduroy Dungeons

If she sold it to me
I'll eat all of it
Even if I don't need it,
And the plagues
Wasps and spiders
I will
Tame under
Softly hissing tallow
And put to nest underground
In corduroy dungeons
And feed
Those pallid monsters
Boxed lunches the Same as she Fed me
Rolling in on steaming
Skates
And sandals
So many years
Ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Cornucopia's Young

Your stewardesses are still all here:
Their gunfighters have melted into the slugging rivers,
And someone has to sing:
That I have been up past midnight, but I have been disproved
So many times,
While the new graves are being dug, but what will
We put into them,
Alma- Except that I hope that your child is well, or at least
I hope you have seen another good movie,
Which will give us a little something to talk about,
Because you have not seen Colorado:
You have not been that far up in the loins of the tourists
Beauty, the other opulent camouflage the gringos
Either stole or bought from you,
After the conquistadors had defiled your grandmother,
But you will still be here tomorrow,
Alma, because I know you are practicing to become a citizen:
And you are still quite beautiful while the lesser men
Water ski in the opposite direction
While I drink to your soul and read Shakespeare,
As your day births it cornucopia's young.

Robert Rorabeck

Could They?

Birthday cake was good in Spain-
I was drunk and chasing a guitar into Southern France,
Blowing through wind tunnels on Christmas;
But it isn't yet new years for this old year,
And why didn't you love me,
Why didn't you hold off for me until I was done
Baking;
It's taken some time, and I'm behind the rest of My class,
But I'm almost almost yummy;
And we could have gone on paddle boats together,
Or costarred as romantic interests in some Romantic sunset movie:
But the trees aren't going anywhere,
Nor am I: I could come up there and jump on your Bed like a faithful dog and just lie there.
I wouldn't even recognize if you were naked:
I could lick your kneecap, and it would be just as good
As sweet ice-cream for me- I'd hate to move near
The sea now,
But it's almost what I have to do: I have to get out of here
And nearer the wallets of walrus sized tourists,
Sell them slick amusements and cool refreshments,
The ice-cream from my aluminum tram underneath the Rosebud shadow of the Castillo De San Marcos,
And take solace in the fact that they could never think
To find ice-cream so sweet as you;
Could they? Could they?

Robert Rorabeck

Counterintuitive To The Natural Gulf Stream

If I get drunk I am inclined to hear
Oscar Wilde singing of the grumbling bees;
Scarless, he is quite beautiful, though I'd Hate think of him now,
Or Mark Twain, but he just goes on and on
More metered than Bukowski, the mailman-
But such rhyme schemes are not good for liquor:
There is no meat in the house-
I eat buttered bread with molasses-
The flies want some, but who are they to partake
In the uneven strumpets, the imaginary paramours
Who'll mow the graves for me-
I'd hate to wake those old poets up to tell them
What has happened to the Mississippi,
Or that Florida is a fully privileged state where she lives
In, driving leased and unspotted, around and around
Counterintuitive to the natural Gulf Stream;
Soon I will light a fuse, and watch the purple cabbage bloom
From the spewing lips of cone,
The chicanos take tattooed and one for free-
These little things I tend to say with too much cheap
San Marcos rum in me- and little bits of sand shaken from The webby cleats of deep water terrapin sung to me by Uncle Remus and his black faced cotton-picking harems;
I think its likely to make me an ambiguous regent for
At least another half hour down the cool walks of this evening,
But sooner than later they'll put me out and find a place for me
Where my dreams will come soft and practicing-
Not knowing how purple it is now or in which mythologies
I am to allude in, but my mythologies are my own,
Smothering this southern evening:
Cars sunken in canals, airplanes dissecting the friendly skies,
And her name is Erin;
And I'd wish she'd serve these things straight into me, her
Auburn hair done up bobbed like a waitress in a hairpin,
From my couch she'd come to me, sexed tiki-torched hips a' sway'in;
I'd rhyme to her like a little fish with my glass house all but Paid for and shaped especially to keep her in.

Country Fair

Another put on:

The queen of the fetishes gave me
A shape-changing mask,
So that I might see her undress,
Spending years of luxury in the hem of
The boudoir of swamp, on the cusp of
A cheep suburbia megalomaniacs and Alzheimer's daughter go to fornicate after Class; and their are potions and spells
In the woods, and cheeky barmaids who Serve you the fermented spits of trees,
The excitement of spreading roots, the Merry-go-rounds of cypress with red corsages;
Her armpits the little hairy boats, your Tongue the man singing on the gondola.
A purple city spinning, and panhandlers glittering
Your lover's eye with custom made poetries,
And tiny erections not meant to be too imposing.
Men who never talk,
And salt-water flats where they feed you
Taffy ladled from the brine, and upstairs beds
That are forever knocking, inquiring of the Faceless maiden's forever moaning,
Tiny nebulas kept in lockets, French-kisses
Over the telephone, and electric ponies running
On tightrope overhead; she has written her phone number
In lipstick for every boy who has attended,
And play on the swings which overlap her glossy
Canals, and the seesaws which swap spit with
The exertions of long distance runners; and I can see
It all looking up from my windshield of the red oldsmobile
In the carnival's parking lot, her rosaried bosom
The nimbus over the line of constrictive trees, a greenish
Girdle; Even in the rain the colors turn laughing,
As she catches every glorious peck of the awakening horizon,
And I have to take my head off and exchange it
To keep from crying.

Courage To Burn

Pearle scent bodies waiting for the School bus out in
The snow- waiting for so long beneath the overhangs,
As something else imperfect is said
Or written down:
And their mothers behind them, like their Shadows stretching- their first words
Forgotten on their tongues which stay inside
Like terrapin hiding from the blistering stories
Of this cold weather;
But eventually they come- poking their sensitive
Heads out,
Or running away between their classes to their Secret parks over the impasses of canals-
Running along the riverbanks, roaring
With snowflakes metamorphosing,
And skipping over the irrigation moving slowly
With blue gills,
Filling into the tardy drainage while the encephalitic
Sun tries to find courage to burn

Robert Rorabeck

Cousin Windmills

Sensuous wound, you are my cleft hoofed soldier
And this is your penny-ante cathedral—
The little boys are gathering up their marbles for you,
And their dimes:
They are shooting the b.b. guns at their little sisters
All in honor for you—
And the day is young and getting over chicken pox—
There is a nest of pig rattlers in the palmettos—
Your father is hard at work clearing them out—
Later in the afternoon, there will be a complex storm,
That will cast an unusual shade of blue onto all of
The cypress: the cause of it will be the penumbra of
All of the stewardesses flying ever so high
Until they are finally gossiping and doing their
Laundry in a sun shower—they are the only sorority
Up there—they managed to make it above the Ferris wheels and their cousin windmills—
They spread their wings and illuminate the porticos—
Like decorations of an arrow shooting over
A sweating hearth.

Cover Up The Beautiful, Beautiful Words

Now I have a mask and typresets but
It will not be halloween—not even tomorrow
And I am in China
Not in Paris with a muse,
But in Shanghai with my wife,
And nothing else lasts forever—
My paper novels fallen at the feet
Of unknown guests like stillborn sacrements,
And the yellow angels waiting to expand with
The corpulent sun:
Nothing else is beautiful,
But my little family on a paper- dirt road:
They are beautiful and they will go on forever,
Abandoned at the borders of the Zeitgeist's page:
I wasn't even trying to make money,
I was just trying to live forever, eventually,
As my illgotten liquor sweated and lactated off the Borders and the forts of the page:
Now, anyways, there are no more heroes,
But television shows are getting better—
Novels are getting more contrary and more abnormal to Understand,
Though I am certain that it will snow somewhere
And it will, inevitably, cover up the beautiful, beautiful words
That we still cannot understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Cradled In Your Shadow

Touching friends of bodies:
Like snow on apathetic woods,
I suppose I want to be with you
In the crèche of mountains,
Or anyway between you and your daughter,
I want to crush your grapes and Expectations with my imperfect body:
Or anyway, this is what I want to Be coming down to your doorway,
Whistling like your mailman,
So we can forget about the power lines and
The airplanes:
All we have to remember is to drop her off
To school,
And then back to your kitchen and fireworks,
Because after New Years this year,
Sharon,
I'll have $200,000 dollars, and I want to give it
All to you,
Because I can imagine swimming in the opalescence
Of your color changing vestibules
Is better than summiting Everest,
Or spending my summers at Disney World,
In between the pointlessly shipwrecked middle-classes;
And dreaming of you I find my way,
A pilgrim halfway to Canterbury,
One of the sadder stories Chaucer left untold
Before he died,
Waiting for you to fill me, giving you all my money
Just to swing my dying sword like Something desiring to be religious
Cradled in your shadow.

Robert Rorabeck

Craftman's Heaven

She said she never stopped reading my poems;
But from her venal mansions she never cared to right more
Than a hair's-lick;
When I told her so many times that I wanted to undress
Her midway,
And sail like a flute-boned bandit through her arid Spanish streams;
And then she would know that the sign language of my blood
Beat with the percussion of her winsome curves,
Like bows and arrows striking down across
The living cadavers of plywood men,
Cutting right through the knots of hearts:
Erin said that she never stopped giving a damn about the Words I wrote to her choke-cherry orchard,
Coming up with the stuff the way hair and nails grow after Death;
And she went with her men and her gods back and forth
Through the sea;
She said my words made her come, but it was only
From a distance where she saw herself reflected in my craftsman's
Heaven:
She neither saw nor thought of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Crawling

I can't even remember who I am
anymore
and it is a beautiful thing when the lights are cut, to move around
the vast concrete easment, man's measurement of God's design:
To feel the twisted glory in our dissected humanity-
Like a ghost in its wayward park deep in the wispy light's suburbia
watching in their backyards the strange middle-class dreamers grow up and wilt back again the lower things
The Ages of Stick and Mud that take on the classifications of upwardly mobile society to survive off the photogenesis of light prancing on the lips;
There ex-lovers slip further into the new meaningless comforts- They comfortably bleed themselves
Dry,
holding hands in the powerful living rooms and spacious coffins, in upwardly mobile basins where their children swim thoughtlessly in state-funded schools, safely into the shallows of their white-collared pools.

Robert Rorabeck

Creatures Of New Glass

I'll follow you until the windows shut,
And then I'll die right into the snow;
I was meant to be a lonely cut
From a Dickens novel- I was meant to look at Old loves getting married in this spy glass,
And then slit my throat on the downside of
The next caesura;
Isn't this the way to go, to end up broken down
Well before familiarity,
To last the afternoon breathing alone in this room,
Or in a car alone in a park down the hill from Where the houses laughing live;
I've mentioned the scars- I see your eyes by Them, sliding away as if out of control,
Hinging to new lovers who carry you through the Thresholds into their huts
Where the fires live, where the spirits birth, breathing-
Shaping the creatures of new glass into their world.

Robert Rorabeck

Creatures That Were Never Meant To Exist

Maybe you will call her, like a unicorn in the Waves,
Laughing, tantalizing and making fun of the kings
Who would have her tasseled and made to Perform
Looking across the flaming sunsets, the green ducks,
And the airplanes receding like wishes she would Hate to remember;
And all of his hopes fail, calling to her like winos
Bleeding sooty alcohol out amidst the traffics,
As their bodies curl like crustaceans into the cut
Grasses of their graveyard shells:
But it seems to persevere for awhile, even while it is dying;
As it hangs on to her advertisements, some other
Gods stealing her away-
Red accolades hurdling into the eventual sunset
And the promises of creatures that were never meant to exist.

Robert Rorabeck

Cremations Of Paper Snowflakes

Cremations of paper snowflakes:

Some thoughts last forever, just like the winos

Kissing their bottles,

I give you this:

Outside, the trees dancing like silver and green

Fireworks in the dying dreams of

Sunlight—

And with the surcease of it,

My eyes close to see the sex of your brown

Shoulders swimming in some bed

I will never enjoy—

But I lie down quiet pledges like these,

From my bachelorhood

Which is some kind of lie that you can

Pick up in a flea market underneath what pretends

To be heavenly light cast off of the migratory

Ferris wheels—

Like beautiful visions lost in a park

The losing baseball player carouse before they

Have to come home again

To wives and children—

The sun obscured in a banquet across the street

In the blindness of another world.

Robert Rorabeck

Crenulated Like Goldfish

This is another palm crossed out into the Traffic of the usual drunken night;
And I would like to say that most recently I have Perceived myself into the seemingly beautiful,
But that is just another tooth ache;
And why did you buy your house when we couldn't Live forever together,
Crenulated like goldfish happy and baking near the pool.
I am a fool,
A working class hoping fool, just wanting to be at your Party;
Just wanting to bust a tooth for a tooth fairy,
Just wanting to vagabond And move to Colorado,
But there are so many words I don't know,
That I am unsure about;
And the earth is weary, and the earth is earthy
Running out of candles and its majestic cars running low on Gas,
I cannot fool it; as I cannot fool you, S-:
My mouth is numb, my eyes are empty, and already you've Found your better man skinnier and better than I am:
I still want to live forever,
But the engine won't start, and the dogs are purring and the Rockets are just about ready to leave the earth,
But they are still waiting for you,
S- Sommelier, immortal- they are still waiting for you,
As my tent Is still waiting for you like the night of jubilee
Of so many affair,
Waiting to be taken down, awaiting there:
S-,
S-, S-, and your lucky last man all hyphenated and unfair
That he has won:
He has won and the ships are leaving your planet:
The ships are leaving your planet,
S-,
And you don't even care.

Robert Rorabeck

Cricket

I am here to teach you how to draw
All the sad lines for children,
To make believe there is a sea who has Adopted them into a world of singing paper
Upon whose unwritten surface they might Reach out and find anything,
Like the finger prints of ghostly cousins
Somehow living in the watermarked rings
Of underwater forests,
Whose glossy canopy is flowing like swings,
Like mermaid's uncut bangs,
And their parents coming home behind the Twin headlights flooding after dusk,
Somewhat worn and cuffed from their years
Of outdoor labors;
Simple basket weavers and glass blowers,
The mortally pure care-givers returning to the swirling surf
To occupy them from those pages like an insect with the Scrawling music the eyes first hear before it
Is given over to the full outfit of senses;
To which the calligraphies are singing,
Making believe that they can be anything,
That they might last forever chartreuse and weepy,
Naive like make-believe swans of their changeless beauty,
Everything surrounding them, circling,
And occupied by what strange vermilion burgeoning,
Until they are laid fully grown, smoky haired and Lined, folded into beds out of water forever, but through it all
So preoccupied with the faerie land's illusive enigma
Never having known that their sweet author has gone
Before them, over the swelling ditches, the caesuras
Where the rains tremble on branches above the gentle
Roof housing their parents restive,
And that now, too, they are called home,
Their thoughts so gently with them,
Breathless, yet somehow children still swimming the depths and shallows
Of that brightest world they have known.

Cried Your Name

You wrote me today
(Oh, how I count the times, Though they are very few)
The little lines you seem to pull out
From absolutely nowhere, the kites
From your mind in another universe that take Off and reach me five states over,

Traveling along tree-line graphs the dizzying hills
By day, and the somber and perfectly flawed
Mirror of sea by night,
When your hot tears swell the effervescing
Combs of waves,

And a ghost of your shadow lingers in
The ebbing flow, a liquid spider-web
Of anemic veins

Sheets of the lightest metals,
With your eyes' patina, dragging like
Golden filigree your angelic guts
That touched everything they could
As you sped toward me with a revenant's message

Because you were concerned on how
My words were arranged for you,
Like some cheap bouquet torn up all of A sudden from the weeds and thrust toward you, as if I
Was peddling sex organs gathered off
Strange women walking the streets,

But I told you not to worry, dear,
Because at the edge of my red precipices
Out here in Arizona, all things are born mad,
And I haven't thought about you 365 days a year
And those arranged like a dozen azure horse-sized roses
With saw-toothed thorns that tore open my Veins and 4380 times cried your name....

Crocodiles In The Egyptian Sea

Cold is the bone under flesh,
While drinking liquor, colder still—
Cold as the reptilian heart with a warm
Stone—
Cold as the lonely school marm,
Uncomely cousin to the librarian—
Imaginary lover to the nun—
As cold as I feel myself in this room,
Five stories up in a suburb of Shanghai
Stealing all of my mother in laws boxes of Chinese wine,
My ninety pound wife finally asleep in the Next room with the twenty five pound child—
All three of us sick for three weeks
Since we've been here,
As airplanes go missing from the sky,
And the lingering of my art is without a muse—
As I am without a job but have a home paid for
And 100,000 in the bank
Just the same, there are crocodiles in the Egyptian sea who also do not linger in my thoughts.

Crocodilian

Crocodilian, I manhandle you,
Are my slave in a paper-bag. Moonshadows
When she crosses her legs,
The light turns green. Tulip bulbs in Second grade, and after class dodge ball.
I saw my peers kissing in the shadows
Under the subtle lies of metallic quarries:
The engine classrooms made of tin,
Just like containers of refillable propane:
The school-yard something like a meadow,
Unclassified bubble-gum. We get together
In the gym and runaround in circles;
I pretend to stop and hold her eyes like
A religious vision, but I am getting old,
And she is leaping onward. This is little more Than another sin I have yet to confess for,
But we should have a potluck downriver from
The graveyard,
And slip this girl into an albino canoe, and Take her to hear the whooping crane, and slough
Through the mathematics of semiprecious reeds,
The cattails an instrument for vociferous reptiles,
And lay her there and brush her hair,
And hold our breath for a hundred counts,
And read to her what the heavens say above
The fading billboards and the zephyrs of indescribable
Traffic, which go along far beyond us on the Concrete stilts, the megalithic steps of a tireless Daydream repeating between the bookends of Sunlit motioning.

Crossing The Cemetery

I work like a dog,

But I live inside

My mind—

I am published young,

But the day is

Long while it takes an

Entire week

To cross the Cemetery.

Cruel Winter's Shade

There are times when you must be real,
And tintured in the mountains of a wimpled soul-
Not just these words,
Like toys dragged up from a sea chest, moderate
Attempts to make me whole-
So I haven't seen you from high school, and I am
Wounded so-
You have dogs, and I have dogs which make us whole,
And we are both at the top of the food chain,
Or I guess the rumor is that you were, a flight attendant,
A modest success who endears to lower class angels;
Or at least I've heard-
Always in the clouds, don't you get nose bleeds and Commercial airliners come roaring down your streets,
You toast the busy passengers in their business neats,
And then listen as some busy coyotes drain the bleated
Bleats:
But that is just how I have occasion to imagine you,
Your eyes as changeable as a stormy arcade,
And I guess you have that too- in an aerie the glaciers made,
Illuminant and wimpled, really in the cold, cruel winter's Shade.

Robert Rorabeck

Cruelly

Going down to do myself, cruelly;
Everything you told me was a thrill-
Amusement parks,
The sounds for dogs, and boys with Blue eyes, pooly;
But I can't make up lies,
Your lips were pursed and surly
And you didn't wait at the bottom of the Hill meant for graveyards and for temples,
What god would not will. Palominos glide
So lightly- Your father is a pilot, your boyfriend
A harness racer, three feet tall,
And I didn't meant to get in the way of your Dinner bill. Surely, you're so happy,
You say so in your will. What are you doing
Now about the paycheck on your brow,
I should not think to wonder.
My hands as light as air don't disagree,
They are leaving to shake the forest, to hang
The goose on its tree;
And you have to be so silent with your metal on
The street; it is precious metal pressed by precious
Feet;
And the windows are left open, the felines flicker inside,
The day is brought out to splendor,
But we can't go on forever; though, cruelly,
You will always be a rose between the thorns, thus abide.

Crying From The Butchered Mythologies

How the waves are tired now—
I cannot rightly describe their lull,
How they go like this, smothered,
Like lovers into a full-moon threnody;
And there are cars far beneath them,
And lonely young girls with freckles
And bangs on simulating swings,
House wives too—and what are they doing:
I shouldn't say,
When I am nothing to them and all
Seems to be coming around—
They are taken under,
Taken down beautifully like cut flowers
Carefully arranged
Without corners, smoothed into the Interior decorations of a suburban Cenotaph when I do not have the Beauty they might appreciate to resurrect
Them, the divinity they might have found
If they chose to surface and breath,
If they came up in the morning, burnished,
Exposed, picked up like sand dollars by
The careworn hands of heartbroken bachelors
Who once shared the twilight beds with them,
Who saw them lying there in the shallows,
Waverly, the ignis fatuus that came to them
Crying from the butchered mythologies and Barely let them live.

Robert Rorabeck

Crying With Whatever Cenotaphs

All day long in a cloud of dynamite
Rattle teeth as
Golden as the armpits of the moon, until finally Released
And settled down and succeeded in the shallows-
There off in the penumbras
Of the satellites of Anywhere, I wonder what it must feel like
To come down off the cooling steps
Of the bus and to fiddle on home
Like a crustacean touching its open wounds:
Like a firework who has figured out how to handle itself:
Over the bridgeworks of bleeding gums where
The otters still swim anyways,
And the hobos toss their overused bottles underhand
Like flutes with too much spit,
Cursing and writing to the awful green grass in short
Hand,
Mystified again by what the day has done to them:
Until the housewives scuttle across their heady bones
All in a home ward circus of Cadillacs and roses,
Esteemed that the day is just going to be all right,
And then their in their weeping bodies
Crying with whatever cenotaphs who can bleed all throughout
The night.

Cuckolded Husband

I am writing poems
And then I will be joking
With the bottle:
It is my longevity,
It is my throttle—
While not one single werewolf
Howls,
All because they do not Exist—I'm sorry—
Just as none of the old swing-sets
Exists—
But Disney World's exists,
In fact, it is the epitome of my Story—and we all have been affected
By it somehow,
While the most beautiful and
The most innocents of knights has Been bleeding out in the aloe—
Until the moonrise comes over itself and
Its fairy kingdom,
And you kiss and swoon, and become
A better wife all over your cuckolded Husband.

Cups Of Earth

Daydreams without heroes- underneath school
Busses,
Underneath cathedrals: angel-less
Heroes
Playing hooky, spending all of their Roman Candles,
While the daylight flickers
Like the light through a zoetrope:
And now you see her brown skinned, being chased
By foxes
Into that world over the trees,
And what you would have wished to speak to her
Has clouded in your mouth
Like the guts of an orchid- and you can only
Guess at what she does, as the night inevitably overfills
Its cups of earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Curious For Awhile

Heart attacks from Looking at clouds;
These gods are made
From nothing real,
But look at all of them,
Undeniable pantheism
Grazing on a blue table
Who will remain curious
For awhile
And then mosey on.

Robert Rorabeck

Curiously Amused

Girls come in all day long:

New girls, long young mothers with flocks entrained,

With their elements amused:

They are rocket ships who never got out of Earth's atmosphere,

So they just kind of fizzle around in cars and air-conditioned

Foyers, buying things:

They don't bet much on me- Maybe I will love one of them

Some day- Maybe I will have my own vermilion swan

Who I can watching swimming around the green carpeted

Pools of my living room,

And drink beers to her silent green silhouette,

And then at night pull back the olive drapes like a weeping

Willow in a fairytale

And listen her weep of all the things she'd forgotten to Buy that day to fill the refrigerator,

While I trained all my senses to the erogenous spheres

Which kept our children so occupied,

While the alligator sat like a corpulent emerald general down

The mowed easement digesting the family dog no one

Could remember having anyways,

While I remembered that I really loved a girl from another

Birthstone which for a while must have me

Curiously amused.

Cursing Dismissive Allusions

You're so good at teaching,
And you're so very beautiful, like a Disney
Spell,
Something mass marketable: Oh Hell!
I'm no good for you,
Let him bare your child- He's your husband
Anyways,
My thoughts are rootless, feral, wild:
But I'll sing to you,
I'll slip and swell: I'll be like the sea for you,
Oh Hell!
If I were anyone, they would say I'm mad,
But I am not anyone, so I'm glad;
And you are like a silver dollar, or you are Like a seashell,
Your future is bright and wonderful; won't
You teach me beautiful: Oh hell!
I would have bared your child; I would have Shared my thoughts with you,
As you cast your spell, but I'm homeless or,
I'm only good for little things for short whiles:
I want to do my best for you,
And sit and learn and smell all your pretty wiles,
Your gardens and the things you refuse to sell:
I wanted you to teach me, and I to bare
Your child, but you are already teaching,
Your thoughts married to your husband and his child:
You are so bright and beautiful,
I am thoughtless, feral, wild: Oh Hell!

Cursing Every Hurricane

Adapting to jealously on a celibate rug-
Reusing airplanes, folding them with spit,
Pretending in coitus,
Each mobile set above the cribs like the stars
Above the fjords of ancient heroes
Going down to sleep with the best monsters
They have slain,
Bleary eyed, making love to their amnesiac sisters
Even as the rest of the world is getting up,
Buzzing, kindling:
And I go down with them, with so many of us
Like little fish, like tatters of silver in their Masculine shadows- Never more being delivered
To her quite by ourselves,
But handling the pain with masturbation and Rum from Barbados, ancient and plausible gold,
Ho-yo-hoeing, looking at houses we would like to Break into,
Swearing our self to the clockwise typhoons,
Cursing every hurricane.

Robert Rorabeck

Cursing The Stewardesses

There is a diving board in your eyes—flashing, vituperative—
And you are already in the downward motion—like
The most beautiful thing: like lips blowing upon a pinwheel—
When you remember that there are things yet
Brilliant, as you lay your head down to rest into the dreams
Of the thesis of an adolescent hypothesis—
Then let me give you this—like a corsage for prom,
As the rain echoes like mascara down the eye of a hurricane—
And we all wait in the popcorn theatre—threading our tongues—
Across our lips—and we cannot possibly remember if this
All that they mention to the clouds who do not know how To fall from the sky—as underneath them, the milkmaids open
Their amber windows, and looking up, curse the stewardesses—
For being their sisters who were stolen away.

Robert Rorabeck

Curtains Drop Into The Sea

A wall of curtains drops into the sea;
It is beautiful, like a bride falling from the rocks,
And we drink whiskey as we look at her,
Though we are afraid she will turn and see us
And suddenly become self conscious and less alluring;
Her ankle is the bobber in the foaming lips,
And we stand around her, sway and sing drinking songs,
And her groom is floating on his back as she Feeds him mouthfuls of cake, his polished shoes
Have come off and sunken in the warm bottoms, and the government
Wants to shut us down, because they cannot understand
What it means to be French with only two hours left to live;
Unlawfully, they are taking down the fabric, pulling
Off her tresses and turning off the lights,
But now she is full of salt, and they are both full
And young and as they kiss, we the audience applaud,
And then shuffle out of the honeymoon; In the humid night we share
A light and satisfied conversation in which We discuss what we will drink with out dinners,
And the jealous housewife looking away over the parked cars,
Still remembering how beautiful she was extending miles Across the land says, "She was born Catholic, but She was not a Catholic when they baptized her that way
Before everyone."

Robert Rorabeck

Damp Jewel

Damp jewel in the hair-lip of grass or Hanging from the obnoxious skin of a cypress-
Petty witchcraft that evaporates
And the clouds plays hooky- until another sunlight is Gone, mumbled into the vocabularies
In the west where the sugar cane burns and the dragons
Make love to bare breasted virgins-
While, around here, after dusk, after all the Mexicans have Gone home from cleaning our house and mowing our Yard, the washing machines still do a strange pirouette
Trying to mimic the great tornados they hear so much
Gossip about.

Robert Rorabeck

Dan

I've already written about Dan,
And I've watched him drive away.
Now I listen to traffic, and I'm on my second glass
Of rum. I try not to feel my face, or how I love
Her or say her name: Erin. But damn, I have,
But at least I haven't dedicated anything to her,
But if I get something else published then I might;
If I stopped this useless anonymous sway, and went Over to her house and mowed her lawn and held
And petted her cat; and kissed her father on her lips
To make him laugh, or delivered her a Christmas tree,
Or caught a blue bird in one hand and taught it into a song bird
I carried on a thatch of sprigs over my shoulder like a knapsack
Like a transcendental soothsayer going from classroom
To classroom as from town to town in high school, selling
My lines for bread, and stopped masturbating in the bathroom,
Over the porcelain fjord, the useless sex organ fixed by Plumbers, destroyed by cherry bombs, evacuating into the Anonymous saltwater estuaries which mingle with the sea and Atop of that the oil rigs like water spiders skating. I suppose
I should end with the way the traffic is moving, horrendously Useless and expeditious and naive, and even if I go back to School I will have nothing left to say to her; but will read about Mark Twain and how tonight I delivered a Christmas tree to A drunk French woman and how, afterwards, I came after her,
And how I remember her daughter smiling at me, her angelic
Bone structure open, but also fretful, her eyes wandering like Careful hikers over the halfway ruined side of my face.

Robert Rorabeck

Dancing

Dancing,
Dancing, stars and elbows:
Another song underneath
A river:
Another place that cannot survive burning
In the ribbons;
But it takes awhile, accumulating to
The dragon in another world.
While the mermaids sing and then they Teeth on the pilots
Who came down just so they because-
And I know it doesn't Make any sense while I ride my bicycle
And look for beauty wherever she may Be underneath the heavens of Loose change.

Robert Rorabeck

Dancing Angels

Dancing angels- Don't you stop and look
At my scars:
Why the cars drive and drive beneath you:
Don't you stop:
You are the heavens dancing for Drunken sailors:
You know who you are- you are the housewives
Who stop to bend down to give Kisses to the lips of lucky goldfish in the Canal:
Don't you stop now- they know they are lucky,
And your children are lucky as well-
And they give you paychecks,
And wishes down the well- dancing angels,
You fly above them:
You perfume the orchards of their suburbia-
And pubescent truants light off
Blue roman candles and bottle rockets
From the summits of houses for you- and you fly
Above them and their old schools:
You fly in any direction- like wishes-
You have become the things you once dreamed off-
And you go to places in France,
Where your lovers wait- and you make love to them
Like colors in a pond spilling over without reason.

Robert Rorabeck

Dancing Haiku

I can't wait until he is dead because I Want to dance on his grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Dancing In A Zoetrope

And then they will say that you have Abandoned Colorado with the arcs and the blueberries
Uneaten by cats as with canaries,
The lightning leaping from nipple to mountainous nipple,
Trying to draw attention from the airplanes
Or something else even more beautiful
As I steal fireworks and a three legged dog walks underneath
The trees and then the overpasses:
And a breeze blows up from a very young age,
Settles in the trailer parks beside the orange groves,
And wonders if you have heard him whispering your Name,
As pearls grow in their grottos like the ghosts of seahorses
In their saturnine estuaries, as preschoolers do
Drawn and lonely from the school bus to the teeter-totters
As the wolves watch the housecats on the edge of the parks
On the edge of a country where I have seen you
Riding in my car, taking off your blouse as if a picture
Dancing in a zoetrope in pure sunlight just Trying to tease me.

Dancing In Their Weekend Proms

Fridays all the pretty swans must be out swinging-
And even the clouds are well instrumental,
Going cork-bellied over teal tennis courts;
And the lawyers are perambulating, the best of them in Short tennis skirts- kneed divine;
And I can walk out of my mind, like a mollusk tipping his Hat over now that all the birds have Gone deeper into the south, roosted into Cemeteries and rusty centerfolds,
Now that all the Monarch Butterflies are whistling strangely
Transsexual in the butterscotch cocoons:
I can stroll hunky-dory out between all the balmy sidewalks,
Lighting off my sticks of spitting tinsel,
And the housewives won't even mind, because They'll be too busy entertaining- and only their most insincere
Daughters will find me out,
Call me out on the swings which arc almost all the way out
Of the neighborhood:
They kick start, and they can almost jump over the drooling
Jaws of alligators,
The drunk procrastinating Spaniards out on their pool floats
Taking depth soundings and muggy green temperatures:
And I can whisper or scream that I love her,
And the air plants will stick out their bristled tongues- and some insects
Will vibrate in their armpits; and even my scars will seem to Glow industrious like mica;
And I will realize that I am only a cartoon with four fingers,
And my heart is a rubber turkey- and the girl I love the motivation
For a really miserable time;
But I wont abash my silhouette, and I'll finish what I've Been smoking with my tender meat hooks; I'll humor the black sheep,
The girl in her ridiculously lonely séance and maybe we'll Even steal a car and make it all the way down to where the Sea is made up of horded tinfoil from the spinsters of
The greatest generation,
And we'll just lie on our backs and let DH Lawrence make up
Better rhymes over the ochre-sexed tortoises;
And watch the cloud creatures dipping their proboscises and whatnot
Into the daffodils of the sea's whatnot,

And pretend to have a good time and be in love,
While everyone else is dancing corked in their weekend proms,
Cocooned there on the shores of the city's ice-moon,
Un admittedly transsexual and horded around the living room's
Football game with chips and guacamole in a Disassociative fugue.

Robert Rorabeck

Dandelions Of Playboys

Dandelions of playboys grow up
Learning to drink the sweat off the White house-
While all of the wine in this house-
In this little apartment
Way up high in Shanghai, China-
Is housed in boxes left over
From our wedding-
Boxes meant for Christmas
For the vikings
Toating that we had our years-
And I made my wife come twice in her Parents bedroom in the early afternoon
Yesterday:
The same bedroom we conceived our
First child in-
Out of the window:
Snow
And farther in the distance,
Airplanes:
Airplanes making barretts for beautiful
Women-
Airplanes making sashes and garlands for Monolithic women-
While beneath,
In their caverns of I know not what,
All the cold women
Crossing their legs-
Scribbling their chicken tracks on the Obvious sides of better and more
Esoteric of things.

Robert Rorabeck

Daniel Johnston Personified

Before I go to sleep
Your songs lay like 2by4s on the rainy
Earth. I gather them
Up in stacks to make
A-frames for Fireworks
Signs on July 4th—
Your colors are as Bright as everything
And down the street
Under a sad cloud,
You have built a house
For her from your lips,
You have breathed lonely
See-through children
Into her, playing in
The front yard on the Rainy earth—
Some things last a
Long time...

Dark Caribou

Dark caribou
Eating broken winged sparrows
Who are trundled in the branches
Like poisonous holly,
Whispering the Contaminated thought:
The afterbirth you eyes deluged
When the neighbors could smell them
Crying red hot cinnamon
His experienced body dripped on
You shed of his office's
Blue second skin
While I was at the somber market
Trying to find the right children
To take home like undernourished
Strangers
To silence and grow in the 1970s windows
Our world experienced through.
You slipped away like a white hare
In blinding snow further up the sinewy
Backs of the Alaskan Range.
Past the gated threshold where your Body displayed the dripping adultery
Plucked from your vine,
You transformed into naked ribbon
Spooled in his hands, tangled about the thumbs—
I watched with
Kaleidoscope binoculars near the sea
Until the feral child's hunger obscured
My vision,
And I led him with my kidnapping hand
To the backyard and let him feast on
The orange tree
As I fed the crumbs of broken memories
To the goldfish in their invisible school,
The acidic spray of murdered citrus smearing my eyes.

Darkened School Yard

If I knew how cars could park through the city
And into dark,
And the love they had made inside of them, the evaporation
Of steamy legs;
Then I would also know what it felt like to be a patrol
In a long sleek train,
Straight northward to the capital of our brains: Look at the pretty Monuments rising their contentment;
Follow the leader through the sandbars, following the Populations of our uncles:
Going prettily ankled through the snow drifts; and the cars park here;
And the cars park there.
Cicadas sound out through the night and they leave their old bodies
Behind stuck to the ornamental cypress of our yards,
The pretty pagan ornaments that housewives never even think about Nor surrender to:
The jewels of the earth, Precambrian and making love, stuck inside
The distillations of our juvenile throws:
In the parks where the lovers seem to lean on stilts and the stars
Play music,
On violins or dobros,
And there is something always more required, and it is more Beautiful than this, or a darkened school yard.

Robert Rorabeck

Dawn

I love the dawn,
But that doesn't mean anything-
Those are just words in a language
We've been weaned on;
And if Dawn is real,
Than she is girl,
And too beautiful to belong
In my language of dawn,
Though I am still in love with her:
Dawn, but that is meaningless, if
It means anything
Than Dawn is real, a creature of my Language, we sing a similar song,
But she's too busy to just belong
In my words attuned and worshipful
In the language of dawn;
And still I see her caroling on the street,
As the world quiets, she skates
Sweating beneath the cypress and palms
My imagination decorates,
Tinselled and tawn,
Young and gone goes sweet,
Sweet unobtainable
Dawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Day Of Celibate Rain

Day of celibate rain,
Stamping the tomfoolery of birds
To the line.
Maybe the last time I saw your eyes
Was in high school graduation-
You said goodbye,
And now the rains, they keep up what the Customers should,
They dampen boxes and wet wood.
And I know your name
While the airplanes go leaping,
Leaping on the weathered planes;
But it is so lonely not having you here,
And the rain makes me realize just how absolutely
Good it is to be alone,
Without a son drafted from your silver
Womb,
Without a plumber for his tomb:
And I want to think of your eyes somewhere
In the curtains of this weather,
But your eyes are good and gone
And making their own celebrating where
No poinsettias can grow,
But where the tourisms grow so much that they've Become fanciful with their own generations,
And where it doesn't rain
It snows.

Robert Rorabeck

Daycare Underneath The Swingsets

Daycare underneath the swing sets—knowing all
Of the colors of this thievery:
Only one or two words found out so far,
But there will be school tomorrow across the highway—
Not far from anywhere—
And you will come outside of your house and look
Across at the orchards,
Or up to the apoplexies of skies not too far from
The power-lines anyways—
And not pretend to wonder what it means
To be in-love,
You are not so confused with the goings on:
Mestizo—as it is your right to be:
Child of conquistador and Indian—product of Rape anyways—
No wonder how it was that you had no problem
Coming up to my door—
There might have been blue feathers in your hair—
And I thought we made love,
But you were too busied to stay inside—
And so you went home to the man you've had two children
With even though you do not love him anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Daydream Beside A River With A Unicorn

Daydream beside a river with a unicorn
Of narcolepsy drowsing as even to fall amidst the blue gills
Open-mouthed and snoring:
And even if this is just a water-coloring just like
The other things that we tend to do to Survive in the middle of our days through and through High school—forgive me if my heartbeat gets too loud
And begins to thunder beneath the clouds of these Thoughts of you—improper pronoun in an improper church—
They don't even have stained glass windows to look out
Upon the bus loop—or to filigree the light that passes over
The new scars of my cheeks—and I am not a used Car salesman—the sunlight echoes outside as it can—
Until each cottonpicking strata gets magnified—
And in a drunken lurch, I can call for you across the baseball
Diamonds and the apple orchards that do not Exist—and even though other and better words do exist
For you so many times, and you are kissing another boy
Opened mouthed whilst I am getting beaten up
For another time in the locker room—
Maybe I will see you out again in those woebegone yards—
And you will look across me without seeing that I traverse a Dungeon for you in my heart.

Daydream Of Drool

Her water colored bicycle has many dreams
Of pin-ball, and ping pong, and pool;
I used to sit across class from her and pretend
That I could know her in a swimming-pool
Of flushed and bright eyes,
The marriage vows we could say underwater
As the daylight swam around like a coy otter,
The elusively effluvious life, the hunger of A birthmark; Oh, what a fool. For instead,
I would just slip out of class and tight-rope
The canal, swing in the park, the elliptical stretch
Of a canary on a string- She rode away to marry Better things, the bell on her handlebars a-jingle, and I was left alone in my classroom, scribbling
The homework of pastel numbers, my cheek
Bejeweled by a daydream of drool.

Daydreaming Of All Your Dark-Eyed Welshmen

I find it easy to kill little things that Belong on planets of weeks,
If they are attracted to the light and Getting in the way of me finding out how
To better suit you;
But you're just out watching football,
The gentleman's sport with many colors
And bruises:
I have scars of my own; they will not heal,
Nor are they beautiful,
And I find that I have too many lines to be Considered immortal,
To many lines to find your hand through
To walk you to the park near the elementary
School in the student ghetto,
To rehash with you how I floated with my Girlfriend pantomiming what it would be like
To live in the middle-class shadows:
The funny thing was,
I was still thinking about you even then,
Wishing that I was alloyed with a shinier base
For which to suit you- Erin:
Thinking of you even then while you rode the Locomotive burning coal through all the cloak
And dagger overpasses;
Perhaps daydreaming of all your dark eyed Welsh men,
Knife fighting atop the first class passenger cars.
With their backs turned replaced by the scarred stuntmen-
I know that if I were you, Erin, that's what I'd be Daydream of, anyways.

Dead

The body fled:
It went down river,
It wound up dead.

Death Is Insatiable With His Spoiled Blue Eyes

I wanted to be true to you,
But death took me up in his spoiled blue eyes
And I had to watch, bivouacked,
As your husband put on a corset for you and
You came home-
And I have climbed four mountains in one day with
A feather in my cap,
And I have called my dogs my masters, and become
A better man for it;
And I have eaten an apple- And I too am libertarian,
And not a dirty hippy;
Yet I can appreciate a tattered red white and blue Underneath the look out tower stashed away by
Some overweight cowboys:
And every citizen should have his guns,
But it does no good. I eat apples and look into the Skies, but it does no good- I am only slightly above
Average intelligence,
And I am still waiting for the pizza to arrive,
For the literary agent to return with a positive reply,
But it does no good: and what about you,
All the men you've flipped,
All the séances you've conquered- it really does no
Good- Let the terrible infant suckle there at your hip,
Let the paper airplanes fly:
Death is looking in your window; he has already eaten me,
But he is insatiable with his spoiled blue eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Death's Table

The eye ducts of God,
Heartbroken,
Send floods down from the peaks
Of the Sangre de Cristo Mountains
In spring, the sun's shadow
Resurrecting in steep fields
The schizophrenic colors of Van Gough's palette—
In somber expressionisms spill over
The quartzite cliffs, like the ruin
Of stone viaducts stolen by the Romans
From Ancient Greece—
Like silver faucets her eyes crawl upwards
As if spindle-legged water spiders along
The anemic channels from the Orient
Veined in rivers of amethyst
Bled, my opened wrists
Perfuming the bathtub with anachronistic murder
Framed in the open window through which
The world barks like a sick dog.
Breathless feeling now wears crawling bracelets
Of six legged flies that eat death
To dim and clean the fires, checking in Along the porcelain shores of his clotting
Cadmium pool in twilight
Glints of our smothered son;
It is how Jupiter must observe
Loosely robed by her courting moons,
Like Queen Elizabeth keeping crowned,
She stands out on her dark terrace
At the end of our life—
There she sets Death's table to dine....

Decorations Of An Arrow

Sensuous wound, you are my cleft hoofed soldier
And this is your penny-ante cathedral—
The little boys are gathering up their marbles for you,
And their dimes:
They are shooting the b.b. guns at their little sisters
All in honor for you—
And the day is young and getting over chicken pox—
There is a nest of pig rattlers in the palmettos—
Your father is hard at work clearing them out—
Later in the afternoon, there will be a complex storm,
That will cast an unusual shade of blue onto all of
The cypress: the cause of it will be the penumbra of
All of the stewardesses flying ever so high
Until they are finally gossiping and doing their
Laundry in a sun shower—they are the only sorority
Up there—they managed to make it above the
Ferris wheels and their cousin windmills—
They spread their wings and illuminate the porticos—
Like decorations of an arrow shooting over
A sweating hearth.

Deep Beneath The Untrustworthy Sea

Like your brother who got killed so far away,
By sharks or trains-
I don't care- I only weep for my own solicitations:
I'll cut down any unsuspecting tree in the lips of forest
To be my tannebaum;
I'll decorate as I please, turning my back against the Balmy traffic;
Because it is so difficult to find truth in what the Soul has to say,
Jogging lethargic through its socialized parks, meeting
Old friends and sharing their likeminded adulteries;
But I believe, I will steal the wine from
Her husband- and the dog might speak, and if I
Click my heels high enough up on these swings,
I will surely fly,
And skip school and migrate over the lactating heads of Wounded tourists- and all their unspecial cities;
Go where I please, hold my breath and visit the feral
Continent deep beneath the untrustworthy sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Deep In The Forest

I put on pageants to excuse my scars,
To delay my inevitable novel: It has a flat
Tire, and the night is wild and flipping over itself
Like a firework pinned to a tree.
The mad man has taken over the fort and shot the Donkey, and no one is brave enough to harvest
His meat;
But for a little while he's made the street beautiful,
As beautiful as a woman society has given
Over to him for a dance or two: a serene
And agreeable woman,

He crouches like a gargoyle with all the things
To say. His hands are scarred by the pull strings of Divine Providence. He wonders,
How far will he fall once all the lines are cut and
The fish is free to roam with a giant hook in his mouth,
And his mate dead,
A trophy on some fisherman's wall;

It is like he has stumbled unto a valley where there
Used to grow grapes until the grandest fire tromped,
And now there are only stones,
And an entire colony of windmills like church goers,
Waiting for the wind to take them in spend-thrift fits,
To see the hallelujahs of their spinning hands' jubilee;
And to see this is madness,
And it came upon him in a host of swirling motions,

So for the rest of his lines he wasn't there:
He couldn't be seen except for a distant threat lighting
Off homemade fireworks,
And for the rest of the movie there were only officials
Debating what they could do about him,
Until the audience all left,
And the argument continued like a tremendous tree
Toppled like an erroneous whisper deep, deep in the forest.

Deep Inside My Cave

Dreams are caracoled while I lay off in the shadows
Trying to do better work for you;
But your man is a fireman: he is a classical hero with Big tits that bounce like dancing girls:
He drinks so much juice and curls so much iron:
This is what the mongoloids do while they drool up the Blouses of airplanes:
This is your world in the little houses underneath the Deciduous trees, underneath the park benches:
This is ironically the greatest turn out of the university,
And you feed them your amber juices and they grow
Big, big:
Until they become bulls and slide under cars to look
Up their skirts: I wonder if you can remember who your Sister was, because she was once like you; and I
Make up memories just to try to recall who you were:
I pretend I carry your books to school; but the dancehall is Empty and all of the corsages have been donated to Graveyards: Only your men can truly say where you are,
Curling through the darkness, saving you like a well
Bosomed unicorn and glowing with your immortal insouciance,
The waves resonating from the pools of the monsters you've Laid to rest; and I imagine all of this high atop my castle,
Or deep inside my cave.

Robert Rorabeck

Deep Into The Shallows Of Your Next Beatific Day

Grab your gun,
And kiss my soul-
I've made total of $7 on all my scroll
Over all these years,
Bootlegging in my dampened, elderberry
Hollers- but I'm whole:
And I can see you floating over me,
Just a bosomy tattered caracole over the Swings where children are moping like
Pimpled flowers:
And I used to cut my wrist almost every hour:
Used to read Shakespeare down near where
The dead girl wouldn't die-
Crab-eyed, cut up into a million pieces of stained Glass- I've made so many missteps
Until I landed in the high basins of Colorado:
I've never really been beautiful.
If you were with me now, you'd be wishing
For another man, but that's just my misfiring spell:
I suppose you're in love,
But I'm doing fine- I've got rum and fireworks,
And time: gray-haired and despoiled,
Yet I've never lifted my gun for oil-
Rather I like to slur my rimes like spewing precious
Bits of clementine;
And if you are not looking, and if you are away,
I'll ride the giant sea tortoise over the Gulf of Mexico,
Over the cannibalisms of conquistadors,
Over the spew of uninhabitable atolls,
And land my soul in more balmier of climes:
I'll kiss the cleavage of a blonde stewardess who Gets my gist,
Or I'll just swing in time to your eyes as the look away
Deep into the shallows of your next beatific day.

Robert Rorabeck

Defeated By A Casual Angel

Rather this meadow is vacating-
An esplanade curled at the corners like the Sly smile of a coy lover-
It is too late now to start anything on fire;
I just have time enough to grab my baseball
Cap
And head off to work-
It is snowing in the oilfields, but the horses
Are watered.
I have holes in my boots, but you are not
My wife,
So I can go along unmended underneath the Caesuras of power lines:
The men are empty now, the oil pumps are Iron cradles for palindromes-
There is not a spot of unspoiled sunlight in
All the sky-
And I haven't seen where my mother is gone.
There is only the memories of smoke
In that theatre which was once raucous and unschooled.
Now envy isn't even green, and nothing is
Said of your eyes-
Maybe they spill like your lips wasted into the False atmosphere,
Or they are the reasons why I went away,
Tossed like an AWOL soldier across the hindered Fields- defeated by a casual angel,
But would not cry.

Delaware

A same old night in the city
Shedding like a river of holidays the Preciously bought lights of movement
Pale and heavenly bodies
Revolving forward and missing,
The shift of direction,
Even more akin to the delicate veins
Inside us, the precious mineral inherent to blood
Depleting only to surge forth again,
A cavalry charge,
The purpose of continents, lungs,
And women giving themselves the Chance to look again:

This the two lanes of traffic moving
With the direction and drive of red
Ants through the dusty body of their hills.

Jammed into the places they've Been made.

Here,
The old cat is on the roof tonight
Pawing the meaningless motion above my head
Then resting, trying to Lick itself into Heraclitus' river;
Here in Lake Worth the Electricity finally comes back on
Two weeks after the hurricane,
And everything is the same and Moving again

And I have to look at everyone's Face again,
Most horribly my own
Before I can forget and pass away
Like Christianity
To become the expanse of materialist wasteland

My mind the repeated batter in servitude,
A zygote born to die incomplete
And needy in a spasming orifice:
After all this time I've forgotten
To take account of things,
Inviting the creditors to come
Pillaging in me like Conquistador
Virgins eager for a first time
And ever after exchange
In 3 piece suites
With bags of ice and posed relief
Hiding agendas and papers to sign
With fire axes behind their backs
Waiting in line-

I lay on the bed and let Them on me and all over the Furniture they dropp their DNA
In a dazzling miasma excreted from
The fornication of this life
Like pollen dripped from the bee
Wasted from flower to flower
All over the furniture and especially spread
Across the bed
Pistil stained I see ghosts of Her opening every door every day she's getting Out of the shower
Undressing the way specters do
Before them:
Too fast and speeding down the Interstate,

A reckless waste of gasoline
Spilled from the lips

I don't know her, but my mind
Keeps falling back down into
The luscious sinkhole of a brain
Destroying 3 lanes on I-95
Dreaming of 3 bedroom
2 bath sex spread eagle willingly
Rings on ring fingers,

bones and flesh pressed like flowers saved in a book,
And all those middle-class values,
Cheap wishes that come true:
The possibilities of Feng Shui
A lottery of Pre-Socratic philosophy
Clothed in Judeo-Christianity
With Jesus still fresh and on the Hunt for a star on the walk of fame;
All of this laid down the suburban lanes
Like paradise

So far away from me

I see her in the blue revelry
In the expanse of tomorrow's
Wetness, an ocean reaching for her.

I sate the hunger for her
With
An expensive hooker called in After mom and dad have left
With their racehorse for Delaware to place in in the stakes/
She has Pape tattooed
On the nape of her back like the Graffiti on the side of a building
Given up in the ghetto
That keeps staring at me
After she tells me to Do it to her doggy style
So she and I can finish and Move on to the next lovely boy
Homeless for a night under the dark overpass;
She's the first Latino I've Been with, but she tastes the Same (and puts my score
Up in the double digits)

Now the waves crown,
Rush and come to us
On the beach, the city
Is panting,

Tortoises
whores
Wasted and dark swimming
In the water's orgasm ignited
and
We ignore it;
The sea spills away from it
Like her hair falling in
The sink of a vociferous garden
Outwardly beckoning me,
As if I were a classic hero
With a sword able to do something,

I think of brushing her hair
In a bed next to her.

But both the cat on the roof
And Heraclitus are liars,
And Zeno knows I will Never reach her,
But the tree next door
Still whispers

Her name

To me:

There she is and here
Am I,
Two ends of an ever
Extending line.

When I get a day off work
I go to the movie theatre
To break the law, remaining
There all day
Falling in love with the Dark emptiness and the illusion
Of light,
Attainment flickering flatly
Magical before me,

As if she were bared there
The two of us dreaming together,
A Zoetrope of Children suspended forever
In a black and white film,
The revolving carousel
Holding hands and laughing through
The disguises of Halloween, pictures of forgotten
Relatives taken in rapid succession
Before the world could change us
Into the inescapability
Of a paused existence.

Delicate Promises To The Fireworks

When the windmills stop-
The silence of death: the waves do not move:
The fish seem to sleep:
They make a blanket of their gills,
And a teepee of their steps,
As we reside at their shoulders, trying to believe
Even though our grandparents are Gone
And scalped:
And the new flag only has the color green:
Grasshoppers lose their bodies
In the barely,
And so do their cousins- but their cousins
Are still beautiful
Beside the latchkeys of deer and foals
The wolves milk:
Reintroduced,
They are so careful now not to disturb anything:
They are so very careful:
The way sometimes intelligent fire steps
And gives its delicate promises to the fireworks
Held in the churches of a holiday we were all
Supposed to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Delighting In Every Airplane

Dancing in the cathedrals breached from
The mayhems—
And then their grandfathers died beneath
The mountains that themselves
Died underneath the airplanes—
And I have forgotten all of my time in Limbo in Arizona, but the scars upon my cheeks
Are still upon me,
And I have grey hair—and now I have been Teaching for one or two years in the very Same school I used to lament about—
As I beckoned, open wristed,
For the humming birds to come in and sit about
The fields of my classrooms,
So they came, just as all of
The children were closing their eyes—
So they came,
And cursed and chatted about—
Just as I imagine all of the stewardesses were Doing just about the same—
All them above me, and above the earth,
All of them bathing and delighting in Every airplane.

Robert Rorabeck

Dénouement Of The Empty Theatre

I think I would like a house with an orange tree,
And neighbors who never grow old,
And laugh and kiss openly on the patio;
Already retired, now they drink beer and smoke,
And gossip over their highly successful children.
There should be dunes across the street,
And swaths of trees, who sing after midnight,
And keep the secrets that they touch, the rivers Underground, the better words my tongue has Yet to tell my mind. And I would work
Part time for places my parents had never eaten
At, and make deliveries in short order, with nothing
More complicated, attending to my rock garden
And sleeping with my dogs, take up smoking.
I would lay on my landlord's roof, and remember the better
Times I tried out, and the offices in beautiful white Lines over the canal. I would swear off reading
Better poets, men with minds as sharp as ceremonial Weapons, who have already pinned the eyes of Virgins and flight attendants,

But this will not happen, and in two months I will Drive to South Florida and sell trees in a failing economy.
I should never go back to college, less I destroy the Idiocies of my nostalgia, and I should never see her again
The way she sleeps in the arms of bodybuilders, my words
Too dull to kill or wake her up; but I should be outside for Awhile, and I have enough money to pay my bills,
And steal away at night when the sky is beautiful and smells
Of citrus blooming on the better pages of flowering ingénues
With genius grants and succinct phrases which honey
Her lips, so that they make her swoon,
And take her home long before she Could hear this final line.

Robert Rorabeck

Depthless Sorority

Hide the bicycle beneath the holy
And slip away from school—
Come to learn from the otters, and the housewives
Who are all drunk and combing themselves
In the backyards so calmly
The fawns come to lick them like saltlick,
And they don't care:
And special cowboys, beaming down from the blinded
Stars, like jars of liquor,
Lap their jaws—and those nude occurrences,
Like stewardesses who have undressed of their wings
Get as brown as Mexican cleaning ladies
And speckled because of the sprigs bobbed with Oranges:
They cannot recognize themselves,
And that is why they slip down the banks and into
The canals—and learning, swim away,
To forget everything from their husbands and children:
Escape like hourless clocks into the sea:
Metamorphosed underneath the lighthouses until
The sky is wearing a necklace of floating airplanes,
And the sea welcomes them into
Her depthless sorority.

Robert Rorabeck

Descendant Of The Golden Fleece

Sum of the body in prettier words-
Aphrodisiacs, kisses of fire eaters to drunken angels
In the moonlit spotlights
Of suburban parks with tadpoles in Tears between the grasses,
And virulent lizards climbing up the swing-sets:
Another pretty scene between the houses
And business parks
Like a casserole for the nocturnal creatures:
And for my thoughts,
Wounded between the arcs of the microcosms
And the golden means:
Pantomimes and zoetropes of amber
Dragonflies and cerulean foxes; they say
I will find you here, my love,
Tumbling in the puddings of toddlers—
In a chicken soup of fieldtrips gone into the dusk
Of a weekend,
If you would ever come out into this yard—
And let the ants roll over your barefooted knuckles—
And let the sunlight drape you in the affections
Of its golden circus.

Robert Rorabeck

Developments Of Fairytales

Developments of fairytales—whatever they are—
Made to imagine the tomorrows that could not weep forever—
The miss stepping mothers reclining in pieta against
The road kill—while they sing songs—evangelical-
And Christmas trees evaporate—I remember skipping school to Head down those roads—and when my wife was beautiful—
It was not an easy process—stealing my mother's clothing
To sell at the book sale—and when the unicorns awakened
They had no one to cry for—the Mexicans were already Done trimming our yards—the hemispheres were so baby blue
And emptied of airplanes—the playgrounds kept their Ghosts on the swings—and it was an hypnosis altogether
In the bright and airy winter—but you are coming home to me
Across the world—and you lethargic with child carried
In you belly's retinue cannot remember the forget-me-nots
That were never passed down—I seem to be hanging upon
The precipice where the dwarfs fought with the dragons—
Left nude and empty underneath the negligee of the stars
And forced to watch as another hero entered the beauties of your town.

Devilishly Heavenly Body

She's a hot Jupiter:

In a summer meadow she burns out all

The other planets,

Or at least that's how the scientists described

Her in their catalogue, i.e. Leggy science fictions.

Mamma's boys drink their milk in slugs

As she revolves so far away and yet so dangerous.

Because of her my good side is now my

Bad and visa versa, and always will be:

I took over an old Spanish fort near the Mediterranean

Sea and held it for five days calling her to come down

Even around noontime and destroy me with but

A peck of a kiss,

In her hips sways the surf, an entire legion of Perfect unborn children, slated for Plato's epiphany;

And this is all true, and I've gone mad,

Sitting on the rock strewn stoop and

Drinking Chablis or Thunderbird- Only a sommelier could

Tell the difference between a cheap slut and a

Real princess,

But of her the windmills lined out like a sorority of

Daydreams spinning, drying their multi-armed laundry

Like the cobalt blue of a Hindu goddess- I don't know the name of

Which one; but she is there.

Each windmill said her name as they made the slightest

Amount of energy all at once like a flower-pedal army;

But in the daylight she isn't even true,

Just a thorn so deep under my flesh no one would believe

The homeopathy of such an unquenchable influence.

I'll fire the green copper canons all day,

And howl with the dogs after the corrugated sunset-

And point her out there in the vast breathlessness, and say

Now won't she come and step forward and blow some

Smoke, and all at once reverse the poles,

And turn me to inheriting ash as I so deserve,

The bomb-shell of my catastrophe,

Destroying me with the immaculate energy of that

So devilishly heavenly body.

Diana

You f%cking douche rag of honey;
Yes, I want it in the fridge, where it can live forever;
And then your fart blooms like an incontinent strawberry,
And the ferry makes love under the bridge;
And the dolphins play with their dogs,
If they are smart enough;
And we will all make it enough to our end,

And we will spell out, and we will put it down;
And it will all drool like honey,
Diana- all from our other ends, and you will never Read this Diana;
And yet your daughter is beautiful, even if I have never seen,
Her, Diana: she must be almost as beautiful as you
Are,
As beautiful as strawberries,

As beautiful as watermelons all strung out and stolen
All week
Which are now hanging like fattened scuppernongs
Underneath the wishing wells of
The Christmas tree,
Or at least the dark and unthankful places where I wished
We could go and
Make love;

And make love.... Diana.

Diana's Ploys For Salty Boys

How easily the lifeless men poke their Heads out of the shells of broken down school
Buses, covered in heliotrope motor-guts,
And being congratulated by the alligators and
Forget-me-nots;
But do you really want such men, eyes so
Nocturnal and fibrillating; they are not rich;
They've given all their money underneath the goldfish
Making wishes;
And they only drink cheap rum, and sway that way
Real instep waves do underneath the covered walkway
Into school: Arms around each others' shoulders,
Swaying, singing a sea-shanty for you, their coy
Naiad- their queen, but will you be good to them,
And let them pool and run around in your shadows like Silver roe; or aren't you not Diana's assassin-
What mean thing will be the end result of the infatuated
Metamorphosis. Rather, instead, feed them popcorn
And tatter tots and watch them leap around the shoals
Of your coral aerie; and watch them play baseball for you, poorly,
And mount the field even as the propitious storms bring Braver, better men to be enraptured by your ploys
Of angelic bone structure, such kryptonite for these Salty boys.

Diatribes of Crossbows

Diatribes of crossbows as the lights go out
And the young girls have to bow and bow—and then
Have to fend for themselves as there is no one left
In the living room—
In the morning—daylight and sunshine and sharks teeth—
And the deliveries are delivered
And the lunches are made and the school yards are Attended to—and in the shade there is shade—
And the bobcats sleep amidst the grave stones on a slope
That pretends to say the pledge of allegiance to the American Flag—
And the numbers swear off the higher elements—
But, eventually, there is another playground filled with echinopsis
And shade—and another muse figures out just how she was Made—in the daylight with the boys all around her—
Spitting their fireworks upon her shoulder blades—
Doesn't she just figure out just how she was made.

Differences Between Tomorrow And Voodoo And Zombies

I will teach the children tomorrow
About the differences between tomorrow and voodoo and Zombies—
Even if there is a butterfly over the dead mule,
The sound of my lips will sound again
Over the emptied baseball stadium—
And my muses will echo—
Like the sea in a glass in a museum—
And you will know nothing of me,
But I am a good man—
On the swing-set, in a church,
Or teaching Sabbath school—
I am the reincarnation of my great- great grandmother
Who married too young,
And wrote her poetry to the nothing-men
Who lived between the apexes of the overwritten mountains
And the valleys of the nameless heavens.

Dinner In The Ocean

Feed me my dinner from the haunted table,
And I will see your eyes when they open,
A book of poetry which drinks light, but your lips
When they speak, they do not return what is put in them,
Like broken vending machines,
Molds of plastic lions and teal penguins they keep
At the zoo,
And the remote control boats in their contained pond,
Where there are no alligators,
But only shortly trimmed grasses about the concrete;
Their crews belong on the top of wedding cakes,
Then you should say to me as the light fails,
What you really mean, if it is in you,
Allow me to bring this utensil between my teeth,
And consume the hollow points, the way the spigots go
Spitting out amidst the lawns of clean workers,
The tenderly obsessed, the town of hazy borders,
Thus, unlike them, let me know how you are wounded,
And the proper way to leave you alone,
For we will be parting soon out amidst the midgets of Twilight, back into our slender rooms, our bricks of good
Will, where I see you across the table like a murdered ocean,
Your eyes open like a book of poems.

Dis-A-Pear

You know that the séances were broken by trees,
And now that your children are Asleep and thumb-sucked,
Christmas is finally laying in: even the stewardesses
Are coming home out of the sky,
Eager to pluck their thumbs into something-
And their daddy's abide with green eyes
And jumping jacks,
Petting the thorny heads of the precious amphibians
That wait there beside them
Perpetually,
Forever- Just as tourists by ice-cream,
And the scars run down my neck like necklaces of Waterfalls,
Or pictures I have seen of Kit Carson peak falling
To the left shoulder of my once muse:
As these pleas I write for another woman flash
Like phosphorous in the mouth of
A trapeze of that other time
When you were, for a moment here,
And then literally,
Utterly- and forever-
Dis-
Pear.

Disappearing Mexicos

What about autumn, showing himself to Disney World
As the tourists fall down amidst the leaves that are Changing and the billboards:
If there is someone who I love, she is waiting for the snow
Or she is holding my hand—as I languish
In a fieldtrip I can hardly believe in: the day is in morning
Along the road where we pay our taxes
And our coaches roll against the sea—until we get to the Places of our amusement where the skeletons are Laughing in their skulls, and we wait in our serpentine
Rows until we get on the rollercoasters
And disappear so jubilantly all into the hinterlands of our Disappearing Mexicos.

Disastrous Eyes

I left her in the store where she belonged,
And as I drove away I knew she was helping another Man just as intently as she had done for me,
With those disastrous eyes, in the casual way a housewife might Let a stranger into her house for a cup of sugar,
And I knew she had done good for me, for her day was Long and filled with bearded patrons going in and out:
Some whom she knew and called them by name,
And others like me whom she had never seen before,
Or maybe only once,
As her hours were filled up humbly with restocking shelves
Of tacks and screws and duck tape and all of America's wants
Under the halogen lights of the small town hardware store,
So that she was most likely related to the owner, or worked
There part time, and lived with her husband in the corrugated
Trailer parks where the rattlesnakes slept too in the nooks
Of cinder blocks, but drove a nice car. I will never see her again,
And that is perfect, because I knew as I drove away with My receipt for sledge hammers and drills stuffed into my blue jeans,
That her effort would soon be going into our revivals of fireworks
There across the New Mexico state line, and she would Become a part of the history that is altogether forgotten in the Dusty commerce;

Already I was meeting new people eager to get away,
Bearded men in orange coveralls standing beside a warning
Sign which told me not to stop, for convicts were working here,
But when they looked me in the eyes, those disastrous eyes,
I knew they had to get away,
And I took them all together up the unwhiskered throat of my mountain
While the sheriff's back was turned, and asked them nicely
To get out into the wilderness, and left them there without A survival guide, though I already knew at least some would survive.

Disbelieving Traveller

I used to climb mountains to see god:
I'd only do this on weekends, and I'd skin so Much knee,
Like a stone skipped from Tallahassee Florida to Colorado,
Like a star crossed aphorism following the sexual Horizon even though
He didn't believe in god; but this left his girl
Unattended in her gardens,
And you can only imagine all the milkmen,
Postmen and fire hydrants to draw milk and water
From;
But now I don't hike anymore, and only dream of Documentaries,
Of making good tips selling Christmas trees,
And setting up gifts of girls from high school I shouldn't See anymore-
The sweet little gifts of other men who answer their Phones, who bake apple pies and attend to their offices:
With eyes that never close, badly bruised drinking coffee
In offensive movies,
Blowing like tattered ragtime out the open windows;
And I loved her but that was just in the park, in the nursery Rhyme: If I really had to spend time with her, to clock in my Hours by her, I would have run away long before,
As I have done so many times;
But now I am already perambulating in the greater nocturnal Gardens they thought to keep under wraps; and I can feel my Pulse in low oxygen, something alive and needing more of It making the marble statues move
Giving gifts to no one; and in the altruistic summits I haunt
While lower down even then tourists are skiing,
And a god that is almost a possible thing to which I travel
Disbelieving.

Robert Rorabeck

Discarded By The Professionals

Dangerous allegations of the supernatural
Landslides,
Going down like this, making love to pilots who Haven't spread their wings,
Words shed and quivering on a basking yard
With the unclothed bicycles,
Discarded by the professionals who are up to no
Good.

Robert Rorabeck

Discovering The Wan Distance

Valleys of families and little girls
Running through them, picking rosaries
While submarines hide out in fjords- or
The skeleton dances in the Tower of whatever amusement her eyes look up
To discovering the wan distance
And the men driving the airplanes- they Seem to be migrating
And she wonders if they have lovers.

Robert Rorabeck

Diseases Of This World

Days and days of fieldtrips for stallions where everyone is A winner:
Now I wonder if I will ever win, down at the dog track where
The unicorns surrendered;
And I get very tall and go masturbating through the parking lots
For Alma,
Skipping and saving myself while the cars pearl and sparkle:
And I catch fetching visions as if I was a crocodile of Young lovers hinging upon hinges,
And tonguing each other like letters collected in a rain shower:
They are not eager to leave, and my car
Has a dead battery: I watch Sharon go by: the grass lisps:
Lighting hits the converter,
And the day is bright but dark: I fight a young boy named Bruce:
I sucker punch him and I win, and then we all drive off together
To other houses where I can fight a succession of other men:
Beautiful lice crawl through the bright hair of my forearms,
The parks are downsized.
Alma is married. Sharon is married.
And I think my aunt gave me her lice before she left for Chattanooga

Dishonoring Satan's Prison

Cheeks lie scarred with roses in the clouds—
The apaches are approaching with intentions of
First rate abductions,
And I remember the wishing wells of your malls—
Where I could fall down forever
And you would remain in love with my best
Friend—
And when the daylight curled over,
It saw its own reflection in the music box of
A carousel,
And it could never find an absolute desire to Touch the earth—
The beautiful harem remained in their grotto,
As my mother electrocuted herself in
The carport—beautiful illusions all of them,
Swallowing up the daydreams after midnight
Until they were all shut into a poem dedicated
To Satan
And words became a sacrifice whose Heart was utterly—
Absolutely abandoned.

Robert Rorabeck

Disney World

Glory days of a thirty-three year old god called over—
The morning glories thin to a haze
And the Fourth of July turns into the sleep of dusk in
The hotel beside the road—
But when you get up, there is your family, and breakfast;
And no matter where she is, there are more trucks to Be loaded, the last of the fireworks to pack away:
Yes, the holiday is over for another year:
But there are so many billboards peppering the road
To sell almost anything—and going into the panhandle
You can enjoy sunlight, and nude entertainment,
Until, finally, you find your way into another
Disney World.

Robert Rorabeck

Dissimilar Stranger

Omnivores in nylon
Strutting at the fair,
Damsels in leaky blouses
Floating through the air

I have seen her over the Castile De San Marcos
Waving like a flag,
And in the Sangre De Cristos,
Amber light sleeping in a crag,

But as I inevitably disintegrate
Into the hollow east,
Is best to forget the dissimilar stranger,
Neither man nor beast.

Robert Rorabeck

Dissolving Me

Your roots never charmed me
I did my best to prefer the silence of numbers laid out so I could see them on my bed
the failures
show up on my hangdog
face eaten into scorpions
the burrowing of my fears for you,
the hunger in my gut for life
on the dead plane
OH GOD
the life's ba@tard
I have you inside me dehydrated sunk, wounded righteous
we both need HER water inside us
OH GOD I can see her for 3 days now
f-ing a big strong man, occasionally thinking of
me
the #s I need out on my bed, I need her to solve, since the watering hole of high school I've needed
her since I saw her legs take off on the runway
since she showed me her pistol
and claimed to be some great deciduous mathematician seeded with numbers the snow of chaos

in her eyes
her legs the easy reason the swollen fulfillment of my needing bed empty bottomless
the night strains me silence harasses me and she repeats in my eyes scrolling
like a bad reception human desire divine creation
I swore not to when I looked at my face
I know I cannot
OH GOD
I need her roots in me, dripping sweat from flesh
arms spreading on me and her eyes back to the origins planning understanding solving dissolving
me.

Robert Rorabeck

Distant Flower

I give long witness to your eyes
Looking for silence.
Where is your child underneath
The mountain- There could be so many Ways.
I will save her, because I know what You're thinking,
And the bus is turning around
Having forgotten so many things.
Maybe she is in the sky, the sky beneath the Mountain,
Your child, your daughter of so many things.
Words are spit on the window of heady
Vagrancy,
But your eyes are really wonderful,
They go so far away; they see so many things.
The night is a cryptic flower turning in its Jewelry case,
And you forgot to know who I am in any case.
And your daughter is so far away,
But I will save her. I'll read her the words you Couldn't say in any case,
When the song is over, when life and breath are Over,
I will return her to you under the mountain
The night whispering,
Your daughter safely to your arms,
With your eyes so far away.

Dive Bombing For Your Bloom

If you had to kiss me, at least it was before noon:
That way you could dismiss me, and so easily engorge yourself
As to be fully sated and yet quite beautiful for the Other evil bumblebees who will surely soon come dive bombing for your bloom.

Robert Rorabeck

Divine Acceptance

Pitching tent where we think the Sun should go,
My cheeks weeping trouble in the Shadows,
And I've not had an easy day.
My days have been troubled for so long;
I pretend in my religions about you
That you would not care,
Stumbling upon me from the porthole
Of an airplane,
Every cloud another creature god was Figuring up:
You caress me like an underage aunt,
Sigh and nod and forgive me my troubles,
And give to me your body as a shade tree
With no hesitation expeditious on the tarmac
All the tourists somehow ignoring us,
As I looked up through the symmetry of your Branches,
And nodded off into the jubilee of your Divine acceptance.

Robert Rorabeck

Divine For You

The night is here in a private romance I have forced Upon the stage,
And Alma knows that I cannot cook, and she makes fun of Me for buying my clothes at the thrift
Store,
Even though I caught a forty pound king fish for her and watched
Its dying straight into my eyes
While Anibal told me it was a night I would never forget;
And I suppose I wont, just like there are words too intelligent for Me to ever come back to use;
But I was the drunkest man on the boat, and I swam my songs
Out to you and your brownest of wings,
Still dreaming that there was something left in my points to prove,
While the sea kissed me,
And bobbed with the greatest and most hollowest of moons,
And I suppose there was something in the strangest of reasons for The divinest of providences,
While my dogs were the lonliest and away, while you sister is Turning fifteen today;
And I suppose very soon she will strike out and get married;
And I don't suppose that there is anyone yet in your family who has Finished high school.
And I suppose that is why they will all someday soon have to work
For my father,
And to think him beautiful, while the sea swims greener and more
True;
Alma, all day long I think of you while the airplanes swim;
And I want to drink of your lips and douse and divine for you,
But all you want to do
Is blow out your candles and go to sleep in his arms,
He who is always the most untriest to you.

Robert Rorabeck

Divine Plan

The highway is long and here:

There it goes like escargot whispering in my father's ear,

And I never visit anybody's house without watermelons.

And all of their spouses could breathe beside the pools

Of their

Fabulous enjambments of houses; and I don't understand any of this

Alma,

But I just walked the Sahara Desert and suffered through all of its

Baseball games of mirages;

And I just talked to Pedro, Alma, and he said that he slept with you;

And he said that you were in love with Nelson, but why he doesn't

Know,

And the swing sets are shrinking over my grandmother's grave.

And I love you, Alma, but I don't have to tell you,

Because it never snows over Guerrero, and you are hardly asleep in Bed with your man,

As the planets turn heartily like eggs slipping and sizzling noisily

All according to some

Other god's than mine's divine plan.

Robert Rorabeck

Do Them Right

Just remember that no matter how beautiful
You are,
I'm the one with the book published,
No matter how insubstantial or petty:
The book will still be alive on Monday,
And you can have your Used cars
And lawyers and gay parades- What is done
Is done,
But now I am so drunk from looking at my Destroyed reflection, I don't know
What it is I was going to say,
And when I try to get the free liquor out of the One armed farmer's house,
I back up into walls, and there is no one out
Here at this hour to apologize to,
Just these crickets and mosquitoes recycling the Scottish whiskey out of my legs;
So that one day I might be well know for making
You slightly inebriated with immortality:
Erin,
Sharon: I'm doing my best to get the word out,
Doing my best to survive.
Boy, I do not look pretty, while the traffic makes the Careless music,
I sit again and cut myself in similar angles every night,
Because I love my muses,
My cats with nine thousands lives,
And this is the only way I know
How to
Do them right.

Robert Rorabeck

Do You Understand It

Don't you know that you shouldn't
Be cruel to me,
S-:
My heart is butchered me on wax paper for you,
And I am making love to my Uncle for you,
And I'm cleaning all the palm trees near the Canal for you,
To make it beautiful for your new Wedding,
And the coral snakes on the cake;
Because you are not my bride, S- and your name is just a word from Another country,
But I've made you immortal now,
Just as your daughter will also make you immortal:
I try to remember the names of beautiful plants
For you,
And I try to keep on going,
And try not to think too much about my Catholic
Libido and the rivers that just keep on flowing
And drowning children,
Because you are my sick muse,
S-,
And E- in my venal muse:
Do you understand it....

Dodo

Call and you will find me
Wandering around like a misplaced
Star in Hollywood
Confused and naked in my room.
You can bring your new boyfriend
Down and introduce him to me,
And we can shake hands,
The cordial sort of flesh like
White bread smeared in marmalade,
In simple lies that cross our lips
And tender-hooked eyes,
As the flies sit outside whispering
To the earth that time
Is almost finished baking this pie.
You can see me here as you can,
That surface of the sea,
Sleeping in my shell. You can see
That part of me and walk away
And make love to my stranger relatives
On far distance spheres,
In the buzzing cities where humanity
Shelters its fear,
And goes fornicating around
As instinctually as koala bears in Sidney,
Fearing extinction,
The Dodo Bird, grandfather's hungry coffin.
You can do all those things
That trickle outwards shallowly.
Sure, you can see me in my room,
And I will shake hands with you.
I will even give you my autography,
Because you want to be my fan;
But I am not really here. I am near
The end of things, watching the world
Blown around on a string,
As an infant god plays in his
Crib on the edge of the Arctic Sea,
A kite tugging to be free in the hands
Of a vagrant king. I could whisper so many

Little things to your lips up from my core,
But these are just the shallows,
The night crawlers in the shoals.
Down in the nocturnal depths the Grand things speak in blind gestures,
The unmentionable behemoths
Guarding the golden mermaids,
The greater whole of me
I shall never unveil.

Dogs Get Smarter As They Drink Rum

Going down into the dreams that are Detrimental,
Opening our hands up like this like the Mimes for butterflies,
Even when there is no walls of shade;
Drinking too much liquor makes you cool
And forgetful,
And I wanted to relate this to the impassible
Summits in Colorado,
Which I surmounted four at a time:
I really did, and now I am trying the publishing Tricks and no one cares unless your Smile is straight and polished,
And I loved you, I loved you, Mrs. Sommelier,
And look at your usual children-
Yes, even they are beautiful, but where will they Homestead;
And will you look for me under the earliest lampshades
Of discovered electricity after the day is gone,
And you are lying down with your pomaded husband,
And isn't it very casual and thought out-
Utterly serene with the car in the garage, and glitter
On the pool- and two and a half cable Tvs,
And golf clubs leaning in the wall beside the car:
I can grow bigger or smaller according to the degrees
Of how your corneas dilate on my passionate scars,
And the angles I use to nervously relate to you,
Courting you gloomily and calling you out under the eaves
Of the new stars before Halloween,
Assuring you that the alligator can read your sweaty fortune,
And the lulling of the stagnant tide will persuade you,
Out into the adulterous penumbra where I will put my Hands upon your shoulders, feeling the outline of your bra,
And pushing you up and down, your bare feet leaving Their eccentricities of the alternate reality I would like to Cartography into the unbounded territories I would like
To leave for with you.

Doing A Millions Seconds

Moon, cool and vermillion,
What are you doing a million seconds away
From the heartbeat of a grasshopper,
Of a flickering emotion upon
The hidden side of a cloud—
Even passengers looking outside the porticos
Of airplanes cannot imagine—
The first loves, or the pets we have had—
Words that are above our vocabulary,
Or the fabulous delusions that
Are too busy acting pretty to ever
Get us anything—
I remember the downside of your old
Neighborhood—the chicken shack
And the pizza parlor—
And the flowers I bought you—
Spreading my garden of unobtainable love
Out the spring-time's door—
But my wife sleeps like a rosary in my
Homestead—
And the passions I once kept for you
Have flown to the cathedrals of Oblivion—
Where I once kept all of my love for you
But nothing more.

Robert Rorabeck

Doing As I Should

Girls still love me even when I get drunk,
Brown haired, auburn eyed:
Careless bandit, I still think about what I might do for them,
What I might steal for them,
Or if breathing out I could be anywhere,
I could be real hung-over like a mighty wind-banner of the clouds:
And S- has beautiful eyes, and a child,
And she goes on walks with her husband, her husband,
Her good man in her good land:
I want to serve in the service of her army: I want to be a shadow of Her good man;
But where I sleep, the wells of shadows run so deep,
And the cousins of goblins keep good keep,
And they keep around their savage green billboards:
They can advertise anywhere,
On C- B-'s tennis courts, or anywhere there is a sun or moon
Or their penumbra sweet underground,
And the woods are well spoken,
The woods keep going to the river,
And you can use the river to find your way out:
It's an easy way out, S-, an easy way out of here,
And I can smell your penumbra left behind near the Drinking fountain near the hall:
But you have a beautiful husband, and I know he is a good, kind
Man, and he just keeps on going,
Eating those ghosts like you- Maybe he looks like me while he eats,
When I was skinny, or when I was famished:
S-, look at your eyes, and look at your daughter's eyes:
They are the very same,
Like receiving the same letter in the box of your heart,
And it proves you will live forever,
S-,
S-:
And I will keep on protecting you, keep on shooting the dragons
In the heart over the poolside resorts,
Even though I am only half a vagabond conquistador,
Even though I am only half beautiful,
S-:
I'll keep doing, doing as I should.

Doing As She Does

Muses of my species, like paper airplanes lost in The metamorphosis
Of the rain:
What will I do with them, like dryads sunbathing on
The other side of the canal as the sugarcane burns:
What can I say to them from here,
Shooting off my offerings of fireworks
And sugar starts:
Burning all of my army men in the armpits of Bonfires:
Offering a mouthful to the clouds where the Stewardesses live,
And all of the time checking themselves, leaping
Like fables themselves from house
To house,
And doing their laundry out in the carports like Grottos that shouldn't have to exist:
Why then it was here anyways,
And the nocturnal rain comes, and the frog princes
Sing, and the oranges somehow grow like
Globes produced from the flowers
Of her lips that perfume the backyards of all of our Childhood as she keeps on doing as she does.

Donna Inez

Translucent shreds of paper dolls
Falling through her auburn locks
In winter's night she stands
Shivering in a streetlamp's glow.
Teardrops freeze upon pale, peach cheeks
Crystals of her inner soul
To have but one to taste and share
Even the smallest part of her;
To touch her cheek as the tears now do
And hold her head against my chest
Her breath hot upon it.

To run my fingers through her hair
And smell the scent,
Like daisies after morning dew
Upon mountain valleys
Where snowmelts run
Frigid cold
And the sun burns it's grinning life
Where aspens sparkle in the breeze,
Gentle whispers of the wind
Their trunks like her body,
Smooth and slender,
Creamy white skins;
To touch them is to touch her;
To smell the scent of the breeze is to inhale her.

Her lips are red,
Rose petals brushing
Butterfly wings
Parted softly as if to fly;
Her breath, the wind off Caribbean seas,
Salt and sand whipping against my face,
Seeping deep inside my lungs;
Her whispers,
The waves
Breaking against the beach,
Waters seeping between my toes,
Shaping the world with a sculptor's graces,

Molding it in a lover's caress.

She seems so sad,
As if a love was lost,
Like a child shadowed by the night,
Her face hooded by the moonless sky

Her eyes look up
As if she hears me whispering her name.
She sees me now,
Standing on a shadowed hill.
I can hear her gasp,
Her body shaking more from shock of me than the wind.
For a moment we share each other,
Lost in the bottomless wells of blue and brown
And then she walks into the night
And I do not follow.

Donning Of New Satellites

They were shown the mark of his kiss,
And afterwards they could not be friends
In the red bricked aquariums where Knowledge grew in the coital branches
And the cheerleaders budded on luscious stems-
They made love for some time after,
Trying to diffuse what they were sure to be,
But persistently he came knocking,
With an invitation to become a vampire.
For then the walls were sad and stormy,
And their silence echoed like an army,
They saw each other infrequently in the courtyard
Their friends gossiped lackadaisically in the gym,
But the time together has had its passing
And both the wiser, they were graduating
Their odometers were flipping over, they were aging
And the time that held them both so closely,
The likely heroines of our story,
Was the frantic passing of a dying season,
The way love calculates without a reason;
So now on new pastures, their eyes go fawning
And to novel bodies, like faithless satellites,
They are so far away donning.

Robert Rorabeck

Don'T Tell

I am thoroughly shot through with windmills,
Alma,
And I plant the glass bottle on the glass table next to the wooden Picks of the bird house;
And it sounds as if there is someone outside my door:
The airplanes leap just like your new family of rabbits,
And the cars will drive through the rain tomorrow:
I drove by your house tonight,
As I remembered and worshiped you,
And I slept on top of a roof near your house almost a week ago,
While the other homeless specters fell down drunkenly in the aloe
And tried to kiss your doorknobs from where they fell,
But they didn't get so far:
Oh, Alma, Alma- if you can remember please, please,
Alma- don't tell.

Robert Rorabeck

Don'T You Remember

The trucks pull the sea over you like some sort of Blanket, because I wonder why anytime you see me you start
Shivering;
Am I that most beautiful form of cadaver; when I just want to Ride the tamed rapids with you:
I want to be a grinning tourist going through the routines
Of sweet amusement with you and your daughter:
Those very long and twisted tresses I could find you on,
Trying to become a kamikaze mariposa,
Trying to leave the perfected states of your body for abstraction,
Or just trying to look down the blouse of that old fort in the bosom
Of Saint Augustine, while all the nuns sleep like stamps pressed
Sweetly up against their arrow-eaten conquistadors;
And what really am I doing but becoming the extinction of fireworks:
I am becoming the green copper canon with digestion problems at Your wedding:
I am gurgling up spells for witches and trolls; and I still remember
Your eyes, Kelly, floating like azure moons over those canals
I skipped school on just to look in to your eyes, Kelly;
I was the otter placing himself moribundly in your lap for so many Seasons; and don't you- and don't you remember?

Dorothy In The New America

When Dorothy got to Oz,
She crawled out her window and said,
"Is this still America? "
Because she felt so strange,
She took the ruby slippers off the dead
Girl,
And in vanity covered her bare feet
And walked down the road,
Singing,
"Does anybody want to make love,
Because I am so afraid
And I have no money."
That was when the Scarecrow
Leapt off his stick in the flaxen fields,
And trying to walk in a straight line,
To appear as if he were in a confident state,
He declared, tipping his stuffed head alluringly,
"Hello, Dorothy."
"That was the first time you said my name, "
Said Dorothy and then
They embraced and grew naked
And wet in the cornfields that grew
For miles like a chartreuse sea
Bordering Munchkin Land,
While the wicked witch picked apples
In the sad forest wondering
Where her sister had gone,
All the time studying the skies, fearing their Myriad possibilities.

Robert Rorabeck

Down From Heaven

Today we are looking in at the sons of Walt Whitman
And the torpedoes floating softly beyond the stained glass windows
Just on the other side of the hypocrisies of the church
That has sunken with the tears from the girl you abandoned:
Little girls filling you wine glasses,
Like soft feathers lost in the aloe: and I convinced you of these Affections as your mother wept in the carport
Beside the car that was salmon- and the frogs sang that once were Tadpoles, as the angels looked down from heaven
And everything turned into the vulpine darkness and consumed the Orange trees by the fall of shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

Down Her Interstate Of Cadaverous Holiday

This wind, she is a banshee- she is relentless,
See her shake the cones from the conifers, make aspens
Opalescent naked with this still yet early autumn;
And today I walked the dragon's ridge,
Trying to pretend that I was somnolent, in a state of Fever dream, or half-real in love:
Like a re-animated cat, something absolved,
Something that might fuse with her and go out with her to Lunch and have so much money as to bare children with Her; and to never have a hunch:
What I am doing now, lighting the wicks for the less than Virgin theatre- maybe the lost cause of the lost boys
Launch, to crenellate and in-flume the air,
Over the picnic baskets of stuffed watermelons;
And she is on the yard, the gently sloped abutment of Old cavalries named after their gray generals- she is a southern Bell- she is ringed and pierced and swelled;
And they are having lunch- sweet peas and fried chicken,
And their children, I can see 'em, half ornamented behind the Red aquarium, getting drunker, diving down into the golf balls
Of the alligators' hutch: I suppose I might save them;
But she doesn't dream about me, the lazing conquistadors
Who, pompadoured, have taken off the parade:
Look at them sleeping rusting, weeping in their translucary Hibernations: I don't suppose they should ever care to Wake up again- absolved to see her speeding fast and leggy
Down the freeways of her pristine arrangement;
Perfumed at the hinges of wrist and ankle: she is a fast beauty, Metamorphosing, illiterate, what how she destroys us without
A thought, savage instrument, necrotic-fanged, busted,
Down her interstate of cadaverous holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

Down His Path

Loneliness over the yellowing adobe of
A teacher's hovel- the street winds from here:
It goes to your house,
Where you lay browned bodied with your children
Laughing in your yard-
Your father underneath the engine of a truck:
You still live with him even though you told me
He put a gun to your mother's head when he came Back to Mexico.
Now the stars bathe you, and you think of
Your own man, and the roses he didn't give you-
You have taken his hand, and begun to Look across the orchards to where the sandstone
Lay suppliant to the sea: soon she will be combing
Over him, taking as she wishes-
Then over this, as your eyes close like butterfly wings
Over this, you may think of me as you continue
Down his path.

Robert Rorabeck

Down In The Valley

The horses are sick again,
Leaning over the blue meadow in an Uneasy way;
I follow their rut, my nose stuck
In Chaucer at the part where he died,
And gave a justly permanent cessation
To the poetry,
As if there'd been a car crash in
Merry Old England,
But even then the sun was the same sun,
But a little younger, and the continents
Have yawned a breath or two more,
And there are new aqueducts,
And its easier to be nameless and not Pressed into feudal wars, if only by a little.
Language has grown corrupted,
While science profound, the seas are Beginning to taste her salty ankles,
The butchers make their sombulent rounds:
And she is in the dewy eye of an insect's
Arrhythmical heart, the years,
The years, the years, she goes beating,
Just as the horses' hoofs trample around the Ovals making room for the weathers,
But eventually in aberrations concluded,
Even while she is like confection in angora,
She too will be the ancient husk lowered
By the pulleys of strange men, but they will Still read of her, high upon the newer aqueducts,
Biting their lip at the personifications of a resurrection,
The illuminating filament ironically in the dullest
Print, for I have placed her there for the years,
Like a beautiful flower distilled between
The pages of a book.

Robert Rorabeck

Down The Highway

All of the tables are turned and all of the dogs
Are asleep—
The Christmas tree is lit; Oh god it is so bright,
And the angels are learning
As the gift wrapping collects beneath the Vanishing lives—the highways continue to matriculate
The wives—
As some kind of punishment,
As some kind of spear in the side of god—
The television shows continue to laugh and nod—
As the voice of the real lions roars like a waterfall of Water fountains—until the angels can finally be Found inside, going to school except for on weekends—
And enjoying the places
Where they are so fortunately found to exist—
They kiss and tell for show and tell
And then they'll pretend to disappear—the god
That they believe in travels by himself down the Highway, cursing the sun as he drinks a beer.

Robert Rorabeck

Down The Open Road

By the pictures of their high heels,
And laughing up past the carefully grafted cinderblocks
Who happen up from the lone and dusty yard-
The goldfish and the beaded curtains while a young couple
Is fabulously in love, and he is bleeding out children from her,
Like specters
That flicker behind the marionettes as they dance from the house
And over the canal to the land of the talking cats;
And afterwards, while he is in snoring recess, she goes out beside
The orange canopy and the Shetland ponies, and kneels
In the grotto of the carport and the washing sheen:
Beside her an uncountable number of toads ululating in the aloe
And discarded rebar,
As from over her shoulder, thousands upon thousands of Hungry and bare-chested can be seen leaping across the barbed Wire garments,
Counting their blessings and their tear their feet on the empty
Seashells compacting along down the open road,
Until they find shelter in the bosque across the street with the Cenotaphs of conquistadors, and the pornographies of junked cars.

Robert Rorabeck

Down The Road Of Cerulean Canopies

Delighted in the eyes of sincerity's rearing-
The beefsteak of juggernauts obscenely
Unclothed for the traffic that pearls and beads on a dry
World covered around by the thin
Curtains of an unmistakable ingénue bathing in each
Caesura of the sea,
Cantankerous and bee stung- the size of every woman
Swaying the magnitudes after tearing down the
Four walls of her grotto,
So that each little door is nude and filtering in the Unwholesome dinner guests who open up their flashlights
Like rubies on the beauties of clams
And look at themselves backwards down the road
Of cerulean canopies even while they drive.

Robert Rorabeck

Down Their Awful Hall

You are my secret prejudice
I haven't yet found a way to give up:
I don't believe you actually love the Human race,
But you sup right beneath the football
Coliseum;
It would be better if you more appreciated
Baseball,
But your hair is so perfectly auburn.
Listen to the way it swings,
Back and forth like an unhurried sea.
Even in your coffin it should swing that way.
You are like the titillating prize at the bottom
Of a crackerjack box,
The very thing I used to drive to Miami with My father for deep after midnight,
To get my fingers sticky,
To populate my soul,
To watch the winos basking against the fire drums;
But the prizes are getting cheaper,
And night after night it gets so cold;
I know you have never really loved me,
But how can any woman really love me,
Especially the sea, or my venal muse;
When it is only the interlude between seventh period and Halftime,
Though the traffic never abates;
It comes like rain, or like my fingers,
The way they would like to fall through your fingers;
But they don't know you at all,
And now they pause to smoke and listen
As your echoes fade down their awful hall.

Robert Rorabeck

Down There In Mexico

Bench marks for tadpoles who stare with wonder lusting
Eyes up to the green airplanes that fly
From here to Mexico:
Because in the bosque they have fireworks, and butterflies
Who no longer wonder how to fly:
They have made their way to decorate the smoky forest
And on her lips to die: some fairy tale who is Sleeping there,
Born in the womb of Mexico- her children will sleep
Beneath her, lamps doused at the entrance of An impoverished church,
As the daylight is siphoned out of the sky by the lips
Of bats who ballet around her, singing with their ears-
Going up from the scarred lips of the earth-
And going straight up to bleed on the Stars- while her mother sweeps the dirt out onto the mat,
A mountain cat eats a coyote, and from her lips
The infernal spirits sprint like cinders-
Before they get to the earth around her Mexico,
They will look like fat black caterpillars
Until they crawl into a zoetrope full of shadows,
The end result of whatever metamorphosis there is Down there in Mexico

Robert Rorabeck

Draft Dodgers Of Midnight

She doesn't care,
The weathers I've made for
Her,
The fragile sun I've flaked from
The hallways of
The derelict high school.

Out in my high yard,
Masturbating, watching traffic through
Cyprus crooks,

Bet she's off with her newest of new boys;
Out in the orchard at picking time
With the handsome eyed Mexicans
And step ladders;

And the windows are wicked
Always looking in;
And she is filled with original sin.

Robert Rorabeck

Dragon Car Blues

Even if I was the Dauphin of France,
I wouldn't use you as a paramour-

The ancillary vagabonds never had a chance;
They fell asleep in poppy fields on Their way to war-

And I smoke in my dragon car-
With the ghosts who preen like rain,
Who enter through my hollows like snakes
Search for corn in a cracked vase;

They are just as cold and as tender hooked,
Like wounded kins bleating under blusterous
Lindens,

Off the careworn easements of the old shell road's wind;
The Australian pines tussle.

On Saturdays there are dragon cartoons
On the television-
But I'll never be the Dauphin of France;
I'll never use you for a paramour, or make you take
Other countries for me:

I never even thought to roll the chance,
But keep to my paranormal conversations,
My cactus gardens sick of the hummingbird's fast-beaten
Molestations

Smoking in accumulating rain, consumptive
And miss formed in my dragon car.

Robert Rorabeck

Dragonflies All Over Whatever She Had

Then there were dragonflies all over her lips-
But She could have spoken if she wanted to,
Only her eyes wouldn't tell me what was wrong.

Robert Rorabeck

Dragonflies On Tulips

The sun gets so yellow it gets nose
Bleeds 'fumbling for oxygen as the little Children lead one another away
From school:
They are climbing up the orchard,
They are pushing up the swings'
They are acrobats in charge of their own
Holiday 'singing to no one as they please'
Pretending to map the extinct paths of Conquistadors 'settling down to eat
Something sweet they have stolen,
And then getting up again
To steal into a Catholic church in the middle Of the afternoon'
To fall around dizzily beneath the rafters in
Their headlong canopy,
Or to collapse next to the water fountain
And oleanders out of doors,
To become mottled as the sun freckles her
Branches 'to languish there,
Lungs falling and rising again like membranous
Wings without any reason at all.

Robert Rorabeck

Drawn By The Wounds

As I am here, so you are still there:

Oh Alma,

Oh, Alma- all full of your dieties or whatever it was:

Famous, and from Mexico, while all of the white

Girls I once knew try to ululgies you:

I can cut my throat like a yellow toothed guppy cut from the gold

Coins rung from the fair and still live:

And still live, alma:

And I love for you- I live this way, even if it is just for you because,

Underneath the watermelons and underneath the simple stars:

I live, smoking and telling a dime story for

You,

Alma, flashing through the cantankerous woebegone;

Even after the fairs have gone, and the fast food franchises grow

Woe begone in the first spinning depths

Out into the first fields of praise- and I don't remember what I've

Been saying,

Even as the out first chariots have been aloud to be out and

Cantankerous- and even as it is all spelled out,

And even as the words for her birthdays try to span the heavens

Through the kindergarten fingerprints of my hands;

I will love her through the ruby dimes of the roses that grow underneath

The footprints of the windmills or anyways: and here it is,

And it is dying- but here it is, anyways, and in its premature bedrooms

It is crying- and it is crying for you anyways, Alma- for you

My muse, anyways, it is out on the roads, open throated, drawn by the wounds-and dying.

Dreamless

We did away with dreams.
Like accountants we made practical
And timely love to one another—
We didn't waste minutes with Affectionate words from our lips,
But left those necessities to our Cost effected eyes to talk loudly
And instantaneous the truth on How we felt,
How our irises gorged upon our flesh—
In night, we were each other's watchmen
Who grabbed one and then the other bodily
But gently making sure neither
Would escape our blanketed cell,
Intimate mates who were in for life,
For if we were ever to become responsible
Parents with modest to comfortable incomes,
Effective citizens of our united enterprises,
We must continue on the assembly line
Of our sheets around the clock,
To keep fitting our parts together
To make the final product, busy insects
Pollinating the others' meadows,
Forever dabbing and fiddling with one
Another to perfect the processes,
And during lunch breaks
When the whistle blows,
Playing with each other's feet while Socializing at dinner parties.

Robert Rorabeck

Dreams

Those are the littlest bits of things, the color of God's Eyes too dangerous for a
Man to touch, for brought Up to his heart
They would cause it at first to Cry and then to bleed,
But there in the rainless gutter,
Where they lie like a stained-glass
Mural, shattered,
And no longer describable,
The heat coiling upon them
Like poisonous snakes,
As the cars drive by in schools,
In Scottsdale, AZ, those are
The littlest bits of things.

Robert Rorabeck

Dreams Of Ferris Wheels

I have had dreams of Ferris wheels:

Oh, don't you know- I have, swimming through the slow

And deepest seas of Guatemala;

And I have seen your silhouette in the fruit market,

And I have called you like a bird or butterfly home to me,

Alma:

Because your body swings so bright and brown through the constancies

Of the day,

That I should not be so proud to not answer and obey:

I have been all across this country:

I have been up and down, and barefoot on railroads:

I have been around, but you have been so deep and so young,

And the rainstorms came to entertain your young:

Your children who are so bright and brown, they are citizens of this Country that you in your adolescence found:

And I love you: and I love you, Alma- and that is no lie:

And if you do not love me, then I will go off somewhere to die.

Robert Rorabeck

Dreams Of Life Not Far From The Zoo

There are great places to live and die
Under the skyway of peacock plumes;
You can sit on your porch all day and look at a
Sky filled with blowing scars;
You can make love in the afternoon to who you
Choose, the buffet of wives and honeymoons:
For a few dollars more, you can have dancing girls
And cocktail parties, and hot air balloons;
And invite your friends over to look at cars;

Anyway you look at it there's a downhill slope,
To the unanswerable graveyard: friend or foe,
You're going there, win or lose,
But from the freshly painted windows of this nesting
Living room, the pain goes down easier,
The liquor blooms like spikenard in the sunburn yard,
And you can do exactly as you choose,
And catch the newspaper every morning from your front
Yard in a robe and dancing shoes;

You can buy it all and outlive the bank,
And watch the weather blow across the roof in her sororities,
You can put some gas in the tank and drive in and out of Your restive loci,
Or ride a bicycle just the same, for it is such a lazy, summer
Game to live here and listen to the mating echoes from the zoo,
Like a miniature version of your childhood,
Flashing through the trees and canopy; If you find yourself
There tomorrow, then sit and nod and wait for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Dreams That I Cannot Share

Held the fellas in their days:
Stood straight up inside cars, as if it were A parade,
And got drunken at the shoulders of pine trees,
As if in the ghettos of a
Baseball game- and here it is- a boda, a wedding,
A way that they slew the witch in her
Perfect night while her children were flying their Perfect kite,
And the cat sat up right there, and purred into that Very air-
As if you had awakened from your sleep,
And remembered me, and took me into your heart
From the very deep-
And in a very deep somnolence held me there, and whispered
Into me things of dreams that I cannot share.

Robert Rorabeck

Dreams That We'D Had

Buried me up to the elbows of their Sandcastles, lost children
Who had also lost their hearts
Into a zoetrope of stars as close as the sun,
And the dolphins leaping
Into a world where roses became extinct—
As she,
The finalist from all of the muses I have had:
The one I made love to some sixty times
Amidst the pornographic daydreams of my bed,
Eventually moved north of the nursery
Rhymes and rollercoasters
To be someplace
With her husband and her children
Forever—she killed my graveyards dead,
So I married another woman on the other side
Of the world,
My knees knocking off the heads of so many Candles,
The wishes of all my dreamy birthdays spilling
From the hollows of my instruments,
As I ran away to find someone other,
Fearing the dreams that we'd had.

Robert Rorabeck

Drifters

Long ago two people made
Love, with their eyes long steady,
Flesh and bones pressed, in mid April,
Two days after my birthday— at 8,000
Feet above sea level it snows in the White Mountains where I finished my Work early to have time enough to Think about dead relations facing eastwards and the Marble tombstones that ornament their Skulls on far away hills like crowns or trophies with Birds fluttering hollow-boned and darting shadows along
The cemetery's black iron gates, as I open
A popular book beneath a cloud smothered sun.
I look up and dad has brought home a Drifter named Joe to help with the Horses—19 pregnant mares whinny amidst
The pines before the hillside slopes steadily
Down to Highway 180— Joe was walking
The 60 miles between here and Showlow,
Singing songs to his newborn son, his eyes
Following the line of highway to a home unseen—
Now,27, Joe sleeps in the room near mine,
And when Grandmother comes this Sunday,
She will greet us both the same, and pretend
To worry that I didn't go to Japan to teach,
And say now, it is too late. I will smile because I can not explain to her, like an Indian who Passes through the boundaries of another man's World, those things, beautiful extinct
Animals, which can only be sought in the Frosted steps miles above the world's highest Mountain.

Drifting Before I'M Drifting

Drifting now before I'm drifting:

Oh, Frank O'Hara, my new girlfriend, sanctified

Like a long legged mailman for awhile:

I will worship you good, go down on you for lunch,

And then grow fickle and let you disappear

Beneath that bad meat and flies of a dune buggy:

And I want to have dreams, but they are made for Better boys who can understand and teach their grammars:

Or boys who don't mind at all,

But who can swing that bat and cross their blue-anchored

Arms over themselves and look like well-developed

Swans:

There is just nothing for my disease, something like a

Scattered prince blowing out his ashes along the Mississippi:

I work for no one, and it's a good job, because

Nothing has as of yet broken down,

And the city is vagrant and made for versatile fuel:

And all the most beautiful people are so beautifully employed:

They have so much going for them; they know the classics

And can allude to those sunny sororities: Like,

There's a girl in a garden misquoted, and my two dogs are

Laid out but in their time will wake up again and worship

The things I should dare thing to sea; and I loved a single person

Wonderfully, but I am not brave enough to publish my

Poems for them:

I am not brave enough to find a suitor and disappear into

The unsuspecting trance of commuting angels:

And down, and down, and make yourself comfortable on the Way to the job; but it wasn't suppose to end like this,

My love, but so it ends.

Driving Away

Soon the world will be getting up and
Breaking through its banshee membranes;
And even though I haven't seen her eyes
Since high school,
Since I entrenched my senses like a sated
Terrapin underneath the school bus,
And saw her things,
She is not mine: like a telegraphic scream
On unsubstantiated news,
She dresses to sell to her jockeying guys
So slightly involved in her diamond minds;
And I put my hands on dirty fruit to feel her
Effervescing pulse,
But everything I sell so too will eventually be Someone else's,
Like our language, our thoughts of cars
Parked on the gilded throats of brilliant esplanades,
We can only lick our throats over the weathers sure to Come;
Though they will always involve her in some beautifully
Uncontrollable way,
We will never steer them, the apoplexy of our tongued
Storms;
Just so, she isn't she always around, opening the doors
And driving away.

Driving Away From Her

Powers fill my gold toys, simulacrum that they have Chosen to hide in the keystones of mountains:
Breath in my lungs as I remove her to the bedroom, into all
Of the warm loneliness the experts were sure would Remain forbidden-
Getting nearer to her, even as we crawl away into the viaducts
Poured into the mouth of a parking lot goddess-
Where the tiniest of ants begin hyperventilating, where her
Breasts become the meat for unapologetic sparrows:
And kidnappers get too lazy and go back down- like kids
Who still wet the bed scrambling higher to light the Gas lamb of some stony lion of weathered pugilist:
Just because this is where she happens to be tossed, stolen
By the gods who have long since eaten themselves,
Made to weather the cryptic nourishments down through
The lavender abutments until it is all just some words she has found,
Crying to her like her daughter at her tit, and she must decide Whether to lift her blouse and let the latchkey in, or Step away further into the million fired night- to kiss new Gods in the airy grapevines of their perforated apertures-
To put an end to my fears, as she looks down, her nose bleeding,
The entirety of her world left behind and driving away from her.

Drowning Home

Wherever you are you can make
A go of it,
If you ask your government or mother for help;
And there's cold beer in the fridge,
And warm waves they are saying her name outside
The cozy door;
And I can take you down this way,
So many steps, the flowers all pinpricks of white;
The poisonous envy of coral snakes which can do
No harm unless thoroughly pressed like perfume on The palm;
They've shaped how the birds sing,
And all the professors are naming, drunk of the polyps
Of space they hear breathing through the screened lanai;
I want to say that there are so many passages
Into Mexico, the bereaved highways un sanctimonious,
Declassified going their way;
And would sure like to see you twice in one day
Out at some dog track or chicken coup, the places
Where foxes like you naturally cohabit with the spaces
Of haranguing blue which match your eyes like a good
Suit for an interview for your wedding day:
But this all just a goof, not even good enough to feed my Dog, though I saw such beautiful houses today in the Quaint pandemonium of all that could be wrong;
And women who looked like you, who should have been you
Walking their dogs- should have been your dogs;
But I am just drinking Mexican beer, and trying out a new Variance into the constant puzzle of my magical emasculation,
The bad science of my loneliness deserves another try
Even after the last inning has thrown, and all these f%cking
Tourists are drowning home.

Robert Rorabeck

Drowning The Graveyards

When I saw you standing there, I knew that this was America.
The sea encroaching like an unwanted lover,
Shimmering with its cenotaphs of conquistadors-
The crowds gathering separated by infinitesimal lovers.
Hands reaching out, dividing like starfish infinitely wounded,
Recreating the reciprocities of an untouchable classroom:
Seeing him attempting to pin a corsage on the hem of Her phosphorescent dress:
Like a weeping bouquet dredged from a mortally wounded womb:
Here they are roaring with the silence,
Moving forward too fast to remember- In pauses, holding out to our children,
The shopping malls devoid upon midnight,
So in-glittered drools the eggplant mouths upon pillows-
A noise embittered with silence,
Our flags whipping as the mane of the animal who stands still,
A river drowning the graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

Drunk Kisses Of Love

Tonight I told myself I would write—
I bought a bottle of Captain Morgan spiced rum
And a bag of limes, so I could sail those long forgotten seas alone
And end up someplace familiar along Florida's east coast where I used to skip school with the old gang, and smoked between classes
In a studious alcove, a buccaneer's bedroom beneath old stone steps
Where the sea came up in her mighty whiteness, and foamed like a panting huntress
Undressing and lying wetly in the buff about our middles as we toked—

I was going to finish ten single spaced pages, churning out the Blurry words, with her eyes behind the picture as inspiration—
In my lonely drunkenness, it's how I reach out from my world
In my chair 8,000 feet above the earth in the White Mountains,
While she plays cards at sea level, putting on the invisible pout of her poker face
With the strong armed boys who fleck her boudoir which was once
Inside a purple porpoise that has now changed its name; but the Delivery boys still go there to get hung-over on her when their Shifts end at 4 am leaving only the zombies to moan through streets
Dripping dew and used c#ndoms—

Instead, I failed miserably, as it is my sallow way, when I come
To think of a sickly grad student, a short haired blonde who used to Take Old English with me— She's now married and going for her Doctorate in Kansas City and does not notice Dorothy getting kidnapped by A hurricane outside her window— But she's still a raging feminist Decrying the Anglo-Saxon man and his new arousal to the machine Gun stashed in the woodshed, leaving the old axe and pitch-fork to Rust, leaving me beside the dead pilgrim on Chaucer's way, smiling
And calling me a text-book trooper....

I only finished one page leading up to where Blackbeard will steal
My love and the last of the rum away which is foreshadowed by the strange and deadly
Rose thickets growing in the waves in the Port of Nassau, before I Realized I was failing again, that my language was weak,
Though the rum was strong and knotted like oak—
I packed up for the night and the pirates sailed off into other sunlit
Bays, fornicating with their stolen women and my sad hopes,

As I settled down and watched a documentary on the lost Sudanese boys
Who come to America to find heaven—

Here, they are the blackest black, the lowest of the low,
In dirty streets they are the beautiful rebellion of machine-gunned orphans—
Like all the rest of us, they want to lie with the most petite white women
In the rushing beds of sunlight and waves and give them giant brown teddy-bears
where motion comes upon
Motionless and a new medium buds in thickets and avenues for the awakened
Artists to strut down towards her—

Is she still here or have they stopped serving drinks?
She must still be here, in these ancestral halls which echo the long Motion under the waves upon the beach— My desperations for the Barmaid who swims with indigo dolphins, who puts a pot on the fires
For the blackest of black boys, the darkest of orphans, those who come Unsuspecting towards the tumultuous glut of the red, white, and blue Mechanisms, there to lose themselves to the childish identity, the African-American. They cannot escape their pigment, which the Fires of stolen rum highlights, but she sees me standing outside of them,
A tanned pupil with tanned eyes—

Back in middle-school where I used to pretend I was a slave
Shackled to a shit stained bed, dying in my last days in the hut of the Pitiless white master—
And in high school I used to tell these two guys I ate lunch with that I should go to Morocco to become a white slave, to pay the debt of my Ancestors' capitalistic transgressions, even though I found out later my Great-great grandfather was an abolitionist preacher who got shot in the Mouth fighting for the north, going up the gray hills thicketed with seceding muskets,
Only to get married at seventy to a sixteen year old, and the kids I ate Lunch with laughed at me—Now one is a drug dealer and the other is the Same thing he was in high school—

I want to tell these Sudanese boys to go back to Africa, because the Tortoise has always been faster and wiser than the hare. Back in Africa They can hold hands and call each other dearest love without being called f@ggots—
Back in the original savannah, they might be greeted by the machete of their Unforgiving counterparts, but at least they won't be cast upon by white eyes,

The fundamentalist drive-thru's who have butchered Jesus and sell him with Greasy fries, those who cause heart-attacks, those ridiculous pirates who even Now steal her away from me.

Go back! Go back I should scream with ½ a bottle of Captain Morgan
In me, causing the length of this poem and its transgressions, as it calls
Out for her once again, the woman I see serving me the drinks which Burn these words into me. Go back! Go back to the original space, the Form without the abbreviated language of the salesman, because she is Still waiting for you, nude and hungry at the edge of the sea. Go back,
My blackest of black brothers, my beautiful dears, and maybe by Reclaiming yourselves, you will wake her up and she will take a break
From surfing and come to lay beside me under the steps like a cave
Above where she will lie down beside me, and serve me her
Drunken kisses of love.

Drunken Honeymoons

In a weather of summersaults I fade from you:
I remember me,
Do you remember you: or the evidence of your Children living in the armpits
Of the aboriginal empires,
Building pyramids in Egypt or in Mexico:
As the phoenix becomes a bonfire of the inebriates
Of our drunken high school only to bloom
Again—
Repeating the metamorphosis that cannot begin to Be described—
We love each other equally, and all of the time:
Forgetting sometimes until we come into view—
Can we ever look up into the heavens
To see from our high school:
Whatever it is we cannot remember—as the Ferris wheels
Turn away, as we are on our drunken honeymoons,
With wives hung around our shoulders whom
We cannot even begin to describe.

Robert Rorabeck

Drunken Shame

want to love you, but that's the thing:
I've worked it all out, but it's obscene:
You're laying down with your bouncer,
You're serving drinks to the derelicts,
And this isn't even yet Shackleton's invention:
I might be going back to high school,
And that's cool: for as in between your legs
I would like to play out as the fool:
I'm not Shakespeare, but here's the thing before
You leave, I've written entire novels about you
And the sea. As a juvenile, I've stolen those things
Pre-requisite to know about you; or, at least I Stole a Pl-yboy in Key West on my friend Jordan's Birthday; eight(teen) or so years ago- but, how, even now
I'm being considered by a major literary agent,
But not now- they've reconsidered, and are not Thinking about me, how so now I don't have any friends
Who are not Bahia; or that guy, but I almost have enough Money to buy a house next to that Mouse;
Another insouciant orchestra lives in South Africa,
But he's German, and given to the jaw. Now this is just Getting ridiculous and I would be remiss to not insinuate
The jest that I would not like to be under your blouse even Though you are a jaunty stewardess: but this is not true,
I drool: I would be remiss to insist that under your blouse
I would like to lay the foundation of my house, the forensic Evidence of a shooting evidence of a mouse: I would like
To lay it down like a louse, but I've had too many sips to go Through with this, I love you, E-:
And this is not a rhyme. You don't consider me anymore,
And that is just a crying shame. I would like to shoot myself.
I have consider this already. My sister is married, and I am out
Of bullets; and you are f&ck-ng a bouncer, but I don't know anything About that. See now how you pose him holding up your friend's Tit like a chalice, what the f- is up with that?
E-, I hate myself: I've tried to kill myself over you, see how I s-ck
At this: I don't know anyone. I don't even know my sisters;
And I shouldn't self-publish this, but here it goes out the window
Like an insouciant airplane; and I am drunk, and where you live

It is Saturday, and this poem has bled off onto the next page
Like a gangsters; but you're not even reading it are you, E-
I would like to buy a house near you and sink into a swamp, because I can't even think of anything better: I haven't even been with The juxtaposition of my s-x in two years, E-
And where are you, because I cannot write anymore tonight
Without your ghost, and I am lost without you,
And that is all there is, which is all of this:
Only a crying, drunken shame.

Robert Rorabeck

Dying Daisies

Open my throat like red curtained windows,
And you will see the sun has set on my Words for you.... These lines are the last Remaining embers two surviving soldiers
Sit around, stirring the ash,
But they are freezing to death,
And soon they too will lie down beneath
Their thoughts, and let the flowers of evil
Curl up and devour the fleshy pinkness
Of their happiness. There, their boots
Will stare straight up to God,
But he will wave them off, as he sees
Death crouching like a vulture on his carrion;
He knows that they are no longer his,
But for the pale woman behind the veil
As they now become disinfected from the world,
As the fire now starves upon its muted spot,
No more flames like tongues licking, tasting
The night for bits of you,
So too go my words for you, and these thoughts,
March down to their graves like good soldiers
Nearby the windless lake where you live
With all the beautiful girls without memories
Trying to catch your new fish that flop
Like pale satanic promises up and down
This dead man's dying shores....

Dying Too For My Bit Of Fun

Rain looks like whisky falling before
The sunlight,
But the day is almost over and
I'm still out of alcohol- and it hurts to Look at my face. My teeth hurt as I think
Lupine on girls that already died in the 70s,
And girls from high school died:
They died in North Carolina, they died in Saint Augustine- They used to play the guitar,
And I dreamed of them under the broken down
School bus and on, and on;
And, when I could, I sucker punched the Bullies in the locker room- I didn't try out,
I didn't run; and in between my classes,
I smoked the sea underneath an umbrella
In the moonlight, and made love to colors there
Are no names for, following after the Daphnes and Carolines, dying too for my Bit of fun.

Robert Rorabeck

Dysfunctional Conquistador

Waylaid by a prom queen denouement,
The sky is green or the sky is amber:
Or I am just hung-over.
High school is only halfway finished, but I
Have no business finishing it-
Relegate me, delineate me to any sort of Truancy. Beat me into the quiet insouciant sound
Of middle-class homogeneity:
There where the housewives live,
Those gunsmiths who take only the most professional
Sort of lovers;
Bivouac me near the sea or near the mountains,
Position me as you would your play-dough lover:
Say you want me and you want no other.
Strike me dead with a kiss,
What eternal bliss- Check my pulse to make sure I Can't recover. Kick some dirt where I no longer
Hurt- and the cars pass by in their eternal metallic slather-
Then go off and homestead the other;
It is what I am good for- dysfunctional conquistador.
Just say you want me and you want no other....

Robert Rorabeck

Each Famishing Word

A languishing perception of the classrooms holds over,
Like rain trying surmount the stained glass of a church in between Where I worked and the bar where
You served beer- Now all of my words are echoes—
They are unforgivable—
Each one a freak brought to represent another fear:
My wife is in the shower while I write these things Underneath a lamp underneath the Cabbage palms—
Where am I going, as the night treks out,
Each wave a hypnotism for sea-horses and jelly-fish,
And each famishing word a stain upon my soul
That was supposed to be immortal.

Robert Rorabeck

Each Of Our Mutual Wishes

Touching the soundless chords of perception,
As airplanes are touching down ever day,
Their bulky wheels kissing over the perfect stone lips
Of cemeteries,
The forts firing off their cannons and the madmen in them
Fireworks,
And there are dreams that I've had in the middle of classes
Other people were taking,
But those dreams are what no one else can have:
And I have you in the, Alma, and it feels right to admit this,
And that there are angels living in our hearts,
Sleeping like genies in gas lights waiting for our frictions
To make them come awake
And fulfill each of our mutual wishes.

Robert Rorabeck

Each Of The Peninsulas

Wearing a baseball cap to Disguise identity,
You stood barefoot
In the shade
Cast from the nude
Lamps of the Trailerpark;
But you grew up and
Were blessed with all the Amphibians
That crowded the stadium
And sang through the Rains
That united the cats,
Collecting them in the cinderblocks
With the moths
Where we perennially
Sold Christmas trees
With the Mexicans- your Uncle amongst them-
Making love to other women,
Carolling and sending the Zygotes to the chimneys- until
He understood that there
Was nothing that
Could not be loved by him-
Abandoning his loneliness to His wife and children,
And caressing each of the Peninsulas that were
As close and as easy for him as Stepping stones.

Robert Rorabeck

Each Of Their Hair

I am Briar Rabbit
And you are super sexy,
And I've been folding paper,
And my eyeliner doesn't stream
So I can look straight up at the dusty
Mighty god folded
Over the ceiling fans:
We have six of them in our ceiling fans,
My parents so lucky and so forgotten
From picking
Watermelons and lettuce
And f%cking cotton:
And I have seen you on the bus,
And I have seen you a dripping heroin beneath the Florida holly,
And you are my poem tonight, even though you are
A dry river bank,
And now I have my own money, so maybe I'll even have My own house to farm alone for some years.
Maybe I'll even have my own wife who will read
Insociantly by the intercostals light dreaming her days
Away in the brewery of more handsome men,
And old teachers have asked me to hand job for them,
And old girlfriends are a year or two old wives,
And rightly I should be a virgin or two since them,
But I've been inside almost a dozen holes,
Because of the caustly loneliness,
And E- couldn't possibly understand,
Because I summited the mount of the Holy Cross alone,
And now the words are not mine,
And my dogs have wandered off somewhere else,
Because they are so tired of searching for their old master,
And they are limping and soon they must die,
Like the fire my tenebrous fingertips are constantly lighting,
And I am only thinking about one or two women,
And they are so beautiful,
Like stewardesses,
Even though I am not,
And it is not possible that they could be thinking for

So long about me,
Even though the cold wind is blowing forever
Through the forlornly patriotic banners of Each of their hair.

Robert Rorabeck

Each Unbothered Nod

Glorify the homeless man,
The one we stole the world from:
He who tramps without shelter of home,
Without junction of wife, or yet fully grown
Caress of children: Glorify him,
And his marvel of beard, and
Name each of his scars as the constellations,
And road maps, so that we might see by them,
He who has never know the prostitution of Business, nor the condemning judgment of Peers; never reciprocated with the foibles
Of the classrooms of gaseous ego,
Who picks up nothing but what is of immediate Use, who loves nothing but the open wounds of Sky, or, casually, the entrained lovers of business
Men as they pass by insouciantly air-conditioned:
Love him, the continuing transcendentalist,
Whose teeth have disappeared from the malnourishment
Of tasteful enterprise: find him, unwashed as the Tramping messiah of boxcars, the underpasses his hooded
Cradles, the enthralled forest his lexicon;
Kneel there in the hermitage of humilities: his wealthy
Silences, and the purities of simplicity, which baptize
Thoughtlessly as he proceeds down the verdant uncontained
Hallways, the waves leaping like silver dogs of unrequited
Fidelity: the road so surely his element, that he goes Down just as unknowingly, encompassed by sunlight as
By twilight, and the dusky hues of her unwedded dress,
Blindly feeling her as if awakened newly metamorphosed
From each unbothered nod, each unburdened repose.

Robert Rorabeck

Early Morning Paramours

Kick up your heels and scream-
Show me the mammalian gardens which make Me dream- full bore like a conquistador
To explore,
Paying by the hour the things to which I am sure,
The early morning baseball cards,
The diving boards, her bee-stung tits-
And some of this: her birthmarks in the red bloom age
Of a dream,
While her mother is away,
And the dogs are out long tailed checking under
The moon for a dream:
Taking me out there consumptive in a cart,
And I'll point you out the way,
Nothing I am doing here has been real:
Bicycle thieves are more real than this-
Wait for them after midnight and they will take you away,
And you will never have to dream again:
And now I am bored and waiting for Jordan's sister
To take off her clothes and swim,
And all of the yard is an excuse for high school and the Third chapter of aliens,
And things are budding in bunches yet fermented,
And the fox is toothy,
And the airplane is paper folded under the crenulations of Air-conditioning, I can't spell,
And my youngest sister should live so many years after Me; and I've been to the bottom of the Grand Canyon three Times.
But hell- and time is a hummingbird fast-toothed in Its claret box,
And I am just that gummy toothed fox leaping for the vine
It can never reach- oh hell,
The bus has left me anyways, and it is such a short walk home,
That it should be easy to go and see what fine things
Are waiting for me short skirted, insouciant, singing
Like early morning paramours on the color TV.

Early Morning's Play

Let's string the stars along our street,
so you can look at me
and say nothing, and I can see in you
the great distance of our sexes;
In our loins the needs of curious time travellers, the experiments in the humid cul-de-sacs that lap one another like folded space
after you have gone
away to become a professional;
I am still following you through highschool-
I spent so many days with you thinking back, both of us ingenues
of our state's education,
the highest rung of mammals
walking on hind-legs through the sunlit jungles of South Floridian modernism.
Now a cubist sitting in your office,
collecting you things;
now you can not see me
nor do you recall my name.
You are busy tasting the Hind end of a pencil figuring out the plan:
grown fully now, the result of a high-end nebula, a family recipe-
but in strictly geographic terms,

I am even higher up,
kissing the sun's ass, thinking further west how your toes must feel the Atlantic's tongue licking them like an allegorical puppy
I imagine you must keep hidden away within the preschool of early morning's play when someone not yet fully realized caught your eye and called your name to come play.

Robert Rorabeck

Early Poems

I will only have my early poems,
My blue period, the nights alongside the basinets
In the monte marte when the one whore showed me
Her cuneiform,
And I cut my tooth on the petrified rind:
Saw you across the fluttering windows, wasting you
Time with you tongue along side that awful man,
In the cape of whoever:
Your eyes the spittoon cloisters of a dirty park,
The pranksters and the dead prying the coffins out of Jest: Out of that I was stymied. I couldn't even leave
Out of my patriarch's jail,
And it wasn't a good time to imagine the postcards
You never send, and I made up epitaphs to the imaginary
School bus you used to drink your pints of homegrown
Milk on under the pinkish teal under-wings of herons:
And all those animals rushing out of the mammalian brush Fires of sugarcane and rush hour stripping their Furs and crowding into the sea, making the tourists bulk;
And there was no greater beauty than the infantile spit
In my sandbox which was used to denote your pallid
Areola, the aboveground swimming pool in the tenements
Of a desert: And here it is at hand, trying to turn twenty years Old and not looking any better. My hand is outstretched Showing you the key to nowhere, and the publisher is Not accepting unrequited solicitations- so there you are.
This is a poor man's house who can't even afford dog food,
Who sometimes imagines the brightest azaleas all spun out
Beside Diana's pool where all the great mothers have come
Far south to bath in and get a taste of good homeopathic
Magic; but I can't even rightly picture that species of flower,
And mine remains the vague failure drunken on a park
Bench far too deep after midnight to be reading to anything
Brilliantly open or available for lovely romances.

Earth

If I wasn't so tired,
I could tell you where we're going,
For there is an entire language of tricksters not so
Deep in the earth,
The laughing bellies of rain-men: ho, ho, ho;
But I'm not so good with other things,
Like driving cars and dancing girls and football, but the earth is like a mirror, and I should say Nothing more,
And the earth is like a home, or like a cemetery.
The waves are always leaping like class clowns
Onto it, not realizing that evaporated the earth
Smokes them as a truant under the same musseled
Trellises where they go leaping so gleefully:
The earth is a king at a waltz, and the sun his emperor,
But no more of that stuff: This is not supposed to be an Early model of the universe,
But only a tiny little thing, a handful of dirt:
The coyote sniffs the earth. Fleas crawl up and stowaway
On his coat from the earth- Furrows of scars make tracks
On the earth. Chickens eat between the tracks,
Sometimes, while crossing the road, they are hypnotized by
The median: Otherwise, they too become the earth,
And this poem, or a quiet novel, and last century:
Great men say now the earth is thier's, but they are not so
Correct that the earth doesn't laugh at them, nor does it mind
The entire civilizations of footsteps marking up his chest:
He is good for scars, the earth, and knows that what we say
Are only the echoes we hear while even now we are Coming back to him.

Earth Angel

Poets spill words from their lips
Like unattended gas tanks at the pump.
Spitting like babies they learn reckless Sounds they mistake for heaven's joy,
When it is even more than that,
Her legs running in the humidity atop
The concrete, and saying I love you to Her shadow is some kind of earthen poem
Amidst the dandelions and crippled bees,
And the ants spewing from the crack in
The sidewalk like an overused womb.
Recognizing the verbs of her lunch, her
Lips smack like flames licking candles,
And her drenched shorts suit her bum
Like a nun's habit rife with the smell of Blackened persimmons tangled about the river in The slender woods. Then there is hardship
When she doesn't return the thought,
But keeps right on with her exercise, not Knowing it only makes the poetry better,
More prodigious until it is spewing as if
From a cartoon bubble out of the paper mouth
Of a bullhorn. Thus, stymied by the interest,
And now confused between the old lies and
The musing's truth, she gives in and becomes
A fine catch, a trophy of some thousand lines,
The busy aphrodisiac of the art form until
Her and it are indiscernible and magnified,
So her areolas take on themselves the aspects
Of twin moons balancing milky cherries,
Dishes served to infant kings,
And her lips drunken boats torn free from their redskin
Haulers: Even better than a doctor's wife,
Or a lawyer's- she is like the thing professors
Find without looking, a soft paramour of the Craft, an attentive student with her blouse unbuttoned,
A singing interest of poetic actualization,
Now so like a paper doll folded at the elbows
And knees, a book of words in the form of a

Dove. And then again just a girl jogging
Along the road beside the university, as sunlight
Skips through your window and gives a fit of Erections which over last a decade.

It is a big turquoise coffin
Pirouetting in outer space-

In it is buried the entirety of Our human race.

East Of East

You can hold up a Christmas tree almost with your Eyes and I am near then I can defeat the caterpillars
And the bees making dresses in the yellow coral,
And the snakes will moan the fire signals
In the reef where the pieces of heart will find us and make us
Stronger,
And the airplanes will go far off and so comfortably,
Bearing all of the signals of the modern age: the beautiful carriages
Where women serve man and beast,
And your eyes converse with the windows opening far away
In a bed of lovers east of east.

Eat My Bouquets As I Drown

Come back to me and give me rainbows and death
Even though I know you are trying the rivers to Survive or to paint a pretty picture:
Even though you are all right here and there is
The reminiscence of nothingness so near to my head—
And in the busied architectures of the butterflies in the Forests- whilst it takes only so much time
For the songs to me sung—molting- changing rhymes
An depictions of ourselves until we are upon other Planets—and then what is left for our high schools to do:
You have scared almost everyone—and there isn't An airplane already taking off who hasn't already peed his Pants—and this is the uncalisified middle grounds-
Even if you don't know anything about your own young
Art—This is how it happens to be, without a pay check whist
Your young dog continues scratching himself—
So many perfumes in the private bedrooms of the underclassman—
What does it mean—
With the waves coming in, and the private ballrooms decrying
Baseball all over themselves....

Echoes Of The Blind Man's Hammer

Neon sign of 'Food'
Written for the blind man
He has bloodied his nails
While building a
House for Himself
Up the switchbacked
Slopes
Outside of Golden, Colorado.

This is from
My mother's childhood.
See her.
Her brother and
A raven are following her.
And the raven sings
'Jupiter! Jupiter! '
This is the name
Of my mother's horse
Kept in the valley
Crowned by aspen.

Robert
(The name of her brother)
Will never leave this Haunted world.
Even after his parents
Are dead,
He will wake up
In the trailer park
In Firestone, Colorado,
Ringed by emptied cans of Domestic beer,
Still hearing
The raven
Calling for my mother's horse
And iron echoes

Of the blind man's hammer
Upon the bloodied nails.

Echoing Before School

Merry-go-rounds of feral children,
Aunt Mary's in Pieta,
Like the poster for a blockbuster movie:
Sharon is in Colorado
Bundled up, driving a stick shift:
The world is made up of icicles cross-stitching
A racetrack no one gets a good look at before
The race is over,
All the tears have melted, Sharon:
Your child is beautiful flipping through the pages of Her naïve life:
What will it mean to you, Sharon,
Your daughter bathing in the same auburn light that
You have known for so long,
Carelessly, taking advantage of with your pale and Milky limbs:
Your eyes sleeping burs half perceived through the Neighbors hibiscus;
Sharon,
I couldn't even begin to say, to speak of what dreams you've Had,
How you perceive this garden, but it seems to be as if I've been walking after you for so long,
Echoing, biting my lip while the footprints you leave
Are coming up
As the mailbox is raising his flag,
And the traffic is beginning to drive right through the earliest
Of passing through light,
Wimpled grasses unbending, taking away its another greenness
Signifying its wish not to be discovered:
The mist leaving the vermilion baseball diamond,
And Sharon....
And Sharon is echoing before school.

Ecstatic Truth

What bedtime stories
Will you choose for your children
To knock them back
Into the poppies to sleep,
My pretties,
To send them snoozing
From their overfed
Satanic Paradise
Caged in a middle-class house
Sequestered by a manicured
Golf-course
Locked with a gate code
The nitric oxide allaying fears
Into the briefest of Sugar-coated comas?
Certainly not the vulgar
Hypocrisy of your
Communist youth—
That the man you first loved,
Which was I,
Is not their father,
Nor is the next one
(The stranger you left me for) :
But the third one,
You assure them:
You are rather sure he is their father.
The ecstatic truth
That you can never
Explain to them,
The poetic justice you fear:
That a homeless man,
A breathless copse of shedding limbs
In the croaking gutter,
Maggots vortexing a writhing sea
In his swollen liver,
Has more glow of deity
In him than Their poor,
Well-kept mother.

Eden #2

The coldness runs too deep,
Even if the weightless scientists discovered
A new planet with budding life on it,
Abound in rich gardens still standing,
Two brothers in love and weaponless,
A place where death never touches the sad corners,
Where prostitutes never hunger and the winged
Serpent was denied and left early,
Where the forbidden fruit still hangs forbidden,
Gladdened on the ripe branch, even still in reach,
Where the innocent flesh
Of those distant ancients are nubile and sinless,
Still clothed in fig leaves and Lilly pads, with
The open fornications in the tranquil gardens,
Between the lions and the lambs who gambol in
The yellowing fields where the winds blow warmly,
Here where the pastoral borders expand with
The holy procreations of cousins, where there is Only one age, and ageless, in the green space
Where throats sing praises to the fecundity of Angels swimming in the trees, and God still Visits every Sunday to read to his great flock
From his glowing book, where there is not space
Enough for gravestones, the unnecessary markers of Sin never to be perceived, here where a thousand years
Is still infantile, where thoughts grow in Temples like glistening chalices upon which the Untarnished souls sustain and the knowledge received
Is given to all daily in little bits, breadcrumbs that fall Down from the clouds like manna softly bumping onto Those gentle heads,
And the goodness continues on and on
In glowing, manicured waves.

Yet, not for us— We can not climb aboard the rocket Built to take us to their second paradise, we who have tasted from Her drunken lips, our Eve bedded with the Serpent,
Creating the dark places of burn and rust, the pallid Coffins in which we live, and though, ashamed, she Left him to come back to us, and we forgave,

That first coldness remains and runs deep, forever
Lining our borders with the hoarfrost of her eyes, shivering
As we stand at the entrance to our once fair garden
Where God's burning sword defends eternal,
The half eaten fruit still rotting near the place she fell,
So even if we were to sneak back in, either here
Or 20 light years away into that undestroyed paradise, Illuminate and gentled, we could not escape, for the Bittersweet taste of knowledge is still choking our throats,
And the coldness of our sin burns forever colder inside
Our dislocated bones.

Edict Of Parking Lots

Edict of parking lots
Upon the borders of which a few
Blue yet sincere
Ghosts remain caught in
The brambles—
This is the same spot where
Edgar Allen Poe turned up—
Death from alcoholic voting fraud—
Where no children are left behind—
The metamorphosis of men into Soldiers,
And women into stewardesses and Thus into airplanes:
It is beautiful to behold, if you can—
The changes
They do not wish for you to perceive—
The only things that you can teach Yourself—
Madness—
Wildernesses choking on arrowheads,
Paths into forgotten or ignored
Beauty—
An adventure into the stagnation of Boyhood
how Peter Pan and myself
Learned how to survive—
And we are still here,
At the place we found across the street,
Following the first star until morning—
Naked, feral
And enjoying the company of dead
Poets in a place so near
To you you forgot to overlook
As they taught you the good things of The earth and,
lining your pockets with gold,
sent you on your way.

Edie's Garden

Edie threw white roses from the balcony;
And the finer generals said, "She doesn't have Any hair, " but Edie didn't care:
She went around Bel Noir tossing candy like
A bouquet exposé,
And the no talent bards wrote songs about her
No one would sing,
But I remembered her from high school,
When no one else did: I did, but Edie didn't Care. I went out during lunch and slept underneath
The broken down purple school bus,
While even then it rained for a cabaret of Crocodiles, even though there weren't any crocodiles
Anywhere near there; but Edie didn't care:
She went straight out and down the bank before
Latin, and straddled them like steeds;
The principal said they'll eat you Edie, take care;
But Edie didn't care: She just threw her hands up and Sang, and sang; and she wore a red scarf thatched through
With sun flowers and wood thrushes.
I imagine she rode them around the entire neighborhood
Until it rained so much it flooded;
But Edie didn't care- She moved up to her Long Island
Summer home, and laid down amidst the cats and kissed
Her mother until it was time to go back to school,
But she stayed at home anyways,
While in the vast lonely habitats the lions roared,
The traffic squawked and two handsome brothers came
And set up a camera to make a movie of Edie;
So when it was all over, the audience agreed that it was The most beautiful thing,
But Edie didn't care, and threw her white roses
From the balcony to the fine young generals,
And of them in later days, retired under the palm trees,
Edie sang and sang.

Edison's Thievery

Let us pinch the cheeks of dearies,
And go out into the yard in the light they invented
Just last century,
The mowed and fertile plane,
The miniscule and microcosmic all down below,
Curling and multi-legged in the grass.
Across the street, the neighbor has his expensive
Car all waxed and cherished glean,
And the girl I once slept with and Moved into many times, how she rows:
She lives there too, an aphrodisiac of capital,
A curling iron unplugged in the backyard patio
Where the pool stays lighted and cleaned; She swims
Back and forth, pretending that she is pure,
Still the daughter of her parents, and yet there are weeds
Beautifully accentuated by Edison's thievery,
The brick-laying thugs smoking her....

These truant fingers skip over this like pollination;
They no longer move through her secular pubis,
Or twiddle in a thimble full of her cottaged quim.
For certainly scarred, they are still the cicadas on the brim,
Sloughing off of themselves, the luxury of metamorphosis
Whispered in the ear of a dandelion before she spores:
This is how they go away, and this how they remain,
The patterns the tide leaves on the beach, or on my temples,
Throbbing as they watch pieces of vampiric angels
Unclothe and bathe immortally in the open and concrete showers
Their tan-lines hauntingly androgynous.....

These conquerors of better sport farted through an education,
Made love to phallic pestilence, were married in a mopped
Apartment store: Look at her going up the poor mathematics of an Escalator, and coming down with defining sacrifices, Now
How the trimmed grass whispers around the little feet of the house,
How the buds come out and flaunt clitorises for the wet blue wasps,
The stinging quips of rain;
And the luxury of the sea, salt all over their bodies, and
The hurricanes rife with unruly children, like truants kicking

Feet on the swing-set outside the stained-glass where
The Catholic's choir sings,
And after all the redded hymns, back under the humid pine trees,
He opens the door for her, though her dress is ripped and her Eyes away;
She goes in politely, her lips bruised,
Her hymen a torn curtain of a forgotten play,
And they move like gangsters to their plotted psalm:
He to watch gulf all afternoon, her to take her sister's
Medicated phone-call,

I watch the ants move in the grass.
They have found a whisper and are carrying it away
To their queen.

Robert Rorabeck

Edith Piaf

There is nothing on t.v.,
But the ocean is very deep.
I have been hurt in the forest
Where I sleep.
The glaciers are losing face.
The announcer is speaking French.
The little sparrows are trying to teach
Me to sing again.
The woman is smiling at me.
The woman is not smiling at me,
But someone I thought was me.
The church bells are ringing in
The steeples above the naked leas.
The shepherds are herding sheep
I have been hurt in the forest
Where I sleep.
The butterflies are flying over Egypt.
The announcer is speaking French.
The boys are taking their girls to a formal dance.
Under the banisters, the boys are sharing liquor.
Out in the street, the night is awful deep.
I have been hurt in the forest
Where I sleep.

Egret In A Tree

Egret in a tree in a parking lot
Word starting out,
First candle on a bonfire overlooking
The Christmas trees and giving them
Your shadow
And you stare as the thunderstorms
Give pearls to your shadow.
The tourists drive around you like
Wild persimmons,
Giving you their caracoles,
Dreaming that they were flutes.
The waves joust
And sometimes they become tears
Let down by gravity like grapevines for
The city that stands at your back but is too
Frightened to approach you—
And the airplanes take off, the stars
Bathing in your shoulders.

Either Of You

Stay away from me and my unicorns:
We don't believe in either of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Either Way

Cinderella smells like beer after she's Done with all the mice,
The lab experiments of pitter-patter:
They've pockmarked their feet all over her,
And smeared their cheddar and now she's Passed out and handcuffed in the Weeds beneath the monorail,
And the cardboard moon is lirting, floating upon its Track of would-be espionage;
And all the tourists with their careless balloons
Are returning to where they hope they parked their Cars;
And this is where she left me, and went off to reassemble
For her husband,
But I think I've stumbled upon something significantly more
Beautiful,
Because she is just there one breast over spilling caracoled
With the track marks of overturned carriages,
Her heart now as quieting as race horses given in finally to Mightier rivers;
Or I might be all alone in a park after hours,
And she is just a shadow of an overweight bone;
But it is just as well,
As either way she is my beautiful.

Ejaculating In The Misspellings Of The Afternoon

Tallest of trees
Laughing, stretched out all arms
At the edge of the parking lot:
People coming in,
Doused by sunlight—
Animals making believe they are people
Wearing masks,
Ready to make a sacrifice of their Greatest of gifts in order to survive—
The sun going down all Around them
And their campuses,
Dousing them in crepuscule,
The little children amidst them laughing
But fearful—
Going home to get warm in their Souls,
Bathing suits shed in the sunlight
Until they are all nudity of the darkness:
And the waves roll in,
Caressing, being orchestrated by the Satellites—and the wind
Pulls strong and swift,
The marionettes making love comply—
Ejaculating in the misspellings of the afternoon.

Ejaculations On The Green Carpet Of A Thirteen Year Old

I thought to hang out with you today,
Angel of clichéd genitals; I thought to become a basketball
Star of my high school, and take you out to lunch
To sashay beneath the epileptic streetlights and the protuberance of sun:
Here, I've written things up and down my skin never Knowing certainly what the next word will be, but that is yours:
My skin and all its scars are your prayer flag, this tattooed patriotism Sending young men off to war; clammy thoughts come to you like toy soldiers, dripping zinc
With their bayonets and wounds: Fix them!

There is nothing perfect in this scheme, nothing mathematical,
And when I nock on your inner-city door they say you've gone off
To pursue a dream: In college you knock on wood, you Exercise, and underneath the somber rays you run until the Maples display in their deciduous strip shows, chorus lines of Hard working cherry and dog-wood.
Now all these things I've put into a bottle and skipped it on the waves,
And tonight I will fold it up into an airplane and send it off the cliffs,
And over so many insouciant graveyards you will never know
The generations, how the scientists said today that comets scattered
Diamonds so that women would start wearing fur coats:

This you will never know: every word that has come to me bubbling
Up like oil in my entrepreneur fields I've pumped,
Silky ejaculations on the green carpet of a thirteen year old:
I put back the scars,
And lay my son across you like a beam, so you might go to and fro,
Showing off your legs, competing in roller derbies, cutting out snowflakes, changing very little
From decades even while whole conglomerates fall, sickles and bears
In a red field. And this is the third stanza of my most recent fit: Since Christmas I've started a novel; I am waiting to hear from a literary agent,
And if I learn to fly it will because you gave me such a current,
And the insouciant tug I get off this vicarious breast-feeding;
And if I must fail, then please forget to give me your fire in a horn of tin
Aslant on the grave, but stay warm inside and kiss the columns of his more

Journalistic neck, and wait for the storm to pass, and then proceed
Into the newest story of your next beautiful day.

El Agere

El agere becomes willful at dusk,
Chapping the buttocks of the canyon,
Spinning pools of light like children until they Tip over the cliffs, and string into the glossy waters-
I have laid on my back for hours atop the teal carport
Of mildewing golfers, some things on my mind,
And listened to the jangle of spurs, the friction of tires
On the minute and abrasive surfaces, like some sort
Of rhyming code- Each hair stiffens under the shadow of The palms, and I write a note to you and stick it in crease
On the roof, just an hour before the hurricane-
El agere comes leaping like a lion from its Atlantic cave,
Circling around me and thrashing all the oranges out of the tree,
Pushing a toddler on a plastic tricycle apoplectically down
The avenue, taps out the windows like a mad lover, an eel
Who has sickly slithered in the zoetropic shadows of his Wife's adultery- El agere came about me too in high school
As I slept in the effluvious oil slick under the crippled bus, Thought of you in mirrors that were blind, came and Whispered to me from the trees, that I would soon be old,
And as lonely as I am now- That was the day you came and Sat with me in Latin class, and asked me if I was okay,
When I would not look up, for I knew who you would become,
Taken by el agere in swift degrees, fluctuating like a paper
Doll far across the inebriated ocean el agere soups up, for Now all my hair is gray and even now el agere is leaping out-Side my glass door, dripping cones from pine trees, shoving dusk into The hills, and you are far away in pictures of motes and Caesuras, learning to love the men el agere has pushed you
Towards laughing, like a spore plucked in season from a garden
I once attended with my eyes: Now el agere comes draping
The roofs, and eddying highways, and I have asked him to take Me to you, but he only laughs a violet radiance, like tiny wheels
Rushing on concrete, he exhales that you have gone shopping, Dressed all in new things and boys, you couldn't possibly Remember the day you sat next to me in class, laughs el agere....

El Arco Iris

If I go away and leave her to sell fireworks in
New Mexico,
Guys will start jumping all over her like rats leaving
A drowning ship;
And I wouldn't even blame her, as beautiful as she is;
And I want to bed her down next to the Palm Beach zoo,
And tell her things I cannot explain about herself to her
Every night while the same old moon waxes and wanes
With the black cats over our bedroom;
And she isn't even mine: she only kissed my neck twice:
Today is her birthday, and I am trying to buy a house
For her:
Not the virgin of a small town in Peru: not even a good Sized metropolis, maybe, like this place;
But maybe of everything, at least for me, and that is why
I am trying to collect myself and gather my courage and My green canon balls, to line them out and count them
Like paper airplanes before the tremendous thunderheads,
To show her daughter and her daughter's grandmother
Even though I am sure that they cannot hope to fathom an Estimate of who she really is.

El Canto Palido Por Mi Primo

Tinhorn cufflinks and pale alligator boots tapered to a point,
And Marteen is ready to return to his second wife in Mexico- Only Yesterday, I stopped for him to get a fifth of southern comfort whiskey
At the Old Red Barn in Sanders, AZ, and he talked all the way home
With a language as insouciant as his whistling on
The standard bred horse ranch where is his precarious employ,

But he cannot find his visa, and his shirt and pants match like rich
Cadmium, and he is ready to go with all his worldly goods stacked like
A metal and wood hive on the back of his truck which sings Mexican cantos
Laid down the way ghosts move from the little town of White Rock,

And sometimes I feel that my words should move like Robert Frosts',
And that when I too grow old that I should look for the apertures of my photos
In my books spined in the color of golden wasps who no longer exist,
Slightly askance with my homily visage, my eyes the sort of somnambulists
Walking through the broken gates of old corals in the twilight smudges,

But such whimsy is my condition, and I do not know how to dance,
And Marteen with the lanky frame which no longer exists on the East Coast,
Has a better chance with the made of Carmens sunbathing their spotlights in Miami,
And this brittle careen which I do to touch the pale whiskers of unnoticed flesh
Is but a performance that anyone might try, for in words to live but a day longer
Is all there is to be hoped for.

Elbows Of Memory

The fireworks were over
Whence they were barking for a Chinese Christmas
Or a Chinese New Years:
And my brother in law's dog has finally collapsed at my feet:
A golden retriever named Bonnie
Too large for this apartment in Shanghai—
Can you believe, this place is worth more than a quarter of A million dollars—
And all of the savings of my in-laws,
Just to provide for the trappings of a son
So that he can be married.

The sky is in stilettos. And I have been drinking $500 dollar
Chinese wine, usually only drunken by officials—
I have lost another tooth and gained a belly;
But when I take my kids through Century Park,
Dozens of Chinese families exclaim,
&quot;Jin piel-yell&quot;—or 'extraordinarily beautiful, '
However they might say it.

Now, three years ago, I lost a teaching job in a public Highschool—as I was trying to reclaim the ghosts of the girlfriends who Were never quite aware of me:
The beautiful girls who I let haunt myself—
A valentines of ghost ships of so many castaways' memories

But I don't love them anymore,
And I don't write poetry—
I just get lost at the elbows, and when I return—
Milky eyed,
I get to enjoy them all so thoroughly, equally—

My children in the space of my heart—
Captivated before my eyes:
They have done away with my habit for muses—
They reward me with all and both of their prizes—

And the sun looks up at the clouds and smiles,
And the cars peruse the roads,

Will the alligators fawn—
Examining something that has been lost for some while- -

The smoke echoes up from the fireworks,
And the shadows hang on, clouding to their elbows of memory.

Elbows Of The Garden

Elbows of the garden stretch cantankerously
As I try to look at you from
The corner of my eye—
Brown skinned Mexican, beautiful girl we Want to steal the world from—
As children come in glistening like traffic,
Shifting through the strangely sentient hallways
Of the earth,
None of them afraid of monsters,
And seeming to know how to get wherever
They are going—they know more than me,
And can even spell words only using three or Four letters,
Until this pageantry settles down in the afternoons,
Back in the theatres of their own abodes,
Mesmerized by the kaleidoscopes of Their very own televisions.

Election Day

Great despotic emperors,
My parents are back home again
And knocking upstairs;
I'd thought they'd been dead for Seventeen years:
I try to reassure myself by looking
In mirrors.
My jaw unhinges, I try to make
Wishes,
Bloody Mary comes and gives me
Bloody kisses:
While then, all the while, she's been Down on the grotto toting the bottle,
Passing herself around amidst the boys,
They un-tuck and start out on her,
She becomes for them quite an adventure,
But where it is they find themselves on her,
I don't know;
For I am left under the briars,
Under the snow, the cabins are rotting,
The rivers slow; she goes away on a bright
Strung bow,
And I hang around with nothing to say
For myself, while my parents rattle through
The dusking sky: They wish they remembered
How to cry.

Electricity

I try not to worry about things,
And I day dream:
The trucks come, and the trucks go:
Delivering to graveyards through the f%cking snow,
You know;
And what your name is the pain of my bleeding fingers,
Your skin on my mind a blind man trying to build
A house;
And I just keep at it for you in curious and pitiful ways:
Snow white is in her tree fort
Being propositioned by alligators;
And everything about my body is warm and mostly Celibate;
And I don't want to live without you:
I will just keep on getting prettier through the Alligator Juniper:
The buses have wings and their own segregations of sky:
We all die into each other,
And sing sky-shanties; and I know you have a lover
And four children;
And I think I know that I shall see you again,
Before I die; but oh how tonight he is making love to you
In the saw grass estuaries where the trucks are loading up;
And how many boys do you have other than I who Have rounded the bases through your sweet figments of
Sky;
And lying on your back counting the stars, the world is a figment
Of your imagination;
And I wanted to touch myself while the terrapin shot away;
And I invented electricity as I thought upon you today.

Robert Rorabeck

Elements Of Echo

Liquor is bright,
And the world is silent in its go around,
And the least things have the most to say,
And it is unbelievable I am still here-
Though I am not here,

But cradling the weight of her thoughts after
Some midnights, letting the skeins overspill
The spirit of our high school,
As the diminishing coyotes howl,
As the plated alligators lurk,
Sometimes I curl up to her like this,

Though she is not here tonight,
Though she was not here yesterday,
And to those classrooms there is only subtraction,
And the kind of tricks they pull forth from long hats,
The gentlemen who love her toothily,
Though it may be far along after midnight,

And the liquor is like a chlorined pool,
And tomorrow I will be collecting money from a Navajo
And carrying on to Aztec, NM, and on into Moriarty,
I have a song to sing because my fingers would trace her spine,
Each plate a cusp of her construction,
A bridge over thoughtless waters,

Though I am better like this dreaming of Latin,
I would sting myself by her cursory lips and inattentive meanings,
Though she is pressed into him as a peninsula between great lakes,
I can still sing into her these elements of echo,
As if this were the great depression, and the transitory landmass
Of sugary tramps and weekends of flea markets,
Though she is not here,
Though I am not here,

I am here, and singing her again a song of meaningful quiet
As the clouds migrate the blushing herd of their extinction.

Eloquently

Silence has its own echoes too:
Each of your eyes are its sisters walking the tresses
Of a railway I cannot remember,
But sometimes it goes leaping over great unanswered quarries:
It goes leaping and gets a jubilant,
And that is went your throat is grazing on the hills of Green gods,
And I can't remember your name, because it doesn't begin with A K, and I've never swung with you;
But maybe I have lied before, and I am lying now:
Maybe we struck out together: maybe we panned for silver:
Maybe we summited her together:
Maybe I have liked to taste the placed on you, the hidden estuaries
And water fountains that your daughter tastes even now;
And because I have said so so eloquently, how could
You, with a clear conscious, possibly deny me.

Robert Rorabeck

Elysium's Chimney

Subtly now but every day
Grandmothers are passing away
Thoughtlessly they are floating upward.
The sky is greeting them
Playing the orchestras of their youth,
As their grandchildren mourn for them,
Thinking them the once kind vessels
That held them in Sunday School-
But they are not here
In our neighborhood graveyards,
Our non-canonical saints,
The beautiful gray-haired women
Who like lovely verbs
Worked hard to keep households
The places of well-kept safety.
Here they go now,
Passing through the clouds
Blurry eyed and delighted,
Clutching their favorite handbags
To their breasts as they shoot upwards
Through Elysium's chimney,
Exclaiming "Brother Ned! "
And "I declare! "
But neither cursing nor blaspheming,
Keeping their souls as they Kept their houses clean for company.
Now all the saints do them honor,
Conducting them like
Pardoned convicts
Exonerated from gravity's decay,
Loosed from the sun's patriarchy.
So soon the conductor is calling,
"Last stop, Pluto. Last stop now! "
But not a single grandmother gets off.
They stare curiously at the Dark old bachelors walking that place
And hold their breath until
The train is moving on,
Past the planets now,

Past all that is imperfectly known
Into the beating hearts of their mothers
Like old philosophers
Rejoining what they have always Known to be....

Robert Rorabeck

Embittered Metamorphosis

Too old to turn back,
The teenage army disbanded in the North;
Many starved, though there was cannibalism,
And after all their eyes could not move,
To speak as they should,
To rest periodically under the windows of flesh.
The sky was beautiful.
Yes it was,
And there were white-lung tents sent up in
The absolute tundra,
Breathing from the winds' manipulations
and fireworks
Vendors put on displays for free,
Upon the azure fields overlooking the military highway,
But no one bought anything
Which could not be eaten,
And people found there was no money
To buy food,
And loves wished to rekindle something,
But they couldn't go off to find where their other was,
Who was lost some ways out looking for them:
As their teeth ate their lips,
Everyone was sure they saw something out there,
Something coming closer,
Whose needs they could already feel
Taking away the feeling of their extremities.
At the last, they were too tired to move,
To throw the bones in ciphering,
Crowded in invalidations of the senses,
They would not even cry, for that had been Thrown out as useless some years ago.
In their end, all they had was themselves,
The last flames leaping in the petrified bodies,
And then, upon dusk, when the curtain came Down like the sleet storm on a hostile planet
Alien to human form,
Isolated in beauty, the new adults
Went to bed in morbid slumber,
Never to wake upon themselves again.

Robert Rorabeck

Emoting With No Tomb

Dashed in crippled sauces-
Doing the juvenile bliss, every word is
A miss throw,
The bases are loaded with lisp:
And I loved a green dragon fly on the areola
Of a charge-
Or it was a blue beamer tucked under the Olive groves,
The banshees mowed the seashore,
The anemones were claret and really poetic:
The selky taught all her boyish otters
The hook and the throw-
Going down to her was a long ways down to
Her,
And all over her other suitors were using motorized Vehicles; I guess being transcendental
Was a mistake-
That yellow snake in my soul hissed the phosphorous
Of pornographic technology-
The movie stars so beautiful all suped up with Scientology:
And by the time I got down to the last devilish ring,
It wasn't my name she was singing,
But I got to watch by the shore
As my uncle lectured-
I must have thought I was really clever-
I probably thought I would last forever; but then
They had to close her down,
And all the apples trucked away- and I grew a beard and Forgot who I was, ate bred with no mayonnaise;
Baudelaire laughed top court, flatulent in his sway,
But I didn't look up,
I could smell her perfumes all over his switch;
He, the grave, the plot who had beaten me forever
And disproved that I was of his family that should live
Forever,
But just the plastic flower that should swing in fits,
Without oils or insects of my own,
Just something gone along the trail,

Her pigtailed swung and boomed from
That venal master's lips-
Her echoes the crass bassoon, the teal persuaded;
And I was left emoting
With no tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

Emptied Glade

Raindrops in a tortoise's shell,
Overturned beside the road—no more little Souls inside of it,
And no reason to call this a soup of tears:
The wolves no longer give off colors,
Red or blue,
Going either way, and in their guts are no longer
Pinwheels—the sky is no longer brightened,
But neither is it afraid:
The gardens are not hidden—the waves lay where They are laid,
And the curtains open upon an emptied theatre,
And the sun opens upon an emptied glade.

Robert Rorabeck

Empty As A Loveless Heart

Dysfunctional as the fireworks burst over the Roadways of old epiphany,
The angels in lawn chairs painting their toes, their Glowing hair like weathervanes taking account
As the pussycats sleep
With the rattlesnakes whose wings and voices are Gone
In the theatre whose roof is as sharp as a house,
Underneath the Pleiades where the cars drive hopelessly,
And out into the be speckled yards where
Alma wears her miniskirts but not much else:
She herself is a star, and I am wounded in her brilliancy:
I am just a little boy lying low in gray headed make-believe:
I can rob bicycles, but there is nothing much else
I am good for,
While the moon grabs the brown marionettes and drags
Them across the glossy dews;
And the simulacrum up in its lofty room keeps on repeating
Its two or three things of thoughtless merit
To its weebegone room as beautiful and empty as a loveless Heart.

Robert Rorabeck

Empty Bottle

I throw my empty bottles down into the grave,
The shattered glass of a baby's cradle;
The things which always fall so far from trees:
The punji sticks are whispering,
Their cleft palates whistling in their orphanage
So far down below, where the quartet of my uncles sing
The stolen enjambments of the black men and their cottonmouths.
This is the pit where the hungry tigers prowl,
Disguised by a beautiful sky so far away-
The clouds are blooming to their orchestras,
And soldiers died in their campaigns are resurrected
As the birds who busy in their migrations:
This is the opera where she gypsies across the world,
And her footsteps are the weather which glazes the pots
Of men, the discombobulated crowd bumping together
In the trances of their empire; foolishly they fall
In love with her nude horizons,
The expulsions of nimble cannons in her storms,
The way she sheaths their eyes in her dewy draughts,
And swishes off the oriental perfumes of hidden spikenard;
Not meaning to lead them on, they fall for her anyways;
And now down in the pit we loom together like injure birds,
Fluttering against the tigers' smile,
As she sweeps across the lantern moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Empty Handed Pain

Airplanes fly low enough to hurt,
If I had a soul:
They trough right through the dirt,
They caracole the bitter fruits of Childhood stains-
Wherever I am going I have you on the Brain,
And not enough dirt to bury you,
Or to extol myself for the wounds I Always seem to bring upon my soul,
If I had a soul
And not just empty handed pain.

Robert Rorabeck

End This Nonsense

I weigh the same as a
Small planet.

Check to see if my hands
Are clean.

My mother's name is Janet—
Dusty and cold,
With only a dog walking
Around me.

If today was your birthday,
I'd sing you a song;
I'll sing you a song anyway

As I eat candy cars,
Because today I climbed
Molly's Nipple—

And looking down I could See all the way across the
World
Into your bedroom window,
As the breeze fluttered your Curtains,

You were sleeping with him
On your naked bosom,
But you were so
Lonely, my eyes could Tell,

The alphabet of my Name was stuck to the Red hinge of your lips,
Like buttered toffee,
My love,

I will fold myself up

In a paper ship,
And blow and blow
And blow,

To sail across sky and Interstates and
Into your window
I will not wake you up,
But rest my head on
Your unoccupied breast,

I will whisper happy birthday
On your lips,
I will fall asleep.

Robert Rorabeck

Ended

I pour liquor in my car for the last poem of evening:
I have no idea where my mother has gone,
Or why the wind is moaning; but the same old vicissitudes
Have out,
And beautiful women saddle up and ride their ponies:
Just as houses line up for a beautiful woman who is promising
Kisses,
And the sky is filled with runaways who have evaporated,
Who started out through high school but never finished;
And the baseball diamond is red and needing; it is the color of her
Birth stone that she is bleeding;
And she sleeps all day and wakes up in her bar; and she touches the Burly flesh of the men who control her fires, but she doesn't have To drive too far;
And this is the potency of high altitude bouquets drying on her lines,
Like the romances of fish fluttering on her vines;
And she is my venal muse, and she drives through the lushes of her Environments that I am trying to think up better names for;
And the fires burn beneath her, and my mother runs away:
And the city dries up like coral in the dusty bay:
And she rests her head in the beautiful beds of historical hotels that Seem so far, far away;
While the eels slither through the remains of her auburn hair
Caught up through the tangles in the sky- And she no longer wonders
If I should ever be her guy;
Because the city basks not so far beneath her, and there is so much variety
That she is happy with the stock by which she can pick and choose.

Robert Rorabeck

Ending It

To begin something is only to end it:
This love, this paper cut of an airplane in the sky:
To love a woman who you went to school with,
Who only remembers things clearly from
The first ten years of her life or So;
And that you gave her flowers and birthstones,
Because she was your first or second or Third obsession,
But always one of the best ones:
To receive three or so kisses from her:
Two on the neck, one on the lips; and then to never Hear from her again
Because you disappointed her fancy, while
She was looking away across the sea trying not to Get caught:
Disappointed her but not quite as much as you have Disappointed yourself or your mother;
Not quite as much as you would have disappointed
Her four children
Who are already hungry and waiting for her to feed them,
As you would have had her feed you; ending it,
With her lips, and eyes, and tongue.

Robert Rorabeck

Ending This Thing

I've drunken you to distill by
Unsober soul;
And nothing that I have is perfect,
And it is because I have no children-
All I have is my lonely song,
But for the last several days I have become finally
The budding thing, misspelling;
But finally, yes beautiful; and you know, I am over
Six feet tall- I am about as tall as your husband,
And I have so many things for you to use,
If you have a garden that needs tending,
And I know you have a garden-
You have a beautiful, anonymous garden-
And I've almost caught upon it,
And these words are sickly things, sickly birds,
I send out to you to play with your young child,
Cartoons, mobiles, entire airports:
don't see I am the alligator smiling at you from the Rippling shallows; it is a good thing to have death so Near to you,
To know that I am a pet for you,
That I will deliver your mail to you- Wherever you live
You know how faithful this mailman is;
And my sister is coming because it is her birthday,
So this evening I bought candles, and vanilla ice-cream,
And a bottle of cheap rum; but the bottle of cheap rum
That was just for me,
So that I might sing tonight for you;
That last stanza, a run on sentence, a nonsequitor,
An unapologetic romance, was just so that I might serenade
You; because I am not Shakespeare,
Because I am skipping school,
Even now leaping over crenulated canals filled with the ululations
Of approaching reptilian death,
To slip into auburn liquors atop of suburban roofs,
To shoot of fireworks underneath the blowing skirts of sky,
To be a teamster under you, to show you my teeth,
To worship you, the only religion I know how;
And your eyes are green and not unlike unmowed yards

I guess you've never seen,
Which, I guess, is how I'll choose to end this thing.

Robert Rorabeck

Enemies

A marvelous execution is coming today.
New boys are becoming men,
Though already their wives
Are taken by the enemy.
Newlyweds are introduced to shame.
Their children look backwards in the Polaroid
Impatiently waiting after school
For the beat up blue Chevy to get off work.
How long can they crouch down
So their schoolmates cannot see.
In the living rooms of shadowed latchkeys
The pallid microwaves bake their dinner,
While I've secretly been seeing a friend of yours.
What would you say if I wanted
To make a museum of our love?
Before the honeymoon, it was all over.
The enemies took us away, and made us enemies.

Energy Left Over

Each of us is the decaying
Static of the initial Action each of us is Resonating outward from
The center a metamorphosis
Of the first energy
The great fucking bang
That explodes in Us still
Reverberating to a point of Singularity we are a
Defined to return to
And though our Decadal ideologies
Tell us we can do
Great things with our minds
And our morality plays warn us
That we get to choose
Our black and white
Paths there is not
A single one of us
Who can step beyond
That sufficient energy
That is not just inside us
But the wave and hum
That we are still resonating
Busily outward
From the center not knowing
How quickly we are to Collapse back into the Great black pit
Where those nothing dogs
Nip and gnaw our bones
As they are destined to
So are we predestined
To live upon the line
That we are space and
Time stretched out from
The center and us a

Manifestation of that initial Incredible action we are Going nowhere but outward
In our decaying energy
We scream for Personal freedom
Lost to our society
And all of this still
Only a desperately
Kicking wave of red shift
Shooting outward all
Of us God's first Breath
And with inhalation
Eternal death
Forever until God breathes us
Again.

Enjoying The Game

Estranged here—feeling alright—passed out underneath the Overpasses of another country—as the girl you love,
Pretending to be a stewardess, checks in her dolls:
And you can pretend at making love in a little House you paid for with cash at the end of a cul-de-sac
In Saint Augustine when your dreams were just a few years old:
Can't you remember: how the stewardesses leapt and leapt,
And the frog princes sang and sang, and your face became More and more beautiful, until all that you knew became a Tourist attraction—another place to attenuate and enjoy the Light, after the Indians were vanquished—
And the ice-cream had all melted into your refrigerator that Never worked even though you were all that was beautiful—
And the conquistadors came home to your forts, furrowing their Crosses like tourists and other worldly passengers who Kept themselves so busied at enjoying the game.

Robert Rorabeck

Enough

I can hear the arcades down the street,
And even the crickets are purring:
Wherever I am jumping cars, wherever there comes Rainstorms,
The crickets are purring- Crickets you have never heard;
And birds on power lines you've Never seen, because you've never lived where I have been,
And I have only lived at night,
And seen so many things you've never seen,
But you get the gist and you can tell some fortunes by my scars,
Though you haven't seen me since the fairgrounds in Florida,
I imagine that you might believe in at least some of my scars:
And the patrons move in and mill about,
And the pregnant mothers lean far over and it seems as if They might shoplift,
And you have little plastic cowboys and Indians where you
Live,
And maybe some cats- and a husband who always looks nice,
And a child at his hip;
And it really doesn't seem awfully fair,
Though the dreams spin around alike, and people bicycle and Bobsled wherever they are, even if you or I haven't seen them,
We can ask the very same moon who reigns over all of these Chain restaurants and colleges,
And make-believe romances, and she will kiss us just the same
With her equal glows, and we can get the gist,
And be pulled by her like two waves trying to fight it out
And that is really all we can ask for,
And it might just be enough.

Enough To Use

Basically I just did this for you, Erin:
I just got so drunk that I lost the most beautiful poem about
You again,
And this isn't even Disney World, and ah-ha, I am going out
Again jus to be getting drunk again;
And you wouldn't even believe me, what I just lost for you:
How I enjoy ice cream in jaundice and in address
For you;
And now all of the old amusements have played out,
And even Miguel has left my house alone, because I couldn't Even drive, because I was too drunk to Chauffer for him,
For his dinner;
And now I am stranded in a spook house; and now I am too
Drunk for you to even care about me;
And now your mouth is watering, so soon I must garden it;
But remember, Erin, you are just my venal muse,
And if I wasn't just enough beautiful for you, I wouldn't Have to change costumes, but I am otherwise
Beautiful enough for you: but now I have to laugh,
Because my mother doesn't even recognize who you are,
Or who I am; and like I said, I am just a pet cemetery so easily
Petted for my venal muses:
And once again I have lost everything to you, and I am
Just the experience of tomorrow, just another film that you Cannot even wake up early enough to use.

Enough Riches For The Both Of Us

Where the car has gone away—taking the hands that Hold her breathing—
Taking her children up the road and into the orange trees—
To sleep underneath some basking moon,
As my moaning comes like terrapin out of my body's Shell—
That I am dust underneath a race horse—and I cannot see Where the metamorphosis bathes around the knees of Cypress:
And there is an absolute glitter in the slowness that the Alligators drink, hungry-throated—holding their breath,
Swallowing enough riches for the both of us.

Robert Rorabeck

Entangled As The Snowflakes

Soft and as entangled as the snowflakes of Siamese twins who have been Weeping upon the subzero playgrounds
So much that they've become stuck to Themselves
Underneath the graveyards and the ufo's—
While the dog in his silence
Remembers how he could not sleep,
As some lady in the cloud banks above him
Could never chastise him for how he could Never weep—
And the moon peaked out over the bible
Belt of America
While the housewives, unbelievably,
Could never think of slaughtering themselves—
As the golden chains which held the Titans
Ran down the embankments
As the alligators who always were,
Who even saw me kissing and congratulating
With a Mexican housewife who Could never be my girlfriend,
Farted and came all over themselves.

Entering (The Shift)

I look down from
The red balcony,

Oh,
So red!

The masked assassin
Spies his mark,
The lovers lie naked in blood.

The stage is open
Under the trees,

Even the aspens are naked
Shedding golden coins,
Blanketing the coyote's skin
The blue ants are feasting....

I must hurry into work,
For the world is about to Enter a tunnel:
And blind, and blind....

The pressures are growing distant:
There is blue

(when she comes near)

And there is red,

(when she walks away)

Both of them entering blindly

Forward and away
The motion of the azure sea
And the crimson tide:
Rapidly

A Cadillac
A shoe,
A crab scuttles before the sea.
The only sea.
The sea,
Pulling back its Curtains
Reveals her slender leg
Rippling over the earth....

Entire Apple Orchards

In the middle of high school
I used to leave classrooms—I used to leave
Right out of school
And flop and drink right beside the waves—
Seahorses teaming from some anonymous
Father's liquor cabinets—
The sun a stream of pugilists, beating me until
I was stinking of nocturnal perfume:
What a way to live—
Little children at my door—entire apple orchards:
Now I am a teacher—
The sky cries in the afternoon on weekends
While I drink—
The eyes of Dr. TJ Eckleburg are in the room.
My Mexican uncle just sold his truck
And his son and nephews are over celebrating.

Entire Orchard Of Things That Are Lost

If there was a turtle sitting there
Slanted into the canal my mother dove into-
Could I ask him where she fled
Off to, the house wanting to follow her-
The car in the carport,
The laundry in the laundry machine missing her:
She fled,
And left the smell of the orange blossoms, and the Screams of the neighbor girl being molested
While we all drank beer and listened until Later when the goldfish sank,
And when the cats were making love: I was too
Young to skip school, so I rode with father down Into Miami and we picked fruit out of Boxes and spoke nothing of how she could
Have disappeared in the shallow murk:
She once showed me the tadpoles metamorphosing
In there, a green bathtub-
And when she took me home we ate apples with My sisters off of dinner plates- but now
She is gone into that pool in which the stars have No reflection, but down there I can see
Stolen bicycles and the statuarities of moribund alligators-
An entire orchard of things that are lost which now
Belong to her.

Entire Planet Of Venal Wildflowers

Jingoistic prisons- I love you in suave deserts,
I misspell you and undress you and wait for you to Emerge with the drowned golfers from
The alligators beds- gurgling your putrescent snows:
And if I happen to always get you mostly wrong,
Be kind to me on the rack- Make the pleasure last
For the loneliness is grander than the Sahara desert:
Let her taste her wines up there, gurgling in a swooning
Hillside of opalescent rubrum,
Let her ride her stellar tortoises in wild abandon,
And give me new cruxes to be a thief under the nocturnal
High-school scars, the ghostly corsages of prom:
And let the entire country pullulate like an antonymous worm
Twined with all of the dead king's men like Christmas ornaments in balmy July in trailer parks and Tennis courts and little white lies-
Let the fireworks be duds like impotent penmanship,
And the roofs cave in- or the entire carnival turn off amidst Gyrations over the sticky sweet pine trees,
Let the joggers undress and be undone- let hot air and weather
Balloons despair and grow envious of commercial airliners
Because of their heathenish long legged stewardesses;
Isn't it like Mars, the things I say- dealt with and now certainly Obsolete- and a swing set some how got there and never Experienced the oxygen of her jubilee's anatomy,
And thusly the Grand Canyon is an ant lion crevice a place too Infinitesimal for dye cast cars to die when put up against That delinquent fathomless, her body's sweet residue
The eerie squeezes of an entire planet of venal wildflowers.

Robert Rorabeck

Entirely Undone

The prettiest séances are in her eyes and all of The piñatas are in the back yards where her young boy
Michael goes;
And we divide ourselves by the sun and the shadows:
And made love on Tuesday,
And kissed on Wednesday, and I held her knee for awhile, today:
But now she is back in the home underneath the franchises of Stars, in the home her father has promised her, but she can never Pay off:
And when we made love together, she told me that she loved me,
But the night is so loud and diademed by the careless airplanes
And the hurricanes that are sure to come with her maiden name,
Whose pirouetting can be seen from outer space;
While all of these words are harmful, they are so careless:
And she is nearly naked and into his arms again:
She falls this way, the same way rockets and space shuttles
Fail:
She passed through the frontera with love on her mind, and soon
Had her first son into Florida, and across the backyards so akin
To mine, but which I had never thought to explore;
And all of my words are wounded, and they are falling from
The majesty of the sky; and my parents aren't even barely alive anymore,
And my dogs are far away:
Stanzas don't exist, and school carries on: there are only licensed
Paths over water;
And she falls asleep, her beautiful body cradled into that mess of a Misallocated Mexico; and I have tried so very hard for her,
My Alma, my soul, but it cannot be said that anything that I have done
Is so finely said as not to be entirely undone.

Robert Rorabeck

Entombed

My love returns to nothing.
Dead relatives place black tulips on My living tomb, as her eyelids flap like ravens
Around the branches of another man—
She is hung on him, like a horse-thief
On a bough he's sentenced on, the engraved Strangulation of one heart distracted for
A lifetime— When there are many numbers
Which might lead me down streets coated
With the trails she leaves, they are the Mathematics of men already dead,
Haunting the sunny crypts of married
Women, their souls dredging the deepest Bottoms, perpetually looking upwards
Toward the faintest light she casts down
Carelessly, the parts she casually sheds
Like the blushing skin of a reptilian bride,
Blinding manna settling before them,
The thoughtless material they use to Entomb their mortally wounded hearts.

Eras Of Soldiers

Eras of soldiers lining the highways like billboards—
Beautiful delusions in their gears of playgrounds.
And I amidst the tourists of cars—
Waiting for my wife to give birth to our
Half-blood baby,
Waiting for a sign to beckon from the barbed wire
Of constellations—
Something to correct the sense of beauty—
A child who knows how to piece together the Pieces of a china heart:
There is a long roadway from his atrium—
See him fitted in strides inside his mother's Womb:
See now he has no problem:
He is in a little village. He is in a neon tomb—
He who knows no words I speak of,
Knows better ways of expressing the warm
Night of his heaven's cocoon- -
Enjoying the festoons of his egg-yoke Christmas—
Soon he will be outside—
And he will know lions. I will want to drink for Him—I will want to bring his china-doll fingers
Up to caress these scarred billboards
And ask him who he will be fighting for Now that he has stepped into a bigger tomb.

Erin

Should I try to write you a sonnet
Named after you—I believe I have Done that before, but it only made you
Concerned, so your fingers crawled away
From a keyboard that sometimes would speak
With me. If I told you I loved you, would that cause
You to pack up and drive five states further Away, to begin to scr-w a new man just Because you couldn't understand why it
Was I loved you? Should I need a reason to Say the reasons for the things that I do,
But if I can't stand now, will it be okay for Me to dropp to my knees and ask you to marry me,
If only to rest by your head breathing on our pillow?
I have now had a desire to taste you for over a decade,
And the least you can say is okay, you can Dine on me unprotected for one night, even if you don't Know the real reason why my parents gave me
My name. Blinded by the fury of the world,
I have followed you like a dog who smells the Unexpected blossoms in a hidden glade he comes upon
Which jogs by him with a night decorated in your legs.
If I love you, so what? If I love you, need there
Be a reason? Let us pay the man, and ride on that together.
There you are, the ripeness of life
Strung on the tree where you live, being plucked
By invisible gentlemen who will never see you. If I have Known anything, it is my love for you. If I have seen
Anything in this life's starless night, it was your face
Adorned by lips who spoke my name and kissed my neck.
For 2 years, you have kicked and neglected me, because you Didn't like the way I crawled up beside you when you
Were expecting someone else. I won't even send you
This now, because you will say that I've been drinking,
And shake your head even though secretly you want
To believe me. Instead, I will wait outside your door
And hope that you will find me early in the morning,
And let me in before anyone else sees, to sleep naked
With you and your dog. There, before the sun becomes

Fully reborn, we might share secret sips on Shakespeare,
And we can begin to sell each other on the names of Our children, if you aren't so frightened when I tell you I have no other reasons for loving you
Other than you will always be beautiful and
You know my name.

Escribiendo Telemundo

My mother's tear rags are all but used up,
Father is at the auction buying used horses,
But the South Florida Fair isn't here for another Month: I won't be around to flip around then:
I will be back under her shadow where the aspens Crowd in a cool harem, where my dogs leap and Lick my face, showing that they defer to my Dominance, and I feed them double-cheese burgers
In kind:
Now, my scars grow like briars and thistles,
And the traffic bustles with the insouciant whim
Of gallantly saturated capitalism: I read a book by Randy Wayne Write and try to fit in, a grown up boy's Wet dream, la de da, and other notes that take the Afternoon to plink down the keys, to disappear into Basalt and a lime grove which only existed many yesterdays:
They have cleaned up Military Trail, and put the working Girls out of business, but I have some sort of rash Making vulgar continents on my belly, and I'm trying To reserve my savings: I gather nickels and buy a
Chocolate bar for dinner, just like Bukowski,
Just like the old kraut but not as exacting; and the traffic
Rushes back and forth disproving Presocratic philosophies:
I don't care. I've only had five bottles of rum all year,
And I still might think of her more than she does of me,
But what holistic remedies enter me like slender ghosts serve
My mealtimes of writing well; and still, there are people
Going their wheres on their withers, and my ex-lover polishes
Her super-saturated lawyer with the talent of an industrial Paint brush, while I have a manuscript in print she will never Read, and such irony lays fat and salty upon the curling Tongues of heedless waves as they are introduced to the Soundlessness of her shore: hushed there, they dissolve
At her touch, and disappear forever like everyone,
Like this poem.

3: 13 PM

The sea besides the castle shook for her
And I drank a lot.
The pilots sang for their mermaids. They took Their planes diving for her,
And their passengers turned green,
Singing and holding their breath for her-

The sky spumed, the clouds ejaculating as fireworks-
They were showing off for her-
As the last of the titans kidnapped stewardesses from Airplanes and married them:

I told my children bedtime stories about her,
Just as my father told me stories about the feral boys
Raised by the badgers themselves trained by her:

By the age of twelve, I sold fireworks in Miami for My father
Who himself was working entirely in servitude for her.

In the mirages of daylight,
Along the franchised strip,
The streets sweated for her, turning into teenagers
Who committed suicides for her-
And I called her up and I hopped on stage for her:

I sold for her- naked
Before the stars and dinosaurs,
Barefooted in the strawberry fields,
She stepped down from the castle:

A muse on a geometric waterfall besides the watermelons
And the centipedes
And the narcoleptic unicorns-

The shaggy man covered in locks of blonde crawled
Out from beneath the courtyard of that old high-school
And danced in courtship of her

I ran away from home and achieved the highest Scores in the arcades for her:
I ran all night for her,
Past the nocturnal graveyards and the all night drive in Movie theatres for her-

I smelled her sweat pattered like the homeopathy
Of the coldest holidays, as chameleons shed their Technicolor skins in the daylights on the popcorn rocks
For her-

And turned into a cenotaph in homage hunting in
The waves for her-

I saw her today. The prettiest thing from Haiti.
34 years old, building a trailer to sell things in underneath
The bridges. She spent $150 dollars on me
And laughed and talked about a thousand false things
Before she went away and I started once again
To mind my own business-

And now that I am done- and it is a holiday: President's Day-
During these hopeless hours the young queens of Mexico are being Sent home to be re united with the graves of their grandmothers-
I can lie down underneath of a highway and pretend it is A beautiful meadow:

And with my eyes closed, I hear my son say that you are perfect
And I know that he too is talking about her.

Robert Rorabeck

Estuaries Of Forget

Lay with me like trysts of gold and I will forget who
I am or that I ever loved Alma,
And we will hold hands and drink the sad breath of the Ceiling fans:
And nothing at all will be sold: all of the out of Work prisons will clammer and din:
And when I look into her eyes tomorrow at the fruiteria,
Hopefully I will not be so easily trapped in,
While her husband calls her and she has to get up and look
Away,
As the airplanes fart and then attack each other on the Nose bleeding planes,
Making us feel intimidated and threatened, while
The bums beat each other for quarters on the street corners Underneath the red lights of the little girls who have Forgotten who they are,
Who are so insatiably hard at working to forget into the Deeper and deeper estuaries of forget.

Robert Rorabeck

Eternal Sleep

Salmon spawn and die somewhere else
Far above my head and across the canal:
And I've worked all day, and have a nice tan.
The Mexicans don't look at me funny,
And they call me primo- The gringos still stare;
Their eyes are blue and wet like frightened
Newborns, and they are growing bald.
The traffic rounds and moans,
While I drink one hundred proof bourbon and Prepare to read Lorca, to watch after all the open
Balconies out past the lime groves in Madrid,
The hidden continents of Roman platoons,
And the rocky clefts like open breasts entombed
By the cursive winds; the pensive scribes who Behold the oldest of seas, their expensive fraternity
Shipwrecked on her left collar-bone, the patio
Of the outdoor restaurant in North Central Florida
Where I walked to buy books that were on sale;
Pensively, still searching for her, and she recalled my Name and migrated towards me the few steps it took To imprint her species upon my neck. Now the Recreational vehicles sink from the procreation of Intelligent cockroaches, but even they are crooning her Name: And we sing to her, even tonight under the Tangled nets of power lines, a book with Lorca's
Poetry in both Spanish and English next to my hip.
Tucked away, a book I have written, and still Further off, pink-bellied but persistent, swim the Other things I would give into her before eternal sleep.

Europa And Ganymede

Spending so much time
Going home to hide—to stare out of the jaded zoetrope
Of the window
At the housewives returning home—spinning in Cadaverous fits—legs turning on and off—
Like the jubilescent
Lights of any fun-time Ferris Wheel—
While the sea-clouds blew across the finest strands of Land—and puffed themselves across the armpits
Of the mermaids,
As the peacocks laid down to roost with the conquistadors—
Into a silent blow- job—
As the trees held their crooks up to the moon
Who turned them in
Until they turned silver and played themselves over and over Again in the wishing well of a movie theatre—
Like at any lunch room in any high school—
Lonely, silent kids looking off into the Scandinavian bone structures—
Counting off all that they could for themselves—
While the werewolves hunted underneath the moon
And over-ripened orchards -
And the marionettes plucked themselves from the violin's
Vineyard—
And life was discovered on Ganymede and Europa at the same time.

Euthanasia Of Airplanes

After the failing loom of dusk,
Crepuscule,
Soft smotherer of parks and waves,
Eventually bedrooms—
Blindness of the common sense
Puts the common man to sleep
And everyone else
Inside houses
Cats and dogs—
Lovers left to swim in minds alone.
No more emollitions underneath the sun.
The soft thief of the night is out.
You know who she is
And the mind, having no more sense
Of its own,
Cannot even command you to hold
Hands with the ones you know,
The insincere strangers
You are attached to;
But in her beauty floats, perpetually hovering—
Kite of balled snakes
Each with a venom of a planet,
This euthanasia of airplanes trusts us all
To be infatuated with the veneer of closed parks.
Paper airplanes sleeping and spit upon by Wasps,
Impervious to the tiny thrill of their thoraxes—
Like cloth dolls hung upon by wolves—
I love you now,
Stranger, thief,
Planet made of wax alight by one candle.

Evaporating Back To Homes

Transoms moving on fieldtrips, like sororities of Open rooms
Going underneath the pool hall of sky- going at a clip so near
The shallow waters, as if to be partaking in a heady
Honey moon:
And the little children riding in their cars watch the waters fall
As well,
Falling like themselves, collecting and then evaporating back up
To homes I am not even sure it is possible to believe in.

Robert Rorabeck

Evaporation

Divine providence, a prostitute for a month,
And seven kids,
A lucky number: The hours spend to lunch
And fornication,
Moving through the motion pictures of our nation;
And when once it gets cold,
It freezes; and I can't look at my face-
I can't do most things anyways. Even in school I couldn't Spell,
And I was always the tremulous procrastination following
The tardy bell-
I experienced a certain noirish- vertigo while copying
My rushed plagiarism of her eyes.
Then I stood up and masturbated to the pledge of allegiance-
Out in the laundry mat of the student parking lot,
I followed the suave tortoise to its narcoleptic victory;
I.E. I slept underneath the mortally wounded bus:
I failed PE;
But despite all of this I loved her throughout the trials and tribulations:
The blue-jay eyed bully who pummeled me in the gut
With her inky quills, her tomahawk sensation when I saw her out
In the playground's field kissing other swells against their Wills,
Until she drifted away and found the poor sap she would marry;
And I sort of drifted after her, like a mollusk dried out of its Shell, a stage of evaporation of the sky,
Not in any noticeable sort of hurry.

Even A Ladder Needs Its Fireman

Everything is at its finest, so worry.
In the groving rows the pits are buried deep to Hurry;
And the lion has no need to count,
The clouds in the sky don't want to hunt:
And the movies are on television,
The finest vestibules of our species who couldn't Lift a gun to save themselves.
The wedding bands, so soft and smooth,
Are lost to the ocean's sales.
All the pretty wives are hapless in their kitchens.
The kittens in their pails;
And when I lived next to you, I lived so far away from
You;
But now that I don't know where we are,
Are we so close that I can close my eyes as you orgasm,
As your man touches you like butch-fisted bouquets,
And you squint your eyes trying to make out who
He really is.
And your daughter is building sandcastles in the grave.
Even a fireman needs to save a kitten from its Tree every now and then,
Even a ladder needs it fireman.

Even After You Have Gone

Horses in the shadow of a cross
As it begins to rain-
And my parents are somewhere
(Maybe in Spain)
And you are somewhere.
Where are you? But don't look
Behind us, my dear,
Because the waves have taken the Evidence of our time together
Away-
We were together yesterday,
But not today-
How I long for you, I cannot say-
Because everything we knew about
Each other we have cast
Away- but there remains a Ferris
Wheel in my heart for you-
And it keeps a light for you even
After you have gone,
And reciprocates through the memories,
As it rains softly over the emptiness
You have left in my body
As you have gone- The rain continues
Whispering to the echoes of you
Rippling in my hidden lawn-
Where I lay naked waiting for you,
Expectantly, even after you have gone.

Robert Rorabeck

Even As It Flies

My body sweats inside of new junctures:
All of your life swimming in the banishing ambers of
The rivers that no longer move:
Alma, I have had dreams of Guerrero where you lived, where You come from,
Where no Romans ever conquered, and I have had fits and fought
Vampires for you
Alma, even while you were with your husband and your sisters
And your children
At the movies, and I was at my teachers house, and the palm trees
Rose like little boys who had Survived plane crashes; and all of it was so sweet, like Christmas trees who stay up all year:
And I hope I still know you come Christmas time,
Alma, because I want you to work my cash register, so I can still See down the slender avenues of your luscious
Tributaries,
Calling you up and calling you down, even though we are so far beneath
The mountains
Alma, even though I am making no money with your eulogies:
I can hardly walk, Alma; and my jaw is wired Shut- I have been through so many plane crashes and accidents,
And maybe you thought that I was beautiful once before,
Just as you thought that your husband was beautiful once before,
But cant you hear me calling to you now,
Alma- like the castaway wish down at the bottom of the evil well:
Alma,
Alma, I will live forever because of my words of love for you:
Don't you wish to live forever, because I can happily step aside
And offer up my spot for you on my airplane
That is always burning even as it flies.

Robert Rorabeck

Even As They Fly

My soul beat through the schoolyard:
Soul,
Frightened rabbit as the stewardesses flew:
And I wondered,
What were the colors of their toenails,
As they flew:
But they had their colors, and their perfumes:
They flew above all the tender heads
Of the school yard,
As they flew strange goddesses of escaped
Domesticity,
Like waves in church where will they Go now as the students leave,
As the traffic coalesces what mystery of things
Changing just to go back home
While the women up there fly across the ocean,
Taking with them the theft of their hearts:
See how they metamorphosis while
The children go home
I expect that they change colors even as they fly.

Even As We Said Our Goodbyes

She told me if the world had to end
She'd move to Mars;
And I didn't know what she was telling me,
Because I was too intoxicated from her
Sex:
She lay spread red delicious rump on the same
Old bed;
But she was telling me something significant,
How she could stand her ground with a switch blade
Knife,
And then shop the town:
She had four children, all of them good and Conceived outside Mr. Roger's Neighborhood;
And yet there was something of the unreal in her eyes,
And I stared at them as long as I could
Even as we kissed and said our goodbyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Before Men Learned How To Fly

An empty crib at me feet,
A bottle in my lips—
And it is time to hear my dog breathing,
My wife lost in the other room
Of the tiny yellow house,
Her mind still speaking mandarin
As it always will,
But the oily haunts of the daylight gone—
The illusions of the sun light's architectures
Sunken into the other side of
The vanished swings—
And I have grey hair, and yet I can
Dance like a little boy—
All over the stage of the graveyard
As it pretends to appreciate me—
And the illusions I give of beauty,
Like fireworks lit off before the teaming eyes
Of foxes who want to drink all of
The time, even before Rome—
And I imagine one fox crying there,
Weeping at the foot of Calvary
Up to the vineyard that he was supposed to Believe in even before men learned
How to fly.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Higher

I have sung you into being through my little doors
Of glass,
As it was butterflies that I had tamed and taught how to Walk and dance,
And I blow away the hopes of dandelions using the lips
Of my mind,
Like you blew out the candles on your birthday cake
You had not so long ago
At supper time
When the world was young and new and so many waterfalls
Yet did fall,
And smoked and gleamed their destroyed reasons straight back
Up through a world kaleidoscoped with prism,
Like a mess of promises from god,
And I laid you down on a matted bed of your favorite color
And made love to you
Alma, while the fish leapt and leapt even higher.

Robert Rorabeck

Even If I Call Again

Shallow wounds, I know you are here, and I know
I can't win - cadaver with a bouquet of roses, you will Go home and home and home to Him,
Going through the rainstorms and underneath the overpasses.
This is just my sad nocturnal memory for you:
You live across the railroad tracks, or in another world,
While Saturn has all of her rings,
As you sometimes wear the rings I bought for you from
The sunshine flea market- Don't worry, my scars
Will heal even as my heart fails and they may bury Me with the nameless prostitutes underneath the roses
Smelled by all of the tourists: this is just my thing
As the gardens open up a store of stolen jubilee to The rain,
And you smile through the afternoons like a creature burning
At the seams who is lighter than air, but will never come
Even if I called again.

Robert Rorabeck

Even If No One Would Listen

If I could tell you how beautiful she was
You would never believe me:
You whose language knows my tongue, but I try to Sing her up every morning anyways:
How she never had to finish school to be everything more
Than beautiful,
Even while we were truants, or even when I found myself
Alone under the emptied school buses:
And all of those houses were occupied by us like the Lightest of tombs,
And the airplanes sparkled and the pools were chalices
For diamonds;
But neither of us can know the real meaning of this muse,
Because she was birthed in the Boundaries of other throats, where strange birds gossip
While brown babies are being born
In the hurried fronts of dying mariposas whose Glorious poisons accumulate across the rugs of The bosque;
Even though I have cupped a hand across her unclothed boundaries;
And I have inhaled the ovoid hallucinations of her oasis:
Even today while her children wait for her back on Cherry Road,
Alma came over, and I tried to sing for her a crude mirror of The beings of her soul;
And she was my muse, and I made love to her,
Even if no one would listen.

Robert Rorabeck

Even If She Said Yes

Bicycles of little boys trick or treat all day,
Trick or treat all year:
I happen to think about the blond headed mother who Came in one or two days ago:
If she comes back I will ask her out and it will be
The first date I've been on in seven years-
And I plan to take her to walmart to buy bicycles and Then drive off with her near the sea,
And ditch the car- and just ride bicycles with her for Our first date- If we have to, I would take her to A really nice restaurant;
And if I have to, I'd buy her a whole bunch of corpulent
Flowers-hyacinths and whatnots,
But I'd rather steal them from all the insouciant though
Comely gardens of suburbia;
And now it's not even ten o'clock and there's not Even a customer,
And the clouds are just visible though it being well past
Crepuscule, and I am the only man alive,
And she is the only woman alive- and we are tremulous
In our gardens of plum tree and spikenard;
And if there was a second date, I'd take her to Atlantis
And practice the forgotten art of roller-skating,
And make heaven a place on earth-
But I doubt it's there anymore-
Even if she said yes.

Robert Rorabeck

Even If They Cannot Fathom Me

If I am going to die by your inclination,
At least make it as beautiful as a drive in movie
Or a wheel barrow
Out in the open summers, and their seasons:
And then the weathers who are without Reason,
Because your name is Alma and you are my muse,
And certainly I will love myself and my possessions and Travel alone and nameless for you,
And this is but only the beginning of my declination,
Just as the waves hustle over the infinite sea of Nameless heroes:
And I love you; and I love you, like an echo who can't Even love me,
And I've got your back, and I love your fathomless
Eyes,
Alma- even if they cannot fathom me.

Robert Rorabeck

Even If They Never Make It

Broken, and the children are moving home now
Like snails through a forest ruined
By fire: and someone is shouting,
And someone is pointing out,
But gold hangs in the trees: at first it looks like Serpents hanging there,
But it is some other tale- infatuated and fanciful;
And the crowds gather and dress up and go to Dances:
It almost feels alright to believe again, that your Loved ones are coming home,
And even if they never make it there, at least they Are thinking of you.

Robert Rorabeck

Even More Esoteric Rose

Bushels full of fireworks in the dirty keys of Love:

I am no longer beautiful, but I still send out my doves;
And you are perfect in your rain or in your shadows,
While all the pretty knights compete for you
In all their pretty battles;
And one has taken you to his house, and kissed your hand
And spun you like hot glass in the fires of a bedroom's hearth:
He has figured out exactly how to spread your worth;
While I am but a disqualified pugilist weeping gore-faced
Under the bus
While all of the other kids are enjoying their high-schooled lunch;
And they are looking up into your eyes:
Sea green or sky blue, and they are following in love with you;
But you don't know exactly yet what you need to do,
And each day comes and each day goes, and you grow into an Even more esoteric rose,
Spreading thimble-tongued in secret estuaries, and cloistered
Basins where the sun burns down on you, giving you your dunness
To which you fill your enthusiastic young.

Robert Rorabeck

Even More Lines For The Sacrificial Untouchables

I've used too many words-
I just wanted to recreate the sun, burnished
And tan, over your sweet swing-set,
I wanted to be your man,
And make up for my scars, my undefined chest
I could open up to show you the glass-blown
Gifts of who you really are,
But I've said too much- I've become lost in The third fitt of this modern fairy-tale-
Who are you really? I won't tell,
And all the flowers are beautiful in the meadow,
Like Catholic candles lit for mass-
Though they might now be dancing, they will Soon blow out, but even then
You are my Jesus, and I'd drive all day for you,
And write down the exegesis of your thighs, underlining
Our children, spit on my palm,
If that was how it was really meant to be,
But I don't believe you- your hair is as auburn and Waverly as a drunken wave- If you are not a mischievous
Otter in your sweet and alcoholic habitat showing off
For ever boy,
Your thighs tight and gripping the bicycle's seat,
Then you are the naiad of some seven seas, a tall drink
Of water, a wedding gown flowing down into the other
Man's lap, delighting in the breathlessness of my pain-
I can even see you now, and how your gaze burns healthily
Nocturnal and satanic,
I wanted to love you and live forever swinging like a
Gleeful censer in your nipples park, but you are not my kind
Stewardesses- With your knives, you cutpurse,
Didn't you only want to come and delight over
The wound you carved and salted.

Robert Rorabeck

Even More Than I Believe

Forecasting this usual loneliness,
So easily displaced into trailer parks where there
Is just this one trailer,
And all these slash pines and the stone nests of Rattle snakes:
All the lucky rabbits feet are gone,
As my feelings have gone for you, like the hero
At the end of the movie;
Like the beauty in your amber face being bled over
By your lovers candles;
I am not sure of anything, but airplanes have perfect
Armpits:
I have stepped through the stone archways of many Vanished Indians, hearing the myth of Custer Translated from their victorious lips, and all my will Was lost.
I was sold as a slave across the mid-western states-
I passed beneath a better muse in Colorado, and eventually Was reunited with Mexico City,
Like a monarch butterfly; but in the morning I will never Get back to Spain: My aunt who took me there is still Gone, even though she is living;
And there are so many fine houses across the canal
Where all of my old classmates are sleeping, wavering like
A mass of candles on the mowed waves;
But all of their women are occupied, all of their fireworks up
On Saturdays of roofs, all of their paper airplanes folded Into nodding beds: All the ivy is stretched up to the Titans and their heads,
And she is in love and not coming down not even for all
My sacrifices of baby's breath; because she is never there,
Even though I wish even more than I believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Even She Didn'T Taste As Sweet

Proper English of pronouns sleeping homes in the Parks,
Indistinguishable johns resting their sooty foreheads
On gravestones in the darks:
And I have loved you right here, which isn't very far:
And I have sat and inhaled you in your car,
As just today, this morning in fact, I lay on a bed with You and it too seemed to levitate:
You handled my rope trick and I rose my far and ancient Friends from your declivities:
I have bought you birthday cake, Alma,
But even she didn't taste as sweet.

Robert Rorabeck

Even The Abyss Of The Hereafter

Daylight troubles the mouth of the wolf
Or my mother—
And I get drunker and drunker—
It seems to last forever—
The bouquets of fireworks of my past years—
And my hearts that have had to surrender—
In this place where the real lions live—
And the poems that keep getting spread out and spread
Out like stories for a dollar underneath the overpasses—
Underneath whatever it is that is finally defeated—
Moonbeams and crossbeams
And the epaulets of wire and telekinesis—
It is not as much a shadow show as it is for puppets—
And the daylight surrenders to the kidnappings of rounded Corners—of libraries that have shut down—and Hallucinations that go into hibernating at the day-barks
And the ballparks while you kiss the armpits of your sister—
And the daylight—and the daylight—
And the amulets reflecting off her—if this was a stage
Then it would be filled with the echoes and the echoes of laughter
But this is not even an amusement park anymore—
And there is not even enough to pay my passage way into the abyss
Or even the abyss of the hereafter.

Robert Rorabeck

Even The Poorest Thing

I look at you and I want to kill gods;
And I do. I get them drunk in their Christmas
Tree trailer parks,
And I cut their throats and coyotes lay off the Neighborhood cats,
And come loping, telling jokes in a lappy
Drum circle around that immortal wine;
And I really do love you,
And to prove that you are mine, I shoot the eyes
Out of commercial airplanes with my BB gun:
And the stewardesses scream until the young
Boys leap up and French-kiss them,
And they go to sleep across the spotless canal,
Where alligators like grandmothers watch over
Them forever, forever,
In the beds of conquistador metal which can never Be unproven;
And I sleep with my good side turned to you,
Because I am always afraid that you might care;
But I never let go off your finicky palm,
And we jog together around intercostal golf
Courses landscaped in spikenard and palm;
And I should be delivering these blue letters of other
Lovesick men, to pay for our dinner of bread and gin;
But instead I just keep slipping my words through thin air,
Folded in the eye of a misconceived hurricane,
Hoping you'll believe even the poorest thing is rare.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Though

Emolliating in the soft green prejudices
That I cannot understand,
And everyday awash underneath the mountain
With even the swiftest of arrows embedded into
The deepest wounds
Already cut from the cultivated forest of Fruit trees
Falling down- and little feral girls have bruised
Their elbows
And broken their favorite heirlooms and the lonely
Devices that flash all night
Trying to be saved by the fireworks who themselves
Are dying;
And it feels so far away, even as the trailer parks
Slumber,
And the beautiful angels are looking so good even Though they are holding their breath,
And even though they are not real.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Though I Know

The forts are crawling with delusion and with the Spent fireworks of where we don't belong,
Though Alma called me twice today over the insouciant waves:
She wants new breasts: she shaves,
And soon it will be Christmas and I will absolutely have to
By her something.
By all of this writing I feel like I have come to know myself,
And I have discovered the misplaced parks of my childhood,
Near the ocean and the restored school houses,
Though it still doesn't feel right to be here,
Or to be believing in all of the little things I happen to believe:
I don't want to see movies anymore,
For they remind me of her perfect life, and the other nicknames
I have cultivated for her,
Even though I know that she does not love me.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Though We Both Yet Breathe

Laughing cenotaph: good fun for Soldier boys being christened and charley horsed
By the waves;
I walk through dying houses, while my words
Crayon your fore brow like the numbers of
A little girl;
I get mistaken for who I am all the time,
I hang out and chain-rhyme; and the wimpling
Orchards blow like your bangs, like burning sugar
Canes;
And the egrets wake up and make love with the Herons, and then blow themselves over billboards and Over silver vines,
And I am awakened and smelled the rummy ants Running over the cut blades; and everything was Saber toothed and unafraid; and I leapt from the shadows
Of the forests on either side of the golf courses
And the everglades;
And I ran to you calling to you in the waves which Were your changing room, and your graves;
But the better knights had already come before me,
And enraptured you and turned you drunk, so you
Were cheery and unafraid, and with your glad children
Summering in your trains;
I used to have a dream of slipping out of my window
Into your dreams, but now it seems as if neither of us are Real, even though we both yet breathe.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Though Wounded

There was nothing under the airplane,
But the sun:
The sun was female and seemed to be
In a wave of sky-
Where was she going, underneath stewardesses,
Paper airplanes trying to be Consumed by her like kindergarteners
In midday baptisms-
There was nothing extraordinary about her
Otherwise:
She floated there in a steady curse, while
The spiders buried their mothers
And we said the pledge of allegiance
While standing, even though wounded,
In the classrooms where we didn't belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Though You Say You Are Still A Good Girl

You don't care if you hurt me, as long as you stay
Beautiful:
You are like my mother- maybe you live down a ghostly
Street under the manticores of parasitic street lights:
I have watched you hang upside down from them
Showing off your training bra,
Trying to start a fight of little boys, making them lay of Their paper airplanes and masturbation:
Your eyes are time machines, but you don't care;
And I just lay out for you in the implausible weather, watching
You playing your plastic trumpets in and out of movie theatres,
With the favorite sweets of your bellicose boys:
And maybe once I wanted to be Shakespeare or the doggerel of His brother Marlow:
I wanted to take Tamberlaine's crown and smash in your Apple-pie halo:
And then I am a black eyed surfer beaten up thorough the angry
Caesuras: the forts of opals and coquinas looming straight over
Me
Filled with their dead memories, and their extinguished candles:
Their copper canons like pews at mass:
They sit forever as the ice-cream melts like your legs,
Like the simple heirlooms you keep in a chest,
While your areolas flagellate moving back and forth in a bed of Dreams that has been a wonderful ship for so many men
Even though you say you are still a good girl.

Robert Rorabeck

Even Through Those Hours When You Are Far From Home

Like a sickly grove of trees worships their Lady in the sky,
I reach up from my weedy encroachments
Wishing for you,
Seeing each frame of your shadow through
The monsoons streaking your glass windows-
You are inside, baking and warm,
Your apron tied around your hourglass waist,
Doing your thing, dancing for your children;
Jewel of domestications,
And I am immature, and out of a job-
Quite suited for this economy, I tramp and Slip through the hours of this industrialized swamp,
The tourists making a busy cream in my mind
And the pistils of air plants bloom like tongues
Enjoying their perches in the yards, and in each
Womb a beautiful car, restive and showy;
And when you wake up you drive all day, or you
Bake, and I sneak into your house and smell the hours
You have spent, and, trespassing, against the Crenulations of your engorged pool- pretending to Love, or know who you are, even through those Hours when you are far from home.

Robert Rorabeck

Even When I Told You I Don'T Believe In Satan

Simple words like cherry red
Cars in the sun-
And I don't believe in Satan-
Potted spikenard consumptive upon the sea wall,
Crinkled by salt, diminished by seagulls,
And I don't believe in Satan;
But cast eye downwards in the telescopic sun,
Why then are you there in the sand
With that man-
Why then are you there in the sand with that man:
My girl- my girl. My only girl-
Wasn't it me who breathed you from the sea
Instead of going out to dinner-
Wasn't it I who payed your way and gave you
A wishing well of fair won goldfish;
And there isn't a cloud yet in the sky- it is a blue
Color all its own,
And grandmothers are alive- and grandmothers
Are alive,
But what empirical corruption so close at hand-
I telescope with my eyes,
His hand winnowed upon your shoulder blade,
Your balmy fan,
Except I cannot see your eyes- they must be looking Toward your home,
But the spikenard is stolen from the mountain-
The meter is out of coin;
Grandmother is in her grave-
Isn't that your hand in his hand even when I told you
That I don't believe in Satan.

Robert Rorabeck

Even When You Are Fleeting

My jaw is a soup bone for your cold dinner;
Or it ornaments a barbed wire fence softly
Singing in the drying pastures,
Gnawed on by standard bred horses and Antelope:
You can drive by, but you should not see it
From where you are at,
Keeping time with your better movements,
Your eyes illicit waterfalls down the good-side
Of his face as he drives,
As he flexes for you and you pass into the Shade of the forest
Before returning to the later half of New Mexico,
To all those silver mines and jewelry shops
Where he mined you;
But if you should come back around this Way maybe on the weekend or for a make-believe
Holiday, doing your arbitrary shopping,
Or pretending to visit the high lonesome places
Half shutdown where once John Wayne ate his Breakfast,
Do me a favor and do not stop if the sun should happen
To whistle me down to you,
And skip like a little street boy polishing the sweet sounds
Of politics and religion right out of me,
Even though I have nothing to pay him for the job-
Do not stop- Don't even slow down, because that Would make some tourism out of my unrequited decorations;
And because I am already stood-up,
Just let me keep hanging around doing what I do because It would be all but useless, and I prefer to think of
You as something beautiful even when you are fleeting.

Robert Rorabeck

Even When You Are Not To Be Found

The city goes home and bifocals in
Its wrathful arcade;
And you can tell that I have been drinking:
I have slept in my clothes for seven years,
Because I didn't
Want you to know the scars I have since been wearing;
And maybe you lost your virginity as nude
As soft shelled love birds
Out upon the sandpeppered shores of the fresh water
Estuaries;
Maybe even you were snapped at by beatniks,
Maybe you carried the equipment of the band from the Cars-
And now these pretty words just make you tired;
Maybe you are in love with a great voice, and when He comes swinging down at the batting cages of your body
In the rudeness of your collar green night,
You don't even care how far he high tides in you;
And you give out his name like solicitations in a mailbox;
And you come and afterwards you circle the town
Like Zoroastrians for your fairer grandfather's icecream;
But I still know where the wild figs lay,
Or how I crossed your body with my eyes on its skullduggery:
And I still know where that treasure is buried that You have never quite found;
And I know how to lay you even when you are not to be found.

Robert Rorabeck

Even While She Looks Away

Ignited by a night and all of its candles:
So many candles that it must be on holiday:
It must be like the tourists
Preparing for a parade- while the fort casts its long
Shoulders again up against the sea:
The stone rising tidily, but conceding
To the water and her breathing:
And girls I do not know, coming to me, but looking away:
Surely afire as they make their wishes up into
Other heavens,
Swelled by the virtues of those bulbous decorations,
Hair curling around alluringly- until they are finally Called up,
And the world of straight arrow carriages bemoans their Newfound chastity- the orange groves
Try to accentuate them with an often claret bouquet:
And the sun; what does he do, but jump through the day,
Freckling their shoulders,
As they go out baptizing their sorority- maybe even Metamorphosing through the uncalled for weather:
Staggering the tourists and the unwise children on their Shoulders,
As they try to make out what it is, straining their necks through
The airy clouds, even while she looks away.

Robert Rorabeck

Even While The Sky Was Hurry Hurry Down

Existing here in the farfetched algorithms of Gut shot aeroplanes-
Running around speechless like an overwrought
Marionette
Trying to be scalped by Indians who are not even Sure they exist themselves,
Until it is time for lunch: pretty girls curling with Their own enchantments
About the may, may grasses, where each warm animal
Has a surname and feminine hands to Hold him as if his heart were in a pink nest
And everything was fine even while the sky was Hurrying down.

Robert Rorabeck

Even While They Drive

Delighted in the eyes of sincerity's rearing-
The beefsteak of juggernauts obscenely
Unclothed for the traffic that pearls and beads on a dry
World covered around by the thin
Curtains of an unmistakable ingénue bathing in each
Caesura of the sea,
Cantankerous and bee stung- the size of every woman
Swaying the magnitudes after tearing down the
Four walls of her grotto,
So that each little door is nude and filtering in the Unwholesome dinner guests who open up their flashlights
Like rubies on the beauties of clams
And look at themselves backwards down the road
Of cerulean canopies even while they drive.

Robert Rorabeck

Even While You Slip Away

Fire hydrants in mistaken Iroquois,
And now you taste his lips, while I've been down to the Bottom of the Grand Canyon three times
To taste hers,
While my legs and body ached upwards for you,
And saw the amphibic silver bodies of airplanes
Leaping in the illusions
Of the telltale weathers: and I didn't even know who You were, Alma; but now shouldn't it be
For all times, for good and for evil,
Now that my soul has tasted yours,
That I will always know who you are, even while you Slip away.

Evening Of The Seventh Day

Spiders with red scars crawl up the Wall to the sadness of the church's organ;
There is a leak in the corner molting the drywall,
The practitioners avoid it with their eyes.
The preacher's wife leads the weeping in prayers,
And they move as somberly as though ghosts
Through the eye of a hurricane.

I wait outside with my red car idling,
Her lips on my mind, my hands on the ignition.
Snow flurries make flirtations with autumn.
There used to be Indians crouching on the windswept
Plains, now there are aluminum trailer parks,
And swaths of concrete which bleed into rivers.

Beneath the steeple, I say her name 7,000 times,
As some kind of offering,
Until the bats leave,
But I keep my money in my wallet,
Except when there is liquor. Then the planets swim
Unanswering even to the most fervent reverence,

Beneath them, the donkey has feverish dreams,
Its teeth showing as it is urged up the cryptic back of
The most wounded of canyons, laden with sacks of ravished
Gold; it sweats remembering the story grandfather told
Of the babe in the manger, and the three wise-men,
With gifts of the like which the special interests garnish politicians,

But now there should be only one sun, and the hive
Of lips which drinks up the sweat from its fur, for it Doesn't know of such things; those stories belong
In the green of gentled worlds, for now he only knows
The switch, and the cragged pass which slips upward
In steeper garments,

As the world flips over like a hound hit and wounded
On the interstate; sure to die, the sallow finger's of the Preacher's wife prick upon the keys,

The organ plays, and the spiders march across the Effluvious webs in spindles over where Gray and balding heads bend to pray upon the Swaybacked ropes of creation, a spooky world
Now bonded beneath power-lines and the leaping
Bellies of aero planes,

Who had once seen god naked and panting,
Hunting across the permafrost, awakened from a Motherly glacier who slid away and wept until Scalding, birthing but a single world, he feral and Windswept who swam from the lake of her womb,
And like a tadpole metamorphoses, decided to Dawn cloths and speak no longer to the trees of her woods.

Eventual Super-Heroes

The strangers proceed through the yellow air.
They are not quite super-heroes,
Though once they were acquaintances,
With their arms outstretched
And yawning in the impoverished parks, or
In little turn of the century rooms
Of silence filled with scribbling insects:
Their eyes are the saddest things
When they go down the Intersections of faded walls
Looking like blind people for their next love:
Nervously, they chew the asses out of pencils,
Not yet knowing if they are passing,
And it is raining outside and how will they get home.
Eventually, not even super-heroes
Can fly in such weather, though they are Too afraid to ask the opposite sex for a ride:
There on the walkways, they write
Their names in Old English on the wet
Cement and wait for it to dry in the rain-
Eventually, they will manage to look up again,
And everything will be gone,
Or starting over....

Ever So Motherly Limbs

It's no holds barred in the venal
Contagions of the sound:
I almost have $200,000 dollars and
A c&ck as hard as spikenard,
And a Jewish lip that I want to press as fat
As a cherry red mollusk who's been making
Its fornicating rounds around the sea,
Who has been eating legumes and thinking of You and all the sounds you make with your Husband deep in the crèches of your bed;
And I just want to move up and wet my pants
In your basin,
Maybe once hold the gossip of your hands,
And throw back your spirits and count the changing
Of my wounds,
Perhaps fart and navigate for one afternoon through
The mausoleum of your rooms:
Sharon, I am not beautiful, but I can go on and on,
Meaningless and harmless, erecting my art like
A child,
Looking up for your holocaust eyes, because any mortal
Could die into them,
And I have given up, and I am no good while the Police are not around. If you saw me
You would think me imperfect, and I was.
You would love my brother in law just because,
But I want to be perfect, perfectly asleep in the moving
Shadow, the zoetrope and perfumed orchard
Of your ever so motherly limbs.

Evergreen

I have stopped watching the movie,
But it shouldn't matter,
Because its only black and white;
Even the dogs could identify it.
And though I am now doing nothing,
I have stopped dreaming and spend
Hours looking at a photograph of a girl
Who should make the world spin,
But she doesn't sell used cars,
And the landlord is so fretful for this month,
Her beauty couldn't help, but she doesn't Worry, and plays with her new husband in
The snow, and this weather compliments her
And keeps time, even though all the birds have Gone. The mountains loom, and even Then from the front door there are quite so
Many bears hibernating in the indentations
And the folds, snoring through anonymity,
So far away from the ocean, and the salty
Cuts of high school, and the truancies smoking Cigarettes, and the insignificant games of Eyes. The mountains build their own weather,
As if jealous lovers holding blankets to them,
Teary eyed in the dark,
But I have stepped on their highest summits,
Trailing away from tourists who glut there on Her beauty, and should make her rich by and by.
She shouldn't even see me,
Though I have walked high above her doorstep,
Disappearing in a storm, and down again
I cross her street, and the world slumbers like
A beautiful merry-go-round to which children
Sleepwalk, and in the morning she should arise
In the perfect climate, freezing,
Seeing herself in the weather, as the bows of Trees proclaim her, and the mountains her
Cathedral, rising up in patriotic basins spilling
Down to her, the places I have seen.

Everlasting Life

Every day I experience
A billion eucatastrophes
As tiny gods smaller
Than drops of honey,
Dying only to be reborn
On her budding lips,
As they reawaken the Far distant religion of Everlasting life.

Every Bit Of Nothing

How are you while you are not imagining me:
There you are with husband and children after the ferris
Wheels are taken down,
And my wife is in the bathroom where you used to Fix your hair after we made love,
And the sports of winter are over,
And you are up there with those horses after
I have supposed a thousand songs for you—
Now he lays his brown body across the apiary that you
Once lost to me—
And your children coo indoors having no clue of How you once shared every bit of nothing with me.

Every Day

All day long I clean white shoe polished tables,
The sky is that naked equus on a stage of white washed
Blue:
I think of Disney World and the hidden cormorants busted
Wing in the rich and eerie foliage:
I would love to spend a life in equally dark spend thrift
In the dark of that wonderland,
Repeating all the papier-mâché vaudeville sweltering over
The plutonic love of silver-fish conquistadors
And their extinguished teal headdressed mates:
And I think that's what I'm doing, anyways- down from
The ski-lift of the sparkling sun- Because I have an erection,
And I am holding your hand even if you aren't yet on my Planet: I will come down eventually- elliptical but wild,
The ice centaurs shooting pell-mell across the frosty void
Like poky little puppies who dig holes underneath the fences
To go home early when the silver triangle rings for Tapioca pudding- And everything is slightly off kilter,
And certainly at fault- one side of my face is always better,
So I shook keep that side directed toward your fancy as We lounge and fart like love birds to the big headed animal
Parade- take our shirts off and swimming into crepuscule
In the utterly killed waters where Peter Pan always smiles,
And the crocodile it always ticking even though he shouldn't Be afraid to die.

Every Green Morning

Look at me now
To where I open my chest
These marionettes play for you
Make a stage as my ribs open like opal curtains.
Here, my heart is the tiniest sun—
It pulses with vibrant expectancy,
Like a ruby that is alive.
There is a Persian army of sweat rolling
From my brow,
Wild horses whose hooves make tumultuous
Language like water sculpts earth and bone.
My eyes are caged sparrows,
The irises their eyes growing
As they hope to feed on things
Those are still awakening from the dewy grass,
The bed on where you sleep and dream
Of tiny children sleeping inside flowers
Your fingers brush across, those too memories
The beautiful things which still toy like colorful
Ribbons running like Yuletide virgins
Along your peripheral vision.
These things inside me dance for you
As they kill me,
And I open myself up for you mortally
Waiting for the every green morning
For your eyes to awake
Blue upon me.

Every Inch Along The Way

They have tourists buying crystals and Junk beneath the valley of
The angels: Now that it is snowing, they are Eating icecream
Next to the geysers of a superficial water park—
Holding their hands over their eyes—
Skiing in the down drift—
But looking up there: there—amphitheater
Of light in her mysterious boudoir where the whitest
Of rabbits lay buried—
Comatose in dreams of spring—wherever everything
Thaws and runs down jubilantly in feral braids
Amidst the aspens:
And I walk up her slopes once more—in a truanacy
Of unequalled scars,
But seeing things upon her that cannot be described—
So high above the dictionaries of the tourist's
Schools—
And kissing her every inch along the way.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Memory

Well, there were flowers outside
For sale,
And we moved amidst them, inhaling,
Stealing their perfume
As the bees did: this was something my Uncle couldn't save,
But he still has his unicorn in the cooler,
If you know what I mean,
As my grandfather was in his grave:
And the children who should have Been to school,
Waited underneath the overpass where
The waves yet echoed:
And in those feral voices, a song-
The memories of sirens saturated there,
And the bells and the lips
Of naiads in their hurricanes-
So the secret orchestras were sung in the Graffiti's of their overcast cathedrals,
And at night at home
Sports continued being played- the Gardens whispered,
And the family prayed- but through the daylight
Desires continued- streaking, foaming,
And answering- vibrations from extending Shadows- going to brush their lovers
Across the sea- while in their classrooms
The lost girls forgot every memory they cared to Keep of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Night

I drink beer and masticate:
To my left there is an entire household of aboveground
Graveyard,
Each grandparent off wandering their stucco tomb,
And at night I always have to masturbate like
A cat on a hot copper roof just to give them something
To listen too:
I try to make it sound like old times,
Like past lives with my flag pole silhouette underneath the Slash pine with pervasive scoliosis,
And where my futile seed spits, glued with incomplete
Thoughts of your auburn living dead,
Then an entire badland of cops and robbers flumes:
And there is Bonnie and Clyde and
A rat a tat tat:
And the old people turn over in their grave,
And tomorrow it might be tapioca and marshmallows,
But some eternal zygote splashed into their Extinguishing fireside graves
Will remember how every night I come for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Night Your Beauty Is Stolen

If there is beautiful, it is in the faces looking away;
Or it is in the warm and itchy bodies pooling upon the Tennis courts of an insouciant housewife's

Day:

The condominiums who strut out like hydras, and the young couples
Who curl up to them like song birds who are loving their Pythons,

Or the children who are lost again like field goals who never clear
The pylons;

They are like new springs growing breasts and migrating once or Twice in their beautiful lives, while the Mexicans and Guatemalans
Cross the deserts,

Only to fall back down again, emolliated, naked organs corsaged with Wounds,

Houswives slathered down into their song-bird kitchens;

And I see you now and again here like a centerfold folded up into
The bedroom where like some flowers,

Every night your beauty is stolen.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Other Holiday

Scar of sun in the Sky- spider wound- floating
Like a match stick spume
Burning Christmas trees in July;
And bicycles run speaking
Over the bridge,
Going to collapse with the Maidens whose skin is as White as icecream-
Ferris wheels evaporate
In perfect delusion-
And I think of the Girl who can only love
Me on
Every other holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Picture Of Her Ever Made

Tussling, tussling on our brooms into dusk,
Never letting the long shadows from the sun exactly Escape us: cheering with our bottles of Liquors over the trees,
Make our complexion finely rummy:
Oh, I said she was beautiful,
I shouted across the land into her sports utility Vehicle- She kind of looked up as if to Understand, but her expensive shoes were already Polishing the gas-
She had a new boy, so she wagged her fine a$s-
Maybe in the air-conditioning underneath the tinted
Shade she made a tear, but if she did it
Was Faberge- my words could not endear her to the Weariness and literature of a grey-come sea:
I loved her, I loved her, yes indeed, but she was always further Away, and always smiling in every picture of her ever made.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Piece Of Penny Candy

Repetitive joy in the belly of a whale—
Geysers the long throat of the wishing well
Like a wedding train to heaven
Somewhere over the desert—
Lost and found fireworks where you left him,
Words coming out from your mouth
As a tortoise from his shell—
The uneven forgetmenots of makebelieve
Habitats
Wherein the corners the ghosts are laughing—
Little frail things, they are the weathers for
The spiders in their moats
Remembering the work places that Couldn't go on forever—
Prayer flags fluttering above abandoned
Drive-ins—
As the replacements flooded in—
A girl in a convenient store that is sold out
Of every piece of penny candy.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Time The Sunlight Chooses To Yawn

Epiphanies underneath the windows
Of society,
Where the little ferries pollinate quite Readily:
Making love to the browned stems of
The flowers and their counterparts
Alike:
Their pornography in the bird baths as in
The sadomasochism
Of the wayward kite:
How I love you there looking out at the Things I could not see,
Unlike anything else in the word,
As you made love in the pill bugs and
The broken ivy
Stemming across the shingles underneath me:
As you made love so small in your Haunts, but exuberant- experiencing the Honey of every bee's sting,
Dripping with diamonds: what I could not Say for you,
Are the words collected in tears or in
The fonts of blind men,
But I am sure that you are- underneath the Rearing of cats,
Laying like dew in the fans of the yard,
The roe of wonder lust colonizing around you
Every time the sunshine chooses to yawn.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Unreturned Drop

Pilots drink rum and sing
Sea shanties
And they are passed up by little boys
On their way to never, never land;
And the stewardesses sigh,
Swooning as they remember lost love:
And these words are his,
To an adolescents of vermilion orchards
And spells which would work,
While they play sports beneath us like Salamanders
While the rivers boat:
And oh how I loved who I loved,
And I didn't even have to finish class to spell her
Name,
To keep it like a fetish under my pillow,
To seep in the wounds of her being, to surrender to Her at daylight,
And to carry her books for her with whatever hands I
Have left;
And I am the little shepherd boy still tending to the Sheep up in the mountains,
Weeping into the deeper spells of the lakes she knows that Will never move;
As she bares children and changes her name and fights
To stop the wrongs of the earth,
These waters still bare her name, but what she does not Remember is that I have cried every unreturned drop.

Robert Rorabeck

Every Way Home

Thanks for nothing,
Old-time marionette of the sky—
I finished another bottle
After the shock value has spent another
Token
And sunken,
Disappeared into the sea—
One way or another
I still have to awaken tomorrow,
With the sawhorses
And then the cold
Green grottos—housewives
That made their money off of Stolen video games,
Escaping against the teal
And blue green waves—
And other ways out of here,
Echoing through the evaporating
Canyons of their daughters' lunch rooms,
Believing in lunacy and other
Ways out from here—
Crippled amusement parks that she was Too afraid to take me too—
Drinking tequila at midnight,
I am too afraid that I cannot turn into another Person's doll,
So I remain right here, echoing, heart-fallen,
Last ember in a bedroom that has no place
With itself—
Can't you remember, or are
You trying to forget—the ways we tried to make
It up that mountain, dead turns at midnight,
And falling behind other things that you could Not love—
But the dogs loving me,
And the eventual moon light showing me every Way home.

Every Word

With everything there is a

Word:

On tree or branch or

Bird.

Well, then the sea is

Round as the globe-

My eyes open

My eyes close;

They see only you,

My muse.

Robert Rorabeck

Everyday

I can document how I feel from
Out in the long, slow yard, while another airplane Passes in all of its Garments of instruments:
And I can put myself this way for you,
Lying through the illusions sweating as shadows
Off of the bodies,
Waiting for my parents to come and end another day-
I can say the things that the sunlight seems to Say, as it leaps across the canal and across the burning
Cane fields along its way:
It slides across the razorbacks, and the rattlesnakes-
And it goes into its unknown romance-
And where it is has gone, you will go- into
That blanketing horizon where I swear I
See it go everyday

Robert Rorabeck

Everyday Foreplay

Going down again for my lonely song,
After the thunderheads have cracked like gems,
And showed their true bodies like the lit up
Thoraxes of lightning bugs, but....
When will I finally find my way from here,
And roar down from my mountain like a Comanche
In a Cadillac, a government apology,
My hair turquoise and feathered, my body fully stemmed,
For upon the highway I could be the long ejaculation,
The neon sign, an out of the ordinary invention
Conceived of Tesla's self-imposed celibacy,
A fine gentleman shyly scribbling in the shadows, half fawned
By the hibiscus in the corner of the doctor's office:
I went out of high school anonymous, while the Gypsies danced in the rain in front of the duplex, Selling key-chains, while letting their bosoms air for All the lonely mothers turning their cars around,
Meeting their destinations, never turning their eye again
To the recluse in the Mohawk;
Back home again, their fingers and legs running the Kitchen, their father-husband cracking farts on the divan,
How can they not think to see the verdant peel-away,
Making a left with their virginity toward the apoplectic sea,
To whom these few words skip down to worshipping,
The everyday foreplay sketching each caesura the moon encourages,
As in the roofless sky the clouds leap up blushing jubilantly
From every suburban window; Their curtains drawn,
They couldn't see, as they sit at the table to pray and eat.

Robert Rorabeck

Everyone Else

There was a sandstorm:
But we didn't belong in her garden of
Mirages,
While the students were blowing
Glass to make fun of windmills
While it seemed a silent fit:
But it was beautiful,
Especially for the tourists-
And she kept her palms up, even while
She was sleeping,
And her houses were beautiful,
But needed work:
Oh, silent dog with one eye:
How you limp, like a wounded rainbow
Across the movie theatres of the Graveyards,
And it almost seems impossible that
We don't have to arrive here
Anymore:
We just have to look up, and the airplanes
Are already gone,
Like breakfast eaten by the over eager gods
On Christmas day in the sunlight of
A child's eyes- full of the blinded innocence,
While everyone else steals all that they can see.

Robert Rorabeck

Everyone Sits Alone

Life is the cage
We are all born into
The zoo
Drives down the long
Snake in the rain,
Everyone sits alone
In the park
In the car
In the theatre
Everyone sits alone
And looks through bars
Of their flesh and bone
No eager hand can grasp out of this
No willing hand has the Reach,
We touch our flesh
To the flesh of our cages,
We lay down chained
And little birds sing
Beside others miles away
And barking
We touch steering wheels
As the lights cross our eyes
We learn to believe
The birth of shadows
We drive, a line of slaves,
Down the road
Everyone sits alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything Else

We looked at the albino alligator today together:
You said it was the first one of its kind that you had seen,
And then you took my by the jaw and kissed me about the Mouth the way the waves sometimes can be seen kissing the Dying cenotaphs,
And I couldn't remember anything else- except that the Tables had turned, and I was your mistress:
Like a turtle who sometimes lives away from his home,
I returned with you to the underbelly of my house:
And what did we do- what did we do so far away from the Frontier,
And two days further still until your home town in the dry sticks
And woods where Walkin says that there are too many mosquitoes to Even breathe during this time of year:
Alma:
I made your hair look like a witch's today- and that is what you said,
And when I called my mother on the phone she said that you
Were a very sweet girl, but
That she didn't wish me to be hurt again: but, Alma, I have a castle
In the sand and I know its time will come before the evening of
The day:
But I can hold your hand, Alma- I can hold your hand while the Waves take everything else away.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything Else That Has Fallen From The Sky

Long shouts of glory through the forest
Even still die away:
The sky is cold and gray, and your buttercup orifices
Have been trounced into the path by the drunken soldiers
Of my fingerprints:
Gainesville is dust: the mermaids were soldered together,
Their tailfins rust:
Airplanes full of lurching tourists kamikaze into the barking
Woods:
It is no good, but the sun still whittles all of this from His seat on high,
But he is such a lonesome guy. The rainstorms come and Make him cry,
And the earth pitter patters teardrops that drool obliquely
Around the convexity of scuppernongs
On the wild paths sniffed by homespun dogs;
And I think of you and everything else that has fallen from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything Is Yours

I settle down with the pain,
The human base from which
The fountainhead springs:
The five senses riding forth
Like lunatics,
Each one wanting to rob
More than the others
From the bank of
Your lips,
But you shoot them down
And scatter them
From so far away.
They come back riding
Through the beggar's dust,
Their saddlebags starving,
Bringing back the pain
Of all that emptiness—
They all sit around the porch
Of their mother's blouse
She unbuttons to try
And let them in but
They are too drunk to Move.
Every second they are
Petrified by you.
Opened or closed,
Their senses see you,
Feel you, taste you,
Hear you riding around them
Like a buxom phantom,
But they cannot win,
For you are the Devil's Instrument,
Man's first sin,
The knowledge that made desire
Bloom in Adam's empty
Chest,
The abscess of his missing rib,
So need set forth the exposed

Cartilage and bone of his open wound
Like a cadaver's bouquet
Upon the silver platter of
The human race;
You let them in and trapped them,
The caged animals watching you
Move around them,
Your legs tall shots of liquor,
Your eyes blinking gardens,
Your dress the breezy curtain
Over your body's gold mine;
Before you tasted the honey
Of savage wisdom,
Injected with the serpent's
Neon poisons,
They didn't even know
What you were
Though their eyes touched your Flesh through every young day,
But now that you made
Man aware of you,
With the knowledge leaping
Out of you
Like electric briars from
Your roses' spasms,
You ungrate backwards,
A mirage, you are somewhere else
Even though you seem close enough
To make love,
To touch,
To taste,
As you flaunt your form
Before his sight,
While, from your secret room,
You whisper his name into his ear,
While your scent calls him
Like a hound to the hunt,
The blue mountain lion
That disappears with sundown
Through the white spools of aspens.
You play your beautiful game,
Calling him once or twice a year

When you get drunk.
Naked pictures of you are on the Playing cards in his hand,
But it is you who will take the purse,
For when you open your legs
You make the rules,
As you made his senses become aware.
Lying mortally upon you,
Everything is yours.

Everything Tastes Better

Eating out at restaurants weakens a soul:
In the light of the same snide pettiness,
Look at the menu,
A delicious assembly line: Look at the tourists
In the atmosphere of those booths.
Even if you aren't the one who pays for it,
You are becoming theirs:
Words fail you, greater words become unknown
The more you eat.
The savage airplanes are calmed, and the professionals
Line up to shake your hand.
Even sports figures eat at restaurants;
And the sky is so blue overhead for everyone,
But you can't see the sky full of blind portcullises;
And you can drink and laugh and carry on.
Even the dragonflies grow fat against the windows dripping
On the obese hibiscus,
And your mother farts like to the tune of a high school marching Band,
And you father is selling used cars right there at the table.
And before you know it all of your old crushes are eating
With you: they are married and yet they seem to Be available, entrained in a wrecked space,
This country gloom- I don't know.
I guess I am being really perceptive or just out of line,
But I'd rather drive real fast up to a window and steal my Lunch of pie:
Eating at restaurants deludes your soul,
But everything tastes better with wine.

Everything That Has Wished To Be Stolen

Arriving reasonless in the center of
The country—
It feels like a washed out fairy tale now
That the girls I will not love
Are not here:
Only my mother, because she will not Leave me,
As I scramble up the mountain
Like a capitalist of horse shoes without Any friends—crying for her,
Not realizing that she already lies
In the heart of a strawberry field that
Has been picked clean for the season—
And so she slumbers, waiting for other Stories or for me to impress her—
But I don't know what to do—
The moon must be large by now—
The turkey and the pies must be ready:
But someone has set them where they cannot
Be found—
The moon like a thief, like a detective,
The horses beneath her eating everything that
Has wished to be stolen.

Everything That I Dream For

I met you the Monday after I was robbed at gunpoint:
You were beautiful right away, Alma,
But I could ignore you, because I'd just bought lingerie for Diana,
And my dreams were still falling uniquely somnolent for A sommelier in Colorado:
So I said that I could work with you and not lose my mind,
But then the others proved to be so impossible and So untrue:
I had dreams of open graveyards without them, and all of these Sore wounds could not heal,
But you did so much for me this Monday that we both took Off and you brought me over a painting of two Elephants caressing that I finally got to lay straight on my wall:
I wonder how it is that you can find me beautiful:
Because I called you Linda, and you called me Lindo,
And there was the smell of peanuts, but otherwise I chastised myself
For not doing better art for you,
And we are all still just trying to survive, while you remain another
Man's woman,
But you are mercilessly beautiful, Alma, and you live next to the dog
Track, and I have walked to your house:
It was so easy:
Sunday is your daughter's birthday: You can put two candles on Her cake,
Because you are everything that I dream for.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That I Need

The bodies spill over into bankruptcy and I wish I had
The time to express to you what opulent beauty your body carries:
Alma,
You are the paradox of all those cats on the fences:
Alma you weigh one hundred and ten pounds, nearly half my weight,
And yet you carry around with you all the curves of Spain:
And you told me that you wanted a boob job,
But I assured you there wasn't any great need for it:
Alma,
I want to water your yard: Alma, I want to captain your ship,
And hold your hand while the cicadas go undressing:
Alma, I want to be the sailor you guide home with your almost ochre
Engines of fire and bright weed:
Alma, Alma,
You sell everything that I need.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That I Would Forever Know

I made the sign of the cross and other
Holy anachronisms that my name could not provide,
Then we cut out of the square dance and went to a private Rink amidst the sun-vanished trees:
We drank of each others eyes, and drew each others thoughts:
And then I was sure that she would be everything that I would forever know.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That Is Soon To Be Real

Day is first dark, and it ends in dark:
Softly, unobtrusive; but in the middle of its arc,
Day is so abusive, a ribald in his lime tree park:
Making copper cannons squint green with Envy,
Making forts flash against the sea,
Or housewives topless in their driveways:
Words cannot really describe the apex of the day,
The saint hood of immaturely overage boys
Making muscle gyms in their fathers' garages,
Keeping out for girls
With their thorny corsages: if they can make it through Noon, who's to say what all they can love:
But in the dawn, and in the dusk, most amphibian,
Swings the swing sets of the monarchs,
And sit the prettier girls all lost in shadow,
Books waiting patiently in their laps; but it is so sad
To them when the sky begins to arc golden,
For soon the bus will come and the day will go
Leaping through its wonderful keyhole:
And everything that is soon to be real will certainly Be sure what it does.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That Pretends To Learn

Yellowy embers in a field of burning houses;
An entire society of wives losing their places,
And giving their necks up to the Leaping sea:
There she is always doing her business,
And her laundry underneath the gulls and the Albatrosses:
This is her busy work which makes her a kaleidoscope
Of princesses:
And how I've been saving myself to the homeless
Tune besides
The busiest afternoons whose bugles have been Burning entire forests
Whose heads shimmer over the waves and go off
Like phosphorescent buttresses,
As the heavens bend down in Pieta—
They listen gratefully to everything that pretends to learn.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That She Has Promised Me

In the green avenues of her favorite color,
When I was young and skinny,
I hunted up snakes for two weeks in California:
It was my dream.
To sleep in empty train cars in the tall, tall grass,
Like a fairytale without any wine:
And the apartments that we reported to no one but
The ghosts in their swimming pools
One story below;
And my face was all so awful to look at,
And I got my stories and my furniture from the trash:
And I failed right away,
Marooned off the graveyard shift, and I crawled back
Home and lived there,
And went to college in Florida: I got nobody pregnant:
I went to Disney World once or twice,
Lived with and then separated from a girl, thank god:
Diminished into a wave and found a city of
Other fools and an apartment as big as a single footprint
Left in the smeared trail of a centipede,
If you even cared; and thought about movies, and went to
Them:
And I am still singing my imperfect song underneath the Limpid runways of the off worldly values of the heavens,
As tomorrow I will be waiting for Alma: for Alma,
Because after all of this incest and decents and flights
From the terrors of hell, the suicides in the flutes of Trees,
And the witches casting their awful perfumes of spells
Over the vacated baseball diamonds,
I have finally found my true love, my true love;
And I believe in everything that she has promised to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything That You Would Leave

Another light over another avenue
You traveled on before I was born, and you are Gone but your song lays evidenced on
The stones
And the bees have laid their wax across
Your bones
So now you sing like a yellow holiday
Over the specters of the yellow and somnolent
Graveyards
Your lips lay pursed like the furrows of the Orchard
Like the canals that don't take so long and skipping,
Or the bottlenecks that the genies are keeping
Up from which the sky yawns and Burns- even it doesn't remember how you felt
Even though it filled your house with his light
And called you into his yard everyday
To spring and lay your eyes across the orchard's
Sea that it was laying its truth across for you
Just so you could remember everything that you would leave

Robert Rorabeck

Everything To Me

Auspicious fire now aren't you burning
Free and clear in the kettles of the roadways:
Without any other mile markers besides her married blue eyes:
Now aren't you burning down between the arcades,
And in the bosom of those absolute mountains:
Inside that sorority where dye cast cars collect, and from which The clouds swim up gurgling like chorus lines of pool girls;
And now don't you remember we lived here once,
And we touched ourselves in public bathrooms, outside of Which the swings very nearly took us up to god:
And the early afternoons were full of sweet propositioning, and hopes
That you would come like divine providence out from the tributaries
Of the less offensive school yard, as if some demigod had finally Let off slaying his father's, and had given you to the both of Us, or at least to me; and that was when you could fine arrow heads
As green as envious coke bottles, and the cenotaphs were still Being farmed in the sweet recesses of the early morning see;
And your eyes were so good and blue that they meant just About everything to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything Will Last Forever

New movies come out on Fridays
And I buy newspapers expectantly,
But you like they,
Have awful taste in men, in movies:
Look at all the jigsaw science I've Laid around you like
An ecstatic truth, or a curse,
But how easily you move away from
The borders that seem to spill like
An overeager humming bird from my throat:
That this too is too surreal,
Esoteric and hurt:
It will not sell or dress up for Parade,
It will not be seen out strutting with the girls
In fine silk negligee, the fake sailors
On the promenade:
And they will drink root beer floats,
And the castle will rise like a tortoise in disguise,
And the sun and the sky and everything
Will last forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Everything You Will Ever Be

I drink to airplanes when they fly so low
They should be barrettes in her hair,
And S- stands there.
She's just won the game, but I'm all out of quarters
And I want to do the same;
And even tonight the teachers are fully engorged,
Touching themselves when they'd
Really want to touch the lord.
And tonight you look magnificent,
And you can keep running on for a very long time,
But the hike really isn't transcendental unless it
Has a steeper grade;
My sister Rachelle is coming in two days.
She has a DMV from Colorado State,
And I want to look beautiful for her,
Because she is good proof that I am at least halfway to a Genius;
And I have visions of you, even though I am not well:
I cannot pilot airplanes.
I just swing on the swings, S-:
E-:
I want to live forever. I am no good otherwise.
I need a good woman, one or two.
I want to live forever, I want to rob banks by thinking of you.
And your beautiful as I imagine you with your Tommy guns
Up against her pert breasts like babies out of Kalamazoo:
Do you really read this, sh%t, S-,
Do you really know how much I think of you:
All I want is a vision of you, like a Christmas tree in immaculate
Weather,
But it is just because you are so beautiful:
So many guys have wanted you, S-:
So many guys still want you, and you are married but that just Makes my romance more romantic and heavier like the coats
Of the heavily sated lions.
Soon they will remember who you are, S-, and they will Wake up and eat the hands of whoever is so careless to feed them.
They are hooligans like you were,
S-:

Don't you remember how much of a hooligan you
Were,
S-:
How many hearts you've broken or destroyed;
And I just want to live forever in your divine entrains,
In you pagan penumbras;
And it is as if almost any word will suffice for the sacrificial
Knife,
The dirty nouns, S-, they are like nymphs,
S-:
They don't care: they work by the hour, and your daughter
Is so utterly beautiful.
And your husband is beautiful.
And I just want to be your janitor after your sweet
Cadaver S-;
If I could; it is my only knowledge; and I don't know what I am doing,
Or where I've gone; or what flowers grow on these Beautiful slopes,
But they are all I want S-:
S-, and I love everything you will ever be.

Evolution

When men come to live in space
They will forsake religion.
Like a two year old
Refusing to suckle his Mother's breast,
They will learn to breathe
In the atheistic void
Realizing they will never reach her,
For she is still young and Forever running away
From her heart.
They will have no use
For modern transportation,
But will walk around aimlessly
On foot and be tricked by the sweltering
Mirages,
Thirsty nomadic bachelors who
Fiercely defend their territory,
The airless acreage
Between the forest fire
Of stars;
So if they come upon a stranger,
They fight like feather-light pugilists,
Their lungs starving for air and liquor,
Not understand how anything
Could come towards them,
Even the smallest gravitational mass
Recreating time's memory in them,
Her lips and eyes blooming like
A nebula's newly born solar system.
Refusing to admit she is near,
They fight like saber-tooth tigers
Ending life in the volcanic savannah,
Tearing away the voice from the Breathless air
To reclaim peace in their space.

Robert Rorabeck

Evolutionary Friendship

My dog used to be a wolf,
And I used to be a monkey.
Now he is my dog,
And I am a better man.

Robert Rorabeck

Ewoks & Escargot

An hour past noon,
Fingers itching from the caffeine,
Gun in the bottom drawer with the bullets,
But there isn't going to be a fight.
Pissed in the high jewel-grass where the Bouquet of wildflowers rots,
F*cked into an anonymous grave where
I dropped from the homosexual-yellow
Apartment; saw her lips mulling,
The dykes had their fingers in the pool;
When the moon got out, they'd howl like
Cats, and it was easy down those collegiate Ways, to inebriate and swim;
She decried me that I should have taken Away her buffet of suitors, eyes grazing in
The well-lit cafeteria,
But now you can buy my little book in Japan,
And I had my opportunities, and even more Scars, a favorite place to sit in the sun and Read well-viewed from the windows of Liberal arts, about fateful mountain climbers
In the cerulean crevices of Everest,
Infants in full gear and crampons engulfed by
A subzero womb, the howling of silence;
The girl from folklore class came up and sat
By me for several minutes, hoping for a turn,
That I might teach her mathematics with a full
Set of fingers, but I only got up to her black nylons
And the midnight polyester dress she wore:
I was always afraid to look her dearly in the eyes,
And she gave out on me and flirted with hombres,
No greenhorns tacked to books, sweaty ledgers
Which held my tells: So I became a latchkey and Fell through a well of well-shined skulls,
And they laugh at me, while I mull over a novel
About a dark skinned dwarf named Milo,
Who knocked on my door in the student ghetto,
And said he'd once been a giant, but had made
The same mistake as me, and moved next door

To a witch who cursed him with her switch,
So he could no longer deliver pizzas,
For his feet would not reach the petals, and
He was ignored by the barmaids and the bimbos;
Thus there was autumn, and the supermarkets
Carried gourds and corn stalks,
But we didn't buy any, but worked the midnight
Shift and got drunk in the crook of That sh*tty north-central city.

Exactly What I Should Not Do

The silent ships proceed through the forsaken
Shadows of your old neighborhood:
All the places where we used to make love,
And even before us, where myself and my aunt would Experiment out amidst the corn snakes and the old
Tomato hampers,
Under the harvest moon, and the balloons that we would Send away with dollar bills taped to their strings
For the hobos,
While your mother and father were slipping away:
While my grandparents were separating like two parts of The disenchanting sea,
And we could both go up to Disney World at separate times,
But it would do no good to save any of us:
Your husband was too beautifully drunk to be faithful to you,
And now he lives like a guest in the house of your children
And your new boyfriend;
And we hardly even talk anymore, because we are just Related- And it will rain tomorrow, the trucks will come making
A mess off the peat, at the caribou will fumble,
And the Mexicans will roll some more dice out amidst the stampedes
Of the cloven feet;
But you will not remember me, nor will I remember you,
Because I do not speak to anyone anymore, though if I have loved Anyone, then in our early morning pagan schoolyards that is just What I did before I knew exactly what I should not do.

Robert Rorabeck

Exactly What She Does To Me

Deep at night, somnambulating,
My scrotum tucks in like a shivering terrapin:
It feels like an icebox cupped in the long-nailed Feeling of a highland banshee;
And when she kisses me, this dreadfully tattered
Woman of the far north country,
It is like I cannot breathe, and so hang from the Long shadowed neck of the deep south lynching
Tree;
It is like I am that ancestral ash shed from a
Cigarette's cherry by a snaky teenage truant swinging
Like a leggy black-nailed serpent along the moony
Shadows of some ancestral maple tree:
This is how she places me, an entire colony of greedy
Ants feeding on a dove's flightless cadaver,
An airplane falling silently like a stone into the awaiting Sea, and I am too lonely to gather, so easily she Breaks me like a windmill's blades tasting the salt from The windcut sea- She winnows me,
And every night by that hour of her name she encases me
In the dark resurrection of her habitual sensory:
I jog around her for seven miles, like seven times, like a spell
While the rest of the world drifts off like a poorly crowned
Paper-ship in a spilling gutter. I can hear her laughter Long after her drinking games are over. She doesn't Even know that she does it-
What she does to me, what suicide inspires in me,
A woman who doesn't know my name, her legs spilling like Shaven ways of kneed and opal tributary; and when it is over, and I am gone, but an empty space ready for viewing, then she Awakens and travels on, filled with the gyrating pinwheels
Of blissful energy she has consumed of me;
Her bosom then too like sweet burial mounts topped with Sand dollars and those with cherries, just a final allusion of Exactly what she does to me.

Robert Rorabeck

Exactly Where She Is

Apples of poison above her
Auburn head: barrettes in her hair, and airplanes
Flying low:
Her lips stung now by jacketed wasps
And later, in the waves
Jellyfish:
She will think then that she can almost
Swim,
As she does: against the false lights of the Trailer parks and the dorms of sparrows:
And she will swim so far,
She will almost make it home,
The pockets of her slip filling with sand
Until, finally, she has to open her eyes
And find out exactly where she is.

Robert Rorabeck

Examples Of Your Divine

Dancing around the spikenard and
Their dead rabbits of luck; these American women
Have dreams, and they are emerging
From the bummed out trailer parks with their briars
Of Christmas tree lights: Oh, you young breasted Mothers, roller-derby and junk- Oh, you
Bright toothed lassies, housewives who sleep on
The roofs and howl, make love to necrophilic Conquistadors biting their pieces of eight at your Gate: Oh, yeah- And you stewardesses touching down,
Newly emerging feminists with your pharmaceuticals
And 14 karat stitches, drink drinks and flying Aeroplanes high- Come out in a wealthy parade from
The crashed pornographies of the Australian Pines,
Come out right into my childhood drumming heels-
Take my fireworks and my little sister, for examples of Your divine- The mother b*tch is suckling her litter
Close to the engorged canal, the kittens are mewling
Against the rattlesnake in the swell, but its almost time
To douse your esoteric songs, those things only little Boys could know pressed up against his nursery of ululations,
And climb up onto daddy's roof to shampoo and Root beer floats, bottles of liquor and screaming bottle-
Rockets; and do not worry, for in the morning where the Yellow-jacketed buses circulate,
There will be plenty of time for your junoesque worship,
And time to run away too, truancies of divine and quiet
Places out in shady hutches, to give your lips proof
In the uncanny moments of incredibly beautiful quietude,
When you are not putting on a show.

Robert Rorabeck

Except For Yourself

My heart drinks its rum at the movie theatre
The day after we make love,
And I look up airplanes through the ceilings,
The piñatas and the paper fans,
And I see for a little while that I keep Feeling for you,
A blind man in an empty playground-
Because you are not here:
It rains, and I see your sisters at the supermarket;
It is like a dream that I've been trying
To tell myself is still alive-
Trying to buy something beautiful even though
All of the shelves are empty,
And I will have to arise another Lazarus
And teach school tomorrow with a broken nose-
Knowing that my art is bankrupt;
It is not even sugarcane art, and you don't Deserve it- and my virginsitas stare with open
Eyes at my barren pain, after the festivals
You sougled inside my chest have packed up
And trunked all of their singing butterflies;
And you keep your roses in your gardens
With your hearts and queens,
And no one paints them for you except for yourself.

Robert Rorabeck

Execution Of Our Loneliness

Come and crawl into me,
Loneliness,
You are mine
And I wear you like a medal
Won for a war I am still fighting—
When the night is so deep
I feel like I will drown, without Her flesh to cling to, a soundless well—
Without her warm breath on my skin
To wake me up before I sleepwalk off the cliff....
She turns away from me every night
Wondering where I am;
She doesn't realize that I am not so far away—
If she could only look across the sun,
She would see me sleeping like a dead soldier
On a bed of dripping gladiolas in her echoing valleys.
Even halfway across the country,
All it takes is a leap of faith and a plane ticket,
And in two hours she will be the arbiter of me peace,
The tranquility in my arms,
Conspirators snuggling under the covers,
Cartographers of the continents of our bodies,
Mapping out and laying claim to our country's Loving-making—
The name of our new royalty
Spoken in whispers between our lips,
The execution of our loneliness....

Robert Rorabeck

Exhausted Hood

Come now you contagious voodoo sound,
I've been fluctuating around the semi-fulvous
Of librarians:
When I get too drunk, I wear the old baseball cap
Of my ancestors,
I make fun of published poets,
I have to laugh:
My scars look glorious, glorious
And I'm bubbling up above ground; it's the shoots
For the best tourism,
Sea-jaded terrapins farting their eggs on High-school aqueducts, and
Black eye-linered bitches smoking their flumes
If you couldn't tell this is where we Once butchered our knives in our lunch rooms:
And I'm high on highly combustible fumes:
Dancing, dancing repeatedly across the concrete
Atolls that I spume:
I am beautiful, beautiful And lonely at last:
Oh, sommelier, you are such a wicked blast,
And I'm feeling beautiful caracoling under your lips,
So beautiful I could almost die scrimshawed like this-
And Michelle, I am no longer bleeding in my car,
Michelle- you who are iron pyrite,
Who are not beautiful, who could just about die
To the centipede of vampires- The movie is over,
The dance is over,
And I am looking beautiful to the birds that are hungry-
I am looking almost edible to the cheerleaders-
Yeah, I'm looking real good in my black cape and Hood-
Though I'm getting kind of chilly because of the alcohol
That should,
But in the first time since the dinosaurs I enjoy looking
At myself, and I love sommeliers with eye-liners and mirrors
Tilted toward themselves;
And I love Sharon, as any good boy should- and the Lawn is mowed and the c%nt is good;
And I love Sharon, Sharon as any good boy should,

And the lawn is mowed and we are
In the dream of the road; but I'm not sure how
I should spell it, under the mountains with a flat tire,
To the streams of tourists and storms coming in,
And I am no longer sure if I love Sharon,
Or if this is any good,
Or if I should continue breathing with the steam
Hyperventilating under my exhausted,
Exhausted hood.

Robert Rorabeck

Exhibition

Constant rain provides the atmosphere
Where even lions cry,
Dripping on the iron bars of their capture,
Their muzzles also wet from their domesticated
Kills,
Just as the lonely women stare out from their Kitchens in the winnowing dusk of green landfills:
See that the moon has affixed to the obscurity
Of the storm, and their father isn't home
To light the candle,
Though their children are seemingly warmly glued
To talk shows precluding their primetime t.v.,
And out in the yard the pine trees shiver as they Are frisked by the drippy wind,
And unfortunately seeded in the places they might Not wish to bed,
Extending the woods into the driveways of Special handles;
The rain slicks the doors of automobiles,
The tourist flesh, the warm transportation now killed,
For their husbands are not at home,
But out searching for gold under the flooded hills
Until they become the barons of this menagerie,
And cannot go home anymore because it is no longer worth
It, just as the thunder exonerates the lion's roar,
For fear of truer tears in the places of their false preservation.

Exhibits Too Far Beneath

Off to a party of Ferris wheels, while the little girls—
Spendthrifts—are all gathering their stuffs:
When they get done,
Bloody-nosed—they look up the slope to the atmosphere
Of the waterfall—
The waterfall is seeming to come down in
Some kind of pieta for them—
Maybe it is almost Christmas—I wonder what has been Happening, while, all of this time they Metamorphosed—
Yes, they did—until they became the grandeur of An astonishing zoo populated by girls all of
One of a kind—
Fed by the offshoots of the nipples of the mountains—
Like carnivals of weathervanes spitting chewed up
Confections and candied apples—
To feed her in the exhibits too far beneath all she Ever knew.

Existence

If they felt like making love, they made love
And that is how they existed,
Even if neither their existence nor their love was real.

Expectations Of Metamorphosis In Insectoid Degrees

How do you like yourself now that They've named you the new class ornithologist?
You keep your lucky cricket next to you
To get advise so that they don't turn you back
Into what you were before, that thing of wood
Who slept in my bed- I know all about that,
And the tricks you pulled, the common average day
Tricks with simple geometries: I look you up
When I'm feeling lonely, too lonely to carpool,
And the people there, the unwavering faces of all
The gems of high school, all the old and unacquainted
Revelries, the too hard crushes, the mushy encores,
The tricks and the quarter sticks of dynamite lit
Off in the ruddy court just before spring time: Now
Not mostly bachelors and maidens, but crackerjack
Attorneys, air force lieutenants, housewives of umpteenth
Degree: All alike in lettered rows of Christian names old
And new and spotless like gravestones just placed in The green lawns beside the lonely cypress, and the Carport: abracadabra, spoken by the race, and there you
Fall alone smack-dab on your face, and my name too,
And her name, and others I don't remember who the hell
They are, some girls who look too pretty, some guys
In formal snide: All of us are doing so well at our stations,
And we are looking at you, looking to you, and wondering
Where are your collections of psocids, arachnids, tarantulas,
Butterflies, and moths, for shouldn't they be tacked above
Your head like diplomas with the red ants, the subtle metamorphosis soon
Stymied by formaldehyde- In those cleanly echoing hallways
I so seldom attended, though I've probably written more cues
Than anyone in the history of that school, my record is A lonely stain, a glacial pool, a single set of boot heels clicking
Down the hall, but today, my dear, we have something new,
For we are all here in some sort of science looking at you,
Waiting to see if you have truly changed in what we expected
You to....

Expecting And Describing That Only She Can Be Real

How to have been away out through the suburbia
Our legs the pistons for a pantheistic heart
Out on the hunt, pattering for muses, proposition
The moon for them to love us-
Hating and denying its stolen light when she does
Not love us;
And try to recreate our jaunts in the middle of broken
Number school days- defying the flaccidity of
The less than stellar rhododendrons haplessly placed
By the teacher's desk by her enamorous pet;
And I didn't even realize then, but if I could I would Have just stolen out under the quite even habitat of her
Desk, while she was weeping for her father,
While her unworthy boyfriends were falling away like Uneven petals in a game of love;
And I could just close my eyes and listening to the ringing
Of her chapbook jewelries across the graffiti's
Enamored beneath the swollen elbows of her rich pane:
To be like a cenotaph beneath her, this Sharon or muse,
The hallways to us like ancient sea caves made perfect by A worrisome god,
Echoing and sieving out the sounds of that maudlin beauty,
Knowing that she is everything priceless,
Expecting and describing that only she can be real.

Expensive Skeletons

Expensive skeletons

Prance at the fair; their bones
Are tasseled with ribbons of air,

And the flute players play notes from
Their yoked eye-sockets out their dazzling muzzles,

And they canter in long ovals all a hustle,

Amorous scientists stand at their markers,
Admiring their glistening absence of muscle,

And the fine ladies up in the lees,
Whose hats are an expensive nest of taxidermed chickadees,

Cry out for the glorious good-byes,
With tickets in their hands, and hands on their thighs,

As all around them, like a show of cadavers,
The morbid gentlemen's rimy ponies whiny and slather,

Those expensive skeletons
Prance at the fair, and their bones
Are tasseled with ribbons of air....

Exploding Galaxy On Shaven And Silky Legs

Words come like on dates after careless movies,
Or after rum: when no-one is giving a thought to the Crèche of waves, but are hung over from the lap dances
She brought out of the tin flask like a horn for plastic
Flowers: she dances half naked and veiled before the screen,
And then he brought out her tits like fat nickels and We went out for ice-cream: motionless wars in her beauty,
And the watermarks over her tears like the osmosis of far Away plant life yet proven, but studied in the carefully
Monitored habitats of her tears sans gravity: I haven't kissed
A woman in half a decade, and that is fact, but I still crush
On romantic love, the language pressed like attended insects
Between two teenage bodies, or anybody: As out from here,
Like a long plane were thousands of rabbits are raised for dinners
In exorbitant countries, families live well polished in gaited
Communities: I might stroll up and down those buffed sidewalks,
And sleep like a privileged hobo tramped from San Francisco
In the shady architectures of their landscaping, haloed by a palmetto:
There she dances for me yet in the lackadaisical séances of mid-afternoon
Clouds, or, if not, who cares: She was French and tramped away
After two weeks, and her tongue touched the roof of the mouth
Of reptilian men who seeped through her midnighted window without Legs: Maybe I loved her, and drank her wishing well: maybe I am Thirsty for that taste again, but I cannot remember her name, or the Theory of how she expanded away like an exploding galaxy on Shaven and silky legs.

Explore

I'm trying to go to sleep; but I'm harrowed:
I think your p*ssy is ethereal-
It really is a candle flame, and you have red
Hair:
And if I cut my ear off, and painted you
Sunflowers; I could lay you across these Springs and have it; I could make you sing out,
And smell your breath, and go about the Oldest definitions in the book without really
Thinking about it, just like two old professors
Studying their old English:
And if this is really a song, it goes silently like
A poor child drowned in the ice-cold river;
And if this is a psalm, it starts by speaking of Your two red legs opening, diving the river,
Giving conjunctions: and contours,
And I haven't really gotten to it, what I really Meant to say about your p$ssy; about that Spot, Tom and Rebecca exploring:
There should really be a philosophy meant to Expound it, and a profession just set up to enjoy it:
And maybe there is, a carnival and a circus;
While I'm standing on the cliff surrounded by Caracoles and the strange young purposes of man:
And you are really the velvet bull's eye I was meant to Hew for, to perfect a cure for: And thus I go flying
With my eyes closed to dream about you, to strip
And peel for, and to slip behind the secretive curtains
Of those wet-walled cliffs who lay down crying for Me to explore.

Extraordinary Machine

Preparations for warmth by wood:
There she is in the little cabin,
Smiling I suppose,
But her back is turned-
The gestalt of the cold woods
Come into sleep on the floor:
Molecular spindles strung out
And snoring,
A female poet from another planet,
A fine aberration-
Powder burns on her hands:
She writes words by firing guns:
Poof bang!
The natives run,
Though soon she captures their worship-
Tentatively, I step a little creepy step,
Which leads to another:
I want to make love to her,
As I can see the powdery slopes
Her breast mounds rising,
The areolas stretching like inflating balloons:
The suckle and nip of wolves,
Tiny worlds on each nipple not known to me:
I want to be hired
To pluck and suckle them like grapes,
To pick the spilt food off the floor
And eat every crumb;
But what gifts do I have to offer up:
My unpublished hands are too juvenile
To buy her charity,
My face too careworn from mother-worship,
And if I proceed across the border,
The Martians will take away all I know,
And hang me out before her ancestry
Like a distraught poltergeist verging on Messiah;
This is what I should do,
But stand there watching the long shadows
In a vanguard of flickering foreplay
Across her pinkish napes,

Her shoulder blades the careless knives
Bared priceless in the jumping lights.

Extremities Of Love

If you saw me before baseball,
Would you hold my hand, and would you say that We could now be
Friends, before all of this hibiscus, or the weathered
Ways home
Just for virgins toward their grandmothers:
As this is just as song,
Or a broken place: with its mouth filled with Echoing and
Broken glass,
As the fireworks at first burned the grass
With their over expensive love that I was really fond Of: but then the holiday was over with
And lost amidst the un glorified placed where Most of us tend to live:
Like vampires, like werewolves, in those Eternal carnivals that forever give and give-
As we take our place amidst the motions of the Killers and their husbands- as the lotus's
Stick around the palmettos of the yard: and the orange
Groves tend to go on forever,
And the beasts yawn in the sunlight towards their Extremities of love.

Eyes Of Raccoons

Eyes of raccoons in the darkness:

I have spotted caracoles of nocturnal eyes

Hung over like narcoleptic dreams in the darkness,

While I have thought of you,

Pushing your trams and your coffins for your

Different gods,

For your young bulls that come off like different

Fireworks, who pinwheel clockwise or reverse

For the different librarians and

The ways you love them:

Like I have loved you over the hijinx of many expansive

Canals:

That I have love you this way, leaping over the burning

Sugarcane of smoldering black men relocated from

The Caribbean;

Bighting my lip, hoping that my gun powder might be added

To the green copper cannons,

But all I can wish for is to hear your laughter rolling through

The smoldering darkness again:

Erin, you never said you loved me- you never said,

Because you'd rather have gone to bed with so many, many

Men:

Sailor men and tattooed rimbaudian gentlemen, kangaroos:

Erin, how dare you- you carouse,

And that is why I am kicking this caboose over the scars again,

Trying to get high again,

Back in the stars again, swinging my throbbing wet

Red bat again while the traffic moves, Erin-

For anyone- anyone but you....

F. Scott Fitzgerald

Meretricious beauty—the definition of my very own
Muse struggling toward higher art—
The same way that F. Scott Fitzgerald loved his wife:
For no reason except for her chassis
For a very long time, and she was unfaith to him
With a fighter pilot—
As he looked out to the sea—and drank—and drank—
Imagining what was abandoned there,
But it was unfathomable,
So he wrote The Great Gatsby—separating himself
Into two parts—
For recollection and catharsis—and drank and drank,
While his very own wife went insane
And burned up in a fire after he had died from a heart Attack—
But I still tried to teach him the very summer of My June—Not really understanding him,
But appreciating his alcoholism—
Like a goldfish won on a Ferris wheel swimming
In a windowsill that overflowed with all of his most Insensible lights.

Robert Rorabeck

Faberge Tears

Child in your arms: grown man in your arms,
Mother—made of topaz
And living outside of a church in
New Mexico—
Where they don't sell fireworks anymore—
I don't even know if you are really there,
But I know you exist just as much as I know
That the Best Western
And the Safeway exist—down slope from Eagle's Nest where my father used to Set up tents and shacks and sell and Sell fireworks:
But you are also a place in my memory,
Delivering from the faith of girls who Should have been my muses—
And I can hear the stream running beneath
The form of your dying son:
But put him in his crypt and he shall arise
And live forever—making nests of Ferris Wheels—sleeping nude
And warm: do not cry mother,
For your son is dying—and in your arms,
His warmth escapes like the sun does over
Arizona—
But he is more real than that: the children
Will come and the go to high school
Tomorrow—
The stores will get busy—the beautiful fares
Will pack up and go to the next town,
Molting all of their Faberge lights in the Process:
But your son who was already dying,
He has already arisen
And he will be kissing away the tears from your Cheek tomorrow.

Robert Rorabeck

Fabulous Selection

I just want to sit beneath your chair
And listen to your beautiful farts
Out in all that pinstriped spring;
I'd place your school desk underneath a tree
Where pythons and blue jays live;
The biggest thing out in the middle of Africa
And admire you in our own winsome country;
I'd tie a swing for you daughter and keep her
Occupied while I curled up beneath you
Like a cat exhausted from hunting turkey for You on thanksgiving; knotted in the grasses with
The Easter eggs, your eyes catching most of the light-
Do you realize that we are pin wheeling on the Edge of the universe,
And you are the most beautiful thing I have ever seen?

Robert Rorabeck

Fade

Only in rhymes
And silence then.
Empty hallways,
Ghost sitting inside cars
As it rains,
Something blue on the swings
In the northern park.
Trees weep beneath
Slate gray sky
And high heels down the lonely
Walk:
Her eyes observing the prairie
And she is very young,
There is so much sunlight
In the emptiness,
An empty theatre
Performs,
The thespian's tongue
And the mountains
And their young,
The city is a stranger,
She keeps her lights on
All night,
She makes love,
Unidentified
She is here
In the shadows touching me,
But I was wrong,
I must go away
The dogs are crying,
She doesn't know,
Trusting her eyes,
I was another man,
A mirage-
My heart is on
The night table
For the morning,
But I have disappeared.

Faded Page

Now with the greater light
Out
Gallop the underbelly
I cannot see the names
Of the things
God chose to cage me
With in this world's lonely exhibit;
With his light failing
Slink forth the scavengers,
The tinkers,
The half-blown men
Who take tickets to ride
The girations
I keep alone;
When the palate drips
Obliquely where
The mountains bleed,
And the clouds drape like
The inky tentacles of An octopus
And night's sea blinds
Our eyes
Like an owner
Trying to put a
Skittish horse in a trailer;
There I come,
Like a slinking skunk,
Like an industrious spider,
Like a scavenging racoon,
And put down the Restless things only I can See inside me
In oscillating marvels
On this faded page.

Fading In The Spanish Sky

Under the buffalo road,
Through the windy tunnels in Spain,
We lost ourselves and fell in love:
She had eyes lacquered with marriage,
And her paintings sold in Japan;
In Catalan, walking down from
Her second house, she showed me
Where Salvador Dali was born
Upside down from a tree of clocks
And he smiled at us before we walked away:
Then he was just a smile,
As the Spanish Armada watched
Jesus baptize Generalissimo Franco
In a sea of Neapolitan ice-cream,
Before they set out for England
In the fated storms that would sink the empire;
While we drank sangria in the bay
Where the wind tore the sash from
The lady in the rocks,
And the Roman ghosts marched through
The dry orange groves,
And spoke as the wind through the Green leaves cradling the fruit
Of an ancient womb.
Now, nothing is as it was before,
For we lost her grandfather's guitar
On a train that crossed the border
Into France on Christmas Day,
With nothing to do but to kiss in
The empty streets, and wait for the sun
To sanctify the clouds, as dawn
Married the world;
Now all of this has disappeared,
And she is a grandmother hanging
Her memories in a show in Madrid,
And the time passes slowly like the Wind off the cliffs,
Where all the old ghosts gather like
The torn curtains rippling on the battlements,

Above the town where the virgins are all engaged,
And the little boys, in their Summer trancies, don't even see,
As they light off the stolen fireworks,
The beautiful things leaping in the sky,
Things that are for their brilliant seconds,
Fading in the sky,
And then no more.

Robert Rorabeck

Fading Rainbows

Its so hard to begin with
The pronoun that could be
A dog,
A ba$tard,
A son while I
Read my books and weep,
Jogging in my basement
While the movies run:
I am ready to move out near the Muddy threads,
Ready to audition for an Original voice,
The bachelor's blood,
My transcendental imaginations:
So, even without liquor,
I think that this is good,
And should be read and tattooed
Upon her body's pink chariot
While she holds her breath and watches;
And I even think that now her eyes
Are expecting this,
And now reading it her lips
Curl pleasantly redacted like roses drinking,
Even though it is only average;
And some lions maim the brave Christians,
And afterwards the flies hover around the Windows, the voyeuristic loading bays and docks,
Tax collectors for the great American pies,
Coagulating,
And the fading rainbows leap washed out
Into the tan dumpsters,
Little children ardently riding tricycles which Squeal and grate each time with rust,
The oaks clinging overhead as they try and Hide those scars- In fact,
They are also weeping.

Robert Rorabeck

Fail To Mention

Bragging of the silence,
The emptiness after the last of the echoes
Of really great music
Have gone away, and stepped off the buses;
And I watch two brothers jerking
Each other off,
And have to be disappointed that it is only
Figuratively-
And I read Borges, and want to kill myself,
Because I am not Borges:
I am just doing this- Maybe I a betting for Divine Providences at the races,
Hoping that my tongue will be loose and Skip well through the mud of My liquors:
Doing this to quench the tears that I am not
More,
That there is another, much blacker man right
Now fulfilling the swing-set
I want to get on,
Just as my dreams of her will undoubtedly for always Go unfulfilled,
And it is a slick circuit, and a turning wheel,
And the potter's clay is all ghosts,
And I am the irony of the opposing pre-Socratics,
Turning all at once into something that should Never be repeated,
Getting nowhere all the time,
As the rivers flow in sheets of eyes where here eyes turn
Towards so banally,
And yet fierce, when her husband is away
Doing very important things I should not fail to Mention.

Robert Rorabeck

Failing Tonight's Class

I could buy a house now, almost,
And direct it over your grave- and mute you as silently
As anything so beautifully failed into the intricacies of such A spacious earth.

And even now only a 100 hours after the nappy haired
President has laid down in ju-ju for the first time in the querulously
Painted halls who had previously mastered his grandfathers,
They are salaciously criticizing his first decisions,
Beginning the swift matriculation of his exploding-head suicide:

Even now, though, I am too impressed by my infatuations
With the voluptuously breasted bartender to give a damn about his Midnight; In fact, is what I mean is I am too drunk to be writing poetry,
And then what I do conscribe is too wordy to be lauded by liberal professors
Who are recognized for their criticism;

Right now I might be yet too scarred to give a damn,
But I am working as steadily limbed as a Roosevelt towards my America's Well0built tomorrows to give a damn about grammatical errors;
Dreamily, I am still skipping seventh period history, and drinking
Golden rum from Bodicelli's half a clam to give a damn about
What I meant to say previously;

Plathe's Ariel is laudably fantastic, and I am leaping for it
The fable of the red haired fox with his grapes; when I am and so Many others on their mortal fleet shall never reach it; Still,
I don't care- I scratch at flees- Six years ago I played Mrs. Pac-Man to The left of her, the yet single barmaid good enough to be a flight attendant
In high heels I want to come into:

I just finished fourteen pages today, living a life in a catacomb I've Long since died into and thrown upon the oleander bouquets of another
Flower I am too drunk to recall the proper name of which I mean:
She lays down tonight in his He-Man bed, to drunk to also to be
With any other cartoon; but it is good enough,
Even as my scarred visage is being considered by two NY literary agents:

I forgive it all and will even give it time to nurture:

I didn't vote for him, but have enough consideration to offer
The quaff of water from the palms of my immortal occult:
When they have given him enough time, there will be enough werewolves

Between he and his daughters to give reason to regret:
For now there is only history and the wide open deck of aircraft
Carrier on a secret mission, and her blonde hair flowing salty
And altruistically official.

Robert Rorabeck

Failing You In The Mortal Night

If you let me love your shadow,
I will follow you in and out of stores, my tongue
Never touching anything but your souls:
And I am failing, failing like a kite with not Too much wind- Doing something that is Anti-social,
Not bothering hunting out the eggs for Easter,
Or Passover,
Not having any religion which isn't pentagrammed-
I can smell my rum,
And you eyes all the way from the racecourses,
From the glacial glades where no one mows your yards
Because they cannot get that high;
And if you can hear my screaming, do not care,
Know that it is just a dusky dream- something a poor
Boy does because he doesn't have tack for his horse,
But his flock is alright-
He's just upset because he's outgrown his mother
And her bed- That he's lost all his money betting on a girl
That has no business loving him- who shows to her
Every night his two unshelled wrists, and gets no reply
Except when there is a fire under her skirts,
And that happens as much as the good guy wins;
And now let there be silence except for the sparse code of Bare canopies on power lines over your house
Waiting until there comes the paper snowflakes, the thunder
Of rolled cannonballs and the other theatrics of this Winter's burlesque resort- Every so often the skiers slosh
Through the snow and you look up,
Hoping like me that they will enter, but unlike me,
Who looks for milky friendship, you the Madonna with the Rich child already suckling,
Only needs them to buy the spirits they entered for
And then to leave by the same way they came in.

Robert Rorabeck

Fail-Safe

It is impossible for you to fail, but you have already Begun- Your family is on a honeymoon,
As swift as you the rivers run:
All your exercise is for the tourism of paddle-boats;
They think you are infinitely beautiful,
But they don't want to have to pay for anything that is Beautiful
If it can be stolen away, and used to populate their Keyholes and garages;
And I have been above them; I have been at the top of A flag-pole,
And watched the weathers roll in to cover you:
They were always watching you, as I was watching them,
And saw you reflected as if through the perfect somnambulance
Of a bath;
Or I am just lying, and I still live with my parents,
But now our home has wheels and there are no dogs.
The trees still lead down to the canal, and if I were to ever
Step across I am sure I would not end up in the trailer park
Which seems to be there,
But underneath the lotus flowers they are cutting for your Hair;
And you are in your store so fair with the foot traffic coming in,
The middle-class families of gypsies. I know they will buy everything,
Because the weathers are like your guardian angels,
Burning rubber off the lips of mountains;
And they are just as sure as I am that you can never fail.

Fairytales That Cannot Be Counted Upon

Lapses in the rituals of her eyes,
And other things that don't provide anymore
Promises for salvation;
The churches are all tucked in underneath the Melting snows:
The windmills chew themselves,
And the deltas divide like the winnows of a
Fan,
Each prong pollinated by each one of her
Mermaids-
The fish looking grimly up to the brotherhood
Of her otters,
And it all swims for awhile back and forth,
Telling to itself fairytales that cannot be counted upon.

Faith In Her Ever Effluvious Dress

Headless and naked,
The dandelions have begun to blow
Their spores.
No longer virginal, they will become
All but indescribable come winter,
And atheists will say that now they Are a myth, and pull the lever of
The machine, to see what prizes fall
Out from the golden ring of her science;
But like pricks from nervy spines,
Or the cold shock of the invaded lake,
I should not shake off how I imagined to see
Rows of devout soldiers queuing like ants up
To her phototropic stems,
And in the cavalcade of ceremonial suicides,
Mounted her like toddlers climbing up atop
The four-post bed where they were conceived
In the sun-tossed basin,
And floating away on the gilled parachutes,
Like ghostly bouquets tossed over her shoulder
At the reception as the wind blows;
These then are their secret missions, the Diminutive espionage of a vanished spring,
They shrink into the lips of waves and join the City-dwellers in atoms of water dispelled along
The foamy caesuras and crests, measuring
Only beside the dolphin's fins,
Metropolises of unspoken numbers which twirl
In the chaotic universe without centripetal ellipses;
These I know, from faith in her ever effluvious
Dress.

Faithful And Beloved Pets

My houses look like they have survived the fall of Their bust
To land on the wicked witches of their ruby toed trust;
And now I am out of liquor,
And the parks glide like silent, water-killed rainbows
Through the darks of all this metropolis:
This is how it is going every night without candles.
And somewhere close Diana is sleeping- and further Away you are sleeping;
And up in the mountains Sharon suckles her child while
Her husband congratulates himself with farts of jokes;
And I am doing this like a rodeo clown, suspecting that Kelly has it in for some other man,
But all the time either wanting you or something else,
While my poems die like billfolds, like forlorn trusts;
And yet there are places yet perceived underneath the overpasses;
There are green copper cannons that I can still trust;
And the sea is just off a pace; and I almost touched her today;
And later on I touched myself and I am gray:
And I am a story book you will never read, Erin. How beautiful
You are physically to believe in nothing,
And I wish to speak to you again, but I hate you; and you are Like a dangerous and venal flower being sniffed by the nostrils of An extremely disastrous crocodile, E- And I want to love you,
But you are a movie that has sold out in a theatre full of brown faced Though innocuous men, like something I have failed but Can never understand; so keep to the contagion of your camps
And those things that you can enjoy,
Because I really want for you to love something, to prove myself wrong;
To prove I am an amputee in my failed art, Erin:
That I don't or should not exist, and the graveyard is yet blooming,
And your lips are yet beautiful and even now bending down
To enjoy the snout of your faithful and beloved pets.

Robert Rorabeck

Faithful Mountains

Maybe the mountains curl around
The haunts of your neighborhood,
And you awaken in the strange contracts
Of the scientists perfecting hope-
The entire forest is expectant, seems to be Pregnant with the thoughts of your senses;
And all the houses are made from Those dead ancestors who used to celebrate
The wind and figured the airplanes
As the higher hopes of god.
Each snowflake falls for you, Is Attracted to you like faithful metal,
Curls and whispers around your cooing daughter
Like faeries,
And you don't have to wonder, tucking her in What her first word will be,
Because it is certain to be as beautiful as your Own language blessing that sky that curls up
Against your faithful mountains everyday.

Faithfully Home

Trees have been growing
Up beside the streets- and the Indian reservation:
Navajos get drunk with dogs and Fleas-
They fall amidst the trees, which sometimes
Collapse upon each others shoulders,
Like consorting friends-
Twins that multiply all through out the green
Sun showers in the valley:
They copulate up one side the mountain and Down the other-
And they fill those spaces with a fraternity of Wilderness:
And we sometimes walk through their Crowds with our dogs,
Find our way sometimes, and losing it others-
And the roads twist like ribbons in her hair-
Green monument-
Like the first goddess of the earth-
Sometimes they say she is beautiful, as she spits
Out cobras and badgers
And wolverines-
And the rivers run down from the lakes of her
Eyes,
And the evergreen forest never loses her
Complexion,
Though the Indians never sing anymore-
But they get drunk and dance
Just as quietly as ancestors lost forever in her Bosom-
As the sunlight lays trapped in her pools and Estuaries,
And daydreams with crustaceans underneath
Her canopy,
Painting the fibers of arachnids with their Iridescent pools of daylight,
Until all of her beauty disappears in the blindness
Of her night,
And the Indians become happily lost,

And the dogs follow us faithfully home.

Faithless Home

I can't go back home-
My father is waiting to tell me what
I'm worth:
The sun is setting, watercolor on the Sullen earth:
I am worth one racing horse,
And I am scarred; I can work like a dog,
But what about my balls to be entrepreneurial?
And I just want to write a poem,
One poem that shouldn't burn:
An irrefutable, beautiful term that should Banish any other words for how you've Perceived the city's world:
Everything you had to say like a painful joke:
I want to roll up and smoke every green wave,
Every misplaced love:
I want a poem to be beautiful, my epitaph into
The vulgarities who multiplexed ascend down
From this drooling tip:
This end, but here is what I've had to say for it,
Like bricks in the mausoleum,
And here the people are, professional tourisms,
Taking their cars and lovers
To get washed and manicured.

Fall In Love With The Great Abstainer

How to break this form- Fall in love with the Great abstainer, two horns; ride the riverr too tough
To cross, pillow fight angels:
I still want to skip school, receive my degree from the Greenwood,
Procure the golden bough, become some king before
The next knife fight,
But I am blowing revelries to a dead regiment,
The seashell cavalry trundles around the hips of burying
Children,
Average in the sand out of hotel rooms; mothers tanning
Their souls back in the suns shadows,
High school heirlooms, drunken goddesses who lost their Bloom,
Rich and muggy- Should have gone to Harvard
Trailer-park; now the pay check is nothing but the next
Rum- car payment: Girls on the boulevard rollerskate,
Ice-cream, lick their rings around tourism's runny; it doesn't Pay for it. The entire park is in need of a graveyard; and What have I done.

Another name for Ireland, an older name,
Was Erin, or maybe she was their capital, or their king:
I can't resist misspelling it the misdone deeds of the young;
The more superstitious religious have to kill their king;
And I've forgotten how to unbutton exegesis, marble
Fawns run broken into yards; Trojan horses for spare preschool Children- Spartans spar with the agoraphobia of a broken Heart, mistrusting the bloodsplatter of gods who were off
To work, preoccupied with another alphabet;
And all around the brightly falsely, the sharpening cart is full:
Sky high- Read books all summer, and put them done,
Feeling up the produce, look around:
But you didn't go to Ivy League: You are with me here
In the dirt: Listen to them crocodile's weeping,
Are kids are kicking in the soccer field, good boys; but Where are the waves- waves anyway,
We're almost done unbuttoning.

Falling Away From Our Earth

About those sad things which rise up and fall
Perpetually to and from this earth,
God sends the rains in a sideways motion
The gray spoonfuls he feeds those empirical children,
The proof of his courtship with the world.
He does such gardening by a gentle light—
See now, he takes her by the waist and drags her
About the fading dance floor; Drunkenly,
Around and around as if he is having fun. She Swoons in full seasons for him, so her clothes fall off
Like waves leaving the shoreline of her knees and thighs
And she births in her great natures of orphaned children
Which roll forth upon the earth in migrating extinctions.
For, he's already gone away, leaving his cadmium residues
Like lost soldiers calling blasphemies from the caves
Where the Holy Virgin is in Pieta with her stillborn son—
Listen now, through those falling rains,
And you may hear again the sounds of his footsteps falling,
Falling away from our earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Falling Down

It feels okay like this—to know that we are Going nowhere while the cities built up like
Permanent playgrounds
Around us, while she didn't know if she loved us—
But it took her awhile, so she never forgave us—
The gravity like the sun occupying us on these Rides, the four ways to find her, groping with our Loins, whilst the seniors were graduating,
And my newborn son in his castanet was looking Up the streams of heavens, hoping that it would Be god who was falling down.

Robert Rorabeck

Falling In Love With Foxes

Cool as the road is going, goes I,
Underneath the open unabashed day gone sky:
Full of new reposes and places off to the side
To rest and lay easy, and with arms wide open glide:
Receptive to the two lips of wind,
Following the marks of the weathervanes:
Going forth and back again,
Reticulating to the uneasy senses and maybe right over Holidays of football games and entire student bodies without their Senses:
Maybe it is I am saying just the things that have no need for saying,
That have already been said and so now in the grass are laying;
But I am still gladdened for these sorry gifts,
These back and forths a back agains, these crisscrosses
Over her heart or some other vital organ, these leeward intersections
To fairytales unspoken:
These gentle crosses also to those previously mentioned fables
Where housewives truly can do falling in love with foxes.

Robert Rorabeck

Falling In Love With Yesterday's Light

Mother,
I want another cigarette.
I come into your room
When you are not looking,
And when you are asleep
And worship you using the Matchbox cars
And paper airplanes I still Remember.
I keep an eye out for the cops
When it rains-
I watch the purple ants biting
Your tits-
The traffic still continues
On for miles leaking and Histrionic from cities I've Never been- mother,
I have a book published like
A little polite brother-
You don't understand,
If I were to die tomorrow I
Should still live for a few years
More.

Robert Rorabeck

Falling Into My Arms

The forest is waltzing right underneath
A pickled moon,
And the dungeons are all emptied, and the housewives
Are sweeping:
And I don't even live here, but I keep coming up to The surface and breathing,
Sticking my head through Alma's window and kissing
Her three times,
Like the structure of childhood folklore before she could Drive away,
Promising to see me in the morning and come to My house to do the laundry:
So now I feel like a hero, and all of the monsters are Hibernating:
There is time on my hands, and the world is at large,
But it is just an overgrown living room
With healthy lamps speaking over the propitious
Dinners:
And the trees are smoking while the hearty gods smoke
Their pipes:
And I pick green things for Alma, but I don't even have To before she is falling into my arms.

Falls City

The factories of our lives
The managers
Create us on the assembly
Line of needing parts
The duality of sexes
Requires insertion
Like light sockets
Like a slaughter house
To come undone in Midwestern planes abandon/ feeding it/
Streets and long fertile Fields roofs and fences
Fencing overweight lives
Fed on troughs of bright TV
Caged in by slick cords
Of power-line and preaching Elvises
Towering sentinel communication
Towers broadcasting sparks
Above the prefabricated
Houses across the street
From paradise city trailer parks
Lined up in rows of Forgotten promises and Christmas tree lights
Subordinates to the factory
Processed meats
Great conveyor belts
Running down hands
To put us together on
The long dead end roads
Of dust
Of America's heartland
Forever looking out windows
Seeing inside the panes
Trains leaving down the tracks
Of another's childhood
While the power lines
Stream with electric
Clatter

Familiar Song

My great middle-class evil
Going out to lunch
And dinner dates,
Spending your monies wisely,
Apathetic to my scars
And how beautifully they might make me,
In a far away and lonely light
Exhumed from the disastrous water-
Drenched proms;
You have to strain your neck to look
Down on me- How told,
I am apart from you,
I am diminished and scribbling out the directions
To the golden chalice you keep Pell-mell discombobulated in the backseats of
Your cars;
And you have so many children
And apostrophes you don't know how to use them,
So you just sling them like Jackson Pollock
And somehow they turn out all-right;
And you have horses, but they are all on poles,
And all your dreams you have to wait for in lines
In vast amusement parks,
And in every aspect they cost you a dollar two,
Even for the common everyday hot-dog;
And it all ads up
When I have relocated to a sea banished of Corpulent tourisms,
When the eager-black turtles are undoing your Sandcastles and making great black clutches to Inseminate themselves, and bare gurgling broods
Next to the weave of her salty gown;
And all these things are going into her
And simultaneously away from you,
And I follow them like an unwashed French boy following Wolves;
And they call her the whale-sea,
And no matter what you say you can not develop
Into her; in fact, she may be coming into your neighborhood,

Sweeping it clean with the nudity of Her pantheistic sororities,
And then how might you cry for me looking for A door to knock from those vengeful caesuras;
But somehow I cannot hear you,
Because this tends to happen through the great
Carelessness of time;
And you have already driven away from this Song,
And are now enjoying ice-cream under a
Fairy-light
With equal distance to the church and park,
And airplanes go leaping over your heads like
Strange, overzealous folkloric angels,
None of them laden with led balls or witchcraft
While I am fantasizing in a tree you can't remember
Where the little ripples grow and the sad hummingbirds
Dip,
Where I am in tattered raiment, drinking of beautiful
Women you couldn't possibly understand; who, sadly,
Couldn't possibly know me.

Robert Rorabeck

Fancy Fib

I can carry on without you without any
After affects; You left me for his morning sickness,
And figured I should be all alone with my scars,
Most evenings to be found reading Dickinson in graveyards;
My bicycle you didn't give me sleeping well besides:
And this is where I am, and the sky is a wonderful tarp
Hung far over the wrought-iron fences,
And the old dead armies always to be segregated;
And even before the storm, the ants are busy masticating
Bird carcasses; and I can smell her on the storm,
And she is not you; you never where but a heirloom
Pinned on my existence, something else to go through My door, to share my bed and pets with:
And now that is gone for coming near a decade;
Can't you see, you never where but a thing well decorated,
Never were the sea, or the woman inside of her who I will Always love- Never were but a thing of fancy fibs,
Sometimes beautiful if well told, but gifting nothing but time
Into the ears of your listeners- Now take his hand and proceed
Through the gentle ways by such you have been gilded:
Go into the brightly lit room and share teeth and eyes and Family; but do not share me: I go on my own way now, homeless,
Untied to the little lies you molted, the little rings you stole:
The sky is unbound and ceaseless and I'll drive under her even While she turns green; in all of her darkening colors
Heedlessly pillared and threatening your busy suburban happenstance;
And the sea is uneducable; it cannot be financed-
I blow her kisses from the castille where I march duty free,
And all the ancient wanderers of her conquests roam with me,
Flipping well-filled by her salty being; we gossip through the
The living and the dead, knowing nothing transient, and not a one of them
Hears who you are, for I would not tell them such a lie.

Robert Rorabeck

Fantastic Patriotism

America killed a unicorn,

And turned on all the lights
Throughout the defeated forest;

We started to drive our cars around
Her, and didn't stop until we'd had a good cry.

And someone made a movie.
And some attended home economics,
And some ate cornpone,
And some had a drag race;

And some debated,
And some relaxed
And stripped down to their bathing suits
And I swam in her light
Which was still effusive and not dispersed;

And the celebrations
Lasted a long time,
Well after July 4th
By most estimates;

And even after the rain,
The fuses evaporated hissing into cones,
The lawn littered and welcoming weeds,
And everyone up and gone back into the suburbs
Aglow from the chandeliers hanging from white popcorn,
The nostalgias
All alone,

There she lay
Yet beautiful and yet dead-

Far Above Another World

Pleased as the pleasant bees taking over
A small corner of the house—
Little wildflowers outside sipping of the sunbeams—
In just a slant of a garden,
The forest otherwise over grown—making a poetry of The inner space—
Little windows looking through keyholes—
A little goldfish swims back to his garden—a little girl
Holds hands
And examines the ribbon of a canal—maybe she lives
In a fish bowl, or at least a trailer park—underneath the Talking lines—only if she ever looked so
Beautiful as to ever be my muse—
The parks lay barrenly across from her—the mountains
Gather up their news—
Wild horses on the forefront of a graveyard of missing
Parents—Airplanes making an apiary in the Sky over a forest fire lactating a breakfast
Of honey and eggs—
As stewardesses get together begging to be remembered
As they keep continuing far above another world.

Far Away From Here

I put your name in all of my meals:
I ride around with your syllables on my wheels;
And your besos are my wings,
When you skip around and kiss me open mouthed
In the rain,
Like a scratching record choosing its own tunes to Pick up:
Your body is as light as a kite, it feels like a butterfly on My swing;
And when I get low, my suicide gets distracted by your Kites:
Pulled away by the wrists of your children.
Alma, I become a coloring book waiting open mouthed
For the first signs of the storm:
Hurry, now, Alma and color me in:
All of your hopes and inspirations tattoo onto my open
Wrists who is like a mistress or a song bird
For you,
Before I bleed, before I steal bicycles and buy rides
Far away from here.

Far From Reality's Home

Places of fealty in my soul have dried
Up- Are scars slathered with green algae the Toads with sun stream eyes matriculate toward-
I put myself in the middle of pantheistic mountains,
With Diana's doorways to other worlds
Of fan fiction and accolades; but, oh Jove,
I am getting old, and nothing that I thought was Beautiful has ever sold;
And down by the crick she takes her men, luring
Them with bottles of copperhead gin-
She lays down with them in grasses her father mows,
And makes her living preening under comely parasols-
And when its over and the earth is quiet,
The sunbeams orangish and westerly, the airplanes drowsing
Like the earthbound souls of the lower angels,
The elk come preening, each felted horn an opportunity
Toward feral religion; they gather around the tatters Ofa lover, folded through like lost kites disproved in the Woods- the elk bugling the sorrowful calls of planets
Without life, but they never awaken, neither man nor Wife.

Far Too Late For Me

You have no idea how cold it gets Alone in the car
With the dogs lost up on the mountain,
And you are still doing this
And no one else- The moon would seem to be Looking curious over the lip on the Other side of the road where the coyotes'
Silhouettes lope; but you are no longer
Sure- it may just be her nature to seem that Way- what glows heavenly obtuse from the Other end of the marionette,
The little boy's dream who escaped from his Father,
Stealing whatever automobile there was,
And driving down the road to do everything badly:
Now I've buried my fool's gold in
The hills which seemed to be at the same time her
Bosom, and am waiting for them to bud;
But the seasons have come earlier this year,
And soon it will be her birthday, and she will forget
The stunts I've pulled: Maybe it is her nature,
To be the beautifully polished stone the tourist's
Bribe- Changing as the colors of the wine she sells
Swirls, hypnotizing, somnolent:
But I don't know: Everything with half a brain has Already flown south for the winter, to get there in Time for the matinee; but I don't know- I haven't Bought a new pair of jeans in over a decade,
And my wrist is naked of any sort of time piece,
But I don't need to know the hour to know that it is Already far too late for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Far Too Sweet Or Too Sudden

A thief and then a liar pass over the two dueling overpasses
Who are fighting their ways into the jungle of heaven:
Words break down about them, and are disregarded and fed to
The toothless lions looking with uneager vanity into
The shallows where the blue gills are mating,
Where the suddenly dashed bicycles rest;
And it oh so happens tonight that Alma does not join her brown
Loins to my pale streets:
She sleeps with a man who ran away from Mexico with her,
Who ran away from her and then back again, crossing the frontera
So many times, seemingly unafraid of saber tooth's:
Certainly he hasn't read these comic books, and his pornographies
Are all alone,
Even though he will be losing sweet Alma again come the next
Downy morning, when I sing to her like the carnivore of a blue jay,
Like a wolf in the forest of a candy store;
And somehow she has recognized me and called me in, and her body
Presents a storm of Ferris Wheels down across the empty bones in me,
And plays there a melody so fickle and so real,
That I can never capture for a meal, nor own as something for to sell;
But she will sing down to me again by the successive displays of
The sun,
A firework with a pulse, a happenstance of an apathetic providence,
Far too sweet or too sudden to understand.

Robert Rorabeck

Farther Away From Her

Long avenue that is the serpent of our history,
We live in trailer parks that do not exist
And drink beer beneath the deer antlers—and go outside
In the rainstorms for a piss—
And I have loved my women here—browned skinned
Daisies continuing up into the stars:
Goldilock's who do not know whenever they will Be getting home—
And love that disappears into the insouciant of nocturnal
Bars:
Feelings in the rhythms of my glass—another way to go
Home before I sleep—
Terrapin and hobos sleeping beneath the overpass—
Soft whispers against her absent minded cheek—
The lactations of a world that moves so far away from here—
Crystal clear rivers bleeding from an ocean
That rushes nearer and then farther away from her.

Robert Rorabeck

Fast And Fleeted Heart

Because I haven't caught her yet,
I'm casting out again letting this silver net
Of lies free to sink and entangle about her
Pinkish knees, where she rests wading
Upon the briny knolls reading books to selkies-
The women who come up half amused
To stare when in the daylight they have lungs,
And lips to smooch, and mollusk tongues,
And appetites to preach from sea up to sun.
There as if imagined by Botticelli, with Eyes of cousins they stare for awhile amidst
Those interpretive eddies which fasten to rocks
When the tide exhales, they learn of the Others' declivities, and how the souls unfasten
When they sleep and swim around
Murmuring their subconscious dreams and shopping,
And I become but an interrupting wave of Masculine instinct breaking once upon them
And then away, back again into all the others
Bemoaning their loneliness and playing sports
In the brief enraptures of entangled brethrens,
The nets I threw nothing more than a spider's
Spume, a roaring chorus on the shoals, which lapped
Her knees with scrawling drool, the unbanished
Light quickly scrubbed away, and took the memory too
Of the finite wave I was, leaving my mark well
Below the bosom of her fast and fleeted heart.

Fast Food Graffiti

People who don't write well
Will be forgotten:
Good, bad, or indifferent
It doesn't matter.
Your name might be Mentioned in Dante's Divine Comedy
Going down or Coming up,
All this virtue
Condensed in the few lines,
Reflected upon by Virgil,
But who reads it anymore:
You might have the Highest office
In all the world,
But I don't know you;
Look at the stick of a bird,
No wider than a finger
In the middle of my hand;
It is singing your name,
And me?
The least of all
The scribbled egos
In a Super Walmart's bathroom,
Trying to get laid;
I am not even done
And already no one
Can remember
Who I am.

Fastly Fading Noons

I am drained by people,
And the subtleties their eyes can put upon a body,
The small business adventures they go on,
When the sky is open to them like a freshly eaten shell.
I am aware of the traffic on all these streets,
Like concrete tributaries to the greater good-bye;
If you spend so many years with schoolmates
Only to watch them latch on to their new work,
Forgetting the casual love that must have pricked them eventually;
I can go back to those neighborhoods in a sober
Calming rain, and walk those avenues yet fully grown,
And I will not recognize a single person,
Though the landscaping is the same beautiful resilience
Of thatching green and budding red, the storm makes Fertile and quivering;
I can go to the park where I skipped school, the dream
Of the somber girl still waiting for me on the swings;
But she is not there- the desire is a ghostly place,
And she is far away in a brilliant new suite smartly defending
Her client, earning her way, loving a male of her new Socio economic privilege;
Slowly, the houses grow weary of the parade of families,
And their facades dull, their gutters weep and dribble in
The cold, salty storm;
And I can lie there for all my time, in the corner of a world
No longer belonging to anyone,
Watch a caterpillar disappear into a cocoon to come out something
New, but not me; As the river speaks and floods,
I go down the avenues of friends I don't know anymore;
All that I lost too soon, as if I were some unstable bystander
Who needed to step away.
There where they are singing in the softly glowing church,
Where I kissed her mouth and felt her leg in between the play's Rehearsals. The next week she was with someone else,
And I no longer snuck out of her window to watch the world
Smolder beneath the fastly fading noons.

Fata Morgana

Far above the adobe's swaddled dung,
Though yet beneath the formicaed solar-system
The care giving mountain squirts
Leaping sunlight from her tit
Like an effluvial stampede of floating doves:
Down, and down, and down
Into the open mouths of the receptive orphans,
So called, they grope her flank,
And climb upon her, the needing pups,
And towards her head they bank
Where the milk flows from the ancient glands,
As from the fountains gating the affluent neighborhood;
And listen as they mew and lick,
And rub against the adopted flesh,
So to her chin they grin and plump
As she lifts up her head and her eyes open
Like invisible moons, and thus she Gives life to the little things she Never cared to own.

Father Of Their Easy Captivity

These words may fall from my fingertips
Like gentled children
From their mother's breasts down into cribs,
But I do not know where they come from,
Save that there is gossip from the fields
From the tawny women whom winnow
The wheat in pollinated swaths of bucolic rapture,
That they have heard them once feral
And ill-natured running unwashed through the Great forests of northern France,
Before the king sent for chorus girls sequined
And feathered
Like song birds, their bosoms a perplexing ruby
Cleaved in a powdery river;
Thus was his plan, to capture the lycanthropes
Before they erased themselves, and calm them
And pluck them as peacocks paraded on pink marble,
The stones themselves raided from the virgin's grotto,
And put them here, now strolling along the concrete
Sidewalks of suburbia, where there are holidays,
And peaceful alligators glutted in the drainage,
And the sombulence of housewives, their secrets
In smooth blue cabinets, and ceiling fans that hypnotize;
Thus they fall down, teeth cleaned, bodies clothed
For the following morning's play,
And they go to sleep well fed but with short attentions.
They do not remember whom they belong to,
Nor should I concede to the committee before me,
To being their father of the easy captivity.

Robert Rorabeck

Fathomless

A deer in the cauldrons altogether:
Looking up, fathomless to the fathoms—
And stars and stars
Of places filled with ghosts—
Submarines lying in the trenches of the sea
And on Mars, Mars:
Two dogs leaping are her moons—
And in these streets at night,
The antithesis to Arizona's limbo—
And the things I saw today,
Riding on a bus, the caesuras of my wife's Legs, and the laziness of being alive
Brings us back to familiar places:
The dow in the meadow,
Eating grasses,
Chances upwards to see the ghost
As the moon, the thief,
Bends down to drink the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Featureless Resting Place

Happens here, and laughing- spilling out the perfumes
From the places that will not heal:
Just here alongside a highway, where ever we are:
Not exactly getting any of it out: not really believing in anything:
Stumbling upon some luggage in the dusk of the roadside
The tourists tossed out;
And our knees are scabbed, and our body weeps,
And how much longer I do not know:
I do not even have a map of the country that we are in, but something
Is singing in the grass- intent and venomd by purpose;
It is there singing of us, and to sleep to a place we must go;
While the conquistadors keep busy in the dunes foraging for Pornography,
And the traffic rushes like Mexican brooms, able to displace us
Even though we are not moving, but weeping for a kiss without Legs, slithering through the easement anonymous:
A lover's nameless bed, a featureless resting place.

Robert Rorabeck

Feelings Of Our Mutual Lonliness

I can still smell a muse's perfume as it
Draped me away in the car,
As the old devil of satanic providence drove me
Away from her:
Up in the morning in the field of clattery bones
Where the poisons drip from
The mêlée of old friends who never got my letters:
Her eyes I remember, the brown water marks
OF a sincere abyss:
The absence of furniture across a living room
With a canal on one side of it:
You were still in Mexico while I was growing up,
And I wonder how many butterflies have come and gone
Since then.
Over my burning sugarcane, like poisonous love letters,
Only to die in your arid Bosque,
Felt up by the fingers of death who know so well
Our feelings of mutual loneliness.

Robert Rorabeck

Feral Mother

It is easier not to make a sound.
Sound is the coming apart of words in
The imperfect senses of our mistaken
Reality:
Language, the social construct imposed
Upon our minds
Like birth—Thought, inseparable from Death, taught to us in school,
Senses sharing a common cause
In a neighborhood that shelters us.

The earth shelters the coffins and does not speak.
The multitudes without headstones are there
As they were before,
Matter animated for awhile
With the purpose of finding a job
That hopefully meets the status quo:

The rain speaks lucidly of this without saying
A word.
Nature is constantly wanting to take you back into
Her.
The forest is throwing her hearth of green
Arms,
But men, awakened by the minds of others,
Mistakenly deem themselves apart.

They have built homes to live apart from her
And airplanes to leap across her wet appetites
And warm caves;
But I look for her when I am alone
And not with other men.
I remember that I am an orphan stolen
To lie in beds,
To eat the meals that humanity has prepared for
Me,

While she watches me like a feral mother,
With a heart of beating oceans,

With Appalachian breasts,
With jaws of sincere obliteration.

Robert Rorabeck

Feral Wanderings

The wet body of blushing fountains,
Fieldtrips the night:
A swing-set in kindergarten's backyard:
You say you love her,
But the teacher thinks the tulips are for her:
When you travel,
You eat your mother's chicken soup:
It is not good, because she doesn't know you,
And you get sick:
She knows your sisters better,
But there is still the girl you love-
Sleeping on the rug next to you,
As you inch toward the paltry theft:
Soon you will be discovered,
As they line you up for the end of class....
Outside, the sky is a blue cabbage
Darkening off the sea, the thoughts
Of deeper men you don't yet fathom....
But even then you knew where she lived,
And your parents took you past her every day.
Then you could go to the woods
And be with your dogs,
As the rattlesnakes patterned the sleepy
Motes of sunlight,
The fractured rooms of slash pines,
Who still hold no thoughts for you
Amidst those feral wanderings....

Festival Of Russian Roulette

Wounded and lost,
Like a knight never to make love with
A princess again,
Or even eyes- Lost like a school yard
Of impotents,
Swaying to the sultry lips of minnows-
As it seems for awhile
That the entire conflagration can come up
With one word to describe
How they can never see her again:
Because she is gone forever
From this high school:
Gone up north,
Or transplanted across the sea- and I seem
For awhile lost through the heirlooms
Where I am not here-
Arduous perfume calling to a tempestuous
Love knowing that she can never Leave her batting cages,
But it rains and her weapons whisper as
They glisten and cry-
And maybe they never awaken for another
Breakfast again,
But what I know: I've kissed your mouth,
And fed you mine-
Your children are lovely,
And you will go out with them in the great
Hibernations of all of the weathers,
But you will not become my world:
Like a zoetrope jumping for a fox,
You captivate me with illusion-
And I watch out marriage like a silent
Film
Before a festival of Russian Roulette.

Robert Rorabeck

Fever Of Glowing Horses

Balled into a fever
Of glowing horses-
Broken-legged down in the Valley-
The clouds move over a
Well the naiads
Have fallen into
Whenever the flags are made
Out of the carcasses of Butterflies-
And your father's corpse
Roams the earth
Waiting for a king he can Finally Appreciate-

Robert Rorabeck

Fever Of Unkind Loves

I am dying, dying,
And the traffic doesn't give a piss;
And all these boys are born,
Fighting,
Sunburned pugilists.
And the night is up: it is real up
Like a carnival of cast iron,
And it wont be coming down for months,
And you'll love your boys and Flip over for them,
And the slash pines and the Australian pines
And the boys with better names
Will applaud and they will fight fires
And learn how to spell and some math,
But the traffic wont give a damn;
It won't hush,
It just continues on like the noise of a pilgrim on Its ways to Canterbury in a rush
Knowing without knowing that its author is dead,
And there are only so many things to Spell and misspell,
And the night is beautiful,
And the dunes- the dunes hold your eyes in the caesuras
And cenotaphs of burnished conquistadors,
As the traffic comes on insatiable,
And you teach school from your desk high on a
A fever of unkind loves.

Robert Rorabeck

Few Inches

A difference of a few inches
Counts big time within the species,
But I would rather stand very still
And let the red rubber ball
Sting my thigh, than play the game to the end.

Because even now the afternoon clouds
Are leaping like a herd of frightened elk
Over the ill-proportioned fences,
And soon mother and father's shift will end,
And they will be back around to drive me home.

Robert Rorabeck

Fictions The Truants Tell Themselves

Upon the bones of heavy slumbering
They cheated on their loved ones inside a bus
That was broken down in the School yard
That the heavy and unsolvable terrapins ate
Orchids underneath of
In the oil slicks of bled unicorns- Those Uneasiest of fictions the truants
Tell themselves as they bite their tongues
Just to make it to the other side of
The canal
To escapes those rooms where you have forever been Looking away from them.

Robert Rorabeck

Fields Of Barbed Wire

Eden in the cowslips—bluest sort of thing:
The airplanes are resting,
Lightning languishes, cerulean disease in the evergreens:
Making love to bears across the Stone nipples of that volcanic garden—
This used to be engulfed by a sea that has evaporated through
Some sort of abominable love,
And the blue cats take shelter in the tallest trees
Where my dogs whine for me all night
Lost across the valley where the Trailer parks snore like tin-nosed crocodiles—
Maybe it will be all right, as she sheds all of her tears—
Daughters of the pilgrims making love to Lost Indians, as the conquistadors glisten like rubies peeled
Away across the supple grasses, intermixed through so
Many fields of barbed-wire.

Robert Rorabeck

Fieldtrip To The Moon

Up the saddles of the high monuments-
Waiting with nose bleeds
Up the skirts of aspens- looking haughtily from
The fire towers,
Down through the break neck valleys into the Innumerable lost lovers-
Words that escape from here without mothers,
Feral and never paying taxes:
Going down nakedly, drinking melted snow:
Sated into the mowed greenery
And spikenard below the monastery as if plane
And shipwreck survivors:
Selling sets of knives to the belief of divinity:
Where the otters pray and slap tails for Housewives
Until there are rows of orange trees, and pools
The glisten eternally-
In a suburban boudoir underneath a fieldtrip to
The moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Fieldtrips Of Summers Gone

Too far away from fieldtrips of summer gone-
Of goods things of past young gods,
Of words that ring these feral bells-
You really alter my artistic horizons, but how much
Do you care,
Now that the summer of my beauty is gone:
And there are no more unicorns in the tides surcease,
In the ways of going down far from the east:
No roller coasters or roasted peanuts, tamed alligators
Out sunburst eyes in wicked crepuscule,
While helicopters hang low over wine gardens,
And there are dunes where bicycles lay asleep half doused
Like shed crustaceans,
And I don't know where I am going-
And you are out in your classroom trying to create little Things that never fall down,
But your lips have been unsealed and you have gone up
Through the deep surprises of his field,
And the traffic pauses to be surprised at your romantic Silences,
But you never stop and wander where I have fallen and Am unmendable-
Just some busted guy now indescribable and indisposed
To great breasted witches down in the long shadow
Of the other side of the wall.

Robert Rorabeck

Fieldtrips To The Zoo

Oregon girls have orgasms
Orangutans have them too—
Sometimes I think of you
And then it passes
Like forgetful children meandering from
Fieldtrips to the zoo.

Robert Rorabeck

Fieldtrip's Truancies

Watching alligators farting like
Bottle rockets,
The butterflies spinning like
Jumping Jacks,
Dancing like Ants in
A possum's a$$hole.

Robert Rorabeck

Fifty Fifty

I have given to the world
Much of my Beautiful parks and Estuaries
But never once
Has any of its Traffics
Stopped to Even consider
To offer in return
But a kiss
Or a day spent holding hands
And
Perambulating a place
That half reflects her beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

Fighting Romeos

Look how quickly my inky bugle scrolls the air,
Sending out in the spider's fingers
The madcap rows of my fighting Romeos:
Without a general, they are leaping over the ditches
You have set up with your reserve, to nock them down,
Your silence putting many of them to sleep,
The euthanasia you garden, cultivated to keep a distance:
And your eyelids drawn upon the windows
Of your body's house, when you crawl into familiar estuaries:
Disbanded, like the valiant zygotes which Will one day penetrate your cyclical eggs,
Like the victorious knights at a jousting contest,
They search you out alone,
Some the wanderers of a lonely country,
Nodding under the overpasses of careless men
Who, arriving too early, find you in an unripened bed;
Others, the seafarers, like otters
Looking for you through the oystered fluids,
Drawn to the wetness your eyes partake of them,
The sea creatures who swim on your daydreams
When the rains shutter on the roofs
Of your old classrooms, noticed until the weather passes:
Here are my few surviving romances,
Cleaned up, they wish to take you out on a date,
And they will fight for you like brilliant tigers;
If they knew where you lived, they would send you
Springtime hillsides of extroverted daisies;
If they knew your key, they would already be inside.

Robert Rorabeck

Figuring That I Have Everything Down

Now you get out into this night; and you don't Wonder, you just go, go, go:
I think you have graduated- I think you are even more Beautiful than I have eyes for:
Maybe you are even my mother, but I am not thinking about
You,
Or hurrying to get along with a quest for you:
There's a whole waiting list for that, and your species of blue
Eyes and bangs:
No, I'm just drinking liquor with my feet up thinking about
You; maybe I am even singing, but I am no good at it,
Licking my lips to the sport of grizzly bears and obnoxious
Strong me who are possibly just your lovers;
And you have them all conquered, and they are just defeated
In a valley where there is no bashfulness, where nothing
Ever falls down into, and that is why there is no pleasure;
Or, you know, that is why I have won,
Because I haven't had to go a step out into the naughty weather
To touch you: I have you right here, spinning in the moan
Of gypsies, and you cannot get away,
Because you don't want to, figuring that I have everything
Down which could be worth anything to you.

Robert Rorabeck

Filling In Blanks

You don't dance
Or read to me anymore;
And I am all grown up,
While upstairs there is a distant female
Voice saying hello,
But you are probably working and
Lucky for it,
Because of all your great stuff
And easy bounce;
While those twisted men, those men like
I am,
Will soon lose everything:
At the track or somewhere close,
And not beckoned in will crawl into gutters
And into ditches,
Brothers to the crocodiles,
And look up the skirts of sweet young
Tornadoes,
As the country dries up and turns into Kansas, a toothless fairytale,
Where even the most renowned pugilists
Are out of breath from so many hapless blows,
And young wives go weeping towards
Empty swings,
And entire flocks of houses are left abandoned,
Heartless and naked,
And green recedes like a salt-licked tide,
And bones look pretty thrown bleached and Saturnine through such influential happenstance;
And if I were to find you there,
And we both got out of our cars and approached,
Shyly across the callous lane
Above the flea markets of silent permanence,
What could I say to you knowing
Even then you would not read my poems;
But instead look forward to that balding sea,
For even though dying her love was indifferent
To unconditional soul.

Film

I wanted to make a film of our love,
But it is better to walk away someplace else,
To fornicate with strangers
In a Hollywood movie;
But your eyes are projecting on the screen
Flashes of light skipping children
Around a desolate tree
In a lightning storm.

The purpose of filming you
Is to show the incredible beauty you exude
When you sit in the satin chair in A Victorian meadow
And stare outward as If seeing a secret girl
Skinning her knees in a Narrow passageway into
The sky:

For a moment there seems to be nothing,
But then you notice there is a color to it,
As your eyes search the tiniest swath
To the left (Which means you are telling the truth)
There is the sound of your flesh panting,
Like a kitten scratching at the kitchen door,
And of the microscopic
Combing in the field of trimmed grass,
Death and field-mice cleaning
Their likely plates.

The purpose of the art form
Is to show the stratification of human life,
To get laid because you do something competently
In the motionless conviction
Sitting in the rainstorm.
Your blouse is papier-mâché
Glued to your breasts,
Your eyes the conduits through
Which the audience appreciates

The wind is corrugating the lake.
The waves in perfect phalanx
Dying on shore,
The power of invisible force
Revealed like a harem of ghosts
In the rising smoke curling from
A cigarette's cherry.

The cautious adversary,
I use field-glasses to watch you
Cross your legs
As raindrops meet up and celebrate
In drunken rivulets
Down your shins.

Deliberately, your gaze turns
To a place off-camera
Where you seem to see
Something you recognize....

Robert Rorabeck

Finding Peace

I used to jog around you for seven miles
After four in the morning
While the girl slept I was going with,
Who has been married to a lawyer for the past
Some years:
And I could see the lights on in your patio,
And hear you laughing with so many things,
But I couldn't stop- I was like a shy firework
Shooting off with you on my brain-
I caracoled that old Florida University seven times,
And Chevy's of drunken fraternity shadowed
And laughed at me-
I pissed on their tires and told them I would not,
And I thought of girls sunken with conquistadors
Deep in the east,
But finally I gave up and returned scarred to my Parents' basement and finally,
Far away from your overcast hemispheres,
From your unending sleeping walking joys,
And your immaculate silhouette,
Running alone, empty with my dogs,
I found peace.

Robert Rorabeck

Finding The Truth

Look! I say nothing to you-
My hands are empty-
They hold not weapons,
No bouquets- drive home to him
Just predestined as a wave
To crash and burn against the sea:
Make love to him
When you said that it was me-
And the sky became awash with the lying Promises of daylight,
Who was going the way she always does:
Leaving us,
As the dolphins swam as in a drowning
Carousel-
And my beautiful words dimmed,
Without ever finding the truth in your name.

Robert Rorabeck

Finding Warmth In The Darkness

It doesn't have to be like this, even though
The day is gone over my shoulder,
As you have gone home to your family, but already I am Wondering about what next time it will be
When we will make love, Alma; and I really want to Kidnap you and take you to Arizona,
Or I just want to run away from you and rob banks
Against your shoulder;
And I can take you up to see the lonely boy gods of my Mountains,
To the exact if roughly hewn pulpits of my heavens
Where I pined for you even before
I had the opportunity to consider you: these footpaths that I Have always known,
Can carry your gold too, and we can pet my dogs together,
And I will carry your children away on my shoulders,
Laughing and making you carry your brownness up
After,
Until even the highest aspects of the journey look out after Us,
And we go down perpetually, floating like magic over
The misplaced graveyards, and finally into the bedrooms of Wildflowers who shut into one another,
Finding warmth in the darkness.

Robert Rorabeck

Fine

I thought it was over,
That all the scars had dried up like fish
Pinned on trees,
That the wagon had turned over spilling its sin
Into a double scoop of holocaust,
That I was kicked out of the house with the Dirty cat, like a starving beggar:
But now this comes, new mutations up from
The anointed feet: feel me,
The itch of seams, the molt of butterfly.
How I come dancing over the purplish tor,
Giving motion to the lack of better words. A
Dictionary is flotsam without its society's notions,
And now everyone is losing their houses:
They are floating down river calling to helicopters.
How so, I am above them, a needle of light doing
No work, but feeling fine.
Where are they going spinning? Will they soon
Catch fire? Or, who is this, a bit of sugar at my shoulder, Perhaps tossed there like smoke billowing from the Glades,
And I am not even there? I am hung out to dry,
And the crowd has traveled south like a carpetbag-ing
River flooding the banks. Winnowing fingers
Lock on to saints and talking rabbits;
But the sky only whistles, too lazy to make rain to net
A rainbow- it is doing fine.

Fine Young Yesterday

Soft pacifists in murals of malaise:
I can barely see you sweaty over the bedroom of My young days,
Because my ears are burning from cheap wine,
They don't hear reveille or get up on time,
And they are past over like sated lions on Mondays,
And the tourists have all gone down their enthroned Gullets like strawberry Sundays,
And up in the sky didn't I say they are advertising
Your wedding day;
But anyway, hip hip hurray: and didn't they once have
The world fair in Saint Louis or Chicago; and weren't we there high stepping through
The papier-mâché jungles-
And didn't you know that Sara Teasdale is buried Belle Fontaine, that she was married to someone she Didn't love,
And the way she thought of him along the stark midways
Of her younger days- I'm sure I know, if I can't rightly
Say-
The traffic skips by like amphibians opening wide
And ululating on into crepuscule,
And I missed you in school today, but I guess it doesn't Matter, because I am not beautiful
And I don't think you love me- at least not the way
I love you- forever- even if you once loved me that
Fine young yesterday.

Finis, Mary

Put it out like milk for the kitten's tongue;
Or let us say our prayers without speaking before bed.
Then by the moonlike light your breasts grow tinsels of Spikenard, your eyes the fine jubilee of a sommelier's discriminating
Palate: and here is a donkey, and three wise men,
But I am scarred, Mary, even in your bed- My words are Just as scarred. They more often than not fail. There is nothing
Immaculate about me, but maybe my hands- They do
Commercials; but that's why the baby can't be mine.
I can see how you conceived him somewhere between Dallas
And Atlanta with the commercial airlines pilot,
The old quarterback, his blue cap hiding
His bald spot you didn't know, or his grandfather the octogenarian:
But my scars you cannot hide,
But the grass is green, Mary; it is so green, and I enjoy mowing it
On the weekends- I give the Mexicans time off, and I drink
Rum, Mary, burned from the sugarcanes where the alligators tan;
And why I can just look up and tip a cheap glass and look at Your belly shooting like a silver star over suburbia; while you smile:
Soon they will be selling it on major intersections across America;
But now there are two oblique wet spots on your dark blue pantsuit;
And I am not going anywhere. Only pink angora can hide how Rich you are, Mary, like a Vineyard growing up the stony nape
On the hill of Golgotha fed by a river from Jesus' side, a holy Spigot which first gave Catholicism its preemptive ideals;
Holy plagiarism decorated in pagan's garlands,
And now the sun and blue velvet curtains, exeunt stage left
Then a fine living room, and drink, and skinny dipping in the Jacuzzi Around teal shadows with people I'd hate to know. Then finis, Mary, Finis.

Finishing Migrations

I went too late to the party-
The evergreens were too full of herons,
Restive,
Not at the end of the migrations,
In the wake of monarch butterflies-
I grew beautiful,
Too late, too early;
Or she was a child, or she was married
In little houses in the rain-
With little lights;
She would go out sometimes and smoke,
And I watched her from the sea,
Shivering- too cold to make out,
But every one there was good and famous,
And they told me it would be better
For me to go along the way;
And her eyes were sad, but forgetful,
And they seemed to tell me
To be along my way.

Fire Engine God

If you are brown and you do not love:
If you are a forest underground, or in the sea;
Or if you are a homing pigeon or a turtle dove
Who never returns with Offerings of peace:
Then I know you, and you are just the traffic
Stopped for a pace of a light cycle-
Maybe you turn and look at my star fruit tree,
Maybe you halfway come to the conclusion to Think of me, your stomach, your engine rumbling:
Maybe you are an airplane hovering in close
Space- Maybe you are just opening,
Spreading pedals or spokes, something beautifully Concentric and round, but you don't consider for Long- and there you go on your way,
Shampooed and legged in your pierce-nosed
Parade- Once all my fireworks are spent and left
To just smoldering surcease, and there are better
Boys happening just nearly in the east:
And you go that way, and they flex anchors for you,
And I die exhausted, and happy that you stopped
And maybe were pensive and thirsty for the weight
Of a hummingbird carried in the matted hair of
A saber tooth tiger on the lam from a fire engine god.

Fireballs

Some pretty flask tossed into the canal
Sleeping in the alligator's bed as he dreams of Girls
As the witches fly over their housewife cousins:
They go to make love in the cypress,
As the row boats sleep above their heads
In their shallow journeys from the islands-
Around their roots the crypts sink in
And the moccasins lumber in erstwhile balls-
Their ballrooms of bellies entralling,
As the young girls clap majestically at the airplane's
Fireballs are tumbling.

Fireworks

No more baseball playing without
Those witches,
New or old, floating: they are my muses;
And the high school sings with Glasses of pain,
And the windows open and share eyes
With the rain;
If this is not a song, Erin- Then what for
Are its poses;
If this is not a song, Erin- then why for Did I buy you roses;
Because I am not a he-man,
And you can never open up to me;
How many strong men have you been with,
Leaping forth across this Country,
The America, Erin; and my body is not so
Beautiful,
But tired and lagging from the races,
Unqualified to meet you in the middle of wildflowers
In the higher basins
Where the windmills of maddened soldiers beat out
The clouds,
Where I have perceived you underfoot of the breathless
Continents,
Where I suppose I am not proud to be,
Erin- Erin, I sell fireworks, so why cant you fall
In love with me.

Fireworks Again

Yards and yards, in the plagiarized field;
But what is the king doing, but turning you down:
Or he is turning into
A four legged thing, that his son will kill;
And he is losing all of his friends, but
The movie theatre is Quiet and peaceful, because sometimes here,
I skip into other shows,
And I listen to my grandmother on my birthday,
Telling me promises of artificial fire,
As I try to think of how things should feel right
While dance, or not dancing
Without wings or legs, and there is just the Pornography in the blue dunes, like the major
Event for the cenotaphs
Of conquistadors, or anyone else who cares enough
To be here, pounding on a door in the middle of A forest that takes a long time to get to,
While the prettiest of honeys sing, or stretch their Arms to become another attempt at the make-believe Fireworks brushing their lips once again into the sky.

Fireworks And Christmas Trees

Wound is a vision that comes again
With the glass—
Let's open her up again, if only because
We have to go to the graveyards
Of school tomorrow
And we need to feel alive—
As the seahorses nibble the mermaids'
Breasts—of course they do—
Let's show our obscure pornographies
To the grottos of the pieta—
To that well lit and beautiful
Slaughter house, to the backsides of Muses who have now collected to their Children—
All of their snowflakes have melted—
And they do not cry—
But let us listen to the insides of those Tears, anyways—even if it's not
What we are supposed to be doing—
We are supposed to be selling
Fireworks and
Christmas trees—
But let us try to amuse the language of
The corpse just one more time,
To shake up the fireflies
Into suicides of daylight—
To pretend to be brave even after
The fairgrounds of her heart have packed up
And moved away.

Fireworks From The Roadsides

Cave of envelopes in your dreams-
I've been sleeping for a while in the folding spaces—
Promises of whispers,
Lips of butterflies—
Rains descend over the cities of the cliff's side,
And we sell fireworks from the roadsides of Mars where Christmas trees grow
As tall as roofs,
And the men you love float about like snowflakes
Stuck in mascara—
And the little children who fall down from them,
Scabbing their knees on presents of Roller skates and bicycles
Think they see arrow heads and Indian nickels
In the open markets of the naked slopes—
Where one flower blooms at
A time and the sun holds his hand out
Trying to panhandle through the offerings of his day.

Robert Rorabeck

Fireworks Sometimes

The saddened reindeer of her eyes
Looking over the emptied parking lots of midnight—
Wondering which way her boyfriends or
Her pilots have gone—
The mountains rising up like their own gods halfway
In the middle of the country—
She has never seen them, but she listens for their Songs—she sees fireworks sometimes,
Costing so much from their brilliant distance
Before they are done—
The love lives of the silver and heroic—
Maybe they languish just as much as a commercial—
As another of her dreams weathers the crenulations of A somnambulant pool—
They will be taking down their tents tomorrow—not Because they have nothing left to sell,
But because she doesn't know
Her holiday has already gone away.

First Star Of Morning

My parents live on the precipice....

My ears are ringing like maudlin wind-chimes,
From the last of the rum,

There are flesh-eating horses out in the hoary yard,
Devouring verbatim my father's estranged love,

The same sort of love I give for you,
Until they turn off the lights and tell us,
"Now that is enough. Each of you go back to your Sea, "

And there are wayward Mexicans living in our Front lawn,
A man and wife, and his father,
Jesus and Antonio, mi primos-
Do they know that they are eating him too?

Last 4th of July,
Finished on Route 66, in Moriarty, NM,
The famous nemesis, I gave myself this strawberry
On the side of my face,

And called you twice-
A man answered whom I didn't know,
But we still made bank in the desert of empty snow-
Now it comes around again,

And you still do not love me,
And I still do not know what to do,
For I am not pretty. Just so, I am lost, but if you Should find me,

Then there is a house for you, my fingers, my tears,
My soul, and all the saccharine cadences my body wishes to Swap with your body,

And this is another pitiful attempt to call up your eyes,

Wayward and nameless on their stool in the empty bar;
Warm exchanges, I promise, and luckless fidelity,

For soon I am homeless, and I ask you if You could be my first star of morning.

Robert Rorabeck

Fishing For Sharks

My father looks so beautiful
As he kills what is his:
My father looks beautiful, dressed up for showbiz:
How many enjambments has he come to cost;
I don't want to talk about father-
I want to get lost,
In your amber eyes- In your auburn amusements:
I don't want to acknowledge your guys,
I just want to fornicate in your salt-water abutments:
Oh, I love you- I love, but that's like saying
I have a soul- So much a cost,
And so much a toll:
Rather that you were a ghost, a holiday of fear,
And instead of wondering of your beauty,
You just curled around me ear,
And spoke to me of the strange sciences of loss:
I don't want a father, whatever the cost:
I just want you in a house in a room,
With your fingers in pies, and your hands on a broom:
I don't want mountains or streetcars or mountain-lions:
I just want you naked, suppliant,
And rather a mother of tombs: I want you swept and Colorless and weaving stories on looms;
And, if you're fetching like broken glass,
While then I'll leap over the low bridges of centipedes
And water moccasins,
And make you my lass;
And feed you the fingers of my silhouette,
And mount the svelte of your back, and make you moan,
And eat turkey and mash potatoes with you;
And call you my pet- Then we'll go out into the bottomless
Merry-go-rounds- and catch my sister,
And fish for sharks.

Robert Rorabeck

Five Foot Tall Heaven

Cabbages in secret muggy rows,
Like the clefts you'd have
If you were a centipede,
Like the children I would leave needing gasping Like silver-pinned fish if I were Silvia Plath,
But now everything is on the move:
I used to take the Turnpike up every weekend
To where the alligators perpetuated
The condolences of adolescent post hibernations,
And I saw you once there all decked out in your Soiree,
You all smoky and creamed, never once suspecting
You might once have been my muse;
And you even beat out your mother, and thus
Had very little to prove.
Because you are so very beautiful and your name comes Out of the tips of mountains like the very fine
Secretions of fairytales,
Like raspberries higher up on the footpaths away from
Cars,
Where all the light is smoky from the forest fire that Has a moral conclusion and a finer point,
And you are there around about in your higher heels like
A fire station so I have to look up to see into
The sweet smelling kitchens of your eyes
Even though I am a hefty centaur and you are little more
Than a five foot tall heaven in a pony tail.

Robert Rorabeck

Five Hundred

When Dale Earnhardt died,
I fell in love with NASCAR.
Delivering pizzas at the time,
I understood the dangers of the Sport: when I saw her jogging, it
Was very hard to control the car.
When in the wee hours after Saint Patrick's Day a drunken
Sorority sister invited me into Her portico to exchange my Pizzas for sex with her, I accepted;
And inside her boudoir flecked
With Johnny Depp and Backstreet
Boys posters, her drunken legs
Open
Like a starting line,
I fell in love with the inevitable
Speed of life, and the little death
Inside women, inhaled like
The moment of breathing,
Involuntary, like an erection
And inescapable ruin of the Body.
Running along her backstretch that night,
I understood what it took to be stock car driver,
Applying rubber feverishly under her panties,
Under the night the world circulating in
A giant socializing oval that sometimes led
The victory lane of sex.

Robert Rorabeck

Five Star Ranch

The elk are starving,
And the rivers are growing bold.

Novice wolves are practicing
On latchkey children discombobulated
On the red saddle,

Eerily tall gentlemen avoid speakeasies,
Brush their heads through the anorexic pines
Where the wind is coughing,

The hills make a dry and cricketing cauldron
Where the opaque cattle swirl, their horns christened with barbed wire,
They turn and turn with strange instinct summoning potions,

The gyre of skeletons rises in the roofless caravanserai,
And baptize the heads of uneasy tramps with the spitless drool:
Their home is under the weathercock which

Is turning like a little girl pretending to dance,
As the hateful eye burns spots of forest fire which ring
Rounded stones and clutches of rattlesnakes,

While magnificent gravestones crowd to the east,
Entire families waiting for the redeeming plough to unearth
From the expectant sorrows these tuberous crops.

Robert Rorabeck

Fleeting Appreciation

Butterflies going back to Mexico
Put new poison in my body:
Just going back over the absentee borders,
Beating their wings until they come
Up with new numbers over the shadowing abysses
Until you don't know where to Find them:
They have only gone to kiss the knuckle-bones of Their dead grandmothers,
And then to die plated by the rain in the hillsides of Corn:
As they become paramours of the ashen storm,
As the hurricanes halo the volcanoes,
To warm kisses of their own lovers take over
Their bodies,
And that is when your eyes bloom up from
The graveyards, to retrieve thoughts I have given you
Underneath the playboy sun:
Letting my own ochers run down your lucid tributaries:
Showing off your apiaries budded upon my Fingertips and tongue:
And as those thoughts of our lovemaking dye like
The poisonous aspects of butterflies over the graveyards
Of your ancestors in the nameless town of Your upbringing, I hope you think of me as well as find
Some fleeting appreciation for the songs I have always sung
For you.

Robert Rorabeck

Flight

A little bit of good is in the wings of an airplane,
For it can take us the farthest away, in amphibian
Leaps, in the sexy legs' choreography-
Misguided lovers may wake up on Sundays, rub their Sleepy eyes and say hello, hello? And be most perplexed,
Because already you have sacrificed for passage through
The concrete corridors where souls not already dead
Are disembarking; All sorts of failures can be handled this Way, spent fuel streaming behind you like effluvious confetti,
A vagabond holiday of flippant services, the bone smiles
Of your conductors and their perked tits, the coffee percolates,
The danish twists, and you can let the lucky sleep droop
Your lips: Then, back down from featherless heaven, disjointed
And amiss, the new cities, the old cities, spill out before
You like a toppled candelabrum starting to fire, and for Day labors you can buy your fill of cheap hotels, cigarettes,
Runny liquors, and squealing girls: and the forgetful type of Honey stolen from the impish bees combed from the altered
Branches by the silver bellied flight, and if all is not right,
Then fugitive flee, for already the engines are purring like Tadpole kittens to skip your across the sky once more,
And string you out again upon another's floor whose blacky
Histories, thankfully, you know nothing of, nor care nothing for.

Robert Rorabeck

Flights Of Leafless Fancy

Now all swing-sets speak in
A singsong way.
Now all the stars glisten from the Fangs of rattlesnakes inside
Bottles of rum- For she has led the Battle out into the occupied breath,
As I piss and water the venal flowers in
The ankle-deep grass;
The castles of America are stolen from the Jungles of Bavaria,
As her eyes are castaway upon the boreal gyms.
We found the evidence in your brother's room
Before he could escape to kiss the lips of a visiting Swann- And I am apolitical, but your legs
Make you my queen, and when you bend them
To go somewhere,
Don't you create a sisterhood of swishing motion
Which makes me tremble,
But just as cuckolded men are afraid to step out
Of the waves to buy cups of ice-cream,
So am I certain that your lips are the illusion of Man's approach to god,
As if I was to reach you, moon-audience,
Would lose all sense of reality- become a flightless
Loon. Yes, and I'm proud of it.

Robert Rorabeck

Floating On A Lucky Gentleman's Balloon

If we start fogging our four windows,
One day soon- nine months or so,
All of our children will be storming the gates of Heaven;
A womb of filigree and midnight spume,
You know the room, vertical underneath ceiling fans
And plastic stars and blue brooms-
I've laid you there and cleaned your flower with My tongue,
And beat out a jingly tune on your petal soft drums:
Oh, I guess that was just what I was meant to dream
About doing to you,
Passed out in class, or fondly depriving some other
Boy's father's liquor cabinet when I was supposed
To be eating lunch:
Staring into your eyes instead of the instructor's,
Drowning out any other lies;
But now there is only the static of a poorly received moon,
For aren't you so busy living out your life in another
Man's bright balloon;
And sometimes I see you go flying through the sky
Like a motion picture in a velvet room,
That I want to smoke you out of the sky and drop you into
The crèche of aloe so near the passion play
With a slight rain coming down, that I would make you real Enough, and plush and comfortable enough
To believe in you for always, even after school is such A long ways over,
And you are floating in that lucky gentleman's big balloon.

Robert Rorabeck

Floating On Airplanes

Inside an airplane is cool and easy,
Where everything is moving steady,
Like the quietly humming specials of car salesmen;
And balloons of many colors,
And children weeping holding hands with their Mothers at the zoos, and suckling;
And when your lips impart to me snacks
And dreaming,
I can say that I have a lover above any mountain,
Even if she is getting paid to be polite for it-
Because the words on airplanes don't have a certain Meaning,
And it is expected to meet ancient childhood and Heavenly abundant sororities at the end of it,
Wherever one might be going- Touching down there,
Then the sun is steady and is as warm as a furnace
Like glass blowing,
And I could say that I love you from all the way up here,
And not really mean a thing,
And all the professors and their critiquing and even those Successful lawyers the widest fonts are advertising
Can't truly touch me-
Cupping your bosom like water leaping,
Like bending over the fountain breathlessly panting
In some half destructive kindergarten,
Just your lips and their services, lipsticks' fjords smelling of another tongue's vociferous language, rowing-
Yet evolving, and there the colors are yet blooming:
Even on fixed wings,
Virgins stringing the vaporous garden like the crowning of Some celebration
With the physical tendrils almost giving up their evaporation;
And here I love you,
With the blooming mythologies wearing seamless nylons,
And your ankle curling, mythological vases
Stuffed with valentines;
But this is just a song without its certain meaning
Wondrously sailing, just a piece of paper
Floating for a second above the forgetful earth.

Robert Rorabeck

Flooded Earth

Here you go thinking that I was dead,
You turned on and on like the little girl dancing
Without gravity, untwining all of her things
Until she is fully grown and Zephyrus even without Any sky to denote her breathing,
Just the sharp blue quality of her eyes,
A star dying, jubilant and blushing up to the very last Second:

Lying on my back beside the waves, looking
Up you kept changing your dress,
But it couldn't stop who you were....

I bought you flowers, I stripped myself naked
Before the mirror of my words and showed you
My scars, my hollow places, the places that were About to cave in, or already had: I wanted to become An artist on your planet, and garden unrequited bouquets
Through the bare footsteps of your deity.
When I failed, it was because you had a boyfriend and So many admirers, I knew
The way they strutted like tobacco princes in the dusty Redness of your out-of-state photograph collections-

but who was the one who might Wish to see you through the unavoidable beauty of your perfect suit?
Or cast a net like a spell which would ensure the fidelity of Your body to my conquest with the stamp of one kiss?

I ask like an echo- How long now since my art truly felt
For the beating of your soul, that resounding basin I used to Share a class together with, just one- And now out there
You have gone like some bird looking for the tranquility of mountains
Resounding above a flooded earth,
Which is what I have become, hypocritically dry-eyed and Taciturn- a dry county who has learned how to float so well,
Who doesn't booze anymore,
Who doesn't even go outside to enjoy zoos or sunlit parades,
The way a young boy's balloon might attached to his hollow wrist

Like a jubilant wind-kicked pet;

And you, and you- There you are some ten years away, barely
Even obtainable even by the speed of light: I can barely even see You from my bedroom underground where I used to pray for Your nourishment before each of my meals of sweet holocaust:
And you didn't come, and still you turn, blazing,
Some sort of sexy idea yet caught upon the way a doe flits
Leggy through a forest of snares,
The dangerous consequences yet avoided, some sort of unkept
Promise, you just keep leaving, turning brighter and brighter,
Turning, turning.

Robert Rorabeck

Floodings

Murdered and drowned eyes
Queue up to me in my sleep
In the cold dark waters that flow
Underground and connect us all
In our labyrinthine womb—
Their hands wear marriage bands
And promise rings— Their lips
Cry out strange words beneath the Frigid world, as they seem to Want me there. Beneath them I can See pale houses settled in small yards
With one cypress tree pressed into Each manicured lawn, and rippling
Driveways decorated with Landscaping, little fish-like children,
And cars— And I know I should go
Drown with them, to let them show me
How to become a professional in this Middle-class estuary— It wouldn't Take long for me to stop breathing,
And then to learn the recreations of the dead—
To move about in schools in the diaphanous
Vail of dreams semi-fulfilled, to do all those Things successful people strive for altogether
In lakes underground, collectively holding their breath—
Here, where I can see my wife waiting in the Wavering lawn, bodice full with promises of Gurgling chastity, and my children sprawled
Like marble fawns drowned in a flooded creek—
But I will not go to these tonight, if only because I do not know how to swim so blindly—
So, fearing responsibility's bottomless embrace, I
Feint into lonelier pools that swirl away
In the reeds and shallows— Where, in warmth dawned,
My own mermaid sunbathes for my eyes....

Florida

Where was she in
The fairy stories
An invisible woman
Fainting under the orange trees-

There she gives me hope,
As in her background
An alligator slides into the canal
And disappears-

When she is out to make money
She serves young men under the palm trees
And looking up they wander along her neck
Into the Bay of Horses-

I do not know which one
Of them is having her tonight,
So far away
And I cannot care,
For closing my eyes I am with her,
Always admiring
The oldest city in America

Nearby in the mangroves
Behind the hidden pinkness of shells,
Maybe our children will be playing
As the waves are tamed into
The domestic estuaries

Where our fingers interlace
Then our lips share the salt
The wind has carried this far to us....

Flower Devoured

I sit beside this uncouth firelight;
It is not warm-
It is a fried chicken charade,
So I strum my legs; it is the best I
Can do.
Your windows are dark and on Silent parade-
It is a death sentence;
It is a train, a wedding procession
Dark and veiled.
Yes, I can smell you in the rain
And on the far side of the cemetery's
Immortal segregations;
You came last year, or years before
And where you are going
You have long since been,
Deep and queer
Like napalm in the jungles,
Like the pricks of pain of Spanish
Stars eclipsed by waves
And drowned ponies
Of legionnaires and knight-errants,
Your tresses just the mane
Of a green girl sinking:
If I turn away,
Where will your fire be then,
Or will the seas of cars devour you,
And smooth you over until you
Are fine enough to hang in A kitchen:
If that is your cell,
And it suits you, then allow me one
Last howl,
And a fling with you atop the corniced
Top of a crocodile as it cries
Across the canal,
To deposit me at the banks of university,
Where I turn and watch you devoured,
Your pedals plucked by the Curious game I keep about you.

Robert Rorabeck

Flower In The Rain

I want to fall on you like rain
upon a wildflower
Opening new reason from you
Scaring all the old bees away from
Pollinating your bed
Scaring all the fake men off who
Can only stand the sun
So it's just me and you in the Meadow
The rabbits in the hole
The grasses are wet and beginning to bow
The forest is damp and sleepy
And in the meadow
I bend down and kiss your petals wetly
Falling all over you
Letting your pistil slip into my mouth
Sucking off your honey,
Almost plucking you
But not going so far
Just pulling you so that you can feel
Your roots leaving
To let you almost taste
My world in the sky
So afterwards you can go down
Believing
The words on my lips
When I fall on my knees for you
A flower in the rain.

Flying By The Stars

Nicknacked by the busybodies whom do not drink—
While I am in Shanghai having insouciant dreams of Living back in Arizona—
In Show low, in a little town of 10,000—
Can I support the sport
When my writing cannot even uplift angels,
Or buy off the metamorphosis of their wings:
Cannot calm them down,
Making them part of the normal revenue:
Now we have stewardesses flying back and forth
Wingless, who have never seen me even though
I have been once or twice back across their planes
Even though I have not learned to spell,
But the night is calmed,
The unplanted roses are sleeping just as ghosts
Beneath the cosages of the white mountains—
Maybe ten years ago my sisters were going to prom—
But now the night is out and the fire has burned
And it will take the blind man a thousand
Unbelieving steps to meet the carressess
At the end of his road.

Robert Rorabeck

Flying Monkeys

I'm calling on you because I'm a wreck,
And I used to dream of becoming a professor when I
Jogged around the junked golf course
By the side of deep twilight, and the paltry swathed condominiums:
To tell you the truth, I haven't loved too many women-
Mostly, I've been able to count them on two hands
And you rank right up there,
But now my legs are cold from drinking cheap rum:
Can you love a man without any fashion sense
Or social position?
A man terribly wounded in the dark of a fraternity's Pick-up truck, so he doesn't even know where he's Hurt, but he just remembers you sometime in North Central Florida before Halloween in that Asian Restaurant joint now demolished on 13th street;
What the F-, now it flows- now it flows- I don't Yet have a bicycle or a home on an island, but give it time:
And the girl I neglected by dreaming of you has a new House and better ways to make her living;
And this is not good, and now I don't care to teach anything
To the living; but love me, if you will, in your time,
In the quieted spaces between the snows and your inevitable
Breast feedings- because I love you,
And it is the only thing that reoccurs to me every evening
As I chop down trees, oiling my joints and looking up from Time to time to keep an eye out for flying monkeys....

Folded Airplanes And Paper Butterflies

In families, the warmth of science's loneliness disguised
In religion's degrees: You whom think him your lover, Cannot actually touch him, your husband, for the both of You are forever encased in an electronic sheath—
You have to go to the sun; it's thermal reactions the metamorphosis—
Butterflies over Nagasaki and Pompeii—
While I was sleeping on your roof one hour before yesterday—
And in those words, filigreed with imperfections and enuendo,
I wrote you a thousand poems written in a language you do
Not know—
And when the coffins of your lovers and your ancestors
Are laid beneath the ground, they do not actually touch that Place—they are developed from the ectoplasms of outer space—
Better to be cremated in the fire that burns in these pages—
Better to have seperated from those lesser sages,
And awakened in these momentary arms—
Folded airplanes and paper butterflies dying as they try to Cross the canal to be noticed by your eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Folded From Paper Dolls

Paper airplanes folded from paper dolls—
You still hold my heart in another world,
Even as I bleed gasoline,
And I am forgetting vocabulary
And better and more eager parts of my soul—
When I get up in the morning,
There is so much jingoistic patriotisms
Over the happenstances of the fieldtrips of Our playgrounds that I don't know
Anyways—Or all because of any number
You cannot even guess—
The beautiful women hyperventilating on Their birthdays—just waiting for Just any wish—
Or in the saddest playrooms of the daycares
Where I left you—
Even if across the canal the cats played and Talked to themselves—
I've said I love you to too many Mexicans,
And now I guess I have to suppose
That the angels will have to Take care of themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

Follow Me

Long day envelops me:
I drive past the president on highway-70,
And it is a rusted ride full of strange,
Slow motion appeasements.
Rival take my house-
I don't care- I sneak into libraries.
I read Leonard Cohen for free and Masturbate,
And then deep in the night that
I shouldn't say,
I drive past the university,
And see slender, peeked students making
Love over some nameless bridge,
Over the Mississippi,
And how they touch, how languidly,
Like the gently driven cadences;
And it don't matter that they really shouldn't Love- I will buy an apartment next to them,
To listen to them making love,
And I will take my dog out at night,
And watch the airplanes skipping,
Pretending that there goes so many important
Men, warriors sailing the heavens
Served by leggy, cup bearing women
Who know how important they are,
And given my studies, I
Should whisper everywhere to no one:
I never found a woman.
I didn't get rich.
Follow me.

Robert Rorabeck

Following Lost Dogs Home

It gets cold in the automobiles of twilight
When there are no charms or stores opened.
In the points between her map,
The lady is cold and beautiful sleeping in her car,
But she could be anyone,
And young professors caravan to the conference to Add their two cents to the collection jar;
Oh, but look- Aren't they something?
F&ck,
But there still isn't enough pictures of Sylvia Plathe
In the garden to identify her,
Her lap is empty
And she could be anyone; and the people couple young and Happy in their car,
And they go on the sweet vacations, they go far,
All the way to new horizons along the train tracks smoking
Time,
But they only drive there:
They sleep with the new people entering them,
Heads on pillows, thoughts upon the lips of who they are-
My love was here yesterday, but she doesn't Belong to me; she is in the tunnel with the new Trains entering, smoke and grease,
And no one is out on the swing set but the wind,
Who says come to me, but no one answers: It isn't her.
I have lost my dog,
And no one answers but
If the moon is on its final quarter, I couldn't tell,
And the woman is sleeping in her car, her breath the Chamber whispering- In Spain, there are poets who could speak to Her, all asleep under the olive boughs, but she doesn't Answer them by the moon or anything; her blue jacket
Looks nice on her pallid skin;
It resembles her, and I wish I could love her,
But who am I
Jumping trains;
I wish I could cover her up and speak to her &
Become the smoke
She is beautiful if only half way to other ways than here,

And doesn't give a d$mn of pain,
And she has no home of where she knows,
Most beautiful without the land she flies along;
Or if she joins & is lucky
Getting lost about anywhere, follows her dog home.

Robert Rorabeck

Foolhearted Voyage

If I describe you fool heartedly, isn't it that I love you,
And I hate to go off and leave you to sell fireworks, just
As I hate the things you make me promise you,
Because we spent our foreplay on my goodwill couch
Good enough for any whitewashed family,
Good enough for the longest rivers of America,
And I helped you try and find out how to become a citizen of This great country,
But not because it was your country and that you wanted the vote,
But because you needed the status to save your mother from the Newest immigration laws,
And how many times then did I tell you that I loved you:
Alma, and how many times did you say that I
Was lying,
But even with all of that how much did I discover about you in A couple of hours,
The willing journeys we took together, and I will always wish
To be more beautiful for you,
Alma, and I wonder if you know how absolutely beautiful you
Are: In your strange opulence you far outstretch my Previous muses,
And you are the only one who has given her body so readily to me,
And I love you and kiss your lips like a starving conquistador
Who has bungled upon your drinking fountain in amidst the Savages of a concrete jungle,
And I wish to appease you somehow, and to call you out of the Somnolence of your parents house,
But also to congratulate them for all of which they have accomplished
In the short seven years they have been in this country-
All of that time I have been mostly celibate,
And dreaming of how to reinvent the light bulb or of other girls
Like weak butterflies less perfect than you,
But now that I have found you out, I am a like a struggling dog
Who has finally made it home,
And I finally have something to believe in, because the Virgin of Guadalupe has answered my prayers and delivered you up
To me:
You wear her golden visage about the grotto of her neck:

I think you might be the embodiment of her immaculate
Spirit, Alma, but anyways I have prayed to her several times tonight,
And thanked her for you,
But since I have finished off the page with this poem
I should say no more,
But fall asleep and thus set out on another voyage to figure out
Any other means of finding you.

Foolish Gold

Their parents had the appearance of impenetrable value-
The rumor was they were made out of real gold:
You couldn't break your teeth on them,
But it was still painful
To embrace the process that was necessary
Just to be sure-

I used to hide my books on witchcraft under the Bed. They didn't find them until I ran away to Michigan with Jordan-
That was where I used to live,
And slept the night in the back of my Grandmother's Toyota,
And forgot to keep a watch out for ghosts.

There was a graveyard there and there
Is a graveyard still-
Where the janitors still go weeping, and a loch, but they called it
A lake, a great American lake cut up and entangled
By water skiers all with perfect skin;
But oh, how very pale;

And my great uncle, the physicist, the head of His department, an ancient smile which doesn't fade,
A beautiful house on a great American lake,
Fulfilled promises,
But tomorrow is the first of the month, April:
In ten days then I'll have another year on the world,
The quietness of too many scars:

That will be some sort of jubilant holiday,
The best of its kind: No solicitors just the usual
Jew, Priest, and African American coming into the bar,
Except not so politely spoken,
And everybody drinking and pretending
That the rent isn't due.

Fool's Gold

Told itself to the jungle—told itself to the lies
Of the busy airplanes,
While the neighborhoods lied enfolded—
And the sun became a yellow balloon in the hands of A dwarf amidst the palmettos—
And all the day long you were dancing or painting
On your body the pretty brown alphabets of Your skin—and doing your own numbers—
As an exercise upon how to maintain yourself—
While the clubs went out around you,
Swinging their bats at witches—
Or planting bottle rockets into the fertile grounds at
The feet of the mountains,
While another antediluvian god swore to his dumb
Luck underneath the sea—
As we remembered swimming this way—back
And forth in the current of unicorns—
The commercial airplanes in a mobile accumulated
From the fool's gold in our hands.

Footlockers Of Scorpions

Footlockers of scorpions underneath the Chartreuse palmettos-
They cut up the birthday cake of sky as the cars
Drive by,
And the dolls lay in the castles of ants and Sand lions,
And your mother is in the regular house doing
The laundry,
But if you saw her, her eyes would be
A long ways off- looking across the canal
To the hill of Calvary
Where the wolves dance on their hind legs,
And the foxes are the vintirs of their own
Special kings,
And you have some muses here, but they Don't know it,
But the airplanes continue to fly lower and Lower,
Soon the will have to touch the ground
As if entire harems of mirages for their Narcoleptic lovers,
As the wind blows the weedy instruments
Across the canal again,
And you close your eyes into a blue abyss
Waiting for him to come home.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Birthday Of The Gods

I will live for a while
A skeleton with rum in my gut—
With thoughts
At the bottom of the sea—
An orchestra so far away from
The wreck of the Titan as to go utterly Unnoticed—
Just the bare bones down in the waterlogged
Trenches without any other metamorphosis:
With old girlfriends up upon the mellifluous
Stage, singing their hearts
Out to kings and their reindeer:
And when they get out, a gentled thunder shower—
But, anyways, I do not have to die for my young art—
Because what I write isn't good enough anyways—
And I don't love with white girls, anyways—
And if my muse was venal, at least she was Mexican—
And I stole the virginity of my thirty-one year old
Wife if that is at all possible,
As the heavens pretend to cut the sky like a knife
For a birthday of the gods who do not even believe in Themselves anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Chance To Be Petted

Oh the banal bones of the old horses
At the airport, irritating me with their bloodless flow:
And it is so nearest to either of our houses,
Alma,
Except that I own mine like a graveyard, while you pay
Rent for yours with the sweat and bones
Of the loved ones who don't even belong here;
And I want to tell you about how I remembered
Running away,
And the greatest things I saw even while I was alone:
And I know that you don't like going up on airplanes,
But you would make in invaluable stewardesses,
And now you don't Even want to make love, but you still want to go on Fieldtrips with me,
Just to walk barefoot in the green grass I have protected
Just for you,
And over to the lilacs or any of the other names of flowers
Who happen to grow their stretching their pretty
Necks if only for a chance to be petted by you.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Dollar

Fingers crossing over the numberless playgrounds
Of your amusements' Just words spoken to grasshoppers
As they flick themselves:
Like flames emancipated from the damaging wishes
Of a birthday cage'
They go across the campuses of high school and end up
In some lady's yard:
She is standing topless out in some sunny sun:
And her areolas furl, crenulated delicatessens:
Now, this is her art that I hear they keep chained near the Sea, and the airplanes fly over her,
And the man-o-war come up to the beach like cerulean pillows
Dreaming of electricity underneath the kites or one day
Children will fly'bought for them for a dollar,
Another cheap home that encourages to fly away.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Forever Of Any Awhile

For however long I will have to travail underneath
The prayer flags drying their Laundry across the forever mountains: I will.
I will- And I will bight my knuckles,
And will try to look as if I have been doing something Dangerous,
But nothing ever changes: the elk shed their horns
Every season, and you can make money, if you
Know where the look:
While the mailmen live alone until they are old
And vanquished:
And the housewives come in like a sugar sea making
Wishes on your birthday:
And they just do and do their thing until their Daughters are in high school and then graduated and Meandering up stream:
And soon they will have rings on their fingers:
And they will have forgotten their favorite colors
Until the raindrops hit their windows,
And have traveled down the easement to agitate the minnows
And to make the insouciantly eager alligators to Smile.
While the kites who have been abandoned by their careless hands
Travel the seven seas for a forever of any awhile.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Full Blown Christmas

In fine philosophies the souls retreat and Make love to the shadows beneath the broken down
School buses- I was there many times,
And I don't even know the words for today's vocabularies,
And maybe I will never make love to you again,
Alma,
Because you are trying to be satisfied by your regular man:
How his eyes are even darker than mine,
But not quite as dark as the anxious nights he has taken to you
And across the frontera and the bosque where the mariposas
Are multiplying only to die:
And you will never read this, won't you Alma,
Because you've had enough of the deficiencies of my playrooms
Of model boats and crinkled airplanes:
So now you are only waiting for a full blown Christmas
As he lays down beside you and gives you duplicitous propositions
For marriage.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Kiss

Away from the night
Everyone moves across the street
To be together, far from,
They are attracted to the light
And the music the flesh makes
As it dies
Traveling away from home
A cross to where I have no eyes, intersecting without hope
And I can not see where she is, gone,
The thing that never was between us
And the flowers in the gutter leading
To the sea- before the sun rises,
The thing that never was dissolves and goes away
In tiny fragments before the sun
And her kiss imagined, always felt,
But never,
All the pleasures of the system, petals budding
From the glowing stems,
Like lines on a road,
The conduits of rushing people,
Discarding me
And I am roadkill lying dead beside
Her bed (as they make some kind of attempt at love)
And forgotten on her neck, a broken gem,
Once priceless- now trash-
In the shadows beside where all
The lives move
Dances to the lights and forgets
Neighborhoods drunken and empty, abandoned museums,
And the life flipping over in mausoleums
Pages in a book read but
Not understood, a bed of transgressions
And falsehoods made-up to hide the stains
Like the nights coming on attracting the Insects calling our humanity, a god of weekends,
And spirits past,
Forgetting to resist the temptation,
Where my wrist lays open and waiting

For a kiss.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Little Ways

There were dragonflies and there
Were swingsets:
And at one time they had one all over the other:
And the helicopters were Approaching- the first one a phosphorous
Yellow,
The second one as red as periodic tear:
And I took Alma to the Playground,
And made my love to her, sincere: but she was just An echo then:
Turning around, coital, abstract:
Her brown body lifted off the earth and into the Waves where I carried her,
When she couldn't even swim: her two children
Drowning around her,
Like hapless mermaids: and when I watched her leaving
Me everyday from work,
It was like an entire forest fire drowning higher
Up on the higher ledges,
Where the airplanes can hardly even fly: and it has become More distant from now until then,
And her body is an abstraction from my pain:
Like a painted butterfly drifted off into the severe forest of A Civil War Spain:
Rattled with snake bites, and shot through with bullet holes:
She arrives one last time, kissing the pigeon holes of Angels like the most intrepid of kites:
And then she goes away, back into the rest stop of his Brown armpits: she resides in the nests to which were Born her first and last children:
And with her eyes closed, for a little ways: she sings to me:
Or I think that she must, anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Little While

On the loose though exhausted, what would you
Do in the backyard shirtless all afternoon, remembering
The bottle rockets that you wasted-
Or the girls that you left behind to learn math in school-
There in that open habitat that your mother mowed
Shoeless on the weekends,
The ants riled up to see their gods birthday cake in the Green steak knives of the palmettos-
Or the blue insects like Christmas toys, walking up the Joints in a river of trees,
While the ghost of the girl you loved floats in a canoe
Aimlessly:
There she goes, as the sugar canes burn her motifs-
She seems to have drifted down from Tallahassee while
The forest fires were still all burning around Disney
World- and some Mexican girl
Was lost in the Dry Tortugas, crying for her sisters that You supposed you ate breakfast with yesterday-
And she leaves to take her daughter up to her husband
Through the orange fields and dunes- and they Are even making love right now fallen brown skinned
In an gossiping apiary, even the while college
Students flood their campuses- and the pain lingers
For a little while.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Little While Everyday

Ruined as I go this way singing to my Tomb,
Over foxes in love with their prey: little things getting Littler ever day:
Alma makes love in her bed of far away-
Brownness and evaporation,
The sport of the numbers never figured upon,
The hidden estuaries cleaved from a world of bereaved clouds:
She spreads like an envelop cast into the sea
Without a bottle:
Is torn up and sinks, and never wanders over her wounds
High in the skydiving places where she first made love:
She sings as she goes down into the bosoms
Of the world,
And forgets how he haunts her for a little while:
In these little times we make love,
Before she remembers all that she was to her again-
A wildfire in the back of an untamed horse,
Performing for a lighthouse who cast her light away from The sea that I cried for her for a little while Everyday.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Long While

When I started out I was all alone and I could go for so
Many ways,
Crossed by the angels and silver bodies of their skies:
Crucified by stewardesses who didn't even know why; and if this Is a dream,
Then isn't it real, because I haven't had so much time for dreaming,
Because I was buying a house and hitting on Alma:
I know where she buys her jewelry: At the Sunshine Flea Market:
I am going to go there on my next day off and buy her jewelry,
And an image of the Virgin of Guadalupe that I will keep
In my new house, which is old enough to be a grandmother,
And I will pray to her for Alma, in the utmost moonlight, and in the Opulent rain,
While the students divide, matriculating in and out of their classes,
I will give something to Alma that none of them can ever have,
Because of the way you looked at me today, Alma:
And when you made me flinch when you pretended you were going
To punch me:
I am just a lonely gringo, anyways, and yes, I was sad when you asked Me if I was,
Because your beauty is the only answer to the breathless permanence,
And I can stare at you for a long while,
Alma: I can stare at you almost as long as that.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Metamorphosis

I have to go to school again tomorrow
Since that is all there is—
Like starlight and venison and rum—
Down the halls where the girls have turned More Mexican—
They eat more chili than sugar plums
And at their windows the Virgins of Guadalupe
And in their stone gardens the Pieta—
Uneasy delusions of their apathetic husbands
Around their carports,
Their merry-go-rounds derelict: but I will see Them tomorrow,
And swoop to see them, promising with my Eyes the theft of bicycles—
Mutually hoping for a metamorphosis
We cannot give.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Nameless Road

Reptiles moving in their viaducts,
As airplanes in each section of their airy road:
Manned by girls I once pretended to know from Latin Class:
Floating, floating, ambergrease and mir
Until they look up and see my eyes
Soft pedigree of kidnapped children slipping
Into abeyance between the mountains—
As, approaching night, I might misspell the name
Of the girl I once loved,
I might grow in hunger from a man to a werewolf,
Just as the roses amidst the valleys might become
The forgotten lovers on dragons
Who, having approached the twilight of their heavens,
Forgive all of the illbegotten heroes that once
Tried to slay them
Just to make a name for themselves, and thus Become cenotaphs, nameless markers
Contained like naked caverns—mile markers
For a nameless road.

For A Place To Land

Hands in my own yard—little boy's hands underneath
The banners and castles of a paper tree—
Doing his afternoon delusions into a pit of bonfires:
Burning his toys again,
As his father kills the snakes in the garden,
And piles them up with the help of a Mexican—Pinecones and palm fronds, a bier for the greatest Illusion of a king—and where is my mother?
In the carport? In the Laundromat?
The lilac amphibians are singing underneath a Rhinoceros moon—in the beautiful séance of A crepuscule cartoon—and I loved you as each bud
Pearled into a fruit—
And the moon beamed down on the cloven hoofed
Satyrs playing their lutes—
As I lit off fireworks, and watched the serpents
Sipping gin—I remembered that very soon we'd Be selling fireworks again—
And the pine cones whispered in the boughs,
As the palm fronds gathered in the sand—a stolen bicycle Slipped across the earth—a wayward airplane searched
For a place to land.

For A Pretty And Nameless Fox

In the enfeebled armpits of kittens:

An Alamo, and roses- they are lying against the cinder

Blocks listening toads

Waiting for the rattlesnakes, as the housewives make

Grottos out of their carports, as the graveyards no one single

Anguish, enfolded by mountains and forget-me-nots:

They go this way forever, flooding over with marble

Busts and streams: here it says the dates for my Grandfather; here is a pet cemetery the fire ants

And kindergarteners are stumbling over on some

Occult holiday- pretty animals leaving their

Fingerprints in the crimes, making a name for themselves,

As a flower buds in the chain link fences for a pretty

And nameless fox.

For A Purpose Already Entombed

Here is the other sort of blasphemy- written down
With out her eyes to look upon,
With out her limbs to drape: the incurable sort,
The decade long absence, the affair that never was anything
More than a script persuaded beneath her door she was to Pick up and read and fall in love with, so that by the Many implications of the sad characters, and the stage notes
For rain, and the invented thunder- the plywood lightning bolts,
And the octogenarians as Grandpa Zeus and President
Hoover, that I meant to set out to have her,
Entangle her along the ways of the roots of fruit baring
Trees, to kiss the hem of her maidenhood after climbing the Trellis two-thousand miles, and then the swift intonations
Of a great orchestra encouraging her further,
Her hands opening up her blouse like a gift basket according To this gray-haired conductor:
To yip and leap behind me on this horse, waving our hats to
The village, before we ride away, kissing behind the curtains
To another staged sunset, another successful night for two Young and over eager thespians, drinks and fieldtrips around Europe:
But where has she ever been that was nearer to me, or what I have written to her anymore than a dimming hope, that is fading
Still. Now it is here put out before the eyes of her childhood,
Just a cold bug seeming to wither into obscurity after two weeks
Of its glow-bulb evenings; and after that an ember
Licked by the carousel of waves by the empty sea,
A cremation of a flea: always turned around
And seemed to douse, a cigarette butt flicked out of a speeding car
Going the other way from Saint Augustine- Just a poem
Of a single, extended note crying for her amidst the potted cactus,
A lonely hiker amidst the mountains looking up as she flies high
Overhead, a beautiful airplane: When will she stop picking up
Superfluous tourists, the coworkers and stage-coach drivers going her Way: I could give her a better sort of song, but she must first need to listen
To whispers to pick up this dance in an unremitting canopy far from Society, the cool places of her dives and work; I will love her here
If she recognizes and listens, as if to a seashell,
And if not than this is written for a purpose already entombed.

For A Supermarket Of Imperfect Unions

Capitulating, as if they will finally eat themselves
In the fruitless ballroom:
And I have no children, which makes the world
Larger and full of the sounds
Of hollow machine guns:
And Alma only called one time this day, early in the Morning while I was just arriving for work,
And she had done jogging with her sister,
And now I dream that I will have all of this money:
If it was that I was only more lucky, or more beautiful,
Or filled with the heavenly spirit,
While the sea spits at us all day long in her worried
Dress,
But especially entering the night and languishing in Crepuscle when she is especially beautiful
And she really has nothing for us but all of these folklores
That are all blue in the face,
And I have really only been contemplating Alma's eyes anyways:
How they go so far back in their folk memoirs anyways:
How it is that they transcend the theme parks of the smiling alligators
And the sad theme parks,
And maybe her body hums and purrs anyways: but I only have
This,
An unopened letter clinging to itself alongside the perpetual roadways:
And maybe it is that I will never know how I am,
But I have know Alma, and her every part of her gets more beautiful than
The others, perpetually,
Even while the monsters get more immense and bothersome,
But it cannot be adequately described,
And I can but wish that there was an epitaph carved in the fading
Stones of this world that pressed us together as if trying to squeeze
Out the perfumes of wildflowers into the floor boards of the Carport,
Bringing her and I together across the floorboards that ached and Clung together as the bisexual animals marched across their imperfections, Trumpeting with their snouts for a supermarket of more perfect unions.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Very Long Time

I have no more abracadabra- I can not raise
The dead hearts of a beaten hand: I do this for no
Plausible explanation,
Death has already beaten me, and if you showed Up tomorrow I'm sure I couldn't look into your eyes;
And yet you are ghostly, and you are haunted and Are made up of all the better contours of if I had really had your pets; but you are really so self-
Enamored and have such a fresh paint-job,
I doubt I could get you any wetter- I am just trying not
To starve, so I wear sundresses out in the despotic
Daylight to elicit hate crimes- I carve a harelip
Into my pumpkin as I drink a cold beer-
I want to hop suicide trains, I really want to play Russian Roulette- and Scott isn't really anymore-
And you and the moon are certainly not real,
And I am just trying to deliver the kill-daddy mail to
The sea, though I can never hope to escape my masturbating Cannibalisms;
And the day is a better ghost without any sound,
And the traffic goes about as if in a séance of busy weekdays.
Maybe they are trying to resurrect you and maybe they will,
But I don't want to be there if they do,
Because this is only my job- Once my two hours of grave digging
Is over I'm done,
And it really doesn't matter how beautiful the venal treasure
Is I've found if its blueprints are still radio-active:
I need a good girl, a care giving scientist, who will lie beside Me when all of this tomfoolery is over, juxtaposed, two Similar sounding cenotaphs which should last forever,
Or at least for a very long time.

Robert Rorabeck

For A Village Of Love

My throat feels like a cauldron of fireworks,
And I laugh in my empty house which still moves like
A zoetrope of coyotes in the woebegone desert:
It still moves like the never mindful carousel,
Because Alma was here today and we made love:
Like a scratched record, we made love:
Like a scratched record, we made love:
And the airplanes flew
And the waves continued
As the airplanes flew
As the waves continued
And we made love until just the two of us
Was all that was needed for a village of love....
For a village of love.

Robert Rorabeck

For All Mankind

They make fun for a little while
And then they play is over: the go back to work,
The rattlesnakes circulate:
The airplanes are coming down, and then it rains;
And when it rains, the shelters feel so warm,
And even through the night the roses bud,
And share their perfumes with the jasmines who
Are up to so many wonderful things:
And in the morning, sunlight, and more truancy:
And the airplanes are like crystal chalices
Exposing their blessed sacraments for all mankind.

Robert Rorabeck

For All Of Night To Fall

Another daylight for you
To believe in for an infinitude—
Whilst the blue ants burrow, whistling
Underneath of the bicycles—
And if you had studied more—there would Be no reason for these Rain clouds—
But the cities shape themselves like Diamonds
Out in the rectitude—and then it is finally time
For all of night to fall—
And fall it does,
Across the cities and their halls—
And the words that you could never memorize finally Become dimmed,
And the beautiful ships sink—
And the demons enter in:
But they are beautiful, crawling around
Over the graveyards of you eyes and your skin.

Robert Rorabeck

For All Of This Time

All of these times filibuster my lunchmeats and my sister
Wishes that she was bought out by now, and now the yellow sun
Kills through the bluest skies;
And if I had a stream then it led to your bedroom, and all of the night
Was young and filled with the bodies that couldn't sleep.
While Alma was breathing and all the sheep were counting their Fine corsages and if was such a disgrace to really reciprocate by the avenues
Of golden foreclosures;
And now I have some plants to sell- I don't know how tall they grow,
But they grow, and put them up beside your house in your rock garden
And then you'll know while your daughter is sucking tit in the ashes
Of her habits and I have loved other women by other men by you;
And I'll be some mammals uncle while under all these haberdasheries of Planets I haven't thought of you; and now you think that I have money,
Or that I have had the time,
Put I just press my fists deeper into this earth and smile up past the rest stops
And ask if you don't have an answer by now for all of this time.

Robert Rorabeck

For All The Times Singing You Home

So my face has its own zeniths that the puppet strings
Of gravity keeps pulling down:
I look sadder and sadder, and I am the jubilant paradox
Waiting outside of college classrooms
As chubby as cauliflower who wants to get with his Cantaloupe:
Of course the moon is pregnant: of course it is, but buy its Stolen religiosity, I can see you swimming all of the way
Down the highway,
And soon I know you will be getting off into the steep Jungles of another Catholic topiary: You will comb your Hair at each traffic light,
And then you will come back on for me: because you only
Have on destination, and that is to make it all the way toward
This mouth who is for all times singing you home.

Robert Rorabeck

For Another Harvest

The cloyness that I overuse is here,
And you are now asleep Alma, just as brown and as Delicious as a caramel apple in a medieval fair,
Or a penny in a wishing well:
But there is still that witchcraft sealed in your Brown eyes:
Sealed with the brown feathers that you lid your genies:
And you want things,
And these things come to you through hard work:
And the lights stay on, but you have to pay a little:
You tell me that you have never crested mountains:
That you are not close to your sister,
And that your man tells you that he can find a better woman
On the next street corner;
But I am just right here, collecting the dollar bills,
Looking at you the way the doe looks
At the stamp of a most solemn forest, knowing that footpaths
It has made towards the heart and the Hidden springs:
And maybe my son will have changed from prince into
A spry animal,
But like him and the other words that I cannot control,
I do now own you, and yet I am right here,
Still guarding the fire hydrants, and making them burn under
The collect hopes of the sun:
And I watch you turn around, a hundred bounds of sincere Daylight,
As brown as the joys of the blowing wind who whistles ferally
Over the virile and auburn clips of all the land
Who waits in its yawning bed
For another harvest.

Robert Rorabeck

For Another Makebelieve World

Filling in things here, as if in a delta all of the traffic
Streams to- past museums
And down the luscious concrete slope of a Parking garage as smooth
As a virgin's brow:
Boats rowing on her body, park here when the current Gets off work,
Looks at things that might be sold basking in the cooling
Shadows underneath the overpass
With the Mexicans, the snakes, and the rainbows:
It feels okay for a little while,
Outside of high school- filibustering in the weeds,
And the songs that come from them come out of Tune,
But perfect and carrying on for a little ways
The sad music the ants must here as they think of Her, galloping towards her ankles like
Monoliths of reindeer,
Holidays of natural monuments-
For a little kiss, for a little sting- for her to recognize them,
And then the little death
And no more breathing- ants have lungs no more,
As they recognize their queen stepping from the mowed
Grass and across the street
Like another god leaving their graveyard,
Leaving their home for another make believe world.

Robert Rorabeck

For Another Man

Up in the air where no one lives,
And then looking down
And feeling humbled- Remembering a house
That doesn't stand anymore,
A forest that burned- her body
Left for the buzzards at the stone, the knight
Strung up in parts,
In parts eaten by witches: the soft motors that Purr,
Robot engineers on the tight ropes of their Quest,
The petals falling away in the game of love,
And then it is all over-
There is nothing left to do, but to reside,
To wait out the storm, as the cats have their own
Dreams in the aloe,
Beside the carport where the rebar lays stacked,
And Christmas is over-
And someone's mother is there, kneeling, cursing,
Or praying,
But waiting for another man to come home.

Robert Rorabeck

For Another More Fortunate Of A Night

Crossing and recrossing the panhandles
We sing like jet planes to orchards: we sing as if we would Have liked our father to sing to us;
And it all becomes a lesson better left unexplained: As Alma
Resaddles home to her old scars
And open wounds- the cars that pistil there into junkyards
Overly exhumed from all of Mexico,
The airplanes crossing borders sweet on her- while her secrets haunt
Under the highly mortgaged roof of her father:
Her mother Rosa cooks and recooks dinner; but beside the telltale
Fireside of the same old television, it looks all right:
And if there are monsters, they are monsters better left to be battled
For another more fortunate of a night.

Robert Rorabeck

For Another Year

And a castle on a sandstone cliff
Surrounded by dragons who are ejaculating flames
On some desk in the middle of high school
Where the poor prince mopes—
Motes of crystal stars and plastic tears:
I know what he is feeling, falling in love with the milky way
Of her skin—
As she goes and kisses in her car—paper snowflakes fall
On the hoods of toads:
It lasts all sophomore year, jelly-fish and sponges
That weep and sting, but never think of all of this—Carried by the waves as if by their roller-rinks of Mothers—
Sea urchins beneath them as red as the Siamese jewelry
Decorating her bosom—broaches pressed in her
Brazier—She comes up to another slide
And the sunlight collects around her like hungry grasshoppers
Before she goes down for another year.

Robert Rorabeck

For As Long As Men Can Remember

I want to describe the flowers that they keep giving
The dead;
It is quite common knowledge to some men: men who work
On boats and float in rivers:
Then they are like the song in her throat when she is lying down
And bathing,
Her nudity the unchaste rises, the abrupt hotels and
The estuaries of alligators and spikenard;
And then she whispers to them how she must be cremated underneath
The sky,
Through the reedy shoulders where the canoes float like Softly rollerskating freckles;
And she gives them the answers for all the pretty names of the bouquets
That must be placed over her on the solitude of Unwakeful lines: That she should grow forever in a hoary sheath,
While the flowers of our dictionaries will only
Bloom for as long as men can remember her.

Robert Rorabeck

For As Many Hours

I carry pictures of that miraculous cloak,
But I will never make it that far to Canterbury,
Or wherever;
And it is almost as if now that I have gone down beneath the sea:
I can see you changing her, Alma:
I can feel you body almost disappearing the way it does at night
Laying beside your man:
You were pregnant with Michael when you were sixteen,
While I was kicking out the lights of my own dream:
There are many lights refracted deep in the beds of her sea,
And you can pray to your virgin and sea them all while you lay
Beside your man;
And nothing that I have had to say about you has been enough to Describe a single one of your fingerprints,
Or the way you breath around me the three days a week we have together,
The nine hours a day:
I think it must be more time than you spend consciously with your husband,
But he will make you harvest the rabbits that you love anyways:
Bring them over to my house and save them, and we can start a new family;
And the sea will love us especially,
And we can still work together nine hours a day,
And sleep for as many hours together for so many nights.

For Awhile Of Nothing

Often in clothes as vague as my soul,
I step out enthralled in the traffics as brilliant
As Christmas:
The mothers and their daughters are living large,
Fawning, and making quick work out of Their meals:
I am captivated with this as much as I am with Vampires,
But it all seems to be a trick of the old woods:
Going further in and slumbering with the carcasses
Of overturned circus and the animals
Who can only breathe in the moonlight which Gives them a path to follow the terrapins out again
And into the backyards of high school
Where we took days off and made love to her while
Her husband, returned from Mexico,
Was on the job of digging pools as thick as diamonds
For the peers we use to know, and jeer with as
The fireworks resonated with pinfire constellations
For a while of nothing in the undetermined sky.

Robert Rorabeck

For Azure Hours

Replace blue with azure,
Her apathy with sure romance,
Your scars with angelic beauty, and there
You are: You're a poet now
So sell your lips and tongue for potatoes
And chives-
Drive slowly down streets with girls with Slender vased legs: Those girls are French-
No matter if they aren't;
And by nature, they know so many words for love:
Suckle them like flowers. Invite them into your Car- Tell them it is such and such a propitious Hour, and they'll know just by the look in Your eyes exactly who you are.
Take them to a graveyard, any one, and tell them
Jokes that weep and lactate under the moon,
And they'll respond with frivolous and unhealthy foreplay; but it suits you fine as red velvet,
Like the tongues of Catholic dolls, and if that's Who they are your eyes are closed;
But don't take it too seriously, since now nothing
Is exactly empirical.
You can imagine them as generals in the Dolphin's
Army, spurring you like witch's spurs, sweating
Deep southern folklore the kind that became popular
During Reconstruction-
Remove their delicates like prayer flags whipped away
From the darnedest Himalayan summits;
And give them silver spurs and love bites like pugilistic
Sirs: Gothic or feral, one or the other- Why now you
Are studied reptilian. You breathe azure fire. Skip all your classes,
Because you are a genius especially in the rains-
Sleep on all your neighbors yards,
Hunt on four legs- Forget to wear school
Colors; and if you ask the alligator he will take you
Across the canal to the other world donned in the brotherly
Shadows;
Or he will devour you- Either way you'll get there-
Remove her social instrumentations,

Marriage ornamentations, and swing with
Her on the swings; or just gather by the lake where everyone Else is baptizing,
Or underneath the desert graveyards where your grandmother
Is walking,
Or floating like the hummingbirds,
And just stare and stare into her azure eyes
For azure hours.

Robert Rorabeck

For Both Of Us

Alma:

The day was ours, but we did not enjoy

It,

Together:

I fought beside the water cooler by myself,

Until I found your eyes:

Smiling,

Smiling, and not at my idiot of idiot cousin:

But when we sat

Side by side like husband and wife

At lunch on that pitiful table outback of the Fruiteria,

And I transplanted that little ring to your married

Finger and it made you laugh,

And you expressed your sadness at having children

Before knowing me,

But still was swayed by your desire to take

Michael to Disney World on his next birthday.

And still the airplanes swam as if it was your birthday

In their crosses of fire,

While everything that I had to say was failing,

As the orchards knew themselves by their own colors;

And only if I knew by that hour of loneliness,

And floated above its grave,

Taking your warm hand to my wounded chest, and

Blessed by still beating breath by your warm

Tardiness;

Then couldn't you tell by any of this that there wasn't

Any longer anytime for school,

Or our mutual misunderstanding of both of our languages,

While the bottle rockets shot off like salutes to the court

Where we could both be rhymed together and

Find reasons for both of us to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

For Care Or Reason

Feeling unsure now that anything will happen

Between us:

I still like looking at your face, and your daughters face,

Like the Oracle of Delphi in a mug shot against the Peg board:

Out in the natural habitat of spruce trees: out in the yard

Where the peacock dances for the foxes;

Does she know where I've hidden her eggs, where I've Taken them off to the zoo, while the clouds baptize

In the rains- and the carport glimmers like a shroud

And you are taking refuge in there with

The husked shells of conquistadors: now you can wash your

Dishes and your clothes in them, and comb your hair a thousand

Times,

As in the somnolence of all the rains there seems to make some Kind of reason, and I can smell your firm architectures of your Body as it is folded inside that very shelter, with the washing

Machine, and with your daughter-

And it is all I need for care or reason.

Robert Rorabeck

For Different Occasions

Locked inside their cars for a long while Even children who haven't learned to spell see
The make-believe beauty the sun lights
Anonymous birthdays in the trees- shoppers
Walking to and from the malls,
The green avenues braided occasionally through
The concrete-
They feel her on their skin, their mother-
Gone away- even though they cannot see her.
Airplanes and birds barrette the sky
For different occasions.

Robert Rorabeck

For Each Other

I don't know anything about their Better sorrows:
All of the Mexicans who were my better
Uncles are Shedding tears:
Because,
All of the eagles have eaten the black snakes
Who
Use to make love amidst their Crops of Jalapenos-
But I will not cry,
Because this is not my sorrow:
I am back in high school- again,
Repeating the same memory I dream about
Every night
As the moon tries to steal the tides,
And all of my muses have flown away in
The mouths of airplanes-
And I cannot remember her name, or why
I cried for her
But every night I still sleep underneath the Hood of the heavens-
And I know that if I do not cry for her,
And she does not cry for me- At least,
Sometimes, we still cry for each other.

Robert Rorabeck

For Even Brighter Fields

In the art class of your eyes there was a fire,
When all of the kindergarteners were on a fieldtrip
To the communal wishing well-
Then you still couldn't even see me, but you
Thought of the insouciant canal your day laborers
Dug for you, and to your backyard which made
Shipping your gifts easier;
And they laid out busier poems for you an Cracked oysters on their bare chests underneath
A sky that was a blue junkyard and even the Blue birds came down your avenue bringing gifts
To place underneath your armpits hoping that They could birth their young there: you were a
Virgin at this time, and there was no central air-conditioning
In your house: there were bars on your windows,
But the sun wasn't as hot; it still evaporated the pleasant
Vapors in your yard, and in the winter you went to See your great uncle in Clearwater, but there was Only more paper snowflakes and more tears for me.
I sometimes haunted your palmettos with a
Dwarf, but you became more and more busier and more
And more indoors- and soon you left those daydreams
For even brighter fields of even more brilliant forget-me-nots.

Robert Rorabeck

For Fear Of Doing Wrong

For fear of doing wrong,
I have done none for many years,
And it has made me hungry
And aware of all the strange women in the world
Walking about like transmogrified deer
In the shopping malls,
Leaping like infant sun coils
Halfway dressed in the tennis courts,
Or outside in the green lawns surrounding
Their rented domiciles,
Though I have forgotten that certain whistling,
That trilling call from the back of ones throat,
Which takes sometimes years to master,
To turn their heads my way,
To start their hearts beating like Little frightened birds careening amidst
The power lines,
Chased by the persistent hawk:
Sometimes I see them calmly skipping rope
And hopping through the a labyrinth
Outlined in chalk,
And I would have liked to stop what
I'd been doing to join them,
To bring together in so many ways
Nature's harbingers of life:
Here it is, and there it was now,
But to do so would certainly be
Some kind of wicked folly,
For I have tried it before, and it all went bad,
And now the pain lingers:
A mark, a scar, an unpleasant scent,
So in this spring, as the cherry trees blossom
Like opening silk vests,
I can only walk by and watch the fruit
Fall criminally from its bowers,
Leaving me to walk away empty handed,
For fear of going some wrong course,
Leaving young smiles to linger in sadness.

For Forgiveness

Alone in a bankrupt Spain- How I look at
You; it's like I'm locked out of the house wearing My stuff for Halloween way back when I still had friends and potential; I'd kicked out all
The lights and hid from the cops,
And if you didn't come like something trained,
Came into the beating penumbras of what wasn't
Real- And you were everything, just the perfect shadow Doing what she was trained- How your body was like
A bag of free sugar to me,
Dabbed on your like an addicted hummingbird,
In ways that couldn't spell, went on all along you until
I became dehydrated, and realized everything I said
Was failing with the dawn- Handcuffed on your blue
Mowed lawn, and weren't you inside moaning like a leggy
Tide with your stuff for better boys, a new holiday of Things,
Christmas under the tree tackling your dining saints,
Loving your godly sailors through the tides of your bed sheets,
Two houses with wet paint; and when the mailman came With misspelled gifts for you, lifted by the eager tongues of Other admirers, you let us in with the ants crawling
And at the breakfast of a hung over sky, all you had to offer
For forgiveness.

For Good And All Night

Burned into the reasons of being, all the old words fit
Into the new graves:
The infinites wake up cooing like eager gas tanks;
And your breasts I wonder how it feels to feed under the old
And Spanish ships,
Eclipsed by the green skies; and all of the waves out in the Combing mess,
Worshipping the migratory patterns, while mothers slip away
And weep beside the canals dredged up by man;
While my words try to recall her number, and the cars
Cross the land,
Until once again the city is made impotent and polite,
And the cheap, cheap dollar's worth of kite pulls on its lovers
Wrist,
Tugging like a displeased goldfish trying to leave into the darker
Goodbyes for good and all night.

For Heaven's Sake

Unconquered sunlight falling where I planned to Live:
In Saint Augustine—up next to the saintly giving—
In a trailer park lock-stepped Accounting to the orchestras of moonbeams in Her insouciances of ghettos:
While, then—she is living right here—
Brown skinned apogee:
How long will it take her to find her place,
As she moves up into her busied
Holidays—
And the nights of wherever bleed down around her,
And the traffic whistles in her ears:
She will be beautiful wherever she is-
And the sun will give,
And the moon will give,
And the sun and the moon will give and take:
Even if it is not as beautiful as the both of them were
In our memories—
I hope it will be enough, finally, and for heaven's sake.

For Her

Cheeks stained with the tears of baseball
That somehow Alma cannot see:
I told her I have all of these scars in her car:
She laughed at me,
And she let me kiss her, and for awhile to hold her hand,
While all the other cars moved as if in a fraternity of A band:
And the clouds did whatever they were doing:
She said that we could only be friends; that she must stop
Reading my poetry,
But then we made love, and we made love again:
The forest opened into the glades that sang for the affections of
Her eyes,
And when she drove away from me again, across the Parking lot of the fruiteria, that was when I went back into My own tomb and waited for her to call for me,
As some times she does:
She becomes a wetted mariposa when we are alone together,
Her brown skin prettier than anything I laid eyes upon in Highschool;
And I just want to take pictures of her pretty feet and hands,
Juxtaposed with my working scars, and the dirt in my nails:
I want to show how she can become an airplane for any man
Who opens his eyes upon her,
Even though she will only take away so few,
Her promises as finicky as birthday candles; but she makes Me glad that I had to suffer for so long,
And that my silent art is so pitiful if unabused, because now
It can all be for her- she can be my insufferable muse,
And the affluence of the world will never Off color us at all,
And we will swing together without echoes; and if I still had A shadow, it would only be for her.

For Her Day At School

I want you to remember my classroom with great joy
Even as the frogs go singing across the rebar
And your mother is falling down, stung by the open
Extension cord after doing the laundry—
She is like an acrobat practicing her Pieta—
And the world is conjoined around her into Siamese twins—the night becomes the hemisphere
And leaps across the canal—
Where inside something is waiting for metamorphosis
Forever and it comes and comes—
Minnows pressed against the shallows like bathtubs of Submarines—and other pretty images all awakening alike
To get a look at her as the sun rises—and she draws
Herself from her bath like an angel beginning to practice
For her day at school.

For Her To Love Me

So long have I had to resend my sins of love,
Packed away in the glove box or
The attics for better, and less precarious men,
Considering the heredity of my complexion,
And the state that unabashed sunlight puts me in;
But I was beautiful once:
I was beautiful once in a fairytale halfway through
High school
When I ran away to Michigan,
When S- made crocks of clay and won the Irish lottery;
But what was I doing all this time, hoping for the Quiet interludes of beauty between the street lights,
And the soccer field's esplanades:
Oh- Oh, I loved her: I loved her, her indescribable eyes,
Or her amber Latin eyes,
Light the drunk street lights for pirates,
But it wasn't enough; it wasn't enough;
And the cops come and shine their lights all back and forth
All over our amusements, but it wasn't ever enough;
And I loved her, oh god I loved her,
But now she just street races coffins:
She does her thing, she sells her thing, and she is pierced
Like a moth dying in the sepias of your church yard-
And I loved her,
And her voice is always singing more easterly,
But it wasn't ever enough that I loved her enough,
So I sling my wine,
And cry with my face buried in the graveyards of my plaid
Shoulder blade,
As the cops come shining their lights for Christmas,
Because my presents were never enough
For her to love me.

For I Swear For Both Of Us

The day turns out like my body sitting on a love seat
In the armpit of Southern Boulevard and Old Dixie: I am now living In historical West Palm Beach, in a house I paid for
With cash,
And Alma has been to my house twice, like the cat who comes through
The whole in the fence:
Alma, if you could have seen her eyes as she was cleaning herself underneath
The blue umbrella this morning: I saw her after I had showered and Was trying not to look at myself to endearingly:
She cleaned herself, as pregnant as the snow as it was disappearing,
And you must have been at the market, Already:
Alma: Today, you called Charlie Robert, which is my name, Alma:
And last Saturday or Sunday you said you had something you wanted
To tell me,
After I swore to you that I loved you, but you didn't tell me what it
Was;
And today, Alma, you told me that I knew nothing, only that I had upset
You- While I threatened to get drunk and to go straight to your house
And sleep on a nearby roof, like I had done the other night,
But you compromised and promised instead that you would come and See me tomorrow:
Alma: what are we going to do tomorrow, while the cats sleep,
And the fairs migrate like butterflies across our America,
And you study to become a citizen, of this country that has become our Soul,
For I swear for both of us that it is another great land.

Robert Rorabeck

For Ingmar Bergman

With others old and gray,
Or not so old at all—Maybe they will
Mostly be fair haired and young,
If it should be a tragedy. Who knows?
But this is known, I will die some day
When Death comes to collect that part of
Me that he sees fit to remain,
To gather me up— a silhouette
Of the somber procession upon the hill
Backlit by a tired sun— The busy insects will
Eat what is left, the scuttling carnivores,
Nature's vacuum cleaners which God created to
Keep things cleaned, so there are no leftovers
As everything is satisfied—
Away from the anthills and plaguing swarms we
Will go, being grinned out by our own death masks
As we leave, bidding adieus—
Those heartless grins ex-lovers put on for show-
Go down with that orb if Death leads us there,
But who knows where Death goes, except that
He will take us with him to the other side,
His black robes billowing importantly, for
He is the herald of our great king, his
Skeletal hand pointing ever onward like a compass, onward in the Shade which is so very quiet where no hearts beat,
No blood flows— And maybe our procession will never
End. We will just keep going down in some great viewless stairwell
Beneath the world until we forget that we ever knew the pains of settlement.
In that abyssal fjord where Death will ditch us,
And leave us to the tricks of his shadow as he dives back up
To collect some more...
But this is known— that one day I shall die
And so shall you. My mother will die...
And on that day of the week people will be born
And the people already there shall live— People will go out and make love.
On that Friday a movie will come out you will never see
And there will be a book written that would have made me cry...
And the sun will come up afterwards like it did for us,
But not really so similar all in all, for our sun will be dead,

And this new sun rising is only for the living. Perhaps,
Though, we shall not care at all, knowing that these gifts are
Laid about to gladden the living, as we find newly indescribable
Things to attire our naked souls, or maybe we will not remember
At all. Maybe we will be like the egg in the nest in the crook of a branch
Of an expansive tree. Laying there in our nooks waiting to hatch again
To be filled with new thoughts, like the river's changing gown,
We will become again something we never before were.
But one thing is certain,
That one day you shall die
And I shall follow you, before or after,
It matters little as we shall all accord to Death.

(For Ingmar Bergman)

Robert Rorabeck

For Its Second Of Infinity

If I bought my own clothes,
Would you cherish me in the day:
Would I come out just as sunny as the workers
Who trouble themselves dallying on your vines;
But I think I would rather be sunning naked with my dogs,
Because I can smell you better this way;
And this is a sunnier sort of play, crawling to you on My fours:
Not knowing how to open doors to you, I leap through windows:
I span towards you like bottle rockets who whistle for Your throat,
And won't you let me pierce you like an arrow with your Name on it,
Perfumed in the grotto with the tadpoles of my religion by Which I worship you,
And even these over-kind words dissolve just as your life
Is going backlit into the crepuscule of its hidden cove,
So there isn't anymore than a perfect memory
That for a second flickered in a shallow pool for your eyes
To see and for you to come back to perfectly
When you are trying to conjure up a friendship that burned
For its second of infinity.

Robert Rorabeck

For Love Of You

The day was long and hot for the old man,
And he was very lonely never having Accomplished anything:
You had never given him your love,
The holidays of your children on fieldtrips
Or feeding elephants at the zoo:
He used to have dreams of being in charge
Of the remote control boats well beside the Hungry lions din,
Just to watch the young mothers and their Truants licking snot and cigarettes,
Because they would remind him of you;
But you didn't even know who he was,
And he grew lettuce in his backyard underneath
The clothes line and the evil serpents in
The apple tree
Who were always telling terrible lies that turned Up true every time an airplane flipped across
Or a kidnapper drove up and down the street;
But you never called:
He got a cat and named it after you,
And you never knew until now how empty his Christmas tree was, Sharon,
With gifts he could never give to anyone,
And what trespassed through your life, your husband
And the segues of all of his foals underneath your Saddle is not the point of this story:
The night was warm when he died, the forever temptress
Was out doing her laundry underneath the Plaedies of Kalamazoo; and maybe she loved him.
Maybe every woman in the universe loved him,
Even the busted superheroes,
But he never thought of them as he was going through
With the gettings done with whatever he was doing;
And his parents were prematurely drunkards and gray,
And after nine lives his cat died,
But he kept on keeping for you;
And that night he had a fever and dreamt of pinball,
And you were always there feeding quarters to the machine.

But wherever you were really, Sharon,
Is not the point of his story;
It is that you were not there, and died:
You were out seeing movies,
Or swinging deep in the backside of parks,
So far in your censors that you passed over the Graveyards and then back again,
Tasting the luck of both sides;
It was almost as if you'd twice lived, but that
Is not the point:
He was gone in the morning and the sun sounded
No siren,
While the goldfish he'd won for you played too Close to surface of the shallow pools in his Bedroom where the clawed ghosts of his gray
Cats were still purring attentive,
Their voices almost screaming the sharpest weathers
Of the lips of the steepest mountains,
Living longer than they should have,
Returning back again across the canals no man or Cat should have to come return across
For love of you.

For Lovers In A Feathery Rain

I want a Mexican wife:

I want to trick my white wife, and all the things she would

Have wanted from me,

To fill her condominium with the affluence of my sweat:

Now my introversion and dysfunctions may finally have done

Me some good:

To see beauty for real every day slipping out of her clothes

Across the canal,

Haloed by the repercussions of helicopters, striped by airplanes

And the reflections of school buses in the middle of a

Mirage miles and miles away;

Here they turn out better than anything that can be bought and put into

A home,

They clean up better than boys who hold your love in the seconds

Of crepuscule,

As we all leave each other and the things we've procured,

And go into the divinity of the body's infinite sink hole, and there

See for real the things that we have

Collected,

That are spoken in the lubrications of an unconscious mouth;

And my wife is there baking in smoke

Her skin as delightful as a baseball diamond; and her children with her

Who I will collect with her like the echoing

Laughter of a Ferris Wheel as it turns for lovers in a feathery rainstorm.

For Many Years Onward

Where do those eyes fall
That will one day fall on me?
Where does the head lay that
Will in time lie beside mine?
Where do the lips breathe which Will tomorrow press again my neck
To say my name sweetly
Like the first evidence of Spring?

Not in this misplaced season,
Where the stamp of pain lays justified
Upon my heart,
In these cold evenings where my body
Numbs in loneliness,
So that I cry out in feeble words
Like some ancient wounded thing
In the sorrowful hollows of its everlasting cave—

Come to me now through the Swirling limbo of these timeless mountains.
Like a golden fairytale part these dispassionate
Curtains of the darkest loneliness,
And lay the direction of your soul upon me
Awakening me with a kiss conducted by your eyes.
With warm hands enfolding,
Show me the evidence of God,
And after all this time I will come alive again
And fuse with you in the brightest burning
So that after we are gone,
Like some stars now above,
Our passion will leave its glow as evidence
For many years onward

Robert Rorabeck

For Me To Move

Recorded through the pale subway,
Losing myself here—another exegesis as red
As Mars—
The life unnatural, as far away from the lures of Middle class housewifery as one can be—
And finding myself in a lazy manner as I turn
Thirty six—
Once again the fox who has disregarded the Savage advertising of the grapes—
Though in their cages of cities, the vixens move,
Spilling into the orifices
And the ballrooms of their zoos.
I watch them from an unnaturally safe distance—
An impossible distance for me to move.

Robert Rorabeck

For More Important Things

There are no more wells here- in this fair
City, worth looking down to, though you can cast your Loose change and wishes
Into many of the fountains that I have sat next to
In the faux paradise,
Watching Alma kissing her daughter, remembering old Loves that I have also had,
Mentioning apple orchards because they are worth Mentioning in times like these-
Trying to win her goldfish, even speckled, even though
The fair is gone,
And the lions have done their roaring- they now
Paw at the loose armor of katydids; the fireworks have
All returned to ash,
And the tourists are busily dining- and soon you will Return to your dreams as well,
As the clouds are puffed into the stars by the wishful sea,
And the wishes that little girls now
Soon disappear, as they leave their bicycles for cars,
And keep pressing their bodies to the coins
Tossed for more important things.

Robert Rorabeck

For More Than One Week

Busted up over the hedgerows of paramours trying
To fend for themselves,
Shivering in their fleecelless shoulders:
Without a good or a bad king, and no sign of heritage or Its loot:
They mime the green fountains of cypress,
Swaying for a little while in disbelief- Only going for so
Many more flirtations
Until they are hung out to dry, limp as shaven lambs across
The creek,
Where red throated minnows kiss their buttocks repeatedly,
Stamping their heliotropic promises the size of Newborn ants to the flaxeness of overturned caesuras
Who have never given them assurance that they will be there
For more than one week.

Robert Rorabeck

For My Night Of Nothing

No more poems for my night of nothing,
My soul of nothing—
I am lost underneath the bus outside of the Woebegone daydreams of a high school
I am still bleeding from—
The airplanes seem to tackle themselves,
Trying to devour their silver, winged
Jewelry while seeing down their throats
To give dark red roses that don't Exist to the stewardesses who are flying in Them anyway—
As then Christmas happens and
Then the summer-
Two things leaping in a zoetrope,
Like friends taking the place of lovers—
Like a sky pretending not to be in love with
The sea.

Robert Rorabeck

For My Songs To You Unlistening

Pitiless night, undress me to no one,
And publish me in the pit of an entombed unicorn,
Throbbing with the still life deep beneath the sea:
Take me to museums of mausoleums
And play my quieting face to all the shade of empty playgrounds
Where the chalk no longer steps:
Where the silent voices have it right, because I am sure that I Am doing nothing either good nor properly:
But I will soon have my mute house and my boneless dogs,
And I will yet think of you turning, turning like bright candles
In the air-conditioned Mandela's of your cars;
And I will think that there still may be time to tramp barefooted
Underneath the cones of slash pine trees,
And to listen to the old and yet extinct teachers making love in The sad groves and overgrown parks, because that is just What they were made to be doing; and this night is just Another night for my songs to you unlistening.

Robert Rorabeck

For Night To Fall

We're going to have a good time,
Even though all of Spain goes missing,
We can go to the drive in movie
Theatre in Lakeworth ever night:
And experiment on her jawbone:
This just because of where I love in the Country that is America:
Coming from Shanghai, you will be my Wife, and maybe my muse—
I will not tell you of the other muses come
Before this: □
We can spend time together near the sea,
Beneath the red and yellow helicopters
Up above in their bright estuaries—
Or this is just a plot meant to dissemble beneath
The stars, or I can touch your knee,
And recall how we made love in bed together,
As nature echoed, and the housewives
Called to one another,
Like elk bugling in the forest—plundering their Rich stanzas above the earth,
Dressed in the slips of their ethereal nature,
And waiting for night to fall.

Robert Rorabeck

For Nothing But

The city cries as it is gone, and I am coming into this world:
I who have two sisters:
I who have been to this Disney World: Disney World of senior Trips, what were they teaching us:
While the herded us onto the splendiferous bus, doctors and lawyers
And each to his own:
Oh what, oh what were they teaching us;
And I can remember you there underneath the free spaces
Of Space Mountain, Sharon:
But oh what were they teaching us while I did ecstasy and your Last thoughts where of your late father: oh, Sharon;
Oh how do I think of you now, while the city burns up its quantrills
So high up on its windowsills. While your first and last daughter
Is almost forgotten, while your co-captain, what's her name,
Shows us pretty and well lit chambers of her equaled and well lit house,
While the city burns down beneath us and I give her tongue;
All the prettiest of whores who are out tonight on the pretty terraplains
Blushing with hibiscus, asking for nothing but getting some.

Robert Rorabeck

For Nowhere Again

I get to leave for nowhere again. I am
Planning to take off for the show;
It is the best way, when you are rather the Monster, or at least it is who you remind her of
She tells you on the other end of the phone,
Halfway to Spain
Too close to the air-conditioning unit to be understood
Or felt good about.
The truest light bulbs are naked and have been Around so long they've never changed; there is Something lucky about them turning just more
Amber above the heads of a succession of Girls; perhaps they are the ancestry of a great show,
And they have loved their men.
You can even hear them here singing their bawdy
Limericks, kicking down the halls to the rowdy
Orchestra and its fraternity of men;
Hanging here, near the dust and different kinds of Spiders, it is another attempt to think of her,
The one denoted by the mind of a whole filament
Another bereaved heart palpitating in a backroom
Without furniture, waiting her to return to change
Her clothes,
To smell her a little while around the hot glass,
And to see her from this vantage speaking of ambergris, Powdering up and waiting for the clad elegant men to Do to her as they certainly will.

For One Moment

Days percussion all week,
And white men take turns climbing
Ladders,
And turning the other cheek:
And it isn't long until they are perfectly
Fitted in the jobs and punctuations,
And the sweet nuances of suburbia:
They look at the same,
And the city builds all up,
The butterflies first metamorphosis and Die:
My sister went away upon the back of
A bull who happened to be some God,
And I can't remember who I am,
Or how I got here,
But the portraits of the vinyl interior
Of classic cars aren't half bad;
The hallways of high school the echoing
Coffins of the early labors slipping
Into the auriferous sounds,
Like trumpets that bled out into the air
And then fell like death knells
Into the ground,
The earth tombs and crèches of popinjay
Profits;
But all of this is meaningless when all
I wanted was all but to Hold her hand for one moment.

Robert Rorabeck

For One Of Them To Turn

Barbie's around the cloy
Flutes of spears,
Forgotten sisters of girls in College, like Disney World,
Undulations of the fun rhythms
The saber tooth tigers
Enjoy,
Looking up all night long,
The stars like a cane field of Burning rum,
Hurrying together in the stores
Already torn down
In ellipses of dog tracks
Masticating off the main
Route to Canterbury,
The mountains rising up like
Steps, like fountains,
Where they sit to enjoy like
Statuaries in a
Game of graceful degrees
Everything that they
Are expected to Learn,
As I watch this scantily clad harem
Unconditionally,
Just hoping for one of
Them to turn.

Robert Rorabeck

For Only I

I have waited so long for you to walk away;
Salivated for your stilettos' echoing, so I could speak
Monosyllabically with the women from their graveyard,
In tattered passing notice the beauty extinct but under pine,
And lulling in naked enjambment like fallen whispers
In those dunes; This, if I were a better poet, I would see Laying there, the brightest corsage upon the hood of the Rusting Chevy, inaugurated by flies: This plastic bloom,
A cheap discovery no more beautiful than a doll's nudity,
But I find it here: A better place to be with my knocked-out
Childhood barefooted down the diapered lanes: On bicycling
Holidays where the moon is a pregnant seraph courting earth,
And each wave's caesura a needing thrust; This I orchestrate
With my conducting phallus, undulating forlornly away from Your instinctual prom; These things you have no words to see,
I will speak
For only I....

Robert Rorabeck

For Other Joys

Greenness of walls, of fields and rivers, of the envy of Foxes: all day long waiting for the wash down the Long throats of mountains into parlors
Or arcades
Of old muses: as Colorado gets dirty where my mother
Was born, up the silent switchbacks of Golden,
Up the long tailfins of her brother's mountains
As the days got lost
And the snows melted and she dreamed of beautiful
Swans between the wet pages where she'd been crying-
As in the sky, the airplanes flew with all of those Stewardesses bound to be jumping overseas,
Their noses bleeding, their hearts pounding fortunately
For other joys.

Robert Rorabeck

For Right Now

Now eventually we'll have to peel away from mountains,
While the narrow gauge railroad still takes her tourists
Back and forth between Silverton and Durango,
Even while I went back to her and climbed her peaks
After running down in a lightning storm
Not wishing to hear what the stones had to gossip to me:
That is how far up I've been Sharon,
And that really is all that I've seen:
That I have been above your bed by which you made your child on,
While my body was all alone and vagabonding;
And it has been ages since I have field tripped to a museum,
Except I took Alma to the zoo a week ago while my Parents were losing the fruit market,
And then we kissed in the darkness: and we kissed:
Before that I slept atop of Alma's roof and cursed and blessed her,
And before that I skipped school and took off all of my clothes
All the way down to my under wear and stole a raft from A middle class pool and luxuriated in the canals you never tasted:
But on Friday I smelled Alma's perfume:
It lasted all the way down to Miami; and she only weighs a hundred
And ten pounds,
And she is younger than my youngest sister and more beautiful:
And that is no exaggeration, and that is why I write to her:
Because I can take her in the morning, Sharon, because she loves
Me even if she won't admit it,
For all that I have written for her, but I can still remember you,
While all of the houses sleep in their darkened abutments,
Even though your perfume has disappeared into the abutments of Another eclipse I fear that I shall never taste,
While Alma's lips are a well I can reach tomorrow:
For she enriches me, and for right now I can live forever.

For Such Awhile

Mother thinks there's something wrong
Around my eyes,
She should know, its her heredity:
Too much caffeine and no sleep,
Bad poetry, rhymes-
I've been hibernating in a well of hallucination,
Now look at my shadow swing across the Wall, like it did in kindergarten,
It is the only thing that is real.
I am reading Auden, six-hundred pages
Is not easy, so intermittently I ejaculate
On a green towel, on a cloud,
And ask the simple colony of gods which sting
And eat their own, if Rimbaud wasn't Real, but one of them, and Verlaine a kind of Courting thrill, the way the sunlight might often Fall but only when a body is alone,
Reckless and on mowed grass, insects as azure
As the bottom of airplanes exploring the sky.
A glass of coffee between my legs, this little Dog wet from the thundershower which broke
The horses until they trampled over arrowheads
I stole and gave to her.
Too many of my poems use the second person
Pronoun to be anything but helplessly amateur,
But if the roses I bought for you are still in the Infant's vase upon the window sill,
They have turned brown for such awhile.

For The Attentive Audience

Quivering in an entropy of Miles;
While I really love you on The highway, Alma,
The skeletons of the donkeys smile
In their overturned avenues;
Figuring out in their rock gardens
With so
Many towers
Why it is that people have to
Be frightened-
On their birthdays
As it is with so many
Of their holidays
And the curtains curl their lush toes
For the Attentive
Audience
Who closes their eyes and smiles.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Both Of Us

Cherry blossoms and the rum I hide
Beneath the foldout couch-
I dream that Diane loves me;
And I don't sell fireworks: I hold out and Wait for her daughters to awaken on the shell-
Rock road,
Because I want to dance and flirt with them;
I want to touch my own face and feel good about it;
And the things that have died in their own sea
Are dancing above it
While I am still trying to swing, to breathe out for A long distance like a stewardesses flirting on her
Fieldtrip to Spain;
And I want my words to appear just as beautiful
As a naked terrapin;
I want them strung out and bawdy:
I want them to undress my two awful muses and stroke
Them until they come together like comrades in a game
Saying my name;
And I want to be a lost girl with dirty fingernails
And tangles of curls knotted in the tall cabbages;
And I want to see my own face and smile,
And be blinded by the sea which is always crinkling like
Uselessly wrapped presents under the naked fir trees:
I want to be just as beautiful as you are for me,
And I want to wake up tomorrow making love to you;
And our children to follow waking up, scared
And beautiful every morning before the bus to the sound
Of our love making in the house at the tops of This impossible forest so we can climb up together
And keep a look out for the both of us.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Echoes Of The Wind

Turn off the fireflies and make
The dragonflies into code words—
Now I know who you are While I lie here working—
And the subtle temperament of your temple
Stands alone in the student ghetto
Or the parking lots of your high school—
Like a single dog left out after Christmas with only but a single rose
In his teeth and to his name—
He doesn't know any better—
He has never been in love with anyone
On the other side of the canal
And yet the maidens still go as sleepily
As most river otters-
The banks of where their true knights
Have abandoned them—
And now there is no other echo for Them—their wind chimes have vanished—
And their true loves have collapsed
Knee deep into the cenotaphs of
The graveyards—
And there isn't much of anything left
Save for the echo of the wind.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Excuse Of Love

If I want to be fine,
And set up to be found out by you,
Half carousing the parking lot with a heron feather
In my beard, chewing on something sharp,
Patina-ed in the pure blindness of a mid-April
Eclipse,
And keying the choicest cars
To give you somber orgasm underneath the palm trees,
Or back at home air-conditioned on your adolescent bed,
The ceiling fan masking your toss moanings,
Then why do I keep at it like this?
Pretending we're both in high school when my beard is Grey and knots entangle my eyes,
When instead I should be tossing a football
And lifting weights and looking less slightly grim,
With more sunshine and acrobatics.
I can't even believe that it's been twenty some odd
Years since I was in Spain kissing the girl whose guitar I Stole, just like my mother's arrowhead lifted from the Dollhouse pastures and sent in a box to your address in the Cheering swamps:
Yes, why do I keep on doing this, beating my little drums for Danny, and you a girl I almost knew,
Slicking my beard like a beatnik squinting out in the brilliant Day, only halfheartedly waiting for the rain showers to roll in,
Clicking my fingers like a gift when there is no one there,
When the sorority has long gone off to the diner for Pigs in a blanket,
And the truer poets have all rolled over like newborn puppies
Down the greener pastures of their steeper embankments;
And sadly, it must be said,
You have taken his hand, and walked him into your boudoir,
Like the inside of the purest shell I shall never see,
Flecked by the perfumes of your agreement.
I stand outside and relate to nobody what the emperor
Has planned for the day,
Those things I try my best to make up for the Excuse of love.

For The Fireworks Show

I told you that I jerk off underneath my sister's
Car three or four times a day for you,
Alma, and your aunt said it was only natural
While the students were moving as busy as you please Between their two or so classes of Love making,
While Sharon was putting her hands on clay
Never realizing that she would end up book ended between
The highest and sweetest clefts in Colorado:
Or that you would take a bus through the frontera and end up
Here,
As the gods zoomed and the white man made his bread off
Your sweat and bones,
Never hardly even realizing how beautiful you are:
Immortal like a well who still feeds from the marrow of the Country of your childhood,
A place you have taken me to once or twice while all the Rest of the world was sleep,
And the rains came in staccato over the flash pan roofs
Of all the cars waiting breathlessly for the fireworks show
I wished that you would attend.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Hungry Puppets

What I wanted for this:

A song of beauty to burn its effigy over

The loneliest graveyards,

As it seems to be for awhile a poem

In a crypt

Burning hungrily,

Waiting for the authorities to arrive,

Waiting for no one

And then someone- until it will finally be

Christmas,

As the faithful dogs run around in the

Spotlights,

As the spaceships look down, perhaps

Wishing to make love

To aircraft carriers- as this is just another

Thing called up to do its duty-

Species that is going nowhere, escaping

Nothing:

Families in the elbows of televisions,

I look at you now,

While your children grow up- become

Grandmothers and

Grandfathers, whilst my vision is nowhere

Grand,

As all of the spirits escape from Mexico,

As I've been killing myself for the hungry puppets,

As the paper snowflakes fall over

My very own grandmother- who, mind you,

Is only pretending-

As never you mind.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Life Of Me

I shouldn't have made love to you,
For I shrunk,
In hiccupping seasons where the world turns
Away; and I was cuckolded for good Reasons,
Because, blandly I ate the cake before her
Birthday, and ruined the party.
All her cousins wept and made fun of me
By getting naked except for the vocabularies I Hadn't the intelligence to learn,
And they jested and held up mirrors,
Until I could not open my eyes, and the witch
Who had added the freshman fifteen to her jowls,
Went three times around the palm tree,
As if it were some ritual;
But it was not Christmas, not even Halloween,
But how I went down on her, because she Said something needed change;
And I worked until it was good and cleaned,
And left little gifts for her children around her knees,
And they opened them on Christmas day but wept
Because of how she refused to remain so
Calm and pleased, and saturnine:
She was Junoesque, that I learned, but Disinterested as a sated bee, lips plump and busted
By the rimes of early-morning honey;
And she flitted, and how I shrunk, until I could Swim away unperceived, and she lived for many Year anonymous, yet in his arms, her eyes in A book of pulpy dreams, I could not dream,
Or think to write for the life of me.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Love Of You

I've stolen things from stores that doesn't Exist but that was okay- that was even better,
Because they were made broken anyways;
And I love Johnny,
And I love your cunt, and the hills up it;
And I tell you what:
I am not a fireman- I am not even a hanged man,
But I will live forever-
Or, I just want to live forever in the little velveteen
Fires between your fairytale legs,
Sharon;
And wasn't that why you came to my classes,
Sharon? Not because I was beautiful,
But because I worked for something immortal,
And that was for the love of you.

Robert Rorabeck

For The One Who Really Does

When the night gets busied,
How the airplanes sky, stretching like the velvet
Canopies of hummingbirds across
The classroom's constellations,
Gliding while all other thoughts are forgot—
Thoughts of Armageddon and creation,
Of how we really got here,
Like toads into carports,
Like little girls into fairytales—
While this poem spins around in the Delusions that do not have to exist for anyone
Except for the one who really does.

Robert Rorabeck

For The Owls And The Spiders

All of the Mexicans looked up to the moon,
And I could not dissuade them into disbelieving in That old sphere,
While the faeries that were still alive but Left unburied in their old hijinks seemed to disbelieve forever, or just Until the luminosity became too great,
And they could only live there,
Forever the lost boys into the headlamps of their Own cars—
This was how it was seemingly forever frozen
Just for the owls and the spiders—
Or supposedly,
Until it got too far out of hand,
As their classrooms seemed to last forever,
Clapping underneath the airplanes-
Until it was over already—you see the sea had come home,
Foaming headily all over the carport and into the recesses
Without even one other thought for me

Robert Rorabeck

For Their Amoral Truancy

This is the way I feel alone,
And daydreaming-
While the butterfly stays folded up after the metamorphosis
Of its dance,
And you are still not home yet- but the airplanes
Are laying softly in their beds,
And the serpent has floated up into its tree
Where it tells so many pretty lies
To all of the girls that happen to come its way-
Giving them candied apples
As gifts for their amoral truancy.

Robert Rorabeck

For Their Makings Of Love

Piling up all of my desires before the threats
Of loneliness,
As pale as the happenstance of a song bird taken
Under the river who cherished its bright energy,
So now the beds are long and accumulative
And they never stop until they get to the deltas of the sea
Where airplanes are leaping like stones
Too high up to see what they are wishing for:
I don't think that they will ever come down, carrying
The girls away from the green arcs I made for them
While I pissed my pants in preschool;
And they developed so beautifully baking like pies in Their grottos,
Their female hands as right as instruments that fix around
The hampers of laundry, doing the wishes for the men they
Love,
While I sing with the other frog princes in their driveway,
And we make all the music we can before all of her fulfilled
Wishes travel home,
And gather her in special soft quadrants of the house especially Built for their makings of love.

Robert Rorabeck

For Their Own Gods

I have written you alone,
In Colorado- drowned out by all the tourism
Who never sees the higher summits burned
Where I have kissed you,
And tattooed you to airplanes- and lost my soul,
Slipping down,
Metamorphosed, scarred, hung up in the alders,
Watching the cold fires burning in the Armpits of careless stones placed there by Devils:
And all of this wrecked and alone: the traffic
Fibrillating, a valentines of families
Washing cyclical- a chant to the reliable gods
In their faithful architectures cartographed-
While anemones articulate, washed there
In the high mass of stone- and boys of Loneliness file out of church-
The sky thunderously apoplectic, like an orchard
Cremated before a diabolical lighthouse
In a marriage thrown to the wolves love stricken
Who are bloodily drowning for their own gods

Robert Rorabeck

For This Too

I drink to swing sets and charley horses;
In my loneliness I drink to anything, or I touch myself:
And there are familiar intersections that I cross just South of prostitutions where I have written novels
Where I left then,
And I wonder if my mother can smell the liquor on my breath,
But it is just how I have been trying to taste you,
Waiting for you to write to me:
I am scarred, but I am beautiful: I am a candle burning behind my Mother on her wedding day;
And I want to be the beautiful kiss given to you,
And I just want you to turn out for the show: you can bring Any of your men, or even your husband, while the waves catch the Light like cutlery in your kitchen when houses only cost a dollar,
And your sister was still saving herself for another man;
And this is just what we've been doing to pass the time
While you've been too busy shopping;
And I've been waiting for this too to pass.

Robert Rorabeck

For Those Original Loves

I make these games out of a cannibalistic night:
I eat myself across the grand highways and fjords where the Silliest and most beautiful of flowers
Prove to have no lovers,
And the goldfish sink: Oh, how the goldfish sink just before
Your eyes,
While your brown flesh wonders, and makes its wishes
Up to the infinities of skies,
And then moves away farther than even the most vibrant of Midways could ever move:
And you become a queen before my eyes, migrating across
The caesuras and billboards:
Where will you go now but across the woebegone fronteras
And there again to Mexico,
Where you will reminisce and pine like an endless candle
For those original loves that I will never know.

For Those Who Can Pay

I don't really want to save the world.
I just want to buy a house,
And sleep within it with my mother-mouse;
And lie in the yard I'll mow
My arms akimbo like a battered cross,
And pretend to be Clint Eastwood,
Or even better, Kate Moss:
Because this really is your world,
You'll drive in it, and you're the boss;
I just got lost here somehow- You see,
My ship hit turbulence sea,
And I was tossed, and the fleece was lost
And drowned and never worn again,
The beautifully golden shirt I used to roam
Around in, and grin in, and get laid in,
But why lament the hungry nature of each of Your seven seas, neighbor?
This world should have a fuse in its equator,
And another world shadowing it for free like a weaker Ancestor, both for our offspring and we,
Their progenitors. Because why shouldn't we Light it off, pretending to know where the best
Sales are in the corner of our universe,
Like beautiful women mixed with ash from Iceland's glaciers,
Breasts red from iron, who circulate the tectonic
Shelves of your woody playground,
And sometimes crashing up together to make
Blue-green orgies;
But its easier being a bachelor than one might Think- I let the ice clink around the rim of my Nocturnal drink, and lay back and lie and have my Way,
And let everything else buy and sell and say
How much for everything, because its all had its day;
And there are far too many chiefs who have their Beautiful harems, and used car lots, and sweet
Religious beliefs;
And I can watching the movers leaving with everything

That couldn't stay,
Because on this blue semiprecious earth everything is for sell
For those who can pay.

For Today

Sometimes she Wants to come over
And look at the Sea, but not today.
So for today,
There is no sea.

Robert Rorabeck

For Us

Writing on the downside of a hill
The puppies our father gave to us for Easter emotionless and Asleep—
The sun creeping on the other side
Like something surreptitious:
As some girl all of our words are about
Looks at her reflection far down
In a well, where
Minnows swim with the small vibrations
Of her weeping voice
Waiting for the moon to climb
And to steal from her—for us—
Another chance.

Robert Rorabeck

For Us To Believe

The children of the grapevine of vanishing airplanes seem
The be according to eh fullness of the emptiness
Of anywhere—
While we still try to pull out, the vanishing purple
And blue fireworks who seemed To have fallen everywhere—
While Mars lies unexplored, like a virginal marionette,
Until the summer time comes
All unannounced over the knights,
And they have to take their very same places over
The fields of happenstance, until there happens to be A river and new beautiful visions of the Beautiful fevers of blue women dancing—and
They all happened right here in the shallows of the creeks
Of our echoes- while the same séances broke out to No one under the throats of the wolves of
The undo crutches of the awakening mothers—
Then, on Sunday, another residue to the playgrounds,
And to the off-hand pits of anywhere while they were Pretending to believe in themselves,
Another echo to the star dust—while another Family was found out in the disbelieve of the Stars—it didn't happen to be beautiful,
But there wasn't any more room for us,
So we both held our breath while we pretended
To believe what was happening was for the best
For the both of us, while the stars skipped
Across the tenements, and the other planets
Grew to their best for us to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

For Us To Hear

When I go to China
I don't know so many poems: foreigner,
My tongue is cut out
But I find a wife who speaks to me in Fifteen dollar hotels as we Try to find a child in Shanghai—over the land owned by the Government—they are supposed to be
Her own people:
She loses her virginity:
Afterwards, she makes me wear sandals
To go out and find the means
To collect all of the golden eggs.
And above the Tenements: there are the heavens that the Dragons come down
From:
She calls me a lucky man,
As we shiver like strings on instruments
In the cold from this world
I have entered buried underneath the earth:
All of the riches of
The ancestors,
Ghosts that busy us inside cabs—
As we pass through the overpasses of beaming
Shells,
Making love in their absences,
Pretending to listen to the architectures of Waves
Building and destroying deliberately too far Away for us to hear.

For Want Of Liquor

The night just spindles for want of liquor,
Like a dream of death one may never become aware
From, the mortal amnesias from a brainstem eaten
Into by encephalitis, like a stemmed vine from which The heliotrope orbs have fallen:
And I have never been in love, and the fire engine
Rolls by silently, because there is no fire;
But the traffic is busy and making avenues which lead
To so many homes, and in each of those dinner and Love-making, and wayward children who pray in Sky blue-pajamas, which are damp from piss in the morning
Before school, and make puddles in their little primary
Colored plastic seats in third grade, or get in fights
In after school daycare playing dodge ball,
When even then the limpid shells of cicadas cling to the Bark of mottled cypress, not unlike the smell unfaithful
House wives leave for years in their old homes, their cuckolded
Husbands long since gone mad, and ended the pitiful
Spite which clings inside their jaws and horn-rimmed
Eye sockets like the pungent resin in an intolerable tree,
So that they protest by self-immolation out in the finely
Mowed yards of suburbia, out beneath the near perfect sun,
Even as the traffic goes by slow and eddying, even as the kids
Laugh like bullfrogs in the yards, and the mail comes, and the Afternoon currents flow like warm drapes across the neighborhood,
The flames rippling like cellophane pennants,
Until there is nothing left but an imperfect spot of char,
And maybe one picture from a pocketbook, and when
The skaters come by with their cocky Mohawks, and crooning
For the awareness of the spotlight of their ilk, they are disappointed, Mistaking the human stain for a place where fireworks were Shot off when they were not around to see.

Robert Rorabeck

For What Was Happening Here

Snow-cone underneath the slush of the mountain:
Whatever will they paint you with the colors of My tears—
And will you remember me tomorrow in your ballrooms
Beneath the lactates of the stalactites
Drooling their jaws down from all of the pitiful cities
Of the blind men while I get drunk
And sit on my corner in the city block and scribble
By poems like the outlines of the graveyards of Chalk:
And as soon as my very new wife gets here—the first:
The very first place I want to visit is Bellefontaine
Cemetery in northern Saint Louis
Because this is where I almost got my doctorate
There:
And the other delusions of mortal man sweltering:
But that is also where Sara Teasdale lies buried and Un accosted—and maybe we will move underneath her Memory forever and un accosted—and maybe you
Do not remember the moonlight under which She remains a luminous wave caught into the nets of The bivouac without fear— and the poet only remembering
Her as the muse underneath the transgressions of
The peacock that were already on fire—until it spilled over
And over: barrels of liquor and rum on fire
Into a labyrinth of preschool that all of my peers tended to Prescribe as the only rational explanation for what Was happening here.....

Robert Rorabeck

For Who Knows How Many Hours

Fireworks in the desert- fireworks in the sky-
Like little girls who take your money-
Only to show off, and then only to die:
And I want to go away to make money for my mother and Father,
To ferris wheel above the traffickings of the earth,
Holding my breaths of wishes,
While the clothes dry, and the cats make love on the Fences: and in whatever fields that are left,
They are playing baseball,
And I perform for my muse- brown eyed and brown
Bodies, fearful of mountains,
She faithfully returns to her family every night,
The way a freshman returns to her favorite water fountain Between classes, while the truants leap hot footed over the Canals- and she never sees them,
Or the playgrounds that they have molested: she simply Enfolds back into the lectures
That envelop a brown stage beside the cafeteria;
As outside,
A bit of green rain cloud follows a lost trail over
A broken down school buses, where a corpulent tortoise
Has been busy making love to a woebegone orchid
For who knows how many hours.

Robert Rorabeck

For You I Hoped To Have Found

What of this silence, repeating, like days,
And getting on the bus and going to school,
Of getting punched in the lip
By bloated-gut bullies, and skipping class in the Rain to bundle up under the school busses in Bruised weeping-
While even then Diana was turning around in her
Part of South America,
More beautiful than anything I have yet to See on television;
Exotic flowers like the ones they keep trimmed
And sexy in the amusement parks of Central Florida:
What is she doing but flirting with every man who Comes in carousing under the tent,
Feeding them more for the eyes than with the teeth:
Diana, Diana- it is her, well-bosomed;
I want to buy entire yards for her, while that careless
Jove is away:
I want my house to finally be picked out by her.
I want to meet her daughter, and for her to meet my hounds,
To let them lick and sniff her together with me:
Her stems like crutches against which the entire earth
Weeps- Diana, only I can appreciate you fully picked out
OF all these used car salesmen: Diana, you are making
Your rounds, your native bow propped up against your breast,
And I have gone to see a movie with my favorite teacher,
And I fell asleep and would have dreamed of you,
Except that you didn't come to me, and so now I must go Searching, putting rum against my lips, so that my senses might Spindle out like the waves in a hypothetical shift,
And I can shake off the burning senses of the empirical towns;
I can skip school so many years ago,
Not realizing until now that it was for you I hoped to have Found.

For You To Remember

The night looked really pretty as it happened unto you:
And you looked really pretty eating all that was brought to you;
And we went up to Orlando and watched the surplus
Timbuktu:
They were brandishing their swords that the waves had brought for
You;
And they galloped through every theatre that was an enclosed space,
And the put on their mock battles and their mock loves for you;
So at night when they stole you away from me,
They made mock love to you, and so inside you their mock gardens grew,
While I wept and rubbed my star-scarred eyes on the roller coasters
All alone:
I wept and tried to remember if their caracoles could take me home;
And through the haloes of a terrible jubilee I watched him carry you
On his back and across the sea;
And I cried to my own mother for you, but she was all dried up for me;
And I could not metamorphoses,
So I stuck and burned like a match for you until there was nothing left
For you to remember me.

For Your Most Beautiful And Next In Line

The moons winnows; oh my god I've seen it done
And now I have to spit or I should choke;
Sharon, why do you write to me of these things:
Sharon, I am not beautiful:
Sharon, I am all alone, and the traffic proceeds; they are the Perfectly placed butterflies,
And I have plenty of the apple juice inside of me:
Sharon, your first daughter is named Sabine:
When shall you have your second daughter: your womb is burning;
It is yearning like the spitoon of a kiln all afire;
You know that it is, and I am hardly enough beautiful for you:
Sharon... Sharon, what are you are doing:
You are hardly patriotic, but Sharon who are you; while I have so many Fireworks to panhandle, what I am doing for you:
You don't give a damn about our capitol, so by our gods what am I doing;
Sharon, I just want to swim in your Shadow:
And, Sharon, I am so sick for you; I am a cricket mouthing off for
Disney World,
And, Sharon, it is alright to be mean; but, Sharon, otherwise I love you,
And otherwise I drive my truck around for you, but the beautiful men
Have already built their irredeemable castles so far up for you,
And what am I doing otherwise, but riding bareback and scarred
While the folk artists sing for you and paint your glowing windows,
And you nurse the first of your hot born butterflies, clicking your tongue
Your bosoms jubilant and awaiting for your most beautiful and Next in line.

Robert Rorabeck

For Your Soul

I ask you about your family all of the time
A-,
Because I have none of my own, and because that I would die for yours:
I never met anyone as beautiful as you are throughout all
Of my high school:
I have spent all of my time singing to lesser girls,
And today you gave me a better present than all of the angels,
Because I got to see all of the clothes you wear:
I got to taste you like a water fountain of butterflies:
Your skin so brown and beautiful:
There has never been another woman like you, A-, and there Never will be:
After we made love you wanted to sleep, and then you wanted
Jalapenos on our pizza for lunch, but your bad man rang,
And you had to go home:
You gave me so much today that you had before promised me
That I could never have,
But now I want your name, and all of the time for your amusement:
A-,
I have this house: it is yours: I want to live with you forever:
I want our two bodies to be mutual shores;
I want my everlasting songs to be about you, A-, while all of the Pinpricks of the night burn,
I want to love your children, and I want to learn how to Be a better man for you,
A-, because it is for your amber soul that my soul burns:
It is for your soul, Alma, that my soul will always, always,
Burn....

Robert Rorabeck

For Your Time

Thank you for your time, I said to the mountains and to the shore.

They said, don't bother to write to us no more.

Robert Rorabeck

Forbearance Of Her Memory

Getting up is getting easier now that I know
Who I am:
A poet of some possibility, as the sun shies through
The leafy arcade,
A man of no account, a drifter of the hills:
I know myself better than most: I lie, I cheat,
I steal, but I am a good man, as the whippoorwill
Trills around the freshly painted roof, like a red festival
Above where no one lives:
And there are better men than me, those who pronounce
Themselves to a room, those who have something to say
With the verbosity of so many planets,
But when they are done proclaiming their accolades,
There is first echoes and then only silence, and that is Where I stand out, a better silhouette, someone Who lives in instances of lucid memory, loving the reflections
A wishing well gives in the brightest noontime,
With the bodies walking above it rippling, the dislocated
Fish in the experiment of my eyes: the women
I dream about swimming above me,
Not stopping to throw in their loose change;
They are better without me, and gone to the loud men,
They leave me alone now breathing in the shallow water
As clear as a single note plucked on a harp upon the breast
Of a powdery virgin in the flaxen glade of her woods:
She sings to me throughout my days, as the meadows dance,
And it is no longer painful to listen to her voice,
For I have wanted her for so long, and now I remember her
Sleeping on the school bus, just a little tramp grown up
Near the waterwheels which drooled like silk my ancestors
Spun from wooden thoraxes, the juvenile cataracts rushing like Kittens; My grandfather saw her eyes once in a dream he Gave to me, and now I awake gladdened, assured that my Love once looked deep into the eyes of my forbearance,
Before dancing away like the long trail of a wedding gown,
Like the effluvious ribbons of a stream which has gone
So far, and has yet so far to go.

Forbearing

Scents of her hair
Searching out the windowsill;
Dried by the pollinated breeze,
She stares down the road
Surveying for lovers of her will:
Young men whose job it is
To go from door to door
Selling tuning forks
They absentmindedly use to Pick their teeth.
The further the day proceeds
The older the houses become
Until they are kicking up dust
In their ancestors' neighborhood—
You can never say what was,
Certainly,
Except for the marble truth
Carved in the tombs' resting boards
Robed in waxy ivy
And folded spindles of
A spider's home.
Pulling back the hiding ways,
You smell her like a crisp
Green apple cut to its core,
Mortally explored and fed upon
As she lies sleeping there,
Your grandmother
Or someone who might have Known her....

Robert Rorabeck

Forecasting The Storms

Animals love it when the grasses grow,
Unattended what is supposed to be taken care by men,
Where serpents swim so patterned along the Uncomplicated prestidigitations of precious darlings;
As men love it when there is liquor or a new Interesting woman in the house; but what am I doing,
When I've cried myself to sleep again in embittered
Cities coming down: coffins are in the heart of things,
Mausoleums for great generals or more successful sisters,
But I don't think I've failed again, but thrown a little salt
Into the open wounds like in the science fictions where
The ants are tremendous and we can take it out to the parking Lot- Grandmothers are thieves open bloused and Waiting in the spliced shade of the palmettos for some Mysterious stranger; and I am a wreck without my liquor
With no need for more tattoos because of the proliferation of Some more scars, unpublished, having no care for the Professors and their leafy tenements: this blood is only Condiments- the arrows are glued felt; the woman who is A harlot only an unoffending Christian dressed herself that Way for the evening's stage: These snowflakes are paper,
Her lover someone she saw on television; and alligators can Cry. In fact they are doing it now all up and down the empty
Swing sets of my neighborhood, dressed in the moon's ridiculous
Penumbra waiting for the children to come out and forecast the storms.

Robert Rorabeck

Forested In Daycares

Forested in daycares, we have built things that Will never grow up:
They just diminish and are swallowed up by when it rains:
They are not even graveyards,
And the pillows that we go home to when our parents pick
Us up after work only know a little of our tears-
For the girls that we have made love to as good as naked underneath
The skies
Do not have any well known names- they are just as wild
As the wishes that get away with the flames of an out of control
Birthday:
They are like the stewardesses who have mutinies on out of Control commercial airliners;
And this just spills over and becomes the debased wishing wells
For the dashing smiles of crocodiles and vampires,
Or any of the other age old legends who never even had a thought of Love that would have ever made them wish to disappear.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever

Oh to be short of life,
But heady and well drunken,
Like a bee that has no reason to fly with its
Two days left;
It has seen all of the sweetened wardresses it has needed
To see, and has slept with all of them,
So that it carries all of her names on its leg like tattoos,
Like battle tacks, like stars
Won in elementary:
Now belly as fat as to be tamed, it sleeps in the overweight
Penumbra of something that has been just as beautiful
For it is as it would be for any other
Fly-by-night creature of man:
For in the morning her lashes curl and drink on the body of A man I have never seen;
And they will die together again, sharing each others' bodies
For the life of a bumblebee, which makes good enough out of Forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Above Her Burning Dish

So many professions
Hang on the dying Christmas tree: So many lovers
Forgetting to recall the soft scents of echoes;
And the ever present day is in charge,
Role calling, keeping count. The waves are anxious,
Stuttering cavalry;
But I still remember kindergarten, what Chelsea did
To me;
And I am no one, no one but someone still brings me
My lunch.
I saw Diana today and my eyes still work good:
It was beautiful.
The cars came, the cars. They did not become.
No one cares if I am passed out in the aloe. The rebar
Has rusted, and what about my dogs? When are they Coming,
So I can climb mountains and hear the pulse of my wrist
Rush like the tide over the rocks
Where the sun is like a pulsing skeleton- Where the sun
Is wimbled fish,
Leaping forever above her burning dish.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Across The Sea

Child, you are lost and you don't
Wish for me to find you—climbing up through the Strange spinsters of the night—
Looking for apples in the arboreal bosom—
The stars chickenpox but dancing
Beautifully—your memories on a bus to school,
The alligators in the canal,
And your parents in bed together while the moonlight
Is dancing in the pool like a toy sea—
I left fireworks in a bag underneath the night blooming
Jasmine
That you will never find—
And you know, there are so many airplanes climbing
In the sky and leaping forever across the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Faithful

I've been Alma's champion:

I've been Alma's slave:

And I'll be Alma's Alma's

Anything:

I'll sleep my forever sleep besides Alma's

Forever grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Far Away

There are so many words that hardly give Good excuses;
Even Rudyard Kipling cant write a good poem,
And I've drunken tonight-
And I have to pee
In my bunk in the RV,
While the old teachers study the night,
While the fruit waits restless upon the shoe polished
Tables,
And I hate my father, but yet I have saved so much money,
And I think of the same old things,
The two muses of my disease,
One venal and one sick, and I curse them and Whatever they are doing tonight,
And the pictures they take of their beautiful visages
Like a garden well content and fluttering in the High basins,
And even now I can hear the traffic, and I want to live Forever like a cheap kite with delusions that he is An angel,
Or whatever he is: I don't even have a house,
And I've never seen the sea, but I could move her
And shimmy up next to the graveyards and Their sweet pornographies;
And drink rum under the fake penumbras that never Charge you extra,
And your name is S-, or E-,
But whoever you are tonight, you are carefully insouciant
In your sweet titted playgrounds and you are Forever far away from me.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Hers

The television started with the scars of life;
They are always echoing, and my bed is full of Dirt, this one and that one two.
From the slopes of the mountain's angelic
Neckline, she makes fun of my songs, because They were before her age; but how else
Am I supposed to sing to her; and when the Roads are closed when the snow comes,
How will she ever get my fresh fruit and bouquets-
But the tourists will come out of their woodwork
Traveling in their caravans, their families fully Formed. Will she sing to them of me- How I Used to chase some Rimbaudian god up her
Skirts- How I didn't mind which end I started or Finished up at, but would jog her neighborhood my Knees keeping time on the black pitch, she guiding Me nonsensically many houses over,
Past the lions and the coral snakes, probably off
Drooling on her vanished bed, dreaming of less Esoteric boys- Until I fell down in
The dunes and clasped them in a bosom which spilled
The ant lions from their dens, unearthed the grinning
Cenotaphs of conquistadors; but what she will do,
Is turn her doors open and let them in, trying to survive
Another winter where the beauty is just as harsh as Her own, unapologetic, almost whimsical in its fury-
She will never think of me more than a needless Curiosity she couldn't bet her livelihood on-
Swirling her finger in a glass, she will upset its bouquet
Like starting evil flowers to burn- she will make Everything she owns sing for her, until the storm is Over. Closing her eyes, she will rest with the one remaining;
He has won, and now is hers forever.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever Too Afraid

I'll have to wait until yesterday and listen:
The crickets in the four corners of the yard,
The Indians underneath the easements of Grounds:
The alligators listening toothy-eyed:
And the bandy legged men: the grand daddy
Long legged men
Who cross like firemen's ladders into the orchards-
Picking and wondering what they have here:
Halos over the heads of Mexicans-
Asleep and enjoying themselves- while I watch
For them from my window of the house
That I suppose I own,
After she has driven home again across the Train tracks like the prizes of a goldfish in a bowl
Hypnotizing the feral cats that are forever too
Afraid to come inside.

Robert Rorabeck

Forever, Forever Need

Oh my god what a mess:
That the city shouldn't sleep, but goes around
Its rounds,
The pretty girls of their cars giving you
The very poignant ups and downs:
With their eyes, their eyes like Ganymede,
Like f^cking stars:
Girls that you'd like to remember, who are Impossible to forget,
Girls who are always like after a rain shower
In a bamboo forest,
Wet and wet and wet.
They slip through the city in a sorority of pretty
Hash,
And their thighs are always ready to bash,
And bash- and bash.
Their thighs are always ready. They are like baseball
Bats
Even at seven in the morning, which is the time that
It is now,
And they sing to their young daughters all
Transitory in sleep,
Of how to defeat the cowboys, and of how it is that They should never weep,
While some of up them hold my heart in their pretty
Clawed hands,
And sip of it like homeless wine as they gossip in Their chicken coops:
They sip of it and straddle the spaces through which
They proceed:
They sip of its beating, beating,
And they sip of its forever, forever need.

Robert Rorabeck

Forgetfulness

Now that forgetfulness has settled
His spindly fingers on your shoulders,
Like cobwebs crossed with spider bones,
I am no one, I am no one,
And even if you furrow your brow
And press your tongue to the roof
Of your mouth, like a mollusk
Stuck to its opal shell, Showing
The world that your body is Trying hard to figure out if I ever
Ran against you like a river in bed,
And saw by candlelight all the Secret tricks of your unclothed skin,
Your body questions my existence;
And then you see him, the sinewy oarsmen,
Who rows you away, far away
Down from my broken vase rivers,
Into the calm of his suwanee lakes where
You body disrobes entirely of my sway,
And forgetfulness rises up before your eyes
Like a great white heron lancing your Memory away and so you say
I am no one,
I am no one.

Robert Rorabeck

Forget-Me-Nots

Obeying the fallow months,
They bought the shortest headstone in the catalogue,
And when that was set they took
The blue peacock feathers of the dead flamenco dancer
To the forget-me-not's dump
Where the very squat and very onyx man
In the yellow construction helmet,
Unaccustomed to such fineries had them placed
At the very top of the hill
In a fluttering row beside the diamond navel
Of the dead belly dancer,
Where their blue faded into brilliant gray in the Circling shadows of the vultures and gulls,
And until he retired, the very squat and very onyx man
Could look up past the bulldozed hillocks
And see the hem of feathers shiver, the diamond sparkle,
Until his shift was over and he went home to watch
His Puerto Rican wife's ass as she cooked him dinner.

Robert Rorabeck

Forgiveness

Guardians of gypsum satellites
Fight against the destroyer of hopes
The strange watchers in the night
Like banks of candles lit up
For Catholic mass

Each one holds a secret priest
Burning for your confession,
As she grips you about the waist,
A savior from the murdered sea,
Begging your forgiveness....

Robert Rorabeck

Forgotten

I've begun to trust the truth of blindness
In the colorless recesses where life does not dwell
Where hungry words drip and gather
In the needing echoes that pool in her eyes
The shapeless things that blink at me in the Darkness of my weeping bedroom,
Early coffins from behind the curtain where Skeletons bloom only to sink again without protest
The murdered ancestors of when we Were teenagers, the yet formed glass glowing
Like a wound before an audience facing away
To where an unrecognizable man fades like a Memory cast out in the rain, a flawed life
Cast back into the chaos of God's forge, seen
Just briefly by the woman who bore it and Wept beneath the petrified spheres until forgotten.

Robert Rorabeck

Forgotten Cradle

You told me you didn't want me writing you anymore
Poems,
But you told Charley, my third uncle during lunch,
That I was a poet, and you seemed proud;
And you've accepted my roses so many times now:
And you wear my ring now, Alma:
And you are my bright cloud, like a glorious forest fire of Dreams
Tumbling upward through the most invisible of dreams:
And I can see you laying large across the land:
I can almost perceive your entire penumbra, like a collage of Feral green butterflies and trampolines, like grasshoppers
Feeding on the exfoliations of the sea:
I saw you waiting in line today Alma, without your children,
Your husband waiting in the bright shadows
Like a hungry carnivore of grandmothers- mean and really fit:
I was frightened,
But I practiced my own witchcraft and put your eyelash into
The eyelash of Picasso's lady my old teacher gave me;
And now it is almost always done:
I may have to go off and sell fireworks: I may disappear into the Desert and the mirages of caves folded away with the Gunfighters and the Indians in the sizzling red pan
That we stole from you great great grandfathers; but Now it is hardly enough even for the most Clever of spies:
I have prayed to the Virgin of Guadalupe so many times,
And now I will have you,
Alma, because I have seen this playground in the sky, the places
Of joy caracoling your body that even you can't remember
The scents and smells of your childhood
Lost under the jaded bellies of the flat bottomed rattlesnakes
In the dry lands and basins
That once served as your forgotten cradle.

Fornication In Brevity

I will go then like a doll in a park into the sea
And waiting for you,
Drown or burn in that enshrouded estuary with memories
Of the cars that passed by us as we kissed
And your children waited at home
For you—
And why don't you come back to me, for the flea markets
Remind everything of you—
This entire city is filling up with people of your color,
Though you have moved away with your husband
Into the horse country in between the orchards—
With their ladders seemingly as tall as Cathedrals—
Where, imagining, fireworks kissing, fornicate in Brevity—as you are passed along—reminded of your mother:
Youth leaving you behind—
Forgetting everything you played with, and I a lonely
Part of that back in the footfalls of a high school you Never cared about—
Until the right man comes along and eventually Sweeps you off your feet.

Robert Rorabeck

Forts Of Early Morning

Your children were laughing and snaking towards reason—
Like bottle rockets snaking their way to the other side of the canal
To lie in languishing epitaphs
While I remembered my professors at the university had pictures
With themselves and John F. Kennedy:
And now I die at your doorsteps—and you don't even have to Come out to listen—It is not a gentle art that I am doing,
Getting drunk and languishing into the sleepy business that lies
South of Disney World
Our out in the early morning baseball diamonds—
This is the aesthetic truth that is struggling to be truthful enough
To procure a wife—
Line out with them in the forts of early morning—
Very soon there will be a battle where no one will survive—
But until then, I just want to buy her flowers and sing and sing
And sing to her....

Robert Rorabeck

Forty Pound King Fish

I hooked a forty pound kingfish-
I fowled him on my line,
But my house still has termites and Alma:
Sweet
Alma still pretends that she is not mine.

Robert Rorabeck

Four Feathers

Flamboyant childhood, I have lost you in a swamp,
And the four boys down on their cerulean lane making love
Too early to see when I come around at midnight
In a plastic boat, but where are they?

Spread across the country with nothing on their minds,
Not even drooling of devilish nostalgias of high school-
Not a single one of them with my scars, my dark future,
The only fire escape is kept in a drawer with a cold mouth
To kiss-

And another poem to keep me trucking up to Another sun- Another night with the dogs, and a roof
But no one at home: no firm legs to cross, to drink with me
Beneath the blood-banks of stars, to light off fireworks and Mark the padding of wolves,

There is only this- the sad unction coalesced from Blessed fingers, but not another soul to divide with me, to Settle down with near the remains where the river flows.
Not another stanza like a wooden vase carved into a crutch,
To carry me down the hallway where I still smell her,
And where those boys go yet laughing.

Robert Rorabeck

Four Legged Shakespeare

Inside Shakespeares:

One, two, three:

My dogs are barking sonnets

As they mark their territory:

When the horses stumble,

When the snowflakes fall,

My dogs just sniff the earth,

And howl:

They can smell your

Absence on my crotch,

And sympathize

With my hungry tooth,

About the hypothesis of children

They pat a watch,

As through the forest

They slink and sleuth:

Their noses know the

Penumbra of the moon,

And when the weather is

Turning gray,

They come clawing on

My windowpane:

I let them in,

We sleep all day and

Sprawled in the blankets

Sniffing dreams of

You and the things we'd say:

Happy days of long walks

In the countryside,

Friends well met and forests green,

We go together as a pack,

Tongues lolling to the side,

And you would be our sonnet's queen.

Robert Rorabeck

Frank O'Hara's Endless Poem

Sabotage me with scars and parking lots,
And take me outside the dirty city and down to
The dirty sea;
And why do my farts smell like my dreams for
You,
And things I have enjoyed but have not really Partaken of;
And Frank O'Hara for the first time at 31;
I watch him talking on the phone and for some reason
Gives me a hard-on, but probably just the liquor-
Still in my parents' basement and I don't even want
To think of my batting average,
Even though I am very rich but homeless,
And the days go over, but they don't really end,
Each sun in the same portfolio abandoned by the Artist on the move,
Territorially sniffing out the next wound, bandaged
At both ends, the flowers in the graveyard whispering
Of the girls he loves,
Whose fingers are all married under the Earth,
All given over to tidy, busy homes; and his poem just Goes on unlistened to, untidied up, but it never ends.

Robert Rorabeck

Freddy Mercury

The work is really about the work, they sing:
The young punks with Mohawks and hair-lips.
Tree frogs jeweled in heliotrope, they sing. The Epitaphs they give these graveyards in mass, our song,
Sylvia who by good scars comes, and enters Anne,
What ridiculous, what five-pointed song of light:
I call her Maggie Pie Crust by my five-fingered star-fist:
And now, boys, smoke and light and cigarettes, and tits!
Now we have a band, and we play for the werewolf,
Staunched and emboldened, we howl in the shopping malls:
Our base invades tennis courts; We are all the monsters.
Girls in short skirts take cover, daddies run to their mothers.
We are overspilling into the lap of luxury, our dyes ink their Pools: We swim like submarines, we drool like five-year Olds at play. We jettison. Subtracting such joy that the Cadillac brings, Girls, girls, we awaken the chickens from the hypnosis of Chalk, and enlighten like spry willow sprigs jaunting along
The riverbanks of witchcraft:
We jump up, jump up, jump up: Up until mommy and daddy are Home and idling out-front in their car,
Up, until the newscast is over and the make-up unmasked, and Indeed the rain-clouds in for unprompted mass:
And, I love you, and her, and her too: Now strum,
Since this is the beginning of the new weekend sum: Up, until The bell rings for school, and make eyes down the hallway as we Are all hurrying in; for the band is calling us from the courtyard
Bricked in red; they have fireworks and fingers which fall on the Strings like water-spiders in autumn; and this is the end of the school-
Year, and the beginning of our lives; and no one will remember us
Here. Our classmates will forget us all. Now sing, strange-girls sing,
And light the fireworks, Sylvia; and play the drums, Anne,
And the other girl, the one I can't remember, take a hold of this Hand: Jump up until the light strikes us dead, and then lay low
With me, but still sing, and sing; and now come to bed.

Free Falling

When last I saw her, her eyes were exhausted acrobats
Who fell to my shoulder and then plummeted away.
Like off the cliff, they went.
She did not scream. She went quietly and free-
I think she meant the fall, for her body looked as if it'd been practicing - I think she'd had enough.
As she went, she went down and her head turned away
Toward the distant drop- I mean, she did not look back.
She was like that- She was real gone! And all I could do was See her go, falling forever through the sea that way.
She created my new exhaustion as the city's lights died
Where the old cars circled me as if for an execution.-
They were so hungry and the lights were out so
No one could see.
The pallid streets roamed my flesh beyond which my Legs walked to the bone and walked on, because I was Broken. I could not stop walking. I had a few drinks,
But they did not get rid of her salt or her sting, and she was That photo in my eyes made by the sun. The realness of the Image in bed with another man and free, free, free-
Like the type of thing you see after staring at the sun too long,
Something that doesn't go away. She's still there in another Bedroom across the world.
Free falling.

Freewill Of A Trance

Each following word is like the freewill of a trance:

I can give roses, roses, roses,
And sun, and sea, and sun, and sea,
For I have spent most evenings laying on your floor
And watching you dance around the ceiling,
The fan spinning you like a marble in a pool;
But your lips, those open wounds, they belong to Him who waters you,
And on your birthday you let all of yourself be taken
Into his hands, for him to say, how beautiful,
How beautiful, how beautiful, not believing

I could do the same: You have made wishes upon
His body, your body swollen with tears,

Each following word is like the free will of a trance:

I can give you roses, roses, roses,
But they have been stolen from beneath your sill,
Just as these words I have pulled up from beneath my tongue,
Stolen from a heart how pitiful: Won't you turn now
And take them, and put them in a glass, and say thank you,
Before falling back into him like the freewill of a trance.

Freezing Water The Blue Spruce Cried

Standing in a blue abscess, wounded around
The eyes:
The nocturnal pugilists countingimps,
And the gates awash with freezing water
The blue spruce cried-
And other planes coaxing down: inside their Golden necks, their stewardesses all
Asleep-
The weather about them a blanket that pulls
At them softly,
The sea, a mother waiting in the deeps-
While each pine tree rises just for them,
Nocturnal spectators in the senses of the hills:
And they go over them, nodding in
Sorority,
As the hillsides sigh, damply drunken,
And holding up to them bouquets.

Robert Rorabeck

Friday

Friday, the sky is falling, the perfect mailman
Over those hills, whistling into another country:
And it is already darkness where she lives,
And in my unstructured poetry where she also lives,
But now she is bothersome because it is Friday night,
And the college is always open-
Students dropout like overripe grapes even with The hands of busy sun washed immigrants working over
Them, trying to save them in gunnysacks of penitence-
But already, Friday is falling, and the sun is stepping Away behind the studious hills, and the light is cascading
Like little children laughing and throwing up a lucid
Sheet to let it fall on their unwrinkled faces, like they Will never do again once they pack their lunch tin and Step foot on the school bus;
And where I see her, she is hemmed with cypress and With folly when once I saw her fading as I ran across the Drainage to skip out of high school math, to sit and fart
And light off pop rockets over the slow green mobiles of The alligator's teal and ribboned amphitheatres; There where
The middle-class houses stretched like high mortgage affluence,
Where the Jews and the unwashed goyem finally gathered together
Free of pogroms and ghettos: The clean suited families with The color televisions and Ataris hooked up in the screened in Swimming pools, and young daughters helplessly topless in
The glow, and slow drunks, and candy apple adulteries,
And numb divorces, and SUVs, and over all of that my life
Cut in half fifteen years ago there was another Friday going Down, whistling his song over the Gulf of Mexico, and she Sat somewhere else just as far away, thinking thoughts I couldn't Know, loving who I couldn't say.

Fried Chicken

Pistils blooming like pop-guns, like
Party favors—
The sky explodes over the horses: it riles
And blooms in cartels of witches.
What a show for the airplanes as well as
The otters,
And myself—skipping school, lying on
My back in the hollow canoe,
Floating through the changing rooms of
The canal—
The housewives do not see me,
Lying on their backs and watching the Young Mexicans picking in the orchards—
The pilots do not see me, nor
The juvenile titans, for they now are Watching all of the stewardesses who are Dreaming of playing baseball games back in High school, until it is finally time
For all of them to go back indoors
To watch television and eat fried chicken.

Robert Rorabeck

Fried Chicken, Long Life, And Valentines

Floating for a weekend- a heart on anesthesia,
And fingers numbed
To the identity of the theft of their owner's
Heart:
Strange relationships ignited by gasoline
And trips to the Supermarket- and daylight proceeds over
The dreary carnival
Where men have the shadows of monsters
Tattooed to the busy thefts
Of time-
And I drive around in my car watch airplanes
Leaving through the sadness:
They roar like lions leaping over
Monuments,
And they go away over the museums
As I spend my money unwisely wanting a companion
To come from the waves
From the direction the angels have fled:
To emerge from the reefs of stolen bicycles and
To touch my scars
And to carry with her fried chicken, long life,
And valentines- and to give me all of these things
Without asking for any reward.

Friend And Master

If you are no longer interested in the crude sky
I've painted for you along my Hapless sidewalks right where one story book city
Ends into another,
Here is a knife of rain and a muted song;
Here is the quality and fineness of love you'll have
With him,
I can guarantee you, if you end it and make
A canal to dredge my throat, clearly separating
The two irreconcilable countries of reason and love:
This is the hapless thing I want,
To be anonymous feet up and bloated and enjoying
The sun,
Sniffed at by a hungry dog who is getting curious ideas
When once before
He would have considered me friend and master.

Robert Rorabeck

Friendly Mountains

I smell like the liquor of an insouciant troubadour;
And this is the way I've been going out,
Gummy eyed, aroused, smiling like some terribly
Amateur amphibian,
Wanting to breath forever as I was going down on Her, scuba-diving through the pylons and to her
Rich corals;
And now it is so cold outside as to hobble horses,
And the dumps are all frozen,
The cormorants and egrets of gray herons are shaking in Their boots;
And Nichole or someone is grabbing their other's body
Tightly,
And closing their eyes to imagine the passions of stock
Cars;
And Erin is in her knickerbockers caves, flashing shadows
For the sun,
Making believe that her world is real and always for the best,
While the rest of the Florida is dressed up in another
Color of green,
Even its Pegasus's are green and plural and they can take you
All the way up over the cover girls all tootsie across the Nose cones of fat gutted airplanes;
And I live in a little house that is always struggling to float
Upwards like balloons through dreams.
Wanting to see you house and swim to it like the lucky fish
In its golden stream,
And while away there making love, two houses making love
In a honeymoon of forbidden neighborhoods beneath your Friendly mountains.

Frisbee With Lindsay

I'll get drunk and try to emulate the Beats,
Kerouac wasn't very good at it, but he's still neat.

Then I saw the Congo creeping through the black,
Cutting through the forest with a golden track.

When my dog and I want to go old school,
I'll throw a stick. Otherwise, we play Frisbee.

(And if you didn't know, the middle stanza Is Vachel Lindsay.)

Frog Princes

Sun of an obnoxious quarry as we seem
To be laughing—
Open throated frog princes all of the way
Up to the chandeliers—
While my mother waits in some awful
Mockery of a Pieta—
And the lamps bloom in the gold dusts of
The mines—
Another song mimics the song bird's,
As the traffic becomes utterly confused—
Losing itself into the darkness—
The mailman apexes, but he is no excuse
To me—
Lamp posts lining the streets of my adolescents,
As wicked men travel home after
The fireworks' pageantry—
Licking their stolen wives' bodies of
An adulterous
Apiary.

Robert Rorabeck

From A Fountain Birthed Of Mexico

The calendars are fraudulent over my body-
They say what time of the year it is,
As if playing a game of cards- as the brown body of My muse, crossed over the thresholds again
To be with her young children- and her husband,
In the little house-
Alley cats have eaten the rabbits that once ate her Mother's mango tree,
And there are helicopters underneath the stars-
Cars pass before her threshold like pilgrims on An easy journey- but she doesn't have to think of Any of this- and as she turns into him,
Brown bodies coalescing from a fountain birthed
Of Mexico,
With the lights doused around her children,
And fake programs on the television, she doesn't
Have to think of me.

Robert Rorabeck

From A Resilient Bird

Combining the alchemy of paddleboats across the Torpil acrobatics of the a living room's holiday, waiting for All the yawning mouths of lions
And water moccasins to close, for the stolen bicycles of Kidnapped children to be revealed,
And a perfectly beautiful epiphany to be blundered upon Somewhere out in the make believe moving around in School buses,
Or through the forbidden transoms of the graveyards of some Midwestern university, where the strange girls finally become Perfectly, and unspeakably beautiful,
And the night learns of my laughable prayers for her,
Burning in its attempts at homeless unison,
Like little feathers plucked from a resilient bird who will not Quit singing.

Robert Rorabeck

From An Almost Forgotten School

This day comes like wild horses- ta-da,
You know:
Waking me up and putting me in preschool;
And the day is as all shimmering as
Glass,
And her eyes are changing colors with the Weather,
And I get so happy until I fall to pieces,
And then I place my head in my hands and I
Stop congratulating myself;
And I think of boats and helicopters as Slick mirages-
And I don't know what I've been doing, only that I want to come,
And at the same time say her name, in the backyard
Alongside that glistening pool like a sweet diamond
Of captured, enraptured nature:
So sweet you don't even know, like a slice of your Favorite kind of pie cavorted away from your Best friend's older sister;
And now I should say my peace, and go to sleep;
And in my sweet wet dreams, weep a piece,
And wait until she is sleeping too, and pluck her some Like a narrow-minded conquistador out beside Her kitchen windows,
Reminding her that we are both together at mile zero,
And the waves are even now tapping parallel to where We are,
Wanting in to the bedroom where we've been busy making
Love while the sea has come up expectantly,
And the buses have returned our younger selves from An almost forgotten school.

From Another Forth Of July

Now they shuffle off—
In a time of piss and envy,
I collect a new gut and a new body,
So decry this up to the airplanes,
To the spaces that once could happen
Anywhere—
This is another of my poems that for once
Will never go remembered—
This is the place where the dead can Lie anywhere—
And they do,
While the monuments that once were Now gather
The strangest confections of their memories
Underfoot-
Was not this where they pretended to once live,
And in their neighborhood of rotten gas lights
Pretended somehow to Concoct this ordeal:
Yes, this is how it happened, the murder
That was noticed by no one—
By the little boy amidst the merry go rounds
Of the shopping malls of anywhere,
Stared upon by the glass tombs
And the ruby eyes of the albino alligators
Just after his first kiss,
Just after he thought to disrobe from all of His clothing of lies—
Another play unfolds
Another butterfly spreads her wings,
And at the moment of preternatural climax,
Another American finds the opportune time to become Indebted to the moment of climax,
All of the fundamentalists inside of her
Knotted belly unutterably sure that all is needed is
But two of a kind to be rubbed together
To see the almost religious dawning of another Sacrifice to the crucifixions of America that was paid all too little to lie down

Upon her fading bed
And to pretend—just pretend
For another fourth of July.

Robert Rorabeck

From Body And Bone

As awful as the pools without sisters,
Nude stores emptied of unclothed nuptials and now
This,
A short cut to a bosom that dead ends as the waves
Toss,
And all of the necessary washing machines stop their Machinations,
Like parked cars where lovers no longer caress;
And I think it would be awful if she had to forget me,
No less-
But after the swift lives of fireworks, only so many Cenotaphs lie with the emptied wrappers
In the trash;
And the fairs of her heart where I once laid captivated,
Tormented and beating my chest through wreathes of Fire
And pagan fare thee wells- moves on,
Like the fox pot bellied from all the fairy tales he's destroyed:
And the witches he's made love to now
As calm at cheerleaders after a show, their bellies like Stolen watermelons bashfully distended from what jubilations
They have had with all of the charisma exuded
From body and bone.

Robert Rorabeck

From Burned Out Homes

All of the spoken light told
To the girls of the world,
Spoken into the windows where They used to work:
Now all of the lights are out
And she is hungover in the billfords
Of the places that don't have
To pretend to exist:
Another light shatters the abutments,
Sunken ships going down to their Beds of death amidst the trees
And the movie theatres that glow and Glow—
New species found in the trailer parks
Of the mountains—
And new ways in which to love
Old species
That are on the move from burned out
Homes.

From Deeper Waters Still

These storm clouds caterwaul around me in
Their august monsoon, like jaded debutants wailing
In their pretzeled boudoirs,
Leaving a hallway where the angels descent whispering:
I am five hundred pages into Whitman again,
And the flies are in their house in their vaporous mutations
Accentuating the ache and the bleed,
While my bones juxtapose on the concrete where the Unmowed greenness is seeping, disobeying borders and Vows where poisonous butterflies rest lispig,
Tangled in their beautiful gowns, forgotten the grossness
They lost when they flit from the knee-high cocoons,
Forgotten their wormy friends, and that they are still poisonous
Though no more so than a paper cut to me; if eaten,
The death of the presocratic burnished into the furrows of Ancestry, entire armies lulled blue coated in platoons of Stabwounded hillsides, bayonets blushing the necks of Beardless infantry; just boys, and their eyes on her halfway
To a psalm, the suppositions of juvenile daydreams:
And this delighted reason cut short as her eyes flit away,
Thus the rain commences into its dispassionate orchestration,
And little girls cry flung from bicycles with bled knees,
Never to look again at the unjustified strangers who met them there,
Like elegant spiders stepping up the flume of a drinking fountain
In high school: There is no reason for this line, nor the one after,
For my eyes have skipped across entire oceans, and drunken Far deeper from deeper waters still.

Robert Rorabeck

From Ears To Ears

Brand new aggrandizing scars:

I wake up in the morning and I try to breathe not too

Hard:

Some ones are dyings and some ones are being borns,
And fine young fine ones are always blowing their horns:

Areolas are seashells

Washed away from mermaids, like this new day washes

Away those old ones,

And the sky: maybe she is serving drinks in the sky,

Like a sorority in a Catholic school bus that spread its wings and

Fly:

Now they stretch their legs and yawn, tawny legs of tawny

Ribbon,

Copper arms and bronze: and they lie for awhile in their blue

Suits and pinafores while their captains draw them along,

With far too many reasons not to find me,

To look so far down and gone where then the earth is just a

Trinket blown of vermilion glass,

And their days are always passing beneath the sky, their

Overpass;

And it seems that they are resting for awhile against the inclinations

Of the spheres,

The blind old men, those peeping toms who grin their daylight

From ears to ears.

Robert Rorabeck

From High School

Don't you feel that we really belong because
There are windmills in your eyes
Darker than for your mother's sadness when she goes
Away into the loneliness in her kitchen:
And there doesn't have to be any more reason for these Tattoos except that I went away to Spain so many odd years
Ago:
I barely graduated high school: a truant with a purple
And silver jaw who is no longer beautiful-
Lost so long ago: kidnapped by the long extinctions of fireworks:
Each peeling whistle strangely reminiscent of our lives together,
Until collected under another school bus, I have nothing Else to do but to listen to the long day as it rains
In fake knives- and my Muse named Alma turns in,
Frowning over my misuse of the queens language and all of My scars, scarred like a spearing pylon
Presumptuous in the bay that the terrapins circle, with jokes
And farts, as she bites her fingernails,
And the green cannons bask in the seashells of the afternoon sky:
It might as well be Easter with the beauty resurrected there:
And the airplanes like metamorphosed school buses,
And the stewardesses languishing there, high atop the Revolutions and serving drinks, smiling with the affable
Insouciance that I remembered all of my sweet hearts giving to me
From high school.

Robert Rorabeck

From Mexico

Enveloped like a wino in the beautiful loneliness
Of a park
I think of things that everyone thinks upon while alone:
Alma calls me on her way to work,
Says we can only be friends:
She won't call me again for a week;
I write about her- I sleep alone; the city writhes,
Shadows gesticulate to one another:
She kisses his lips on Christmas
And then looks away
And thinks of me;
And her children at home
Wonderful and filled with so little pain
It is almost impossible to imagine
That they were birthed from a mother who ran Away from Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

From My Soul

You have so many numbers:
Bodies attribute to their cars and those
To their streets—
Contemplating airplanes rise again—
They go to leave the sirens,
As men get up into other lives for Another world—
Well, the sun just turns around,
And there is nothing very Beautiful about that—
But her work speaks for itself—
It has found something indefinite:
It is stealing my heart away,
And counting the wealth
Now stolen from my soul.

Robert Rorabeck

From My Zoetrope's Flickery Meadows

Passions of school yard plays: Sharon,
You took creative writing on the very first day and leapt across
The classroom
When we were suppose to gather and queue: How I feared that you
Would leap across the classroom with your knee high socks
And black pony hair,
Like a waterfall that answers to no one: How perfect you stood and Removed yourself from the desk,
Like a sexy paper airplane of fluted unrest and glided over to me,
And sat beside me and I am sure saw very little of what You were hoping to find; but never mind:
That was over a lifetime ago, chicken wire on the patio,
Old-flames in the sky: Now everyone talks on cell-phones until the Day they die:
And you are gone with the cars and the Indian givers: gone straight up
Stream and never even had to count the depths;
And yet I wonder if you weren't the product of my insularly dreams:
Just the girl I was looking for combusted out of the shadows
And made to dance like a peony springing from my zoetrope's
Flickery meadows.

Robert Rorabeck

From Other Worlds

Plaguing the newness of an intersection,
Song birds shift to the ladies' perfumes—where
They are going—
High-heeled in echoes—bodies like stairwells
Leading
To the accumulations of their senses in their Parloring rooms—
Like a merry-go-round of orchards for the fox's
Zoetropes,
Like mirages in the desert, shimmering—
Cast from the fallen angels
And the touching down airplanes—
Everyday in their classes of daydreams—
Breathing through the mirrors of an ideology
That turns their beasts into kings—
And the sunlight falls upon them in birthmarks of Windmills,
Not only from our familiar sun,
But from other worlds as well.

Robert Rorabeck

From Our Child Cut From The Moon

We wait forever for the moon to arrive:
We have to unload the moon eventually-
Make him see truth,
Make him watch myself from the bedroom window
As I blow up a house to stock you inside:
With kites and ribbons and kittens,
And gramophones of cotton candy and honeydew-
Then the gibbous specter will be so fat with'
Intrigue as to be a tourist,
And we can cut a big slice out of him and raise it
As a child;
And it will slip so beautiful and wild through the Bastions of crawl spaces and suburban pools:
We can name him after you. He takes after you anyway,
Or Federico Garcio Lorca anyway;
And maybe it's his child we are borrowing for awhile,
And it doesn't matter if you lost your head to a better
Poet or the mail man or the American Flag,
As long as you are now well and settled and fat like
A tourist from our child cut from the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

From Our Dreaming

They both shared likeminded wisdom
From knowing each others' tells;
But their young boys died from eating unlucky
Snails:
And the rivers flooded, and the natives disappeared
Anyways-
The bromeliads wilted straight over their Graves
The Mexicans sat around having their lunch- and Then sleeping,
And over their brown saddles the insects
Measured the instruments of
Their short lived keeping- and there was something Else in the sky,
But who ever remembered it, I am unsure:
And though I recalled this to you,
Like stone arrowheads pinioned into pine-
Embezzled from a point of reason there is no use in Explaining-
And when we both awaken from our dreaming,
It will be raining, but I am unsure why.

Robert Rorabeck

From So Far Away

Slowly,
If we had the same shift,
I would want to make love to you in front
Of the big mirror in the changing room.
And when my brother in law gets here
Maybe I will go up to the north side of
The old renaissance park
Next door to the junior college I went to After you had gone up to Gainesville and Forgotten me,
And make discombobulated love to a $25 dollar
Spanish whore:
Because I can do that,
And I've been to Spain and I want to go back again
And I want to have thirty two birthday candles
Burning in my hair
So tucked away like a plum tree tremulous atop
Her red clay we might Blow them all out together like wishing a genie out
Of her hairy bottle
And wish for anything,
But I would wish all the time for a house for you
To come down to in near the sea
The wolves couldn't blow down,
And you could bring your daughter,
If you could learn to love and see from so astonishingly
Far away.

From The Ballrooms

Awakened into the orbit where they are Without voices—somewhere shouting mutedly
To the remaining coyotes who have no dinner dates:
The circus and the fireworks tents
Are taken down and someone else writes a better
Novel and dreams of running away—
Ogled by truckers in the shopping malls of their Heirlooms—as the Indians sleep downhill from
The flea markets of their gas stations—
And their dreams have no stanzas—maybe it is Because they fought too long, and that they couldn't Understand any of their numbers:
When they saw the goldfish in the wishing wells of Their shopping malls, they just pissed on them—
And did not wait for the rain to leave to step outside:
They became too drunkardly for their girlfriends
Who left them for boys who could almost always be Defined by their occupations—firefighters and werewolves,
As the lights fell away from the cities at the edge of The world that no one cared about—far away from The ballrooms in which almost anyone could become famous.

From The Beds Of Ambiguous Tenements

She came fitfully like a knife in shallow water
Never discovered by the ambulances of sky:
I stole her away from her husband and gave her a better house
To live in;
And I could never tell if she appreciated me, but I had a bicycle and Took it out through the rain clouds while the helicopters
Were flying low and the orange trees were shivering;
And the ghosts had started evaporating through the mangers and Spanish harems,
While the frogs wept across the porous stone, and I knew that soon
I would have to leave and sell fireworks
While the day bloomed and sweltered and the waitresses awakened
So very much appreciative, curling from the beds of ambiguous
Tenements; and the day was beautiful even though I knew it would Not last a long time.

From The Crepuscule

Wives lost into graveyards,
Strewn from their imperfect marks: now bachelors
Traveling in their distraught cars
All over town, getting ice-cream alone- windows
Of abandoned businesses,
Snowflakes lost in trees becoming infatuated
And falling into the veins on a leaf
Like the extending lines of
A river, cheating chalk and death- above the heads of The law abiding citizens,
The chief misfits, and the short ways home from school-
Pinpricks of imperfect light boiling in the yards
Like freckles over ants,
And the weeds pushing through, hungrily while foxes
Are underneath the houses tired of Dreaming of vineyards too far away, they proposition
Alley cats to become a zoetrope together
And thus they move from the crepuscule, and naturally
Approaching darkness
They go up the hills after each other, loping until Their shadows are removed from view.

From The Eyes Of Young Lovers Whose Beds Are Already Burning

Speedy bicycles far beneath the motionless skies,
The saturnine gentlemen burning like candles
Skull-caps brushing the fertile crescent of commercial
Airplanes:
Bowed sheet-metal echoing in thunderbird stilettos-
Don't get me wrong, but it is impossible to be Young again, to play stripped naked in the weeds
And pretend it is any other thing;
And yet the atmosphere is so beautiful next to where Tourists f/ck, but it is why they have come-
They spend good money to get drunk under her
Gown, to seed their destinations within the deeper
Ballrooms of the turquoise furrows,
The caesuras of drowning unicorns; it is the Only thing, like a Ferris-wheel turning even if The bleeding won't stop-
They won't shut down. You can't escape her eyes,
And the way she fireballed as you went down from The mutual consumption of a harlequin flue,
Half-avian like bird-men, or like a Precambrian stream gushing newly unresolved
From their changing climax of your evil romance, Clots of alligators and coelecanth- a better thing not to See, the traffic blinded, the liquory holidays disposed up,
How the terrapin proceed over the rusted crowns of conquistadors
And their diminished saints, into the cooled beds of sands,
While the tourists sleep hand in hand, or in their family cars,
A derision of anniversaries and commercialized planets,
Air-conditioned, leased- But
This rutting of the torpid and disposed, clutched in the motes of Sunken castles and baby's breath,
That true love comes this way only when the lights are out
And the waves are fully roaming,
Dispossessed bachelors on the other side of the canal
Hard up and singing rummy shanties; and it is all over by morning,
The young are hatched and speechless, and given little chance;
Their room is a mess,

Yet by instinct they follow her, revealed like pattering evidence
Beneath the spotless sun,
Slipping through the mouths of gulls and waves
Like white cutlery, immaculate and disappearing
From the eyes of young lovers
Whose beds are already burning.

From The Fairgrounds

Mountains on a stage overlooking
The fruit market,
And beside her the road home:
It doesn't hurt to look at her more,
But yes it does:
And to remember her,
Like a birdbath of honey spilling
Over the watermelons:
Or the same old song that sleeps
Alone in a world
Fitted for her children, and the fairgrounds
Will come back around once a year,
And want to collect her,
And she will pretend to go with them,
As if she were climbing up a ladder into My misconceived heart,
But then, tenderly,
She will go down again, and return
Home in her thievery,
Counting all of the wonderful things
She managed to steal from the fairgrounds of My heart.

From The Fertile Womb Of Such Orchards I Was Meant To Attend

Bugger who made the sky in amethyst,
The clouds as handled as uneasy gypsum:
Plato sat beneath and in the dusk understood
That there was two of each thing, but only one
Perceived in this world,
But Aristotle denied him, said there were Nine celestial spheres leading up her
Bashful eyes lashes, but not doubled;
But hemlock was needed to be drunk, like
A sure potion to take the leap,
Socrates insisted, as he did:
Hercules didn't care, he drank her where he Saw her, and the sea was his court:
Unabashedly, he ran around and through her
Legs until she was thoroughly weaved,
And fell down on top of him, bosomy; but she Didn't care: it was just her philosophy....
Time passes on, and I almost killed myself over
You, the little bit of carbon monoxide thrill,
And dad has three pistols fully loaded in the Bottom drawer; and I know who he voted for:
And still I need you, even when all you care to say
To me is, hello; but it won't get me to shave,
Or to stop moving around with carnivals, smelling your Ways along the route: I'll find you in the particular
Light of a particular date, and lay you down
All in corduroy, and punch you with my lips
Until you apologize, and I will teach you all about my Pre-Socratic philosophies, my thirsty swordsmanship
I use to denote you as a certain queen;
And we will do this on the ranging easement beside
The community college, while the ants go through upheavals,
Carrying away the boll weevils to their sandy indoors;
And I will carry off publications for you, in the Homeopathic coitus of our fingertips; until we are Burnished and freely living, with children growing like Seedless grapes from the fertile womb of such orchards

I was meant to attend.

From The Garden Of My Dying Fingertips

I read over words that shouldn't have to be real;
I make them come to half-way life as pain
Killers,
As little things which shake fists of animated dust
And twigs toward the sub-stellar night:
Customers drive in and look at the pumpkins,
But the tent isn't coming until Monday-
I don't know why I say these things- I think it should Be better to live near you,
To smell the same mustard seeds
Blown from the clock towers
Of the state university,
Lungs of Furies blowing intelligent pumice:
Walking the same streets as your serviceable gardens,
Looking nearer the same things which shouldn't have To make you smile,
Even happening across the men you're more likely to Marry:
Now I am so far away down in a dry well of palm trees,
Conquistadors flanged amidst the sharp blue cactus,
Everyone licking his paws from trying to get to it:
And it's funny that no one down here thinks of you
Anymore in passing-
But here I am, weeping like a little bird, congratulating
The nightmares of rhododendron and sharp toothed
Adversaries,
Tempting them nearer in our reciprocation of insouciant play,
All to have you a little closer,
If not in reality then at least in the jungle kingdom of Ghosts and fairytales who come crippled and gimped
From the garden of my dying fingertips.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Kidnapped Fingers

Despotic world of
All of the loves left behind
Like the shells of Katydid going to better places
Across the canal
Or underneath the moons,
As the kite slips away from
The kidnapped fingers—
Then, is this a kind of Song, the graveyards sings to
Its visitors?
Is this a place, a flower allowed
To survive underneath
The playgrounds of the Oceans,
As the fireworks tents peak in
The desert,
And the illusions carry on Carrying their fairgrounds into Movie theatres—
And those places where you
Can close your eyes and See what has left you forever.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Movie Theatres

I am getting fat in the layovers of milkweed:
And someone is calling me—
The bottle rockets have fallen into the perpetual
Night in the serene gardens across the canal:
It is code for another kind of death,
As the dogs run their tracks, as the angels fall:
And snowflakes melt across the windshields
Of a blinded muse:
Or, I suppose they don't have to, while I am
Driving away—and she doesn't answer me—
As sunlight and water fountains
Peter to the hummingbirds—and my mother will Have her fifty-fifth birthday tomorrow:
What will she think of that spring—
As she sees her father laying stark naked amidst
The plastic roses of his graves—
And the tourisms surround her, making her the Higher end of a see-saw—
As the ways bask in the luxuries of her abandoned
Forts: it seems as if they've been falling her
Forever—forever—
And still she is not done, nor does she want to Come indoors from collecting all of the fallen antlers
Shed from the kings she has rejected who go
Weeping from the movie theatres
And across the prairies—
The firelight of another man's yesterdays following
Her across the cinder-block steps and indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Nocturnal Prisons

Lost marbles in the playroom that opens
At one end to a field without end, and to the canal
That doesn't exist,
Evaporated ribbon, like promises
Of girls lost with the yellow-jackets caressing the Tiny nipples of the kumquat tree
Filled with the wayward paper airplanes.
Underneath their tinfoil daises,
The wax lions sweat—trinkets of the zoo
Left over our shoulders—fieldtrips to roller rinks
And movie theatres,
While over there each wave a thrust—
A new reason—an animalistic breath as a stark
Contract against the fragmented delusions of
The séances of the amusement parks:
And holding your hand in one of these places,
And fall off the pace,
Lying with you in the abandonments we both hope
For,
Calling to you hopefully from the nocturnal prisons
As jasmine blooms from the soul
You could not fill.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Old Mailboxes

This is the curse of the brotherhood that wished that it
Had existed a lot more in what could have been the soft brown
Baseball games in the immeasurable depths of your deep
Brown eyes,
Like coffee that wasn't stirring from its sleep:
Like your arms enfolded around a newborn that made up its Own sorts of spells,
While the terrapins wandered, and the boats flew:
And the gods who were still alive spoke to themselves, until
The oceans that we circulated around were really cut up
And emoted the silver destinations of your Christmases:
Alma, or whatever else it was that you really wished to Decide for;
And you children learned the language that your mother Rosa Cooked for them, as I died for you every night, under the arms of The special curses,
As your occultish young body swung around like the heady metals
Of an undecided compass on a journey in a fireside by which
It wasn't made up in any way to know how to prove, or heroically,
Disprove;
Until the pinwheels of my family's name finally regained their Colors, and flew off your lips
Like mockingbirds from the old mailboxes somewheres in a neighborlessly Honored sea.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Other Side Of The Canal

It is my job
To get drunk and pray to you underneath
The sun-
Floating in the railroad tracks of the un busied
Weekends,
As beneath the rose bushes,
As all of my art is forsaken, and you go
Home to your husband: you say you do not Love him.
But you go home to him,
And I climb mountains to get closer to the mountains
So I can taste the rain off their lips
As I curse your name,
And all of your high school turns around again-
What beautiful monuments that are not Supposed to be ours,
As your direct your attention underneath the blue tarps
Of the weddings of another tourists trap-
You seem almost to belong in a museum,
While I've been cultivating my apiary,
Waiting for the sunlight to fall upon our lives,
Even after the goldfish has died-
And I want to take you towards the places I've Already lived, and hopefully haunt those Places with you as the sunspots flash across
The early morning carports from the other side of the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Pool

Imperfect as a body glorified by the iron struts of Day:
Selling the heirlooms of Christmas trees:
The traffic causally articulating to the grass along the Way-
Playing a Mexican card game with two friends of Mine,
Pining for that muse who allowed me to use her
Body one too many times
To only be friends: because I would buy her things and Then look the other way,
While the night was a castle building up to stay
And looking down across the miniature panoply across
The roof of her house,
Burning in imperfect estuaries- crowded by other
Mexicans and minorities-
Brutal games in the park for years before school,
Played by women and her sisters who are Causally beautiful,
And as voluptuous as vixen and serpents,
Just stepping out of the movie theatre, just glistening from the pool.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Pressing Conflagrations

Our bodies wake up from the pressing conflagrations of Fathers and mothers;
At first we have so many needs, but then we wish that we were not
Here;
Because we have seen you slipping on your sweet belly through
The weeds:
You all but stuck your tongue out at us and hissed, and then Went off following his footprints:
Are his father and mother better than ours? We bought a house for You on your birthday:
A yellow house with flowers, and we apologize for being born
So far above the equator our skin is so pale and sickly
Compared to yours;
Or was it just that his father and mother knew how to work their Fires better than ours.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Reasons Towards Her Accords

Pretending to do good deeds, jogging beside the Fires of Christmas when it isn't even yet Halloween- but all of the new Babies will soon be suckling of the massive egos enjambment ed
Into the swollen crèches of another woman
I don't suppose I ever belonged to: as new words rise up like gravestones:
And all that was here dries out of color and folds into itself,
Supposing that it has never had to be for so long;
And my muse, she- lies down with her husband, kissing the centerfolds
Of another grotto or car show:
Forgetting about me, but wounded and breathless: while she is my heaven
I've been calling the fires into and kissing the feet of the other States of Mexico while all that was left has yet to be Serenely proven: and then I eat my lunch next to her, like a kite next to The stewardess in the waves: and I become soft and swollen with the indentures
Of the Wisconsin whose music she never deems to listens, but to which She lives so near towards- and her name is Alma, and this is but the latest Canto bled from my reasons towards her accords.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Seasides Of His Homesick Canal

Destroyed by the sunshine in the monuments
Of loneliness:
Everyday getting up and quivering at the treeless Summit, looking down into the Greenness of valleys populated
By people and marionettes: thinking of doing
Good things,
And then dividing: like plagiarists and scientists,
Losing ears and noses:
To be replaced by gold and comets,
And other strange voices
The students only hear when they are alone;
And in the carport, and
At night, after the rabbits have exhausted all of their Wishes,
And are sacrificed in the rock gardens by
The dogs and their vulpine grins:
And the carnivals are all tamed and starting out,
And the kidnappers are all stargazing under
The blue and cerulean banners,
And the grizzly bears all are praying:
And my muse is not even born, but when she is
It is in Michuacan, Mexico into a world I have never Seen and for seventeen years
Until she is pregnant and traveling across the frontera
Into America until all of this way, so finally she takes my Hand and occasionally falls in love with me,
Fleetingly, burning out like fireworks, like doves falling
Asleep into peace only to be burned home again,
As I brush her brow and kiss her-
And wait for her to call me: Alma, Alma, until she falls Asleep in her distance like the daylight of All that I'd hoped for; and I call to her through the cascading
Orchestras of my loneliness- pitiful and malformed
Through the amber playgrounds;
For her to rise again and caress me, cherishing,
As if a browned eyed goddess moving winged from a bird bath,
Slipping into my sight again,
As sleek as an otter serenading the housewives from the seasides

Of his homesick canal.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Sky

In the glove box of my day
Hot ashes and cigarette cherries- Other mothers
Whose other girls go by the name
Of Mary's- and they sit in the blue Cadillac's
Like shrines in the carport:
They sit in their sashes, and make eyes across
The canal:
They are waiting for any man to find them,
To teach them and show them how.
While their pornography is in a daydream, or with A pill bug in a pill box- the cavalry is Returning high heeled to Appomattox-
And you know about the flowers ushering to
The gutters, picked by the lips of tortoises
As gifts for the arms of butterflies
Who are never present- who are skipping school,
And remained traveling, exhuming fairytales
From the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Sky You Left Behind

The good witchcraft of my song impedes my weary
Epiphany: see the light house in her gory sorority looking Far and then further away:
And now this poem: all of the angels up in arms,
Getting good numbers for the lottery of lost virgins uncorked
To their dragons, slipped like tallow conquistadors
Across the canal- all of the sad shoulders, and the meandering minnows
Whose throats are speckled with the glitter of iron pyrite:
What a holiday to sleep with you, Alma, all and every night;
And new poems for you up in these burning hibiscus,
Destroying for you the words I never once thought of you for you:
Alma, why- the entire architecture and its landscaping is burning up
For you, in a world that is otherwise going down:
How he got you to come back to him while I was never around-
Thoughts formed in echoes, estranged into the estuaries of your Silent throat- won't you hear, my muse, the words for you,
I never thought, I never wrote: and the roads are coming home for You- my god, and his angels, the airplanes are touching down
All over Mexico- Alma:
And I will die for you- an epitaph for your victory: watch them build
The gilded monuments all atop my throat: while the salts of your luxuries Ululate and play for home, expressing the virtues of the rules of A world you were too far lost to give to me, Alma, as if these words
Were the breads crumbs spent in the frontera for your lost children,
Like rose petals spread across the lips of wolves and angels,
Just like the spokes of stolen bicycles confiscated after midnight
For you, Alma: how I fail, and then how your children
Return home, anyways, happening to your own joys- into a world
That is the splendor shed in the bosque,
In the beauty that quakes from the skin you left behind.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Snake's Mouth

My wife, come over to the Other side of the work,
Like an ant crossing a river in A jungle—
An egg fallen from the snake's
Mouth
And into a nest of sleepy-eyed
Crocodiles—
A beautiful jewel that sets
The dinner table—
Anyways, so lay down the angels—
And when they get upset,
They leave their hang-dog shadows,
And go on dates with better
Men—
The world echoes of its contraptions—
No part of it is without a history
Of destruction—
But I have stopped looking for your Face alongside my own reflection
As it drives through the zoos and
The church yards—
And, for a little while, the best of
All of the men put on fireworks
To turn the fickle amusements of
The abusive gods towards them
For an instant,
As a latchkeyed airplane breathes
Its birthday wishes in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Tables Of Divine Providence

In a bliss,
My wife and child lie sleeping
Entangled in the next bedroom
Of this apartment
Somewhere on the outskirts of Shanghai—
And in her belly, another child—
Somewhere, the first collection of cells,
As a bouquet in her belly,
Trying to help me out,
Just the primordial blessing, telling or pretending
To tell me that I have been doing
Alright,
As the sun hangs down like a dog going through
The doorways of the kissless stars—
And somewhere in China,
While I have been writing of her,
A billion or so some odd souls lay sleeping, opened Mouths on their backs like lizards basking as
The moonlight spills over the Great Wall of China—
And I don't have to believe in this
Or anything—
Not in helicopters or firemen or the rooftops of Their restaurants—
And not what they taught me in school:
I just have to look down into your eyes
And see you staring back at me,
As light is kidnapped from both of our worlds
To consider the possibilities
Laid out philosophically, like nude tourists
Basking for the waves,
Like dogs leaping for the scraps thrown
From the tables of divine providence.

Robert Rorabeck

From The Window Of A Junked Paddle Boat

I am calling again casting the paper-snow
Flakes of my show,
That easy death my grandmother applauded some years
Before she herself died;
I'm doing this like a shell-fish without his shell,
A shoeless baseball player, which is my thing:
The lips of the hurricane are drooling even so far
As this place in Arizona,
And I have my heart out again of its fleshy pocket,
Trying not to dispel the nervous things which are True, the coy in the lake of a bicycle's tear-
Trying to fool you into believing that I would kill myself
From the window of a junked paddle boat,
Tossing myself into a feral mouth, leonine or crocodilian
To the applause of the remote control tourism,
For only a second of your eyes- To turn you away from His fleshy gymnastics by my esoteric poses,
Even the failing of my things I collected for you by the dozen,
To watch them losing color outside the fire of your senses,
To see here for an instant the uncanny inebriation of My vermilion truancies- How I dance for you, jobless,
Only wanting you, and then to run away to someplace mundane
But sacred, to feel your absence in the sun, the isolation Life gives like getting drunk in the darkest room until It burns with all the simulacrum of a beautiful cemetery your Consciousness doesn't have be anywhere around to be enjoyed.

Robert Rorabeck

From The World Of The Friends Who No Longer Exist

Warmed by cheap rum, I start reading my own
Words,
Paragraphs of premature novels which seem to run
On forever;
But they remind of sunny days when it was sunnier than
Its ever been,
And we were moving out so all the funeral furniture
Was scattered across the lawn as if a hurricane had it our Feng Shui;
And so the possibilities are with the lizards, and the Tourists are on the paddle boats after feeding peanuts
To the elephant,
And there isn't anymore need for money,
So ex-girlfriends are now married on ruby red cruises
With older men they now call their husbands who Make their lives easy like Hollywood movies;
But I keep falling back to the poesy- its because I like
To lie out in the front yard before a hurricane and smell
The citrus on my fingers like the foreplays of oral sex:
And she is a gentle ingénue in her seasons, smiling with Her tan lines, but the liquor makes me think that I am even More beautiful than her: that I am stained glass in the gutter,
That I am the truanicies shooting off fireworks:
And I am, and I am: I am more beautiful than I've ever been,
Than my mother or grandmother have ever claimed me to be-
I am more than a character actor- I could be a leading man,
Except I am too good for him: I am metamorphosing- I am
A butterfly at the top of my house at thirty-one, and I love
My novels and the things I've kept saying for so long so Alone; and I want to buy a house and hold scientific experiments
In the backyard while the lions are escaping down the street;
And I want to do all of what isn't necessary, but I'm afraid
That my poem should have to end before it overstays its welcome,
And the last of the houseguests gets married and leaves me alone
To climb up the bean stock in the backyard while the Alligator watches me with eyes the color of her birthstones
From the very world I mean to write about, the world of friends
Who have made new friends, who no longer exist anymore.

From Their Earliest Romance

Over the little green room it
Rains,
And the ladies wait out their labors- the fish
Are done swimming outside-
The men are done with their banter,
And the rooster is underneath the gutter
With the dog-
He is silent in all of his color;
And after the rains, smoke over the earth,
And the crops who make their heated gains
In the night time;
The insects change through them- and if you
Are lucky, you will see the little girl
Kissing the lips of the corn snake in the Dirty gutter
Before classes and the light arising over the world,
But not for the last time,
Making measured exchanges- and then you
Will have to sit behind her
And wonder
What he tasted like to her, and what secrets
They shared
So fertile was the light newly born
From their earliest romance.

From Their Games In The Sand

Crepuscule will be happening again:

Here it is: oops, it has gone, and the parks are emptied

And the homes become brightly lit as the traffic

Is parked and we are home

With our lovers or our soon to be party guests, and the televisions

Are on,

And they are gossiping in the middle of the sea:

And we cook for ourselves, or they cook for us: and the airplanes

Leap:

Oh joy: they leap up and up- they cascade, but Alma will not

Tell me that she loves me,

And my tears float like watchtowers of balloons over the

Coquina fortifications which become doused with trumpets and

Petty kings and barbeques with

Gazebos and homeopathic primates and silent unrequited gifts

For Alma every evening after crepuscule has come

And her one or two children have come home again

Their toes curling, exhausted and finishing with be playful,

And culled to us and her tawny bosom,

Like ships returning to port all famished and weary but happy

From their games in the sand.

From Their Highways

A single light bulb hung over
A ghostly baseball stadium—and I cannot come
Home,
So lost in the basements I am,
In the grottos of her tricks—
Even the fabulous letters across a billboard cannot Save me: I am lost well,
As the bicycles and the busses turn around—
And the butterflies head into Mexico:
Mexico,
Where my dog jumps like a marionette in his dreams:
While all of the ships disembark in the dark
Theatres where they are already returning—
And where there are no suburban estuaries for Truancies and romances:
Where you have already escaped from me so early—
Looking up to the stars and learning,
Learning—after all of the lamps have gone, accorded to Their bi-ways—
And the midgets fawn with the whoring princesses underneath
The palmettos:
This—a dream that was lost—
Though I can almost remember your eyes—your eyes,
Advertising like angels beside the cars from their highways—
From their highways.

Robert Rorabeck

From Their Long Darkness

Overused, but vibrant and alone,
I wonder if you make love while lying in Bed with your daughter,
As I come across all the words I will never
Own,
As I am just going up the familiar paths overused
On the indescribably beautiful mountain:
You remind me, Alma, of my mother, if she were
Of another country,
And another time; and I know that my word counts
Have entirely exhausted you,
And my knights have weebegone into your more
Simpler world,
And these are things that by conclusion you just Can't love,
Or no one else for their pitiful sake: while you
Remain over me an elephant of warms, that the airplanes
Cloud:
They cluster like the memories of a summer around
Breathless wildflowers,
And I think of you while the desirous bears slumber,
Waiting until their new seasons come so
That they come stumble out from their long darkness
And kiss you as if you were their own.

From Their Lovely Game

Every ornament in carport of the heavens, looking good
And flirting with the oceans that know
Our echoes- the push of our graveyards, and sometimes How swing sets still leap over the culling of their Mulling weddings:
It is there that their hearts drip, like irrigations for a vineyard
So far beneath the tufts of lilies,
Where alligators float like airplanes, and five year old
Princesses fly when they learn to swim,
As from the yard of a perfect white house they go down,
Causing stains and blood, and little chips in their once perfections
That will not go away;
But it only makes them more precious, as some lights go out
Absolutely far away- and I hurt myself again,
Kneeling in prayer through the dime sized caskets in the infinity
Sucreased from their lovely game.

From This Sad Folklore

Stood up in the huckleberry woods,
Been thinking of Briar Rabbit and your nipples,
And the sky above the coned limbs whispering like
Drunken neighbors;
They have so many things to gossip yawning upwards,
Pretending like the sky is some communal pool,
And that they were all working class evergreens,
Handymen and plumbers,
And some who tow away cars from the university;
Down on their luck except that it is the forested weekend,
And I could really leave here, because I've just been drinking,
And I've just started out,
My sack is full of peanut butter and jelly,
And the dogs are nippy,
And the trails well paved by the long bearded uncles,
The boys on coins,
The puritans and their yokey horses-
They are of only one class, the masons of the forest,
Who make homey amphitheatres from stricken lumber-
But in the Appalachians it is always raining,
And I've been drinking,
And the planes are down,
And the stewardesses stolen naked into the huckleberries,
And the rabbit is in his own delusions,
While Twain scribbles out an Arthurian farce to pay the bills
Against his elaborate contraptions;
The storm doesn't abate, and I am alone and taken shelter in A tiny outhouse beside a giant highway,
And I will wait out the night and then walk back the twenty miles
To my car,
And go home to the girlfriend who disappeared what,
A decade ago- She stricken up a tar baby in the front
Yard with a golden arm, and it is so beautiful
And frightening in its ant-hilled nursery beneath the palm-tree;
The black men are dancing all around it
And making it a peony to keep occupied until I get back,
Not knowing that I am watching them with the ghosts
In my truck,
And that I can barely contain myself,

From this sad folklore I am weepy.

From Time To Time

What they have is real, and what you are is a smoking Ruin.

The mountains will play their bassoons for you only
Because you have been to the tops of so many of them;
And have come down limping with

Grandmothers:

And pan will play his lyre for you: but you will eat your Lunch in the lunchroom of the single men

While outside the window it is raining but only for a little

While,

Because nature recognizes what you've tried to accomplish

For her,

But she can only be sad from time to time.

From Town To Town

There lay a shoulder to the sun—
Atop of a giant who packed a six gun:
And the dogs were laughing
As they hunted the graveyard—next to the Movie theatre—
Next to the museum of our hunting grounds:
And maybe tomorrow I will have
My honey moon in the foothills of the Appalachians
Or maybe really in the foothills of the Himalayas—
And I will drool in very many primary colors
And count my feet against the séances of very many Tourists:
It will seem as if I am one of them:
The ice-cream will melt back against the cul-de-sacs
Of my house—
The dogs will run in their race-tracks or the horses
Will run, or the men—
I cannot remember: all that I know is that I have married—
So I no longer have to wonder as the pretty Dresses of the Ferris Wheels return from town to town.

From Under The Crescent Hills

Twitterpated on death,
Flies know so many lips;

They may not get her message,
But they love her tasty gist.

2.

Mathematicians of chaos sing a plague,
In pestilent orchestras castanet her head,

Until what is unfinished becomes revealed,
Moon-lit, contented.

....

They carry their instruments in rain-slicked
Cases, under shoulder-

Go home to empty kitchens and beg for more;
They will only live for a fortnight,

But will always adore that woman still grinning
From under the crescent hills.

Robert Rorabeck

From Very Far Away

Bright as any shroud over a candy store:
Womanly vessels that sing and cry over the Rounded stone of Vanquished lovers- on the higher plateaus
Where the Titans who have Yet cannibalized themselves sit lamenting,
Spreading the pools of virgins from their eyes:
As the day shifts
And metamorphoses beneath the clouds
That have journeyed in from very far away.

Robert Rorabeck

From Which You Have So Faithfully Have Strayed

A casual touch to be the end of me, like the purring of A ghost:
I carried your cigarettes to the cemetery, and you were
The most utmost;
But you could not linger in my dally,
Weren't your eyes made of far away:
Weren't they just as newly painted as the happenstance of An all of a sudden story,
And I will not say your name to save me:
My joy was the joy of a firework making for a moment
The curb brilliant,
Making even the most religious of mailmen hesitate:
All of these colors foaming and sizzling down into your Hot plate;
And this was just you out there in the outstanding cold,
Lost for a little while pressed to the jubilee of a needy child at His favorite game:
Hot and wild, until my paper flamed and curled,
And all that I loved darkened and mewed to you, which made
You realize that I wasn't your favorite,
And that this wasn't even real, and that you had a home,
And a father whose warmth was even more certain than the empty
Darkness to which you
No longer linger, from which you so faithfully have strayed.

Robert Rorabeck

From Your Fountains

Wound up by whatever hypotheses are in my labyrinth
And suffering nightly-
In the cooling estuaries of a suburbia I was never allowed
To attend,
While my brown muse sinks into her husband,
And all around her the tamed natures of my America sing:
Dear Alma, you have two children,
And you wind up so far away from me: you have never flown
Minisculed into the rafters of my overweight houses;
You have never been with me across to another world
On the other side of the canal,
But I have tasted your lips like priceless penny candy;
And your body has sunken into my own,
A body that ululated with the needs to be set free;
And into another night, remaining scarred and alone,
And underneath the flight path of ambivalent airplanes,
I sing another song- deafly muted into your window,
Hoping that you will look up and remember- and touching
My hand with gentle hopelessness, winding away into Another world where the expectations of your family fall away-
Shed like katydids from high school,
And all I am is there for you- set free, a dream of promises
And bouquets that drink from your fountains never to die.

Robert Rorabeck

From Your Hair

Airplanes make ribbons—yes, they do for Lonely girls,
And I almost forgot that I left you here:
I do not suppose you remember me—
Semiprecious virgin with your two Children—
Will you go into the flea market,
Or will you just sit outside with your two Children in this hot day?
The drink comes to my lips again.
My wife and child sit it out in the other room—
Soon it will be summer,
And the airplanes will be touching down,
Untying from your hair—
And it is a blessing that you do not remember me.

Robert Rorabeck

From Your Hidden Wounds

I think it is possible that you should consider committed Relationships,
With the sun going down over Portland, and every other Color is primary and needing to
Be touched by the uninhabited hands of children,
While I can only come so far towards you before
Running away,
As the lights finally hushes its lips and burns away across
The blow holes of dolphins,
As the lovers douse their wares into the wash basins
Of what they expect to find,
As the canaries kiss the lips of the deadly mine,
As the tourists stumble towards you blindly and unawares,
As your brown eyes kindle and burn before
That dinner table that your children always come to,
Hoping unexpectedly to find new stories spilling of you and Me, blooming in a hidden catastrophe,
Perfumed from your hidden wounds.

Robert Rorabeck

From Your Sun Brownd Orchards

Ten minuses and it subtracts another day; but it was a good
Good day,
And well remembered, though it is going away;
It is true that I am no cowboy, even though I have many sad
Things today,
And maybe it will be that I never again get to clove and Pluck from your
Sun brownd orchards, but it will always be the case that I so happily did today.

Robert Rorabeck

Frontera

Coming across the frontera is like dreaming:
There is no entry for it in any common dictionary;
And there are no peach orchards:
The flaming sword swings like disemboweled airplanes:
And there are plenty of serpents:
But that is something that I cannot truly express:
Even though I gave Alma three bouquets today before she Could drive away;
And she has passed through the frontera, and lost her virginity at Least by the age of fifteen:
Her first son is six years old and she is twenty four, and her man
Has come back from:
Has come back from Guerrero Mexico like another life, like the Gift of a weapon that joined in the defeating of The Alamo:
And now sing, and drink and play cards:
My face, perplexing beneath the common day moon, buying
Alma lunch and sitting underneath the fox tail palms,
And letting her feed me:
And promising her my house, telling her how beautiful she is:
Like a guitar or a violin: promising her so many things;
And just as faithful to her as a lion yawning, and still she goes Back to him, giving me all kinds of nightmares,
And more nights of alcoholism, and phone calls from my Still surviving grandmother who I don't even like:
And the rings of disemboweled trees and other things that used
To belong to angels; and now, Alma: and now this....
And now this....

Robert Rorabeck

Fuerte Del Diablo

I am smiling because
Her eyes are green, and just beginning to Open- How so like the migratory song of the butterfly,
The ideology of the life's spittoon, and cast underfoot
The prettiest things are without reason
Or fanfare, but come out in the down hours
To be fed by my hand, and the secret smiles I give;
How so,

Like the effluvious sides of new sports vehicles,
Like the auctioning cries from the dinner table and bright
New linguistics and the politically correct sideshows,
So well-groomed and porous and even now living
In the corner acre lots with their lawyers and lonely cypress,
But I say:

I am now reading a book I wrote,
And never again will I look into your eyes, even how
The Mexicans despise me for employing them,
For making $207,000 dollars this holiday off of her independence,
And then driving across the land we stole from them,
And picking up the cut pieces of language which should be Given for free to the drunken Navajos.

Somewhere,
The devil is laughing and turning water from the frozen lake
Like the work of a heavy windmill, but I am ready for him,
And the way her legs have bounded away from the loci of my rest,
The way frightened deer pass through the headlights of calamity:
For, I have bought myself a home and a headstone,
And am prepared for the brevity of this job,

Thus I play baseball alone, and look at the sides
Of my face equally, and eat two hot dogs for dinner, and Lying with my dogs at 9,000 feet say quietly now that this is Freedom: The liquor in the glass and in my veins,
The loneliness opening away like strange flowers in a high basin,
Making me say now that this is all,
This is all, and I am a simple yankee

No longer afraid to fire the laughing vatos,
For I am even now laughing as if I were a coyote,

For even now I am smiling, for Her eyes are green and just beginning to see.

Robert Rorabeck

Fully Fledged Flight Attendants

In the city lies the citizens laid quiet off the ejaculating of
The exhausting angels:
Those pretty demigods that put them to work, and then
Sent them back home again,
Down into the jungles and the purple fjords of their deeply
Shadowed
Cribs: perhaps like heroes defeated by their own monsters,
The motifs of satellites nearly invisible in their rooms:
The footprints of super heroes,
The metamorphosis of Cinderella's brooms: and they go this Way by the byways of nocturnal rivers,
Pretending that the night blooming jasmine is the only Thing in the neighborhood that will keep them
Intoxicated, as school comes,
And the ixora blushes and turns into full hedges
Just in the very same time that the youngest sweethearts finally Grow up and become so leggy that they leap across the continents
Wearing the finery of the heavens on their strapless shoulders:
They are now fully fledged flight attendants.

Robert Rorabeck

Fun

Give me the functionality of bob-cats,
Mariposa,
And I will turn around like a ballet for you,
Under the bright lights of the goddesses
All in the art classes,
Or Latin,
Filling up the streets all night long for two Weeks
With their milky love: their eyes as salient and Lasting as the teal caesuras, you know,
Like humping tennis courts;
They felt me up like a tender orange from across
The room:
They candied their apples and sugared their Breads,
And the sky foamed with their perfumed heads
Before they went away:
Upstate upriver, and I followed after them like some Loyal, beaten dog,
But it was already too late: Erin already had a boyfriend
In her bed,
Sharon was long gone,
And the rest-stop bathrooms were pitiful-
The flatulent alligators smelled like dead cats, and now
I am too afraid to go into a house of mirrors,
To perceive myself in different gravities rolling around,
Filibustering; keeping the time that has Already passed away,
And it is no longer any fun.

Robert Rorabeck

Further And Further Away From Old Mexico

Now you say that if I go this way
I can take your hand:
If I hop the cars and slay the dragon:
And I have been up all night pining through the darkness,
Kissing the empty blocks underneath the overpasses,
Pretending that this is Alma's
Brown skin:
Because I saw her once today and called all that I saw
Of her heaven:
And I stole a brick of firecrackers from my father for Father's day and I gave to her in a brown
Paper bag along with a brick of jumping jacks
And a picture of a werewolf,
And I saw my younger cousin who is taller than me,
But I forgot to say hello;
And in the evening I guess Alma's man came to drive her
Away,
And all of this seemed to come and go
Even further and further away from old Mexico.

Robert Rorabeck

Further Away

I am in the right place for another glass,
And perhaps I will never write another poem tonight,
As today I have to explain to Antonio that there is no more
Work right now, for the horses are hungry
And eating up all the money garnered from our patriotism;
And soon it will all be gone, and they will still be hungry
And young and growing,
And the liquor in their legs spent in the egotisms of the racetrack
And the little men atop them like unified Napoleons,
And I will still not know her number, or the saccharine rhyme of
Her heart;
For I would like to take her to the zoo,
And notify her to each of the carnivores' appetites,
And run against her like the bachelor otter in the falsified
Eddies of his plastered architecture,
The way higher mammals purr, and tell her now that this Is how it should be, if she could remember,
The food I feed to her, the milk like fine liquor I take from her
Breast as I steal from our children-
But she is just the rhythmical fantasy stolen by the Indians
And taught their languages and the mathematics
Of their casinos-
And I should have been in Japan by now and laid,
And talking in different languages: In a year a father in conjoined Decade a grandfather enjoying Disneyworld with the newly Spent and bewildered eyes of its doey offspring;
Instead, I let the yellow b*itch in by the static door of my Falsifying basement, offer another toast to Whitman and his Genius linesman, and tell her now that she should not read me,
For this is the weather of a new holocaust, and all hope is spent
Just getting up to the teller, and even though her breasts are immaculate
So that she should be named Mary and feed entire queuing of Third world countries; it is still not enough to justify another
Inebriation, or another night without her,
Whoever she is trying to me- I give her this as if I throw
An infant love letter out of my moving vehicle, and now
That it is screaming there can be nothing more,
Nor shall I revisit this utterly disjointed psalm, another poetry
Conceived on my rum- For her eyes are beautiful though

Far away,
And though tomorrow I may live close to her again.
I could never be further away....

Robert Rorabeck

Further Away Than Memory

It feels good to be away from the other unmasked bodies,
To be asleep in the day where the airplanes recede like signed
Treaties;
And it is wonderful to be directly underneath the flight path of All the airplanes leaving West Palm Beach,
For now all the stewardesses go leaping straight above me,
Like Jacks over his candles, only that they are Janes and their Candles are the soft sheets over my eyes:
And I don't need thunderstorms or air-conditioning to sooth me,
For I can still remember how the telephone booths glowed with Some sort of heliotropic light,
Like fish tanks for the wayward and color blind; and sure she Still has blond hair,
And a family that sways like the wind chimes she grew while Breathing,
But I am not in her room anymore- and I am a place further away
Than memory.

Galahad, Son Of Lancelot

Lancelot of the green heart and other
Immature words—
Had an illegitimate son as pure as many gods—
Who sat with the bangle tigers
As he ate his lunch of peanut butter and Jelly at the zoo—
Galahad was the boy of Timbuktu—
Chosen by the angels to tie his shoe,
And quest for the Holy Grail:
It's what he did,
And this much is true—
He found it he, did,
But I don't know where—oh if—
Oh if I only knew—

I wouldn't have to bet on the races
Or go to work in the zoo—
But I've lost my habit of knowing what I'm doing and my wife
Run away with my shoe.

Robert Rorabeck

Galaxy Of Christmas

Admiring the echoes in a well
Where no one has drowned-
Weekends of Saturdays
Come,
And serpents around them- a few words that I know
Like fire drills in high school getting up
Tomorrow
Tanned and scarred,
Busy day of infatuation steering for the long
Emptiness
Where there are no more planets or Seas or animals-
I will see you, if I still love- busy perfumes on My mind
Eating up the minutes-
And then there will be another woman-
She will stare and stare from
The distance of a galaxy of Christmas-
Maybe she will pause-
And then, I am sure- she will go away.

Robert Rorabeck

Galleria Of Nostalgic Senses

Love me when the show's over,
When you have the rosy glow from Walking barefoot beneath the lanky mangroves,
Teething on the saw grass, teething;
And when it rains over the service industry of Well-calved stewardesses:
When the university is pulsing through
The young steams bowed in holy:
Love me, and put dried flowers in my book of Blank verse,
Turn your head and cough,
Black-eyed in the shadows, put on injuries,
Dirty your nails and jog for me short-skirted
To the semi's h*rny bl*ws-
Graduate for me in the lighthouse's slender
Cathedrals on the land spit, spikenard
For alligators,
Defanged lions cleaning themselves in emasculated zoos
Of androgynous thunder.
Love me too in old picture books of the Holy Land,
In Mark Twain's moody vitriol and broken narrative Structures,
Love me in the tramping disillusion of handsome
Winos taking to cardboard shelter with their dogs-
Love me to the drenching pitter-patter.
Love me because I drive all night for you, and I plow the fields of ambitious sunlight,
And I am impregnated by the distant pit of your Turn-based carousing;
And I drive all night for you just to be under the Cheap liquors of your sundry billboards,
Following the sandy curves of wise men and their hunchbacked
Dromedaries, the red tracks of shoeless baseball players,
The wandering Jew whose name I am carved beside,
Hitchhiking in the stripped galaxy of cars led by Ferguson through the
Galleria of nostalgic senses,
Love me looking upwards from all those saintly grottos,
The muse painted ceaselessly by all the old masters,

Or scribbled dreamily on a desk in math class:
This star that doesn't sleep,
Or the wound that will not close:
One breasted, where satin drapes like the denouement
Of a wishful play,
Where the wind cuts across the abandoned lot except
For all the lesser cars,
And the greater airplanes leaping from the tarmacs of Their home towns to a faraway land where there
Shall be no love to return.

Robert Rorabeck

Game In The Sand

The crack in the sky
Is full of ants:
Cadmus' bull is taking
Europa away,
Little children are making
A game in the sand.
Their father is hypnotizing
A chicken.
I heard you were getting Engaged,
To the tallest of the Cavalry men:
His teeth are perfect,
His skin is smooth,
His eyes are wanton blue-
Near your feet
The ants are crawling,
The clouds are gathering
On the Mediterranean,
The same as they did for Rome-
I am kissing your column
On the quiet lake,
You lay in my arms
Like a broken doll,
I have been away to war
So long,
But now I can smell the storm:
There is silver in you now,
Up and down
I will not go away:
The ants are crawling
From the sky,
Little children are making
A game in the sand.

Ganymede

Long lost passageways come down sometimes from the sun they help you remember how the holy ghost burned when you were young and still going to church you thought John Wayne was a real cowboy and wondered how he could die to be reborn the next showing The Cowboys The Searchers
there were so many movies that taught you to watch in your grandparents' trailer even if parts of the floor were missing don't you remember the night you slept with them in that bedroom overflowing with the backlog of dirty laundry and new born kittens, do you remember smelling your grandfather's armpits- strong basic stuff, like the earth but it's been so long since your father's parents were together-their love gone, Clarence cheated on Jackie- He found another mother the same age as his first daughter Laura, a messianic Jew, you hugged her once and how come? You don't like her, you politician; it doesn't matter what everyone thinks- spit on her, that's what it takes to be faithful to grandma Jackieyou've got to hold your own in this world, even with your face coming off, you have a certain power- isn't it true to get out on the street to get arrested like Johnny Cash for picking daisies-or starting forest fires with you axle sparking flames on the road, while you're hopping on pills, getting drunk and crawling down the throat of the Nick-a-Jack caves to meet your maker- the stoned loneliness of life comes at us all, and we all got to play ball until we drip into the grave- not everyone can be Shakespeare-not everyone can change down the drain into Lewis Carroll's wonderland, but you still might stop the red queen from painting the white rose bushes- bet your cowboy boots Alice was a real girl and the places that she went were no more real than what Lewis Carroll wrote about her I want to fall down the hall in love I want to get my own place in the ocean to meet and maybe you know who will love me far away when I write this it's okay, the sky's coming down- there are plans in the village, places for you and me to come down to the chapel to swap spit and rings I love you or the memory of you like the ghosts high in the skylights of the city; I still have a jaw though it was broken and wired shut at age four when I fell out the back of my father's truck/ let's have a round to that and my defunct grandparents alone- Grandpa's in West Virginia with his messianic wife Laura whose first son died from an overdose and Grandma's homesteading in Oregon with her mother's ghost- And I'm riding on here in Arizona listening to Johnny Cash's rendition of Ghost Riders in the Sky trying to communicate the true love across country and tell you all this so I can be like Johnny Barleycorn, somehow something important in this country alone at this table.

Garden Of Your Lip Service

The roses grow up:
They learn their way: they get straight up
And do the day:
They go to town, they make love too:
The roses, the roses, am me and you:
I see you across the street: I go to you and you
I meet,
And I kiss you and lay you down,
And buy you roses,
And kiss you in your car before you drive away
To your man:
Before you return your house on the spinning
Topaz world:
You who came to me across the arid sea:
You who came to me so I couldn't paint wings on
You as I worked beside you,
Alma: and I kept all of your secrets while I remained Alive:
I brushed next to you, like a butterfly who happened down
Into your fire, but who was dying anyways,
And only wished to kindle you some more somehow:
And I so became fruit for your lips,
Whose firing flesh leapt busily, and entrepreneuringly
Ate my metamorphosis,
Until I became a garden of your flesh.

Get Better Things

You keep thinking things will get better,
So you go on with yourself....
In an afternoon's rain shower
For the first time at your new house,
You go into your backyard and Scream privately that she will love you,
When she doesn't even know where you are,
And can hardly feel you anymore,
The sunken plan of years lost
And all the souls drowned so deeply
Even recovered they are unrecognizable-

How can she love you,
When you are without form?
When you might step outside and not Remember how you got there,
As the cars speed by coldly-
Let her take comfort in the familiar man
She clings to and stays afloat with/
They worship the same God
And they get drunk together,
And things are easier and well-lit beautiful-

You may keep writing to her
And some evening she might hear you
As the background noise on the radio,
But she cannot make out what you are saying.
She cannot understand why it is you are feeling,
For through your confusion
She doesn't know who you are,
So continue writing her love letters
But burn up the words before they get too far
Otherwise they will reveal your heart
To someone you don't even know
And things will get better.

Robert Rorabeck

Get Up Good

I want to get up good,
And go to work, easy open sky work,
Like the open lips of love-letters:
Good easy work,
Like being back in preschool and going on Field trips to the Naked galleries in the over spilling
Art museum,
Inebriate, leggy women- their first explosions
Of chartreuse rhapsody,
The easy, every day spilling spume,
The alarm systems and identical sisters colonnading
The rosy earth, and I don't want to every have
To get up again with a tooth ache,
With a bend; I don't want to ever have to skip school
Again,
With these two legs, or a bicycle to listen to a lion's Stomach growling all day while watching
Cartoons and the trash the housewives are made
To watch in stagnant captivation:
I want the carnivals of work, under fluttering cerulean
Tarps or out in the open sky under the riotous
Tracks of slash pines,
Giving up into them easy, sluicing words of gusto,
Being a gentleman and passing my time,
Never having to escape to the other side of the Canal again,
Just dreaming of her out in the open, putting it softly
To her throat,
In a way that should never have to be explained to any Other of my less stranger sort of kind.

Robert Rorabeck

Getting Closer To You

If you cannot see it, I am putting off my scars for you:
I am trying to become beautiful, I am doing good work
As the sky yawns like a lazy king. I am sorry I am not
There for you. I am sorry I never really knew you outside
My simple literature, or that when I finally buy a home
I will love in it only with my dogs. You will be married,
Or you will have other obligations which distract your Marvelous eyes. I bet you don't even think of how they work;
How they bring about other men gaping to your charms;
I think about it all the time, but I am not the director of your gaze- That is for Another man, Herculean or droll in an overzealous
Proximity, a ready concoction of hips, bosom, and ass-
But I will give it a good study
From here- All the way across this fine country. Curiously,
I can see it the best of all. Your gaze is another wonderful
Invention I would like to drink from with my own;
Auburn challises toasting to the senses- but sometimes the Easiness of proximity is the common paradox, and even though I
Do not have you at all, look at all these volumes you unjustly fill.
The potential of your body laid rasping languorously across my own is Almost too potent a display to imagine, but I do it all the time.

Robert Rorabeck

Getting Pretty

I feel like getting pretty,
But I have no liquor
So sing me a song
From your drunken lips
And stare at me
Until the moon multiplies
And swims,
Like a naked woman in
The sky,
And then you can come
And kiss me with those lips
God stung on his way to Zion,
Because I am not here.
I have gone out the back door
To lay beneath the sky.
Here, I feel you moving
And I know what's right.
So press into me early
Into the morning
And kiss me deeply
With your drunken lips
Because I feel like
Getting pretty
On you, my sexy liquor-

Robert Rorabeck

Getting Ready Again

Should it come to this,
Then I will be found out: That I have been careless again,
Thinking of Erin,
Great and auburn muse who raised my nocturnal flagpole
In the night,
And gets busy with all my redundancies,
Or in the least the ghost I have collected off her corporeality,
Like the tiny white buds premature off the citrus trees:
And Erin is going to Tampa,
Swimming in her car once again under the clouds;
And Erin is singing to her pretty boys, not a one of them
Can get her down:
Erin is even better than the most of Florida- Erin is jasmine,
But even more so the scent I have never found,
Creeping lankily through the sepias of crepuscule,
Doing the only real worship in the Catholic Church underneath
The power lines, in the penumbra of the great football stadium;
And what is Erin doing now:
Sweet Erin, with her hair coming down,
But gathering herself up again, and collecting her secret wishes,
And getting ready again to do the town.

Robert Rorabeck

Getting Up

Now they have a dove:
And it is filled with pain and ants:
And I am still here:
And my neck hurts.

Robert Rorabeck

Ghost Freshly Mowed From Her Grave

I get drunk and get sallow, puppy dog eyes:
I get flag poles of creamy surprise-
When I get drunk,
I just want to look into your eyes; or,
I get drunk and drive in round about ways,
In juvenile merry-go-rounds to your seas:
I lay out and spool, homeless, skipping school:
I listen straight up through the palm trees,
And try to hear you like the far away purring of Commercial airplanes,
Something beautiful and yet popping, yet blooming
Out of her graves-
I sit and close my eyes and blister for days,
And the traffic trundles, and the tide sways,
And the tourists go on forever through their sunnier
And more insouciant farces;
And if I could but live in your sweet town, I'd be Happy just stocking the shelves,
To watch you, a wife in her wedding gown,
A ghost freshly mowed from her grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Gifts To A Newborn King

Delivering the goods,
Listen to me preen, my little dilly worm;
If I am the devilish milkman this is
The city, the archway over the river like a picturesque Canal, a literary devise; it denotes the passage
From east to west,
From mortal coils into Heaven; and I am here
Screaming and calling names at the gate,
Pitching scripts to Caron;
As long as I get the phone-call, I'll get the job
And will be delivering lunch to the pantheisms
Crowded into the sky-wired tenements:
Gods and godly-men, and wives and godly-wives:
I should soon be seeing them all,
Caracoling my selected neighborhood like a
Fine gentleman, a cheap cabby making his hourly wage;
And when it snows I'll drink coffee;
When it gets too late, I'll sleep: I'll keep doing this Until its my time to skip out and follow his other way:
Each compass has four points, mostly, and there
Are so many canals and ditches to leap:
I can go far across the everglades: and see how many Colors there are for the word blue,
And sleep in the outskirts of strange high schools in the Oil slicks and ink wells of angels and engines,
Skip out of there and drive around and get a new job,
Pretending to follow a bible passage,
Keeping in my pocket stray things to give as gifts
To a newborn king.

Robert Rorabeck

Gills

Nine or ten orifices can help
With flying
If your a fish and you take in Any air at all
They keep you in schools
And family
And fresh clothes and careers
While all of the time the Busses are looking good
Under the sun-
Turning around even though
They have nowhere to Go
At all-

Robert Rorabeck

Ginless Sin

Sucker entrepreneur
Bring your lords to the dump-
Underneath the sea gulls' teeth
Lay your frumping frump
Up that fat mountain gilded with
The city's pride,
Sack your wife and carry your bride,
And hang over the cars of Bangless joy, raise your men into boys,
Those girls who are toys.
Sense the fumes of you rusting guns,
Take their money
And invest their funs,
While the world goes over to the other side
Of righteous philanthropy of whipping
Storefronts,
Collect the gold and burry the c%nts,
While the sea rolls beaten down,
And all the nights dropp to town-
You are pretty, you are sure,
And with the deadly artist forgotten,
Her world is yours-
But what world is yours
If she has been dragged out of the sea,
Made to wash your windows which advertise
Nothing but
The awfulness of everything that you can Think to sell:
But the penultimate rhyme will send
You to hell
Where you can set up again, caracoled
By ginless sin;
And sell, sell, sell.

Robert Rorabeck

Girl Named A-

I love a girl named, A—
But now there is no more reason in these careless matters:
They've been selling themselves away—
Kissing and pressing themselves
Up the bunt cakes of the slopes: you cannot say
That they haven't been looking good—
Just like Mexicans growing corn underneath the Volcanos the butterflies travel to and then die into just to Have a look-
Until it becomes a vulgar habit and a possibility that cannot Be dispelled—
I will say again that I love you, but then I will awaken and then Go to school tomorrow—travelling back into A world that I'd just left starving—
And then I will see you dressed in the positive alphabet of All of the heavens—
And I will lie down, striking with my thoughts all of the negatives
Of your fires—
Building and pushing my own soul like a spearhead through
The morgues—In fact, through all of the busy highways of The cadavers.

Robert Rorabeck

Girl Who Sells Liquor With Indescribable Eyes

Her eyes are tired but not the right color;
She doesn't love me because I've called them blue,
And that was wrong of me,
And everything I have done while breathing has been
To caracole her, to search for her like a blazing fire
Lost in the pines,
Like an airplane dying, or the way some ballerinas go
To sleep-
I am useless otherwise, and I want to drink
Liquor- I want her to serve me everything she sells,
A girl who sells liquor with indescribable eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Girls I Sometimes Like

Oh these dreams pass me by like School buses pass my truancy- I hang out in the Speckled eaves of the Florida Holly;
And dream of Saturday morning cartoons and Multisided dice, that the bullies will not Mess with me:
And by now she has an entire house populated with Updated domesticity,
And a pool, and a cat, and a extra bedroom to store
Her extra;
But I don't want to live forever- I want to be able To go through doorways which don't lead to anywhere-forever,
Or dinner parties, or the first draft of Alice:
I want to get wasted on turtle glue and fresh water
Anemones- I don't want anything more than to be able To raid the refrigerator, or for girls I sometimes like
To sometimes read my poetry- Now its after midnight
And the useless things are changing again,
Even more useless- the failing of my little toy men
Go back on the shelves of my bedroom,
And I've skipped out of my skull, smelling her down
The burnished hall where the Mexican ladies have been Cleaning so brightly; and I'd like to catch her in the turnaround
The next time we have a fire drill, spin her around her Slender waist were everything about me can fit several Times over, and end this thing in a secret haunt, in a brash Keyhole up in the Rockies, to bend her supple lips against My stone hard pricks, to lie her in the shadows looking down
And confess unto her heady brevity- That she's had children
By other men, and afternoons to joy;
But that's just the beginning of the reservations I would make
For her- I'd show her such delightful iconoclast epiphany;
Now that I have spoken my peace,
And smoked the bright amusement laying on the flesh river
And tracks of her ride, I should lay off and finally dream,
And so impose myself like the childish magic of a paper airplane,
Flown from my fingers underneath the ceiling fans which halo her:
That's all I have to say to her.

Girls Just Want To Have Fun

Another day flips over and lies still,
With its flag distressed but unobtrusive:
And people just keep doing what they do,
In the world so bellicose with out a sound-
The waves gossiping,
Romero rearranging pumpkins:
And I have my old hunch- I think of you,
So beautiful underneath the salty lungs of a great
Winged place,
Where better words try to find you and run underneath
The table,
And up and down your legs;
And I am so far away, romanticizing this displacement,
Laying out my wayward bed of damp straw on Rotten palates:
And nothing I can say will save me, for the tomb is Limestone and drinking water,
And you are knee deep in the venal aqueducts of your Somnolent pleasures,
More successful at getting at what you want- the refuse of Blood-stomped orchid- the feeding grounds of an entire Species of venal pleasures-
It's what we all want, but some people are just better
At getting down and dirty than others.

Robert Rorabeck

Girls Who Are Never There

Pick me up and carry me because I don't care-
I have golden centipedes in my hair.
I wake up drooling
In the middle of class,
Dumb eyed and doorbell shoed
For girls who are never there.

The sky a yawning precipice
Of pockmarked heroes,
The sky a blue hero of chicken
Pox
And broken matchsticks,
The sky a blue daisy of rotten
Eggs
For girls who can never be found there,
For girls who are never there,

Baring all their broken sorrows
Like eyes hatching blue phoenixes,
Deep and swollen,
Swooning like deeply affected ingénues
Or overfilled shopping carts
For my tomorrows
That are never really over
For girls that can never be gotten there,
For girls who are never there.

Robert Rorabeck

Girls Who Kissed Me Long Before Her

I can spell from here the lights of the neighborhood's Boudoir, the greater and lesser lights, some newly Invented or dispelled- The seething charms of tricksters
And Halloween- Kick out the lights around the Epitome of laws, let her tell me in the dark how he held
Her jaw in bed, made her speak of Christmas trees,
Made her say the things that I would say slipping through Her window like a radio active centipede; I plagiarize,
Trying to remember hypnotized way back in high school
The pain she gave to me, the poems she read a strip show
Out in the student parking lot, the flask she used to dip into My envy, the wild melons that grew in the soccer field
Of good calves and taught, ankle length socks swinging like
Smoky censures: We lay on the floor of her bedroom that day,
And she let me feel her up above her bra- In afternoons,
After cowboys and Indians, we had phone sex once or twice,
And she was so proud when I finally came staining the old
Green carpet more, like an overused Victorian field of pulp Novels and cheap hotels. She's married but they keep coming Into her room, the multithreaded pantheism I like to use; and I am thirty years old- I've lost all my Lincoln logs, my paper Airplanes are sleeping with hidden pornographies across the Canal, but look at how she remains an inconstant muse, Though what I already know about her: She cannot turn into
The forest, or transform into the sea- She remembers everything
She can use to entertain far into the night, but she is just a woman
Now, but I keep killing my green great dragons with butter knives
For girls who kissed me long before her.

Girls, Girls, Girls

The drink has my mind in a pickle where I don't Care;
It is easier looking at myself, and thinking on my dreams.
This is like being in the eye of a hurricane
Where no one else cares,
Or is around to hear my lesser efficiencies:
Girls who once road bicycles no longer wear shorts.
They're houses are as tall as some minor resorts;
But other girls aren't girls anymore, according to Ovid,
They are birds- Birds who girls could never compare too,
And girls in the sea too- Lost like entire cavalries
Of conquistadors out lunching
With Jesus and got drenched in the sun shower,
Made to do laps in their backyard pool- These girls are cool.
You could spend all day long thinking about where the girls
Are hiding,
And where they're diving, their rumps are wreathing to the Convenient store. Younger girls are more beautiful,
They have more to explore,
But the older the girl the more luxurious, the finer the carpet,
The wealthier the habitat and more vibrant the jungle,
The deadlier the snatch- Girls whose houses follow them in the shadows
For some ways, and girls who in public fountains like to Bathe- Girls in chorus lines all ready for bed,
And girls who bob, bob, bob, from giving so much head:
Girls, who make my tummy warm like wine,
Girls, girls, who metamorphoses are so fine;
And my muses, girls who wash each other with garden houses.
And before I go to sleep tonight in my wild track of fright,
Would like one or two to come to me,
Girl genies who carry their lamps on their ass&s like racing snails,
Girls who mount sand upon their t^ts with bright colored pales.
Girls, girls, girls- I've lost my senses.
Girls, girls, girls- up on the fences, clapping and swishing their Tails;
I'll turn you over in my rhyming bed and twine your curls,
And whisper lusterous and mirages all whose names
Carry themselves on the long, shaven legs, the bicycle swirls
Of girls, girls, girls.

Robert Rorabeck

Given Enough Time

She is unfaithful:
People die in her all day-
I roll up my half-finished novels,
And put them in her,
And then raise the tiny red-metal
Flag,
When she is on all fours and turning backwards,
Like a pinup at play
With blue-eyes:
And I wished I was really in love,
And making love to her at the base of a
Juniper Pine,
And all the horses had gone away and followed
Those long roads of America after the last sun,
And I was too busy putting my things in Her to awfully care:
And I don't know her name,
And she's just changed her hair style,
Making her difficult to describe,
But still if you are patient and restful,
You should see her fawning, or roller skating,
Or biting her lip outside the post office,
Or university, or cemeteries you've been watching,
Given enough time.

Robert Rorabeck

Giving Back To Me

It's magic,
How you trap your children in the Glass beauty we all faun in:
Soon they will know every avenue they should Proceed down in
To avoid the monsters drinking cheap
Rum outdoors by midnight:
The merry-green eyed darlings
You shouldn't see, you shouldn't have Anything to do with;
But I've come back from the sea outside your Soul,
And you shouldn't know,
You shouldn't see, you shouldn't have anything
To do with me:
Because, I should scar your soul slightly on the Cheek like a poisoned kiss,
I should invade your house and stock your green:
I'll engorge of the sea-life
You reflect from your eyes back to the television,
Because I am very vigilant at doing
Bad things, and I'll spear you up for a close gaze
Without blinking,
Make it so you can't breathe,
And I'll hold your child in one hand like a slender doll,
Like a ward of the high altitude earth,
And breathe things into her to you shouldn't see:
You should just go away
Back underneath your abominable mythology;
And I'll keep your child long enough to feed her ice-cream,
And return her to you screaming all the way:
But look,
She's learned how to walk, and she can sing to you all
The songs I've forgotten into her,
Breathing the dying embers of an epoch off forgetful things
Plagiarized of life-like stills of your eyes
Which are even now giving back to me.

Giving Her This

This little brook is encapsuled in time:
And me spilling liquor, and making my rhyme:
Forced and exposed out upon the parasols
That have always tried to awaken early enough to deliver their Lunches to you on time:
While the little birds take out before forest fires,
With homeopathic birthday wishes on their wings, while entire Ships of Mexicans sit out and wait before the orchards,
Waiting for the first pinpricks of celestial
Light to appear through the fruits that their fathers and forefathers
Have already harvested:
Through so many turnstiles of so many fruit markets, and through
So many accords of the fruitless holidays who opened their Throats up accordingly beneath the dampening wings that bled
From Georgia,
And settled like the down syndrome of wishes to be carried by
The sheltered backs of terrapin through the blue lions' graveyards,
The quills that flattered the armpits of conquistadors
Out across the clairvoyant dunes and palmettos:
And now all of this, whispers of loved ones to one another through
The ghosts of drywall, like the impotent walls of a university,
Or the stain glasses of a church; until it is all gathered up in a psalm
And placed at the skirts of the Virgin of Guadalupe;
Where it is sworn to her, by me- that Alma has always been my first
And my last wish- and as my first and last muse,
Like a fabulous deer whose life has all been played out on the nocturnal Carnivores of the highway- with all of the birthday candles being Blown out, and the stewardesses finally going to sleep in a long
And burnished flight over the Atlantic: it is all I have to give:
And I swear, as if my thumb was singed by a fire from the overgrowth:
And pulling back, retreating: eating myself- but even while Defeated, giving her this.

Robert Rorabeck

Gladiolas Of A Wider

I can listen to the wind for hours and it never Haunts me;
It is soft and careless as a mother drinking in her rays;
Busting like a hound dog or a retarded gumshoe
Through the lees of slash pine trees:
And the joggers fall through it like stick-legged demons,
And when they cut their knees and taste
Their wounds, they remember things that now live swooning
Like fattened doves into other houses:
In strange boxes which throb with warmth, like wombs
Of whales in furnaces,
And the creatures across the earth move in similar details;
And I think all of this is nice, the zoetrope of the next day's Casual mammals,
Floating like in a tub of plastic trinkets that the greatest Harlot of them all enjoys herself,
Dabbing her pits like Siamese orchards: How she positions us,
And how we enjoy our defeats of victory anyways-
Rising up and shooting down according to her drunken will,
Resurrected, mouthing off, and accumulating in our fraternities
As she bathes, nipped, gladiolas of a larger world until she Rises nude for an even greater sort of game,
Leaving us emptied of her will.

Gladly Knowing That Is What She Knows To Do

Enraptured coelacanth of nothing;
What I am afraid of, the aphoristic nothing,
Shark's breath, wolf's bane:
I looked into your eyes once, Sharon,
And how I felt I will never feel the same;
The hallways of high school like corridors into the Afterlife,
They could never sell, lined with pine coffins
And gun fighters- star-pilots:
Sharon! Sharon!
I cannot look at myself in the mirror, but I am Even now swimming lucidly in the shallows and I have No fear of death;
Your daughter is your afterlife- Sharon, but why did
You have to do this to me- all of these dying epitaphs,
Sharon. Do you think I am beautiful now,
When I can hardly do this, when I am going to live
Forever Sharon,
You and your lucky sister plucked out of the denouement
Sorority:
You two will live forever with me, but you don't have to Thank me.
I doubt that you hardly want to, but I will gladly pay for
All of those amusements,
And will keep them strung out until they think they will Have to move away- Then I will slaughter them for Your child, Sharon,
And for the rogue for Erin to paint her lips while we smile
At her
Gladly knowing that is what she knows to do.

Glass Of Spirited Sorrow

So overcome with a sadness that I cannot feel
The air conditioning:
I sit and eat in my little house and watch movies,
Waiting for you to call;
But it rained all day, and my words were no good,
Really- they were like puppies abandoned on the cement
Slabs of got up and gone trailer parks,
And now only all of the rattlesnakes are sunbathing;
And it is not right,
But it is fair: and you called me some times today,
Alma- either three or four, and I could hear your daughter crying
In the distance,
And maybe you made love to your husband, as he was home all
Day as well: If you did, I do not blame you, because I know that it
Is only that you are frightened;
And when I see you tomorrow, your brown skin in the exceptional
Outfit of a perfect child, I will call you my life- mi vida-,
And I will inhale you the best that I can; but for now
I am waiting for the rains to let off abating,
And for this bachelor's night to finish its glass of spirited sorrow.

Glittering Rum

The night is warm and apoplectic and I am drunk.
I should be out searching for her: she is so close, and
In so many ways, and faces like Janus, like the moons
Or rings of Jupiter: The night spreads diademed by neighborhoods:
Where do they all go, after the last buck is spent and they Are done calling in their séances; but I am still cartographed
By scars, scars, and sad scars, like inebriate depression,
The constellations of car crashes: Oh I love her, and I Still do, and have seen her through so many narrow ways and Dreamy fountains, alone and wandering against the Rocky Mountains in Colorado, driving up to get my meal: her bosom
Fine and pale, her eyes aquamarine and just as unjustifiable:
I should have loved her and bared her children, if I were a better
Man, or a sports broadcaster: I would have done her by now,
But I only know so many words, frugal, debased: She is a harlequin
Up against the stage of time. No one will remember her name
Or face, but they loved her while she was out and amongst them
And shopping. She didn't save a nickel, but it didn't seem to matter
At the time; and I loved her, while she was about, and didn't Think of me at all.

Globe, New Mexico

Apache of my soul cantankerous'as luxurious and as Blue eyed as any of my muses'
Waitressing in Globe, New Mexico 'I saw you last
Year while setting up tents to
Sale fireworks 'in a world that is not yours,
You pretend to be busy in the backyards of my mind'
As my otherwise subconscious skips school and
Messes around 'a truant upon another neighbors roof,
Before any of the stars of the world unfurl'
Just another make-believe making itself known'
Beautiful knots already sewn into the fabric'
You probably live in a trailer park 'and the river sings your Name as you awaken next to him
Never knowing who you are 'with eyes cast away into Another movement of the ever concealing clouds.

Glorious Playground

Apertures, and openings, and arms,

We work in the service of the divine;

I have seen you rolling in the calms,

With otters basking on your tallow chest,

Eating oysters, and stalks, and ruddy anemones,

Saying your name in the waves' knocking of the hull,

Saying your precious absence from the city's arcades,

And wine halls, out beneath the bare-all sky, where

Your husband has taken the speed boat, passed you by;

We are the tattooed cleavers, the cannibals, the thirty year old

Baseball players, the hot-dog eaters, with our harpoons

They wish to sting you, to haul you in and operate on satin,

But I staid them with my gun and with my chances,

For I saw inside of you, and the way you moved in the Glitzy caesuras; apertures, and openings, and arms,

We work in the service of the divine, or so is the motto,

And the company of our paycheck, and thus with forearms

Rippling, and teeth clenching like taught rope, I took the

Steerage from your carnival, and fearing the pillars of salt,

The backwards glances of marriage ceremonies and nostalgia,

I took us into the warmer torpid waters deeper

Than this theatrical fear and out of sight of your glorious playground.

Glueless Horses

Fieldtrips of glueless
Horses,
And I am here talking to a
Butterfly stripped of Flight,
Like legless stewardesses
Given up on smiles;
The traffic pullulating
Like an open wound
With the underdogs
Less than victorious
With the seas as Mute as my love.

Robert Rorabeck

Go Down To The Sea

Go down to the sea and listen
To it slap the docks like a sailor
Slaps the thighs of his barmaid.
Listen to the gulls screech like
Murderous souls sentenced to swallow
The wriggling, scaled bodies of Drowning fish, as the sea spits
Hoary waves up at them,
As the sun lances spears of light
Down upon them,
As the day gyrates like a drunken waif,
As daylight tumbles and slips down
Through the watery sheets,
And there to begin drowning,
A hypnotizing death
With the slow slumbering eels,
Like loose cords of fat brown ribbons beneath the
Bellies of sharks and rays
Down to where the menservants slip away
After a lifetime of shuffling for the aristocracy—
There is the cool, cool place
Where you cannot breathe.... Where you
Become forgotten liked drowned ships and trees,
And sound is muted like screams
Pressed beneath pillows,
And the sea above is like the sky,
Is like outer space, that strange distance
Which sucks your skull out from
The old, fleshy cage and in that drowning
Park where kelp and bodies sway,
In the black black sea far beneath the Streets where drunken lovers still spat and play,
Nothing there will see your pale, eternal gleam.....

Goatees Of Extremely Charismatic Martians

Days that repeat, species and religions of Days,
Crowded avenues in forest fire haze,
Crowded love like captured elephants in Kalamazoo,
Uneasy sisters saying I love you's;
And all these parks sitting still, supposed to be Quieting spaces, waiting still;
Even their loves are lost, the sky is a hapless pail:
All I can see is the traffic repeating like gibberish
Brail;
And I loved a woman who happened to me,
But as she happened she happened to be
But as a fata morgana, a mirage from exhausted and Expended fortitude,
Leaping across the dromedary's desert,
Humping in the accosted stamens, front door and Back door men;
Her lips seeming to be right there like a fire-engine red
Rose exposed and ready,
But really she was making love miles away,
States away, even countries away and further,
Exposing herself to cosmonaughts and the extremely Thin goatees of extremely charismatic Martians.

God Bless The Yokels

Park, Mister, and take a ride
To the zoo.
Tell me what I mean to you
In the photographs underneath some Banyans-
Both of your eyes jungle canyons

Eat lunch near toy boats and
Shadows,
Read post cards tune into football
Battles;
Out in the student parking lot sleep
All day,
Underneath a sky newborn from The sea, Atlantic

When you write me once a year,
Imagine what it does to me-
Already scarred and hanging like a defeated
Flag upside down from the Crook of a cypress tree;

So I will climb my usual footpaths
While banging the cookware to stave off
The panhandling bears- and things will grow
Red from boots and stems;
Everything here needs something,
A little pollination,
As I need you- Imagine what that does to me,

When I can't swim, so I god bless the yokels-
You made me swear off meat and long dinner
Engagements so I
Only eat takeout and tofu.

Robert Rorabeck

God Calypso

I am god calypso:

When at night and I've had too much light coffee,
Got a molar that has come in sideways like an Insubordinate ship,

And the most accessible sliver of my lips is beginning
To bleed,

I have so many irreligious thoughts, as the Boy sings to me, "don't let the sun go down

On your grievance, "... I understand you are part

Of the new band's harem, and cheetahs leap like

Suntanning students at the communal pool,

Where I saw you once outside of Burger King, and you

Seemed too happy to see me, as you do with most

Anyboy- I was getting a Krispy Kream chubby,

But you got off on your bus and sped away like a

Cocaine heirloom- When the kitty cats were having

Sex on the 2nd story of my first studio apartment in

Gainesville, which was a yellow submarine, which was

Cliché, and I was sure that I would marry the weeping girl

On the dirty rug, as the lesbians swam naked like

Paraplegic mermaids in the ephemeral wealth of the

Chlorine glistening, not far from where I got a cheap

Traffic ticket, and just across the street from the anonymous

And overgrown turnabout, where I got drunk with my

Manager, Kevin.... So drunk I lost my Christian name,

And went back to her forgetting how to walk:

At night, when she is gone, and you are too careless to be Forgiven, in my diminutive seasons,

And soon fireworks and paycheck,

Mobiles that swim for infants in wicker baskets on the

Reptilian Nile, and homosexuals stroking in the park where

I've been to the Renaissance Festival and was questioned

For jogging too close to after dark,

Where my mother took flight lessons, and Palm Beach

Community College, and Mary;

In that night, and down the street from your breasts in

Their filmy bras whose colors I can only imagine (

And I do) I am god calypso,

And this is how I sing.

Robert Rorabeck

God Sent Me Here To Die

Relatively speaking,
I am cold,

Made out of gemstones,
But I am not bold-

Neither beautiful, nor quite old.

I ride a bicycle made from a special
Mold,

And all my love is sold to buy
A frame of fool's gold-

Sold my soul and got my machine,

I circle the neighborhood on a lark,
I go round and round it,
The working class garden of ancient,
Rusting park,

Where she was last of told-
I cry somnolent in the stain-glassed
Dark.

I'm worse in a fight,
Here where the nocturnal scavengers
Forage on the helpless flowers,
Those beds where soft-terrapin sleep
Retracted and un-supposed;

And I imagine her dancing without any clothes,
But she's either gone shopping or Migrated to University,
Over the sea but alone-

Made out of gemstones
Quarried from Recaptured atolls,

I ride my bicycle of worried
Spoke,

Hapless,
Remote-

She's left by the highway
Which is, of course,
Long, empty,
But her right.

I am neither beautiful nor bold-
She is far away, and everything-
And the night is so very cold.

Goddesses That Never Were

If I drove now, I would not be defeated:
I would be arrested
And placed in the bouquets of another Disney World
Into which
Some sweet hearts have found light forever
Reflect by the thievery of the moon
Up from the diamond pools:
And you can go along forever,
Kissing
And cursing the serpents, as I become the shadow
That falls into the basement
After you have rearranged yourself for college,
And had your hair done,
And forgotten your boyfriend: and this is just
The strange carriage you somehow carry yourself
In through the metamorphosed sweethearts
Before the transmogrifications of Another midnight: but rest assured, underneath another
Saturn,
Your coachmen will be mice again,
And your Ferris wheels will come down again,
Like the scars of tears across your window, even while
You will not French kiss me and I make love to Working girls underneath the stain glass, the wolves,
And the feet of serpents in the gutters-
And you make love to your werewolves in the theatres
I can no longer believe in- in the temples dedicated To the goddesses that never were.

God's First Epiphany

Though she didn't know who she was,
Waking up, she was God's first epiphany,
His first real work of art since he made the world;
So when she yawned it seemed to him the Clouds were stretching like silken curtains
Across a rosy sky; And when she smiled,
Not know that she had smiled, it was all God
Needed to justify himself, so he put away his Secret knife and feeling lucky, decided he wasn't Going to kill himself after all (Not until she grew
Old and died, anyway—and that being a great long Tomorrow in his way of seeing things) :
And he slid along the branch of a tree
Outside her window, looking Like early morning sunlight flowing in milky
Pools which caught her eyes and grabbed her Attention for several moments, and she wondered
"Who am I, anyway? " Though she didn't know
It, she was God's first epiphany;
So she set about getting dressed and fixing herself
Breakfast not knowing who she truly was,
As outside her window God played around
Like happy sunlight....

Going Ahead With It

Professors have their most beautiful language,
And the hidden cameras in the bedrooms of actresses
With consumption,
And they listen as if haunted by the marching step
Of armies, of men in the shadows,
And of waves. I sit out and sweat on the porch,
And drink from a flask,
My lips quiver like molting insects across the Space where the girl dances erotically,
Like a fruit tree, a postcard of a sickle moon
Above the trances of absentee tourism;
I should say I have scars, like bruises a fighter
Carries on tender-hooks,
And stranded on the concrete islands I watch cars,
Like furtive glances of advertisements freshly painted,
Where the sun plays a violin over the brightening
Of crosswalks, and students dressed up in firs and Lipsticks of oilfields, and enormous eyelashes like
A peacock's flounces; and now we are going to pay
For it all, and the soldiers will burn the cabaret, and We will be run out hungry onto the street and have to Make entertainments volunteering for the experiments of A holocaust, and the professors will watch us from The portholes of high towers, taking notes and ejaculating
To radio signals which speak to them like busty brunettes,
Telling them of the weather,
And how they lay upon it there out across the ocean
And far from their didactics, debonair and swooning,
Their lacy garters, like the kind chorus girls wear in
The silver mines of Colorado, licked by the waves,
As cigars toast lips and lungs, and entire novels
Are sacrificed, tossed down from the ancient rocket-ships
By the mad kings, and entire classes burn,
And the liquor burns from this shadowed stoop,
And the parade is coming, creeping like a thief with Company, for they have went ahead with Halloween.

Robert Rorabeck

Going As It Goes

And your boyfriends have wax dreams;
But how many of those do you have, Like there
Are only so many words in this book:
And books to fill the shelf, and hours to spend our days:
To awaken and groom and to join you on
The bicycle ride or the bus, without even having to know
Your name;
Like basking for a moment in one of that shadows that
Has escaped your bedroom,
Whilst the sun was coming up so haughtily and strange;
While the lesbians frisks in the pools of their chlorinated
Graves;
And Kelly, you come up like a basketful of bouquets
Chagrining the lions mouth,
The pinion in the staves; and your brow is sweaty until
The body of your censer is hung down, Kelly;
As I wish I could sing for you in brighter and more balmy
Ways;
But your body hangs down Kelly, and I am speechless as it Goes, panting, saying the name of its loved ones,
And going as it goes.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Away Going Nowhere

Old new light over good sides of flesh
Sometime in the late early afternoon, washing
A piece: This is when the familiar strange traffic Moves amongst the
Stop go shade; this is when nothing good moves,
When the intrinsic is sleeping like mollusks bivouacked
To the runny insides of quited sprinklers:
This is when all the childish teenagers are away getting Drunk in some classes,
Or better truancies are shooting black cats out of Coke bottles, and all that you never knew is happening
Outside the lipping windows; and light gets its hand on Anything it can touch, and rightly increases the green
An inch. Maybe your hand fumbles for the glass,
Maybe your head rolls, marble or opal but unsure
Yet thoroughly tried: And this is what I've said I'd give
To you, a somnolent nod from the awakened empty neighborhood.
A lover of some lines who used to travel here, the ceiling Fan moving overhead, going nowhere. Your blouse is Well tucked in, and it feels like you are out in the middle of A greatly unabashed sea. All the china and crystal are Done and drying in the kitchen, but where are you moving
Nowhere- your navel is an instrument of the sea,
Plucked many years ago and not thought of until the spontaneity
Of the moment; another sheath whistles in the yellow,
And you lilt a little ways around the white fenced white,
But I have already gone away.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Back To Florida

Going back into Florida no longer
Seems like anything real, but a furtive play
That comes alive between the crowded shadows,
The sun pours down its thespians in a sheen of Performing limpidity, they are all brightly grinning
And well-paid, the nostalgia of a script,
And it seems to me as if I should be on an airplane
Crop-dusting over the red-headed caps of semis,
Coming around her to see if she won't grow up and
Be my unsuspecting bride, because I have snacks
But there is no leggy stewardesses, and several times
A minute I glance repeatedly up into the mirror image,
Trying to believe I was never wounded; but it is not Possible: I am unwound and scarred and built upon
The tangles of a children's fable, but yet here I continue
Down into her, and the sun does not go away, but shines
Down there like the fertility of a young woman rebellious
In her puberty: I should not have her, unless I steal her,
But she is gone at night, the best time for thievery,
And they have hidden away the womb of her everglades
Back behind the entrepreneurs selling those specific ploys
Which has led her away, and crowded the otherwise nubile
Body; and yet I will do good work in her while I have time,
But she has stopped taking notice of me, for I have not Ventured up to her lips for so many years, and when I leave
She will not acknowledge me; even still, I join that train who employs Upon her their industrious revelry, and will love the flatness
Of her clays and limestone which carry her to the sea, and Settle her under that caress; so should be my way, until
I have nothing more to sell, and leave off her beauty, like
A fish breeding back up his granite river, evacuating the humid flat-chested
Cradle, so that she might not be disturbed in her salty boudoir,
But return attention to the sky, braided by the tonal rays
Of sun, and the seabirds who speak and gossip; her sisters
Who honor her there even amongst the tourists,
With bright and stinging kisses upon her dun flesh.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Back To School

Strangeness of unaccounted numbers slithers
Through the unmowed grass,
Through another day of monsooning summer
Under the mobile of a smiling moon,

Thus the night pants with the rasping breathing
Of plagiarists and the dimming gentlemen in their Unofficial meetings the next field over,

While the girls in the petticoats in love serve
Their bodies' inebriate liquors to the unscarred
And untried men,

Where the trains are busy with their bodies' long coils,
And the highways of unpaid and starving truckers,
Alongside which the state workers sleep safely for now
Married to lawyers, diamond wedding rings glistening
Like cut poisons on their dreaming fingers:

Thus, I write it down sucking the paper cut digits,
Alongside the infinite shore where the horseshoe crabs scuttle,
Where the fateful anchovies shimmer in orgasms of silver and Breathless death,

I say, this should be Spain, and the trees olive,
And the clouds the curtains behind which she is naked,
But none of it is true though none the less moving forward unabashedly
With the recklessness of some liquor,

And the banners the way her hair flowed out his window
After the last period of rote lessons and full-toothed dentists,
And the side of her face the profile of a freshly painted billboard
I stream by attentively in observation of what there is for sale.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Down

Going down into the shows of green coy,
Going to where I once was just a boy- going to see your Body,
And the sweets of its round:
Going, going, going down.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Into Wind Tunnels

In my cars- no one- no one,
But underneath the overpasses, shadows, red moss:
Where they should have been selling something-
A stain of rainbow over the concrete,
Weeping mascara of a torn away promise-
An eel in the sea that is an Aunt to other eels, accordingly, like a lost ribbon
Stolen away from a house wife-
Herself torn away from a lighthouse before a hurricane:
And the storm is coming up over a world of ghosts:
The weathervanes shirk their telling signals:
The orange groves rustle,
And the lights of an indistinguishable mass hover
Before the throats of the sugar cane in which the herons
Haunt,
Waiting for a telling signal- or a wish to blow their Hopes into the sky,
Kindling their senses into the other world:
Underneath the traffic echoes- going into wind tunnels
That sing of a Christmas to no one- no one.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Somewhere

My windows were replaced while the boy scouts went down to Spain;
And wasn't this just the way that they were going:
While my aunt had the hardest time knowing where her old husband was Going:
He was going to take things off and then become, while in her the children
He was sewing:
While in the stream of gunfighters, the trout were multiplying,
While I was just on the green carpet masturbating, just like I was stealing my Pie from the old folks and their questionings for the answers of the reasons
While;
And just so that you know why we are going, the lions are a roaring,
And there seems to be so much power in the air, and I guess that is why the Lions were roaring:
Trying to make sense out of the science fair, and her body was piling together
With the flotsam and the jetsam, both of them guess, guessing that they were Going somewhere.

Robert Rorabeck

Going Straight To Bed

I don't really work hard to Displease my heart-
I take long breaks half hidden
Under the hydrangeas,
Eating cheese sandwiches,
Listening to the zoo's ululations:
There isn't much romancing that Needs to be done:
The sky is already finished,
And it is always wishful and haughty;
And that is why all the best girls become Stewardesses, to warm their bosoms in his jacket,
Sighing like school kids on swings,
The last and the best of the Titans going Unnoticed over head in his Cape of blue camouflage;
And I love to watch the winking fuselages
Under his chin as they go by,
Winsome, cryptic: Soon they will land somewhere
And the girls will be so exhausted;
They will have to take off their shoes and Take down their hair, catnap at some terminal
In a little country in Europe;
But that is enough explaining what I've Already said- I'll play hooky for awhile,
Then I'll stack some more cans-
I'll smoke a few more cigarettes, drink some coffee,
And go straight to bed.

Robert Rorabeck

Going To Burn

Diana has an Open minded
Boyfriend
So I am back
Slugging whiskey
To my two
Awful muses
And I am the Banal grandeur
Who is tossing
Flammable airplanes
Over your Matchstick
Church
Pretty sure that Something is Going to burn.

Going To Saint Augustine

Into those actions dancing—youthfulness—
Full bodied—torso of still yawning grass
Spindles around the exasperations of a Ferris Wheel,
Needing your art down a highway
Going up to Saint Augustine:
My hand in my own yard, and what lies beneath her:
Sea shells bivouacked in the road:
It all seems to be a dream—after my sisters have Grown up,
And my muse is married—carried away by Predators:
She lives across the way, and the moon covers
Her, stealing the light that pretends to be hers.

Robert Rorabeck

Going To See The Wizard

Share in my city
These emerald illusions:
Where the jaded fox leaps
For the bridesmaid's unripened fruits,
Unaware that he is a fable,
And just too short to reach,
Her expectations: His purpose is Salivating over the tallest
Girl standing like a tree in front of
The row of olive pews:
They are singing untried songs,
While little boys and girls
Are rushed to the bathroom:
The sea is waltzing in the lime streets:
The sea that no one believes
Can be real,
Because her eyes are just as salty:
Her eyes that birth green ink
Which has smeared our world
And flooded it
Doing away with golden picture books
In the shallow estuaries where Reptiles crowd
Like a new wave of immigrants,
The bejeweled frogs,
The streamline snakes,
The ambidextrous salamanders,
And the age-old crocodiles:
The fractal cacophony of the sparkling jungle:
Close your eyes,
And they will reverberate inside of you,
Like glass smoothed in the waves' undulations:
Offering you a scented kiss
Carried over the oldest hills
The words they keep cupped in books,
And the silver slippers
Which can bring us home.

Gold Collared Disney World

I want to ride on a tourism
Of words, pass my ticket to the fine
Man leading to a gold collared Disney World:
This is it,
Where all the lawns are shaved,
And pomaded and made to waltz,
Where all the dogs are laughing and only
Using two of their paws to dance:
Where nothing ever ends,
Where nothing ever dies or is given to Chance,
Here there is no distinction between you
Or him,
No reason to read the classics, or feel that you Don't understand- No obligations but to buy the Hotdog from the young and freckled vendor,
Where all the rivers are carvings of glass,
And trams on their tresses are Wind chimes ringing over the dead who Were really brought back to life,
And everything is singing and Popular and friendly;
And I hold your hand, and we kiss with our Eyes without ever having to think upon the Deeper tragedian meanings of making love.

Robert Rorabeck

Golden Boy

It looks just like this,
My house in a playground of stars, so that when I go
Out everything is blinding as a golden city in heaven, and god
Is shining:
God is real and he is diademed atop an opulent hill:
And he smiles a rich smile and offers to pay for everyone's rounds,
And the city loves him and beneath him makes joyful sounds:
And I have a littler house down near the bottom of this hill;
It is as yellow as the canaries who rest upon the windowsill;
And my house is filled with the golden rods of our father's joy,
And if I ever have a child I sure hope it is a golden boy.

Goldfish Of All Of Their Tomorrows

A little time more for reindeer in my blood,
And just because of these words,
A little more-
And then the forest is closed- the elevator is Shut without anymore echoes,
And then like missing children turning up in rhyme-
And then as if waking up drooling mouthed
In the revelations of an rv again,
Like a goldfish won across the canal, in the fair Grounds of another moon,
While your penultimate muse keeps on swearing
That she loves her family,
And she loves her family again, while the waves
Leap up,
And keep in kissing the teal of another sad tomorrow;
While in her morning, the icecream you bought her
And the words you've had to say to her fail:
Then the day clouds over,
And any friends that you've had find shelter underneath
The overpasses and wait for her tennis courts to shed
Their fears, like rattle snake snaked shed their Skins- and for you to come over,
Allowing her to kiss all of her cheeks, and all of your Hemispheres, while the medias continue to play the Hemispheres of her favorite colors- approaching her
Again and again, touching roses,
And biting her on the mouth, trying to poison this Reason into her, while the traffic waits out in the shadows,
And the fireworks hold their breaths,
Wondering, and wondering when they will be lit off Again just so that they can once again kiss all of the lips of The goldfish of their tomorrows.

Goldilocks And The Spear Of Longinus

Daddy laid me down in bed
He said,

"I saw Goldilocks
In the surf up to her
Breasts holding the Spear of Longinus
The caps of waves
Swirling in little red pools
Sunlight riding hoods
Of the giant beasts circling
Her.

I yelled, 'Goldilocks,
What are you doing? '

Goldilocks replied in the Sun,
"I've already killed 3
Grizzlies and ate their Porridge,
Slept in their beds too-
Now I'm sporting
Deadlier prey.

Come in
And kiss me
If you dare."

"Did you kiss her? " I asked Daddy.

"No, " he said. "I was too afraid.
So I married your mother."

Gone

No perfumes at nighttime- the house does not Proceed, does not lie yellow
Spangles of family against family- does not Read by the luminescent lights
Nor do soft feet cross and bless the foyer:
Bachelor's room without a dog to spell by-
And the flowers do not bloom,
But up in the morning after super time:
School again, and yards and yards of students who
I cannot look in the eye- after years of passing,
Will they finally be gone:
And like them, will I finally have her echoes finally Then out of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Gone Into The Sky

Birds of crayons and Water snakes,
Unlearned birds in the Firebreaks;
And otherwise the wheels of the Sky are-
They are a long shot over ever
Getting dry,
But they spin and they put off
Spit;
They go a long ways between
You and this:
While the pastels surcease like
Busted lips,
And still all I have to give you
Is this to make up for Everything gone into the sky.

Good American Man

Robert loves it with his name slipping
Into nothing, and becomes John;
Like a kid in a paper airport with perfect
Teeth,
Puts a quarter in the machine when machines
Cost a quarter,
And the quarter disappears like the sun in the West: This is America,
This is why I groom early for the coffin-
There are only so many trees in the forest,
So many gifts for young men to sleep-
She turns over in the night, and wakes up in My hand- I want a stewardess whose legs over-
Slip the folds of my paper airplanes,
Which gives good meaning to my play-
A woman in a blue suit who takes it off half
Disposed in the aloe beside the carport- God knows:
Vortexes and hurricanes of ceiling fans-
Men in trench coats writing the news, breastfeeding
Army ants:
We drive keeps to battles while paper snows
Flakes fall in the long-nosed estuaries of sleeping tanks;
And yes, I know it sounds so good, to become aboriginal America, the sick white muse- Then you can Watch college football, and know your teams,
And you can come home to die with dignity,
The death rattles of the heart in the cages of its dusky
Obsessions:
Red roses in the horn of tin for a corpse at twenty-five.
We can choose to do anything we want with
Our lives,
And that is why this evening, thoroughly tanned,
I've named myself John- A good American man,
I would never drink my liquors with Charles Baudelaire.

Good Chance For Rain

When there is lightning, I want to be close to You, and help you gather chickens under the Propitious stars,
And listen to you clucking what it means under
The new rafters of a Pacific home;
With your eyes abolished like nocturnal flowers
Greeting the dawn and laying off the boys,
Kill my lines for you, finish of the glasses around
You neck making them resemble a homeopathic
Spell- like an object in a morning class,
Whispering to you in the dysfunctional language
Of boys gathered from the comely harvests of France:
That I've had two dreams of you over the last Fortnight: One was just that you'd left your backpack
And gone off wandering, searching for wild berries
And sustenance, but last night I kissed under long
Moments laying here with my loaded rifle,
Mystified by the constellations around your bereavement-
But I'm still in Arizona, perhaps higher than any grave Yard on this continent, and by Tuesday of next week
There will be a forty percent chance for rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Good Cheer

Now broken and as sad as the shadows I live
In underneath the overpasses
With the unicorns and bums:
Over which the paper airplanes her father folded
Bend down so low,
So low that they figure that they have to kiss
Me and this is how they go—
Even though, abracadabra-ick,
They have never seen the inside of the mountains
And the spaces that they live in are not
That rich just two bedroom one
Bath apartments—
Which I closed my eyes and taught in once or twice
For two years—
Condemned by the faculty and the administration
That all I was doing was giving them
Candy.
But this will end their fears:
I am a space ship made of freshly baked bread
And fish,
And none of your classrooms will read
Me unless they want to wish:
And remember that a cadaver lords over the ill-
Forgotten seas,
And comes up before the winter
To pray and bend his knee
To the cenotaph of the waves that crashed
And drank such bouquets
Of poetry, like sharks who dined on sailors' legs:
Well, I am right here
And I am in memory—
My wife is waking up in time for supper—
And Santa Claus is getting ready to give away
Good cheer.

Robert Rorabeck

Good Kid

You are a good kid even
If your eyes don't match
And I drink too much rum from Brazil
Or Cuba or the middle of the sun—
And it isn't the easiest of things—being fit for it—
In the middle of the day after your Girlfriend ran away
Because she was too beautiful—and dumb—
And there were no more fireworks left
To sell—
But in the morning—the roosters gave to us their Echoes—
And it was that very anonymity of things that Seemed to resurrect us to our jobs:
Like the turtles to their canals—
The conquistadors to their cenotaphs—
The used car salesmen to their Christmas trees—
And you to some other classroom across the school—
But your bravery is a calling card—
And I can tell your fortune to the sun and the moon—
And the children will come out of the southern theatre—
Echoing recreationally until their mouths are Filled with ice cream—or the mirages of their Mothers' cleavages—which seems to imply that the entire World can do fine without you—
Even though it cannot—
The airplanes are jut mirages bouncing off a hot pan—
Even after your heart is twisted enough—
And scarred—and, oh, what a memory to behold until
There is nothing left—and the tents have been taken down into
The palmettos, and the cat is licking herself-
And then the entire family of the forgotten memory is heading
Like a rocket into Disney World—precisely as I had imagined-
And fantasy and imagination where I thought
I had forgotten you suddenly found out that she could do
A fine job of taking care of herself—
And forgot herself in your eyes—and you became a blind man
And sold used cars like your father—
Until the night spread its feathers and filled the faces

Around the sidelines of the flea market we couldn't even Go to because the hurricane scared away the pedestrians-
And that was the night I finally figured out you would Be spending the rest of your life with your husband.

Robert Rorabeck

Goodbye

Building up dreams in palatial hair suits of loneliness:
Where the most diligent but fool hearted climbers disappear
In the highest slip:
And, like this, I have undressed you: I have listened to my Fingers play upon your instruments:
I have taken off your panties and wept beside you naked:
I have petted and cleaned the twin sisters of your Head;
And I have submitted quietly as a thief, but going down my Sorrow was not brief,
For now I have all of these songs suckling like nascent swine,
Like hungry Mexicans fighting for the truck at picking time;
And so I swore to you today that I would take you to The playgrounds of Disney World,
Even though I do not like Disney World; and you get mad
At me when I do not bring you enough fireworks:
But my entire house can burn, and I can tramp and hop trains
If you don't believe
That this isn't the same as dying like unkempt flowers into A priceless graveyard, or however else that I was supposed to End this poem:
Then went out into the sea like an empty bottle begging for
A thoughtless home.

Robert Rorabeck

Goody-Goody

Swimming with the cadavers of the young,
We pledge allegiance to the flag.
We didn't quite finish school,
But we don't feel half-bad;
And there's a bird that doesn't swim,
And a girl in training wheels quite young in
The retirement home kicked back
Between the palms;
And a good friend of mine takes his paycheck
From the government,
While you come home and cook for him,
And look at him in his eyes,
Goody-goody;
And when I was in the valley listening for the waves,
Weren't you in a dream I had,
You politely asked me if you couldn't feed the horses;
But who cares,
You rolled away with him, and the credits rolled
Like caesuras:
I held my hand over my heart; it became that broken
Watch melting in its bows-
Then there was just a prick of sun in the caesuras
And the final scenes they never showed,
As children played a game in the sand:
Goody-goody.

Robert Rorabeck

Gorgeous Folklore

Her eyes fill with the cups of trances,
And I am getting things wrong, still not a Diabetic like my grandfather, I think of Going to work in Disney World to write
Novels of utter fantasy, for I will not loan
To my parents what I do not deserve,
And still she is there made of naked pearl
Entering the subway; there is a tornado
Dancing against her backside. He is tossing
The rains like the tears of conceiving mothers,
But she goes away and on the tram circulates
The magic kingdom, coming out of the darkness
To the sound of trumpets, her breasts like
Cherry sundaes. There is a wolf above the rafters,
And he is panting, but only a cartoon.
The black men inside with her are what is real.
They have scars of pure empathy, though they Are too dark for it, and it is from them this Whole thing springs, the gorgeous folklore
They carried with them shackled in the debasement
Of waves, Mickey Mouse and Minnie hunting
Nubile in the toony jungle, and the wolf panting
With eyes of unmined diamond, and all the children
Are laughing, laughing at what they've seen;
And all upon her are the trunks of feminine ivory,
And the black men they are on her, trying to prove
What was stolen. I am there but lonely, a ghost
Of the post-modern, just an infantile notion,
And down beneath us the children are playing,
And bright balloons are floating, and the jungle is Well-organized and lucrative, and the ghosts are Phony floating, and the fireworks are twirling,
Constructs fleeting above the Styrofoam parapets,
And all around this we go circulating, and she is A wanton princess whom the black men are courting,
Like primitive knights drawn to her temples, sweating:
A notion of satellites which will never end, though
She has called the tornados up for what is owing,
And my eyes, like flames, are floating,

Fill from her eyes, pouring cups of pearled trances.

Robert Rorabeck

Gorgeous Youngish Things

Spilling water like drunken wishes out into the space

Of nothing:

Yes, yes, yes: this is the last Aristotelian plane of nothing,

And it has proven to be up to no good: no more haircuts under the

Moons of quieted nothing:

No more haircuts for nothing, Melanie: and why, oh why I am

Singing to you, and seeming to swim toward you coyly just like a

Jelly fish or tadpole,

Because you cannot love me, because I am not beautiful,

And this is nothing given up like a song in an auction:

And the days go by and your children develop, grow long legs

And spearmint arms: and what, oh what am I doing:

Oh, but the old classroom is dimmed but still coming on,

And the skyways go on a ways, and I just want to buy a house under

The pestilence of satin moons:

I just want to be excepted and to lay low: I don't wish to rob any more

Trains, but look into this another bag of fireworks, spinning and

Twirling around just like a bungalow of circle jerks;

And your children; Oh your children have the most beautiful eyes,

But only beautiful, just half as beautiful as my eyes gleaming;

And my eyes licking: yes, my eyes cleaning, and sucking and cleaning

Straight in between the straight of your greedy young dragons of your Gorgeous youngish thighs....

Robert Rorabeck

Gorgeously Penniless

Toil nettled in the sun,
The abandoned hand with fingers clutched
As if a tool of desire furling,
Blue ants crawl inside the pewter thumb,
Resting on the temple of the abandoned lot
Naked for the cars happening sporadically across Captures in the web of sinewy power lines,
Hollow buildings of cinderblock tattooed
By the names of loveless dolls,
Their gaze in the perpetual sheen of tinted windows;
Visions dimming as the hearts burn out,
The humming of the engineer's bib.
The river goes falling from her zoned thighs,
Down to the million dollar sea
Where real boys are conducting trade,
Epiphanies of enterprise, jet planes run
The glowing conduits above the docks of stone,
Where the sea is lapping the city's caving shelf,
But she is just a defaced infant immobile
Beneath the slanted beams, the invisible squabbling
Of the gold-toothed franchise,
She keeps her secrets in the sharp glass garden,
And the weeds which flower like Scottish queens,
A burning scar over her eyebrow where the man
Who once loved her touched her like a blistering dune,
Came down hard on her poverty-
She waits gorgeously penniless for the rest of the Body to come and claim her,
While the ants go marching one by one down into her bosom,
To get out of the rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Gossamers For Puppets

Old men who used to be convicts
Sleep near the sea—
For a thousand miles up and down—
Old men,
And white birds,
Anything but vultures circling above
The miserable clouds,
Like a story book for kidnapped girls—
Like long lines waiting for a popular
If moribund movie—
With all of the possible hairpin turns
Played out—
And gossamers for puppets—not Yet real boys—still on strings.

Robert Rorabeck

Gossips Of Esoteric Rain

Her eyes held all the playbooks and the strangely wonderful
Mechanisms of golden simulacrum,
And I fell on top of her like a beautiful bridge going down
Over the smoky streets of London:
I tasted her in my mouth like the watering hole for unicorns,
And she never once questioned my face:
Her brown skin was perfect, even holy, and wrapped up in my Cheap blue sheets it was almost a prayer:
That is what I did for her: I kept on telling her I loved her,
While the men fixed the end of the street with their Heavy hammers,
Which were drowned out by us, and the bed moved across the room
Like the forest returning to Dusanine,
And bringing with it soft kisses throughout the glorious Gossips of esoteric rains.

Robert Rorabeck

Goyems' Goodtime Variety Show

Oh, the days flip: they flips so well!
At lunch, on the swings, lets have chicken and noodle
From our thermoses and out our noses,
A midday sort of feverish eclipse,
Pausing for a second along our arc for a word from Our sponsors.

Then we'll go into the cool museum and look at the breasts
In oil and pastel- The inkle blots of bruised areola and Roundish nipple, the mermaids are in the lapis lazuli tide,
And they are so young,
But they've been working at it for so long.
They are real professional, and can swim for any sort of poses.

Now why don't we line up and sing
With this Finnish chorus line, and click our fingers
And bob our heads and pretend we're only
Fifteen again, and British and snide. Alright?
All right- And we'll stay up until morning and on and
On and watch nude anime and swing in the orange tree out Back of our cerulean abode, and ride on the backside of
The torpid alligators, switching them with spikenard Alamode.

While they'll study math and what not, we'll Have nothing to do, but flick our boogers and color in Books of Shakespeare and Marlowe. We'll take out
Our knives and have impromptu get togethers and cut off
Little pieces of our flesh and feed it to them fishes, and then throw away
The evidence in the low tide, and watch the claret dye sashay
Very fine- Very fine- If that's what we'll do, then all
That's what we are-

The midnight shift, the checkout boys,
The kids who missed the bus- We sing kind of cockney out in Loxahatchee- Even if we do be part aborigine-
We'll do just fine until the real guys get suited up for the main
Show, the big deal, and then we'll slip out back and peel
Our rubber shoes until they smell like the aftertaste of a

Real insouciant sort of hell.

By the third act we'll be so high,
We'll be Icaria with paper wings held together by Sealing wax. We'll put our fingers to our lips as we fall into The sea, or the backseat, a grinning cushioned death on her
Purring lap,
And her eyes will swing above her lips, so pursed like roses,
Curious aboriginal roses
Wondering who might we be;

But that, as we know,
Is just who we are;
It was so easy getting here, and we'll take what we Get by the back seat.
Cause no one else wanted it,
That's what we got: Petals bending lower, guessing
Who we are.

Granaries Of The Sky

Compassionate will be my new University;
And I will sing of flowers by which I Cannot explain,
And I will lie alone with make-believe cats
And read William-Carlos Williams:
I will toast my dead aunt,
And bight my lip over the alive one-
And even in the afternoon rains the traffic
Will come, this way and that;
And if my house should be beautiful enough
Why then look at the healthy ivy on the trellises
Going upwards above the clouds like a Commercial fairy-tale, taking its notions by Mark Twain: I will love great men more silently
That I did before,
But will be just as removed from the rest of the country,
And still as disabled by my patriotism for the Beautiful bodies of girls who could never understand,
Bartenders,
Bartenders, by their auburn light I've made the world
Of good polished wood, but they haven't set down the Glasses of their job and given me a kiss in, Oh!
Who knows how long- They love other, sweeter men,
Who've never spoken to them by the body-prints of Airplanes, sent their love letters on the clean pressed
Lingerie of flight attendants:
That I should do this, and worship in the long since paved Rock garden where the dogs killed the lucky rabbit,
And I do,
And I sit with her on the easy roof and we wait
For the sky to turn pink and bring to us the revelry of The sea's combing obsessions,
As she still does everyday for me.

Robert Rorabeck

Grandeurs Of Mountains

Grandeurs of mountains in their most solemn of echoes:
I bought my rum today nearest the airplanes,
After I jogged and had a difficult time looking at my face in the Rearview mirror,
After old memories came more clearly into view:
And right now I can put you into a severely opulent pool:
Alma, I can let you swim right here,
With your body as brown and as tremendous as the elephants who fly
With their ears,
Because they are spectacularly unreal, and yet they have so much
Unreal love:
And you can laugh at me, replacing my he's with your j's,
But it will be no less unreal:
I know you read these words that I give, just like at night the nocturnal
Song birds eat them the seeds that I scatter in the low branches
Around the trees of my house,
While your eyes slip away with your breath into his armpits,
While your parents pay the mortgage of your little sagebrush house;
But I can love you forever, Alma:
I can buy you a bicycle- I can buy you a canoe;
I can do anything for you Alma, but I cannot do as you wished,
And stop writing these songs for you.

Robert Rorabeck

Grapes On A Vine

You cooked for him a baby like brisket
That grew into your soul;
And now your soul jingles:
Your soul has a soul.

Robert Rorabeck

Grass And Trees

I'll drink the tears, after the genie has Deceived you underneath her tree, while the busses
Wait beside the portables,

And the schools and libraries are closed:
And it is a beautiful world, filled with grass and trees-
The students walk through here,
And the most beautiful girls with scabbed knees

While the tortoises snore-
And heavens daydream in their perambulating
Estuaries- and the foxes lay, fat bellied-

They are counting the housewives leaping the grapes
Of the vineyard like candle flames:
And seeing what they've been growing,
The simulacrum finally arrives at the predestined
Conclusion

That he is a real boy.

Robert Rorabeck

Gravedancers Union

They're modifying you in your sleep somehow;
While you sleep they're milling around
And studying, rubbing their legs together making
The eerie chirping sounds;
They're shedding old shells for you,
They're coming unwound....
They're modifying you in your sleep somehow
They're passing you around
They can't figure out what to do with you,
How to handle what they've found
They can't figure out what....
They're modifying you in your sleep somehow
They've removed the top layer of your fleshy gown,
But they cock their heads like curious dogs,
Because they still don't know what they've found....
They're modifying you in your sleep somehow,
They're digging you a home in the ground,
They're digging your hole in the ground,
But they're still not quite sure what they've found....

And I have to say you
Look good, real good, with all of us standing around,
But whatever it is we want from you
I don't know
I really can't say what we've found....

Robert Rorabeck

Graveyard Of Sunbeams

Clarity under the moon of a little house
In the little sanctuary of a village lactated from these mountains
That swells in the season of the tourists,
But otherwise is nocturnal: somnambulant village where are You now—where I spent half a decade of my life kowtowing
To my father as he bought more and more horses—
Disappearing into an entire estuary—or a carport where my Mother burned herself in Pieta to the song of the frogs
Against the rebar and the bluegills in the canal—
In that place where my aunt now disappears:
What awareness is there where the scotch pines are so burned
That no one will buy them for Christmas and all of her fabulous
Tits are so blackened—and my wife doesn't call,
And now even the mountains are all gone—
And there isn't a muse in the world that ever loved me,
And you know that you went off to college without me—
And the kites that we once shared are all stuck in the mangroves
Against the beach where we forgot to share each other,
Where the angels seem to burn hidden against the jellyfish
That always look up to her even in their graveyard of sunbeams.

Robert Rorabeck

Graveyard Shift

Without music a body is
So alone,
Even with the dogs beside him,
He's drunken too much caffeine
To shut down,
And its 2 am,
And tomorrow the sun will Rise to Chanticleer,
But for now the celibacy resides
Until his body shivers like a little girl,
And he is left with all her pictures,
Smiling quite beautiful,
With the men and strangers;
The world is utterly naked and white,
But she should never be his lover,
For she can do as little for him,
As he can do for her,
And up town, and downtown are useless,
As quotes from a bible,
While other girls in their own religion
Douse close to lawyers,
And nothing changes,
And the novel lays unready and Misspelled, and the greater lunatics
Are already underground,
And the rest of the class is conforming
To the graveyard,
Where the song ends, where the song ends
And not another quarter for the bolero,
The scars quieted and defenseless,
A routine laying still and restless;
Thus a song has ended, but not another
Song resumes,
And even the dogs do not howl.

Robert Rorabeck

Graveyards Of More Familiar Haunts

She doesn't like you,
She just wants you to make believe:
Look, there are the shadows: go there, grief:
While I fatten my body with all of this Liquor:
While I become a Christmas turkey, and the passengers
Look up, blessing god, as their planes
Touch down,
And their little worlds attribute to their larger arrangements
And dinner parties
That I have volunteered to leave from, to step out
In the mowed yard, listening to the kittens
And to the fountains,
Spilling myself alongside the traffic- beginning to Forget myself, scarred and bludgeoned:
This is the way I will go now- a pilot of a wolf,
My words sounding through the abandoned estuaries of Gutted houses,
Looking for a place to bare my children from these wounds
That the homeopathic silvers have kissed, slightly
Before retreating like terrapin into the pockets
And graveyards of more familiar haunts

Graveyards Of Trapped Penumbras

Fortified wines how typically Un-unusual you are-
The base garden of your eyes
Dirty soda pop-
Phosphorescent depth charges,
And you'll find me alone
In weed-clung gardens-
Counting loose change and Scars-
Nothing I've had to said is Unusually beautiful-
Only but inebriate,
The birds aren't beautiful
Either, and see if
I don't give a d$mn for you
Usually unusual eyes-
Beautiful- cheap- eyes-
Fresh graves of brothers and Sisters,
Graveyards of trapped penumbras.

Great

All the cherished lives building chicken coops
Up into the Ceruleans of ceiling sky where the Titans were Once rude,
Those old, basketball playing gods, like the crushed
I had way back in freshman year
With palindromes and Tarpon: I was already like the old man in the sea,
Wearing old shoes and skipping gym;
And masturbating- and masturbating:
Then my venal and my sick muses were a still far Off threat;
I was still in shop class, and not failed at Latin;
And the only angels I knew lit up for Christmas:
But this sky is not new-
There are dead kittens in the drainage of the sky,
And his brother died young too:
And Sharon is in Colorado, and busted:
She will sing until the mine falls down, and the clouds
Slanting like green cannons in a sinking ship;
And they lie down like exhausted and dying hikers
And sigh at the last;
And I will cut your hair in the night with the politicians;
And I am writing now- and I haven't smoked
Since I felt my Disney World right next door to the canal-
Diana is single again, and Anibal wants her;
And might have her, and my cheeks are cherry red:
Diana is single again, because of my song she heard whispering;
My beautiful song she wanted from me,
She may never hear again;
And Erin didn't admire the opening; she doesn't like poetry,
But the opening was as perfect as the going out:
And this is the coffin floating like a gondola in Paris,
And I am presumptuous for I am already great.

Greater And Lesser Tells

Who cut down the celebrities,

The limbs of method acting wither
Along the path weeded with stars,

The footprints, like cheap astronauts
Waking up in the lunar park-

Give haikus to the girl
Working the drive through window,

Because you can read her name
Painted in glitter in her nails,

The tells of the trailer-park slumbers,
Fearing the Hassidic tornados,
The foolish paths of gilded men

Fly like paper airplanes on Park Avenue
Thrown out the window by little boys.

Greece

Easy days of kindergarten are gone:
And who is left who reads my garden?
It is better that pretty girls
Surf, so young and so long- their bellies wash boarded
Their pubis thonged:
And I will get out of their way like this,
Remembering jealous girlfriends
Because the anonymous flirt showered naked next to me,
And the tortoises panted hidden in the brush
Except for their star-flint eyes;
And my starfish has cracked for another man,
And she watches soap-operas all afternoon,
And gives her kittens plastic violins to play with-
She looks so good when she always takes the bus,
And she knows how to enjoy the exhumed
Smells when one of her two dogs fart;
And she is getting so good as to distinguish:
And tuna-fish,
And I want to rob graves with her; and I want to go on honey Moons with her to places we last talked about on the Phone when she asked me if I liked to travel
And then hung up,
And made me think I was a ghost full of conjunctures,
Filled with the sad absence of her time
Which would ripple outwards in an endless lake,
In the weathers of her somber absence,
Lost in a nature preserve, starving on knuckles of white
Ham,
In a beautiful atmosphere of nightmares that would never End.

Green Axes

Wounds on a face that has to return to work in the Morning while the sky is still a crucifix,
And the snails curl underfoot with the terrapin:
There are diamonds on the path of lost children,
But they lead nowhere: not even to witches,
Or the hapless knights up in their Christmas trees
Whose green axes were once known for taking down
These woods
Through which the pointless weathers bluster:
And the mountain lions yawn, like roses up from the footprints
Of overzealous geodes who once discovered are taken
Up and admired for awhile,
While the elk forage through the sleet and hale;
And then finally, they are set down again: and the old
Forest is burned away, until even more beautiful girls come
In to a house opened to the sky- and sit together in A church of cryptic sorority, praying
For the flowers to come again, never once taking anymore
Account of me.

Green Banks Of Vermillion Snow

Now it has to be so awful,
Drinking my five dollar wine after all of the fireworks
And birthday cards;
After the night has shown itself to the door,
So only the words come: you would think so softy
As to occupy with little girls in their bedrooms in soft
Shoulders
There; but not there, for just as suddenly the serpent uncoils
By the new energies of moonlight,
Striking like liquor from the curious basins of its amusement
Rides:
It strikes right out and marks her, playing in her band
While she was sleeping with another man
Up in her tree forts or her dorm rooms:
As the wine or liquor drips down like tears,
Like sweat in a garden and in the adulterous trees,
While her son is yet to live and then yet to go away:
And in tomorrow, promising, I climb up the facades of mountains
Just to swear to her,
My fingers grasping arrow heads and pottery: my dogs licking
Their wounds stories below:
And she awakens tomorrow, her eyes undressing a world of its Green banks of vermilion snow.

Greetings

Tongue the lightning-lord,
The cowboy plowing dust in
The beat up Ford:
Shush the baby ripening on
The umbilical cord:
Clap the green knight's neck
With the sword,
Then notice then:
She is marrying the strong men,
Traveling sales-men,
Nautical heroes, seamen:
The golden skinned Jason,
Their loins in engorged juxtaposition:
Another drunken mother
Laughing in his harem,
Lying down then in
The sky's bend, unworrisome:
Her hair undone, her dress undone:
Her eyes unwound to the skies,
Her lips balmy and practiced,
Her limbs like resting kines
Waiting for the new fragile
Butcheries to come in,
Greetings.

Grey

A peaceful color, grey.

Something to turn into as you exhume time,

The traditions of mothers and fathers

Becoming slowly immortal: grandmothers,

And grandfathers, and so on, and so on:

Tortoise grey:

Fire breaks which distil the flames of youth,

And douse the tendencies for strangling suicides,

And speeding on confusing highways:

Grey of professors, and grey of established

Thespians:

Wiser uncles who have given up on the family

Business and taken to wearing spectacles,

The grey of the scuppernongs on vines of

Chain-link fences in northern yards beside

Sprawling lakes,

The grey of the first cat who was your reward

For learning to go where you should go

When you needed to,

Grey of thick rope trustworthy by ships for

Knotting anchors,

And grey for the frothing sea in a tumult against

The foreign hull, like a splinter in the unfathomable

Gullet:

And grey for the sky when the earth is furthest away

From the sun, when rain freezes and becomes

Gentler falling and a deadlier paradox,

Grey for mice who are not cartoons,

Grey for the mothers' closing wombs,

Grey for some of her eyes,

Grey for long good-byes,

And for the German Shepherd's panting tongue,

Grey for that part of the moon shyly in the shadows

Watching her from the sky,

Grey for the inevitability of true loves which come with

Time, after the stores are closed and the nights

Are all but empty save for the red leaves threatening

To tear away,

Grey from the lovesick heart walking alone the empty avenue,

Grey for the silent movies and phone calls,
And the birds who never learned to fly.
Grey is the open hand waiting for you,
And the open tomb.
Grey will never be Japanese, but eventually Everything else will find grey, but find my lips
As I find you,
And we will find grey together.

Grim And Dusty Ship

Grim, grim and dusty ship
Where are you going as light
As a pip

Out above the far out yards
With their housewives playing triangles
Like a chorus line of Open-mouthed clams.

Growing Up Far Away

These days are lonely and humid,
And the year so far one long warbling trill
Filled with innocuous hunger,
And the hands of planets who have been Demoted into balls of ice,
And thus float so far away they have no
Recollection of the linchpin desires of modern Homo sapiens, and how the highways run
Distended and spilling over into
Other towns with all the same billboards,
Department stores, and drive-thrus worked
By the hair-lipped and greasy dispossessed,
But still closer than the other things,
The harder elements we have no names for,
Because they are so far away from the sun,
And they spin around and around like stone children
In their ellipses, and weigh so much that
They drag the lighter things around them,
And spin them like coy playing with wine corks
In a Japanese pond,
But if they have a color, it must be added,
For they are not orange, and their hearths do
Not blush, and they do not have a work ethic
Or awards ceremonies were doctors are hooded
And their lives turned into a dreamy soiree
Filled with easy hours, facile sex, and crumbs
Of salt and vinegar
Placed like cake by hummingbirds in the corners
Of their smirking mouths: This is the brightness of Our world, or so I am told by the body language of Lovers making the pleasant intercourse of interlocked
Fingers in the chirping parks, biting their lips over
The names of unconcealed children, the following Generations of amusement parks, while the darker things,
Those without skin or heart disease warble in
The fugue of unfathomable motes unrequited by the Celestial spheres, the folded maps of little towns with Steeple through which starving men walk with Bowed heads.

Guessing That We Do

I want a family of pretty girls to be smiling at me:
I want to be holding the last flame out before the Cadillac's
Of the last primitive estuary;
And this is my plight, crawling beneath the salty phalluses
Of washed out lighthouses:
I want to be a little boy attending my own funeral:
I want to be a thief who steals over bridges and into the women's Locker room;
And to taste the salt off the ankle bracelets of her ankles,
And to come down with her right here in the middle of nowhere as If it was my job,
And everything else in this dirty blue planet was lost and didn't
Care:
I want the architecture of her brown skin to hang in the arbor of My elbow after midnight:
And so we can listen to the trains and witches go by together;
And we can become not so sorrowful,
And I can smell like her uncaring right beside my coworkers
And my cousin who is taller than me
But whom Alma finds less beautiful; and I want to go with her
Until we become irrefutably lost up the swaybacks of gulping mountains:
So we lose sight of just about everything and making a dressing room out
Of evergreens undress and sing like songbirds feeding their Young to each other,
And go down and give her gold into the little cricks gossiping and Building up of otters,
So when the airplanes come again they seem just like gods
And we light up like diabolical candles of graveyards and amusement
Parks just about right underneath them:
And we run away together to the canyons of Arizona; and god helps Us after that, or just holding her arms into the crepuscule and Through the modern mailboxes after dark, listening to the last songs of A baseball game over the graveyards where no one happens to be Buried that we can remember to love; and yet we go together,
As the light bulbs of Ferris Wheels comb the night's migratory Brilliances, guessing that we do.

Guiding You In

The night tries to play catch up with itself:
I have never been in this room before: the house is as Quieted as your soul
In a low cut blouse- the gossip of the night whispering
Through the transoms of the house like
Sailboats through green storm clouds;
And you were not home, Alma- your shift was over
And you slipped away through the skiffs like paper snowflakes
And butterflies underneath the orange grove cliffs:
The ponies were as quiet as buttercups,
And the ghost of your child lay higher up in the roman ruins without A flag:
Your children moved like games across the marble,
And I pressed my lips to the soft brown skin that the morning's
Light stepped in to worship,
As the churchyard sang around you like a lighthouse giving off hope,
Guiding you in.

Gunfighter Of Roses

Put me in a coffin all beautiful at last,
A gunfighter of roses beneath the
Over pass;
Dressed up and laid out there so sweet
And fine, in the middle of the weekend
Flea Market with nothing on my mind:
(Nothing on my mind.)
The Mexican wives with maize and Turquoise tigers; praying to saints where
The herds of cars bluster,
They seem to sweep like four-legged angels
Through the sky;
And I'd think to say I love you,
But I had to go and die: (I had to go and die) ,
So there's no more reason for making bread,
And you can pass right through me with Unfaithful thoughts so untrue in your head;
And your gilded lover holding hands,
Buying anything you want for you second hand.
They've stolen my guns from me anyway,
And tossed them into the unruly sea;
There's no danger of me awaking and calling out
You pinstriped dilatants in the afternoon,
Your tinhorn firefighter so mustachioed and pressed,
Though I wished you could see how beautiful
It is now that you mean nothing at all to me,
(Nothing at all to me) ,
The lid of heartless wood closing above my chest.

Habitats Of Unicorns And Mermaids

What passions leave by themselves
From the sinking ship:
Aged body like a burned love letter
To the gods with gasoline on their lips,
Their beds the fireplaces of Unmatched juvenile truancy:
When, the poets in their youths,
Could not be touched—virgins masturbating,
Like great, muscle bound men with swords—
Giving themselves as heirlooms and Talismans to their muses—
Losing themselves in books,
As the girls they loved lost their Virginity to better endowed young men—
Girls who went out into the courtyards with Tennis-shoes and heartbeats—
And it was there that the sun struck across
Their unclothed necks
And seemed to want to get closer to them from A million miles away, or more—
Where the teachers had no thought about such Things—
But the girls grew up and married one or two Men who also had no such thought about such Things—and the boys who once dreamed
Of them married other women themselves,
Women they had accidentally called from so Far away—across so many canals that they Became oceans—
But still, in the fall, they sold pumpkins,
And the children grew up from them such as Weeds—so it was that even their beautiful dreams
Were not enough: they vanished,
Just the same as the fabled habitats of unicorns
And mermaids.

Half An Artist

I look so troubled with ringlets which Make like hungry mouths of little birds,
Or knots of wood around my eyes;
And is that why you are going, my pantomiming
Love,
Exiting the revolving stage, leaving the Audience in such a hush, never to reveal again
Your burnished areolas like sand dollars which Marked you as the half cousin of the mermaid
Topless at the biker bar somewhat inland
On the southeast coast of Florida?
I spread my lips and imbibe the poison which I must drink to expel the memory of you,
Like a German translation, like a slight holocaust
In sexy lingerie; but it's just pulp fiction-
Over eager, I've begun digging up the roots of The dragon's teeth Cadmus planted before his friends
Were fully formed and riotous,
And so it is with you: Even with all these scars,
Battle wounds, truancy badges which should send you
Whistling at me from out the bus while you head home
Towards the zoo,
I never learned to wait until the rains had gone to unpackage
The dozen roses,
To sit them like a resting vagabond next to the Mewing kitten up the cinderblocks of your steps;
Both of us wanting in and milk,
and so I am only half the artist,
The spotty hullabaloo, the conquistador out of armor
Easily masticated by the greater blue beastly things;
Only semi published in half aware fits.
My house is sold, and I can see you through the window,
How that giant of the man has you all unclothed and folded
Up in him;
But I am still dreamily swimming like a dazzled fish in its Living room bowl, thinking that this is the entire ocean,
And your eyes such heavens to gaze and delight upon.

Halfway Home

Up in their castles battling for air,
And not a single one of their beauty coming down
To bed me:
Me like a cormorant and the gulls a sisterhood in her
Bivouacked cathedral,
Her logic sweet- stolen from the apiary, and that a delusion of
The Ferris Wheel,
Turning around backwards on itself, molestations of Sticky apples and other fruit
That will not heel:
Plymouths and flaming swords showing on the streets underneath
The palm trees,
The way that sometimes mermaids bask in the brine of daylit
Televisions, of teenage boys skipping school-
When, all of a sudden, it all feels out, looks lonely, and under The hood- the plagiarism of all of those heavens,
Of empty baseball diamonds overlooked by witchcraft:
And me getting all of it, sad-footed on an empty lot,
Halfway home, out of school:
Wanting to kiss orchid in the canal, not wanting to say her name:
Bending over it, as if in acquiescence, but not going all of the way.

Robert Rorabeck

Halfway Knew What I Mean

I've dropped the book of Wallace Stevens in the crook of My fold out bed, Alma;
Along with my empty liquor bottle; but lucky me, I have another
That isn't so empty;
And now these things spill, and I wish that I had known you before
That you were real,
While all of this was going down, and your children were still capped
In your virgin town:
Oh, Alma, I cannot sing- I can only stutter after school in the depths of Apoplectic weather; and the white curls only find me
Halfway curious, while the ball is being passed around,
But even in the penumbras of moon glows the grass is so curious
And so green;
But Alma, oh Alma: If you only halfway knew what I mean.

Robert Rorabeck

Halfway Up The Mountain

I am not doing it right now, not hitting it home:
I haven't traveled out much,
I haven't even been to town- I just saw one cloud
Halfway up the mountain that got me excited
About you, and otherwise turned me on:
And the cowboys came down pin wheeling their Horses across the steep esplanade
And I held my dogs close to me like two daughters in
The yellow shade,
And they tipped their hats to me, and some twirled
Their guns,
And on the summit they'd planted a miniscule tattered
American flag,
Which made me dream of you,
And I laid half naked under the watch tower,
Pretty sure that there would be no forest fires, because
The trees were getting naked-
And the entire hemisphere wore the most cerulean of hats
And it made me think of you,
And made me otherwise excited- I was real ashamed
That I made no sacrifice,
Being only a single father and rather poor,
Always having to take a few nips now to get anything out,
And I rippled quite consumptive in the sun shower
And the virulent wildflowers who were closing shop-
I remembered I only saw you once through all of college,
And the airplanes leapt like frogs
And I wept and got on all fours and picked wild strawberries,
But they were hardly enough,
And the other tourists laughed,
All of which, you know, made me think of you....

Robert Rorabeck

Halloween

I met a woman
Named Halloween.
She was already
Married.
She was a distant
Relative.
Her eyes were candy
Her lips were candy
Her legs were candy too.
When everyone was
Away
She played tricks on
Me.
She gave her treats
To me.
Halloween
Undressed
And prowled around
The room
And through the house
Our shadows
Detached and made
Love
In the laughing flicker
Of Jack O Lanterns
Until Sunset
And the night's Parade
When strangers came
Knocking on the door,
Married men,
Distant relatives,
Uncles whose names I
Can't remember.
Each time she gave Herself to them,
French-kissing them
Pressing against them
Her dribbled sugars

Through the threshold.
Her name was Halloween.
Her eyes were candy.
Her lips were candy.
Her legs were candy too.

Hallways Of Another Careless Day

School in another day of clouds, where song birds
Slip into words,
Hurrying the boys to class, and slipping the girls at
The water fountains into all sorts of narcolepsy:
Then there will be toy boats in the streams,
And paper airplanes molting underneath the flecks of Red holly on the other side of the canal.
Even though the cat may be dead
And may even be eaten away by its platoons of Ants,
The rabbits that ran away can still watch you from Where they love—on the other side of the shell rock
Road—in their hideouts of pornography—
As another sun trumpets its rigamoral through the Hallways of another careless day.

Hamburgers Of Plate Tectonics

Hamburgers of plate tectonics be with my soul
As it teaches another hummingbird
About the housing market - beautiful menagerie
A thimble full of hollow bones
Floating over this catastrophe
Of the sea repossessing all of her holidays of Prettied homes.

Robert Rorabeck

Happenstances Of An Unreal World

I could have given you a pleasurable existence
Through all of these words,
While I've continued diving underneath all of The broken school busses
And paper airplanes- I could have shown you things
You should have never seen,
Instead of all of these banquets in twilight,
As you were coming down
And changing your clothes- my first muse, while I was still a virgin underneath the helium balloons of The hollow throats
While all of the rest of the high school was play football
And they could never speculate on these Estranging gifts- maybe I will run away again,
In order for you to become another muse,
Underneath the bleachers of Colorado or the spotlights of
The Catholic church,
Maybe I will save new promises for our broken family
While the frogs are singing light hearted
To the teddy bears of the chameleons who are always changing
Color: there they are, and there is their school spirit
Wherever it was- my mother is showing me,
As the clams open, revealing their infinite pearls,
As the airplanes spiral as if mobiles through the heavens,
As the trailer parks curl their pretty bangs through the Happenstances of an unreal world.

Happily Illiterate

Inconceivable, that she could
Have thought of me today, the one I
Love best and injure myself still deeper
Until I am thoroughly carved,
Petra glyph west of the Mississippi,
The river an incision, the spine in the book,
And we two pages, where I am a
Half-hazard illustration of her prose,
Shunting the swelled cerebellum with a plume
And ink, dabbing the labyrinthine bloom:
I have no other reason to crawl around these Lines, elicit the agony that I still Do not know how to spell; but a subtle
Scar from high school, ghostly she echoes
Through the turn-about where parents came,
And deposited us again into our separate estuaries,
Whose cajoling currents in time caused the Subtle amnesias which took us to other moons,
While I continued to swear by her earliest light
Mottled through the evergreen: Laughing,
She partakes of the fermentations of the salted bar,
Tossing back the citrus of anonymous piracies,
She looms, full mast and out the door,
Bosom the orbs which light the streets,
Her lips and limbs are luscious words,
I read to her, though she remains happily illiterate.

Happiness

I saw you riding your bicycle
Through the magnanimous puddles
In your dreams.
You were riding around in your Childhood, riding around without a care.
When you saw me standing by the verge,
You looked up and smiled.
I smiled back and waved at you
Then settled back beneath a shady
Tree and watched you playing with Your bright new toy.
You played all day and laughed,
And tossed your head back with joviality.
Then I could see that you were something
New and wholesome.
You were complete inside yourself,
And when you stopped to catch your breath
You would sometimes turn my way
And cast yourself on me with a friendly look.
I could tell you were trying to share your Happiness with me,
And for that day I felt warm and carefree,
As your presence made my worries crawl away
And hide in dark places,
So all I knew was you riding around Enjoying the motion of your being.
That was the only time I can remember
I was ever happy....

Happy Birthday

Then there was Colorado
The tourists traveled to, never once thinking of Aspen,
And the steep paths up which my mother was born
Into the cabin of a blind man
With her brother:
How they became lost together, suffering
Various metamorphosis, until
My mother smelled of lavender, and flew away:
And her brother dropped off the cliff
And into a trailer park,
Drinking himself into a working class epiphany:
And I thought of them together while I
Was alone,
And my mother was an attention in the sky,
Shining in the sun, wishing me a happy birthday.

Happy Birthdays

Rejoining through the sabbaticals of wonder,
Every day in a glorious prosthesis: how I hold you without Even feeling,
Not even coldness- the day pigeonholed with these rays of Marionettes,
Amputees growing stuff back like jellyfish triaged in the Sterile hallways of high school that doesn't Even feel anymore,
While the rain comes expectantly the way girls want things
When all they can see is their beauty in your eyes.

Happy Weekend

Now I've said too many things, as pensive as an apiary
Of afflicted numbers,
And now I question the space between our bodies, and how
To rush through that space to find you:
There you are another night as brown as your rabbits in the Clutches of his abusive arms,
And I don't want to think of you too long there, or I will walk
To your house again and sleep on your Roof:
I will pretend that it is another Christmas and slip treats through
The windows of your children,
So that they might love me, even though I know I can never Take the place of their father:
There are still other ships to sail, and the burning grottos
Lactating on the missing shores;
Maybe you have sisters there who you cannot yet remember,
But let me take you to them,
And then we can all drive to Orlando and spend a happy Weekend at Disney World.

Hard At Caressing Your Tide

Conquistadors like waves buried away,
Like beautiful orchards the Zephyrs suckle:
They comb over the pine trees on their way to filibuster
My old uncle;
And you are on your way like something quit sincere,
The crux for every fable:
As you go whistling along your way, I draw your this Still life on its table:
And in my mind your daughter burns like an effervescing
Candle;
And my sea of yearns reaches out to grab your sweet young
Panhandle, and serve myself breakfast from you in turns:
Your breasts the meat of a poultice for my flesh,
And your flesh the surcease of a poniard's aloe:
And I wish for you with every breath, as if a musician through
The fluted hollow;
Coming up upon me like the crest of every tide, ever part upon you
Like the wedding of a bride,
Filigreed and kindled, you come stepping side by side,
My wishes upon your body echoing like coins skipping through
The orchards of a mermaid's pride
Until I have all of my wealth planted deep inside you, and you have Come out to feel the cool of my words spoke to your lips,
Allowing my thoughts in like paper ships who in tomboy armadas
Work so long and hard at caressing your tide.

Hard Times

A bag of crooked angels
Mews like hungry kittens.
God slings them underhand
Into the reservoir
Because times are getting tougher
And he can't afford to feed them;
But as they sink,
Like blowtorched feathers
They burn like a bag of fireworks
In playful leaps and shoots
And he watches the weak little Demigods swim away
Like store-bought gold fish,
Like gold foiled leafs crinkled
In the demure light;
But their youthful, inexperienced bodies
Already attract the attention
Of convicts,
The children of the slaves,
The hungry pugilist fish
Who have survived
Molested into the wild.
The dark things swim up to the little Candle-flames,
The great snuffing beasts, circling.
Before he can see what happens,
God turns away,
Because if he cannot see then
He cannot say
And blindness is a brand of medicine;
So slowly, though still a teenager
In the affects of progeria
He shuffles back home,
His back bent from carrying Man's sinning
He hopes to sleep for awhile
Longer in his secret garden
Hidden in his backyard surrounded
By technology's new boom sounds:

The airplanes and delivery vans,
The power-lines and swimming pools.
Along his fence where life is still getting busy,
The busted virgins disrobing their wings,
Like alley cats screaming,
Having their filthy litters of crooked angels
God can no longer afford to keep them all,
The addicts of his glory
Strung out like Christmas lights
After they should have come down,
Because, for now, his season is over.

Hardy Sees Upon Writing Tess

Sleeping now on the open plateau
I see the gypsies arriving in bright display
Pouring like spring into the town,
Opening like the trap of flowers,
Lets see what they will steal.

A heart or two fluttering,
In the blue field nearby the quiet house
Where the farmer sleeps,
The maidens walk out early
And dance in a ring,
Virgin palms clammy and clasping,
Going round and around,
They are all chanting for a man.

Here he comes walking,
The gentleman of ancient ancestry:
He is a good man who will save many lives,
But will any of the naive woman find him,
Or will they choose the darker stranger
Now rushing from the hunt,
Smelling of all the things
He has killed and conquered
Disturbing the night,
He has stolen a name to suite him,
And as he moves he rends the world before
Him, causing the maidens
To gasp and hold themselves
From the galloping cold
Of this man, who will take many a maiden's head,
Though only one may call him husband.

Harvests

You fell in love with another man,
Though broken before you touched that God.
I saw the fine virgins dancing in
The early mornings
Careful between the bluebells who Saw us all,
Heads drooped and tearful
Bedecking the rest-stop on the highway.
Where I drove by ever so fast:
Defeated and sterile
North bound with the hammer down.
I could not rest.
The country was up in turmoil.
The ants boiled over the grass,
Eating the outstretched hand left unanswered
In the ditch.
The highjackers jumped the plane
Before it crashed....
Rich off the plunder they made vacant
Love to you on the roof of the carport
Outside your dorm room.
Where they landed
I never saw.
I never knew.
At night in the library
I floated past the moon.
In the womb of the mother
I kissed my Aristotelian shadow
And stole the words spoken by greater men
Who in different centuries serenaded your mothers.
At dawn,
The moose with the cadmium antlers
Trumpeted for sex
Before it click-clacked its extinction-
Annexed, I crawled back to your concrete lap,
But from that terrace your lips were bruised
From heavy petting-
Exhausted from thwarted attempts
At impregnation,

You would not let me in.
You sighed, "Go away, my love.
Go away."
You had sated on the fruit of strangely
Insignificant men....
And in no time at all,
I would leave you as you took their name.
Expelled,
You did not look back.
Rather, upwards your eyes lingered
As your long forgotten sisters
Curtisied demurely in the farmer's Unplowed field.

Haunted By Astronauts

Scars have windows, as fish have gills,
Clouds have mothers who remind them of How old they are;
And old boys want to do tricks,
And I pick her daffodils- She puts her hand in Wet clay,
And the potter's wheel spins-
And I've been thinking of her all day
As the storms trundled in, and rattled the sky
Like an empty coin tin-
She used to believe she could speak to animals,
And kept a very young serpent in her green
Corduroys; he told her she was part Cherokee,
And that was why she was so beautiful-
But it was a different lie than the one
He told me;
And back then, Scott read cards-
And the storks floated s-shaped over the screened
Jacuzzi, the orange tree rustled a piece of Torn story;
And I slept alone beneath the new born skies,
Practiced witchcraft close to midnight, conjuring
Your eyes: And death was so far away,
Like a long bike ride,
And you slipped so far away, and the moon grew
Fat and haunted by astronauts,
Which meant that god didn't believe in me,
I guess,
And the snake curled up like incense and told you
You were part Cherokee,
But that was a lie.

Having Forgotten The Taste For Her Living

They've stepped out now, they say to smoke,
The eyes of salient nimbus, excited violins:
Their legs the stretch of granddaddy longlegs
Surveying the pipes: When we were ghosts,
I cradled her ancient Hebrew curls, apoplectic
And stubborn, when we'd fight, though she hadn't
Yet admitted the problem wasn't in the figure,
Or my old truck marking ruts on the corner
Of the manicured lawn, with the single cypress Latchkeyed, drunken and swaying in the Eventual storms, but because she wanted to be Rich, or the appearance of that thing:
The values her parents impeded her uneven breasts,
My yellowed studio crawling with ants, and Blemishes, and down below naked lesbians cooing
In the pool; It was all wrong, so she left for the Summer for her sister's wedding, and I grew worse,
Took water coloring at a community college,
Farted and cracked nuts, and sated on uneventful porn;
But that was worse, how her eyes grew to terseness
And perfunctory like a rejection letter by a professor
Too lazy to read, or like a poem which has no sense
Of form, just tap-dancing like the rains on corrugations:
Now they sweat together, and have kosher sex,
Wedded by a rabbi, ate latkes, did the Ashkenazi dance;
Swayed me into the sleep of the purest of goyem,
Laid with a thorn intruded in the small of the back of The most innocent of mountains, hibernated and the Insouciance of rivers dammed by industrious otters,
Slapped by spawning trout, speckled quartzite and magnesium:
I was the rime smoothed and hidden by the tumble of Cataracts, curtained by the seeded ferns, unable To migrate, or do better, forgetting to spend my money,
Loving foreign women who got lucky at bars,
With no sense of tradition, no tempo, but areolas
I imagine which could circle the sun like greyhounds;
And I have yet to find my weapons, or the copper Button torn on the run, but the night is cyclical, and I am catching up with the disembodiment of my iron-

Willed foundling, and once together we Will compete in the quiet brilliance in the Red nooks of an unemployed campus, and
We will move and laugh with much ambition
And enjambment,
Having forgotten the taste for the living,
But will remain ever faithful beside the eternal
Graves of falling leaves, and poetesses
And paramours with cheeky scars, and Epitaphs in stone, we would lie upon
As if lying upon their flesh,
Waiting for the winds to bluster excitedly,
And moan in their wispy element,
Relocating into an estuary received by our Senses.

He Who Should Never, Ever Cry

I can tell now that everything is fine,
Because you've left the porch light on while you've Stooped that sweet youngish boy,
While I was out jogging the golf course pretending I could Be a major professor;
Or out breathless upon the steeper slopes of scree,
While he was under your cottage cheese blouse, fumbling
With pink fingernails of the presents of your crenulated
Flesh;
And I had to take my car to the carwash, and then for a checkup,
As the tortoises stared at me dull-eyed, hiccupped:
I bought you a plush green teddy bear once for Valentines day:
Do you still have him in some corner of your newly Cornered house behind the gate of your fabricated community-
This isn't something I think much about:
I stomp my boots- I zigheil, which is easy to do from Pluto
Without being lampshaded by all your anonymous ancestors:
Look girl,
I actually made it further in school than you, and that's because
In evening my phallus expels and greedily eats all the best orchids
Laid out as offerings by all the under-aged girls;
And even scarred, you were no competition, and I would not Wear your ring: You rode your bicycle while I jogged,
And it was an easy thing: Other girls looked through the Venetian blinds
While I masturbated- It was no special thing,
And even now I think of swimming away; I wait to hear from Some literary agent as I ejaculate, as I spume,
And the airships trundle in herds across the unbanished skies:
And the football players throw their games,
And I am the ever constant alligator eating the blue gills in the canal
Behind your house waiting for you to bare your inevitable
Children: I am he who should never, ever cry.

Headstrong Shores

Sharon, you don't live here: where do you live-
While our days wake up together, breathing in teams like goldfish
Who don't know who we are;
And they are digging up all of the deeper swing-sets because They are afraid of lawsuits,
And, Sharon, I am really worried that I will never get to smell you again,
Underneath the pitch-fork pines imported in from England,
Or anywhere:
Sharon, the problem was that I didn't know how to huff bouquets before
When I knew you; and now I want to hold your hips like a crutch,
Like canticle that means so very much;
And to relive you like a curse, and to fill my senses with your earthy
Purse:
Sure, you know, these bodies will go to sleep underneath the infinitely
Of welted snows; and the bodies that they breath will go;
Just as bouquets have children and fantasies;
But I want you knew again underneath my open window of senses;
I want to hold your body like something necessary for a cripple out of doors,
Because I know you are a good woman- and you will work
As a bosomy prosthesis for this man who is your Prometheus Stranded and punished in the infinity above your broiling and headstrong Shores.

Heart Haiku

I want to listen
To your heart which will prove
That my god is real.

Robert Rorabeck

Heartless Bicycle

Interacting with all of the catastrophe inside my Soul, listening to your children echo around your footsteps
Even as they fall'
And your heart spinning away 'the rain falling like Trinkets outside 'as if you were wanting to Return again to Mexico'
To see and kiss your children 'to remember what it
Was to be a foolishly welcoming bride.

Robert Rorabeck

Heather?

Do you give me the chance to glance at stars-
I used to lay on my back in the sweet suburban dunes and Affect such scars,
While the houses moaned and creaked like an armada
Of sailing wax ships, captained by mothers with Their own tennis courts and hand blown crystal:
Far out at sea the lions would roar, the fish would starve,
And I couldn't see where I was going,
But anyway it bloomed somehow, and I gave my stains
To the green rug like a Victorian garden,
Plastic army men died upon, Indians were defeated while Paper airplanes flew above and got stuck on the ceiling fans:
Their captains came over the intercom and said,
Everything was going to be so fine, and the roses stuck their Heads out from the crack in the drywall; it smelled like turpentine.
Grandmothers came by concrete rivers,
And their husbands with paper snowflakes. A Catholic girl Kissed my liver, and then threw it across the canal to see which Way it would break. Now the sky is overcast and I am
Expecting the commonly uncertain weather;
Today is my birthday, thirty some years- I can't remember;
But if I had a wife, I'd name her Heather, and salute her every Morning. Her legs would be a good reason for any old revolution,
And I'd set them as gently as kittens outside for the morning,
For the sun to play upon them, to weep and drive;
And I'd wind her up and set her out to get groceries, tuna fish
And glass cleaner and a box of matches so we wouldn't Have to starve.

Heaven Haiku

As long as you know
My name heaven seems Almost possible

Heavenly Hymn

I am Godlike in infamy.
Jesus Christ came down
Dressed in a man-sized
Planet and crushed me,
So I broke wide open,
A ripe geode from the Little girl's hands up to
Her eyes,
And my seeds spilled out
Like soft pearls over her toes,
Until I grew there, as God so commanded,
A humming meadow
Full of green holes
With two newborn
Aspen trees through
Which a slender bright
River sings, cascading
Down to the pool in the Palms of his thirsting hands,
Where wild animals
Gather and drink and Blue birds sing upon
His gentle fingertips.

Robert Rorabeck

Heavenly Scarred Adolescents

Then I will go to California to Look up:
Bottle rockets over a sharp and homeless
Field,
And razors of fiends in the park with Lights as blue as a church's;
And I will take flight,
Moving across the plateau we stole
From Mexico—
Underneath spaceships which seem like
Angels, and the airplanes their dogs:
The delights of a heavenly scarred
Adolescents,
A playground behind the steering wheel:
Looking up,
I will see mother and father and other old
Loves pretending to be real.

Robert Rorabeck

Heavy Pines

Bruise me again against the starless sky,
So that I might feel asymmetrical couched in the damp pines;
I can see your jocund face in the fusing light of a cigarette-
Your friends surround you like a fraternity of hazy secrets
Upon the temple of an unconscious giant out so long
They have decided to build a university down the side of his face
Where the winsome professors stutter like ants over
The weight of all the knowledge they have produced,
Distilled into a little brook of drool that disappears over the rim of His awesome jaw; Some kind of prism lights your space,
As you get ready to develop into a new creation,
Something with two last names, a bank account, and steady occupation; I remain where I was, where I am still, and continue as
The town leaves itself for my cousin specters; Listening
To your fond echoes, we wait for the largess to move us;
Until this, we are lost in the woods and the needles die and Cover your laughter, muffling the colors into sepia, and Drone out your smell like snow and volcanic ash;
But through the miasma of heavy dreaming, I see you onwards,
A painting in the far distance, just a silhouette now
Only I can remember watching bruised between the heavy pines.

Heirlooms Of Another Life

I have done nothing wrong-
But this is the curse of the proceeding afternoon:
Looking up through the horoscopes of Peeling, soft-brown yards- strictly speaking:
The Mexicans lingering, bodies like the first evidence of Autumn- as she goes out of me-
This muse who has promised me so much, like
The tide- the innocent sculptor underneath the airplanes-
She will go away again, and this time I cannot Linger to pick up the pretty shells revealed inside of Me from her vanishing:
I must go as well- into the heirlooms of another life
I must vanish,
As the lions yawn dismissively- they too have only kissed
So many men- and in their careless afternoons not
So many have thought of me.

Robert Rorabeck

Hell

Now real in a crooked harem of any sport,
Michelle, because my two good muses are dead:
Give me you and rum and five empty champers,
Give me immortality halfway through high school
In Catholic church with some cypress showing knee:
Do you care that I have gone,
Or that I was only beautiful for maybe a week,
And when I skipped, and when I sighed with my erection
I blew green smoke, and I stole condiments
And thought the sky was really something underneath the Lunch room where I first came and then ran away underneath
The school bus with that f%cked up terrapin;
And the alligators ranged, and you swung a good backhand and Performed on the sweet timber boards,
And laid down for the Chinese dragon of any men crooked
Enough to find available;
And I tried out for track for Erin, and was lapped by the Proverbial black man; and I didn't care, and spent
The rest of the summer in Arizona watching a house I also Didn't care about rising up- Blue monoliths that never Existed giving me erections which were temporary,
But always tremulous and refurbished in budding;
And then summer again, and oh well, graduation,
But you were a year before me, and your little dog is sick;
And I have obviously given up if tonight you are my muse,
Or I am in Hell.

Robert Rorabeck

Hello

It rained today
Coming down on our solar System,
Slicking our hair
Like cherry pomade,

They discovered a
Planet made entirely
Of tears
Where I carved her name;
It rings like pure
Glass.

I see her outside the Window moving away
Unopened packages in her
Arms, a hail storm pattering,
Distorting newly birthed planets
Named after her.

Robert Rorabeck

He-Man

Crime is calling me out now, for some kind of job-
The graveyard shift of wet street, the lonely moon swaying
In the niggardly cradle;
All the students passed out,
Musicians with sway-backed guitars in laps drooling
On the dirty stoops of the recent days;
Me, just cleaning up the linoleum floor of
The chain restaurant, thinking of her legs and the willows'
Spriggy depressions; a slice of pain,
How I might toss her a few lines, spoken under the Breath of eager inebriations, jealously daydreaming
The last peck of darkness before the abruptly crowing dawn,
Of the bountiful man she is taking home to Tease and spoon feed, to yawn and crack eyes in lazy jest:
To see the signs of chirping day, to douse and Sink against his wooden six pack until noon, and then
To gorge of the greasy feasts of fried lunch;
The American jungle of her eyes; and her wild legs,
The types of sports they played in high school;
Now they just kid around as they walk across the bar,
Serving drinks and souvenirs to the freshman and the sailors;
She has the hidden colors of the flag all over her body's sway;
And its been a decade since I've seen them,
Or since another woman has met my eyes in maybe meetings,
And I didn't even care; because I was full of patriotism for her,
And how I might spend my twilight hours
Running the courses like a misspent champion, 7 miles
Around her rented dirge of philistine advertisements;
Just to get her planted in the back of my tongue, like a wedge
In the Pharaoh's army, ready to dive into her fleeing seas of red orchid;
Now all of that is gone, along with the woman I used to sleep with,
Gone into the Diaspora of obscure Judaica,
The sweaty flee-markets and untamed men with Spanish tongues,
Flooding the needled tip of flora bouquets of forgetful Florida;
She is in with it with someone now, cradle in the lap of rum;
Cradling in the same lap she has always been in, ready to get done
And out of there, while I am just done and ready to settle
Into the services of the obscure; ready to settle in a home built
Thirty decades ago; As I sit down on the pot and bite by tongue,

Read the sad declarations of her forgetful eyes on the manila stall:
John Wayne flunked basic training,
She moved in with him the very next day....

Henry David Thoreau Whistles At The Girl In Blue Jeans!

I really want to touch
The cliché of your golden ransom:
Oh yeah, hemlock,
Also other pain killers like-
Shark's teeth like little good luck charms
On the wingspan of airplanes-
Cereal prizes;
And really want to camouflage in your Requiem:
The forensic panorama of your lips-ticked
Bite-marks...
I want to become the one trick pony who Catches your eye,
Who leads you all around, roaming,
Strutting stiff in your wood-chip stables,
All blue and silver and twined up nice,
A pugilist just as handsome as pain on Ice-
Out on the badland roam of thirsty illusion:
I want to have a wedding with you in
A funeral parlor,
I want to roller-skate with your hand in hand
Like thornless cereus,
Budding foreplay attracts thirsty hummingbirds -
I want to lip-sink, hair-lipped to your punk-
Rock:
I want to have pets with you, and shower
With you, and use your shampoo-
Hot, steaming enterprise!
And clean you proportionally
To my love- Rub you raw;
And I've had a little nip of rum,
And I'm listening to Joan Jett,
And sometimes I think about hanging myself
Looking at myself scarred naked in the backyard
Sun;
It is so impossible, the equation of the apex

Of your blue-jeaned stride!
But the dogs:
But the dogs love me-
They howl when I've left;
I've gone to the city to fix you pretty:
But it would mean that I'd not try my hand
At another poem-
Have another chance to exquisitely fail,
Not summit another mountain
To name her after you or Fantasize about another nun,
Or an aunt, my mother doing dog-fights
And tricks: or I'd put my hand in Your pocket and make your climax for Loose change
In an aspen grove:
Has anyone every told you that he wanted
You naked in the back of a wild mountain, Erin-
Oh well, that's all it is, and soon I'll be moving
Out, and selling fireworks in New Mexico;
All the little tricks who dissapear beautifully
Instead of money;
But I still really want to be Henry David Thoreau
In your woodsy, throbbing Walden!

Her Always Absent Tears

Bodies pounding hidden chests where ribs always Happen to grow two by two:
Like sisters and brothers looking in at the red organs
Of this operations zoo:
And if you breath too hard, your wishes will mess up the hair
Of trees,
And it will fluster princesses and warble knees:
It will ripple the hidden grotto of hers and crenellate
The dying sensation
Of her always absent tears.

Her Back On Me

Now here is Sabbath school- here is a charm for your Body, Alma- here is my spit and whistle,
And I getting drunk in my littlest of homes, trying to cultivate
Roses for you,
While the buses are all daisies: My childhood is all gone,
And here are your children coming up,
Just like each one of you: Michael and Heidi, and they have that Home where your parents live,
Where the sunlight is also slipping with the airplanes and the Copper heads,
So far away from the erudite backyards that I once knew,
And so much more beautiful- the playgrounds are like hot wax,
And now there is a killer in my house as big as a snuffing bull:
You left me here Alma, just like you came in before me,
While I was still working and left the rose I'd given to you:
Now you are home with your husband and children in another world
Which happens on the other side of where the airplanes are Leaping,
For I am continuously bothered beneath these flight paths,
While you are just as tragically beautiful as a fairytale who has turned
Her back on me.

Her Backyard's Memory

How sadly the pictures hang from their quiet song,
And I keep looking at them out of the apartment
I don't live in anymore;
I might be there holding her hand, but the graveyard
Is out of frame,
And she has let go of my grasp and wedded a man
I have never met, but he has met her tongue
And her body laid down at night, which I had met before,
But those photographs she has kept of us
Mean the things which are in the coy twitters
Of her backyard's memory, bricked up inside the Mouth of a dismissed tree, with her childhood
She doesn't play with anymore; in the waning lights
Out of reach, shredded for a nest of carnivorous bluebirds:
They look pretty, and we matched,
And we used to smile at each other and sometimes peck,
Until the red tide swept away the heirlooms of
The leased spaces, like a waitress who has left her job
To flumes of the flooded and encroaching sea; She admits that there was Once a beautiful if sparse hemisphere in the cheap stuccos
Of undergraduate dementation, but I don't ever believe
She saw the communal pool as I still do, drooling from
The steps of my worn spine: the haunting estuaries of silent Bodies of water unoccupied except for the sway of Artificial light, and my eyes like yet hypnotized
Moths metamorphosed and dancing to the undulating patterns, like amorphous leopard seals of celibate drifts,
Remaining there in the luxury of decades as strangers walk
Through the shadows, unreadable books in their fleeting grasp.

Her Blaze

Pleasant thoughts, like a rainbow on the tit of An alligator,
As she lays down with him, and tastes the murder of his Smile,
After they have run so far away together and taken so many Names,
Even after he left her with a child in the great armpits of
The apathetic human race,
With death in his entire smile over every last one of the dinner
Party-
And there were rodeos, and concerts to attend;
And on the sanctimonious finger of her taken hand,
A stone as beautiful as a wild horse that was tamed and taught
How to speak the Queen's English:
And I saw her in all of this across the canal, as she spoke to A genie in a wineglass when I was supposed to be in School:
And she laid on me for awhile her gaze, in between the blue knives
Of the Bismarcks framing her respectable grotto
That controlled her blaze.

Her Boyfriend's Fireworks

Didn't you see the Busses
Turning around
Naked upon the grass-
Entirely in love
With a girl who
Was trying her best to
Be so beautiful-
But even the enamored
Heavens gave Up like
Dogs forgetting their masters
For she had watched her boyfriends
Light off all of their fireworks
Before she went off to Love someone else.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Breath

Everything is good but broken,
And when she calls out now there is no fear,
But challenge,
Naked in the firmament of graveyards
Above the hills of the defeated ghosts of Rome,
She sees all the things which men have seen
And names them her own,
And carves them handily with the wind she breathes:
For centuries she has slipped caves into rocks,
And petted the back of the ancients seas until they foamed.
When she comes now she does so rattling
The window frame, knocking on the doors of drowsing homes.
Absently, she pollinates the rocky meadows,
And tussles the backs of mauve foxes, and kisses
The open lips of the water lilies, giving them pirouettes in the Silken canals, gives berth under the wings of moonlit owls,
And thus cries around the continents,
Weeping for those things which cannot be born of her,
The children she can only shape once they are gone,
Thus removing the chiseled epitaphs of gravestones,
And shushing mountains back again into the coy seas.

Her Brown Father

Starting out of a thought like an unrecognizable sail,
Like a puff of cloud,
Or a heart in its cage: and I told you that this love for me
Was like being in the fairgrounds all of the time,
And you laughed with your aunt, and your eyes were bright,
Even though they were dark brown:
And I think that you still hold an inkling of a love for me,
Alma, even though my time is short and I will soon leave me
House and learn how to migrate all the way to Mexico
Like the last of the contagious butterflies, and there to start
My own family in between the clefts and caesuras of the Rocks and corn:
A family as bright and ill-equipped as yours, and that I love you,
While the stoolpigeons weep, and your daughter eats the candy out
Of your tattooed hand; and when she sees her brown father coming
Indoors, she gets so happy, and her happiness is yours.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Careful Procession

Gloomed ambition sequined in a dress,
Brought in sunset to the bank of the canal,
Where the crippled people have been drinking
And enjoying the insouciant feelings they don't Care to delve into:
They look at her as if she is in solvency,
Going down to feed the mouth of reptiles, but I've known her for the better part of a trifecta
Of decades, and she has never slid her hands into His pouch to feel his cool hearts:
But he is there all the same, though none approach
To catch his name, and the darting palavers of his Watery dictions, the softy spawning randomness
Of her hands cupping his throat;
Perhaps, while we are turned away, and the furthest
Shadows creep, she drinks of him, and her heart runs
On all cylinders, but that is a secret thing only a woman Must know, for already she has a last name which Is neither his, nor known to us, but
She must go back to it, sitting far into the empty green
Living room; As she turns, and stretches up the slope,
There is a dollop of mud on her ankle, and a bouquet
Of burs in her trail, but she fails to notice,
And we do not speak to her, for that is beyond our reason,
Though we have seen her come down beside us
Unfailingly to peer into the waters unrestive jaunts,
To that nest where bares the coolness of his throat as He awaits her careful procession.

Her Dry And Ceasing World

Words change until the syllables are taken together
And understood,
And I am no longer lost in the beauty of the unutterable woods:
I have come down to the tarmac to watch the big silver
Airplanes descend,
Those who before I thought were imperfect angels
With heavy wings,
Like cheerleaders stumbling to the water fountain with leaded
Eyes
And in heavy bruises caracoled; and I never thought about
You while I was in high school, Alma:
But this is your world, and your lips the homeopathic fountains
For hummingbirds or my over eager dodos:
I spent a week's paycheck to buy you a silver rosary with
The virgin of Guadalupe the day after you made love to me
For two hours;
It was like you were a lighthouse laughing as she rode her heavenly
Lights across the tattered see, smiling in all of her levitating dresses,
And saving upon the fortunate sailors taken into the cradle
Of her dry and ceasing world.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Favorite Colors

We don't have to have sex:
We can eat ice-cream underneath the maypole
Waiting for the weather and
For airplanes to come around-
Because daylight will be here tomorrow,
Even if she throws it all always,
Or the highway always leads to death
And the dead brothers
Who accepted his gifts:
There they remain, immortalized for the troops
That march towards the mountains:
They go beside the preschools
Obsessed with their primary colors-
And the little children stop and gaze
Like oracles-
And tell the men through the night blooming
Jasmine
What limbs they will lose,
And what permanent gifts they will gain-
As they laugh into the future,
And the dogs follow them- for a little while
There is joy,
Until their masters are lost through the impenetrable
Penumbra of mountains,
Except for those cavalier few, who fall beneath her
Waterfalls and ruffle her areolas
Until the geniis come out gasping, naked except for
Her favorite colors.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Final Man

The firefly of sun creams its own shade:
It does this over the playgrounds, over the old hats of Neighborhoods:
Its dance is on fire; its hemisphere running out of room,
And still it goes and swims, and turns;
As she tells me she can never have another husband:
She will only be single after this brown government should Fail:
But she still shaves and wears miniskirts for me:
I call her my rainbow, and the butterfly to my soul: and we Sell fruit together:
Like a knight, I eat habanero peppers to prove my love until She blushes, or I tickle her feet when she is like Cinderella overcome by the counter, cleaning, clean:
She asks me to stomp cockroaches, my Alma, the queen on
My soul,
But I let them leave, like a quixotic knight all flushed out
Under the windmills while the cats are milking
And the moon: and, oh the moon;
And then I follow her down the highway for just as long as I can, but I have to finally have to turn down the other tributaries
Of my bachelor avenues, since, because, alas,
I am not her final man.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Folkloric Senses

Castrations do not know my shadows—
My dog sleeps at my feet until I do not know
Anyone else:
The racehorses turn around like my father
Until this is no better news from Christmas—
And I have learned from all of the Estuaries—
Strangest of cathedrals where no one plays football
And none of the babies sleep—
Across from the high school—or across from the University where there is an ever busy beanstalk following
The fairytales up into the clouds—
As my make-believe wife rises from her bed of clouds,
And giving me her folkloric senses, pretends to love me
As best she can.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Gaze That Beam

We will live in our own property,
Separated by our bodies, our Secret hungers steal into the Chicken coup after the magic ends;
It is so late, but the miner's are still Down beneath the earth,
Burrowing like hungry foxes;
They do not know that their Daughters are getting married right
Now to red haired men
Who have deserted the army—
In celebrations, men take women
Hand in hand; they reach over
Fences, they drive across state lines
To look into the virgin's eyes,
To take her in their arms across the Threshold and stomp on wooden
Floors high above the workers heads.
In the ancient hollers, in the moonshine
Basins cut into the earth,
Men look for her beyond themselves,
A wife like a diamond,
The preciousness brought to the lips,
Inspected by the eye,
And once secured, identified,
Held in their hand, given a name,
A value, a place to sleep,
Brought across continents
And shipped overseas, given whitewashed
Homes in somber green yards,
Rose bushes and dishes to wash—
Then, when the men come home they Observe the wealth, their accomplishment:
A woman in their living room cooking them
Dinner. The back of a woman's neck
Shaped like a marble slope;
Her scent reminds them of places
They've never been—
The orange groves of Valencia, Spain,

And the Roman battlements high on the cliffs
Overlooking the sea,
Her eyes, the places that they are brought across,
Caravans of loneliness to the oasis.
What she can prepare for them and serves
To them at the dinner table:
Hope, accomplishment away from the segregated
Bodies that garment gravity and rust,
Children, the infant seedlings, the continuation Of existence,
The fertilization of lips
Reaching over the fence,
The borders without will—
Pressing like coal for eons,
Mined from a marriage bed of principal—
Her legs the rich veins, the star dust
That brings men across their long lonely fields,
Her gaze that beam which disintegrates
Emptiness.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Glens

Across the grass the pigeons spill
Up and down and down
Some still—
Along her legs,
Around her glens—
These pretty girls and some pretty Friends—
I know some words—
I have some scars,
And the angels want to see—
I have some boys who play some Games as they follow me—
Up to some stars
And some heavens,
Around the seas and multiplications—
And then this world,
This place of joy that is right here—
Another night echoes
Calling to herself from
Her cul-de-sacs—
The joys that cannot be present—
The day awakens upon the graveyards—
As upon the hearts that are already gone—
Up again and yawning,
Spreading her wings and opening her
Presents upon a heavens already done
With its dawns—
And the lions yawn, as if I've kissed
Your mouth a thousand times—
Through the echoes of the witches' minds—
And in the trailer parks all fast
Asleep—
I end the day as the little girls weep—
In the morning,
The last shine of the moon—
She puts on new shoes and she goes to school—
And I take pride in all of the absences I've Had—and your mother's apple pie—
Even though it was store bought—

Wasn't have bad- yes,
It wasn't half bad.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Gloriously Immortal Tomb

If I knew some more words, I'd have a mirror
Hung up in an evergreen by a little girl who steals more
Things than a horny sparrow:
Twined by red lace, the mirror of words would bleed
From the vocabularies of dawn:
What a beautiful thing to behold it refracting through the Thorny cones the very sharp mathematics which when Pricking the deader things burns up:
Like the luscious tinfoil bent around a pencil in some Lower level class aroused near the canal and smoked-
Before that, shining in the right direction, maybe towards
The penumbras of the sea-level east, those shallowly bustling places Where socially competent people perambulate and Share expensive drinks, I could send signals figuring their Code that I was worth recognition, and turning towards them,
Blind them instantaneously with such luscious numbers of light
Inconvenience cry out throughout all the world that I had a Dictionary in my high forest that could now conceive the truly Meaningful emptied from the tipped chalice of all the national Throats: It was but one angelical compound swimming through
The darkness of the living pond, at first
An infiniteness of blue sucked dry by the bitterly entwining stars,
The awful interludes of injustice sacrificed for the enthroned gold,
And then a mule-gray,
A female poet with a scarred cheek, two children
And a fine new oven for baking pies and ancestral recipes
To which even this mirror is but a muddled reflection
Going down then, eaten and masticated up in her brilliant light,
The forest doesn't burn and yet is revealed as a stop-light ghetto,
Where she is the deadness of a prime number,
Sweeping steadily like sea-combs atop of polished marble stone,
A stronger twin my scarred pettiness is nourished into:
One heart fumbles and dies into its sister,
And then only the spotless kitchen-beat of her gloriously
Immortal tomb.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Heavenly Drink

Give me despairing hope
Going up the highway I should have left
A decade ago:
Give me tombs for my shoulders, and Coagulant for these wrists:
Still living on another world of pretty Mimosa- and I only can give
So many names to the trees that shade
In the night:
Flapping trees and gilded- trees that flood
The harems beside the highway
Or dream of the goldfish getting fat and Cantankerous in the wishing wells
Not too far from here:
But anywhere, anywhere but here-
And I have loved her, but she has flown off:
And I built this coffin for her so like an arc,
But the prettiest days are over-
And the parades of ice cubes are melting
And contaminating her heavenly drink.

Her High Horse

Scars vanish in
The spokes of a hypnotic
Bicycle-
My eyes have been Drinking in the canal-
Dragon girls in hoop
Skirts
Light off fireworks-
Flirt with Rattlesnakes
And dragons small
Enough to fit
Underneath loose stones-
There is a parade of Dare devils in the sky-
They are never coming down-
They are flying far enough
To touch the Colorado Rockies-
Beneath them they are selling
Baseball games
And drinking wine to Pass the time
And a girl flirts with a boy
And another mother comes down
From her high horse and touches the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Home

Doggone traveler, take comfort in your unrefundable works,
These wasted allegories of the mountains and streams which Breath and mold from her breath and down from her neck,

For, yes, you will soon be smithereens, like the young and darling
Aspen leaves curling in the hoary lick of October's cusping sickle, Pummeled by the fledgling doe, and by the hypnotizing tracks of Men who, such as yourself, travel deeper in trying to Coat themselves by her musk,

For it is in that inescapable season, when you come best bloomed,
Then shimmer like someone not altogether real, sitting on the edge
Of a bed in a dream, that she materializes and leads you far astray,
Into the meadows and estuaries you knew to be but couldn't say,

Thus cupping her effluvious trunk, combine her with your stuff
And she doesn't even know, beauty in a tender suit of amnesias,
How even then she might fall into another man, distend and offer
Herself like a hungry meal, believing this is the truest she could be,

But held up to your transitory works, she transcends her body's
Moods, and the panting infatuations of those eyes, becomes a memory
Materialized by the sifting dusk through the slender bodies, enters
Your house unaware and lays bare her shoulders, looking into your Eyes, for you to lay fingers upon this actualization, and move each hinge

Until she can know for sure her home.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Hungering Dish

I have a book of all of your shoulders—
And you do not remember who I am—But Won't the dolphins surrender to the sun—
Evaporations of the merry-go-round of Your mothering shoulders—
Until all of the day is cradled in the night of Those mountains,
And the magnificent spins—a world of spiders in Their equinox—and other things I do not Wish to comprehend—I can hear a muse putting Her fingers in the kiln to Retrieve her children—they are already something
I haven't knocked—
And the sun blooms in its kaleidoscope of knuckles,
Another easy if insouciant wish—
They day is a pinwheel of airplanes and arrowheads—
Another soldier goes dying in the amusing waves
Of her hungering dish-

Robert Rorabeck

Her Inconsiderate Moonlight

Another busied soldier waits upon the tarmac
Of a sepulcher—
This is how it's been forever since we've been selling
Christmas trees—
In the venomous thoughts of my soul, reticulated
To the labyrinth—and to a sea of unconsummated
Tears—
Never remembering so many words—why the soldiers
Are still fighting,
And the memories resurrect themselves after midnight:
When the damage is already being done,
And the televisions of daylight are over with—
And the dogs are spinning around underneath the moons
Chasing their own shadows
Stolen in flight—I remember that once upon a time
In a rainstorm you came to my house,
And fluttered there beneath my evangelical make-believe:
Moth in a consummation of a wedding in the Daylight—kissing both of my wrists like the repetitions in
The meters of plagiarists—as another crowd surrenders
Its hearts into the sunlight, and agrees to come up
And up—to finally see her, my most beautiful of Muses—as, yes, she dresses in the great opulence of
Her inconsiderate moonlight.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Incontinent Love

I can hear the airplanes calling like grandmother from Her graveyard,
As if tomorrow were Easter and she was getting ready to jump
Up in the middle of paper snowflakes and congratulate Me now that I have a house;
But I wonder what she would say if she knew I was dreaming
About a working girl as rich as crepuscule,
Like a mermaid kept like a bobble in the backyard swimming pool,
Coming up after school with lips like roses over spilling
And capsizing the drunken yachts of my britches:
Now I don't see her anymore, and I can't conjure her up with Any of my spirits: I think that I will love again, because that is what I have been doing all of this for,
And I want all of my own children. Then at night in one of my two Bedrooms I will have her, and she will say my name and mean me,
And I will give her the token for our offspring in the very humid
Banishment where we forget everything else
And he grows: he grows inside of her, the spitting image of myself,
The rich folklore of a youth climbing up her umbilical beanstalk;
And I will look through the transom of her black market eyes
And really wish I had something more, something priceless to trade
Her for this and all of her incontinent love.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Inevitable Afternoon

You keep on giving us cadavers that seem
To tell the truth,
But there is not a goldfish on my windowsill:
And I no longer think of you
So dreamily a few hours away—
The playgrounds we enjoyed have rusted or Been removed:
It was just a game we played next to the sea
While other, truer bicycles made love—
Stolen bicycles in the grottos of cave-bears
Beneath the sea—
Bicycles held in the Pieta of our strikingly
Beautiful aunts—
And bicycles still perched upon store shelves
Waiting to go home to the Amphibian nests that surround suburbia,
To bejewel a crocodile's clutch,
Or to feel the cloy farts of an unfaithful
Housewife as she peddles away
After another mailman
Down some lane of her inevitable afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Insouciant Victory

Nomenclature of my lips and
Senses dressing the habitat of my despair-
The failure of such pretty atmospheres
To linger,
As the cars drive away- the housewives collapsing
Like dry wood and pantyhose
Where the weeds are tangled,
Where the latchkeys play cards and where the Thorny citrus hangs so low as to be kissed at
By rattlesnakes: this is her valentines,
Corrupted by truancy and jealous smoke
Signals- this is another one of those impotent
Flairs remembering my childhood
Spent in the pornographies of the damp woods
Across the seashells in the skin of the little road;
And this is how I linger for her, felt up
Like wet kisses on bloodstained paper,
As she inches nearer another highway of massacre:
There she goes lightened upon by the perfumes
Of her insouciant victory- the fairies make
Pavilions out of her shoulders,
And they gossip to her greedily, even as she Carries away.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Knees' Opal Bowl

Blind men are shushing in the mount,
The trodden hill covered with spectators
For another event:
The insects of the summer's frenzy:
With spy glasses watch the gun-metal bulls
Stampede ovals and advertise
With their painted gills:
"I've seen these things, " I say to her,
Over my wounded shoulder and down a ways,
But it is not clear if she's understood me:
The woman all the young stallions are Smoking with the penumbra half concealed
In boreal smiles:
Her unfiltered legs crisscross slightly
Like bent, yet perfectly deadly scissors:
Her eyes in a disinfected trance,
Watch the moving billboards for a sign,
An aura of a bright clue, a marriage vow:
"I want to ask you to make love, " I tell her,
But the sport is roaring like a thunderstorm,
Though sun-dogs are leaping a concentricity
Around their laughing king,
A blue invades the spaceless land,
An infinity of gentle contradictions,
The working class failures who worship half-hazardly;
They would break her, if she wasn't careful,
Though already there is a someone else's
Hand on her knees' opal bowl.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Knight Of Knights

It is cold over the highways and over the Race horses,
And the just born rivers coagulate in the clods:
Entire trailer parks are Kidnapped by tornados- and the words don't get Any richer than this-
A lonely art, a roofless place beside the canal,
Between the sea and the gods in the sky-
Runaway horses stop to eat the apples rolling down
The bank-
Soft shelled tortoises remaining there all day,
Even before and after school-
Her children get home to wonder- and I remain Outside of her nude kitchen in the clothing of
The sun,
As she weeps and drinks from wishful glasses
Waiting for the day
That her knight of knights will finally come.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Lips Fly Away

Little ships blossom
In blown glass spheres.

Her lips fly away,
Across the green holes where
The river sings.

Fragrant dreams bud
In cabbage green cabinets.

Her lips fly away,
Where a young soldier sleeps
Suffocated on a tomb of flowers.

Flooding pools dapple the Blue lips of breathless mountains.

Her lips fly away,
Between the hummingbirds
Darting like thieves siphoning
Honey into their weightless tanks.

Veteran fingers uncork
The eager casks of fermented barely.

Her lips fly away,
To his lips positioned above hers
The wet entrails of hunters coming down
On her lips.

Her lips fly away far
From mine.

Her Little Tail

Days are coming in and looking too
Like sweet young daughters:
I see her eyes, my eyes run down the Alluring cataracts of her thighs
Too- and they are just beginning,
And her eyes are caracoled by sweet heliotrope
Like forbidden plums;
And her hair is blonde and winsome as if
For a almost boy,
While her grandmother is plump and harmless-
So I pick her out a tree, because it is all I
Can do to her,
And the clouds and helicopters come through
The sky,
Seeming to circle around her things,
And they are all wondering why, if they are wondering,
All that we would like to do with her.
And we help her to her car, like a honey bee on A crutch,
And she buds right there- she smells like yet to Ripen lunch,
And she is driven away like a heroin in an inconspicuous
Fairytale,
Like an almost blue swan before her
Adolescent storm-
Wondering how it will be more possible
To be more beautiful still; but she will,
and it hurts too much to watch her leave,
Wagging wagging her little tail.

Her Little Yellow Birdcage

Alma tried to give me back the keys to my house:
I told her I would kill myself,
And then I didn't kill myself, and I planted royal palms today with Her uncle, Romero;
And when the day was over I showed Romero my house,
And he showed me his two homes, and we tried to figure out which of Our possession was the bigger haul;
But he was the one whose sister in law cooked us dinner,
But I wanted Alma anyways: I have two fruit trees growing in my Backyard, but I don't remember what either of them are:
I am not good at growing or cooking,
But now I can walk to the sea in less than five minutes:
I can spit right into the backyards of palm beach and be home in Time to turn off my lights;
And Alma thought that my house was beautiful: Alma who was birthed in A little pueblo in Guerrero Mexico, who is a legal citizen of America,
Who lives with her mother and father and her two children
And her man right off of Cherry Rd two houses down from the little Park for the bambinos;
Yes, I know where she lives: I have spoken to her in my sleep even While the tomcats prowled and the fishermen wept,
And now I must be going home: home to my little home which may or May not be better than Romero's, only that I paid for my in cash;
And maybe I can't remember what two types of fruit trees are growing
In my backyard,
But it is of little importance, as long as Alma comes home to her Little yellow birdcage I've made for her and dances, and sings.

Her Lover's Shore

Outside—the werewolves
Walked blindly
Up to the roses—
Not a one of them could see
What it was
The virgin was holding,
But the emptied promises
In her bouquets of Amputations—
Old muses who'd lost their Heads to other men—
The stewardesses who'd
Looked away at just
The right moment—
As the white ships embarked upon epiphany—
The silver letters loosed
The other way—
And I got my reprieve for
Another day—
In a lifetime lead between the ocean
And her lover's shore.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Midnight's Speciality

Dysfunctional knights,
Not used to being out of doors, taking lunch with
The frogs:
This is just the place, the wishing well backed up against
The sea—
The freight trains running home to get out of the Rain, the new born children reclining towards their Mothers' breasts,
The same old protuberances winding down—
And only just one or two children yet out of place—
Soon the entire show will stop—
Petrified by the kaleidoscopic lights of the midway,
And someone brighter than all of this place
Will show her face,
And the angels will come running home
As the night blooming jasmine closes her buds,
Perfumed into the boudoirs of her midnight's speciality.

Her More Prestigious Gentleman

For just a little longer, pain,
To get what you want to, perhaps-
A year or two more with your dogs,
Your parents and their disapproving scowls.
Who would have believed their son would turn
Out an antisocial hippie with a thing for Cherry Pop-Tarts:
And the days, and the days, and the days flip over Like picture books for the pug nosed kids tucked into Bed up to their chins in claret sunsets, and saccharine sheets:
Who would have believed, that it would go like this:
You and your dogs celibate- might as well be Neutered- A good man, healthy canines, and the stars,
Most of whom you don't know- a little uneasy
Under the mirror, the way things always were-
How they began to make fun of you at parties,
Because you got too drunk and passed out and drooled,
And vomited, and how they thought about calling the paramedics,
Because they thought you had alcohol poisoning,
But you only leapt up, pissed on them, and ran out
Through the cloistered hibiscus, leaping on the back
Of an alligator in the canal, and spurred it to swim away,
To the secret parks where the clouds overshadowed the moon,
And the obscure footprints in the penumbra on the grass from all
The soccer stars, the whined housewives, and the libidos
Of silk- The things you are supposed to say while sharing Dinner, the way most of the thoughts drift towards sex,
And the jumpy eyes falling upon the aspects they find pleasing,
And then leaping away-
Surely tonight, you are drunk, and those nights back then you
Were certainly an outcast, even if you were the only one to escape
From the cops in Wellington- Now, all those fools are becoming Something, building up reputations, producing television,
Stifling farts, great adjectives, but in your singular weathers
You will survive until you have no more teeth,
And by then you will be at home on your humid island,
Where there is only one serial killer, though you have nothing to Fear, for the sky is filled with rapture, and she has long since Gone and married her more prestigious gentleman.

Robert Rorabeck

Her One And Only

Places where I sleep are
In you sleeping
Like children along a long highway
Resting their heads
Where their mothers should have
Been,
While they are taken across the road
Kill and the crocodiles
Who are always pretending to cry
As they get ready to have lunch- and they Are spent but downsized,
Like rockets sleeping in cornfields
Spilled across baseball diamonds:
As you pass across the girl you were once
Sure that she loved
Sleeping like a pregnant rattlesnake
In a disconcerting trailer in the sated
Parks with her one and only husband.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Paper Boat

A muse—I mean a
Poisonous butterfly, like a
Pick pocket who Purloined my heart
That now lies wet and Heavy
Enfolded in the butcher's
Papers
That makes up her paper boat.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Pearly And October Glades

The rum was exquisite as a virgin: and girls from Spain light out
On the bicycles and Roller-skates and they have no curfew and they don't worry about Making it back to the boat;
They lick their lips and pine for the taste of new oil,
And upon their keystones I bend my foils, as I wish for them running Back home like pregnant trout unwilling to leave behind their Gold;
And if you listen outside, you can hear all the armies marching,
But I am not afraid: Her birthstone is opal, and it was from this stone
That everything upon this earth was made.
So like a gardener, I step outdoors, and attend to her ever present gardens, Unobtrusive, and celebrate my happy birthdays in the opulence of
Her pearly and October glades.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Playgrounds That She Cannot Possibly Remember

Spells kiss wildflowers until the fall: and then they Kiss the shoulders and breasts of stones:
And the tigers fly over the abutments and through the keyholes
Where the cerulean tribes no longer mean to say
Their things:
And the sky over your village is crenulated by lightning when it
Is in the right place;
As this is the exact point from which the entire sorority of rivers
Fall,
Their tears cooking in the feral aqueducts until they fall down and Palaver quietly in the deep canals
Beside the wayward highways- as if it was their church,
Until they run on down to your house that would be perfect
Save for its crooked mailboxes:
And they try to make a lake for you, an estuary as well for your Daughter to find whatever metamorphosis,
The sky looking down the uncountable steps like a proud mother
As her child runs skipping through the forest,
Kissing every blade and fish, all the daylight in the world trying to Strike words upon her playgrounds that she cannot possibly remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Princes

Erections of school yard monuments.
I read to love, but who was Shakespeare anyways,
But a conspiracy;
And I am the child of a farmer, and a basket maker;
All around me the city divides like the gears
Of a clock, and
Dances,
And moves the skeletons underneath her gowns like Steely fish,
Like gears of a clock; and in the park they are out of All the roses I once wanted to Prove my virulence of affliction,
And the paper snowflakes move like stone-hearted
Mailmen:
And what is that I am doing but trying to become a popular
Mode of transportation,
For her heart, for her steaming rooms:
For her bodies glory, the newest and brightest of all heirlooms:
And she is going up to the trains and blowing kisses
For rides,
But how many boys can take her for their brides:
The polygamy of her sports makes even the rains weary-
I wanted to love her in the rock gardens where all my childhood
Fairies were pinned like stalwart religions,
Like badges and stars on a general, but instead I wept for her alone
On the corner of her garments in the depressing patios
Where the cars glowed and the toads bit their tongues
Never even pretending their could be her princes.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Reign

Bound under a cliff of worry alongside a
Coast that bled truth,
Like two turtledoves in a blue rookery:
We made love and supplanted our flesh, and pressed our Sweet curses like love letters to lips.
And it was all because I knew sorcery, and crawled
Up on her roof and sang to her while
She and her children slept:
And I wept, and fell down through the surf for her,
Like a hero diminishing,
Forgetting his table manners and words, until the sky fell away
And fainted,
And she knew no more, but came for me hunting through my Open door,
And we made love while the waves crashed and the workmen
Repeated their evermore,
And the hapless housewives leapt with one another in and out
Of each curious door;
But we made love, and the sky did not complain;
And when she left I prayed my thanks to the Virgin Mary:
I god blessed her rain.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Roofless Caves

Wayward bodies of men somnambulate stealing
The tired, black-lipped kisses of housewives in parks,
So far away from their trailer hoods of dreams,
Like something of a decrepit wish the sea has washed to someone
Even more anonymous and unreal;
And I guessed that I wasn't her savior anyways, Because I am shadier than that darkening neighborhood because I never bathe;
And the satellites overhead have been there since Christmas,
Running around and ululating like videogames;
So underneath the garlands of power lines, she and her sisters live
And breathe, and like the waves they come again and go away, Causing a fright of the surreal, petting animals with their Caesuras, asking us to shave: I wished that she would come again
Someday, stepping barefoot through the threshold of my Yellow grave I am just opening for her like the opened books
Of a butterfly who is hoping for time to save him until He can reach the sweet nectars growing as bright as nenuphars from
Her roofless caves.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Sculptures Of The Shore

With the sun drifting towards my sisters
And the cars parking,
The heads of mammals laying down—
Even the truck stops sleeping,
I search through the echinopsis for
The bedrooms of a feral muse—
I raise my phallus like a bottle rocket—
I am skipping school at midnight—
The shadows peel from the playground
Underneath whatever moon it is Like cheerleaders leaping besides the bleachers—
Soon they will know what it is to make Love forever,
The same way that the ocean knows her sculptures
Of the shore.

Her Shadow-Skinned Heart

Bodies pressed in their rented engagements;
And over-used bodies scrimshawed with tattoos, in her beautiful
Room like a bedroom Michelle made love in so many times
Before her high school dried up and blew away,
And her neighborhood eventually lost its gentrifications:
The cars changed hands, and their keys:
And new eyes met their matches conveniently located nearby the Supermarkets, and the airport,
Where the girls still live too working the graveyard shifts on their Backs,
Trying out their favorite positions and asking me to fill in their time
So far beneath where the commuters are skipping like stones
Never once thinking to hold their breaths for good luck;
And they will soon make it home and sleep like infantile gods of Love draped in the effervescent ivy;
And the sea will moan for them, weeping every inch up and down the Coast,
Not wishing to believe that she is already forgotten, but knowing
In the whipping grottos of her shadow-skinned heart that it must be so.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Streams So Rich And Brown

Poisonous beauty affixed to a
Blushing stem:
She barely weighs a hundred pounds
And I happened upon her at Wal-mart today;
And I promised to buy her a bicycle, while Looking into the Brown phoenix of the rebirthing laughter
Of her eyes:
But she wouldn't let me hold her hand,
Because her mother was in the store:
There were so many people there, anyways-
What a fabulous microcosm of this
New jungle,
But we found each other anyways:
And when I got home, I was too tired to ride
My bicycle, but she called me again
And I pleased myself to the sound of her
Cloy voice
While the tropic storms past like sick gardens
Beneath my feet,
And then I drank more liquor and tried not
To remember the opulent distance of our Bodies standing side beside:
Her streams so rich and brown, and joyously
Daring me to look away.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Sweet And Auburn Teams

Cooling children cooling on the sills of Church:
The perfectly scraped pews where Satan is Extinguished,
The hymns of America, and I know
There is a garden with a flaming sword and a high school
Not so far away
Where pretty girls still practice their redeeming sports
To this day;
And the city around that perfected jewel sparks just Like the sea;
And I can see her turning in her new car,
Turning and turning:
Her nose is pierced and her eyes are perfect, like Siamese sailors Always in perfect orbit on the habitual seas and
In no need of home or shelter,
She is so brave, she is always combing;
She is the chaste pornography of this new century:
She is a perfectly bosomed astronaut enjoy the choicest orbit
Low in the gravity of the swings,
And her eyes are closed as the leaves are falling:
They are brushing her like so many caresses of all the boys
Who wish to join her sweet and auburn teams.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Sweet And Multiplying

The treats are almost done,
The little girl's fingers sticky with salt and she is Almost home:
Her eyes satisfied by what her fingers have given to
The taste of her mind;
Her basket is full, and her leg is rich,
Her abdomen lathered by tallow and sweat;
Behind her many a ditch that she leaped to reach this Final pitch;
But where is the wolf, and where is the man:
Where is the savior with his ax in hand;
I am not telling all of her secrets, the many that I don't Know;
But her belly is as fat as a watermelon wreathed in its Vine;
And she has been as busy as a day laborer at picking time:
Inside the basket the head of a wolf with
A purple-fine tongue,
And cradled on her back the ax of the lover she borrowed
And swung;
And they made love not far from the path nearer her young Mother who has yet to hear her daughter's song of victory sung;
But she will have by morning,
As through the valley rings the joys of her sweet and multiplying
Young.

Her Sweet And Sundry Land

Tomorrow is Diana's birthday:
And she made the woods silken, and she made the Grottos good,
And even while she was doing this she banished the Old gods to their hidden neighborhoods;
And she trash talked
And gave politicians everything they really wanted,
Walking off the path
And making love to the wolf, while I cried alone in The valley she had already attended,
Alone in the aloe of dying scuppernongs all underneath
The echinus in the armpits of aspens:
I sang to the rivers that ran after her, they also crying
For what they had to loose,
And the fireflies got all funny and so did the canoes:
All the trappers in the prairie,
All the undertakers in the land, gathered together in A horny procession and followed after her birthday party
Where she was blowing wishes somewhere
Even further across her sweet and sundry land.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Tearless Eyes

If I loved the svelte aphorisms and I drink more Liquor then who will save me now
While Alma is at her own house making love and Caring for her children.
While all of the rabbits I told her I would save have already Disappeared,
And the birds have eaten their seeds but they still are hungry:
My house has termites,
And I am a poet;
And I breathed inside Alma's car today, but otherwise
Who has the will to save me
Or light up my Christmas tree while the words
Are going down to the bottom to sing into the abyss of joy:
Like the incest of a hero with his forgotten bride,
His sister of the cataracts with the blood of Dragons,
As they are tossed over like coins in a wishing well
For tourists,
While Sharon is in Colorado just trying to survive,
While Alma is right here, in a house she loves more than me,
And the balloons are drowning in the sky,
While the butterflies and mariposas fall to earth like gasless
Airplanes and dragonflies
Who touch the corners of my yard where they drown
Like diamonds in the peripheral visions of
Her tearless eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Three Untimely Swings

It feels to me that I am here,
In a candelabrum, in a sugar bowl- swimming around,
Looking out at the distortions of the dinner
Guests swimming like flies all around the caesuras of death
Which has them surrounded and out manned:
But for awhile they glow like goldfish in the midway of the greatest State in all of America:
They glow like the fulcrum of Halloween, and they sing outside
Of the schoolyards and into churches,
Passing around:
Until they spill their own ways into monuments and dog tracks,
Until their particular unction takes hold
And they become fully developed the same way as metamorphosis
Or evaporation,
And the fingerprints you left on them like a lover's evidence,
Disappear, or linger: and it is their shoulders that disappear
With their last names or whatever; while another Thing even more lovelier than them gets up to Bat at the plate of your breast work to take her three untimely Swings.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Tottering World

Up into the opposites dawning their smatterings
Of mailboxes:
The lawns seemingly pressed underneath the
Christmas trees,
Entombing jubilantly the long, wide families:
Upstairs and downstairs,
Sleeping with their kites, breaths all filled with unreal
Metamorphosis,
The joys of tinderboxes, and the first steps of little girls
Who break outside and pinwheel to the hiccupping
Ablutions of the speed boat lake,
And down to there the foxes with coy snouts come to drink
Beside knees:
He lets her pet him, while his eyes quiver like the Fata morganas of red saddles; and she cannot speak,
But he never says a word,
Preferring to let her minimalist actions, and those of Her tottering world, express his joys,
His eyes aflame as his tongue is panting.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Twin Sisters On My Page

I receive a copy of my first book,
And lay back the cover as if I would a woman:
A good treat, five days before Halloween.
Scarred, but who cares, as now I can hold up
My head while walking down the echoing hallways
Of high school.
Who else will follow me, as I write down this Draft on a paperback copy of Mark Twain's Huckleberry Finn:
Now I can settle down to lunch atop a better poet's Gravestone, pretend that I understand the multiplicities
Of insects riling over my joints as song birds over
The romance of sea;
Or that I was almost held back for failing to learn Algebra, or that I have been scolded many times by Librarians for my tardiness a insouciance,
A favorite word of mine. Now I am a geode displayed for real,
Cracked open at the racetrack by the many hooves of
The leggy runners: and the winners cry, and the loser
Shamble away, but in time their fortunes of poverty
Will see reversals, as I have seen mine; but a little Thing, these few words of mine, toy soldiers who Deny the mirrors, but what better foreplay than my book
Laid down on this bed beside me, so will not she come
Like a curious bee to my flowers, to my cage, for
I have done good work for her, so now she should lay Down beside me, and her twin sisters on my page.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Unbuttoned Wasteland

Remember nothing,
And that is good....

Go after every new day like
A fisherman on a swift skiff;
Heedless with the nets,
Of the bad silver hungry beneath the skim....

Touch her hand across the earth,
Hold it if she cant feel you,
Hold it like you would a knife
To defend yourself....

Kiss the harsh mugger on the throat,
Like an adder until he is blind
And living in the boroughs of warm trains....
And singing of his cartoon mother.

Never look into the mirror
Without a friend, but call it
The carnival rag,
The broken toilet,
Or the concavity of the ruby rats;

But let the lights meet your face
Ignorant of their signals,
For each one is a harmless animal
Blossoming in the windy street;
Take them up to your room
And watch them swim around the whipping fan....

Dust off her legs and admire the opal flume;
Let them kick like restless alley cats eager for their fences,
Her calves like muscular salmon,
Until their jasmine and vanilla rub off on you
Her first and last names,
The accents of her explorations and trade routes;

Then take her there as a child greets a complete stranger;

Innocence and folly graffitied like a salted wound
Explored by nocturnal hunger and his accoutrements,
As your fingers, like a thorax,
Web effluvious touch against her unbuttoned wasteland....

Robert Rorabeck

Her Unnatural Face

Making busied skeletons that do
Not dream to have fun—
Even though they do
Not have throats, drinking rum and Rum:
And unicorns do not exist,
But exist in the unbusied racetracks
Of the sea:
Coming back again and again tomorrow—
Will they remember me—
Folded out
Where they cannot be observed—
The dead that are not really dead—
The butterfly on the crown
Of a narcoleptic king in the beautiful grass of A cemetery—
Laying and sunning his un busied bones—
The mountains underneath the narrowest shade
Of the telephone poles—
The muses coming home for tomorrow—
Tasting their lips,
Figuring out what they can borrow: world of grapevines
Amidst the zoetropes foxes:
Prettiest of the youngest girls in their most beautiful
Boxes:
Someday I don't wonder that they will be wedded to kings:
As the mountains tumble—
As the heavens stream—of a yellowing beauty
Alighted with her fire—
She kissed her knight and her children—as the beautiful
Day puts out her unnatural fire.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Unopening Door

Beautiful words stricken like matches given
Over to the weddings of a graveyards:
That is how far a field we have flown, and how little we Matter:
The hollow bones skip the classes in the sky, but Even they come down in time,
Like wishes in a bothersome well- downed like pennies
In her eyes- like firetrucks saying their good- good byes-
Never more hoping that we could Get ourselves to her in time- a harvest of barren shoulders,
She avoids the ladders of forget-me-nots we have placed Underneath her high strung boudoir,
As the waves of a forgotten memory lap softly,
Caressing at her unopening door

Robert Rorabeck

Her Very Mother's Heredity

Balsam graves of trapped
Song birds
Beautiful lunches over
Filigreed sunsets in Unenchanted mountains-
Housewives with nothing
On but spangled slavery,
The bare minimal
Architecture of their
Very mother's heredity;
She that I love doesn't even Care for my beasts,
She just serves drinks and
Blows boys away with her
Brown gaze-
The auburn broadside of
Her very mother's heredity.

Robert Rorabeck

Her Wonderfully One Thing Of Become

All we have known down here has been young
While I have been busy at growing my lottery of fairytales
Even though they are not all right here;
And this is how it happens after the shower of fireworks
Of a poem:
This is how it happens that all of the drawling jaws of Lawyers and their hangman are salivating before their apartments
And better parts for the Faberge parts of their Derelicts and space machines;
And I am going where the sun keeps shining bit that is just Because my mother isn't even here anymore while my throat
Keeps starving,
While the pantheons of bedrooms keep getting really shiny and really Pretty;
And all what else: I am new here in town and I am looking for the Statue of Liberty;
And I think that you ought to be ashamed of yourself while you
Ought to be ashamed of yourself.
While the waves crash anyways- and anyways they come full of the Mouthfuls of their pretty colors coming up and caracoling and Thinking of all of their pretty colors while all of the pretty Mariposas are coloring if they are lucky enough to travel down the Freshly blown avenues who think, or who are thinking of Cooling,
In streams of by streams of everyone;
As if all of us from high school had become a confection of a constellation;
And as of yet I was still shapely and svelte so as to become
The only one thing she had yet a vested interested in; as if I had become
The only one thing of her own and only one thing that was so wonderful
As to become her wonderfully one thing of become.

Robert Rorabeck

Heralded By Zeus's Lightning

Heavens budded as roses to which the foxes
Are already leaping:
It is an easy thing to do already
While doorbell rings,
While the tortoises finally start out upon their Race:
Whist I've been so long at touching myself
Underneath the misbelieving heavens,
And too soon it will be Another Halloween,
And the skeletons will be altogether dancing:
And they will be handing out the sweets
Of vanished daylight underneath another
Banner of defeated heavens,
Because this is just the memory of the things that
All of humanity has already forgotten to do:
As I reached out to touch the last
Nuptials of whatever goddesses remained
In the nocturne of my bedroom
After all of the cartoons had turned out
And this just turned out to be another line strung out
Around a forest where my aunts made love
To foxes: and this was just the joy repeated
Underneath the rainstorms as the last of the latchkey
Children marched on home in mockery of the anthills
Underneath the paper trees and plastic army men
That, heralded by Zeus's lightning,
Could hardly contain themselves.

Here

Here, these are filthy things
In unnecessary lines.
I try to express myself to the firmaments
But I come down halfway
Like a pop-rocket spent
In some vacant lot in Kansas.
I reached to grasp you from the ledge,
But you leapt anyway into the strong man's Arms. I guess the fall wasn't as dangerous
As I had thought,
But you moved away too soon
From you childhood home
And now your memories sit around like
Squatters on that vacant lot, wondering
If they should be forgotten so
That they can go down to the swings
In the high Michigan park
Where the ghosts of my love hangout
Like juvenile delinquents
Flicking hot ash from their lips
As they take elliptical swipes at Being angels, as the chained wings take
Them....
Neither of us have to go to school anymore,
But I want to sit in the class and stare at Your eyes, even if they never turn
This way again....
Even if I never learn anything more
Than a few lines, like names pissed in the dark.
I'll always have a bushel full of fireworks
To shoot at the gods,
So if you ever decide to come around
That will be something we can do....

Here I Will Be

Soon the night will be crowing gold,
And the oilmen will have their flume,
And I can leave them and saddle up
The leather tack,
And volute out amidst the coalslicked fields
Where the cranes rise their antediluvian stilts,
Their sugar train phallus' peckering the ground
Where the cactus were once purple
But now drip like the inside of souls
Of men, the sharp nards and urchins they Grow into out here,
But I will leave them out across the salty
Plate skipping sunlight around the skulls of Dimmed amphibians, in this godforsaken sea,
And go to a place of sparkling womb with Veins that can feed me, the indented areola
Of her milk round hills, where the ants are Red and crawl like pets over my tools,
And there strike her with my work, sharp metal
My saliva peeling the pregnant topaz,
You can leave me here, where I have found
Gainful employment hooded outside the unions of Man, and baptize naked down in the curling tassels
Of her throat of leaping salmon.

Robert Rorabeck

Heredity Of Nurseries

I will think of you until the Day I die,
And not one thing but the kind ocean
Eulogizes my death-
And cormorants lace the unbroken sky;
And yellow buses keep returning-
And you are buried with Your fine husband-
Buried with your nose in
The crèche of his armpit:
Oh lucky man;
And right now
Somewhere in Texas,
Horribly disfigured-
I am in ancient love;
But you can be sure underneath the Highest peaks of your cumulous sky,
I will think of you until
The day I die.

Robert Rorabeck

Heroes Without Any Joy

This is the world of the fjord and I am not
Your hero—your ancestors have been beaten down—
Whatever rose there is, is destroyed unto the carpet
Of the vagabonds—the future of the spacecraft is There's, and the space of their wishing wells is null and void—
And I suppose that you loved me once upon a time
To the silence of the pecking song birds:
But while I dozed in the student parking lot, you were Making love upon love, studying yourselves in mirrors,
And learning how to awaken later and later until You perhaps didn't have to awaken at all—
And with your eyes closed could enjoy all of those Great dragons who pretended to prey upon
My world that was so chalk full of heroes without any joy.

Robert Rorabeck

Heron

I love the way the sun
Shines on your shoulders
Like off the wings of an aeroplane

When you stand there on
The side of the road like a river
Always moving,
Though you are the calm heron
Unperplexed, waiting,
Noticing reality
In the midday tide acquiescing
To your eyes,

The shade and the light
Like passing freckles
Hurdling torpidly
Across your wrist watch

A still-life with subtly violent
Changes,
In the palm-grove's heat
You chew your gum
And wait for the bus.

Robert Rorabeck

Hi, How Are You?

They should bury me
Right now,
While my heart still
Beats with your love,
Before that goes away
To die
Like everything else.

Just kick the dirt over
The daisy with the toe of Your boot,
Hide it from the sun
While it is still beautiful
This spring

For this thought of you
Is the best thing I
Have ever owned,
And I want to rest
With you blooming inside me,
Displaying to me seasons of fragile life,
For eternity.

Robert Rorabeck

Hidden Glass

Customers are empirical and their
Holidays,
Search for that special sort of perfection to Take home to abuse to throw away;
They cannot be denied,
And there is no stopping them,
But with your vision I light the ambergris
Floating in my head:
This is a glass behind my eyes, this is
A chalice: I am its knights errand stranding right
Here looking out at the blaze;
And the weathers will come and go,
And the tourists will pick up what they need.
Even if they saw you they wouldn't know how Beautiful you are,
A beauty that echoes like the soft light of
A cave cherishing its crepuscule for as long as it Could,
Wishing that it too had a mailbox to feel your Hand,
And your child is out in the park learning to stand,
And I am still right here,
My eyes closed enjoying the indestructible glow
I have blushing in a hidden glass.

Hieroglyphics Of Our Nostalgias

As a child, I dreamed of produce:
Radishes and cabbages blooming prodigiously,
And rabbits enjoying just
As richly as a young boy might pornography:

It was my parents' business,
The selling of the growing of things, the coming up of the world,
And it took us to the very ends of the earth:
Millions of dollars of ears of corn,
To where the lawyers and the doctors lived,
Swaybacked near where
The tortoises with the diamond shells basked.
And where we didn't belong:

Here, the sun shot up and spumed over
The burning golden sugar cane fields- where the upper middle Classes flocked such as golden herons to the schools with
The good ratings:

Here, the sun raked the earth with its rays,
And the greenness increased: it was easy enough to pick it
From our back yards, in the orange fields,
Choirs elaborating in battalions of sunlight;

Things that we could tell our tiny sons in spots of daydreams,
And look back on as hieroglyphics of our nostalgias:
A tangible void usurped from the mestizos, and the ancestors
Of cenotaphs:

We drove our cars across their graveyards everyday:
And in front of our eyes there were billboards, and billboards
Of a million dazzling things,
And places to park our cars so they couldn't move:
And an organization that we were sure to belong in,

In the schoolyards, noises rich with trumpets,
And herons flocking to the metamorphosis of alligators-
A long line of observers, and school kids like monarch butterflies
Migrating in yellow school busses:

a rich canopy that smokes with the abscesses of a magician's

Fire:

A mirage put upon the flesh of boys playing in the sand:

Hands of gossiping angels trying to dress them up in dinner attire:

And girls stretching as the shadows do,

Wringing the necks of mailboxes at crepuscule:

Distending into parks and playgrounds,

Causing mirages far beyond the places where we really lived.

Robert Rorabeck

High Altitude Graveyard

Delinquent children now making love
Under a desk of bubblegum and sunlight,
Like blue turds in a trout lake high up in
The glittering basins the Mountains secrete from fornication,
From slow but tolerant mobility, jangling storms
Like cloaks, like moats of sadness.
I smear expensive snails on my face so that
My mother will love me; I wear a tragedian
Death mask and eat
Red liquorish and clap farts to French cartoons
Where ladies and bicycles are synonymous.
I draw trees on the walls of my prison and girls with Scabbed knees and grass stains. What have they Been doing, I wonder, as I lick their inks from My palm,
And fat salmon swim by, pregnant and backwards
Not at all perturbed by the high altitude graveyards
Where they are going to pearl all their pretty children
Around a corpse.

Robert Rorabeck

High On Our Enamored Perfumes

I gave you a book of Borges today,
As I gazed at you like a fox from the water cooler:
What a shame that I have forgotten all of my Latin,
And I only know bastardized Spanish:
The book I wrote when I was twenty four, you held in your soft
Brown hands when you came over
And made me promise not to tell anyone that you'd Come over;
And then we rolled around on the floor, and you said you were Mad at me when you were leaving;
But your eyes filled the sky, and from my bedroom window
The fishtail palms weep upwards to you; they are green and emolliate
And I have seen fiery green lizards dancing on their limbs:
They are of your favorite colors, Alma:
And we ate your birthday cake yesterday: And I drove my teacher's Car by your house tonight while he was in Philadelphia,
And then I went to your church and had a look around,
And Miguelito stole a gardenia's bloom as we laughed all the way home,
High on our enamored perfumes.

Robert Rorabeck

High School Anatomy

Vivisected for high school anatomy-
See that it don't grow new curious
Red veins and purple arteries,
Like a staunch starfish;
And then stop moping and beat
Itself to death for girls
It hardly even knows, but only because
That is the nature of its selfish wound.

And I know that it is futile and will Spend the rest of its life alone,
Lost with its classroom of weeping brothers
In the soft gray ash down
At the bottom of the greatest torrential sea.

Robert Rorabeck

High School Tourism

Stalemate of the ploughs as another year is hers:
The girls get busy for Halloween and then for Christmas:
They play outside of the windows, as if the windows
Were our eyes;
And they seem to fashion inward, like trees growing
Toward the sun,
But moving along from class to class—brown shoulders,
With hair down around her ears,
An epiphany of a nickname—
Until she becomes all of the boldness that gets stolen
During naptime, and I remain sleeping underneath the bus Until she peels away with another boy to Travel upwards and upwards
Pass the congregations of the trees—slanting at runaway
Speed—the slope is her runaway
And soon she will consume herself in the air:
Ephemeral, metamorphic high above the daydreams of High school tourism.

Robert Rorabeck

High Schools That Are Still Pretty But Probably Never Existed

I wanted to go on the merry-go-round with you,

Alma:

On the day of our truancy, which I kissed the lips of the virgin of Guadelupe, praying to her that it would never set:

And I held your hand Alma while we looked at the Tasmanian devils

And you chastised me for looking at the white housewives,

When I only made eyes at you:

And I don't know why you wont move out of your room and come live

In this house:

The termites will all be smoked out after July 4th, and I won't have to Shoot myself in the mouth if you come:

We can go and look at the sea, and I can laugh at how with you I have Inevitably beaten every white girl alive;

And the last time I made love with you, I brushed my fingers across
Your ribs and seemed to recognize them:

It felt so good, like going down to Miami with my father back when I
Was still reading Encyclopedia Brown,

And I listen to my parents howling in their missionary positions

Hiding behind the beaded curtains:

And I am getting to comfortably fat and sedentary to hike to your house

Again, Alma; and I sent you orange roses yesterday that

Had almost died; but I bought new shoes today,

And you are still beautiful, as the cream rises above the beaten down

High schools that are still pretty but probably never existed.

Robert Rorabeck

High Schools That Surrender To Me

I went towards the flea market:
I fell towards the sea—
I surrendered to high schools that Surrendered to me:
And I saw how the world had changed,
Had went back towards her
Aboriginal thought
Underneath the first of the airplanes:
And I perceived how the kisses from
The sun were so swift:
As she did all of her work and then got Off from her shift—
And slipped into bed, and made love to
Her man—
And remembered her sweetest memories
As best as she can-

Robert Rorabeck

High Up In That Colorado

I cry in my house in Florida:

I cry and try not to breathe: the virgins sit in my

Foyer as green as an aloe's sheath:

And the cars gossip so loudly through the day,

But at night, and deep at night they have such very little to

Say:

Like Alma's love for me, they sleep, in the grottos of their

Love,

Wishing they had courage to end the incredible loneliness

Of my parade,

While all the sky puts on a play before getting teary eyed

And coming down as rain,

And my truancy of words remembers a high school it never

Believed it,

So it rides stolen bicycles up to the roofs of super men,

And there it seems to loll forever,

Trying to become Alma's favorite color, while the alligators

Turn purple,

And their virgins put off their lights, figuring that all of

Their knights have turned far too old to care for them:

And the moon cups and whispers to the wildflowers

Disturbed by no other men and yet utterly beautiful deep in

Their airy beds high up in that Colorado.

Robert Rorabeck

High-Class Stuff (Censored)

That less than average b-tch can go straight to h-ll
Well decorated in the cheaper ancestors, floating on Their lips:

Straight down with all their bills and catalogues
And name brand puff: Let the chipper scalawags
Walk the plank or tie them to the northbound tresses.

We could sacrifice paper airplanes and shoot them
Across the canal watch as the upturned noses crinkle
With the red holly, or we don't have to do any of that
At all: We don't have to go to class, or even stay on The ground. The palm tree's flute is an easy lift above
Into another filament, like the lighter portions of the sea.

Say, now we are here. Smoke and sing quietly.
Those aren't the rules, but it is what you do and if they don't like us, give them
A bird that will sing a song right up their a-ses,
Their little extra chromosome a-ses, because look at us
Like prayer flags, like real highfalutin swags. If they don't Like why we're here, why we can just nod off. We can Be real crocodilian and watch as the buses pirouette like Great yellow dragon flies, and then recite from books that They've banned, the well said pornographie$.

We can show our digs to snakes and compare.
Or we can just mouth off to prospectors trying to steal our Rocks, but

Enough said,
Give the others a shove down to the roadside and point them
The way home.
Give them a spotty red handkerchief for their stick,
So they can truck and roam.
Then its just us, yes sir, and the memories of Her shampooed hair whipping as she jogged around and round in her Little thing, like auburn tinsel for a switch
Whipping up confections, her legs stirring
Two scoops of vanilla ice-cream with the suds.

Yes, who cares about what they said-
That was some real high class fireworks- That was the stuff.

Robert Rorabeck

Higher And Higher, Singing

You looked so divine: I wonder what the world is like
In which you carry yourself: It is no more real than my world,
But it is so much more beautiful
Than mine,
Alma;
And I called you to me like a wounded beast calling a butterfly
Who had just changed,
And still wondering what she was- she came, she came,
And on my dying lips was your national anthem,
And we studied together
Into my deathbed until my dying wish melted into the snow at your Wings,
And you brushed them aside, and glittered away over the fireworks
And the fake boys trying to propose to you in the false light
Of the rosy tinfoil,
Until your stage burned beneath the mountains, and you flew and flew Until you laughed and poked out the sun and Stole his day away,
And carried yourself higher and higher, singing.

Robert Rorabeck

Higher Up And Purer

Lights through the brambles,
Old homes and overturned wagons:
Where have all the airplanes gone,
And why did you have to write
That you like football,
Because now I know you have all your better
Men, your chotskis and heirlooms,
Even though I don't know who you took to the Prom,
And you dress all in black while your bush your Toboggan down the main street,
And all the people looking at you consider you
Casually beautiful,
And they don't have a problem with you,
But they are just tourists:
They belong in the back of taxis where they Won't stop talking:
They have never seen the summit of my luxurious
Mountain,
Higher even now than the naked aspen in their Wide open woman's locker room:
Where you belong signaling airplanes like a fire engine
Steaming against my back
Milking the star-beams, catching the entire hay barn
Alight,
The fabulous momentum for the ellipses of all these circular
Objects,
These sports of fine young gods:
Something that is impossible not to believe in.
Rubbing two sticks together I capture you for a moment in A moving picture,
And it was how I evolved,
And loved you higher up and purer than any other man
Yet living.

Robert Rorabeck

Hijacked Bosoms

I have blood baked in an oven,
And flowers cooked on the stove,
Salted and
Made runny for your lips
Down to your legs:
And your belly-button is a glacial lake
Just beneath the bosom
Where your unabashed child suckles
Through bike rides
And sunsets:
Like two milkshakes riding high
And unbraziered,
Like stewardesses done with leaping shift:
I would like to smooch and suckle
Just one or both
If I pay my toll,
If they are unoccupied:
I would return them to their Rightful place and owner,
Given enough time:
I would put them back, or I would reveal them
As communal property
And take them into box cars with me and nourish
Upon them all throughout them Midwest,
Going no place in particular,
Skipping trains,
Hibernating like a Buddhist bumblebee on your Hijacked bosoms.

Robert Rorabeck

Hippies And Sand Lions

If she called me a hippie,
My misquoted Tallahassee lassie,
I could have told her that those rubber tramps
Were fine gentlemen compared to me:
I could have been a lover but now I'm a pest,
And the only way I could get her to look
At me was to die,
But I haven't done that,
And now I am just something that crawls across
The shade of her picnic table while she eats
Melons from his hands and doesn't mind the stick:
I am either a spore or an ant carrying one,
But I am working,
And soon I hope to build up and take the bar
To become a sand lion,
And then disappear into my trap and wait for her
In the little funnel in the patches of dune beneath
The slash pines,
And say that I will mow my yard and paint my fence
And hang up "For Marriage" signs,
And wait, and wait, and wait for her, until the sun
Gets greedy and over fed.
Then she will come and I will kiss her like a Doctor's mallet, and then knock her out in bed,
And say things to her beauty which she will never Know were said;
Thus in the morning I will take her to the kitchen
Over looking the teal canal where the early sun is Rising like a returned tennis ball,
And I will feed her likewise from my hands,
Thus she would know for certain what I am....

Robert Rorabeck

His Beautiful, Beautiful Hill

Penny ante pageantry so blinds you that
You cannot spell—
I've been the sunlight over-spilling on
Your window sill—
And the world becomes just so many places
Without any sound—
Holidays and werewolves,
And housewives cavorting across the grounds—
In the beautiful echoes from which they Spill,
As the crucify another god upon his beautiful,
Beautiful hill.

Robert Rorabeck

His Burning Town

All of it falling into a fire- while the fish leap
At first lucky,
But then expire: before the lips of the fox
Who leaps, it sears:
Beneath the airplanes, it wastes its years:
And burns away,
A tinderbox that was at first a music box:
At first an heirloom
Now a souvenir, and not one of the handy pilots
Seems to care,
But closes his eyes as the ship is going down,
Or kisses the stewardesses, one by one,
As they happily leave his burning town.

Robert Rorabeck

His Calmest Light

The way the sun shone all over this Pretty planet,
And saw all of us, insouciantly spontaneous
Grew us like garnish on a liquid plate,
Run his naked fingers of roman legionaries
Through your pretty hair,
And saw and swore that you were who he Wanted,
And took you even further away from me,
Up to the slopes of high banishment,
The pretty psalms who echo like Spanish tears, and the cheerleaders who are Dying,
And now you are in his pretty chamber imbibing
Her never mindful thoughts,
And he shines on you his calmest light,
And you awaken and are lost.

Robert Rorabeck

His Favorite Hawaiian Shirt

They found
Him dead,
A cenotaph in A hammock
Strung like a
Loose guitar string
Between annabell
Palms,
A monkey husk,
His face turned to the Side he wanted
The world to see
Him as,
An evaporated martini,
Of salt and rind
In his paw.
He was wearing his Favorite Hawaiian shirt.

Robert Rorabeck

His Favorite Song

You are right out there listening to
The plagiarisms—
Wondering when they will finally come inside to Make love to you—
As the housewives go gallivanting
From their husbands to their playboys—
As the oceans lie starving
And there isn't a bird in that sky who hasn't Forgotten his favorite song.

Robert Rorabeck

His Forgotten Creation

If I try to find you now
Serving the wanderers the old road brings,
Where Chaucer left off and died
From want of your lips,
I will only end up back here
Alone and wounded in my room,
Crying out loud to the four walls,
The bitter end of this continent-
When I last saw you,
Weren't you entrenched in the coital exhibit
Near the beautiful dead boy
With blue stockings.
Carefully, you were pronouncing
Again and again
The name of a real man
Making sure to get it as right
As he was getting you:
And that was the most singular
Devilish sort of survival right off the Way where the pilgrims were moving,
Kicking up dust to Canterbury.
And you failed to make it into the cut,
I suppose, because the old poet was entirely jealous,
That he wanted you ousted from
The history he was distilling in his immortal lines.
Thus reducing your golden paladin into
The plebian knight on the roam,
And you to nothing more than that moan
From the lascivious wind
Recreationally laying bare-assed,
Inhaled like caffeine snuff by the proboscis
Of the Wife of Bath;
But, unlike the greater tradesman,
I could not deny that I wished for a piece
Of such a wanton lust,
The naked geometry arcing in the pines;
Thus along the way,
I wrote these few lines,
Scratching my foot in the dust,

Though I could not stop to guard you for all time,
And already the wind he cast your identity with,
Was picking up and claiming you
As his forgotten creation.

Robert Rorabeck

His Handless Instruments

Kisses like coral snakes—like rum spilled
Down the neck of her wedding dress,
As the world spins from her in a kaleidoscope of Airplanes:
Burning off her phosphorous abuses:
She spins and spins arse-backwards
Just as fast as apples fill their bins-
Until her art falls asleep into darkness:
Imagine the brightest angel
Experiencing blindness—the senses of nonsense—
And one day of her childhood lost in her backyard
In the pornography of her frog princes:
The dog eats the rabbit and the paper airplanes
Do not make it across the canal—
The fireworks get spent into her dresses,
And not a single person in the audience can understand
The soliloquy of her final exegesis
As she becomes adrift underneath the houses
And disappears even though the firemen burn up the Night above her—
As nothing but a lily in the ocean she languishes—
An uncountable time surrounding her,
Recording her in the infinity of his handless instruments.

Robert Rorabeck

His Meal For The Night

Night blooms from the day,
And I've just been checking to make sure everything was Alright:
Your husband sure looked hungry through the blinded windows,
And it is such the shame
That you must bloom, his meal for the night.

Robert Rorabeck

His Most Unfortunate Brother

There I was shipping across the sea
With so many coins spread beneath me and kissing
Alma's toes,
Congratulatory now that all the monsters had surceased
Into the forgotten sounds of Airplanes- and everyone rode bicycles and looked so
Far away,
Now that they didn't have to worry about their houses,
Or the always panting tongues of mailboxes:
Now that they had seen us together at the zoo for the first
Time,
As we kissed and looked at the encapsulated wildlife
All in their tender cages like warm presents:
And I felt her lips, and she swore that I shouldn't Write about anything more;
But I have already written about the novels of her future;
And today was the best day of my life,
Alma,
Even if my father lost the fruit market to his brother,
Long after Cain had already slain his most unfortunate brother.

His Own Wish

Beauty is recluse: it goes far back into its boudoir;
And I have never seen beauty, just her conjunction, and her pierced Nose, which I overuse;
And the night is in delectable, just as if I am selling oranges
Along the boulevard in Miami
Back struck against the holocaust museum,
And this is something very serious but all the same cannot be proved;
And now I will have a little house, and tiny, tiny wishes that Will take me all the way to her;
But she is so expensive- She is fleeting, and she is the beauty jeweled
Into a body that is even more beautiful, but dying;
And, if I had been but a politician: or, say, a successful lawyer,
Then in the stillborn courts of her brethren I would have been beautiful:
I would have been all strung out and beautiful,
But now I will never speak to her again; and all I am good for is tarnishing
The grapefruit of her nonexistent harem; but who am I writing this
For tonight, for this certain isn't a fable, nor do I wish her for my harem;
But I am parroting the rhymes of a popular gentleman that Disappeared before me decades before this;
And this is just the industrious goldfish making laps in his little bowl,
Biding his time, and awaiting his own wish.

His Penumbrae's Gaze

Listen to the night stutter on the hem of the sea.
The moon has stopped its infinite tug,
A dream of an incarcerated god who still has fever over her;
But she is going away now, exhausted
Without a thought of the life teaming inside her,
Without a thought of men other than the one she belongs to
For awhile,
Her wetness will indent the shore like the notches in A harem of brown throats where the crabs scuttle like Discombobulated coachmen returned to the more basic forms
Of survival,
And the effervescing waves will lift away, as if she Has slipped off her dress, as if the night watchman has Sipped off the foam from his amber glass,
And drunken until his mind swims in her inebriations;
And she is going away, receding into the amnesiac thoughts
Of her maiden boudoir,
Letting the wind slip over her flaxen body like the whispers
Of a patient bachelor through her inviting windows;
And the night is alone in the sad wonder of eerie traffic,
The rush of the alien no longer minced with her calibrated sway,
The carouseling waltz gravity rips off again her surface,
The needed touch she gives mindlessly to the sun.
He hangs over in his great darkness the entire length
Of her shimmering bed, but not once does she awake to return
His penumbrae's gaze,
For she doesn't know how he longs to run the felt
Of extinct reindeer, or the red trumpets of olympic moose, through the crests and troughs in which,
Like a whipping banner over an unsundering fort, her body moves;
And he remains there, sobbing in a barren garden attended
By misdirected ghosts and the sad laughter of lost children,
Until the sun banishes him with a stroke,
And she leaps up to kiss her fellow.

Robert Rorabeck

His Pitiless Caresses

Purple ribbon in colorless hair-
Lying in the bed where I placed you somewhere-
Gone over the roving combers,
Gone to play baseball and to make eyes with Dynasties,
While the fireworks dying, hissing golden rods
Into the two for one sky,
Over the slopes of horses, their hoofs stamping
Arrowheads in the moonlight stolen
To belong there-
As you have lost yourself beyond the train tracks
Again,
And stolen into the slopes and raiment of
His pitiless caresses-
As a long ways off, the sky shutters-
And seems for an impossible while that it will Never come down.

His Regular Music

You have your patron, and he has his regular music,
And now there is nothing left that cannot be believed, while the Neighborhoods of the affluent just get more and More beautiful- just don't look so guilty there in the last evening before Christmas: and we are still making love,
While I promised you all of these gifts- and I touched you just while
The last of the winter's sun was rising up:
And you moaned your wish that showed as your children grew up,
And filtered through the rooms of your house:
And your brown, velvet brown body showed its goose bumps:
As my cousin looked at you out in the yards of your infidelity:
Alma, but you said it was okay to play around as Long as he didn't touch you: even while my poems graced the vanishing Lips of my poor grandmother's grave:
And I still sing for you- As I've been to Spain, and the night still keeps Culling up, and pulling its cattle past the tree lines of the richest mountains;
Until all that remains after the airplane's song, Alma: is you and I
Calling to one another like shadows weeping toward themselves;
And it is all less than gold, or the science fiction of the ancient Greeks:
As the candles promise so many birthdays, but they just keep dying before
They can add anything more to your youthful adventures:
Where you have so faithfully gone off the surest paths, and let all of your Roses bleed into the un chiseled smiles upon the feral swing sets
Of the loping gentlemen who have stolen your tiny brown legs
Alma, just so you could watch them run.

Robert Rorabeck

His Senses And Gestures

Lines to the fisherman who in his Insouciant architectures has gone to sleep:
Lying like the shadow on the wall
Beside my wife:
Is she sleeping, or is she listening to me
Getting drunk and typing.
Either way there are still orange groves,
As you as women in love but Abandoned—ladders emptied of Mexicans—her brown apiaries left
Abandoned, her fires skipping town—
And I am left with the principal coming Into my room tomorrow—
With his senses and gestures,
And the world on the lines of a little Thing—so little that the puppets seem Disturbed. Here it is they thought they Would end up being real, but, as it
Turns out, they were wrong.

Robert Rorabeck

His Smile Begins The Gleam

In a confused night, the stars close up like
Virgin buds,
The gloomy tortoise parts his mouth to eat
The nocturnal roses,
The somber petals turning brightest red to pulp
Somewhere within the silvery drawers of the ancient beast
Her slight hands come down upon, eggshell trembling
For the sound and force of thunder, as from the Dark fleet of clouds gallops vigilantes off the Mediterranean—

Her youth has drowned and it feels like
The bodies of azure sailors are lodging
In her clotted throat, revenants the sky displays garroted with Briars of scarring lightning that flicker the undeviating sorrow
Her face contains, a failed vessel overflowing at the eyes
To look upon the grey tombs of sunset and the sea
A necropolis coming alive, each wave a white stone Rolling over, as if the dead underneath wished to Rise from the briny knolls, to overcome the guard-man tide and Walk the cindered beach upon sunset—

There on the torpid cliffs she is only an echo,
The grey shroud her heart lays in a sack for murdered game,
Her lips play like muted instruments against the storm's
Wicked lamentations, the carnival of mattered beasts
Stealing away the dreams of a young girl's bedroom,
Leaving only the sky broken apart, a window thrown wide,
The clouds its tattered curtains, revealing to her the Horrific silhouette of night's face,
Crescendos as his smile begins the gleam.

Robert Rorabeck

His Sons And Nephews

In the middle of high school
I used to leave classrooms—I used to leave
Right out of school
And flop and drink right beside the waves—
Seahorses teaming from some anonymous
Father's liquor cabinets—
The sun a stream of pugilists, beating me until
I was stinking of nocturnal perfume:
What a way to live—
Little children at my door—entire apple orchards:
Now I am a teacher—
The sky cries in the afternoon on weekends
While I drink—
The eyes of Dr. TJ Eckleburg are in the room.
My Mexican uncle just sold his truck
And his son and nephews are over celebrating.

Robert Rorabeck

His Today

The day becomes really grand holding the books that I
Plagiarize with so many javelins that burn my eyes
While my mother washes clothes in the carport with her machines,
As if it was a grotto:
As if the puppies had survived, and I was good enough of a man
As to look her in the eyes;
But when I got to the flea markets now, I only go to buy gifts for you:
And we made love today, but I don't have to tell you:
The traffic rushes and the airplanes roar,
And the air-condition crashes against the walls behind the closed doors:
And you did the laundry for your extended family today,
While I lit candles for you and prayed;
And I read poetry of graveyards- and I wrote the poetry of fools:
None of my professors shall remember me,
Or understand that you have become my sharpest and most important Tool:
And this is your kingdom, your deep brown eyes shine upon,
So famished and so young, that when your love grows in the spherical Gardens of those twins, it is impossible to know for certain:
It is love for a blind man who loves you that way,
Because he has lost his senses for you, and yet you were his today.

Histories That Are Yet To Come

Cars pool into Colorado,
Backing up for ice-cream and wine, you know:
Cars pool into Colorado like diamonds around her neck,
Like blushing baseball players in an organized
Wreck through wolf pass and then up through the collegiate Peaks:
That is your backyard, Sharon, all the little hotels I did sleep in While climbing in Buena Vista,
And you were already well set down your way huffing
Into Colorado Springs,
Like a miner with snow shoes, tossing your hair and counting your Silver,
Blowing ordinary boys away: The traffic stands up for you,
Sharon:
It waits for you, because these are educated tourists who know the Ends and outs of science museums: How Nicola Tesla sensed you
Out, that you should be there one day underneath the highest Race tracks in the world:
That you should float up to the very golden foam in which my mother
Was born; and forever celibate, not unlike myself,
He should create electricity for you and run it up and down the street,
And they should have festivals of the dead while you ancestors
Were but teething;
And somewhere in the back of his mind, he knew that the world would Glow intelligently for you, just as I do now,
Even though I am just the premature historian for the greatnesses of your Histories that are yet to come.

Hitting The Bottle

Another night,
And I am taking it upon myself again
To steal those things which aren't real,
Postulating on my silent houses
I haven't moved into,
Avant-garde Jewish neighborhoods
Where my certain dysfunctions aren't any longer
In the majority,
Where everyone can spell better than me,
And I am certain to find a lover truer than the beaten
Heart I now wear soldered into my chest
Like a watch that has stopped working;

And I do this instead of doing anything which Might be considered productive:
I lie on this piss stained bed as the little dog whines
In little colorless dreams his four legs abound through,
And I salivate over far distant mermaids
And the cleated avenues I might leap with stewardesses
Serving me drinks to get to her:
But I don't do it—There is cheap rum in the Drawer, and I should get to that before my next Poem,
Should get to that before I ever again begin a new Novel, a newer sunrise trying to caress my sad brow which Will not have it,
Will not know again the light of an undeniable illusion,
The very same light that she lie down with her to kiss
The world all over her,
While she goes into the suddenly whimsical hibernations she Is right to have,
And into dreams fully locked with a man so handsome and rightly
Hers, that I should not justly described him
Even after I hit the bottle.

Robert Rorabeck

Hoeing My Father's Row

Any day now the planes will fall,
The plum will fall from the plum tree's
Lip,
And the little blue girl will look upon it
And drool- She will not think that
These are the tools she's seen,
Or that the deeper narcissisms would have Begun constructing gravities and fairy-tales-
All the neurosis of having fine young Entrepreneurs as forbearers- Angelic
Youths whose blond hair wilted to silver,
Who no longer straddle the earth dirtying their Short pink buckskins,
But instead go inside when it rains and talk on The phone. She will tell the ants to take the plum,
Even as the sky quickens and begins to fester
Like putrid cottage cheese.
I watched her stare at it for hours atop
Hadrian's Wall- I wasn't supposed to be there.
I was supposed to be hoeing my father's row,
But the composition of the still-life she formed
Intrigued me so that it was too late to learn my lesson,
And the enemy's keen arrow knocked me in the side
From out of nowhere.
Pirouetting like a gallant destruction
I became still and broken beneath her gaze,
Like a whispering fruit where I could see the ants
Marching with multisegmented expectations,
Heave-hoing from her saturnine conduction. I didn't Know what I was doing, and neither did she.
The arrow had broken off and dug deeper like a serpent
For more knowledge.
She watched me until the rains started
Showing her bee-stung cleavage.
I thought maybe she almost decided a wicked smile
Before she turned like a heavenly shadow at morning
And drove home still drooling to eat;
I pretended that after I died she would come and look at Me again, but I knew she would tell none of her family,

The enemies.

I took comfort and waited for the ultimate return.

Hold My Chains And Warm My Face

Windmills on the back of the earth,
My eyes half asleep,
My other senses half bled and lazing like well
Pallid damsels with beautiful breasts
Distressed in the sepia of Snow storms
And all of that and dim lights
And the patterns of woodland canopies flickering:
And I have done no wrong,
And look at my bank account,
Yet I am celibate and extremely alone:
I am so alone,
And there is nothing romantic about it,
But if I had a wife and children,
Wouldn't I be just as far gone,
Misplaced over the railroads and fields
Of Easter eggs,
Like the swings waiting in the cold park,
Still waiting
And waiting as if for resurrection day,
For the girl to come and sit
And hold my chains
And warm my face.

Robert Rorabeck

Holden

I was the only one in a class of fifty
Who defended Holden Caulfield,
Even though I look like Robert Ackley,
Have his name,
His complexion, and his religion!
But I'm not so simple a nemesis, for I
Have watched Phoebe go around on
The red horse in the rain:
Around, and around,
And around. She could be my little sister
Too, that's how much I can relate,
But there is no use in saving her or anybody
Else, not in the way that is expected.
The feminist professor
In the night class in Turlington Hall,
In Gainesville FL. wished to identify him by Proclaiming him a misfit, and all the petit Feminists agreed, in pink rows, and the Boys in baseball caps agreed too: that was
The game. There could be nothing scarier
Than Phoebe sitting there with us and Carrying on: That's what Holden knew.
I barely talked, I barely talked
At all and that must have been eight years ago.
I would ride home to her religion in
The student ghetto and
We would catch Letterman on t.v.,
Laugh, and eat, and fart, and fool around,
But she's gone away too, married a lawyer
And gotten a good haul, but she has failed even
When the professor would say she was right to do so.
Not like Holden or I have, fallen because We have gone down like model rockets and Never re-ignited, down into the misplaced
Weeds crowning the heads of alligators on
The other side of the canal,
Like paper burning from the open windows
Of sky-scrappers. I worked at Taco
Bell for four months, and got fat for a little While, and filled tacos with one of the girls in my Class.

We both got C+s, but she had nothing at
All to say in regards to Holden Caulfield,
And her name was Greek for catastrophe,
Though I tried my best in his defense, I could say
So little out loud, since we were speaking in a Language whose annunciations only work while
In a crowd, but still I would put on the Red hunting cap against the world,
And recognize the inability to proclaim
The hypocrisies which only silence's observation Identifies:

The cannibalisms of well-dressed loves,
And the people who pull in the shades of gossip,
But only get in by dress-code.

That professor is still astonishingly prolific,
And grew-up across the street from the Caulfield's I suspect, but She'll never be even semi-autobiographical
To Salinger,
Though she has said many things that echo up
And down the hall, into each child
Who she deems her reverberations, it is oh so doubtful
She has yet to acknowledge Holden Caulfield's Inability to succeed as a judgment call upon those Artless establishments where she very happily
Nooks her world.

Holding Hands Haiku

Holding your hand is Better than making love
With other women.

Robert Rorabeck

Holding Kites

Now I am afraid of this scar,
And another picture: the other students are holding Starfish in their upturned hands,
Asking how they can be so easily divided.
And the music boxes are Holding kites.
While, today, I made love to a girl with two bullet holes,
And then I went to see the principal,
But in between them I wrote some poems.

Robert Rorabeck

Holding Your Arms

Tears from a scar less cathedral
Where the crystal dragons go to think of you—
Belly- up anemones—
Blue gills without any right to the echoes of Minnows—
And just another song to sing:
Just girls passing in the hallways—
Pretending to find shelter—lips fighting the water fountains,
As another day passes—and cold minnows
Solidify on the Shoulders of the narcoleptic butterflies—and if you know
That this is a fable,
Then you know that you are here—sleeping underneath
A car, as sleeping underneath cathedral
In the middle of school—
With neckties of your favorite flowers waiting for their Prom dates—
And all of your favorite colors hypnotized—
Your coffin become a zoetrope—or more like a kaleidoscope
With strong boys holding your arms,
Lifting you up to see the illusions in the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Holes In The Sky

There are holes in the sky:
How so? But my aunt isn't coming Down. I call her with the songs I know,
That were taught to me casually
By the song bird, my best friend,
Before they took her into the mines
To be sure:
Now the rivers swim without water,
But without that how can I be sure:
I haven't a home, and yet I am living here:
They make a quarry out of her tears,
But she hasn't cried since they began
Panning there;
And the old men who adopted me and Carried me on the litter they decorated
With cut boughs and round stones,
Let their beards grow down into her,
And echoed in the bristles of their stir:
Now I am so close to her, that I can feel
Her breathing in her home, but there is no
Light where they make love,
But I should know the way, and walking,
Could take her, and carry her to where her Wealth would be found and given as the Names for new children the sky dropped down,
But it hasn't rained in the camp,
And the pans have rusted, and all the songs,
wilting without lips to sing,
Have sunken beneath the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

Holiday Mythologies

I feel like Hercules under this tent.
I finger housewives while they give me that
Eye. I swear in Spanish: La verga-
I sell Christmas trees to Catholics, and What not. Sometimes they want a crèche
Hung under their eyes like a mobile for a colicing
Child. I abide, and at night I wander the moguls
And estuaries they have decorated in, her state of Pretty egrets: the streets flow like constables
Our perambulating, spinning their sticks and batons:
When I see Jews, I don't talk to them, but they still Circle around me and try to carry on. I whistle silly Pietas, and when I drive, I roll planets up and down my Forearms. Comets buzz, and before bed I buy strawberry Icecream and crackerjacks and eat in the hedgerows with
The never-settling ants while the last of the customers
Leave, and the chainsaws stop their whicker mastications.....
When the parlays are over, when the poetry is read,
I drink a few sips of rum, listen to China Forbes sing Dosvedanya;
Pedro puts on a pseudo-orgasms for his own amusement:
I drink out of a special cup I've stole from a man I've Never met: he might be dead. Still, I am careful not to write
In stanzas, but I have nothing on Sylvia Plathe, who will Live forever for 32 yrs, but I can only give this this,
Which I see you already have.

Robert Rorabeck

Holiday Of Rattlesnakes

This is how it happens that there are
No more brides in the park,
With the sun coming up and the larks singing
For a lark;
And in her golden wedding dress she sets me down.
And with her roaming eyes roams all over town,
Across the train tracks,
Through the thistles,
Into the peonies of muddy dirges where the water moccasins
Make eyes
Flagged into the coattails of coal cars,
As the nocturnal planes skim the micas of daylight from
The skies;
And you sleep in your little room all at a loss,
Alma- soul carried from Mexico, but your baskets
Are full of bread
And artichoke hearts; and it all seems to come to me for A reason:
Deaf and blind, I somehow hear and see,
Your brown lips echoing in warning and straying me towards
A holiday of rattlesnakes.

Robert Rorabeck

Holidays Further And Further Away

Sodium is the same one we use for Street lights,
And I love you, but I am out of wind,
But should still be good use for you on Halloween,
Or maybe even other Holidays;
And we can go out holding hands until
The brightness dims,
And no one should ever go home knowing
Us,
And we can get rich on toothless famine;
And under the lights of Enceladus's
Icy crust, the housewives are washing dishes,
And the cops are gossiping at every corner
So everyone is safe:
And I can see how colorful your eyes are,
Even when they ring other planets;
And if you'll allow me before you run away,
To take you to the park where they dug the lake
To increase property values,
Then there I'll keep a house for you that no one Else can see,
And room it full of children and hold séances to Such grief
After you have let go of my hand and left,
And October ended and the kids died at the lake,
And I married another woman who didn't have
Your eyes;
But I will still, from the lowest roof, light off white
And blue fireworks that will die into the butchered
Revenues of so many mistakes,
And holidays further and further away from you.

Robert Rorabeck

Holidays Of Interchangeable Heirlooms

They are such good people they have no more liquor
In their souls,
And she has been cheating on him again in the early morning
Falseness of trailer parks and Doused Catholic churches:
And I've been busy touching myself again, croaking and Combining primary colors like married couples:
And these are the trailer parks where you pretend to survive,
The super heroes are exhausted on park benches and Sleeping underneath the old news of their accomplishments;
And I know you don't need to be saved,
But I am doing it again, making a suicide of so many sodas,
While the ball parks are sold out on the green,
Green esplanade:
And your boys are just as blonde as you are, and I don't Think they will ever be growing tired:
Their bicycles are tireless as unicorns; and I don't want to Have to look at myself in the boy's bathroom again:
I just want you metamorphosed and coming to me
Before all the games break down and I forget the better way home:
And all of this is just as suspicious as the semiprecious barbs
Of sting rays:
And I love many other days of holidays of interchangeable
Heirlooms I guess I shouldn't suppose to have to say.

Hollowed The Stars

Sad, sad decomposition
These atoms are frantic,
And tired of waiting to take her
To the prom- They have thrown away their corsage,
Even though they still might love her;
They have ventured into the unlit football stadium
To drink with the boys and their knives:
They can piss everything away then;
They can escape from the sun before
It is devolves into the inescapable:
They can buy their mother a birthday card,
And say it doesn't matter,
Because it doesn't:
The little words like a hungry fever
Will eat the starlings before they learn to fly:
A rattlesnake will find the withered nest,
And even bones will flit away once they Figure out how to conspire with her breath.
She has already found another man,
And has fallen into him like a pollinated crutch:
They will go together for the length of the song,
And even if she forgets the memory,
Tears will line her cheeks curiously, as
He will love her long after the conflagration has Hollowed the stars.

Robert Rorabeck

Home Across The Carports

Alma, I am listening to you right now,
While I am wishing that I had a bicycle to ride toward your Clever boudoirs;
And while I think of you I also praise all of your immaculate
Jewelry,
While over these past two months you've become my one and Only muse:
Don't you wonder now, Alma, as I do too, if Sharon and Erin
Read you too:
Maybe even Kelly reads you, if she can read- while my house
Floats on a sea of your world,
And I will meet you everywhere, for you are as brilliant as You are beautiful, Alma:
Really, you are more beautiful and more brilliant than me:
I am just the hungry satellite orbiting the aforementioned brilliance,
But I can still buy you dinner,
Even if you love Nelson: I love you, and I want to take you to The movies, and I want to pan gold for you:
And my nose bleeds and my feelings are unconditional for you,
For the astronauts of their ice-creams will soon be floating home
For you,
And we have my mother so worried:
But she is a good woman, Alma: my mother, she is a good woman,
And if she really knew you, she would really love you, but right now
I am always too busy climbing up your sweet and darkening brown Slopes, bighting my lip for the grizzly bears of your cupids to Give a damn to even begin describing your stupid beauty for Her Alma:
And I have been so high up to kiss all the pleasurable white necks of All the passive tense aspens, and not even give another word or
A damn for:
Alma,
I love you: I love you and my lights give off their brilliance,
And my canons fire off their ordinances for you, while you are drinking the Perfumes of your defeated orchards,
And all of the greater amusements that I have already defeated for you,
Just to call you home across the carports and again into the Drunken teddy bears of our shared
And unexplainable bedrooms:

This is how hard I get, and this is how hard I always try for you,
Alma...
Alma.

Home Again

Silver slippered grasshoppers in a cloud
Of ambulances—
My pregnant wife in the bathroom attending
To her grievances—
I am tossing wine on the couch with my Dog,
Trying to spell my amens—
I hope nobody can find me out—
I hope I can get all the pretty girls I've Fallen in love with and find my way home again.

Homeless

If you were my daughter,
I'd put you out across my knee,
Like two lonely sea-sick lovers throwing
Glances in a spatial dance of four limbs,
And two opposable thumbs which eventually Found the avenues of her dress,
Each button and hook,
And street lamps, and science:
Even put down for the recession of the latest Franchise, these words are no good-
They don't do the trick, they don't know anybody.
Already, we have forgotten which way to turn,
What things are good- There are only so many words,
And most of them awful, and crippled,
Like cadavers nameless through their yellowing
Stacks,
Or at the other end decadently bourgeoisie, reserved
For the upper classmen who never think to smoke or
To cut class to purvey the lanky canal in the slip of A silken canoe, to greet out of the way housewives
Sunbathing after doing the dishes down the fickle easement
Beside their pet otters. These things I have never seen,
But have heard of from the rain, or while skipping classes
And dream under the bus
In a heliotrope or darker slick. I will wake up now, and every Thing will have changed, matured or gotten a profession.
Even my little sister is older than me; and the girl
I loved? It is like she was a daydream passing through A sunbeam who has broken into new continents,
Bathed in reawakened seas, who doesn't say hello,
Doesn't even know that I have come out into the front
Yard after the storm where the kittens have drowned.
Now the neighbors are drinking beer and the rabbit is Dead from the dog's affections in the rock garden.
The kidnapper has already passed by,
And the Australian Pines are leaning against each other
As cripples. The sun is out again, innocently composing:
I am only four years old. The house is made out of old bricks
That will crumble,

And I will blame him because you are gone,
And I have nowhere else to go.

Mammals with Swollen heads strut
Around like young gods
Who have just learned
How
To brush their teeth.

Honey

Tipsy: I have been published by a criminal,
A privateer commissioned by the queen-
For where is my money, I say, or I sing:
I wish I could write derivative science fiction by the Truck load, I wish I could swashbuckle, or, at least,
Be as industrious as my most industrious of uncles:
For now, however, I am doing all right, sipping my rum,
Looking mighty fine tonight; and finding myself in a rhyming Mood, over eagerly laughing at how impossible it is To be published, to become lucrative in my dysfunctional
Condition: but, you see, I love the moon,
And the mountain; I am like a pig on its truffle: I am
Done delivering Christmas trees, and I didn't do have awful:
I am almost him, almost enough money to buy a house,
Almost enough talent to get my name out: What I would really
Like to do is get down on my knees and worship you;
If you have a scabby knee from roller-skating, I would like to kiss
It and press it like a scabby flower against my scabby cheek;
I would like to cheer for you at the roller derby this weekend
Or all week; Now the sea, that is something else, that is a funny Thing, and I would like to live right next to her, but she is an Expensive thing; and what of you now, honey, how much I Want to say your name, but you have given me no excuse at all-
To say your name, and you're the one I blame.
And maybe someday soon, honey, I will Move right next to you, and work upon you, and give you all my Money; because I love the moon, and the mountain, and concourses
Of waves; but most of all it is you I love: I love you most of all,
Honey.

Hoping To Appear Mysterious

I was on the mountain where there
Were tourists, and it snowed for the first time
That season, just as it snowed for my birthday;
And looking down,
I could truly say that I saw the whole thing,
Those villages in the nooks and crannies
Where citizens cried and made love,
And dogs ran in slightly feral wonders to and
From the bakers and the butchers,
Amazed and distracted by the dinner-time smells.
I could only sit there for a few minutes,
For down at sea level there were things to do
Waiting for me, and even greater than these was the Continuation of what now amounted to over
Five years of insouciant limbo truncated in a
Celibate bedroom; slightly scarred, I departed
Justly separated from the others of my kind,
Thinking of sweet little accolades and comparing the Aspens to segregated sororities swaying the deep southern Continents where oral folklore still existed;
There was a video game which needed beating,
And a halfway cohesive poem to write, a little Bit of yard work, and then to record the footprints
In the valleys which meandered from turquoise arrowhead
To ochre; and looking up, after I had come down,
There she was, the constant goddess shackled to the Earth, as airplanes leapt over her head like silver frogs
On their way to Alaska, or Honolulu, and some of those Travelers had their faces in totem-poles, and others
Made thousands writing romance novels;
But they could not say who I was. If they looked down
They couldn't even see me, but I did not blame them,
For I had already turned away, and disappeared into the Tule fog, hoping to appear mysterious.

Horrible Child Throughout The Snows

At night aren't you a god of snowbells?
Don't you practice your paper crafts with wine
And cheese,
A little teacher of the northern hemisphere
Deeply in love with your husband-
I don't know anything about married life, but Yours must be great-
Your indescribable eyes so far away that I don't Even try,
But you should be proud that you are that much
Closer to airplanes.
Right out front of me the traffic goes leaping all
Day,
But what does it know of your coming winter?
What does it have to say,
And so where is it really going- I figure that I Want to die by that little part of you that is Indian,
Because maybe you are just about thinking of
Me,
Or otherwise I am not real, and my brown eyes
Are the only thing about my sadness which isn't Scarred- Still young and ironic,
I want to put on miracle plays beneath your house,
And let you shoot me full of turtle dove arrows-
I want to be scarred by hail and so unsalable that I just sit and lick my wounds in the back corner
Of your miracle shop,
Shrunken like a cannibal's head, so that you can pick Me up and coo to me nursery rhymes along with your Daughter,
And share with her your milky twins, the little roman
Crests I guess you know,
And look up into your eyes and become your horrible
Child throughout the snows.

Horses And Unicorns

Here are the seating arrangements lactating
In mausoleums
With ceilings full of blown glass in the shape of Shells—
The day spinning industriously—the patrons
Burning in and out of the supermarket where
You worked with her—
Like candles turning in a rink—the small candles,
Children—or the dimming elderly—
And the alligators smile and yawn with the lions
Not knowing what they do—
As you disappeared from riming the cusp of my Dreams—and flew away with your children
To the land of horses and unicorns.

Robert Rorabeck

Hospitals Of Spain

Rains, you patter on
The tents- soft mouse-foot
Patter,
I think of Tennessee aunts
In wet tall grass-
Two headed horses feeding
From her hand,
Feeding her of this;
And flying army
Ants-
Escorting pregnant airplanes
All the way over the Royal crown sea
To the hospitals of Spain.

Robert Rorabeck

Hot Legs

In cerulean day shifts
Power-lines are gold
Floss,
Ladies wearing rows of Curious pigeons
By her salubrious lips;
Legs like bicycles:
Legs, legs,
Legs, legs,
Legs
Two for one,
Legs.
Get them while they're Hot.

Robert Rorabeck

Hour Of The Wolf

Senses heightened for Halloween,
I become a werewolf, her heart ululating
At my jaws, like the very rabbit, torn
And velveteen, caught on the ribs of thorns:
We sit on the grass and feed,
Grin and show our teeth, think of evil
Rhymes they use to tell children to put Them to sleep:
Her fingers and toenails are red, and we See close-ups of her eyes, frantically looking Askance from the hidden camera,
Which is our eyes, and we draw her to The earth and cigarette-butts beneath the Swings and the falling maples,
Lounge around her neck, whispering the Lines sunken in the bottom of the lake,
The eerie sleepers, feed of her rises and moans,
The penny-candy we rode our bicycles to,
Stealing cheap fantasies from the library on Our way, going behind the churches on
The dirty peninsula scarred by the migrations
Of icebergs, the shivering house who stepped Away long before our mother's wombs nested
Us between the unsealed wax between her thighs.
The cheapest of homesteads is naked and
All but abandoned, and we change in them,
Our body curling; we begin to resemble each other:
She is a paper doll torn, though colored,
Moaning through the emasculations of incest,
A little girl runaway sleeping in the backseat of Her grandmother's station wagon;
The world turns blue and haunted, and she looks Away. We creep up the hoary dunes from the Sea; our salts boiling, she doesn't move,
She doesn't change; she opens her neck
Like a love letter; she knows we will have Our way.

Hours And Hours Of Days And Days

As the bodies work themselves out,
Angels get their wings:
He touches you like folding the laundry, after all of These years:
The music plays in the background happening upon itself
Like candlelight in the deeper through
Of caverns,
While the grottos are all warm and unberieved-
You stand up tall and announce to the world your plans;
And the worlds flow from your lips like
Applause from the stands:
And the tourists know they came; and the cars return to Their starting points as trustworthy as buzzards:
They just keeping going and going around,
Though I would still so very much wish to lay atop of you
And plant my apple luck within the furrows of
The garden already attended so very well;
He who knows when school is over, and how your body
Enjoys itself flitting in its ways as it knows it does
Back and forth through hours and hours of days and days.

Robert Rorabeck

House And Headstone

I've called you by the last line of a poem,
As often as by the first,
And you answered insouciantly the way an obese
Detective decides to solve murders only when He is not enjoying a spotless dinner,
And I have wounded myself by a weapon described
To myself as love, and by your name which Has its own sharpness of metal and deadness of echo,
But all of that is enough,
For even now when I am getting drunk,
I am sure I am wounded, and scarred higher up,
And walking around shivering for I am the last of a species,
But have come to realize that I will be made no more Precious nor immortal by your touch, or by lying beside You bare-chested, with your breasts pressed through
The shadows, and your eyes like ruby pinpricks up Against my own- For I have seen you in your Photographs with other men, and you are a beautiful woman,
But now nothing more, and this invisible flaw lays like
A drowned goddess immobile in her amnesiac lake,
Her lips pressed in statuesque laughter to the hemlock of A bearded philosopher, he too drunk to death and holding His guitar tighter than he would hold you;
And my dogs love me, and the night of my world is too
Miraculous and transitory to cause me to hold my breath for Anything but; And this world is a projective moving high
Above a nourishless field from the womb of its cannon,
As we are all twirling away from each other even as we move
In to kiss, and I do not know you, or why your eyes filled
Me up and gave cause for the heartbeat of my sport,
But you cannot blame me now that I am independent and rich,
Even if you should not remember my name, you should not Say it out loud to anyone, for soon I will have both a house
And a headstone, so even if you should move in close to Visit, I could only greet you at the threshold to tell you
It is not necessary.

Robert Rorabeck

House Cats Anyways

Inside the broken jubinations, a blue gill that sings another song
To his goldfish:
Anywhere, anywhere that she might be, nudging the golden sky:
I have a child now,
And I am not alone, so I have a wife,
But I dream of being far away from here:
Beneath the mountains that fit the favorite coloring of
The tomb,
And the places that molt like the peacocks of Rainbows into the skies—
Even while she is away, she becomes so beautiful that you
Have to believe, that the night starts out the way of The second color in reverse,
And then the fever becomes a river between the trees:
We will become alive again while we are not here,
Just surviving for a little while inside the book stores
That already have no reason to exist:
But in the morning, the plagues and firestorms down
The rows of middle class housewives,
And a special distinction, a hunch in my gut,
Like a catfish cleaning the rug of the living room until Christmas:
And, once the gods arrive, you suddenly have to believe:
In department stores, and the white tits of mountains,
And in any other way that it finally, ultimately
Has to turn out:
If there are dungeons, at least we can fill them with roses,
And if not roses, wild flowers—
As the ponies that do not live here trample the Serenade—
And when we wake up in the morning, there will still Be house cats sleep underneath of the clouds,
And if there are not clouds, anymore—
Atleast there will be house cats anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

House For A Lover

Lines I've given you, like feeding the Hungry mouths of heaven
But joy- as you look into my eyes as you eat,
As I then drive home through all of The loneliness in your daylight
Trying to sing to you without its tongue,
As arrowheads are discovered underfoot of a
High school of somewhere,
And then the day doesn't know where it is Going-
But it proceeds to build a house for a lover
That it then burns down.

Robert Rorabeck

House Of Bees

Then there was a pretty boy on his
Bicycle
Like a tool, Siamese of glowing pinwheels
And the spots in between
The trees
A zoetrope, a glowing lantern—
A house of bees:
You know what it is, or at least meant to me:
As I followed you,
As you were going to feed the loins
An entire bouquet
From the games of your heart.

Robert Rorabeck

Houses Of Glad Kisses

Houses of glad kisses strung out
Perpetually through the forest—
Greatly seeding the lost paths of vanishing children—
Here, they can find one last story for them—
While the sky is a vermillion avenue too well
Above them—
Strange chandeliers are hung amidst the vanished
Airplanes—
Everything soft has evaporated,
Even the stewardesses are floating by themselves
Above the classrooms—
And they send down their love once or twice
In a playful manner, like free tickers,
For the boys whose last kisses
Will be presented to them
By the grinning trysts of the protected wolves.

Robert Rorabeck

Housewife Pie

There are hills where houses live
That I have drawn with damp lights in the classes
Of high school,
When I wasn't skipping and resonating in the waves;
And tomorrow I want to see Kelly;
I would like to give oral sex to butterflies, just to see her
New tattoos,
She gives so many children her bad news as she caravans:
She spots the dolphins in their wishy-washy gazeboes;
And she isn't quite seventeen,
Just a sudden page in a beautiful broadside,
A ship that was there, I swear it, but then was lost:
A place where lost men disappear to what else I know not
What to compare it,
But to runaways and dead poets, and the geniuses I do not know
Listening with their one ears:
Pulling their horns all the way up to mountains while
The skies are wailing and giving their signs of unresigning loves;
The planets will have Pluto kindly put on its gloves,
And the philosophers and foxes go down to the Rivers and there to sit and eat their dinners the very poisons
That cannot be proven,
And I will swing upon my rope swing over the bodies of Both my vixen;
And the paper airplanes will fly,
And the paper housewives will offer us all slices of homemade Housewife pie.

Robert Rorabeck

Housewives

Nonsense of ribbons tied around the apple bows:
The houselights linger and the housewives
Prepare the pretty feast of the bodies
In their views: they spring around the tables that Are being used,
And fall flat into the hearths of the springing news:
Their husbands, glad to be architects of the leggy
Game, catch them and mouth them, and they Do the same:
Every evening as steady as they prove:
Housewives, and sun showers of the evening's news.

Robert Rorabeck

Housewives Or Our Own Mothers

This is true- that you are not here, and I am Drinking,
And tomorrow I will have to go to school again
Building a pledge out of my body
And of my gut:
Distinguishing the gardens where I belong
Where the trees are busily in a topiary of a glass
Encased bower
Outside of which it rains and all of the sisters
You've forgotten lay trapped,
Or have escaped: because sometimes they enjoy it,
And sometimes they want in:
Sometimes they come baring fire, and sometimes
I watch them kiss snakes who caracole the rock Garden or other places that I cannot
Spell,
And I linger at the windows of my box, and drink
To new liquor while I inquire of the borders
Of the canals
And railroad tracks, and wonder what it would Mean to cross them and to become a part of that
Other world, glowing in the strange vertigoes
Who resemble the pallid cadavers runaway in a park
Underneath the regresses of airplanes
With the stewardesses climbing down or calling from
The perfectly spherical windows as if they Were housewives or our own mothers assuring us
That they would soon be on their way home.

Robert Rorabeck

How Beautiful

The cat says my mother's name
Why the alligators realize it is her birthday;
And far away from baseball,
And used cars,
And the beautiful girls with tattoos on the submarine,
The elk are shedding their antlers
As the aspens shed their leaves;
And this is the truth of the meat of the Blushing mollusk;
Its sad architecture, its cancerous science,
The denouement, the epiphany sewed shut in its Coffin for viewing,
All dolled up but bloated,
Another cavalry charged of the disembodied men,
Trying to feel her up without their corporeal libido:
This is the stanza that has to end,
The peat of her eyes, the crook of her grin;
And I still love her,
And I am still trying to get it up, like a sick daisy who Burrows its head out of the skull socket of that Fresh young grave,
And finally looks up to see the moon eat by wolves,
And all it has to say for itself is How beautiful.

Robert Rorabeck

How Beautifully The Church Rose

I have dressed up and done worship to girls whose Eyes are as fat as lambs,
How simmer everywhere like the amethysts of geodes
Weeping mightily in other mens hands;
Oh, they wake up in bed and the flags of the mail are immediately
Raise:
They go to the smoke shop and get enough smoke to make the Appalachians haze:
Bosomy and so round as to be caramelized apples, the spaces that They drive become music boxes,
Controlled and sweet: they can never escape the luxuries that they Pantomime:
They sweep the street like the moon at harvest time:
They are so full and luxurious as to be a house or at least a love
Seat unto themselves;
And then when they stop and listen, their eyes like water spiders
Skating across the crepuscule underneath the gesturing fans;
They don't have anything to lay off of,
And they can't remember how beautifully the church rose
Through all the mornings next to their bars,
Or how I tried to caracole them and catch them up in a plan
That I didn't have enough legs for.

Robert Rorabeck

How Bukowski Ended My Poem

Growing this budding numbness:
Listening to Bukowski- it feels good to hear
A man as scarred as me,
Even a better man; but, Oh lord,
I don't believe in you, but in the old roofs
Of houses,
Of graves being filled in and covered with the Masturbations of green carpet
Of loneliness of the less professional acrobats:
My dog farts- one or the other, it smells
Good,
Makes me think of Disney World, of the lower East coast of Florida- I wonder if houses are Growing cheaper- I need to move out.
I need to get laid, but it is so difficult,
And now my chest is the part of me with the Most scars:
I am embarrassed: it floods, I think of Erin.
She calls me by an old name.
She doesn't read these anymore; its all old news,
But I'm pretty sure her tits are still great.
Bukowski is over. His cat is asleep,
But Erin's tits are still great some place in Florida.
That is how I imagine Bukowski would have ended
My poem,
Erin.

How Dangerous It Is To Pretend Being In Love

Ah God, the sun is real; isn't it,
And it made the sky so blue and young;
And I don't know any better words for it
Don't I; and that is why you stabbed
Me on the spot,
And then christened the new highway
Where you commute to new boys with wings,
Where you killed the young heroes and stuffed Them under your frilly things;
And you made it: the new sky, and the new sun,
And if I am not beautiful,
And if I have failed, and am destined to live alone,
It is because I haven't recognized how beautiful
You are; and I haven't said enough about you,
Or wounded myself enough over you-
Like a wounded animal, I am moving away,
And bleeding these words as I retreat, a chess piece
Doing as he is not allowed, watching you get married,
Making foreplay with a dangerous queen
Who is on the move,
Who is already holding up her own dresses and slipping
Through the mangroves;
She is killing her own tourisms and not asking
Permission from the boss;
And I am not doing my job, if you are not here fornicating
With me, but it is only a breathing game,
And it doesn't matter if I Haven't ever graduated from High school if you aren't playing with me,
Or realizing how dangerous it is to pretend being in love.

Robert Rorabeck

How Did They Survive

Fetishes for airplanes and bicycles and swing sets:
Young lovers underneath an apple tree underneath all of these Things,
Tornados making love across the canal, drinking sandcastles
And talking cats—
Afterwards, prisms in the sky—the disguises of a drinking god—
He lowers his hand to you in the parking lot as
The waves come in to see the Pieta in the grotto:
They are paying for soggy Eucharist and lighting electronic Candles:
Afterwards, Siamese and amnesiac mermaids will drive
Home to cul-de-sacs, routed in beautiful cars—
Into atmospheres of kitchens and pools that chime full of Midnight up slope from the alligators-
Like stewardesses touching down into place in which It is a wonder how they survive.

Robert Rorabeck

How Easily You Stole Our Breath Away

The bodies burn in yellow candles like cadavers
Who are on the Spanish hillside,
But I guess we always have to start somewhere and somehow:
I broke your golden jewelry when you let me make love
To you one time and forever,
While all the cars passed like painted lions on the streets,
While all of the dying Indians crossed their hearts with poisoned
Bows and then flew away:
Up and up to the gods of your grandfathers, and from the arid forests
And jungles that I can never pretend to know:
That is the strange and beautiful mask of your opulent virtues by which You proceed through your day with,
By which too you fawn for my father because he is your patron,
While you asked me in your car today what made my mother a good Mother, and I responded like an unwelcome echo that I did not know,
And you made fun of me for buying my clothing at a thrift store,
Even while you wore my gold, even while you'd been in my house that Very same morning I had bought with the fishhooks of cash,
And the lights went out and the stars did not shine
But were remembered in the blackout of zoetropes,
While the hurricanes whispered like washing machines around and around
In the limpid miss numberings of the fools I had planted for you:
While your body moved through the sky and through the streets of Our day,
Never imagining- Alma, how easily you stole our breath away.

Robert Rorabeck

How Full Of This Knowledge

Her high school is at the top of the hill like a church
The boys are always falling down from like marbles and Breaking themselves against one another,
The bigger ones making a mess of the smaller and laughing about it:
And she stands above them like a glass object on stilts;
And she has given her hands up to the sky to Undress her:
And he does and then he comes down upon her like a nursery
Of kittens,
Her areolas sparking with the wonderment of the minutiae of
The crystals of an orchard blessed by a basilisk:
Her sweat gives of cities of bachelors who really know nothing
From nowhere about where they live
As they roll like gentle curses down her; and it really is so pleasant
That she makes a mess of everything all day,
And not a plane as the balls to shine anywhere above her:
The stars hang down like over watered grapes until they are as Dangerous as power lines nettled in the aftermath of A truancy of hurricanes; and none of it makes any since;
And I am like something without a backbone struck up beneath her,
Showing my guts like a disaster of coloring books,
Because that is I how full of this knowledge I have become.

How Girls Go Good With Boys

Girls go good with boys; I see them
Out walking all the time in My neighborhood;
They rent what cannot be seen; I wonder
About how long they've Been here,
And how deep they are:
How easily lives go when
Girls go good with boys,
The ribs of serpents who conjoin
Underneath the Airplanes like rabbits over
Flowering graves-
Like luxurious tankards filled with Stewardesses and their Bouquets; such elixirs make my Nostrils heave;
All I have is a pen bleeding
Stars into my jeans,
And the shadow that I cast,
Not even a god to follow me;
Girls go good with boys,
Hot footed underneath the overpass-
I imagine that they go good
For days and days
Walking to where the waves
Leap and dance-
I follow them at some distance,
And watch them
Heartbroken-
How girls go good with Boys
For days and days.

How Grown-Ups Shoul Behave

Weeks of cessation,
The car won't star, the grass doesn't grow:
The bricks are red but growing old,
And all of the biblical passages have been read—
Lovers, looking each other in the eye, have passed Away through various means and woes—
Cadavers, once dancing in the rain,
Pretend to be terrapins and cenotaphs in the rain,
And little girls look up at the sky's nude are
And really believe that this is how grown-ups should Behave,
And how they too will behave once they have
The right car and edicate married within the ballrooms
That otherwise wouldn't move.

Robert Rorabeck

How Happy I Am

The gardens are so green, and culled by the road:
Hibiscus rises up and is breezed by the cars:
My parents used to make love in a Michigan trailer that Crunched the backs of mitigated shells;
And the sea foamed and hiccupped and was a lush to the trees;
And there were days where this was nice, and I was just born:
My memory still not hardened from my mother's Loins,
Like purses of the lions that never grow cold: they stick out
Of the savanna and leap just like hungry fires;
And the road burns both ways, with kidnappers and lovers:
And I saw you coming or going, but you didn't see me:
My mind was so young, but now it waits like a kite stuck in Its tree,
While the dogs bark, and night takes over with its perfumes and Transvestites, or the novels of vampires;
And you ride in your cusp, a blue wave like a chariot that stays
Busy brushing your flanks;
And you swell right through the pornographies of my world,
And the kids from yards and yards over crowd the fences as if at A baseball game just to see how happy I am to see you.

How Her Beauty Betrayed Me

I have this sailboat under my Left eye- it doesn't diminish even When I sail out in it looking for you-
But I used to be beautiful,
I used to be good and young,
And the sea is so immense-
Herself the usual beautiful woman,
The real estate agent,
The Avon lady
Flaunts herself something like a
Pantheistic bombshell-
Broad sided, variegated lips billboards
For casinos,
Waves and sharks-
She comes to drink my milk shake,
But there are no heroes on the boat
Under my eye:
It is only one of the newer, more damaging
Scars- I get them as I drive back home
To weep,
As she leaps and shines and laughs,
Thrusting the bosom of her unappreciative
Tide after me;
And it is ugly and doesn't rhyme,
But I will never look away.
Even my body will point the way
How her beauty betrayed me.

Robert Rorabeck

How I Care About Your Little Black Sandals

You have buttons: buttons,
Buttons,
And your friend shot himself in the head:
In autumn, your buttons will turn
Venal and consumptive.
I will drink and there will be no wish to continue,
But if you let me continue down,
Then I will get all the way down to you,
Down to your buttons;
Of course, they haven't yet turned off,
And I am in real trouble, but I am a real troubadour:
Let me be your Sancho Panza!
Let me be your Sancho Panza!
And I will have razor blades and red lasers
And x-ray vision.
What you're doing isn't cruel.
What you're doing isn't cruel- we can still dance
As ghosts,
I suppose: I suppose, and there are fretful vampires
Yet in Norway,
And great cerulean bouquets of flowers with their own
Minds, which I guess is all you deserve,
And I want to be down into the clefts of your fjords,
Clefts of your fjords,
And sell cars with my tongue, sell cars with my tongue for
You:
Oh,
Even if you aren't yet in Michigan, I play for you,
I play for your daughter and her titular muse:
My muse:
Set off on airplanes and fireworks, because I am lying down
Now
And aren't you all that:
And aren't you all that, and we graduated from the same
Sweltering state,
But you couldn't care.... You couldn't care:
Oh,
God... how I care....

Robert Rorabeck

How I Feel

All of this dying yellow:
And all of this:
All of this awakening from the graveyard-
And all of this make-shift
From the happenstance of conquistadors out across
The dime forts,
The car ports- and all of this:
Keeping time with the kings of no one and not A thing,
While a one find time to hang himself, answering to
All of the yellowed courtyard,
And all of the diminished heirlooms:
Why who answers to who is not here anymore,
And not at all:
While it all seems to me happening to and waking up
Monstrous but luckily without any children:
And this is the offspring of my gut
Across the great lakes of Michigan or whoever it is that is Not here anymore: shut in, this is how I echo,
While the fields and the playgrounds are filled with mouthfuls of Mud, and my buried grandmother cannot sleep anymore:
Answering to the pallid echoes: this is how I feel:
And, echoing: yes, this: this is how I feel anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

How I Hold You

Candelabrum at my mother's wedding, like ancient Movies and whales moving like kingdoms in the sea,
And making love:
You know I've seen you there, when you open your eyes
To the glimmer through your transoms under the mountain:
How you move amidst the pinball machines, your Daughter cooing,
Grapes of your majesty where the gods drool like mollusks,
And the boys kick balls like souvenirs for Christmas:
You live in a little house atop a crust of snow.
Some people ice-skate: your eyes are as blue and distant
As virgins in their forgotten strong-holds,
And now I know who you are. This is how I hold you.

Robert Rorabeck

How It All Began

I get so drunk I want to just go to sleep:
The last time I got so drunk,
I was a junior in high school and only had the busy
Information
Of roman candles coming off multicolored in my Hand;
And leading up to that, and Spain, and afterwards,
Any combination of words could come,
Corruptible, still-born, homeless,
Or incredibly lucky, but they always came bursting for
You,
Even though I went to California alone and slept
With ghosts in abandoned train cars in high yellow
Grasses for two weeks,
And left alone;
And went to college, and lost myself-
I became more horrible and friendless- I still don't Have a telephone, as the airplanes leap with their important
Men,
Leading them where we are all headed as long as there
Is so much gas to pass beneath the stars while pretending
Not to notice them,
While down beneath if there is still magic on this pale sphere,
This esplanade which becomes less greener every day,
It resides in your dripping bosom which pools
Like a hidden spring in your womb
Where the wildlife of other men grow and you give those Offspring names,
And love them- as if a stewardess on his ever skipping
Plane,
Though I love you- and will always love you just the same,
But that is no reason for naming names,
Or trying to recall how it all began.

Robert Rorabeck

How It Goes

I'll win because I'm not real,
And I've been doing this for so long,
Putting cheeks on my scars,
Scars on my cherries,
Getting married to shadows,
Shadows who love me and say so
On the swing sets of sweet afternoon
Truancies:
I've been doing this for so long,
Staring from the back of long haired girls
On buses,
Reading over their shoulder,
Throwing stones at bullies if they happen
To rise against me,
Saying that I love you, saying that I love
You; but I've been doing this for so long,
And I don't even look like myself anymore,
And I can't remember how I rode
Up the lightning, or swept long legged into
The zoo,
Or skipped across the lake like a stone;
And your wrist is so supple you belong in My art gallery, you belong with the other things
Who are not real, who I have made more beautiful,
At least in part,
And I wish to captivate you and love you,
And string my fingers upon your body and make you lose
Your voice,
And I've been doing this for so long,
Or at least I've been wanting to, but I am not real,
At least not any longer, and this is how it goes.

Robert Rorabeck

How It Happens

Now it happens that I drink good rum:
Burning like a fire in a forest emblazed by the sea:
Losing all of my numbers, and the ways to go home:
My good dog licking my face,
And all of the silent prayers erasing the features of her
America:
And then we go home, anyways: we luxuriate in her shadow,
While our dogs bask in the sea:
And I have been thinking about her anyways, even after
The fireworks have all been lighted off,
And the words go home to new mother, talking to themselves
Over milk and scuppernongs:
While then the electronic hallucinations talk and whisper over
Themselves,
Making their own way home after super, precluding the smacking
Lips of the wolves:
And it all has to happen for a little while, anyway, underneath
The overpasses,
Presupposed by the pedestrians, but walked upon them anyways:
It all has to happen as a kite unmanned by its brother:
The rainbow slipped from her mother's bosom:
The scars on my chest- the way to file at taxes:
The losses into the sea: the losses into the sea, anyways- I go,
Anyways- this is how it happens to me.

Robert Rorabeck

How It Has Happened For You, Alma

I want to kill myself because I am even now in the penumbra's
Cage fits:

I want to kill myself because I am even now too far into the Inevitable fight of the reasoning to the very

End of this:

While I guess he crossed the frontera with you, and
Had to children like sting rays,

While I cannot even breathe with you anymore:

All I can do is scream and scream while the Age old traffic passes,

And it cannot ever be sold by Disney World:

It just goes on an on,

While you have his initial on your right hand, Alma:

While none of this hubpla can ever be bought to be even sold,

And the age old Satan never even gets a day older,

And the days just come:

Alma, don't you know, that this is just the way they belong to Us,

And they just belong, like tool sheds, and toy chests,

Like fish happening unto these wishes:

Don't you see, how it has happened for you Alma:

That they have come and come.

And finally and eventually, that I have given up and welcomed them.

Robert Rorabeck

How It Seems

Imperfectly in a beautiful park: runaway underneath the Lights of Ferris Wheels and a Spanish Heaven, Singing to the armpits of those Angels who fawn around the clouds, laughing right to the Areolas of the up thrusts of land:
Pewter marionettes, as if promises of trees:
Boiling from the greenish cauldrons of satanic grottos:
Laughing the smoke of delusion:
While all of the prettiest of girls are kidnapped by the most Churlish of foxes,
As the flags in their silly banners pester the tailfins of Airplanes,
And then the pretty lips are let off the water fountains:
And all is seen: like opal:
The silver blue bellies of the fish showing like fireworks Above or underneath the silent prayers of Unmanifested dreams: as the children return home from school
Again,
Crossing the canals, blessing themselves even as their Bicycles are stolen, and the foxes sleep with the mouthless Marionettes in the ditches again- as always,
Or at least this is how it seems.

Robert Rorabeck

How Little All Of That Must Cost

Did I impress your husband with My accidental thoughts;
Did you share yourself with him,
Through my words;
And why are you eyes now green-
You are well published under your mountain,
And so you should have no fear of being picked up Alone in my sea and crafted into Something you always hoped that you should Not be;
Enveloping, little fairies housed in sunken
Cantelopes;
The world is a strange world enveloped in a stage;
And you know not what I know what I should Do,
But I run through the darkness and smell your Perfume on the jaded fingertips of all these Wayward airplanes,
Like silver cones shaken awaken from the lips of Early morning waitresses;
And tomorrow I think that I should like to finally be Laid:
And I am all of one number, and I paint by her
Sweet taint and tell the world of passing cars and wolves
Of what we should have to sell,
So that tomorrow if I should have to die, at least she Should know with quiet certain how little all of that Must cost.

Robert Rorabeck

How Long It Has Been

Up in the clove of death: Mars, Phobus and Demos Circling,
And little cherished starlets: Alma gets her nails done
Before she goes up to see her
Husband: and I love her: I love her like a gold
Bee dying in the lips of a house cat
Who really wanted the gold fish while the fair is
In town- with so much liquor in my gut,
And so many tourists underneath the mountains-
They are speaking to snowflakes falling down
Across the tan trick water fountains-
And all of the wildlife is learning to carry sticks
Of fire and there are spreading gossip over how Long it has been since my mother has been to their town.

Robert Rorabeck

How Many Legs I'll Have To Lose

You've combed your hair again and I am drinking wine
I bought tonight after I left you at that party in wounded
And high weeded guts of West Palm Beach: the grapes are from the grandes bodegas
Where the poets rest in the trenches of lime,
And I jogged today after I left you Alma over the waters and Into the soft terrain of the rich man's homes,
And they made me smile and think of you, because you are So beautiful that you could fit into any of those homes and Make them smaller;
And how you've cast your eyes out of buses traveling far
And to the east;
And how you've never seen the Wizard of Oz, and I never Want to have to fire you:
I feel like a torch in a warm dungeon full of booby traps when I am nearer you:
I feel like a teenager slipping away from school to bask in his Pastimes of cemeteries which border the teal tennis courts
Where the topless din mothers and their professional sisters play
At ease in their early retirement:
And after I left you I jogged until I stopped to yawn up at the Soft belly of an airplane: it almost didn't seem real.
Just as none of this seems real: the monsters that I have to kill for
You are out there but impossible,
And I love you, but the journey is long and the windshields
Have fogged
And I don't know how many legs I'll have to lose to win you.

Robert Rorabeck

How Much I Have

What uninterested sadness those alligators must feel,
Laconic in the expressions that never end,
Reptiles and their grandsons basking under the unremissioned
Sun-
Like days of middle-class housewives,
Or writers better received than this who relocate their heroines
Back again into the same mixing pot of cul-de-sacs;
It is in some obtuse way very beautiful, with the rich palm trees
And yachts all displayed in the distance of the back-nine,
And the players white on white who I might once have known
Way back in high school who stayed in class and grew more
Affluent,
While I wept scar-chested in the oils and pastels from the guts
Of broken down school buses; and even what I am doing
Cannot be excused- The day is clear and influential,
And the new mothers are in the parks pushing their Brilliant trams, and I should be out mowing their yards,
Or becoming the tail end of a snappy movement-
I should come out and dazzle alongside all the stunningly
Bearded minds of the politically correct counter culture,
But I don't even polish the teak furniture while her parents
Are driving her up to state college,
I don't even walk the bichon frise- Too insecure to be a native,
I finish off all the alcohol,
I pretend to be a conquistador well famished and lost in the Crenulated wilderness; I let my dreams distend from my Virulent libido, I smell her general direction and go to sleep neatly Choreographed;
I'll let the rains truncate my sunburned body out in the screened lanai,
And then I might get up and rob this house,
Eating all this petty bourgeoisie's expensive jams;
Never wanting to be this son,
Tipping the religious silvers to my chin- How quietly the cypress
Should crook outside mossy shoulders in little blooms;
Those very same alligators and the uneven traffics shouldn't even Say a thing, and I'll walk off with my polished guilt,
Leaving better insects to pollinate and molt her womb's bouquet-
They'll toss it to the graves in the end,
And I'll walk off nearby into the restive shadows, counting

How much I have.

Robert Rorabeck

How My Story Goes

Walking out in the roses and the waves
Not knowing where I am,
And you not knowing why you feel the need
To bring your body so near to me
When your eyes are so far away,
Engorging.
And the mountains are filled with evil spirits
While Pedro takes off his close,
And the Christmas trees sleep like starving conquistadors
Fearing that they have been brought too
Far into the wilds of the state of Florida,
Beautiful men so full of turquoise thrills.
Men on roller-skates,
Men slinging the news to girls who live in their mothers
And fathers trailer parks,
Girls who always go out tattooed and runny like liquid
Throws,
Who know the cries of unbowed rebels,
And who sing once they have their Christmas tree decorated
In their tin cans,
And the canals flow so torpidly while two boys
Skip school
Underneath the crenulations where the Florida holies grow,
And the foundling tiger opens its eyes
And seeing the shade through the chirping canopy
Thinks it the pinstripes of its luscious mother,
Superimposed and handsome he closes his eyes
Again and dreams the dreams of a young
And handsome tiger out back behind the rows,
Or at least that is how my story goes.

How Permanently Remains Beauty

Sleepers in the valley—
Dreams of Richard Nixon in ash,
Yoke of mascara for her eyes,
And she's lost her virginity:
And it all goes this way:
The flowers crinkling like little girls diaries
Who've been emolliated,
Who you think you saw walking away;
And the uncertain directions their skirts
Take from the bus stop
All the unearthly crinoline about which
The government has worked hard
At reintroducing,
Feral parliaments slipping little things
Inside trees while the moon waxes,
The bumblebees hum absently
Especially in springtime and at
The town hall dance
While the weight of her legs loses its streamlined
Shape over all the years,
While younger and toothier of men keep introducing
More streamlined cars,
Which out do her,
Which make you look away from her,
Until there is only the quiet outline outside of some Store,
But you still think you've seen her
Walking about in the ubisunts of unfair weathers,
Believing that just for a little while
She could just about raise the dead
If her eyes lingered in one direction,
Searing back the layers of untrustworthy tomorrows,
Proving just how permanently remains beauty.

Robert Rorabeck

How Precious You Are

Just as I sleep, I drink alone:
You don't need to see my I.d.,
I have my dogs with me,
I have gray hair as proof,
Still it makes me want to kiss you when I buy my liquor, my cheap rum
Once a week to write my poesy:
I should kiss you at this line, I will,
Then I'll return to Florida and sell produce
With my father, expectant of your greetings.
They are starting classes tomorrow at the University I was to attend,
I wont be going:
The light is a shallow play across the shallow bay
Of my amusements;
And eventually I'll buy a house here
After all the girls from my class are married,
And I'll drink my rum, and say
Now I know you won't be coming, but it is a Beautiful thing to sit out alone and await you
While breathing my spiced rhymes across the streets
Where like the steady tortoise, the tourists
Are amusing,
Housewives and husbands, with children finely
Pressed, and I would like to emulate beside the bay where
The sailboats are sleeping like hypothetical moths,
Like the greater mythologies are sleeping in my scarred
Chest,
Hoping that you will open me up like a legume, like an Orchard, like a clam, and eat of me as I would have of you,
And wear what pearls I have written of you
Around your neck,
Even though no one of importance yet knows how
I have maintained through my thirsty vocabularies how Precious you are.

Robert Rorabeck

How Rupert Brooke Died

I must remember to tell mother that I found out How Rupert Brooke died. We heard his poetry on the Radio as we passed through Albuquerque, just Two poems before we stopped to get gas and corn
Chips. He died of sepsis from a mosquito bite, before
He had a chance to see that action which was his Pageantry: Only twenty-eight, and considered beautiful,
And I have found his poetry the same, undiminished
After a near century, after the body that wrote it has Flagged into a cenotaph somewhere in fair England.
Now I try to figure out where to go, and I read Rupert
After the sun is down and the dogs are snoring. I have Come back from my sister's wedding, and all the little Souls gathered there to see her off down the next avenue,
Freshly shaved and perfumed we went in the finest
Revelries of twilight. Now, depending on how it goes,
I may move to Saint Louis or Saint Augustine by the Middle of next year, and I look at diminishing real-estate,
Something I can put my quiet art inside, and thus repose,
And not long afterwards, hold a kiss to the fragrance of Her possibilities, and raise children there, and tell them how I found out how Rupert Brooke died, and then hold them
To my lap and read to them the words of a dead young man;
Pressed tightly into the beating of my chest, they might Come to know what it all means to me, how such twilight
Echoes even through the youngest estuaries....

How The Defeated Angels Fornicated On Rusty Swings In Close Proximity To This Song

If the genius doesn't mow his lawn,
He feeds the demons that are living there,
Poisons like crumbs for birds,
And he realizes the world isn't entirely real,
And bicycles leap through the sky
Motioned by the curled and burry dunes,
And he has forgotten how to get to school,
Or all the poems he 'd read by Auden when
His parents were in Arizona,
And the sky was a water park evaporated in sick
Capitalism, angels foreclosed upon,
Beautiful wings taken away,
The mutation of Christmas bells;
And something else around the hard corner,
Something like a defeated pugilist,
Or the epilepsy of a spoken-word smith;
And even that night he will squat with the insects
To light off homeopathic fireworks,
The fumes of celebrations quite too small to see,
Forgetting the words his teacher told the class
And wrote in chalk for all to see,
And little girls to skip across,
And melt witches with, while he was sleeping under
The bus, and the alligators were bathing down the lee,
And the world was eaten up,
And the grass drank and grew heartily in humid shadows.

How The Moon Steals Her Light

The airplanes roam the earth as I make a home for Myself:

The fires burn across her lips, and the beasts with horns
Trumpet like wedding day gems through the snow;

And down from there we sell Christmas trees

And fireworks,

And the Ferris wheels leap torpidly in their belligerence-

Her world is dressed in a surplice slathered

By tallow,

And when she goes out into her yard, the waves lather

The shingles,

And the otters chatter like birds in the waves,

Laughing up to her as they lie on their backs

Seeing perfectly and enjoying how the moon steals her light.

Robert Rorabeck

How The Poem Must Go

The best way to do this poem,
Is to ask which exit I must take to go
To where she is,
For the highway is like a flooded river,
And might deposit me into
An undiscovered shady grove full
Of anonymous lives, an enclave where
No one goes to work anymore,
But plays baseball on the dusty red diamond
Out back of their mobile homes,
And drink domestic beers in lawn chairs
While asking each other what things they See in the clouds,
And listens to what the sea might tell them
From far away, though they never venture
To find her, because gas is so expensive,
And they might be disappointed by her shore,
And they let their hair grow long,
And the women don't wear bras,
And the children don't wear shoes but
Read the bible straight like whiskey,
And let their homes be camouflaged by the Brown tears of the eager to strip pines
And oaks;
But to conclude the poem how it must end,
I would rather know the mathematics to her
Driveway,
The number to her soul, and the keys to every Lock of every hinge,
For the highway is a big mother, and the Sun is blinding, and the roads are lonely and Not fond of findings, but if I could know where
To love her, and if I were allowed,
I would go to her and carry her out behind her Little house to the winded river she has never Seen and baptize in one part river
And one part lips,
And say her name consecutively for every day
Onwards, and bare children and watch them

Grow until they took off down the highway
In brand new cars of their own,
Looking for their own exit ramps, and new Lips of their own,
And that is how the poem must go.

How The Sky Is Blue

The bicycles gone by everyday from school:
Telling of their littlest of selves across the bridges
Leaping across the heads of water moccasins:
The jewel-sized grottos, the bats
And frogs strung there like the strangest of garments
Drying in the darkness of housewives
Who have slipped across themselves to sleep-
And these are the words inbetween the homeopathic
Motes of their lips:
These are the hummingbird canoes looking their Own ways while the otters make love, and the Truants pass off fireworks absent of holidays:
And everyday is here, glistening, touching one another
And praising how the sky is blue.

How The Song Should Feel

This is how the song should feel—
Drunken and giving birth after school—
Vomiting into wishing well
At the tiny malls while the china dolls
Sleep all to themselves—
And the heavens take up all four corners of the Universe—
And the eyes of the crocodiles cannot cry,
But you remain my delusion—
Like life on a planet where no one can breathe:
I read stories about you that no one will believe,
And the children go home
Weeping up to their stars,
Waiting for their wings to be clipped
And the wounds the be banished—
So the can be finished playing baseball and Make-believe
To go home to full bosomed mothers
Who have no better excuse than to love them,
The way churches love their congregations—
And the way the long and lonely and absent hours
Love their highways.

Robert Rorabeck

How They Rise Again

Favors for my soul:

These are these, mountain and trees, and other things

Through the purgatory of our eaves;

And it hurts me Alma every time that you are still going home to Him,

When I am a good man, even when you called me a great man,

And the stars, and the sun,

And the friends that I couldn't even resurrect hoeing with the

Dragon's fangs underneath the falling tears

Where I lost my sisters, but who came back again, bugling and calling

Home again their better men across the prairies

And the savage stains of Indians:

The tattoos and the stolen horses, and the other things that are so

Painful and homeless,

The ride the range looking for their strange and moaning:

The sun in the sky beating the clouds, and the fairest of airplanes

Swearing as they are touching down;

And then in the new morning the same old thing: other things that

I cannot truly be describing, cursing and beating themselves

As they rise: Oh, how they rise again.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Become Men

There in a tweed outcome- pretending to be a Friend of hummingbirds along their Busy highway-
When the airplanes are milking the sky,
Or at least
Leaping for it, their stewardesses teetering
On the precipice of the middle class
Taken off
On bottle rockets: where will they land,
But over the saddles of Frog princes- so far away, they cannot Remember their high school classroom
Or what they learned in dazes
Through the courtyard's sunshine- but it Doesn't matter to them:
Soon they will be laughing with new men,
In the back of their minds knowing
That, if they have to,
They can always be returned to the lost and Founds of their husbands
Who even them weep in the dim crepuscule
Across the work stations of their
Garages- like men who want to become foxes,
Or like foxes who have learned how to become men.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Count

Antediluvian city in its high equinox of
Ladders
And key stones, I don't know what You mean.
I curl my pretty bangs to hide my scars and Look up through the stratified séance of Aeroplanes swimming in the Albino mud,
Like birthday cake and different areas of Fish:
Like letters to god, but there is no religion.
He is a man of the sunken forest
And he holds up the Hottentots and headhunters
With his gummy fortified roots,
Thing of stuff he would have liked to have had,
Waiting for his parents to come home with Fried chicken
And good comely apples to make a sauce to smear
At bedtime,
While the Mabrookes floated their impotent
Curses like paper jets around the suction of ceiling
Fans,
Representations of high heeled utopias of silver
Winged captains and taught calved stewardesses covered
In tinfoil like hot deserts that burned your Fingers and your teeth,
Just an idea for a chain of restaurants that would have Floated over the snow caps and the skiers no tinier
Than ants except that they too had learned
How to count.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Cry

In the reeds: bottle-rockets—
Cenotaphs shot off like celebrations besides
My scarred cheeks years ago—
Besides girls who don't echo anymore:
They are done bartending,
Their wings have touched down and have Folded up softly—
So now there is not a place left on the Highway that is not marked with
The copper plagiarisms of a cenotaph—
Disney World is a close as death.
The alligators are all left smiling but only
Because they do not know what else
To do any they never learned
How to cry.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Finish This

If I could die tonight I wouldn't Have to try to give bouquets to Diana in the morning:
In the morning,
Who does she love- There is a red delicious apple in My throat and now I've Slain
Frank O'Hara while no one was watching:
Frank O'Hara, you are a faggot, and I am that destroying Flame,
And now Beowulf is dead, by the dragon or whoever,
And Tolkien has really beautiful hair,
Grown out and Norwegian over the tulips and violets field;
And Sharon is in her kiln of Gold:
Hello, Sharon: Save me Sharon from all of these Goblins,
All of this luscious horde, but don't worry, Sharon,
Because you cannot save me- you are so very beautiful
Sharon:
You are the stained glass that makes a sweet church of this World-
You desalinate the sound for dolphins, Sharon:
Do you hear me girl, while my tired face gets busy washing
Citrus,
While the sun and traffic repeats laughing, never having to Know me:
They are in Disney World, and if they could they would Butcher you:
And they would; and fireworks, and fireworks,
And independent belief-
The apostrophes of the consolations taking walks across
The encrypted flow of really lustrous glaciers and all of their Roe:
Sharon, I am dying tonight, and you should have to finish this,
Because I cannot remember how to finish this-
And I guess this is how we go....

Robert Rorabeck

How To Fly

Bruised around this new eye and not looking
Good,
But when have I ever.... Really;
And I never learned to surf.
I got lapped by the black boy when I tried out for Long distance running,
Didn't I,
But I still loved to jog alone,
Under the curiously voluptuous moon,
When there was no vultures,
But houses on stilts which went so far up
Across the fields of bamboo where the samurai first Fought and rested,
And nothing was figured out or resolved,
But it kept them busy all day,
While we shared steaming cups of chi tea,
And once in awhile I tried to save a sweet victim of Cholera or some other truly romantic disease
Like that.
You almost looked jaundiced as you went off first in The early morning and then more and more later in the Afternoon to see the men you preferred
Making love too,
And I wept like a truly purple flower,
And injected the tears of poppies and we both won Oscars
And learned how to fly.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Get Down

Animals of toys and cloth,
Or my mother's hands brushing the rough
Skin of Christmas trees. She is even saying to Me now,
You must be good- you must be,
As the canal slopes away,
Past the sleeping campers and down to
The hypnotized alligator
To where the little girls come sleepwalking
Across the slow green water,
Crushing the lilies whose throats hang twisted
Up with lost bicycles
And wavering prostitutes: this is the thing
That is,
Falling down from the suburban giants:
Here is where she is, reptilian- green throated,
Singing her wares,
As the airplanes whisper to her like anxious Bees because they cannot figure how
To get down.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Play

Circuses of tricks and good looking women:

The inspectors want more money from me: I just want to

Ejaculate and string out on the swings:

I don't need to be around other blond boys: I can be my own

Sun flair quiet alone:

I can change the dates of the month while my grandparents

Are no longer alone but up in their deep or shallow graves

Names pressed against their hill.

Like I wish my name was pressed against yours:

Two be the other wing of your butterfly, to smell your scent

While I deliver your letter to the world:

I have been delivering your letters to the world for the better

Part of a decade, while you have sucked off the spikenard

Of really lesser Sherpas:

I can carry my own truck up the icebergs of the Mother Goddess:

I can make it back down on my tippytoes, barefooted:

Don't you believe that my wishes for you have been real,

And that you are the only instrument that I have ever cared to Know how to play.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Ride Bicycles

The night is almost pretty like a fun house
Cast off its solar light bulbs,
And the breeze can say anything in the night,
And she can walk right over the pools
Of the elite houses looking in through the backyard's
Windows,
And see that the fine, fine families are fast,
Fast asleep,
And the words that went throughout the day unspoken
Lie with them,
Cozy like a shadowy fire:
And there are entire seas milking beneath their eyes,
And anyways,
The alligators are tied up like zippers in love and sated
With their unlucky golfers,
And last month was Halloween, but I rarely have enough;
So that the cat ate the poisoned lobster,
And now we walk the neighborhood together,
Both of us purring, imagining you fast asleep wearing your Plastic berets all fast and ready for school,
So then tomorrow you can leap straight up,
While we pine on with the cups of pine cones in the shadows,
Still wishing we knew how to ride bicycles.

Robert Rorabeck

How To Swim

When the moon rises above the movie theatre
There will be no more thoughts for Unicorns, or cherry orchards,
But I will have to get out of my car
And explain a bit,
Or I will have to forget about this Christmas tree in my foyer—
I will have to carry it outside to the nuisance
Of all of the feral cats—
Or maybe I will have to go back to school until They discover a new planet with life on it—
But until then, there will be new rum,
And problems with my features—
And ways to get around that are faster than
On foot—
And my wife will sit beside me, and we will Think up a mythology together that will become our Domesticity—and the lights will go out in
The cathedrals—as the dragons return on tippy-toes—
And the moon abates for the selkies who
I am afraid never learned how to swim.

Robert Rorabeck

How True To Life

The clock always seems to be reading
9: 11, which is a good time to be drinking,
Since she isn't coming out,
And all the grass all around the castle is fully Grown and there are so many rabbits
And snakes in it you think you'll never starve;
And it is an orchard, or a clearing,
Or a divine place for different states of witchcraft
Above which the airplanes are always leaping,
And the deer, even the tiny key deer, are always Trying to emulate them:
Bounding like the lower forms of aristolean spheres
You learned about in your community classes on
The pre-Socratics; and somewhere off in the woods
There are houses; and you've gotten it confused,
Because the dogs are purring- In fact, the woods are only
A green ring, and it is mostly houses,
And buildings building bigger concerning their importance,
And the churches are very small and populated by Various species of talking rodentia and souvenirs-
The televisions are always preaching though, and food
Can be delivered to where you lay barefoot in the grass,
You head up and waiting for her to appear or disappear
Atop the top window of the tower;
It is the easiest thing to do, and there was one time
When you thought you heard her singing or taking a shower,
But now she is so captivated by what is going on inside
Her little world beneath the airplanes and flying men,
That she doesn't even care to prove to you
How truly to life she might be.

Robert Rorabeck

How Truly I Love Her

I fear I am drowning youth by your Tongue:
I have gray but I still get carded,
And now I want to by the psycho skull,
Monster-eyed
Quenching his thirst off your paps:
My teacher still lives here,
But Sharon is in Colorado a million miles
Up,
But I don't give a d$mn about airplanes:
I am a very swift Jack-
I can leap right over airplanes:
All day long at the aquarium hypnotized by Sting rays,
And all the world boils down to a toy boat
In the bathtub of a true lover,
And when she comes tomorrow all I want to Teller her is how truly I love her.

Robert Rorabeck

How We Close

I dreamed that I loved you
All made up like a burlesque debutant
At a funeral,
And that is the best of what I can say of
You,
Because of my rum and immortality:
That you are a beautiful girl,
S-,
And when it comes to the hardness of each and Every night,
I am a needful man,
But you are married;
And yet you are as sweet and scientific
As Bengy's sweet and scientific kite,
And I want to jog and need for you in new old ways,
And I want to break into high schools for you and Remember the good old days:
The ways you never held me,
The ways you made fun of me,
And forced me into the library,
And made me think up these things,
And all the nights spent like a paper snowflake,
Cut up and lonely,
Always drinking like cut flowers,
Visiting prostitutes and visiting lies:
I just want to plant myself between you pale and Milky thighs,
And that is just what I do with my narcoleptic Hullabaloo:
I just do this,
And imagine us both lost together in a train that
Was never to exist,
Lost in the movies, and lost in Greece, spinning the Lost and sexy road:
It curves and curves like Wolf Creek Pass which is now
Closed for the winter,
And all the better mountains weep naked and white:
Naked and white,
Naked and white- Thinking of you, S-.

And this is how we close.

Robert Rorabeck

How You Might Cry For Me

Oh god- why even try to record what I m doing:
If I am failing as the sky is looming then what, of what am I doing:
In the prettily worded lips of high school,
While the city bastions, whole the monkeys rest their wings momentarily upon
The doorstep of our haloes of what we are doing then I have Nothing left to prove: Sharon, deep and ancient Sharon, my sick
Muse,
I am really worried, because I am thinking that with your body you haven't Been down into the ancient and luscious throat of the grandest of canyons
And only if I could take your hand and make love with you far
Past the voyages of our savagely honest and vulgarly promised land,
I would find you sleeping with the sharpest of instruments who kept, e
From
Breathing: Sharon:
Sharon, aren't I dreaming, to find you bared naked near the shore:
Sharon, aren't you reading these little pedestals arrested out in the bare Naked center of this clay cemetery;
And if I should continue then it would just be just one footstep before Another, Sharon;
While I am drowning in your sea, lost and beautiful, without a single Hoping thought of how you might cry for me.

Robert Rorabeck

However Far Away

Bodies persistent in their new marriage and I am
Taking the long way around my caracoles,
And I don't want to have to say anything more about Alaska:
The grizzly bears there and the cathedrals that I have trained
For,
Not to mention the candelabrum of mosquitoes:
I would rather spend every reckless breath in Florida alone and Celibate pining over
Alma- playing that I will give her the winsome keys to my bright
And yellow house,
Give her all that is good: give her the breath of my soul,
And make sure that forever she is only populated by the love of Her best man, her groom that sang to her on her wedding day
While my mother peeked inside a window and then Went back outside to gossip with her sister,
While the alligators gargle their fluoride and Erin listens further upstate
To her bands; and she smokes weed and jerks off too, just like A real tomboy that I've hidden many splendiferous things for in the Real hollows of the old oak tree, while the hobos skip town,
And sing the better blues until I have no one left to sing to;
And then the day finally comes that there is an eclipse, and Erin
Metamorphoses, but she still has nothing to give to me,
And I look deeply into your eyes, whoever you are, and however far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Howling

Imagine what the sea is Looking like tonight
With more liquor in
My body,
And your love budding like
A black orchid
Between my lungs,
My dogs howling out
In Arizona as I am being hit
By a car.

Robert Rorabeck

Huddling In Septembers

There are places I still believe in Where I never met you
Huddling in Septembers
Near the sea,
Where I walk past your window
Every evening and never see you
Though your curtains are drawn
And you are sitting at the Dinner table, holding hands with Your family,
Praying,

And though I walk past you
Time and time again,
It is always the same night
For the moon is hung and
The stars, like ornaments
Decorating your neighborhood,
The way they did for us,
Now the blue whispers
Resting in graveyards of Rooms we once occupied
Now occupied by others

The night I was with you on
The walk, where I still walk alone,
Your night lies
Further
In the necessities of carrying-on Where I am the thing best
Forgotten in the seas
Of many nights passing,

Where I now walk,
Looking forwards,
I can never see you
Through your window,
Though you are always Occupied there

As you set your table
Carefully under the lights

You are singing to yourself
And are warm inside

I am outside

And the green lawns
And the newly washed cars
The tiny stone walkways
Curling beneath cypress,
And through it all the quiet
Sounds a neighborhood
Makes when it is contented

All this
Decorates your new mind
And everything here serves as Pillows on which
You rest

Where I walk now you
Never go, and your eyes never linger,
Though I am always right there
Walking by you, looking in-
Every evening is the same evening,
And all the evenings huddling in Septembers,

When once we walked together by
Your house and held hands and Swung in the park. Where we had Tremendous dreams of children
And publications
Here you never go
Alone. You bring your husband and
Your children, and when you go this
Is now your park,
Your green space in which you grow,
And I am to you like a thing thrown

Deliberately out to sea,
Washed away from your memory

So I am left walking alone
In front of your house, every night
Looking for you through your window,
But never seeing you,
My footsteps moving backwards,
Year after year,
Remembering you as you
Step forward

Leaving me huddling
In Septembers.

Robert Rorabeck

Humbled

What can I do to save
My God?
The cheetah has eaten his Left leg and he has done
Moaning in the cavorting
Grass/
He called my name so many Times;
He reshaped me with his Last breath,
With his eyes lost,
Dying-
I look a little bit like him,
The graying man in the mirror,
The remains of the quiet kid
Who skipped class
And none remembered to Yell out his name
As he stole across the canal.
Then out on the wilderness
The cops are getting killed-
They are trying to reach God,
There are so many traps;
I'm sure you know/
Her eyes are full of quicksand,
Her tongue is a
Slithering gold,
She ate him
That night you tried to Dance with her
Ten years old she told
You were forgotten-
Lit you afire and tossed
You from her body,
Like a paper airplane,
Crash landing across the bedroom
She waltzes away
Like a beautiful air-born plague;
Now you too old-

The winter is loping like
A hoary clown-
Ice is blanketing the crime
Scene
Where the corpse lays Fed on,
The remnants of God
A Hollywood massacre,
Pulp-fiction:
Cusped, Humbled.

Robert Rorabeck

Hundred Dollar Bill

Going to Colorado for a celebration,
But not one of language-
We don't do that in my family, put on airs
For things which might not exist-
The poet's self immolation in the waves
Is ignored, because there is nothing
Lucrative about dying for a form which Cannot be bottled:
So we celebrate the pseudo-sciences,
Break horses in the high dust,
Vote Republican and bury our dead deep enough:
When it comes to taxes, f! ck them,
Because we did what we could and we're
Not drinking their tea anyways-
We work straight on through noon,
And my sister has done good and well,
And sometimes I see her swimming in the sky
When the forecast is hazy, and the fires are bringing Out the sweaty lions from their kills:
Hauntingly they gambol into the traffic,
Their tongues rippling a silence which in stanzas
Has not been written down outside the sycophantic Trills their tracks lie under:
She is getting married in August down the neck
Of my mountain, and it will be such a thrill,
And we will fire our guns high up through the Unbroken forest, mother and father will kiss,
Like my sister and her husband will kiss,
Like the lion's sudden kill,
And I will lie against the earth like my woman,
And smirk like a drunken toy again to my other sister,
And night will fall,
And god will have his will.

Robert Rorabeck

Hundreds Of Thousands Of Years Ago

Oh- yes, the night proceeds;
And it is a haughty night,
And not everything will succeed through it-
The wind tunnels I can only make it halfway
Through to Christmas-
I can't even finish this thought-
And I want you as if I was Mark Twain cherishing
The cheapest tobaccos,
And now I have nothing left to sing- Maybe I am
Being rude,
Or maybe accept me as your king.
Right now I am letting the mosquitos drink my blood,
My scars, my chances,
But I am really wanting you-
Erin, or anything: I am not doing good- I've written
A book and I am homeless and no one cares,
And I wanted you for a thousand reasons hundreds of Thousands of yesterdays ago,
But even in high school you were reintroducing me
To your newer me,
And I couldn't even look at myself in the mirror
When I skip classes and stole into things
Hundreds of thousands of years ago.

Robert Rorabeck

Hungary

The trumpets are sounding
Because there is something grand;
They are heralding the sun,
Jove, bull-formed, trampling the land:
All of America under the hoofed meat
Of a man once-godly,
The stampede of cuneiform
Smoke-signals choking the cities—
The heat of this oven scorches my body
Awake, I struggle to breathe
First and foremost I remember your name, Oh Lord!
The angels sing like a choir of school girls
In the shade, on their knees under the trees—
Behind me, those old days are dust,
And my life, the murdered man walking
Around with a knife sleeping in his chest.
My dreams piled together forms of transportation
All a rust,
Your name like a serpent's tongue tasting your breast—
Outside, you go swimming in the sky.
Upon the green bowl of earth I see you lay.
Birds hear me say you name when I cry—
Oh Lord! There you are swimming all day,
The first light of thought when my mind dives away,
Your thighs like marble statues high-heeled to the east.
I just want to go back to sleep and forget you today,
And let my hungry dreams be deceased....

Robert Rorabeck

Hunting And Gathering

Weren't there poets before there were words,
Cause didn't they need love in the boreal eras of moose and rime-
My brothers, the grandfathers of her eyes of sad prehistory;
When her shoulders are naked opal on the stereoscopic hills:
Expressing themselves with bitter howls to
The throbbing night,
And in the flickering stalactites of fanged caverns,
Dripping with the minerals of torpid architecture,
As in the wombs of the earth, and the animals without names
Roaming, the men without names:
They can smell her joints through her skin, and her needs.
Wasn't there love then all of the truth,
The magnetic directions without slabs of death:
The concrete tombs we go into work now:
And the occupations which give us the speech of our employers,
The busy blue cars buzz from each infected wound.
And didn't our antediluvian lovers know better of love,
Wordless, speechless hunting for the vocabularies
Nothing more than mist from her sought lips:
The need to survive,
Her thighs skipping across stones on the high banks:
An icicle drips, she cries naked like a blue lion in the trees,
As the clouds swathe the highest points of the earth like mourners:
Wanting them, wanting something from her peripheral vision:
The heavenly crux of his stonebuilder hands cupping her,
Unwashed, untrimmed;
The poetry in the body like scraping flint,
The discovery of fire: the ecstatic truth of the leather tramps;
Now: all of this,
And the attempts the blue collared scribes make to Scratch it out: This is not love. This is not rhyme.
The city moves, but doesn't breathe, the lines do not lead to water.
This is not poetry, and there is not a poet left alive
Who doesn't live in the cages of feral wolves, snarling his proofs,
Though we fools swirl the wine down our throats,
And call the doggerel of cadavers good:
Where they found her then could never be spoken,
But the quiet sentinels horned and pined swayed unreasonably:
That was the only time there was poetry:

Poetry is forgotten.... Poetry is living above the mountains,
And beneath the seas: Poetry has fled to the moon Unspoken: Now,
Only arithmetic of uneven sums,
The tin halos of politicians who worship no one but steady whores;
The men with cap guns, the plastic conquistadors.
Come down from this; it isn't real. This is the last quarter in the machine.
Afterwards, it will go still.
It will stop entertaining us with whizzing predictions.
Then my love will find us muted in our time, and she will press
Our love to us from her love,
As flowers are kept in between the pages of lonely authors,
And there will be nothing to be said;
And there will be everything shouted from her gaze.
We will not say a word. We will return to her shelter,
And to the throbbing chambers,
The poetry we will reclaim,
We will neither hear nor speak.

Hunting For Your Elusive Love

How can I give you more of this ever failing verse?
I pick a line for you, it withers before it reaches your lips.
If I do not pick something beautiful enough,
You grow inattentive,
And give your heart to brave soldiers.
So I travel up the lighted stairs to the attic
Where the grandfather lives with his little girl.
They know everything about the mountains,
And they can sing:
I bottle their romance in an empty medicine bottle.
The label is torn off,
And you can use it for a vase;
It is easily big enough for all the things that I say,
To puncture your heart with an arrow head
I stole from my mother,
And that gives me time to look for new phrases
That grow where the dead men lay tongue-tied
In the ravishing gardens:
As you pause,
Because it is dangerous, the games we young men play,
And at anytime you can return to your queen:
In the forms of water and wood,
Just one suckle from the breast of that muse,
The lady only the published can tackle,
And you will never again turn your head to this page,
So I must open up these wrists
And search for the novel species of a diviner kingdom,
Leaping through the canals and estuaries,
For phrasings of thought I have to discover,
To butter your lips, and butcher your heart,
Because you are the kind my wanting needs,
And no other, though I may live alone
In the valleys of unrestive attentions unto old age,
I will remain for you the cartographer of perfumes,
The trapper of far away gazes,
Hunting for your elusive love.

Hurricane Of The Headless Chicken

Extreme actions have gotten you defunct,
Sweet lady of wild freedom,
Swinging like a b$тч-swung censer by the hopping
Priest,
First to the left and then to the right:
From the hillbillies to the huckster darkies,
Blowing your nose straight through
The freedom night;
And I have nothing more to say to you:
Grey haired, and quietly scarred, what more could I say to you to keep you from straying from My libertarian yard.
As long as I keep myself unmolested I can keep my Own country in the wild and extravagant
Yard,
Stroking my pink flamingo and cursing the free birds,
Biding my time,
Practicing delayed gratification in the eye of a
Hurricane of the headless chicken.

Hurricane Season (Censored)

The great sea's rim overflows—
The hurricanes in South Florida
Flood parking garages and low
Grave-like suburbias in cornucopias
Of spiny sea-urchins, the color
Of anemic arteries; waves riot
Through gated communities and salt
Bow-ties and bleach lady's bobbing evening-gowns
Upsetting the dress-codes of moonlit swarays,
Making old ladies gasp in Palm Beach
And grab their jewelries, as old men
Clutch their toupees—
Down military trail and US 1, mother
Nature shuts out the lights and beckons out
The looters, as if she is showing us
What she thinks of social distinctions,
As her waves rise up, a commune of Salty blue horses, the blue collared laborers
Of her tide that swells and march down
Okeechobee Boulevard stopping traffic—
Conducted by the moon, oared as if in a
Cauldron by the moaning, chain-rattling winds,
Her waters wreath and spit and curse and laugh;
They slap down high rises and $uck in condominiums,
They turn golf courses into lakes
And parks into swimming pools;
Professionals are downgraded into castaways
And day laborers find permanent employment
As rummy pirates;
As she reclaims the everglades for those Things that slither, Florida's reptilian ancestry,
The ghosts of the Seminoles in great tribes spill out
Of unmarked graves as the useless student body is packed
Into the stadiums now mass undersea tombs,
Where entire fraternities and sororities now
Sway waverly like leafy kelp upon the sea-bed, while Horse-shoe grabs eat out their disinfected eyes and Nest in their hollowed skulls....
As illegal aliens ride by grinning waves, on old

Rusty bicycles gifts regurgitated from the sea's throat,
Drinking the free liquors that come floating opening by,
Equalized with the pasty professionals half-alive,
Bits of flotsam and jetsam, as their transportation
Is dictated by the tides, while their clients cling like
Wet rats scurrying up
The highest boughs of the mangrove trees,
As sunlight cuts up the land like a comic tragic play,
Bounding in brilliant flashes along each crest
And down through each trough,
Like leaping yellow spiders—
The only show in town, the drunken boats go spinning
By as if God was a little child playing his games
While his mother bathes him, as the sea over-
Spills her salty gown, drooling over the rim of That porcelain basin down I-95,
From Miami up through Palm Beach,
The great shadowed beasts swim, the leviathans
Called in by the sea, like strange aeroplanes
Over the eerily swaying heads of the sleepy masses....

Husband's Haiku

I f'ed her bet-
Ter than her husband with-
Out even touching her.

Hypothetical Kiss

Canoes drifting the Mississippi all a little while
We had an apartment
With our dogs in Saint Louis Missouri-
And we dreamed of Sara Teasdale
As we drove beside the Bellefontaine Cemetery,
But never figured out exactly where
She existed for Eternity- while the fire hydrants were red
At the corners,
And the black children played into crepuscule-
Until all of it was lost
And we got blood poisoning and nose bleeds
As the Ferris wheels churned
The tourists into a make-believe confection-
They seemed to resist themselves,
But then they thought better of it and evaporated-
Into the pretty wives tales and open lips
Of foxes,
And I drove away, heartbroken- matriculating,
Trying to find my love even though to someone she Had already spoken-
And now here she is, filling up my life as she Comes to me from across the railroad tresses-
As I think of her, and hypothetically kiss her lips,
And pretend to count her blessings

I Also Worship You

The bus drivers love one another as they deliver
All of the children to their school,
And then they pass away like salmon, like mariposa,
Like birthday cakes in your sweet forests,
Alma:
And I would like to pass away like that too:
After I don't see you anymore, after your body doesn't come Around me anymore,
But goes back to your children and your rabbits;
And I really like it when you let me buy you lunch;
But I know you are trying to keep fit, and speckle against the sun
Like the candles of all of those saints:
Your body is always on the run, washing tables, picking grapes:
And I approached you in your truck today, the favorite color
Of your body,
And ate the sandwich you offered me, and then I went off through
The forest to transplant plant palm trees:
I got a hundred dollar tip while I was away from you, but It wasn't worth it,
To be away for a moment from the orchards of your body,
The sibilance off the gunfights that you breathe:
When everything else isn't real, you become the arcade:
You become the highlights of all the best girls,
And I worship you when I am next to your body:
Alma, I worship you when you are home again with your husband
And children and rabbits:
Alma, when I am alone I also worship you.

Robert Rorabeck

I Always Find Myself

Asphodels in the glorious equipages of Unmined bedrooms where the canaries still sing,
And I ejaculate on the green carpet
And kiss the paperclip nosecones of paper
Airplanes:
And when I am alone I can go outside and shoot
Off fireworks into the blistering night,
And try to look up the skirts of the goddess who lives
On my roof,
Because I don't have any money, but I have so much
Time:
And maybe I am feral, and maybe I rhyme:
Maybe I can only ride my bicycle around in my own
Neighborhood:
And maybe I don't know why it is that the sky floats
Or why it is that girls love the men that they do,
But the bus always takes me home past the den of foxes
And to the symphony of torpid lions,
And when I am walking my way alone across the Murky rink of the canal's hotel room,
Why it is, Alma- that I always find myself thinking of you.

Robert Rorabeck

I Am Dancing Alone Tonight

When I get drunk, say like tonight,
Then I go out under the stars and piss: Say,
This is not like Disney World, this is not like Any other night, and the sitcoms are over,
And I have to piss, and look up into the awful
Expanse like any other trailer park, and pretend
That I have not been climbing any other mountains,
And my name is not Evan, but Robert;
And I am not a sommelier; I cannot tell the difference
Of wine, and my girlfriend of 5 yrs ago is F$cking her husband tonight: and you have to excuse
Me because I do not drive Lexus, and I am not a Lawyer
Who lives in South Florida, who married my ex-girlfriend
Tonight: ha, ha, ha, like Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs
But rewritten so one of them is a lawyer and is loving
My girlfriend tonight; but now that the show is over,
You'll have to excuse me, because I am going home to feed
And water my dogs, and it is such a night for lackadaisical drama;
Or insouciant, drama, a vocabulary I a familiar with,
But I no longer love, her; but I love her,
And I am dancing alone, I am dancing all alone
Tonight, and there is nothing for it; except for tomorrow.
Perhaps I shall call her, if her name is tomorrow;
I shall call her tomorrow, but for now
I am dancing alone tonight.

Robert Rorabeck

I Am Going To

I think about calling you,
But what is your name?
Red River? Indian Giver?
Did you star in that movie
With John Wayne?
Inside the ribbed cage
Of your heart's room,
Do you have an old soul?
Does it still play the drums
Of your life's pounding need
With the same religiosity
As when you were newly born?
That is not rain rattling
On your window,
For that is me— I want
To smash through the glass
Pain of your eyes and tear
Down those curtains
Blocking the light—
Then you will see me,
Like a terrible policeman
Come to save you even though
You haven't called to complain—
I don't care. I am going
To step straight through Your walls,
Like the nightmares
Your father gave your childhood,
I am going to hold your Neck to check the vocabularies
Of your pulse.
I am going to lean you back
And there I am
Going to kiss you—
Afterwards, if you
Cry for me,
I will ask your name.

I Am Waiting

I am waiting for a knock,
A recognition, a need,
I am waiting to French kiss
A woman again—
It has been so long;
It has been forever—
I am waiting for her to take my hand,
To take my body,
To take my lead,
And we will go down like exhausted
Workers in a brilliant factory—
She will have no need to wonder,
She will have no need to worry—
I am the ripe prince of her story....
I am waiting for her glance,
I am the vessel on which she must disembark,
But nothing is left to chance—
This is my right hand,
This is my left....
They both do good work,
And they will ensure her safety....
We can get married in Church,
Or in a park. We can get married on the shore,
Or at our place of work....
But I am waiting,
For her eyes upon me,
For her breath to inhabit
The space of my breathing,
Her lips to spread open like Wildflowers needing the sun,
My words, my hunger....
And from there to spring forth from,
My promises, my name, our children....
I am waiting for her to come,
For her to linger,
For her stay and lounge here
And to remember all the lives in which I have come forth in to love her....

I Beg Your Pardon (Or Max Von Sydow)

Marie sees miracles everywhere,
But her son is dead.

Red roses in a vase.
I want to smash her head.

I want to kiss her mouth,
To taste the salt of liars,
I want to hold her hands in the fire.

If it is rain,
Then I will stare out into the street
Until I find her.
I will stare until I find her,
And then I will follow her forever.

When she kissed my neck
It felt like the bottom of a snail.
Sometime well before that,
She was just a child abandoned
In the sand with a plastic pail.

Marie looks into the wild blue sky,
And begs for an answer,
That night they rolled the stone from his crypt,
But he was not there to answer.

When lightning strokes the earth,
I look for you for hours,
But you are off drinking with your men who Remind you of your father.

You are growing now in the glooms of your gardens.
Laughing, though crying still,
I beg for your pardon.

Robert Rorabeck

I Can Say Nothing

I can say nothing that doesn't die.

A word spoken quickly returns to the silenced void,
Unless it takes root, to nest behind her eyes to live awhile longer;
But this, sadly, it rarely if ever does—
And I have seen things I cannot explain,
Those elusive things unnamed and without definition
Foraging nervously in the backgrounds of her sleep—
And I have tried to hold her hand before to take her back
There amidst the shoots of spinning newness, to behold
With her the shared grandeurs of this new species,
But to exclaim of such things, to try and birth them
Into our world, is to cause death to come and feast upon them—
I have done such murder, as I pulled the silvery dreams
Out of my head and held them like delicate hatchlings in my cupped hands—
Look and see what you have made in me, my eyes seemed
To say to her, but as soon as I breathed my thoughts upon Them, they came apart like spores taken back
To sleep in the hidden recesses of their natural environments, the inner seas,
And there to bud and bloom in the inexplicabilities of undiscovered sciences;

So, she could not understand, and took to liking the Great expensive things our species so readily creates—
Those things, which like us, seem to last for a good long while Even though they are already dead, the carcasses who stroll on in breathless motion;
They are the necromancer's alchemies that comes easy into our world,
And because of this they are so cheap and they mean nothing at all to me—
But she couldn't understand my abhorrence of their stylish normalcy,
And eventually she gave up and began to die that sad way
Women do into the men who have learned to walk so well, dressed
And dazzling like the proudly bejeweled peacocks of the marketplace.
So they were married in a dying world, holding hands and walking down
As pieces of them fall off they will never see nor miss,
And the greatest things in them will remain hidden forever, the borderless
Sea of efluvian delights, the billioned things this world never beholds
She walked away from as I said nothing,
Knowing that as soon as I spoke my words would fail upon her,
Like dying children from another world, they cannot breathe in our pallid atmospheres;

But they flourish inside me, spawning in the infinite gyre—
Even without her in me, their beauties spill over....

Robert Rorabeck

I Continue Beckoning

Sharon, you give me the reason to live through Another day.
Now I get all excited because I can hear the sexy voice
Of a low flying airplane;
And I have rum inside of me, and your birthday wish:
That you remembered me, means everything;
And though I have been lost in the desert even while my Sisters were getting married, becoming profession,
And buying houses,
You have resurrected me, and I salute you with really good spirits,
Because you are absolutely a lady:
And I wish I had found you in high school: I wish I had know the Proper bait for you: I wish that I had the guts to call your soul
To the shallows if your body and fondle it with Some sort of voodoo;
I wish I could have been beautiful for you, Sharon; and I continue
To hope that I am doing right by you. You are the one candle in this World that is still burning, that should never go out.
Sharon, you are the last remaining wish that evaporates the Uncertainty of every tear in this afternoon's rainstorm;
You are the lighthouse in the eye of a hurricane; and like a lost
Sailor jumping for air, I continue beckoning.

Robert Rorabeck

I Didn'T Even Need A Car

Dictated to by high society,
I tried my best,
But the wild scuppernongs called me better far deeper
In the backyards
Unattended to by the wildeyed and learned
Younger professors;
And so I went, leaping, until there was no turning Back,
Pretending I was an airplane
Who was too wide and bright eyed to turn around,
I soon became lost and sad,
And too wonderful to be exhibited because
No one would know rightly what I was,
And they certainly wouldn't take me for Any old kind of marvel;
And it got so cold being outside of anyone's country,
Lost in the cruel caesuras which came and went Like a housewife's knife cutting kale and Rutabaga for dinner.
Left without the spasming warm of your natural declivities,
Which was all I was shooting for,
This arrow of spikenard and come- I didn't need
Any other language or clothing style.
I didn't even need a car-
I just wanted to make love to you.

Robert Rorabeck

I Don'T Know

The day turns down like dogs in heat
Thoroughly thrashed, their feet gone into the beating layers
Of fire-engined flesh:
They still lay out like gay fairies on parade,
Manhandled like goldfish drowning in Marmalade;
And Kelly, Kelly, don't you love me like a goldfish floating
Above your jellies:
Kelly, Kelly- You still lip like a song of a knife over my wrists,
And I would walk out all night for you,
Trying to rightly describe this curious gist, Kelly;
Your family is as beautiful as you are, like a stamped letter,
Kelly; and that is all I know that you are-
Kelly- The rainstorms come and I am all alone, and I don't Really believe in the beautiful dwarfs who are smaller
And more precious than the both of us,
And I just want to spend more time with you Kelly:
Kelly, I don't care who you really love-
I don't care about your mother; Kelly, your eyes are the depths
Of all fairytales, and I wish I could speak to you of what I know;
And I enjoyed your lips on Tuesday, Kelly;
I told you that it was the first time I've kissed a girl in seven Years on Tuesday, Kelly.... And I don't lie;
And I love you, Kelly.... Kelly in your doublewide;
In your papermache tomb that never touched the end of high school,
But I don't know.... Kelly, Kelly.... I don't know....

Robert Rorabeck

I Dream Of Nothing Anymore

I dream of nothing anymore.
The great sea before me is dead
And so thick with the salt of butchered
Tears that even the average man
Can walk across and Pretend he's God—
The seashore is nettled in briars
And blue suffocating jellyfish
Where upon scating gulls blister their Beaks, but devour their stinging meals
Heartlessly none the less,
As they circle mercilessly hunting a
Smothered heaven and cursing all deities....
The flesh rots off leviathans in the Green and murky wharf, where the Muddled water sloshes against the planks
Like something sickly asking for help;
And I lie there in the tumult of wrecked things,
The failed hopes of men the sea has Spit back upon the shore,
Not liking the taste,
The broken bellies of sunken ships....
On the pasty horizon, the humid sky seems
To sink into the sea, to merge like a bloated
Angel too corpulent for its impotent wings,
As the sky is in a shabby dress
And always promises rain that never comes,
Torpida and sweaty nimbus the Drawn curtains in need of dusting,
The veil I have never seen behind,
Though I know the sun and you are there,
In an early morning bedroom making
Love and feeding each other sweet things
As his light lies coolly on top of you,
So never do you hear the slosh and rust
Of my world so far beneath you,
Upon the infected beach I haunt like a blind
And ownerless ghost,
Between the burry sand dunes where the

Drowned sailors sleep like tangled nets,
And the sea like a headless graveyard stretching
In a field of ash, the cremation of my Waveless heart, for
I dream of nothing anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

I Guess I Will

Fermenting yachts you yawl all day
Back and forth atop the red packed clay-
Little girls in tremulous laces,
Little older girls with stainless steel braces:
And the traffic moves, and the traffic yawls-
The socially elite go to hangman's balls:
And I love you- And I love you the way the Feral child loves the woods,
And scribbles and masturbates and doesn't Know he is no good;
And my father has so many horses, like fish,
Like cars, like Christmas ribbons,
And the sky is so wide it yawls- and you don't Know so many things- so many things it's true,
But in your bright room spinning the crèches
From the satellite's loom,
I spill my guts for you and cry over something that Isn't real,
And the roller-rinks are displaced, and the traffic
Yawls- and the whole thing moves the persistent
Tortoise's pace;
And I throw entire ballrooms of pennies into wishing Well,
And each wish is to have you, so I guess I will.

Robert Rorabeck

I Hope So....

I can't afford expensive lines myself,
And I don't want to be indebted to the Man-
I need my soul to be homeless and wayward,
A tattered gown rented and torn after it was Used up at the backstore prom....
That is why I write poetry, and buy cheap rum,
Even though it doesn't help with the problems,
It helps lay me down-
My face is hieroglyphic, with manners for each
Wound, my eyes ringed like a sallow tree,
You can see how far I have yet to grow-
My hands the prayers for alms, wanting her to Spit in them, for her to tear and pee and come in Them, so that the gardens will be most profound:
The flowers corrupted into glowing mutations
With buds that come once a year on my birthday-
Filling the back nine with excrement under the tawdry moon,
I read Ginsberg to figure out- His entire codex,
The a$$ clown of the bomb, the ditzzy word smith,
The Hasidim, one million lines of government cheese,
Until they laid him down in his red pyramid with his Blond retainers no more than twelve, and they had sit ins
And walk outs and fluoride for the kindergarten mouth,
But I still wasn't down enough to figure it all out-
I like Lorca better, because his translations sound experimental,
And though a homosexual he kept it out of his mouth,
Preferred the solemn surreal spikenard in the spangled cloud,
The assured sadness of a dead moon juxtaposed with a living spring:
I read 900 pages of Lorca poems, skim the translations, but I still haven't figured it all out:
I write 400 poems myself, this year pass my quota:
I'm a good father, my face is a hieroglyph,
And her eyes are just pictures fawning over their masculine,
When I would have preferred their round organs sappy and lucid,
To rest above the cenotaph on my shoulder and give a drawn out
Sigh of surrender, her to breath the hot accusations of cinnamon orgasms
In my palm as if figuring it out was all we had to do,
But I still haven't figured it all out, but I am a cheap alcoholic:
All I've had to drink this year is rum- three bottles, under a $30

Sack, fermented cane raised up like weeds in Haiti, stomped
Into smack by the dripping feet of the poorest black men, Stored away in barrels and bell jars of mutated aberrations who Didn't make it as far, but will live a long time down by the river,
In the side show, to attract voyeurs to the used car lot, under the Slapping pennants, red, white, and blue- they will go a long ways,
For their tumors and goiters and mysteries so far stunted;
The rum slapped with a cheap label and a Surgeon General's Warning:
No Pirates or bombshells, no varsity smiles, no camaraderie-
The staple fermentation of sugar cane- I like it like that:
On an airboat in the everglades, the alligators grinning with ruby
Eyes daring crooked experiments,
But I still haven't figured it all out.10% of my poems drunk,
But another 20% lie and say they are, to give excuses for their Obsessions, the poor similes, the ugly metaphors-
My poems are the soul of a homeless man, ruminating eyes, Gap toothed, swaying like ancient mariners thrown off with Limes at the port of Nassau, but they are free men,
And though it may take them a while to figure out where to go,
In the end the are calypso lacking satire, wordy salesmen
Chain smoking and as twitchy as jackrabbits,
Mumble footed fools fallen down before they reach Juliet,
So they just stare up and cry and pet the night-
They cannot afford to choose which way to go,
But they have yet to be crowned with their obligatory headstone:
So they sing their wordy calypso for you tonight,
Hoping that you might canter down the stairs, hold Them gently upon your bosom, whispering softly your Tender criticisms: What they do wrong, and maybe
What they do right.
I hope so....

I Know I Am Not Pablo

She wakes up in Colorado
Some mornings; the aspens are taking off
Their blushing clothes; they don't stop
When she yawns, they get done and naked.
In opal crooks where birds no longer sing,
And mountains dawn powder white caps,
Winter's hoary pollens,
As tourists bring their skis into their downy basins,
And her mother sells them used books
About Hemmingway and far away,
Matadors in red deserts of spikenard,
Lorca breathless under his olive tree;
I should not stop in front of her storefront on my Way to the graveyard,
I should not write out another poem in childish
Fingerprints upon the windowpane;
But the pain is this far tattooed into the walking cadaver;
These noiseless sounds from the industrious fingers....
What then? Another poem before midnight,
And the abatement of Tesla's inventions down the Ghostly main street. How so will she find me in A fur coat. She is not even six feet tall, but would balance Me well enough on the see-saw if we leaned over and Laughed the way children do before they tire and Fall asleep; but when I read my own words by the Illusion of fire, I know I am not Pablo. Untalentedly
Scarred, how should she love me then when she already Has the ring on her finger; this is no longer kindergarten, and what should I make of
Her but a nature allegory, a dryad kneeling into a Glacial tear. I could do it just as easily for the girl who Serves me from the fast-food window,
Before I drive away and start a greasy séance, and I would Be faithless to her, for the talent that I lack is the knowledge
She would give, her body draped like an answer, a Blanket of warm fidelity, so much warmer than what Has become, that I should lapse into amnesia, forgetting Where I live.

I Know I Believe- In Fact I Burn

Lapping in the wound of your eyes-
With very little costume, I don't know what else to Say- The basest of elements, I yet attract nearer
Where you root in the colonnade
Of colored spaces;
Everything I have chosen to speak has turned Corruptive, but such ash can be used to emblazon
The hills across the valley-
And even when times are tough, there is reason to Succeed from the canvas you are looking out
From, the paradox of necessity:
I would have to pick your fruit and sell it to all the Carnival tourists to keep you alive;
I would have to allow this other man to take you as
His seed of family,
But it meant the crèche of your unspoken joy,
That crippling thing that pantomimes, that doesn't even Correct its spiraling descent into the apathetic pines;
I would like to speak to you across country,
But it cushions all sorts of blades either in my chest or Soul, the ratty innards always gnawing-
Every part of you is the arcade men turn pugilist for,
And for that reason I am a defeated victor,
Puzzling his tongue over the sadness of your beauty,
Even more cryptic coming toward the nude winter:
And caracoled in the greater downs of the darker sea.
If men were to really see, they would wither; and so they Only play on fingers, leaving me alone to break the trail
Toward the beautiful apex you have no reason for;
That is you religion fluttering in tulip prayer flags that I know I believe- In fact I burn.

I Lay Down

All books should begin
With sunlight, with rain,
With jovial violence, with her lips parting:
A cliché, a motif,
French women getting changed unabashedly
On the red wet diamond of baseball,
And men singing and Swing clubs, making love furtively
Or running away from love and climbing
Mountains to see her from far away,
And feel her breathing beneath them insouciantly,
The transcendentalism of better pilots,
In the freedom of misspelled names and Open dictionaries,
The thieveries of survival and recognition,
And go down in the cathedral of wet and weeping
Bows, holding hands, praying standing up,
Recognizing the newborn mathematics of her legs,
The immortality of her swollen breasts, the Unprintable memory of that evening,
The indefinable beauty of her eyes courting in the Dimming glow, the crowding of this loneliness
Sparks the ether of these very woods,
With words soothe the rattle of the poisonous
Viper and fill her mouth with verbs and tongue,
And wash together in the dewy pinions,
In the indigoed vespers, the stars milky candles
Wavering leaping over the summit high above,
Cliffs as her neck stretched in this shower,
A monument in its ochre lather,
A woman far away, misspelled, begins the language
I lay down....

I Only Have God In Me When You Are Near

We both have tailbones
Which means not so very long ago we Were fish,
In the greater scheme of things
Those godly days which stretched for eons
In slow interludes between the arc of the sun,
Way back when the Lord was still young and Adventurous and would spend all day in his artistry
Creating the new words which caused those very things
To grow upon the earth, the first couples in spring
Molded by his hands and breath, and then at evening
Settling down upon the first stoop under the soft door-light
Of his modest middle-class abode, and enjoying a pipe,
He would smile satisfactorily and with admiration
At the two of us playing for his show, the first of our kind,
Leaping through the waves, that earliest sunlight dancing
Upon us brilliantly, as our streamline bodies tried on the New world, skimming along the young sea and leaping Youthfully upon his eyes alone—Our only thoughts were
Of each other, and that was all we knew, the two of us our world.

But then one day God was gone and so were you—
There were more of us now, but those were the same ones
I still do not care to know—The two of us was all I've ever needed,
But maybe God felt differently, and seeing how we were many now,
And maybe all the same to him, he may have lured you out
And packed you up for lunch, to fry up with some salty chips.
That was when I forgot how to breathe,
In my gills that stretched out and brushed along your silvery sides,
That touched your neck and exhaled into your throat, and you into me,
But with you gone I had forgotten how, and began to drown in the sea.
And I flopped out and began my devolution into Man,

So now the only thing remaining to remind me of you is That useless hidden tailbone down the back of my spine, that Still in ghostly fingers sometimes tries to wag—Now, stranded,
I am always an atheist—And though the world is filled up with All the many things God made into it, I don't believe in a single
One of them, because I cannot feel them running through me,

Coursing the first purest thought through me—you through me—

But there are those rare days where my spirit awakes and you Come around me, when I see you trying to jog, putting on your new Legs he must have given you after he realized his mistake, you moving
Like the first of your kind down the lane beneath the deciduous trees
Shady in Central Florida, the brightness of faith before the faded lawns
Near the University—I watch you go by at 4 am, after my shift is over,
And I am proud, because though you seem to have metamorphosed into Someone else, I can see you all the same, and it is as if you are swimming
With me in the sea again like those very early days when it was only me and
you,
And I can almost taste you again—

a mirage, He only allows you in my Vicinity maybe once a decade, and that is when I saw you last, when I had To move away from where you continued to swim in those schools far away from
me.

I do not know why you go and do not come back to me, unless it is because
You have forgotten how we once were before anyone else arrived.
And without you, I cannot breath and I am virulently faithless, but in those Fleeting instances when we share the same atmosphere, it is almost as if We could shed our clothes once again and let our truthfulness grow outward into
The sea, wetting our tailbones, that I become alive—those few times,
When you breathe near me, are the only Ones when I allow God once again to enter me.

I Ran Amongst The Trees (Censored)

I ran amongst the trees today following the path of a dozen of my ghosts the uneasy boot prints of my nostalgia when I daily inhale these woods, when I go into them to scream to open up my wind to suck in the air between the pines, to think her name and to run through the disillusionments
I know you don't call, I begin to understand the chaos of the world on this track, inseparable from it: we are not above it, we are but one of the infinity of incarnations from these woods, we are like one of these trees subatomic we are the same material as the woodpecker-
we go down thinking, we rise up believing, we are the appendages of the mother- we cannot be removed from her- we are a manifestation of her thought- How come the Indians knew this and she destroyed them, creating white men with muskets and joneses for blood out of her centennial dreams- we come out of her conscious while we sleep we move on her as she turns on that celestial bed, and each time she comes awake our personal consciousness dies- before we moved through woods, now we are buried in coffinsreturned to her- swallowed up by her, our manifestation is complete, but her conscious is infinite, longing, dreaming, arising, changing, dressing and undressing on the moment, I run through the woods, knowing it, knowing she has dreamed me, and my limitation is that I will die, yet she will dance forever, she will dream up her children forever, she will forget me to birth anew, but I will never leave her descending into her my unfulfilled desires will settle and leave my body-they will go nowhere they will vanish- running through the woods,

I recognize this part, and yet continue my human hunger for the woman across the country who is yet another manifestation from the same source; in my dreams and poems I would have her, I would recreate the power of the mother, but I am only an arm, I am only a thought reaching out, and my only comfort is that very soon we will return to the same source under the deep river's water under the great earth's bed we may lie 1,000 miles apart, but in this breath, in the dream of her world, we walked here together we breathed and rejoiced in our living in this point in the infiniteness we saw each other- what a miracle it is to see another of her dreams, what a miracle to lie a hand upon another dream and know your love for it even when it steps away from you and is forgotten- in the nocturnal cycles of the earth, all of her dreams are forgotten and her dream of me is like this, fleeting, unreal-once I am laid down once I am no more I will have run through the woods on the same night of the dream I will have scribbled this in inky gusts in flashes of awareness the fish makes coming up- and in my dream I will have loved her, and after I go down, another dream will love another.

I Remember You Too

Kelly kissed my neck today just like
Erin did ten years ago-
While I was done buying books and heading home;
And now I want to buy something else too:
I want to buy a home,
I want to throw a baseball game; I want to settle down like
A fur coated animal fully infatuated with the zoo
Who on his Sundays is let out to look
Out at the waves;
And I want to hold Kelly's hand and look out at all of her Trapped sisters and ask her where Her mother lives; and ask her too her middle name,
Because I cant remember:
She told it to me today and we went to the park,
Just like the virgin went to her grotto;
And the little black slaves danced, and the apartments bloomed:
The pirates were laughing in their trances;
Their gold the filigree around the screen at the movie theatre;
And I will die and I will dance,
And girls who I have loved will dance before me,
But now I have nothing at all to prove, or if I do then it is Only something I cant remember;
But I remember holding up my hands inside the butterfly house
At the zoo;
And I remember today you kissing my neck-
And I remember you too.

Robert Rorabeck

I Saw You

Evil men win in this World- I saw you dancing with Him- I saw you dance.

Robert Rorabeck

I Still Keep For You

I remain on our corner,
Where the moon is hung as you left it,
Where the light pools down as if on
A stage, turning the neighborhood blue
With the somber possibility;
I am still here,
Holding my gift for you,
My eyes beholding the last image of
You, how you moved like an ibex
Grazing with beautiful legs
Across our teenage suburbia
How your attention lit upon me
For no more than two weeks and
We made loving play on those old hunting Grounds of Latin class, before new Men startled you into their forests
Where kings saw you bathe with the Dryad Galaphile, in the emerald tinctures
Where your legs scissor with the sadness
Of crocodiles
How you dried off and walked towards me,
Naked and without reason kissed me long
And deep, like something very old
Remembering childhood
Only to lit off again, like a beautiful insect
Resting for a moment on me
For the briefest moment in the shortest life.
See how I wait for you still In the neighborhood down the street from
Our high school, in the old hunting grounds,
This sad light cast down upon the space
Next to me
I still keep for you.

Robert Rorabeck

I Still Want To Go Down On You, ....., Oh Well

What wonderfully warm suppliant:

Now that I am drunk, and probably shouldn't

Be writing anything. Yes, I should shut up,

And look at pictures of you, down the well

Of high school, with your tawny legs,

Shaved and brown like the elbows of trees;

But, as you can see, I am writing anyways,

Even if you or anyone else is reading this.

If you do, it will make me laugh, now that everything

Is thoroughly maudlin: I am neither as ugly as I

Fear, nor as handsome as your drunken expectations

Might have hopes. I am drunk, and it is Halloween,

And I am thirty; and I am published, by the great

Philanthropic arm of the queen's navy, and undoubtedly

You are making lovely eyes with your patrons, or

Whoever you are with. I love you, and I thought

About writing you and telling you that, but

I am not as stupid as you might hope, nor am I

Emily Dickenson holding to the arm of her newly

Procured husband as they are floating down the Nile,

Or anywhere else: My great uncle made fun of my thesis,

But he is a liberal judge, and a c*nt; and now I am

Published: yahoo, and anyway, and anyway, like I said:

I am drunk, and not as handsome as you might expect,

And now I am listening to Jack White spew extemporaneously:

And he is rather quite good, given all the possibilities,

And even if we grew up in Wellington, we loved the true

Happenstance of sunrise of bankruptcy and exports:

Now that I've said that, I should laugh and play a video game.

I am only 1/64th Jewish, so I don't mind where I park:

Today, a woman came with a summons for my father,

Because he has too many horses, but what do you expect?

I'm bone broke, but that is a lie, because I have $150,000,

And I want to go down on you, Erin: I want to go down on

You, Erin, because you are the only thing which is real.

Now pay attention, because I love you,

And you shall survive forever in my voice, if it should

Survive forever; and I want to buy you a house and live with

You for sometime in it, if you should still have the eyes which fancy

A kiss from me:
But like I said, I am drunk, so I do not know if
This is true, but I know who you are, because I
Have painted you in my novels like a salacious virgin,
And let you swim in my grottoes,
Because I love you, or the theory of your thighs
Opening like heavenly doors:
But what now should I write, in order to procure you,
Except that I love you, and when I look at pictures
Of you it makes me swell:
I love you, or the theory of your impermanence;
And I am sure I always will (Which makes a rhyming couplet.)

Robert Rorabeck

I Suppose We All Must....

Stacked against me,
I suppose we all must die,
But I have a nasty trick of taking a whole
Lot of ba$tards with me before I go-
Even in daycare after school in Elementary,
I caught the dodge ball between
My trembling knees and called the teacher
Out,
And he had to go; and that was the end of
That, and we had won,
But, I suppose we still all must die;
And I'd check out Sherlock Holmes from the library
And keep it in bed with me well overdue until even the fine
Detective smelled of piss and fear;
In fact, he entirely lost his sense of smell,
And ended up following the wrong trails,
And was bettered by feral young bloodhounds with Immaculate olifactories;
But I guess you've already been told that If you've read Mark Twain's A Double Barreled
Detective Story; and if you've been listening,
You'll know I suppose we all must die-
Think of the flowers picked for corsage,
Or the flowers I picked for you who came all the way
From Sweden,
Were yet molested by Swedish bees and late at night
By romantic Swedish vampires, before they gave Their extinguished photosynthesis to you,
But what did you do with them?
Didn't even those flaming sex organs mean a thing,
Before you chose to settle down into the blue anchors
Of his smiling wounds
Which took you all the way down to the bottom
And sat there making unmitigated love with you;
And how long do you thing you might be able to hold
Each other- For another poem,
Long enough for a finer gentleman to paint you naked
Into prehistory, glamorous and exposed like a
Newly discovered extinct species, like a postmodern pictograph

Upon the walls of a working class cave;
And I've thought of you driving up to Michigan,
Or selling fireworks in New Mexico;
I've thought of you down with the broken
Arrowheads scattered like seeds out in the pasture,
Or while reading from my indebted cliffs far into Each succession of afternoon;
And maybe one day I will find you out,
And call you by some secret name, and catch you
About the neck, and drink off your lips as if I were Tipping back a flower,
Your tongue a pistil, your limbs undraped each petal
A game,
Solving you for a little while before the end,
And the dawn of a knife blade along the dusky arteries
Where the bank comes reaping what we all must owe;
And I'd thought I'd find you then while
The curtains close and all the dancers wilt off the ballroom,
But even if we won't at least we danced together
Mammals of the same language, breathing so similar
Of thoughts that we might have been of the same body
Even though we were so far away;
And I would hold your hand even as the book was closing,
Even after I had failed at the last chapter,
I would keep to you and decorate your passing in the Beautiful gifts of finished stone that said you name,
Whatever I could buy or steal for you;
And even if I suppose we all must die, I would like to pretend to Having known you,
Of giving you my drunken thefts bottled, tossed into a weeping sea
And carried so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

I Think She Knows

I think I love her
And she knows,
And that is why she
Can afford
To think she loves
Another man....

All that I am is Already hers,
And I think she knows....

Robert Rorabeck

I Want To Be Alone And I Want To Talk To People

Pain burns out eventually like an exhausted fire,
Like a scarred baby shushed into sleep approaching
The bleary dawn,
Smoldering as it faints, dreams of walking:
Sift it, though, and it is still alive,
Hibernating in the starless coals,
Black caterpillars to be metamorphosed into blazing wings,
Hiding like a little girl who can speak with dragons,
When these mountains are very dry,
Like parched lips waiting for the ore of lovers, and lightning comes Riding like a debauching gentleman promising
Rain, but there is none, but he already has her in his saddle,
Carrying her to the complicated alders for her to swoon,
Thatched in the crossties of sickly peeling trunks,
And wake up enveloped and undeniably compromised,
And the wind is crazy and dispossessed,
Can move the bolts against the stockpiles,
Can bend trees like great bears foraging for the rarest honeys,
And pollinate the valley in a single huff,
Like a drunken giant can fornicate with mountains,
Can caress their nipples until they spill volcanic milks,
Can give the scent of elk to the wolf and lead him on,
And the natural elements know the pain is waiting, the Foreboding instincts under the misrepresenting rime-
Pain is the sort of predator which hibernates inside the Greatest judges, and the microscopic flees,
And is even there when the circus is in town, and when Someone is smiling, and does not need shadows to hang around
And though there are times when pain is numbed,
When kissing in the lawn, and swimming in the glistered chlorine,
When having a good dinner, and petting the animals who come
Out of their hutches to be fed, pain is all around,
Waiting for the butterflies to wilt,
And the game to fold, for love to disperse to strange continents,
For parents to die, then pain struts and is king,
And he can be seen for miles around, and felt coiling like
A ball of infant coral snakes in the marrow of the bones,
Striking with venomous precision in gleesome darts-
And I told her, if she came to me pain would dry out like

A starved criminal upon a moldy couch in the middle of a
Black forest surrounded by the industrious city; I told her
To come to me, and she said she would, but she did not come,
Knowing that it would only attract more pain, eventually;
Thus my pain lingers, and she kisses a tall gentleman gleaming
Like mercury whispered down from the weeping moon;
He is seemingly without pain, and this why
She touches him all over in slow ways, and says his Name the way the sea sloshes and licks the legs of The dock, but pain is there too, mumbling in his dreams,
And soon he will wake up like a sudden catastrophe,
And then pain will be all over that place,
Like salt in the fire's wound.

Robert Rorabeck

I Will

I really only have one leg,
So you wouldn't shoot me if I am not enough,
And yet I go and get your ice-cream
And get in a fight- blue jaws laugh at me,
When afterwards but before school
They are eating carnivores their nest over
The trucks I've come to for you;
And afterwards, waiting so long to return,
You are kissing another man, both of his legs
Playing football:
And now I have hives, and I am melting
When I get up I have no equilibrium and the Ringmaster told me what good would I be;
There will always be a better man for him to feed
The elephant: the n#ggers in the sacks, the gold
Lying in the hay: and I heard you making love
Dripping tongues of flesh while the new ones came
In circling like buzzards waiting for your fruit to dry,
But it never will: You've gone through your Transformations, and held battle and now the victor
Is yours, and you lay in the bed of flowers and ask Me to hop along and bring you some,
And told me to name them whatever I will,
As long as I name them for you; and I will.

Robert Rorabeck

I Won'T Stop

My computer is about to crash,
But it is still too dangerous to touch you.
In a week I will be in the same state as you,
And I will sell pumpkins on Halloween,
But you will not see me;
No one will see me, but the same girl
Might stop by to get a discount on a Christmas Tree, if only because she pretends
To want to have sex with me....
But I will think of you;
It is what I always do,
And I am sorry. When the planets move
Like silken virgins between the trees,
It's what we sell: Frasier Furs, Scotch Pine,
Asphodel—What the hell is Asphodel?
All I know is that it rhyme and it's Either a plant, a tree, or an herb.
How do you pronounce herb?
I mean, yourself, when you were young
And you went into your backyard to play
With what you were. I wonder about those Things, and the tiny spaces of green I see
You in. Way back in high school,
One night you called me out. My "friends"
Told me, you wanted to see me, but I didn't come,
So even then I knew you would move so far away,
But then: always then and on through now
I knew I'd love you. I love you now,
Because it is all my soul does: It writes for you;
It centralizes its pain through this existence
On you, Erin. I love your name and my soul
Pines for you. I'm drunk and this damn
Computer is about to crash, but my thoughts
Are true to you, as you disappear into another
Woman, your forgetfulness eludes me,
Excludes me, is God Damn F—ing rude to me,
But I don't blame you. This is life,
The nature of our existence, and we are not
Stars naked and getting love in a movie.

I love you and you know this and in a week
Or two I'll be in the same state as you,
But you won't see me, though I might swim
In the same sea as you, breathe the same air as you,
Look up at the moon with you from so far away.
You must not see me, because you know you
Love me too, but this life needs it's pain,
So we'll both do what we've got to do.
Marry another man, let him enter you.
Bare his children and take his name,
And all those things which f— away the pain,
But, Erin, here's the thing:
I won't stop loving you....

Robert Rorabeck

Ice Climbing

Send shivers to my loneliness.
Look at me with starving eyes,
The places where isolation roams
And imprints startling tracks in
The permafrost—
Show me your breath so that I might find you
Outstretched like Prometheus'
Lover on a glacial step,
Your blooms the frigid
Chrysanthemums upon
Winter's open sill.
There your soul is an ice sculpture,
Carved and held captive by
The Northern deities insured
No men will come and find you,
Hidden in the declivities,
Beneath the freeze framed falls
Of great longing, in the crystalline azure
Monoliths that rise up beneath
The blue underworld sun.
The defeated heroes of this adventure
Stand there before you
In the jaws of amethyst stalagmites.
Like a child lost in the night
Listening to the wolf's snuffling
Approach,
In the great and barren upper peninsulas
Through continents of frozen lakes
Where wiser men sleep unabated;
Where I will find you
And save you somehow—

If He Is Really Smiling

If she hyperventilates repeatedly, how can she kiss
The frog who is hoping, hoping-
After the students have returned to class, and vacated the Topiary-
And the bicycles have led thieves up onto the roofs to Smoke and feel the redacted blemishes
Of their one of a kind lovers-
While then not so far away, in some carport of Suburbia-
A housewife practices her common place adultery,
And the tortoise in her carport eats an orchid at the foot
Of the washing machine- eats an orchid:
God knows where he found her- but after eating her,
He will slip away to become a meal for An alligator who is waiting patiently down the slope to
The canal, but can anybody tell if he is really smiling.

If He Isn'T Immortal

Getting fat, driving up to windows too far past
Crepuscule,
Beginning to disbelieve in French-kisses just as Much as important mail:
Now if there is only vanity, at least I can say that When I will wake up it will be to work in The garden of Eden:
That's what this place really is, with sports stars
And Guatemalans and prostitutes and whores:
Grandmothers softly tucked away in their graveyards,
It having been so long since I touched the flesh
Of their hands as I have raised the tin-foil flag on Some mailbox,
And these words I use can never justify the alcohol
The unsteady means by which I use to get here,
To stand out front of her door along with the kittens she Would rather use for sacrifices;
There are two silhouettes through the portcullises of That silly little house,
And Erin is in love in Gainesville with a man who plays
A guitar,
And god is barefoot in the palmettos his feet in the stigmata
Of freshly cut coral,
And the corral snake is milking his wrist, because d$mn-it
If he isn't immortal, and he has nothing left to lose.

If I Called You Tonight

You reek of amusement parks,
And dorm room sex,
The memories of fieldtrips you never went on.
I want to call you,
But I don't know what to say,
And there are so many things to attend to
In the worrisome Gulf Streams of North Atlantic loneliness-
Soon I will have to attend my sister's
College funeral, and there will be so
Many suspecting eyes, blinking spontaneously
The instinctual needs of far away flesh-
The dark rooms where life develops,
And the places we go to remember nostalgically,
The best places are not real;
I want to call you, but I don't know
What to say, trying to forget the dissection of Galleries from the homeless artist-
Couldn't I take you there without lifting a finger,
And we could spend the entire time not Looking at each other, but riding the rides,
The mechanisms which try not to comprehend gravity;
One day there should be children and Merry-go-rounds and fly elephants,
And my eyes on your hips like a weapon,
And love made in pastel paddle boats on lazy
Rivers where the animals are given luxurious cages
And fed popcorn;
There I could see the sweat of your eyes, and Clasp your forearm to stabilize the trade of tongues,
And we could abandon ourselves,
And become the exhibit of coupling in chlorine,
Like otters, we play with these mollusks
And cannot comprehend the affinities for time,
Our children would be the squeaking pups I would Hold up to your breast as you sang,
So what would it matter at all then,
If I called you tonight?

If I Once Lived There

Wind like Mexican tigers suddenly upspring,
Making me pause from where I'd been forlornly touching
These things;
And the pool is right beside me like a faithful dog,
The pool whose friends are gone off to college, who cannot Quite his day job;
And I sing to the empty waters, into the false blindness of Lost friends,
And the sunlight skips on the waters, seeming to winnow it,
Searching for a lost purse, or probably more so for her:
How she used to come out and change her colors from his Flesh,
By laying down in the back of a neighborhood who has all Gotten up to the traffic of musical chairs and changed its Positions so much it is impossible to say if I once lived
There anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

If I Were A Fly

If I were a fly,
I'd crawl on your lips,
I'd lick at your eyes,
If I were a fly-
What would you say,
If I said your name to your ear,
If I were a fly,
And could I go about you this way,
In the secret procession
Of my choo choo train legs,
I'd tickle your neck,
I'd shade in your bangs,
If I were a fly,
And what would you do,
If you knew my name
Would things be the same
If I were a fly
Would you let me be Familiar to you,
And explore you like a new Continent,
And cartograph your things,
And plot each inch
And sketch
Would you allow me to be Alone with you in
Your bedroom,
And feel you stretch and breathe.
In class,
Could I go on being your Unnoticed tattoo
If you were a girl I knew
And I were a fly.

If I Were Daniel Johnston

Make me a drink and I'll call
You joy:
Is that my drink,
Did you just get over the boy-
Well, well- I'm still hung-over these woods-
Well, and I'm not looking too good, well-
Brindled under the cover of a stewardess,
But maybe this drink will Get me out of first grade hell- well:
You're eyes are still beautiful,
And everything to believe in- you are my Laurie, if I were Daniel Johnston-
If I were Daniel Johnston-
But Laurie never loved Daniel- She married
The mortician- and she drove around all
Spaced out in a hearse through midland cemeteries
Under the swayed backed Mick Jagger Power lines-
I've loved you since I colored you with Crayons, out of lines; or, I heard you laughing well past your Bedtime- when good girls were sleeping through Their rows in the woods,
You were laughing, wiggling your toes- and looking Good; but this is my own disease,
Impossible to share it with anyone else:
And I love you this way quietly on my swing-set; and on my knees,
Trying to blow out wishes through the trees,
If I were Daniel Johnston, and you my Laurie....

Robert Rorabeck

If I Were King

Dying with the bluebirds who haven't found
Their summer:
I supposed I loved you, but there is only this:
The inconsistent artistry
Across the spine of broken continents
Trying to sing:
Across the dying world, another angel
Fading- falling as ashes to the lips
Of the somnolent fish in its Playground: falling down that way, over
The train tracks of the playground:
And I hate you:
And I hate you, while I remain theatrical,
But it doesn't matter as I am dying-
And it seems to take a while for the fire engines
To sing,
Across the playgrounds, making a boisterous
Noise into the amphitheatres that I suppose
Were never there:
While in the morning, there will be breakfast:
And the daylight of their songs only lasts for Another summer,
And then all of the pretty architectures diminishes-
And we sing for our own money, as the preternatural
Daylight fades, as if I were king.

Robert Rorabeck

If I Will Ever See Her Again

Candle light doused in the sea underneath the Pretty fort: what have you been doing, but holding
Your breath and not making any wishes,
And now your time is out, and nothing can be given to You, neither the waves nor the pearls beneath the waves,
But it all still goes on beautifully, like pulling
The ribbons off a stewardess' legs- and if she is a present
For you, I cannot care- because soon she will leap, and Leap, and take to the air: soon she will fly away with Her brilliant cavalry of men, her sorority for an Entourage- and I can't- I will not care- how brilliant
It is, nor if I will ever see her again.

Robert Rorabeck

If It Meant Anything

Palm trees are awakening on the other side of the glass:
There are so many words I've dreamed of,
In the language which cannot be communicated to The commuting species; they are going as fast as Apoplectic car salesmen out in a storm,
But they are as beautiful as the unripe sky before the Tumultuous harvest: once settled they will lie with Those permanent scripts above them, and the fronds
Will brush like careless women resettling their hair:
I dreamed, though, she was entirely bald, like
A cancer patient, who had reverted to her original name,
And yet nearly as beautiful as when I clipped her in the Bleached halls, until she fell so far away from me she Ended up in Colorado between the red stones of Ancient masonries the tourists peruse, and her the same;
And even in my dreams I was too in awe to speak to her,
Though I met her eyes at certain intersections,
But now that I am awake and the traffic flows, and my Old lovers make love to new calls,
I don't believe I've seen a thing, or even so,
If it meant anything at all.

Robert Rorabeck

If It Pleases You

If it pleases you then yes;
If it does not please you, then forget it:
For I am displeased with my form, and I would like to Travel around a rich cul-de-sac in a park
Where the storm clouds belly and press cannibal song birds
To each blade of grass;
And eventually she drains herself while you are so full and Far away;
While they say that it is the very same moon over all of us,
But I do not believe them: here is my moon over my world,
And where is your moon; where is your world?

Robert Rorabeck

If It Should Ever Rain Again

The nights were spent alone,
Evaporating, and now this: not even a knighthood,
Estranged from my parents,
Vagabonding in one place, jump roping over graves,
And the curly hair of the spirits indistinct of color:
I have a book published,
But I end up working for my awful uncle, making
Ten dollars an hour:
I drink too much: I love Alma too much, and maybe or Most likely it is that I will die:
Maybe it will be in the hurricane season, which will give me
A good excuse,
So I don't have to look anymore at the overspent old ladies,
And feel guilty for despising them,
Or trying to move them along all the quicker;
And I can't hear anymore if it is raining, but it really shouldn't Matter, since all of the historical forts are locked,
And the celebratory fireworks eagerly spent,
All of the flatulent tourists sleeping, their cowbells silent in
The overprized hotel rooms stocked up against the easy way,
If it should ever rain again.

Robert Rorabeck

If It Was Your Happy Birthday

Like puppies who somehow shut up at the sight
Of the next round of glorious sunset coming through Your window,
Like a glorious tsunami that the clown fish have been Dreaming up
In their tanks in those shops, dimes of water filling their Gills like breastfeeding;
But you are already gone down the other side of the hill,
Your pail empty,
Your daughter starving though next month will be her
Birthday:
And I am the bank robber, or I am the fox,
My easily avoided arrowhead shot near your shoulder bade
Like the tattoo of a windmill tempting you to surrender;
And I am the ever so many things that you have never Picked up to read:
I am an entire library at the bottom of the oceans of my hell:
Your body is an orchard running away into the gloom
Of a preposterous family,
Rootless, telling each other nightmares, while you get off work
And take your high schooled sisters to the mall,
The airplanes floating above your head like the perusing
Majesty of obese angels;
While your religion remains back in Mexico in a Virgin emblazoned on Some disbelieving farmer's 15th century cloak;
But I will chase you like an adolescent fox plays with a hyperventilating
Butterfly through the forest,
Until we both exhaust and lay like a rookery of fire engines fallen down
From the steep slopes of the airy basins;
And then the greenness will sing to us, as if it was your happy birthday,
And all around will be painted your favorite color.

Robert Rorabeck

If It Were Real

Open me in the shadows, my son of boulevards,
And you will say I am brilliant,
Even though it isn't enough:
For all my songs are an echo;
And all my hair is gray, and the sun has beaten my
World;
All the girls are empty oysters, all my words of Them the eventual failures of a burned out fire;
And I exist within the minute pauses of traffic;
I try to exist right here,
Or when I leap it is to breathe inside the mobile
Shadows of a goddess;
It is the only thing that is good for me,
And she rests in holidays but never quite repeats herself;
But I keep swilling up from the bottom of a glass,
Each time my eyes a little wider from less oxygen;
Each time the rain hitting further apart, her canopy a little more Spread,
And I more drawn out and tenebrous;
The train tracks shallow basins of my dogs' muted tongues;
I sleep all day in their loneliness,
Or in the brilliant loneliness of her shadow which shimmers
Sometimes off her body as it waves as if it were real.

Robert Rorabeck

If Only Sunshine Could Cry

The power of the spell over her, as dark as a
Starless Mexico,
As elusive as the eel of onyx slipped into the grottos
Of her favorite virgins after
All of the celebrations- after the suicides of her
Inextinguishable uncles,
And the last ashes of the madder than mad fireworks:
And I wanted to kiss her lips
Through the open windows of all of the possible sorts
Of transportation imaginable,
Thought up by man- helicopters and even through the Transoms of a forest diademing the shell rock
That ended in the brink of a childhood canal;
But I was only eleven and petrified of Kidnappers while the rabbits laid eggs,
Excited by Easter sunrise, and another resurrection,
While I bent and nibbled at her painted toes;
And when we made love in my cerulean bed, and
She held my breast, my ample flesh clutched in her painted
Nails for the few minutes we had,
It seemed that it should be raining outside, if only sunshine
Could cry.

Robert Rorabeck

If Our Suburban Streets Could Divide Entire Hemispheres

The sunlight kisses the swing-sets, if that is what
It really does;
And the swans set out to some place really beautiful,
If only for because:
And there over the sand dunes of the park,
Beneath the mangroves and the sandy pines, the sun
Is leaving for the dark:
The mailmen are finally home, and the mountains are Cooling and waiting for stories,
And all of the airplanes are settling to park,
Where some such lovers kiss deeply in the heavy fuselages;
But I remembered this morning and how we made
Love,
Even though I have never been to Mexico, I have been to You, Alma,
And into the sweet darkness kindled like phantasms in your Eyes,
Finally welcomed me and gave me new names. So even now
Though the sun is fading like flowers in a graveyard,
I am trusting,
As I remember the single syllable's flame that I spoke
As we came together,
And I ran my finger over the old friends of your ribs, until
All too soon and just like the sun,
It was also your time to go away, seemingly to a home on
The other side of the earth,
As if our suburban streets could divide entire hemispheres.

Robert Rorabeck

If Pain

If pain, then let it be slow like mercury-
Let it eat the moon in all of its hemispheres,
Entwine like beautiful barbed-wire glowing under the sea,
Time and time again around her neck,
Until the blood is roses,

If pain, let it dally for many years all around
My sunken eyes, my raccoon eyes, the nocturnal visions,
Where he is under her skirt like a welcomed thief,
Like a heirloom clutching her neck,
Or a brooch of lips tucked into her breast like
A giant infant at the tug,

If pain, let it be the wounded memories which make Dogs raise moist muzzles and howl from hairy throats,
The playgrounds of abandoned winters,
And old men hauling their guts in red wagons
Back and forth from the store to loneliness',

If pain, welcome,
For you accentuate all my failures,
Leave entire pages unread, find out I am a plagiarist
Whose dictionary consists of three dozen frosted words, Eaten up by serial killers with the rime of screams under Their nails,

If pain, enter,
For I know you,
And you have stuck around since my childhood,
To dig the graves of little animals, to bow my head as she walks away.

Robert Rorabeck

If She Does

We've got in pumpkins-
Entire bins of pumpkins- and my job today
Was to kill the ants,
And think of something:
And this really beautiful mother came in today-
She looked like someone's sister.
She looked like she'd played soccer in high school.
Then a man came in with gold teeth,
And I think he made a comment about my face
Under his breath-
I shouldn't like to think what he had to say,
But I know he was Italian and a painter
And from New York,
But definitely not an artist,
And I was glad when he went away,
And after he went away I thought again of myself as An artist
Who must try and look at his face from the sunburned
Shadows from the best possible angles
And try to make the best of it,
And be happy that that beautiful young mother came in
And asked my name,
And said that she would be back to buy a Christmas tree.
If she comes, then I'll have to find out her name,
And see if she doesn't want to ride bicycles near the sea:
If she does it will be the first time I've been with a woman
In seven years,
And the very first time I've been with a beautiful woman
Not counting a couple prostitutes
If she does.

Robert Rorabeck

If She Ever Dreams Of Me

Every day I say nothing, and at night I nocturne
As soft as the lingerie of negligent sparrows: I go nowhere
While my sisters grow up,
And it is beautiful if only because I have so often been under the glowing Lip of mountains;
And I have seen wolves and bears:
I have had a gun pushed to the back of my head, and I have slept
For three nights in the castle perilous;
And most of my muses know who I am, even if I have only kissed one
Of them;
And she knows who she is; and Sharon lives in Colorado, which Isn't bad;
And she knows all about the perfumes of spirits, and her daughter is Beautiful: Her husband has the highest score in pinball,
And how he ever won her I don't know,
But it is a beautiful dream they are having, asleep in their house
And up in the mountains deep in snow;
And if she ever dreams of me, I should never know.

Robert Rorabeck

If She Refused To Come Home

Some things glide through the aspens on
Their bicycles,
Full of hopes even though there isn't a path,
And it snows
While the river doesn't have to need to sing,
And yet the hidden spring
Replenishes itself in her dressing room,
Quite sure she is beautiful
Where the red foxes glisten like the wayward
Contestants of a baseball game;
And what I had to say to her was for without Reason,
But love.... A concept of panhandling,
A homeless, toothless sport,
A smoking hole in my shirt; and now I would Like to go to her
And climb up her, nesting in the summit of her
Gaudy beads, all the fashion she puts
On moving with the circulations of the forest
Only she knows,
But she is not entirely jealous and would stare for Awhile up at the pretty thief of moon
As it snuck the meanings of romance out
Of weighted sky and plied it to her trade,
As she grew more children
To shade a house for me, even if she refused to Come home.

Robert Rorabeck

If She Wasn'T Already So Far Away

Twilight drinks itself to sleep and I am Here doing the same and yawning trying to picture the Dusky clouds over the Retiring golf courses and the teenage cemeteries,
And maybe it because that I am not even real
And had to sit tonight behind Romero's house while his Special needs nephew had his forth birthday party:
And I sat beside Alma and her mother
And her daughter:
And she wore the dress that I bought her last weekend at
The flea market underneath I-95:
And I got to do this until the man she lives with came in
And sat between us: he had fake diamonds in his ears
As big as a black man's birds eggs:
I didn't care: I went home and jogged so far I jaunted past
Where the drunks were fishing and into the rich man's Yards and still I jogged, and I jogged,
Thinking that I could still breath in the loneliest perfumes of Alma
If only she wasn't already so far away.

Robert Rorabeck

If She Will Ever Be Alright

You understand that I love you for real and that is Why I am sweating out prostrate with my liquor and holding Hands with the ethereal:
That I am so scarred and the ghosts are tatters, and the cars drive Incessantly,
And no one hardly ever thinks of the orange groves, the strange sustenance
Of orange women,
The candles lit and falling down in the grottos for the Virgin:
They all just want to get to Disney World and start making sounds of joy;
And I can hear the wind; but I can only imagine what it must have Felt like, the tugs of need that they gave to her after she was born,
Like knights laying in her castle and demanding gifts
Without even knowing how to speak; and the pitch-fork pines
Go up so high like gaunt kings- the second money of their crowns
That calls the lightning down;
And mother counts the payroll all night; and mother is very beautiful-
Almost as beautiful as you, the metamorphosis of all the butterflies
Ending like the last surviving conquistadors into Mexico City;
And I wonder if she will ever be alright.

Robert Rorabeck

If There's A War I'll Sleep With You One Last Time Before I Get Killed

These nights are falling like stairs to nowhere,
And I have no idea where your eyes are leading,
Though I have seen them grazing
On the natural selection,
And if you don't remember seeing me, never mind,
Because I have set out to find you
Alone as my body rests-
I will come to you and pick you up,
For an eight hour adventure of a lifetime.
We can go to that theme park every night,
Even if you are married to another man,
I have a million things to tell you,
And it won't cost a thing,
Undoubtedly, you won't even hear me,
But I will still be here for you, trying my best;
This is all I can do, for you
Are some kind of perfect summer,
And I know I shouldn't love you, not anymore,
But this is not something that needs to go away,
There are so many points upon your unfamiliar lifetime
I can drop down upon,
Places you've never been, you will take me to,
And afterwards, if you let me, I can show you
All these things I continue to try to say,
Because I don't want to die a virgin:
Long distances kisses from a man who really doesn't Matter, who sees you blindly, fool heartedly
He is building a ship to sail out to you,
Just to see you once more, in this quiet life,
He hopes for one more chance,
To hold your hand and step out the Doorway,
To the backyard you have forgotten to explore.

Robert Rorabeck

If They Are Alive

I am going to die, mom.
Do you understand, father?
I am going to die,
Soon after you,
And I will remember you
Until I die
And if I have children
They will remember you—
These words I am writing,
Are they alive?
If they are
Then they will die—
Like a monarch butterfly,
One upon millions,
Poisonous,
Migratory;
They will find their place
In their season
Or they will die along
Their way;
They will die
In a week or two,
In a year,
In a day;
They are never to be heard again,
Stoned away;
They may seem to last
Forever
But if they are alive;
They will die
They will leave no choice,
They will have no children;
They will look like you,
Written in my hand,
They are your ancestry;
But if they have anything to do,
In a season
Once in bloom, They will die;
They will speak without reason,

They will bow down and deliver
Their message to their king;
They will sleep in the living room
Awaiting Christmas
For some years
Only to grow old
And thoughtless;
They will begin to forgive the Reasons you came together
To give birth to the hands
Who gave birth to them;
And weary,
They too will lie down
Upon the earth,
Finally breathless
The journey met
In a language discovered
And fulfilled
In their rented and well
Maintained plots
They will rest
If they are alive—

Robert Rorabeck

If They Are Of Any Worth

The rest of the campus is asleep, so who can I talk to:
Who can I raise up to walk with me through the poisonous Show offs of the
Carnivals of smoke screens:
Sharon, you are up and the world is so young:
You might as well be a starlet, Sharon:
The first and the last star,
Like a wave that takes forever to disperse, if that is what you
Are doing:
A wave so perfect in mind and body that she somehow made
Her way from the Atlantic basin to Colorado,
And up in the chimneys of little boys she made up her mind.
Now all of the cars are rusting,
And I am losing faith in what all the muses are supposed to be:
Oh,
If I had been beautiful enough for you, Sharon;
If I had set out early enough from my door, proudly slinging my Powder and sword;
I would have won any war for you, Sharon:
You are just as beautiful as my mother in her bitter youth,
Sharon;
And these are just my few words still flung for you:
Sharon, like chicken scratch;
If you saw me waking up beside you, Sharon, you would not Love me,
But here is just a little more, like a silent carnival evaporating
Before the threshold of your beautiful door,
Like costume jewelry left under your door, the little play things
I leave your quiet though startling mind;
It is up to you to decide if they are of any worth.

Robert Rorabeck

If They Should Fail

Coloring in the vermilliad, they have a safe time
Talking with themselves:
The snow is hung over, the icicles have inched all week:
Libraries are closed underneath the heatless sun;
It feels good,
As if I have made new friends that shouldn't have to move,
Even while the plates tinker over the warmth
And passions of the poles that sit and wonder if Spring
Might come,
While all of their gods make a zoetrope for the kings of
The past,
Who are still turning, keeping clockwise so that they should Never have to wonder if they should fail.

If We Were In Love

So they called us out of the ballroom, and we Necked in the tall grass while the lions tried to swallow
A harvest of satellites
Like children in a junkyard of cradles; or it was in The green bottlenecks of cars,
Swimming away from school- and from the things we Couldn't say ourselves,
While cowboys rode the gods metamorphosed into Bulls with strange names, and eyes like the confections of Terrible disasters,
Where the most beautiful of virgins were kidnapped into;
So all of our lines read like bad science-fiction
Wrecked into the mirages of a graveyard of oasis's;
The geniis flecked the ash out of their rolling studebakers
Down the streets where the blue bells still seemed to Waver up into the green forts of vanishing mad men
Stocked full of fireworks,
And against them- each wave a madness, each a house of A windmill; and the housewives held the hands of their Tourists and thought that it all was special;
But the whores thought nothing of it at all, buried beneath the Rose thorns, the esplanade turning like a blanket over
A dragon;
And we held hands and walked together through the denouement
Of another evening, but I could not tell if we were in love.

If You Are Around

Who do you think I am now that the night pedals,
And most of the shoppers are done;
And don't you think it so sad, Alma, that I haven't as of yet
Bought our bicycles,
But Alma, I am listening to beautiful music:
It feels like your skin,
And I wish I was more beautiful and easier to be understood by
You
Alma:
Tomorrow I will see you, but I doubt you will be entirely pleased
By me until sometime in the afternoon,
Which is about the hour that you seem to come around,
And the cat fish are so fat and so round,
And they are always surfacing through the sweet and young canals
Just to see if you are coming around
Alma. Just to see if you are around.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Cannot Still Save Me

I almost gave up again but then I remembered my sister's Horses- speckled like the shoulders of the girl
You brought here last night-
And all I can remember of my sister's wedding is the brick with her and Her lover's husband's name smack dabbed with the other bricks:
And now there is a song, another song coming in with another
Wave,
And I am sweating pot bellied out on the coach, my face as mottled
As something that is really insecure and thus always halfway in between The metamorphosis that it always seems to seem:
And the day is broken: the day is on the toilet or is the waiting machine
Inside a phone booth that is dead since high school,
And so I weep beside you in the weeds overcoming the grass like a Movie theatre that has gone to pot,
But otherwise I am good, and I can look up from the little planted tree,
Too small for firefighters to ruin, and I can see her looking back at me:
If her name is Sharon, then Alma you don't remember her,
But she did not save me- so just imagine that this is the parking lot of A super high school that is still surviving,
And Alma you still nook the keystones of my soul, and I am always and Forever climbing up into your treeless bosom;
And, Alma, why I'll be damned if you cannot still save me.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Know What You Do

Going away from the trains further,
Going away for good- going to become a beautiful
Innocent girl smoking in a store-room,
Going up the switchbacks, and going down the Switchbacks and the traffic is always rushing,
But my dogs will only live for so many years;
So many years the cats and goldfish will live,
Kelly; and you don't know what you've found:
My words they are perfumed badges, but they are just
The sweet cadavers still exhumed above this ground,
Above this earth, like sweet melons trying to disavow
Their marriage of gravity, or their marriage to so many Things that are still weeping, that haven't turned Out;
And you saw a dolphin; and you saw a water moccasin,
And you gave a shout,
And danced above your grave; that was what you were Doing, dancing like a dying airplane above your grave;
Kelly;
You didn't even know you were dying: I caught a glance
At your breast, at your tattoo and you were wheeling to And fro,
And I didn't know what I was doing, but I had to let you
Go and you spilled from my fingers like the early morning
Holidays of paper snowflakes, of bamboo;
And your children shot off fireworks and fell asleep in
The zoo;
And you are a beautiful woman, Kelly; Kelly,
But I really, really wonder if you know what you can do.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Liked That Sort Of Thing

With this face I like to pretend
To be an old man with this glass- A nearly Perfect old man, with this glass
And with his bag of fireworks near the sea:
Won't you just sit out and wait and see,
What I could do;
And I've never spoken of this before,
And I am so proud and hung over, while I
Admit that there are better things for you to do:
Luckily you are doing them,
Meeting people I would never meet,
Making love out in the sidewalks of the Catholic Church I can remember positioned quite blue and still Across from that great secular university;
But I won't go to school anymore,
And you know that, but when I did go to school,
It was very difficult to look myself in the eye
In any bathroom mirror- I always looked so awful,
But not quite as awful as I look now,
Revealing myself to you, meaning to do anything to Draw your attention to me in my lonely house,
Like an old widower under the despotic sun,
Even while the waves are crashing and the traffic is going Around, calling in the girls like feeding birds in a pine Forest, flaunting to the short skirts in roller skates,
Meaning that I have dictated this evening my sour candy
From my ineffective bag of tricks,
Hoping that it would captivate you like a poison apple,
Desiring your endearing dishonestly, suspecting that you
Were willing again to make love, if you liked that sort of thing.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Must Look For Me

If you must look for me, do so now,
For my temples will soon be done molting,
And after I've taught my dog to speak, I'll Smoke a fine cigar as I walk away,
My pockets chewing money; though I'll Whistle for a ways, but its not because I'd Want you to find me,
For it is such a sunny day, along the avenues
Which run so swiftly by the cemetery, and the Clouds are pages on their way over the burlesque Sorority, where southern bells swoon off their Bidets, blowing kisses to burly mailmen on their Way home to the misses, while children on the Swing set kick their feet over burry ditches,
And latchkey kittens mew and sway their tails
Up the jumbled gutter, were blindly hungry chicks have Given themselves away;
Little girls pass by gingerly on glittering roller-skates,
Down the windy hill-way, wishing they had three wishes,
And grandmothers sing and do their dishes from the kitchen,
And I am almost all the way,
All the way to the end of the sidewalk; The day is passing Through, and that is nothing beside me, for you have Walked away, you have walked away,
And left me nothing to do, but to do what you already Decided; If you must look for me, do so now,
For the day is gently gliding, dousing the trees in their black
Well, turning off the library, but there is no one beside me to kiss and tell,
As you have walked away,
Leaving only my slipping shadow beside me.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Were Mine To Marry

I have driven past graveyards of Olive and fuchsia:
I have been down to Miami with my father to gather produce,
Before he had his toothache and he wasn't Always so angry:
Before I even knew Alma, or her Virgin of Gaudelupe,
While these nights I tend to bow and pray to both,
While her children are glistening with the lactates in their grottos
And the stars are swinging like smoky censers
And I have a house but it is as hollow as a trick of woe begone
Shoes,
Isn't it Alma: and I drove your aunt and your god mother home today
And I expressed all the things that I desired out of you;
And Meirna wasn't displeased, and she only said that women needed
Some time for such decisions,
And I hoped and prayed that this was true, and that you might want
Me;
And that you shouldn't be afraid, because I, Alma, could be your safe
Loci:
My entire body could be your yard for you yawn and tarry and rest with
The alkaline deer, if you were mine to Mary:
The entire world would be a place for sweet an slow moving fish
Who never had anything to worry,
And the snow would water the grass- Alma,
If you were mine to marry.

Robert Rorabeck

If You Will Be Pleased

You don't seem to see my scars, even while we sit
In the wavering penumbras of your stationary cars; and the bulls
Have gone to the quick markets,
And the sun is as red and as wide and as hungry as an offering
Bowl:
And I do all of this in the quietest howls of the hungriest night:
I say your name like an apocryphal prayer:
Your eyes are serpentine timber, Alma- and your body is a smooth
Bicycle filled now with the familiar tricks of Our delusional marriages: and you are my friend, and we shared
A breakfast together this morning. You fed me pancakes with Strawberry syrup: and your legs were shaved
And they went so far up your little body, like brown ladders into An arboreal heaven I delighted in plucking before
Noon:
And now I pray for you, while your eyes turn in the strange lights
Of your home that seems so far away, Alma;
As I wonder how much time it will take you to get around to Reading this,
And if you will even know me then, and if you will be pleased.

Robert Rorabeck

If You'D Been My Sister

Would that you'd been born my sister,
Then you would already be happily married,
Free of the holocaust
When your mother left to be born again;
And you'd already be happily married:
Maybe you'd be considering me,
But you never would;
And I would be sitting here all alone,
As if I had never known you, if you'd been my sister.

Robert Rorabeck

If Your Eyes Ever Chose

Part of the hemisphere is thick with Rainbows,
Alma: and I can barely remember Colorado:
That is how far away I am from my last love,
And you said you didn't want to hurt me even while you
Moved your car over and idled on my tomb:
And I went over to our aunt's house and looked at her
Virgins and ate her sister's
Cooking, but I couldn't help thinking of your country,
Verdant and green and full of swing sets
And birds of prey:
And I want to propose to you atop that hill we went up
Together
Where there aren't any hungry dogs that could carry you
Away,
Because you barely weigh little more than a hundred pounds,
But you know that I can anchor you and feel the Vibrations of your kite string as you moan in the sun showers
Of my lucky bedroom Alma,
And the fish tale palm winnows like a waterfall of your favorite
Color right outside the open window
Where the airplanes are always leaping like well thrown Stones or lucky amphibians if your lips ever moved off my Water fountains and if your eyes ever chose to look that way.

Robert Rorabeck

If Your Eyes Jog Away

Please don't go away and marry
The mortician—I have been in his rafters,
And the black widow spiders tell me he is no good for you—
I am dead, but I am Casper the friendly ghost—
You are looking right through me now,
Your eyes are s@xy legs; they jog right through me—
There you go jogging through the heavy rain—
See how you make the trees sad, because you won't Say your name, nor tell me what your first word was—
Please don't go away from my lonely University,
Even if I am a ghost and your eyes, s@xy legs run
Right through me—
I am Casper the friendly ghost and we can sit
At your front door and let you get out of the rain—
We can sing songs together, even if I sold all
My albums to get my soul back from S-tan—
I can sit in the same spot you sit, and go inside of You, and sing the songs that you sing from your lips—
I can know you, if you let me, and live a warm
Afterlife within, inside the u-bend of your left ear—
I have been in your lover's home, and it is no place
For the living.
The black widow spiders have told me—
Even though I am dead, I am Casper the friendly
Ghost, and I can sit with you out of the rain or you
Can watch it come down right through me,
If your eyes jog away—

Robert Rorabeck

If's

If I saw tamed lions walking in the sea
With seahorses riding in their manes,
There would never have been a civil war
In Spain;
And little girls torn by kites high up in
The trees,
They'll look down at the parks of the world,
The reedy lakes now all of it no taller
Than their scabby knees-

And, in the afternoon, when all the buses have Gone home,
And there is no more music lessons,
And each kind of little bird is building its nest
In the gutters or the limbs,
And I saw the trapeze-cat walking a tight rope
From this home to the first moon,
To steal your birthstones,

I would lay out a saucer of milk as a reward
To fill my hands with the jewelry of your notions,
To eavesdropp on water-skiers,
And the specters of the service industry
Who used to be teenagers, smoking in the park,
Burning little holes,
And misty arcs hung on chains;

And if I said I'd love you,
You would not complain, but hang on me
Like a fruit in its garden-
We would watch airplanes skipping- if
You would take my name.

Robert Rorabeck

I'll Sing Your Name (But I Am Just Drunk)

I said I loved you,
But I'm drunk- The only way I could Get you to look at me would Be to die,
But I'm too afraid: Listen to the clacking keys
As they promenade:
If any better they would make the sulky
Race through the oracular glade:
I won't write to you directly,
But I'll sing your name- Erin,
Why do I sing your name?
With every night and every poem,
I sing your name:
If it ever goes down,
If I go down as something, it will
Be your shame:
Erin, why should it be your name, if you
Shouldn't make your name mine?
I want you to be mine, but isn't that just the Liquor speaking,
Isn't that just the mother's concern,
And now who do I hear echoing around each and Every impossible turn?
Why, it's just you, Erin- Isn't it?
Because I'm drunk- And I spent $500 hundreds Dollars today, Erin, to go down a new path
Just as far adjacent to yours as my old one;
But I guess it is still just as beautiful in this weeping
Orchard not concerning all the ankle-deep
Weeds, Erin,
And the stolen watermelons. Won't you
Show me your naked breasts, Erin?
But I am just drunk, and the new born foal
Is dying.

Illusion Of The Failing Light

Fell off the stage for somebody, and slept underneath
A school bus
To lay in an orchard of shadows with a terrapin-
With your eyes,
And breakfast all around you, laughing-
Until you made them cry by breaking up with them-
And the saddles are between the mountains-
Isn't that where aspens grow in a different type of Sorority than what we have right here-
While our little brothers sleep outside in blue tents-
Out numbered, they pretend they never have to Go to church again,
Just as I pretend I never saw you kiss his lips-
As I watch you from the shore,
And you became the illusion the failing light played
Across the cliffs- and kept the firemen up
All night with your illusions- until
The lighthouses dimmed beneath the horrendous
Mobiles, swearing they'd had enough.

Robert Rorabeck

Illusions In The Beauty Of A Hibernating Heart

We sold watermelons together and
Now these songs
Cut up into penny candy for 20 cents—
So far from Mexico,
Just a few hours by plane—and I am
Diminishing,
But I still love you—cicadas crossing
Their legs and Changing their clothing in the night—
I remember sleeping on your Roof while you slept
In the bedroom with your husband
And your children:
I was your wolf gusting away—trying to Sleep in the storerooms of your chimney—
Trying to make believe we might once
Enjoy the sunlight of rollercoasters—
If we became the plagiarisms of Tourists—if they kept us together as
The snow melted and ran down the cheeks of Summer—
Now your knights follow you as your car
Is repossessed—where are you going,
Where the rattlesnake lies coiled?
I keep trying to paint for you in these echoes—
Illusions in the beauty of a hibernating heart:
As the school days continue lapsing over themselves—
You are all I can remember,
Even though I will awaken tomorrow and lapse
Through another day without you remorse.

Robert Rorabeck

Illusions You Can Find

Whatever illusions you can find in a carnival
With nursery rhymes tumbling into her at the end of the hill,
In a sweating navel of extinction's joyous echoes
The bones of sounds:
Where your mother and father met and got lost in the woods
Amidst all of the prettiest elk and chicken wire hung up in The lees and around their antlers:
Strange mote of a dance with the airplanes picking berries
And coming so close to the ground as to kiss starfish
Where the angelic arboretum pulls back, where there
Is a sea and dryads disappear into mermaids
Evenly beautiful through the lactates of the heavens:
Where cars park and the first loves weep
Over orange lipped extension chords,
And tourists getting their pictures taken with the Pieta:
I know you are here—In a fantasy that weeps for itself
And the swordfish who have lost their lovers
And come to wreck their silver bodies beneath a lightless house.

Robert Rorabeck

I'M Yours

Wasps close to a flower who's dying
You know your name,
And you know I'm yours.

Robert Rorabeck

Imaginary Real-Estate

Baudelaire is finished and already out in the yard.
I would say it was green, but he has done something
To it, so that only he might properly describe
The hue of its dying;
and all the stars are like shrinking violets as
The busses pull up, yellowing, and the lions roar, meaning to yawn.

Look at all of this, where we've laid our heavy stakes,
And fashioned for ourselves a finite space which needs
Governing and river boats,
And a psychiatrist who listens to her and takes notes
While she lays back under the whirring patina
Of the ceiling fan and pretends that she'd rather not be
Our wife, and that her legs do not contribute to the playground
Violence and bullying of our microwave childhood,

Or that all of this is something awful,
Even while the organ plays in church, and afterwards
Kids dressed for Easter swing above the hill,
Cuffing ants, eclipsing all the
The rows of fine marble stones, like song birds with bad habits
And tobacco stained fingers; and eyes which linger
Without reason or jurisdiction, even upon cousins,
Especially upon them:

Freckled apples and kittens,

Lines following in a parade of costume sailors.
I prefer only females saluting each other and tipping their Negligeed plumage:
Rootbeer floats and strawberry shampoo,
I dream about them underneath the finest
Cross in the oldest city, I give them their own paragraphs
And supporting rolls in tinkering novels.
I do so much for them that I even clean the dishes,
And take the thorny pie out of the suicide ovens of distinguished

Female poets with stains on their cheeks, like tears on fresh ink,

I leave the air condition on as the traffic hurries to the Places I am afraid to contribute to- A younger serpent cuts its Way through the grass heading to drink from an evil flower
Growing from the nostril hole of that francophone beast:
I don't even get a dial tone; but use the spare dictionary as a step
Up to kiss her. Except that the pedestal she was put upon
Has gone empty, and someone has stolen the only car from the Sky blue carport:

A tarmac hot and empty, and somewhere further off
Petty crime and hesitant sirens,

The sprinklers are jewelling the yard;
Teeth ache in my jaw like pearls in a clam, the newspaper is Wet: all the energy is escaping like words improperly used,
Like mathematics developed instead for feeling as for effect:
Like tourists out on holiday picnicking distinguished by a Religion which really isn't theirs to speak about;
The bulls are tearing through the China shop,
The waves are leaping,
And I am holding hands with a little girl,
And, don't you know that I am all alone.

Robert Rorabeck

Immaculate Lapels

Airplane on Christmas- you are my Present:
You are how I managed to be here, open
Armed,
Waiting for the divine providence of Something,
As the light held my shoulders even though
It was growing cold,
And the movie theatre was a cave
From which echoed the dancing of Pretty pictures that should never Have been made-
As it comes around again: as the jungles grow,
And the eagles fly over,
And the waves become surreal as they try
To kiss the angels-
And the stewardesses fly over them-
Their fingernails painted like sherbet and Marmalade,
Their pantyhose seamless- and their pilots
Wearing copper wings in the geometries of Immaculate lapels.

Robert Rorabeck

Immoral Car Show

I don't know sh^t: I studied enough to learn
The job,
But I forgot everything:
In the new continent where I watched my peers
Kill Christians;
But all I killed was a dancing chicken,
And the trees went forever upwards, haven't
Being used: Fry the meat, live in waddle and daub,
Steal the girl: get a good paying job,
Tie your shoes:
This is what they sang to me from their cars,
Going up the hills with ease, graveyard shopping, going fast and clean
And surreal, Catholic injuns- the feather light professional Christians
With new tongues and tickets to ride the ski lift:
Odin said kill them all, but
All I could do was fall in love with her at the university.
I lived in a hole like a rabbit:
I had a red lizard's soul, and I sharpened my knife
On her wet stone heart,
But she was thoroughly petrified and I broke my Gift on her and it didn't come back,
Like a dog would, or that careless, captured sea:
I wrote a worthy thesis and climbed some mountains
As an exegesis, and no one cared:
They moved in together and shared, and I lived in my Hole in the earth, strange erotic dreams of bright teal
Tennis courts where my papers flew like late blooming moths:
All over the place, restive and reasoning under her leaping tennis skirts.
The housewives loved me, molted the exoskeletons
Of their insouciant habits: Those auto grazers
Were giant and had so many legs, and ate themselves
With afforested tongue, and then laughed about it
Going to the tanning salon in their blazers:
She changed her name and forgot how I'd showed her
The tattoo south of my navel I got in Spain:
I forgot everything I learned about her,
My comrades forsaking me thinking I was dead,
A consumptive pickle-faced Mary Jane, I drank alone in my

Pine-needle bed- my toes peeking out of the covers to Check the weather, and continued to worship the reindeers I could
No longer raise with my impotent necromancy
Stuffing my head.

Robert Rorabeck

Immortal Gold

I keep reminiscing
A cool sweet gun behind my back,
A pop barrel of kill
Joy,
And children's rhymes are selling smoking
Tires in the sky:
I ain't going to die,
Not this: I am the surprising exoskeleton
Who fell asleep under the bus
During math;
And that's all they're going to get,
Custer's Last Stand left a small cleft in the Unseemly mountains
As I crawl through, trucking my lunch of Cold ham and cheese folded up in plaid,
Putting on a wolfish camouflage,
I'll pluck straight up to god
And steal a kiss in the deepest, oldest caracole
Of his cheek,
And sit at his good side for all week,
Clicking my heels
And remembering my stride,
Because of all the things I told you and didn't Hide,
While the day and ride were long and tried:
Even if I never got a tip for the effluvious timber
Of my immortal gold,
I get paid cause I ain't
Going to die.

Immortal Ice-Cream

Women have been looking at me tonight
As if I were a wolf:
Beautiful women, and I don't know.
I just want to sit down and eat my ice-cream
Along the gentle bend of the easement
Underneath the airplanes who don't know my name;
And it is amazing, absolutely amazing to think
That there are people flying through the air-
There really are people flying through the air,
Like super heroes, like Russian acrobats without Trapeze;
And I think of Erin, as I always do, how I sent
Her flowers,
And then she sucked the bouncer's c%ck-
Or whatever she did, in her independent boudoir.
Who's to say,
Except I am an independent entrepreneur and even past
Midnight I can here the traffic rushing, rushing
To and fro,
And she said she would read my poetry forever,
But I- I don't know.
The bouquets I sent her are long since dead, and I can Only imagine her now as a headstone underneath the Deciduous trees who are shedding lonesome tears
For that barmaid,
Shedding tears, shedding tears, far beside my great uncles
Lake, while the stars seem to last forever
In the sky, even though they do not:
And I want to live forever, and I deceive myself that I will:
I am a better writer when I am murdered under the rose Bushes,
Or when I am stacking cans of soup, my throat thirsty for A cigarette,
But now we are closed, and beautiful Russian brides
Are riding bicycles,
And Erin is still beautiful, but I don't know:
I think maybe she is not beautiful, because she is not a grandmother,
And I damn all the novels I have written for her,
Or with her on my mind:

She doesn't deserve me-
I am immortal ice-cream,
But I still have Erin, sweet venal
Erin melting on my mind.

Immortality

Lost things parked on the road, and the satellites mew
As they fluctuate over a heathen's suburbia:
And I don't have to look away- but I do: there is wine in the Glass,
Dessert wine from somewhere arid where there is no need for Canoes,
Or hypnosis: the mirages come at their own will,
Piling like butterflies over buildings: if there was a fire,
It would be leaping everywhere, as the rain comes down
No where:
And there are no canals: the alligators there are just cenotaphs,
And the world that no one survives to know really flies by;
It leaps through the catastrophes as it burns away,
Like something of a pulpit as the lion hoops, grinning continuously
For the catastrophe of its tourisms:
And I say these things to myself as I imbibe; as I just lost another Far better poem to oblivion- but it was rubbish anyways:
And I am alone, and have no fear of ever finding immortality.

Impenetrable Shade

Something dark is breathing outside my tent:
He is as big as a house- he is a wino with a scythe-
He is the pestilent horse of death;
And I am not afraid,
Because he knows what I am doing for him,
That I have mowed his field for him,
And will soon be selling all his laughing children orange
And flickering like kerosene lamps lit by barmaids
In the prehistoric Caribbean;
And he wants me to get laid- and maybe I will,
Underneath the teal copper cannons in some semi permeable
Esplanade;
And afterwards I will lick my fingers by which all my tricks
Were laid,
And we will laugh together and I will happen finally into sleep
Above ground and yet deep, deep in his Impenetrable shade.

Imperfect Art

Now I feel like dancing, of opening up
Forever underneath the heirlooms
Of my sideshows,
Underneath all of these vanishing places
Where we have to be found out-
That we made love, and broke
Ourselves underneath the hapless sunlight:
Don't you understand that
I decided to find you here, and so I
Found you here-
And it feels for awhile to become a bridal Temptation:
But what are your children doing,
Even when sometime you are not home,
But leaving your body to think of me as I buy
Your dresses underneath the rose gardens
Of the overpasses:
As I prey and make love to you while
I am alone on my weekend:
And I know nothing of moving making,
And this is just a scene that I am thinking back
Upon you,
As you lay there, opened mouthed- but Very soon you will have to sunbathe for your Family,
And then you will have to get up dancing,
Like a marionette- and this is a true love
Story- and your name is, Alma-
But my art is so imperfect, that the world
Will never know.

Impermanence Of Stone Butterflies

Impermanence of stone butterflies,
This another night puts its reasons to my lips,
And there are relatives in their graves:
I don't know where grandfather is buried,
But I know how to get to Disney World; and I have My ritual put to work by the light of day,
That uncommon light like a sea of light shining on
All of this species- This mobile of tailless masses,
And what does it mean, but it is so easy to ask that;
It is so easy to pretend to perceive the mundane,
But I am just trying to impress the opposition of my Species: I am doing the same thing as baseball players,
Principals, and astronauts;
I am trying to dress up for her in the park, to dress her
Down;
And I have been drinking my liquor and dreaming of Shaving my head, of being a husband to Diana who doesn't
Love me,
But loves her homeless captains, and how long will it last:
Will there be similar fairies in the morning,
Soliciting over the parks and the avenues where the serene
Cars drive; the little lights in the grottos of witchcraft,
The little trails she bleeds, the perfume of her footsteps;
And that is why I get drunk, and don't have a family:
I am waiting for something that cannot happen:
I am waiting to buy a house, and become the ghost of her love,
The memory of her sweet flower plucked before it
Could open and given to its cartoon mouse.

Impermanent Beauty Mark

I want to come, and streak your face
With an impermanent beauty mark while
The winos float by just as insouciant as doves
And fainted conquistadors down past the pool:
For you to wipe me off and smile like a holiday
That as ended, a hearth in which a fire has soon died,
And exhausted you can go back to picking dates
And wild scuppernongs to the better suited
Fables, long-tongued, and gooder for wiping your taught
Pink wrinkled as$,
So that I might smile too, and picking up my plastic
Stewardesses for a fix, become the paper airplane
That rests pullulating across the other side of the canal,
Never intending again to return to your careless,
Adulterous palm.

Robert Rorabeck

Impervious To The Senses

Refusal to do your songs, as you would have me do them—
Looking up in the midnight you don't believe in,
Seeing the immense yellow eyes of a deer that is just Shadows: cars and RVs driving beneath her,
As she is on a rise:
Her eyes are the only places in her that are lit up:
Something never perceived on my parents' property—
Something left there, remaining—after
All of the fireworks and Christmas trees and commercial
Heavens are sold—
Like a friend to a werewolf—deer without any light except for
In the eyes—eyes of the homunculus
That even the dogs couldn't smell—the trees are dying,
And there are airplanes and the Pegasus above her—
Stewardesses dreaming like water fountains over the earth—
Where she is like a graveyard that wants more—
She has the carnival smell of perfume interrupted by adultery—
And she is there, impervious to the senses,
Still—even if she doesn't believe in me.

Impossible

Teal monuments hover and vibrate like
Threatening broadcasts over the sloping greens
With little holes,
And little flags which wave like little surrenders,
The crocodiles who smile back strokes,
Sleep in their prehistory, have no judgment for Fashion, faux pas- Exgirlfriends, dermatologists,
Thesis defenses-
There where the storm comes riding like something
Which can't ever be experienced in
Moribund hallways, the echoes of grammarians,
Longitudinal fathers put the spurs to their sons,
And the crocodiles smile with nine irons and Backstrokes, teal monuments hover and vibrate like Threatening broadcasts over the sloping greens
With little holes,
And little flags which wave like little surrenders,
The adulterers in the window's cuckolding, can only
See each other liked peeled plums-
They stick fingers into the steaming desert stolen from Their mother's birthday,
There where the storm comes riding like something
Which can't ever be experienced in
Moribund hallways, the echoes of grammarians,
Longitudinal fathers put the spurs to their sons,
So they rise up with good posture, professional arrangements
Corner offices, big windows where their contemporaries
Play the sport of kings, the green body of the woman
Conquistador, rising up in little holes, with little flags
Like little surrenders,
The crocodiles who smile back strokes, and the cold front
Where the storm trundles in brushing the lips of pine trees,
Salting the arcade of their limbs,
Like something which can never be experienced....

Impotent Musings

-ucked up despotic universe burnished
In cruel despotic time,
You've really got it in for me,
Given me the bad-luck of dysfunctional rhyme,
Slouching shoulders and drooping
Mustache,
Two good legs to the liquor store to dash
To pick up my clichés of state college,
Bastioned in hemispheres of unpublished knowledge:
And she's a fan of my impotent implementation,
And I would like to make her the first mother
Of my impotent nation,
And send all my faux politicians over to her auburn brow
So she can crown them each with the head of
The cow of my semi-pulp benediction-
The fair movie is over and I didn't even listen;
I didn't kick my old woman like Bukowski,
I didn't worship the splendid grave in splendiferous mood
Like Baudelaire; Perhaps I rhymed a little bit like Lindsay; Perhaps I am too gray to care:
The lovers are still young from talk and tongue-
I haven't spoken to anything since the dinosaurs,
And this is just the impotent rush of spell of impotent spikenard-
I am not even going to get on the bus,
Because I am too tired and burned out to love a good woman;
I wouldn't know how to begin- All my muses are venal,
Lock-jawed in marching bands of handsomer and more Important men.

Robert Rorabeck

Imprint Of My Memory

I don't have no rum,
So I don't know how it is that
I'm going to say
That I don't belong to you-
That I haven't belonged to you for so long,
Sleeping gray eyed in hostels,
Never weeping even when the poets disappear
In that forgotten civil war-
Like dogs who lose their fellows out amidst the Coral paths:
Their noses snuffing, their ears ragged,
But as long as there is spaghetti and red velvet
They just don't seem to care:
And you have your own man in a phone booth or
In another booth in some restaurant,
And he or someone else is smoking, crenellating
Smoke, of course-
Yeah, maybe he is checking the papers, going to Bet on a horse: a sure thing;
And you are wrapped there like a style,
Like a word that is sweet to compose- And I am watching
You eat your bloody breakfast;
And I am consumptious with another jaundice sunrise
Coming over me,
Happening without repose;
And you are so contented to be with your man-
Your blue eyes the tender jazz extemporaneous from the Body's fountain;
And soon I will have to wander off again barefoot through
The shallows of the coral reef,
And the bloody anemones will bask there all day long in Their thimble pools,
The sky undressing as she does; and you will have never even Looked up, but how should it matter
When there is no sand from which the eking tide to steal
Even one imprint of my memory.

Robert Rorabeck

In

Becoming sheathed in the vanishing colors of The yard;
I would have liked to say that her favorite color was Red, like an ixora:
Maybe she bordered the walk into high school:
Maybe she was just one of many I couldn't stop to smell,
But now crepuscule is entering the yard:
The rattlesnakes curl into balls: It is almost time for their Young to hatch underneath the hamper where
The whelps are being birthed:
They come out so faithfully to the side of the carport
Where the toads are ululating in a fevered pitch:
And there is the washer and dryer all warm to the side;
It is almost like the grotto of a virgin,
And the little back yard where the pet rabbits are kept,
And the orange tree weeps; and over the chicken wire fence
The entire sky laments as it is turned away;
And I wonder too if you wonder what that must be like,
In your other little yard not so far away.

In A Ball Of Kissing Dreams

Stillness in the river
In the unanswered season—pledges of Allegiance to a classroom in
The summer—
And other ghosts—like the graveyards of Kindergarten—
The television still turns on when you
Are not around—
Hummingbirds hover in the ether,
Propelled by the wishes of Abraham Lincolns—
You are up in Ocala with the orange trees,
The horses,
And your husband—or you race above
The earth,
A comet who struck matches across my Bedroom like rattlesnakes entwined
In a ball of kissing dreams.

In A Bed Of Moonlight

The calves mew their tibouchinas
And I wait for Alma to Call: the cats are building their castles across the Canal
Where the salmon lactate their minnows
And the cowgirls spill with their dinner bells into The hall:
When the busses come, they put purple flowers in their Hair and turn around so many times that it Seems preposterous:
Just as Alma will never leave her family for us-
It is as if someone refuses to leave hell to spend a fieldtrip
In Disney World;
And yet I have felt her up, and given her legs the bouquets of My lips-
And I have pleased her the way waves break in the pylons
Of the fishermen of milkmen:
Sipped the lactates of her caves, and have otherwise enjoyed
Her loneliness- and closing my eyes,
Committed the crimes of bathing with her out of doors
In the fountains of banks and other Places in Miami and across the Gulf of Mexico that we Were never suppose to go in to value one another:
And yet we go- with our eyes opened, and our eyes closed-
With the pilgrimages of the snakes and
The foxes through the heather- and the shampoos in the corridors
Of her daughter;
Until we have to burn away anyways, offering our souls like
Paper to the dead,
Her tiny hand closing around my hand the way the sated wildflowers
Go to sleep atop of their lingering firemen in a bed of moonlight.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Bed That The Streetlights Douse

It's peace- and it's reason,
And the foliage is wet around the house:
The wife is sleeping with her
Spouse
In a bed that the streetlights douse.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Blissful Sea

Imperfections in a blissful sea of Waves- waves that never any man shall sea-
So far away from any lighthouse, and yet
Imperfect-
Full of the wet enunciations of their feral amusements-
In a school of whelps wet dreaming of Mermaids
Hearing myths of coral reefs hoping upon for their Bodies to dash:
And racehorses, and other harder stuff: while neither knowing
That they are almost all of the world;
And that they are in her dreams, and cousins to her tears;
And on, and on they rush.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Carney's Dream

Translations in a Carney's dream: I want to buy my soul
At the flea market,
While my muse has been making love off and on underneath
The school buses making their rounds,
Calling halleluiahs with their caracoles; and then they pray down
To their dinners, and Laugh and shout, and by some other ways muse:
While I have crawled under the blankets with you,
Alma:
After it was your birthday, as very soon it will be Christmas:
And the lights in your eyes are the most perplexing brown:
So dark as to be filled with promises, and the wings of Stewardesses too;
And your children are somewhere calling from the svelte lawns of Graveyards up underneath the plastic cardinals of gauzed wildflowers;
Until I stole you away from this
And gave you CPR through the first elements that crepuscule gave to The paramours and starlets at their first attempt at making a movie.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Comely Zoo

Contagions of the landscaping of the world:
Flowers flaming their hair for cars:
Two tiny windmills on the corner of our store, like Harmless monsters,
And it tells us that our bodies have blown up to enormous
Sizes:
The girls we have loved from high school have turned away,
And kissing the stamens of other gentlemanly surprises
Having nothing more to us to say;
But Sharon, our sweet muses, has wished us a happy birthday,
So now all of the world can go down many leagues into dungeons
And kiss and pocket all of those corduroy dragons,
The stolen hullabaloes and wealths of Easter Eggs:
And I have been out myself into the middle of the lagoon, of the Sunken prairie,
Have felt the arrowheads of sunken stewardesses kissing my feet
Like my aunt Mary,
And offering my naked if scarred soul promises of weddings too;
But I tell her I have no more room for promises to marry,
Unless she is a Mexican, and her soul is migratory, illegal, and poisonous While the silhouettes of school buses reflect for miles across the Desert,
Sending us on wild goose chases while our doppelgangers kiss the Lips of aunts name marry in between the pretty cages of the pretty Animals in a comely zoo.

In A Common Destination

The first thing Alma gave me was elephants- and I
Got so lucky I caught a forty pound king fish:
Then when we made love, the scars of our two bodies
Melted together made singing cadavers and Dancing tattoos:
At night, alone I drink fire for her, and of course I bleed
These songs,
While I watch birds perpetually mate in a sky of Blueness-
The traffic sings of masterpieces, and insects skate across
The water, as the lips of a girl I imagine I have known
Bend closer to the fountains:
The castles and the mountains rising behind her, or Looming in, all their majesty bent upon finding out
If she has a single perfection, and the traffic follows her,
Sure that she will provide answers and reasons
That will bring them together in a common destination.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Country Named After You

My legs are cold
I feel like an amputee from the civil war,
And my parents
Are sleeping:
I don't have anything better to say for myself-
You might like my words,
But if you saw me juxtaposed with better men,
Say buzz-cut astronauts,
You might pretend to still love me, because you
Pretend to be a good woman;
But at night while I was away selling fireworks,
You would go to sleep with them;
And that is no good, but something you can Be sure to believe in;
As I believe in you, pagans believe in animals bare-chested
And fornicating at the zoo-
The West Palm Beach zoo, where I first fell in love with
You,
With my Amazonian goddess, while I watched faggots burning
And smoking as they touched themselves,
As the spider monkeys leapt and flew;
And little tragic heroes grunted with sweat and the flu
As they tried to struggle over the guard rails or the cattle Guards like
Terrapin or stray balloons on a quest:
And they are almost there, to the silver palace of wherever,
And their friends are beautiful; and I am with them,
And we can pull down the sky and eat the Fruiteria of the figments of our imagination;
And we spend all of our time
Composing and playing make-believe games in a country
Named after you where it never has to rain.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Courtship Of Nonsense

It isn't that I want to live that way—like the sun
And the moon,
In a courtship of nonsense—like bodies pegged to Bodies—
The billowing cadavers of another preternatural
Midway—
And always someone who is gossiping—
As they seem to be trying to make a tract of their Shells—
Most of the time failing—sometimes doing some Good—
But giving everyone else a hard time—
Yes, I believe—this is how it fairs, if it fairs so well:
Weather, foul or good, overhead—
Like over passes over the flea markets,
With all of the beautiful wives always going somewhere.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Creche In The Mountains

Tricks of tombs and spiders
In a crèche in the mountains—
There in a pretty womb,
Tumbled together
With the wolves and arrowheads,
My parents bedecked with white hairs
And my mother's sister—
Yet lost in the limbo I enjoyed for Five years:
There they are where the Milky Way
Cascades in a rich and expansive swath
So far away from the cities
Or the thoughts of sexy women
Who dream of driving towards those apexes
Of society
With thoughts of seduction:
They are constantly going there with A purpose,
To the crowded plots where manmade light
Drowns out the heavenly ones—
For procreation and survival
Until they are returned to stone or Dust or whatnot
And the rivers take them back again:
First their painted toenails
And then their tattooed ankles—
Take them from their beds to
The gutters
And wash them down the streams,
Down the muddy and weeded runs
To cool the lips of deer and foxes:
Here they are intermingled with the nocturnal
Thoughts outside my parents' window:
They are already sleeping.
My aunt is reading a book alone.
Beneath of where
The Milky Way turns like a pinwheel
Upon a young boy's lips.

In A Deeply Sated Creche Against The Eves

Now today maybe my face is almost pure like
A butterfly demured into the forests in the far underground
West,
Into Mexico:
The way she has shed off her old cars and boyfriends,
But has kept her birthstone clasped close to her breasts,
Because that is the way she started out,
And that is the bath she has taken which sometimes floods in Crepuscle,
Leaving watermarks on the posts of mailboxes,
Leaving tawny calves bitten by sharks or werewolves;
And in the morning to the cartoons all beautifully arisen
As beautiful and as light as hummingbirds and vixen,
She cleans herself or she sings:
What exactly is she doing, but putting on her new boy's rings:
She doesn't even have an understudy- She is not afraid of The passageways from one to the next revolution:
This is all a merry go round in its solution, that she showers in Nakedly and shampoos and has her ablutions;
And maybe they speak about her in classes about her,
In which her auburn distributions are the penultimate solution;
But for she is just touching down again
Blushing like cherries carried on paper airplanes, her paper as Red as firecrackers;
And she crawls down and finishes hanging from the crooks of Cypress trees; and maybe she even cares to think or remember of
Me,
As her day finishes and she passes out once again like the most Colorful and beautiful thing in a deeply sated crèche
Against the eves.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Dragon's Fading Dream

Weapon in a cloud in a dragon's
Fading dream—
The sea happens over the open windows
Hoping that their search will find her—
Verbs of actions—
The proverbs overlooking the methods—
Soon the entire nocturnal garden
Will be enshrouded with the sunshine—
Airplanes will burn like arrows in the sky—
And the weekend will surrender
To the merry-go-rounds of impassible
Joy—to the cenotaphs of high school
And her soft hoof prints over which the Milk weed sways
Until the lights turn off—and there is No more room for wandering—
And the church is a lone and stumbling—
Bloody-footed and tender-eyed—
Like a marbled child in a latchkeyed
Fairytale of any passible Monday.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Fat Mexican Sea

Old fat Mexicans in a fat Mexican sea—
Rolling over the star light,
The candle light,
And the light from the grotto of
The virgin of Guadalupe- as the strangest of Suppositions burn their roses—
The busses happen to end up with Their gray hounds—
And there are only so many words
For poetry in the mongoloid's
Alphabet that ends up either
Way looking beautiful
To a blind man half in love with
The sea.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Fretful Slumber

If I am skipping school again
I wonder where I will go
Now that I am a teacher
And locked in here:
Over my shoulders, the perpetual rainstorms of Boulders
Billowing upwards in the fabricated zoo:
Like my love
Underneath the overpasses- and my wishes for
Her,
Muse who has betrayed me once again,
And after so many nights has not given me
The secret to these castles
And has left me to love so many no ones
In successions of the rainstorms
Of hotels
Besides the passageways up and down to her-
Conquistadors in a fretful slumber,
Lumps of coal tossed to rats
As it seems as if we are made to believe in her anyways:
Strange echoes of her mother leapt into the fields
Underneath our banderas-
She has had us for a laugh, but as the fair continues
Away, she is still laughing
And it seems as if she's begun to cry.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Fruit Market

I loved you in a fruit market—
For days and evenings, checking out—
Ways before and rain in the clouds—
When you went home,
You sometimes stopped by my house—
And we made love for the hour
That you were at my home
And then dissolved into the reality of Your life—
I wrote poetry for you, in and out,
And tried to make love to you for
As long as I could—
But you were Mexican and couldn't leave
The one you had children by,
And you broke my heart—
A thousand poems, drunken bottles
Left on the side of the road for you—
A dozen roses guarded by the rattlesnake
That wouldn't go away—
And now I am writing like crazy,
Drunk again after a thousand years,
Waiting for you to come out of the sea,
Waiting for the sun to shine after it has died.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Garden I Can No Longer Enjoy

Brown bodies coming onto shore
Echoing with the horses in the well mowed Yard,
And falling in love with their cousins;
And they are here,
As the moon hovers like a zeppelin, and the Graveyard waits open lipped for horses,
And you can feel each blade
Of grass and the ants' sting- as the blue feathers
Fall down from the sky,
And the airplanes fly in their flight paths
Echoing-
The ways up the mountains are far from here,
And her bedroom is right over the train tracks:
She is in his arms
Folded like soft laundry, until her eyes close
And they go to sleep like serpents
In a garden I can no longer enjoy.

Robert Rorabeck

In A God's Bed

Languid as the spiritual beliefs of green hummingbirds
Who seem to just float there
In the high resorts after the snows have gone away with the skiers;
And the valleys are naked and surreal:
They are motes of yellow that the aspens pony-tail:
And here the nude angels frolic across the Venal earth, wearing nothing but Wrist watches and jogging, their legs leaving the dew for the Thirsty centipedes
All the way up to the fire towers who look then again
Across the bands of the earth
Where the valleys of green caesuras rise again as if they were
A woman's body, lying there as a lover in a god's bed.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Merry Go Round

Graveyard bright, ruby graveyard
Right underneath the graveyard busses- there you
Are
While the terrapin leaps
While the terrapin runs they don't seem to be Doing anything
But they seem to be having fun: underneath the Uneasiness of that trespassing
Until the hallways fills:
And, yes, they fill, until they turn around
Burning up:
And the buses turn around, culling up from the Earliest moments above the ground
They come up and up again, just as rain on her Cheeks
They come up again, and they have a special
Spell over their meaning
And they come over once again
Rounding the earth, and kissing her kin
And round, and kissing in a merry go round
The earth again and again

In A Museum

Down at the casements and banisters
Of another wedding in a museum in Michiganâ€&quot;
The parks not very far awayâ€&quot;;possibilities of Playgrounds cooling in to the tresses of Dusk,
A few apples blooming,
A few airplanes touching down over the bloodless
Graveyards populated by the ultimatums
Of our families and plastic flowers in Horns of tinâ€&quot;
Paid for by a tenth of the dayâ€™s wagesâ€&quot;
As the dogs go around and around the tracksâ€&quot;
Betting of familiar wages,
As my wife crawls to sleep agoâ€&quot;;Across so many Seasâ€&quot;;I voyage to find her,
Intrepidly vested in my weekly scars and Drunken delusionsâ€&quot;;I will find her and lay her down
Upon the road that I call a bed
And pay someone to stop the traffic so we can Make love.

In A Place Of Trees

As I interviewed in a
Place of trees,
Castles crept up to Heaven's
Knees;
As the ladies in them waltz
Away,
I do not know what else to Say.

In A Place We Can Never Go

My false promises burn with their adolescent

Stupidity:

They have been truants again, reading Stevens in the park

Of their transcendences:

But not understanding any of him: wanting to come on to

Alma,

Wanting to be her fairytale and to swim with her

Through the white bred canals,

And look up open mouthed through the spindling entrails of the

Clouds:

Oh, I am afraid that I have failed you again, dear Alma,

My dear:

I am just afraid of that black knight who is your husband as

You are,

I fear:

I do not have the girdle needed to brashly cut the dragon's

Sultry neck,

But we can run away together and play cowboys and Indians:

We can bring your children with us and feed them

Holy milk like weebegone kittens,

And I can hold your brown hand out beside the summer pool,

In a place we can never go to, but isn't far from here.

In A Possibility Of Unending Directions

What do I know about all of these,
Watching the make believe of bodies
Trying to create the fire
One last time
Across the gravestones of abandoned churches
Up in the clefts where it is still too
High for trees to breathe:
Where I've thought of you, through the Confections of evaporated tourism-
Where I tried to evolve myself:
Above the white washed monuments and the state
Fairs,
And every day of breath sliding into the cooling
Recreations of the canals-
Where they keep their arcades, in the hidden
Alcoves, where the girls do not have to Sing anymore: they can just nod off while
The laundry does itself
And the plethora of airplanes kisses across the Nighttime sky in a possibility of unending directions.

In A Pretty Unison

All together in a pretty unison—and you can hear
For yourself—
Aren't you listening: all of you pretty boys for Christmas—
Isn't this the avenue in which the plane is flying—
And the sunlight starts up its motors—
And now she is stroking her hair a hundred times—
Doesn't she seem to be filing outside of Doors—
As the horses are running, pretending to Break their necks—
And the shadows are over—nocturnal accumulations
Across the cricks—
Or painted across the canvases where we were Meant to believe—
And hasn't this been all of what I've been teaching—
As you shoulders fell out from beneath the Evanescent wings—
And I suddenly remembered how to spell for you love—
And you have me just the kisses—
The evaporations for just the promises of almost Anything.

In A Promising Sky

Beauty in a carnival here at home;
And in acrobats over seas where I talk to a girl,
Calling down from a comely terrace- wanting to be married-
The girl I loved from Mexico has abandoned our Adultery,
And returned to her husband- he is there to love her like
A prize he doesn't appreciate-
Maybe my soul has lingered over the wingspan of her
Brown shoulder blades for a very long year,
My heart pounded on a butcher's sea saw- but finally the beaten
Waves leave a mark,
The seahorses are stunted and amnesiac- did she ever
Love me, I hardly wonder- as I begin to step
Up to cross the hurdles into another girl's yard
Floating with delight in a promising sky.

In A Purple Thought

And then I had you in a purple thought—
It was just like the one they kept around the cemetery
To show off to the old widows and their bystanders:
It was a beautiful cemetery in the middle
Of everywhere—
Across from a flea market, a circus, and a military base:
They trained the men to march and bring to
You plastic flowers—
And the wished for you in the middle of the night
Pleasuring themselves,
While foxes who were not really there, leapt and pirouetted
Underneath their windows—
The waves, not far off, pretending to wait for the Castanets of the heavens—
The lush pull of the occultism's séances—just across from
The corner deli where the Jewish women overate
And complained—
They complained so much they could hardly remember their First boyfriends who weren't even Jewish—
And when the grandest of planes dropped almost a Thousand feet—well then, oh well—
They pulled up the tadpoles just as quickly as the lampshades
To shadows—and grew them into tall gaunt princes
Who were always in love with unicorns but were never very Good at any sort of baseball—
And I remember you standing outside in the rain watching
You little sister Phoebe go around on a carousel—
My best teacher said it was a symbol for the best kind of Change—
But—oh well—you are not really here, anyways—
And I am afraid that I am just a character in a dime novel.

In A Sea Fluming Our Celibate Rooms

Going down into the vocabularies which
Are undeserving,
Who are barren and can't make things really grow,
Even after being f-ed by alcohol;
Going back to the familiar hallways of rhyme,
Looking out for her, and the spell of her legs:
And here she'll come echoing, the catch that we meant,
But will her eyes fall on us against the lockers or,
Will they be spent on other boys with their more Apparent charms; it seems we've always been here,
Catting for her, chewing the little Jew's tobacco,
Spitting for sin; and the day will turn on and spin
The earth on her axis, and she's on a swing,
The priest with his censer chanting his thing; and other
Girls who are married, with offspring on flesh,
Gurgling and chewing like aborigines fresh from the bush;
And all day long its like fishing for her:
When she finally comes along, I almost forgot what I Was going to say; though she pauses for awhile to care for Her feral Rome: We think of abductions, of carrying her home,
Like a Christmas tree above our heads.
Even with so many lost souls faceless and unremembered from High school, she is still the one who dances like spiced holidays
Both late and early projecting such faithful fury,
A zoetrope so romantically blurry, in a sea fluming our Celibate rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Soft And Vibrant Rain

World of joy fill in my veins, a coloring book when no
One is at home,
The paper airplanes folded on the lucky carpet like dying birds:
Eyed by the serpent that no one thought to see-
And places over the canal not so far away, that housewives will Never see:
The joy I do not know, and things that will never sell,
Hands that never brush the wardrobes of the forest,
But like boudoirs in the dusk, pricked by antlers of the Tallest beasts,
Bleeding sap and tears, wondering when it will snow,
As the flowers spring wildly,
Giving their heads to the sunlight, like children pushing their Lips beneath the venomous buttons,
Searching out a mother's breast, like a fire hydrant
In a soft and vibrant rain.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Sweet Chicken House

The get up to school and work
Traffic soft now, coming into the cone of my senses-
I lie on a bed of recompense; I think cemeteries
And jewelry stores and junk heaps where a mugged dancing
Girl's peacock costume flutters:
They all have something in common: nude women in an Apple orchard,
I guess: The Castillo de San Marcos, making love next to her
Next to the sea,
Children who love cartoons and their own reflections where
The mirrors are like soft pools that they can always enjoy:
Their soft bodies like low watt light bulbs, so that They can grow up and contain themselves
Casually- the queens of ephemerality drizzling above the Cotton mouths,
Like softly rolling daydreamt thunderclouds within the clutches
Of candelabrum and chandeliers
Made to dolly-up
In a sweet chicken house.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Thousand Blankets

Wreathed by the corncob shadows:
Silhouetted by the healthy bones still with some meat:
The headless saddles,
The heartless treats: and the old homesteads burn
With only the feral eyes around,
Crenulated light make a play across the famishing leaves:
The canoes in the garage, the scallywags in the Eaves:
And the entire street is lost: it seems to swim back a ways
And then disappears- the schoolyard empty;
Its baseball diamond a taboo; and the hands which once
Ran over mine, and through the fields
Of parked cars and airplanes
Have disappeared toward new and more fortunate weathers,
As if my little brother was kidnapped,
And lay shallow and breathless wrapped in a thousand
Blankets of moldering pornographies.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Tomorrow Of Tomorrows

There is a boy who is taking a brown bag
Everyday—and enjoying the whatever savageries
That do exist
For whatever and into whatever reason
That I have enjoyed for you for this little time
While you were playing and enjoying whatever waves
In my little classrooms—and then you were Half-hazzardly building to the maelstroms—
And either way it was not espionage—
But it was just another plan that was drunken and Echoing over the business park
And into the satelittes that could not pick me up:
That this was then a pretty swallow—
And into the anonymity of the graveyard,
As the graveyard itself was picking up the heavier elements
And again and again carrying and carrying Heavier and heavier tools up the mountains
And up the mountains—well, then—here seems to Be the very appreciation of it—up again—
And up again—in busied estuary of tomorrow—
While you will try swearing of the cloaks in the clouds
Of the forays of the tomorrows—I have done enough
Studying to remember how it is that I need to survive—
And while then in the busy elements: remember that I love
You, and I will love you in a tomorrow of tomorrows.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Town Of Lotuses

In a town of lotuses,
What does the grass say to the trees—
With you walking across her paths,
My wife—
Weighing less than 46 kilos—
Asking if I consult the stars about you
Sometime in the early summer
While the rattlesnakes are still Shedding
And the early night cannot get rid of Himself,
Settling around the tin mailbox and
The cheap flowers,
Considering to itself if it has other Friends than the ones that can be Found here—
In the fierce holidays that distillate
Around the ring-tailed foxes
Making a dance toward the moon—
Wishing to call down the marionettes—
All feminine—who have learned to Dancing without strings—
Like souls reclaiming their shoulders—
Like baby's breath dancing upwards from the graves.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Trailer Park

We can paint the slash pines with fire
Running down from the mountains,
Chasing the coyotes and stirring them from Their sleep:
We can even call up the bluest sirens in the
Sky
That wake up all of the Titans, disturbing them
From their wettest dreams of Stewardesses,
And disturbing you from your classes too—
Divorcing you from your daydreams,
And make you run through the oils of one of My grandmother's paintings above her
Shaggy carpet in a trailer park
Near the cemetery:
There you are, a call girl dispelled from the Mountains,
And all of the trees terribly beautiful all around
You if they were not all on fire.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Womb Of Stars

I want to be black in a womb of stars
In order to know the catastrophes of your falling airplanes
And womb of rattlesnakes:
And I want to know just where I cannot belong, spilling
Out from the epiphany of waterfalls
At the exact moment the god you believe in cries:
And I have been trying to pleasure myself even while you've Been up to no good—my sport already lit in the wicks of
The fireworks you sped away—after I was already too busily
Breathing underneath the amphitheaters
Spilling out their patrons into the streets of the joys
We could not have—after all there was only so many words
And so many afternoons spent after school—
Video games and labyrinths and places we never believed
In—after we were collected into the evenings of home—
And your father got back together with your mother
Momentarily-
And sang of all of these festivities—of these bright lights strung
Over the alienations of our radioactive tombs.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Wound Of A Pyramid

Beauty in a wound of a pyramid—standing over
Mummies and the clefts of the sommeliers—
It is all you need to touch yourself and to find yourself
Out, while
The night echoes like a bouquet the bats as
To the vampires—
And these are only words—these are only
Sacrifices of chum to the indoor swimming pools,
Trying to wait up all night for Santa Clause after nothing else has survived,
Trying to figure out the echo of
The divine,
Repeatedly—
Throughout all of the choruses of the hummingbirds
As through the lactating apiaries of the lusciously divine.

Robert Rorabeck

In A Zoetrope Beneath The Sun

There are still places we can go.
Like green lights for the fox to follow
Where mermaids are as swimming emeralds
And trees emerge from the sky—
I suppose you do not think of our Swing-set anymore—
Continually, you have to return diurnal—
Disappearing to where there is smoke
In the sky—
And unkept promises of your metamorphosis -
Words as offerings left for you in
High school,
And I wait underneath the chinaberry tree—
Referencing black gods
Who dancing in a zoetrope beneath the sun
That so blinds you.

Robert Rorabeck

In All Of Its Colors

Sugar in all of its colors poured from the moon
As she shakes through the night,
Face so scarred and beautiful above the traffic;
But nothing truly artistic about her thievery-
The things she steals every night
While you sleep across the train tracks that glow in
The parallelisms they were made to do-
But you barely come anymore,
As your children grow up
And the reindeer step over the empty glass bottles
In the ramshackle parks
Where no geniis can possibly live
Any longer:
No more hope in the world she steals from-
The waves like crippled tinfoil
Balled into the armpits of the tide- even oceans
Glowing in the emptiness that she somehow
Takes away in the paradox
Of the world that she makes her own.

Robert Rorabeck

In All Of The Heavens

Set us together in some parks and Tell us we are lovers'
Light fireworks off over our shoulders
As we try to kiss'
Giving our tongues a dictionary of Confections
That will play upon our hearts forever'
We will become little trinkets that
Will bear children
And name them as you have named
The constellations,
For they will mean just as much
As all of the angels sneaking around with
The airplanes in all of the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

In All Of This World

Nights slip away- they peel according to reason;
That is just what they do,
Like stewardesses slipping out of their shoes after long,
Leaping shifts;
And I am doing all of this right now for you,
Alma,
Because I took a mental picture of you before I left for work this Morning,
And your body swayed next to my body like a brown
Censer,
And we took a test together, and your eyes were like pregnant
Butterflies:
Really pregnant and down deep in the deepest forests of Mexico:
Your eyes swam and swung across my body,
And after that you went to church, while the flowers bloom all around
Your cathedrals,
And there was never any prettier girl in all of this world.

Robert Rorabeck

In All The Many Shapes

Clouds are here around the House
And it is too late for us
To make love-
In fact, we won't be doing
Anything,
While they metamorphose
In all the many shapes
That they truly
Happen to never be.

Robert Rorabeck

In 'America'

What do I know about Mexico:

Tell me about Mexico, Romero—where you are

Born, my favorite uncle:

Tell me how to get past all of the mirages by winged-

Chariot or by airplane

Now that I am married to a girl from shanghai

And the muse I made busied love with

Has gone up to her husband,

Disappearing into Ocala and all of the nights that

She will make love to him:

She passed the Frontera into 'America' to get here:

And now she is a beauty and a joy and

In love with the things she cannot see,

But tell me, Romero—off Mexico:

I have seen her underneath the overpasses here,

Skulls with diamonds as blue as the sea—

And the Virgins of Guadalupe doing their laundry

In the grottos and the strip malls beside

7-11: tell me if you can see them, anyways:

Because my eyesight is about as good as my vocabulary,

And I am only hoping to become more innocuous

And it seems to take me longer and longer to

Breathe:

But you know all about Mexico now,

Even long before the sun is even thinking of starting out

To molest the forgotten bones strewn over the Far side of the mountain—and I have love you niece

A thousand times and once again in my soul—

Another night drinking rum beside the imaginary candlelight

For her, only to have it fail into the curious delusions of Another day in 'America.'

Robert Rorabeck

In An Anonymous Week

If I am not beautiful, nobody really has interests
Or love; and I am quite shallow,
The pittance of an unreturned dove:
You know, you know- all of our graves or quite Shallow, too- like animal graves,
Like animals shoes; and this is what I have been doing,
Digging up shallow tubs of earth, throwing dirt
Over my shoulders like a dirty curse, and doing it
Without appeasing anyone in the eye;
If I should have to die, If I should have to die, let it
Be little animal tears for me, and distant cars,
And distant echoes of somnolent feet; you know,
I am not pretty, and the way the earth moves, I shall Be dead in an anonymous week.

Robert Rorabeck

In An Emptied Place

They sit there remembering what it was
To be outside of your classroom:
Shadowed into the reminiscences they have to Move away from every day:
Busses collecting upon the busied mounts
Of high school whatever it was that you were Meant to describe to them:
This art in the daydream of a dead end:
And they play baseball or they forget their locker
Combination:
They kiss the other truants, and they say their Amens:
It is only they who know what they do:
But I still remember my memories of you—
Lost upon the bleachers of outer space—
Many now a tombstone in an emptied place.

Robert Rorabeck

In An Hour

How much time do I get if I just want to lie naked with you,
And try to figure out the color of your eyed,
As you turn away to look at the two-sided mirror:
That I just want a person to fall in love with me.
Can you do that in an hour?

Robert Rorabeck

In An Obviously Bright And Sunny Day

All the superheroes go down the rabbit holes
In the rain,
And even the traffic packs up, the recession proceeds
Underneath the greasy lamps underneath overpasses:
All the sweet flowers that I have sent crawling up
Her walls like healthy surprises on Easter close up too:
All the penny candy for boys on bicycles in the lower Peninsulas of Michigan
Are dripping away, and I don't know:
I don't know what I was meant to be doing, only that I have More money anyways for not knowing what I should Be doing:
And I've sold fireworks out in the middle of a pitchfork
Desert, while I've grown new scars and waited for the deluge
Of the things that I would say to her,
And after that the watery proofs of El Arco Iris, and the Mysterious things that come inside a house after the mailman has Left,
The children who grow there after school being fed by the Bright circuses, while the otters swim on their backs and crack the Legumes in the shoals;
And, anyway, that is just what I've meant myself to be saying,
As if life were a musical in an obviously bright and sunny day.

Robert Rorabeck

In An Open Classroom Of Sunshine

Doing my new part for the hunger
That already finds me alone, even though I
Remember hotels that remain always halfway vacant
One or two days from here across the country
That is our country-
As these are her easily spindled wounds, as my muse
Lies down her head again with him in a bed of brown
Skin liked hushed cane that is soon to burn
Until I can pick her up and carry her across my shoulders
As if through a sea of traffic
That has no mind for us, and so we are peaceful through
All of their chaos,
And I can raise my head and nod my chin to
Some unspecific star- and kiss the hallucinations
Across the burning asphalt, and check my distance-
As my living body carries her onwards
Across the wounded battlefields of fleshed delusion:
And all of the way, until I can lay her here,
Honeymooned in the spot I've told her about,
And both of us of different colors, our senses collected
Like a bouquet distilling forever through the Heartbeats in an open classroom of sunshine.

Robert Rorabeck

In Another World It Should Begin To Snow

Misplaced in a forest that I cannot tell,
Words look up as divers drown, sharp utensils
Of another day placing themselves like organized serpents
Through the blinds,
And girls who I will always love drive away:
If this were a grotto it should be rich with the feral smells of All their kills,
And everything they didn't have a mind to put me through:
Now I have a house, I have a tomb, and a tin horn placed
To my lips like a kind of technologic mother
Spewing- Going alone to movies on my birthday,
Feeling the saboteurs undermining the intersections that cross
My body,
Waiting for torches and the long veils that they should wear
Stepping up to kiss me,
If everything the sun has had to say finally went down,
And in another world it should begin to snow.

Robert Rorabeck

In Another Yard

Armpits of matchsticks in the memories of Her kitchen-
Alligators as big as bears in her backyard woods
Where I used to play
Until my very own father was out of monies,
And done making noises
And I had a house of my own that the clouds whispered
Down to and the traffic matriculated by-
That this was mine too, with a kind of yard and a Telephone,
And a lover waiting for me in another yard while
My mother looked again across the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

In Any Case

The waves glisten or
I don't know what they've been doing like
Hooded snakes underneath
The lampshades:
And through the malls of your yesterday
I suppose we've been holding hands
Or kissing mouths,
But becoming misshapen anyways
Through all of the science fictions of our Halloweens:
We've
Been headed all out and this is Christmas-
What is there left to sell
Whilst another couple has become married:
Theirs is a preternatural vow
For the vampires and the werewolves:
While we are almost done,
And this is another honeymoon for the dead:
They stand beside the heavenly lights of another fruit
Stand-
Hardly containing themselves, as at first the lions yawn,
And then grow hungry,
As the little girls at first pretend to dance before
The heavens and then go indoors:
They will not be metamorphosing anyways, today-
They've been doing good to themselves
But only between their classes:
And I suppose you know that the hummingbirds
Don't know any words in any case even though they've Been drinking from out of our
Fountains- just as if they were our wishing wells,
As another shuttle tries to breach our Impossible hemispheres anyways-
In any case.

Robert Rorabeck

In Anything We Want

Your body pearls its flea market hearts as for
The decorations of
The cheap thrills filigreeing our favorite carnivals;
And this is real again tonight:
That you took me in your car at lunch and we kissed,
Alma- Later on I danced for you in the rain,
Because you always keep yourself so clean and Beautiful,
A little musical girl without any song and a nice
Ass that is only for show;
But I have been to your petting zoo,
And I listened to you reading Borges in English to me
In your car sitting like a panther in the rain;
And then I read him too, and we switched languages
And sounded so nice,
And I kissed your brown skin, and thought I would Die again as you drove away and left me,
And made all the silversmith airplanes look and sound
Like buzzards;
But I have given all of my bastard's art over to you,
And I plan to see you first thing tomorrow and press you
Against my wall like a very brown wildflower,
Like a mirage picked from the desert, and make love to You, and continue inspiring all of my hopeless
Art into you,
With my quiet lips all over your body- and then all of the sky
Pretending to make us believe in anything we want.

Robert Rorabeck

In Between The Mailboxes

Shoulder to shoulder,
We, crying, compete for the spear:
It hurts, down at sea level,
Gasping underneath of the airplanes,
But what do they have to say
To any of us?
That the day burns as it echoes and Gasoline leaves pretty scars and
No memories—
The way they play beside us is uneven—
The gifts they give after paying their Monies are unoriginal—
The daylight has already taken off—
The fairies are disrobing into the pornographies
In between the mailboxes
And I think of you far away from here.

Robert Rorabeck

In Coitus With The Devil If Only For A Second

As the night laid her somber dress
Across the street and fondled the Drowsy corners of the houses,
All these ordinary members of
The neighboring family
And the prefabricated dreams
They held like cheap eggs
In a carton,
Dozens and dozens of
Them planted along the street,
The children continued to play on,
Fumbling blindly,
Hoping to soon figure out,
To understand without the aid
Of helpful trained animals;
They tried to pick up the Tools and vehicles they were Practicing to be made into,
All night long
When their parents prayed for
Them,
The sun sinking behind them into
The sea
Where I joined it's army and sailed
Out to the West, across the Prairie where the dark silver
Conquistadors marched in the river
Into granite extinction of text books,
All the way to the other place,
Long forgotten and run over,
The sexless chambers of God's bedroom,
Where he swiftly took us up
And made us and the earth
Into a great red brick he threw
Through his ex-wife's window
And disturbed her, if only for A second,
She in coitus with the devil.

In Colorado

When you get up in Colorado,
You are not my muse: your children
From another man
Suckle either of your breasts equally if
For awhile:
Maybe it is because of you that they believe
In carnival—
As the clouds queue into the mountain's
Nipples,
And the fairies of sleep leap down from them
To bathe in the glaciers milked into their Bosoms:
And there you are, rind in the hillside—
Myth of my high school—and you are not
My muse,
As another night rides over my shoulders
Like a passengerless airplane—
And I am a homeless man off to feed the giants:
And I am married too—
Your eyes are blue,
And you are not my muse

In Cu-De-Sacs Of Sweat And Tears

Bath of voices and of Hummingbirds—the children sing forever, going into Their shelves— A wash with their own echoes of Laughter matriculating through the halls—
Pretty and bashful with acne and smiles, and all of the Bloom, like a meadow excited by windmills-
With the craft of the dark moons hanging like twins
Above them,
And in September—fireworks—great bonfires of weddings,
And other women's love down through the forks
Of rivers, accumulated in cul-de-sacs of sweat and tears.

In Days After Christmases Are Dead

In days after Christmases are dead,
And in houses where no marriages happened—
Ghosts, cantankerous and green,
Filling out the apertures beneath the satellites
Of the chandeliers whom
Brandish their lights like fairies—
Exhumed in the void
As it seems to be the reasons,
As the littlest of the boys are still in love
With their very first rubber balls—
And something else yet again must have to come
To its conclusions—
Beautiful girls get all of the luck,
As butterflies who look just like them are still Migrating into Mexicos, to die habitually into the Hotspots of those lukewarm grottos underneath
The volcanos of their playgrounds
Of poisonous amusement parks.

In Disney World

Found in a grotto of cash- bound to make money
While the dogs howl-
The moon is round but sharp, and she is stealing things from
The supermarket:
She is out of control, but going down the ancient highway.
While my love may be a firework:
She may last for awhile, and cost too much,
But she may not even be real-
And standing there beside the road, watching the trucks drive
Through the night,
The orange groves an entire heavens in pinpricks of silver flowers,
I go towards her, not wanting to find her in Disney World,
But expecting that is where she probably is.

In Each Lock Of Your Hair

I love the way your hair curls through
The ribbons and the gold;

It seems to me the laughter of children prancing
Around a Maypole,
With the hair-suited creatures out and pullulating:

This is something sincerely pagan-
It really doesn't exist anymore,
And I try and mouth it to the briny star,
But the traffic roars and pulls
Filled with things too fast to care,
True and modern gods to plush and placate to,

But it exists in your hair in this time,
The cheerless castles and their wan girls,
Their grotto's water-dragon's aquatic swirls, the spume of Fairies in the waves
Make invisible phosphorescent too ephemeral
To be proved,

But every paraplegic scientist who keeps close-lipped
To secret renunciations of every entire hemisphere,
Deep in the night, tremulous- brought out in The dark empiricism of somnolent senses,

Knows beyond theorem, beyond the dire motherhood of the grave,
And slinging star of death; beyond the rhythmic chaos of the waves,
The proof of things which shall never be reclaimed
All a glimmer and alive in each lock of your hair.

In Every City Of

I am not going to see you anymore tomorrow-
Dancing a thunderous jig-
The same way you have never seen aspens,
Because they don't grow
In the red mountains of Mexico- and you don't Like to read about them
From these words that I've already said
For you, and lain beneath the night like a Cemetery for the stars-
You who don't care anymore how you are my muse-
Brown and perfect midway of Daydream hallucinates:
And I've shown you where I've walked
And patted your thumb like a hummingbird
Does a flower-
And read to you of this joy, and eaten beside you
Out in the sunshine
Where your children will never see us- even though
He has given you marks on your neck
During this time- and you have, finally, gone home
To him,
Leaving me here heartbroken for Christmas,
Writing these terrible things,
And pretending to worship the crow who stares
As if hypnotized at the uncountable and homeopathic
Seahorses that he is sure must abide in every city of every wave.

In Flight

In Spain—I drank sangria and watched a fleet of roses
Sailing underneath the feet of Salvador Dali—
That was near Port Beau—That was in Catalonia,
Where my aunt learned the Spanish tongue over the graves
Of dead Spaniards—
And there was artwork hung, and bulls, and corsages:
And a long ways to wait until graveyards—
Pigeons singing in Madrid, and still cheeks on my scars—
My love was hidden in blond curls and dressing rooms
And placed upon girls with lips as orange
As the sun:
Fetishes of swing sets—drunken nights, New Years—
The places that fill up inside of us—
Souls that become phosphorescent underneath the moon—
Avenues, slender ways, to struggle up to the balcony
Where she is sleeping—but what to say to her—
What tricks to pull:
The Mediterranean, captivated by a sea of rocks:
Petrieved women, giantesses, wondering what it is that happened
To their dreams and when it is that they again can believe in flight.

In Forests Of So Many Far Aways

Bodies pill and recluse for videogames:
My father pees close to sundown, and we don't go to church:
And the new government is taking charge,
While all of the earth worn cheerleaders are awakening mostly Eaten from the trench coats of canals just as their graves;
And I am looking beautiful, just as beautiful as possessed slaves:
And the nights full of moon, the very same moon,
And her dresses at prom and all of her secret toys;
And it makes me think to wonder
That she was a really sweet vivacious girl and she passed away:
She stopped to help someone in a roll over vehicle and she got hit Herself and this is just some modern folklore my mother just Told me while I was meaning to do well by myself:
And the night looks all of a sudden, as if it suddenly remembered
That it was forgotten, and maybe on Mars or on Saturn
There are girls like muses floating around and holding their breath
On all of their birthdays, girls or muses that looked just like you,
Who are lying like Sara Teasdale or some other Sarah beside the Graves of some others, but otherwise all by themselves;
And the candles are blown out and the night is done.
And the gypsies pack their medicine balls, and the crows of all those Girls fly away like darkened pages flipping over so many alders,
So many alders in forests of so many far aways.

In Front Of Whatever Friend

I can hear all of the Mexicans in a deadly festival over
My house;
Even as my roses have gone uneaten: they remain in the Ferris Wheel lights of a store that will never Multiply before it turns out its lights: and she cannot come over,
Because she can never be rude:
Though her skin is beautiful: Alma, my muse- and is worth
Going to school over,
And figuring out things over, even after the stores have closed:
Even after my parents have stopped crying and brought home
Fried chicken to tease the eyes of The alligator: as she goes back to sleep inside the fallow gardens
Of her luckless man again:
And he bites her lip like a poisonous root meaning no good,
Even as the airplanes abort, turn tail, and return to the States: over and across the farthest matriculations of wherever
It was they were going;
And it is not beautiful, even left alone and selling an insurmountable
Amount of fireworks in the deserts of New Mexico,
Before the movie theaters, before the forest fires:
Without any forests, without any breast feeding mothers:
Maybe without even any mirrors, I will figure out that I am not Beautiful, while she awakens from her nest, sour fingered,
Eyes as hungry as a fox in the loins of its fable;
And remembering you, as you occurred like the first séance of a wave
Before the baseball games of whatever birthday it was:
Even you could not stop me from dying, or wetting myself before Waking up in the whatever morning and eating hotdogs with Ketchup and mayonnaise before the eyes of the alligators
Or the crocodiles
Or, whatever senses it happened to be in front of whatever friend that it
Was.

In Ganymede's Shadow

They all turn swell in Ganymede's shadow—
While we are all just looking out,
And we cannot see just how she turns around—
For the trailer-parks as for the nimbus:
Perpetual bodies in the tomb—
Counting and swearing by the werewolves and
The whatnots that we still live here,
And that we are all fed up:
Bodies blooming in the clover hoping to win
The four-leaf lottery,
Spelling out of the love letters that are all thumbs:
Until finally that fine mother cat has given birth to Kittens: kittens—underneath the brightest lights
Of the midwives of the séances—
Of the aphrodisiacs of the candelabrum of the waves—
Of a I don't know what else—
Except for the preternatural existence of their Nature—life right here—nude and showing off in Color—
Soon to be reborn without nuclear remembrances:
If just enough to spread the nebula upon the palate:
A day light, a dilemma—
And another yard amassed that doesn't belong
To the bedded light of the dreams
That sway upon the cobwebs of the headlights of
The nebulas—that there remains always a tomorrow
That forgets most of itself—and even though
The waves come and go so beautiful—
They are yet no so swift to dream.

Robert Rorabeck

In Greening Tides

Addicted through the sport of clouds,
All the day's visions last until gone;
Snakes come out and are Frightened by the blankets of sunlight the blasted Gods make nude love to the Housewives in the shapes of mailmen and weathervanes,
Across the acerbic vineyards
Of another suburbia's blindsided malaise,
While the children latchkey, and get drunk under the Crooks of the thoughtlessly transplanted cypress
Trees,
Who seem to petition the phantasms of every airplane,
Like wayfarers in greening tides of those imaginary yards.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Arboreal Sorority

And this is another sound, a protuberance to
The alert jack rabbits:
The way I sometimes hear the airplanes leaping
A leap year:
And I am in my yellow house, and you are with
Your auburn spouse:
And the trees outside go like this:
And the trees outside going like this,
Not as the waves go, but in mirror image:
The trees go like this.
The waves go like this, as you are yourself
Beckoning-
Stewardess in a mirror of long ago-
From my boyhood I remember you, even though
Now all of that memory is the sad sheath
Of a forgotten cicada hanging like the forlorn
Decoration of a weeping holiday against the throat
Of another tree lost in her arboreal sorority.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Beautiful Hair

Nubile poem on the cleft of an orb—
Silence slips over the curves of a river-
And the strange jewelry that decorates the housewives
Without a sound—
Sandlots of castles of missing cars
And other mouth less amusements—matriculating
To themselves until they happened to believe that The most fabulous invention of all happens to Be the hallways of their highschools—
And now if you can picture what joy they are in—
In the strange memory of fishes swimming around
A midway of an unbelievable palace that was Never there—why then,
A joy to them- a joy to them—
A spark of a firework igniting in her beautiful hair..

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Blond-Blonde Hair

Corrupted into the grandeurs of the theatres of incents—
Of grandeurs of grandeurs
Of sounds that cannot rest—the hummingbird of a mockingbird
Seems to consist of the ringlets of the starlight
Of moonbeams—
And it goes around themselves—speaking of other heavens in A different language—but once a midway must have used to Exist here—lying in her daydreams and combing her
Blonde—blonde hair—
But now there are only graveyards being awakened by roller-rinks
And the spaces that never seem to survive in the vanishing
Never Lands—and more and more playboys are laid and laid- off
The girls—the girls just look more and more Beautiful the younger—and the younger they get—
Well- anyway—well anyway—there is a well of enlightenment
Somewhere and, otherwise—moon beams—and moon means—
Star crossed—and star crossed in her blond and in her
Blond-blond hair.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Demension

If you decided to skip school where would you
Go,
Overpowered in your ideas to be alone—
Coming along into her parks and comingling with
The sunshine in the palmettos:
While everything else takes awhile to finish
Around her and so to become real:
Like the ants beneath her, these are your playgrounds
Too—and while you masturbate,
With your lips busied upon her—what is your Thought—
What a strangeness lies between you—she will Marry another man,
And your teachers will not pay a cent to see the dimes
Of your teenage tragedy: it will just become another
Fault beneath the mountains—luminescent—
Vulgarized by the commercials trying to sell her spirit:
Then the heavens will melt off of her,
And she will slip away like a torpid afternoon—
And you will scald your hand in her dimension,
Until it is time to come alive again.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Favorite Color Of Gods

You can fill up this butterfly with words
Like amber liquors into a shot glass over ruined fingers,
While the thoughts tumble the speechless birds;
And all of it can be a canyon of a heart waiting to be filled,
All the speechless wilderness that burns behind the Senses,
And the feral boys there who are unlucky shots:
They are trying to call you from the banisters of an apathetic
Nest,
Because anyone can see how rich you are, and how foolish:
While Alma is smooth,
Her hair like the penumbras of a punchy comet:
She'll ride her ponies anywhere, and when I practice witchcraft,
I put her eyelash in a portrait of a woman by Picasso,
And then I lay back so greased and count the verbs,
Those actions that I saw her out doing through the day,
What a fortunate curse to be so positioned near her in the world,
And to have come upon her after she has already settled
With her beautiful family in a golden forest where the hummingbirds
Sleep on the ground like the loose and homeopathic change
Of sated serpents,
And you can count the rings of their hollow flight paths they once
Took, singing like thirsty halos around Alma's
Head,
While there was movies, and the Incas rose their green nosed
Pyramids through the cracks in the smoky coronations
In her favorite color of gods.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Little Heart

Some cattle bonfires for luck
Whilst my father drives a truck full of golden fireworks:
He is going somewhere over the heavens
To look for work—
Underneath him, archangels are in the forests of
The heavens—
They are telling stories of the times they remembered
Eve trying to poke out the stars
And picking strawberries.
At their footsteps, the schools of men are wild—
Teachers get fired,
And butterflies tangle into balls outside of school—
Antennae lactating and kissing the stamen
Of the wildflowers who bloom in the armpits
Of the neighborhoods and the cemeteries out of
And I feel inspired by these things,
As my life drives away in her little heart.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Most Careless Of Days

If in a vacant rodeo,
Words are swallowed beneath the Sky already bled,
Past the sundials and the ways that the Dead were thrown into those cliffs,
Then think of my mother
Here,
And of her mother, and her sister buried-
And forget my dented trumpets,
Or the hapless birds that procrastinate for
Her shoulder:
Think of how the sun rises over her banks,
And the very horizon peels away in
A sheath of occult blue-
And how she lays all day underneath the Tourniquets waiting for those children
To come home to her from their Season,
To relinquish the things that they now have
And return, though she knows
That they cannot- her bones growing so
Uneven and empty from these thoughts
That she is sure she can now fly to
Them,
Or become just as careless as they are, exploring
With them over the swallowed caverns
That use to burn altogether with the sunlight
That once dripped from her shoulders
As she fed them way back in her most careless of days.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Nocturnal Gardens

Don't you know what the queen remembers?
I have gone to the liquor store and tomorrow will be My birthday—
Another birthday and I will keep with the kids at school:
Having drunken so much rum from Barbados,
How will I explain to them tomorrow what they cannot Feel—the aesthetic of my vanishing muses—
Now that I am married and another year older—
Even one year older than the God of Easter,
Will I keep the ventriloquisms of my art:
Of stolen bicycles and terrapin with cerulean shells,
And stewardesses who fly forever on airplanes
Until they are kidnapped into the vineyards of venal foxes:
I do not know—but the waves swell with mermaids:
Don't you know—they are just as popular with the sea
As the people in red China where my wife lips:
Tiny as a sea shell, I put her in my pocket—a wish worth
At least one candle—
As I walk away with the sunset—as the moon cleans my Pockets, shining like a leopard
In her nocturnal gardens.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Remembrance

Tide moves out, breathless,
Leaving us time to smoke in between classes:
Moving up, apexes—
Then I'll have to return to a school that is
So far away from her caesuras:
Listen, mannish boys—as we smoke: what does
She sound like to you? How many Mermaids can we count in the rhythms of her
Sounds: pretty echoes
Engulfing tears—or other words meant for her—
Entire trailer parks of her cessations—
I wonder if hers is an easy rode: most of her daughters
Lay forgotten—business of her nebulas
And areolas: we can watch her for only so long,
Before we must carrying ourselves indoors
And watch the television:
But she is always there, riling in her business:
And though we will lay forgotten, she will come to Our tombs and overpower us in her remembrance.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Sleep

Laughing beside their plots,
Relatives and forget-me-nots, do not decide
Upon a thing:
They lay right there through the oratories
And gypsum confessions,
While young girls go to school, flowing their hairs,
And dragging their trains:
Even the angels seem to drink from them; words
With flowers in a vase,
The smell of her two month old perfume still in My bed.
An iguana climbs my lime green wall. Outside there
Is gas in the tank of my car,
And Mexicans across the street, moving in their Brown shadows- while the mausoleums rise like Orchards of Christmas trees, kissing their Last hurrahs- sending them off to make-believe;
And all of it in a lottery of hearts,
Creating the tide of our Siamese bodies, listening
As we fall down beside her,
As she rolls over and forgets us in her sleep.

Robert Rorabeck

In Her Vast And Burnished Soul

When I take my first taste of liquor,
Something moves; it could hardly be expected
With my dogs breaking wind, snuffing the Smells of my liquor;
I am as if in the tilting whirl of the carnival,
You know, who the steady buzz of big brass lights,
The carnies know- they have the same dreams;
They can go anywhere, as long as there's
No where to go: Around, and around, and around,
Repeating the words to sound ridiculous,
Still knowing there's an even better foul mouthed
Vocabulary in the libraries of the university
Cropped near the sea- The stone women, the Atolls which arise enmeshed with the bellies of Cherubic nimbus: Societies on the move,
Spinning out their old- I fell in love with her eyes,
But now I have to swear they were fool's gold;
And I am here now, spinning, spinning
Repeating words and heady, because I'm about to Taste my first dropp of really cheap soda pop;
Daddy- And the carnival is built up next to the balmy Eaves of scrub pine and palm trees. Flipping our Heads back like cans uncorked, we can see up the skirts
Of the girls across the canal leaping like lime-green
Fauns on the teal tennis courts: Girls we used to love,
And on and on, Diana we worshipped in the suburban
Gardens of our backyards; and finishing real quick,
Like the quickness of a song, or the vacillations of This migrating show, then if I've done my job the sensation
Will linger and skip, like something tiny and alive
And yearn, ululating like cheap soda pop in her vast
And burnished soul.

Robert Rorabeck

In High School

When the day is saying what it meant
And ultimately lying down for the unctions of Jasmines, what fairies will play with the cats
As their owners work all night at some carwash
Or roller-rink,
And the stewardesses take all of the time
To the sky—hopping and gallivanting like tree frogs—
Like knights with copper wings—
I wonder how many corsages have bloomed for them
At so many airports underneath the moons:
Sometimes they must feel as if they are upon other Planets—taking their first footsteps out into
The neophyte cities—their wings drying in the background:
They are in high school again,
Their heavens have touched the ground.

Robert Rorabeck

In His Eyeless Rooms

Airplane over a rose—over an old avenue—
A place where my parents used to live,
A trailer park,
A used dictionary in the hands of a skeleton—
A cenotaph kneeling to a cross
In the wave,
A blue lion in a cypress perch—
Infatuated with a drifting cloud—
The sun so high over the gems of its burials—
Nocturnal hearts beating in the burrows
Or the shallows,
Waiting for the hours that midnight perfumes—
Waiting for you to come to see him
In his eyeless rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

In His Shell

It happens that I am not at home,
And that I am filled without reason for a place that Will not heal,
While the stewardesses come in talking nonsense,
Fresh from their leaping bivouacs,
But famished from their overpriced breastfeeding
Of their constituency of tourists;
And they lie across the room and wait for the special
Cases of lions,
And the fire drills during homeroom:
And they mouth off to me with their eyes, swimming:
Turquoise and dove-shelled:
Almost salient, and reachable across the dime-store
Canal,
So my breathing becomes busied,
And I am held over, and lightened by their speak-easies,
Hermosas of the airlines,
Or other waxy fairytales, until my parents arrive and Drive me home to bedtime and to other places
That I awake and praying, like a tortoise who becomes A lighthouse in his shell.

Robert Rorabeck

In Illusions Such As This

Fitfully the fire must molest other
Trespassers who are as equally unblessed:
They started together falling pitter patting in the halls,
And perhaps sharing lips,
But they eventually found their way out of doors,
And god blessed the sun
And god damned this: as the fish tramped legless
In the canal,
And the cypress bowed around the opened foyers of the Houses;
And it was a slow wound upon a worriless battlefield:
The sky was a blue cream,
And there was no logic to her hips, but the way they Danced,
Like a penny in the streams, like a flower in the meadow:
And the dogs leaped after the foxes,
Deciding that they too would love them, and be fair Game for the show that I wished to take her to later that Night, to bent nearer to her caress in the balmy illusions,
To promise her more as the moon awakened
And happened perchance to stumble on to a field
Spread out to her in illusions such as this.

Robert Rorabeck

In Its Apathetic Shade

Nights of storyless jubilee-
The soldiers truncated in the cemetery,
Nothing about them sparse,
Just a little warm- balmy- their petticoat
Flowers are melting,
And full of garden snakes:
And there are no mountains, no muses;
At least she doesn't
Call- The soldiers are full of broken wax-
They are weather-destroyed books I think
I should not sell-
I try to look through the dour indigo of that Massive tree,
But the sorority is dark behind it, and turned off; she has her
More eloquent men who wouldn't
Be caught dead here:
Men who like cartoons with no interruptions;
And I am in the dog house again,
Without children, just the tiny scabs of fickle
Wounds:
And I doubt she cares to know that I want nothing
More than to sniff her ankle,
To bow in her shade and curl my tail for awhile-
To whine in suppliant mastery.
She probably thinks I'm sick.
She doesn't think of me at all; and that's good:
She's moved out of here like a carnival turned off
And packed up, telescoped into a saddled centipede
Rhapsodies of daydreams
Sashaying with a hundred cadmium legs down that Faded hall;
And the highway she goes is high and leaping,
And I think it should never come down.
I am in its apathetic shade, feverish and weeping.

Robert Rorabeck

In Its Zoetropes

Crawling to the forefront of another misery of Guatemala—I drink my rum,
I say my lines—and I await for another day to splay me open
To the eyes and senses of fishermen—
Or, if I suppose, the sunlight cannot keep you here
From another catastrophe,
Like stolen bicycles sleep walking back to their masters—
Cannot keep you from his love,
Or from the marionettes of his children he Conceived inside of you—then the cave is stolen,
But in its zoetrope still dances—
Laughing under the moonlight for the wolves to come
Into its movie theatre, or for the planes flying above
It to look down,
Causing another catastrophe, awakening—
The moonlight over a valley of windmills—cousins to
The caesuras—they spring around them,
Never bothering to wonder what is laughing at the Same time with the moon.

In July

In July,
After the tents are down,
And I've sold all the fireworks I could,
I will pack up and move away for a week
Or two, and climb in the high cleft footsteps
Of God, and swim with my hands scrambling
Upwards into the sunlight cast from his Gaze looking down, staring through clouds,
Like doorways with Bright keyholes I slip away into—
I will take pictures which I will send to you
To give you proof of places where the Brilliant angels of your shadows swim, places
In which I have
Hidden thoughts of you....

In Kind

Hibiscus and words,
And tracks of land all around Disney World:
Like, like fat bumble bees too fat to pollinate
And around the knees
Of flowers.
We play musical chairs twenty-four hours,
And I want, and
I need,
But my vocabulary is a slim volume,
And this is why I don't succeed,
And piss and stain plastic something chairs;
And your hair is golden,
And your hair is green, but like a garden full of Conjunctions,
Like pet cemeteries or very homeless men,
And I guess I just want to breed and sling my Slang,
And rot your flesh right off of you like the kiss of A boomslang
Where the country is wide and gorgeous
And you can bring all of your children down the rosy
Mouth of the canyon to watch the river roaring
With my name,
And you can stretch your child's hand out to let her
Pet my wild mane,
If, and only if, my undying love, you might kindly,
Oh so kindly, allow me to do the same,
In kind.

In Love With A Turtle

A window in the shadows looks out into
A chord of wood
And a length of beautiful velvet torn Off the elbows and womb of A woman as she escaped down the tree:
Maybe from the serpent:
Maybe a fireman was calling her to come to
The flea market that afternoon
That weekend-
Maybe she had golden hair, and a diamond
Ring on her finger-
Maybe she was in love with a turtle.
She might have even been my mother-
Anyway,
There is still more school tomorrow,
And the mountains continue to grow
So far away.

In Lue Of Something Else

Dove sail like gaudy Christmas cards between
The trees,
As my scars cast darker by the sun beside the Swings and slide,
And the little men buried in the sand-
She drives like a rich person, she drives all day
Until she hit's the ice,
And out of control she looks up and catches my Sadness,
My sister fully graduated in cap and gown,
The disco ball reflecting nature's imperfection
Or God's sorrow, or just the mailboxes out front
Of all the yards,
The little red flags up in expectation or surrender.
She used to board her horse near here,
But that is sold and far away- The leaves are yellow
But not quite gold and next month she and her Husband will be leaving for the phoenix desert,
But they are not ornithologists, not even that;
And as I hurry through the splicing complexions of
The yards, I think up these things, like greeting cards,
Little Capitalistic prayers I choose to give her in lue of Money, when I go and save her from her disregard.

Robert Rorabeck

In Me

Traffic creeps on Sundays,
Away from church,
Or toward the whore:
I want to skip off work and gallop
To the sea,
I want to lay in her
And have her lay in me.

Robert Rorabeck

In Me, Alma

I am in my little house in historical west palm beach:
O, I can see all of the indiscriminate scars on my body, and almost Hear all of the palliations of the sea:
How the fish are always coming up to be raised and then to be dying in
Her,
All the little boats slipping through her saltwater canals without Any cares:
Then the werewolves loom and the mountain range comes up so
Sharp like undefined cutlery,
The esoteric heirlooms of you occult, and I can feel like I am alive,
Because I have seen the washrooms of your eyes,
Alma:
And you are brighter than anyone, even though you got turned out at Such a young age:
And, Alma, I just wished that I was saved: I ate two hotdogs tonight
For my dinner, Alma,
And I bought you and my mother both Mother's Day cards,
Because I didn't know what else to buy you:
And this metropolis is so big, Alma, but we still live close to five minutes
Away from each other:
While, I am sure that you know that these bodies live, they really live;
And we dig all day to burry holes for different types of palm trees,
But now you body really moves,
Alma;
But I have no greater wish then in the deity that is transplanted next
You and your kids at the petty zoo; if that body was mine, then all of the Greater professions of the science museum would have nothing
At all that could be proven to me:
But we would have drums and buses and ways to get out of sight and into Our other worldly destinations;
And if there is a goddess, then I have believed in her; and I see her every Day, Alma;
And I believe in her: Oh, Alma, won't you ever believe in me?

Robert Rorabeck

In Mermaids Anymore

Tricks of racehorses lying in bed with my Wife—waiting to go to school again
Tomorrow—
So many sorry archangels—the stained glass
That all night looks down into emptied
Carports and now the wreck of mountains—
The fox is in the chicken coop—
The shooting stars are anywhere—
And there is someone to love other than me—
Boys who get their hearts lost in
The waves—
Tattoos that say that they could be anyone all over
Their chests—
And the night starts out in a tent of Bright surrender—the night blooming jasmine
Come to the old men who no longer
Believe in mermaids anymore but
Who are still in love.

In Mortal Form

Sullen women, and beautiful,
With no lines in their palms:
Their mother is inside the red tent
Under the swaying palms:
I saw her go in running from the sea:
Crying for her daughter,
The woman of palest earth
Who the greatest god tricked into the waves,
And took her away from the Earliest forest on the back of the bull:
Her mother is weeping jealously,
And the stars are singing like virgins:
Her sisters are weeping in
The hem of the waves,
Hoping that the greatest god will Kidnap them, and anoint them
Under his heavy brow:
How can they know that
He is never to return, for he
Was only in love with their sister,
The one of muted form.
She has now swooned into his opal
Nape,
Her feet drag limply through the Constant waves,
And when she wakes up she will
Be a married woman of borrowed form,
And soon must forget the slender boy
She loved in mortal form.

In My Adolescent Centerfold

I'm listening to your songs,
And drinking my rum:
I am afraid of every man's death:
I'm afraid of grandpa,
And I'm afraid I can't spell-
And that's why I'm listening to this pulp
Espionage,
Surprised that I made it so far through college;
Not surprised that I ended up play on the Green crop circles of the carpet
Again,
Folding paper into airplanes,
Fire-bombing He-Man-
All day long while the ants are in a rut.
DH Lawrence is fornicating with the lady-
Grey spiders up across the white cotton
Pillars,
And I have friends passed out in the grass;
And I have a craving for bat mitten and cricket;
And I am the king of England,
And I have soldered mermaids tucked in my pocket-
Tomorrow, I have Latin class,
But I only go to see your comely eyes staring back
At me across the hemispheres of Easy lighting;
And when I get up I should follow you out into the Fire-emergency esplanade;
Or go to the musseled grotto to sell advertisements,
To smoke with my friends-
I named my Cherry red Oldsmobile Jodie,
But that doesn't mean I didn't have feelings for you,
Or undressed you naked and laid out with Your list of favorite amusements and Video games
Fully spread in my adolescent centerfold.

In My Dreams

I wasn't invited to her wedding.
I cast myself out of the insouciant hotel room
And waited for the stars
To hold up like taxis for gangsters and their Mob,
And I made where horses ran as snowflakes
And picked up gas and speed:
It was some intelligent forecast,
Like a fieldtrip I can hardly remember to the art Museum where I cut my teeth on
All the naked ladies
And horses;
But Sharon wasn't there, she never was,
But across the empirical fairy tales of the canal,
And yet she is always ready to lay down:
She is always worthwhile to write about,
And there is nothing wrong with doing it.
She can run for miles,
And I won't give up. Sharon is my new immortality,
My Olympic swingset tucked beneath the Rockies,
And I don't think her husband would mind,
Knowing just how rich of a car this girl is.
I don't know how he got her- I don't know anything,
Except that I was more beautiful,
And that I was enveloped in a playground of dates
And figs,
And vines nuzzling beside her daughter her breast
Like a gas tank,
Tucking in to the tannin revealed by the open lips
Of areola Sharon has no choice but
To give to me
All that she ever had or never thought of
In my dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

In My Fumbling Rains

I drink rum, and by the end of the month I will Even have my own little house
That the pets can lie in, and we can hear the waves the same
As we heard the lions roar down the street
In our adolescents:
And one time Erin called us out because she wished to Sit near me beside the bonfire,
Though I didn't come, and she was already beginning to realize
Just how many boys that she was good for:
Marching their royal palmed legions:
Absolutely gorgeous bicep-ed centipedes like hefty candles all
Those so many nights
That she tossed liquor at the bar, and shrugged me off:
Those patriots of her body really enjoyed and she fell in love
Every other day,
And now my poems are short and cadaverous: They don't make Eyes with anybody save for substitutes;
And the come out like piss-stained wimps from the cardboard
Vacillations of their libraries and pet cemeteries
And weep for little superfluous things that never had much of A reason for existing:
And they think of you and complain as they lose cohesion and Melt like witches,
Or beautiful working girls named Melody, that lose track of time
And enjoy getting lost in my fumbling rains.

In My Heart For Yesterday

A weekend disappears and I sit on my Couch across from my dog—
My wife in the shower and I am drinking
Rum. The airplanes have either gone to Shanghai or outer space,
Like the love in my heart for yesterday—
But what absence is without pain—
Words that cannot figure out beauty—
Like kindergarteners painting their colors
In ancient caves and then laying down
And sleeping— sleeping forever
And sometimes dreaming of the women
They've loved.

Robert Rorabeck

In My Lonely Bachelordom Of A Pinball Game

Pitiless contributories aglow in the hearths of Collegiate mountains:
I have been drinking rum, Sharon, but tonight you might As well be my muse: Do you yet read these awful dalliances,
These rubs of antique genies,
Or these rope tricks to no where: I'll have a house now
Sharon- by the end of this birth month, I will be all alone in A yellow fort older than your grandmother,
Owned by a Norwegian artist of eggs for twenty years before me;
But now it is mine, Sharon, and in its humid nights I might as Well think of you,
Because you were an artist and maybe a friend, and maybe
I fought to control myself across the classroom for you: Sharon;
And maybe this is all wrong: and maybe you were meant to be shoeless
And lost in the same forest as me, Sharon; if you are reading these,
My consumptive and sickly blue butterfly: That is who you
Are, like a candle that burns without oxygen, your daughter
Needing another sip of your name: maybe your husband is all wrong,
Or maybe this is just another quarter in my lonely bachelordom
Of a pinball game.

In My Tiniest Of Backyards

Gold is carried over the hills by Alma's sweet wrists
That I carried and kissed today,
That I reached over and held like newborn hummingbirds
In the crib of her air-conditioned car before
She had to drive away:
But I bought her a three hundred dollar rosary of white gold,
So maybe now she loves me:
And when I listen to her pulse I can look far away toward
The northern clouds, and maybe towards Disney World:
And the atmosphere seems to intensify:
There is the music of angels being picked by the wings of Airplanes;
And in the instances that were never meant to be,
I can seem to feel alive: as the day hibernates, as I wet her brown
Skin with my weeping letters,
Only to let my mind drift to the tattoos I got in Spain,
And to the yellow Senna trees I want to plant in my tiniest
Of backyards.

In My Trembling Fairytale Arms

Dragonflies and horses;
And everybody counting sheep: you ask me
How the world can be more beautiful,
Alma,
While the ships are sinking into bathtubs,
And I am too drunk to go outside on my bicycle:
And I have eaten too much again,
Underneath the unkindled lights of your birthday Cake.
And if there was really a stratosphere here
Again,
Alma,
I would pull out the kites that the feral children
Have stolen from me,
And I would teach you how to fly just high Enough above the poisonous spiders in the Forever forest so that you would Never have to fear upon being bitten and thus having
To sleep forever in my trembling
Fairytale arms.

Robert Rorabeck

In Nostalgia's Brutal Junk Heap

Yellow rainbows smile upside down from Cheap liquor bottles
In those retired rodent neighborhoods where dogs
Take charge
And fleas hold circus; they are all in love with the Gamy mermaid who takes her bath of tricks
Sometimes when right before
The ice-cream man perambulates with his cursing
Wind-chimes,
His balmy vanilla fireworks: She takes all the dimes
That would've been his
From the bicycles of adolescent kisses;
And then she swims away, swearing that she'll make
It all the way to Spain,
But she never does- She just gets to Lake Worth
And then dances topless for bikers;
And I would have liked to see her before she was all spent
In a house of bruises underneath the palmettos,
Their suppliant cutlery that is peppered by cicadas-
But for these scars, they make me sad and agoraphobic
And I just watch all the fallow girls playing soccer,
Their knees in bits of rashes
Crenellated in the absence of colors of ancient newspaper;
And by my tomorrow, they'll all be sad and hung-over,
Would-be super models, now housewives with their Elicit stashes-
The mermaids weeping with only bitter star fruit to eat,
Spider monkeys going bananas on each of their irritated teets;
UFOs fluttered in the landscaping, and their big-eyed captains
Sprawled out drunk in her bushes;
I would have given it all just to be one of their pubescent
Rashes- and the rains come sweating- And I Am a vagrant on the squeaking swing-set in the suburban
Cages the cops patrol showing off their badges- They have caught
Me out of time,
And all I can do is look at them sideways, trying to give them
The best angle, so I might wriggle off this ancient hook
And escape the rotten meat brigades attracting such beautiful
Suburban flies going out to lunch

In nostalgia's brutal junk heap.

In Open Throated Vibrations

By the gowned streets
Cited with people
Walking in trails of phosphor
About in the slag of the metallic quarry,
The weary maiden lays down to rest
Red-capped and lost in
A two lane path through the Petrified forest. She bites an innocent apple
Thoughtfully from her wicker lunch basket.
Chubby and boisterous tourists stop
And take pictures of the elegant juice beading down
The indented pink basin of her plump lip,
A child of clitoral dew dreaming of a waterfall.
She smells like hot cinnamon taking a shower.
When her eyes look up into the flashing bulbs,
They can not understand what is happening
Though the irises swell with curiosity.
The domineering conductor takes his troop
Away, trundling down the marble foliage
To the cottage of three narcoleptic grizzlies.
Left alone, exhausted like a long distance
Runner naked in the middle of Africa,
She begins to hallucinate. There beneath the marble
Roof planted in cement sheaths thickets of orchids
Are humming, in opened throat vibrations.
Some are white and some are blue
And some are changing colors rapidly.
She steps off the path, not hearing the tourists
Scream far away, not seeing the beast's
Long-tailed shadow stalking like a debased gentleman
Obscuring her shadow

In Order To Survive

Always wanting more,
The jasmine blooms: it smells beautiful and causes
Tranquility:
I let you into my courtyard today, Alma, and we picked a gladiola
Or something else together,
And you told me it was what your mother always liked:
Alma, you got pregnant at sixteen in America with Michael,
And I went shopping at the Sunshine International Flea Market for something
To buy you for your birthday, which is on the Wednesday of this week:
And then you came over and I kept on wanting to touch you,
And you kept on telling me not to touch you:
You smelled so good, and you used my bathroom, and the lions played
With the rabbits, and the planes touched down and felt a beautiful
Weight lifted from them once the stewardesses walked out
And realized that they'd been touching so many precious things:
And I am so glad that I know your name, Alma- and surprised,
And I am feeling slightly unreal, Alma, that you came today-
That you stayed and spoke my name in the shelter of my house, which is A necessity every man needs in order to survive.

In Our Unrecognized Hands

Lovelessly, enjoy the tennebaums of infrastructure:
Salient as a terrapin just knocked up at a
Bowling alley,
Jog your pin-shelled hips along the consumptive avenue,
And tell your girlfriends at hand that there
Is something not at all right in
All of this:
But look at how the grand houses have made it all up
Beside you,
Pillaging like ruthless children and down right bullies
Into adolescence,
And saying to one another neighborly, and tongue less
But using all of those gaping transoms like
A gauge:
Look what we have done, grown brawny and well-
Developed in the competition of our Neighbors,
And now we really have swung so high that it no longer
Matters to contemplate where the swing sets and Other dalliances of our youths have gone:
We were jaundiced anyways and out of sorts;
Our family's pets loved us better than anyone, but they are Now all cotton mouthed down south into graveyards,
Where the airplanes lick them like thoughtless quills over
Paper,
But without any ink:
And men come anyways and trim our yards and verbiage,
And put roses in the lapels of our front doors:
And housewives come in and frequently cook, or infrequently
Make love in us,
Their haughty daughters swimming and sunbathing half nakedly
In our backgrounds of pools: so, so what- if that girl we First knew was never fit for us,
And has forsaken our grand playgrounds of ballrooms for not Even a fifth of us; and sectioned off in her little hut
With her brown man and wonderfully breaded children, maybe she throws
Fits, like the sea in her carrion of whimsically sociopathic
Dressing rooms; it is never for us,
And our affluence is wide open and gaping, not even good for

Carrying grapes: until we rot we will think of her
With the sun coming up like a popgun over the marble busts
And trellises of our head rooms:
And we are only good for apiaries of homeless, sugar toothed
Wasps;
We think of her hair as it glistens, and cascades; and we look
Out at our roses the men who do not know us have planted at our Knees,
And think day after day what it would feel like to hold them over her
Like a rosary in our unrecognized hands,
And become our hoped for parts by offering her the shady perfumes
That she has already told us she can never willingly accept.

In Parts A Poem

Monday is having a holiday. I can see it all the Way, over seas-
Girls in little photographs who've been in Little plays,
Who now sail out on cruise ships on weeks of Sundry days: While, I am in the riddle
Of my writing room, but I don't care.
Mommy Fortuna's carnival, forensic underwear:
The familiar song of the road danced upon by my truant
Fingertips,
Every daddy wanting to be so bold, discovering Ballerinas, ingénues fast asleep under wayward pines;
I see her, but I have someone else on my mind;
And it goes down like this, naughty boys in the rain
Sputtering from the gutters, carports in washing machine
Noise, my mother almost electrocuted by a naked
Extension cord, and latter on a jubilee of spikenard.
Retired neighbors drinking domestic beer, pornography
Across from here, busty blasphemies, oh bright dear,
Oh azalea, what are you, but getting your pilot's
License, daydreaming like an angelic acrobat swooning
For the slick mustache of her swashbuckling lord-
It has two means, which is why I keep coming back to her,
The smell of gasoline and her shampooed hair,
Another night of cheap liquor spilled precisely 1879 miles
Away from the lacquered bed board of her boudoir:
3 parks Jesus, to one part wh*re.

In Pictures Of Strange Midnight Yards

Tenebrous squalor of words, I do not love you,
And the world is disjointed and all of the sons of all of The mothers and fathers are far away from their Trailer parks: they are being looked after by strangers,
As their zoetropes languish underneath the sky
In pictures of strange midnight yards who are always pulling Back and pulling back as the airplanes fly to get Outside of the houses who are chasing them but Cannot fly.

In Places We Cannot Go

Heart stems in the forgotten cul-de-sacs
Underneath the willows- and I wonder if you've Seen us:
As it's been raining, but the airplanes have been Flying in the sky anyway-
And my face is scarred, but not as much as the Way you left me
Because you are the mother of another man's Children
And the angels hatches in places we cannot Go anymore.

Robert Rorabeck

In Pools Of Bright Shade

The night is a night of brother less panthers:
Those beasts who don't wear any shoes, and never get hurt:
They are hunting tonight and breathing out from the open Windows of
Virgins who haven't yet traveled up state to die in the cataracts of Narcoleptic incest of fraternities:
And I can't really imagine that bartenders are reading me anymore,
Or that the azure lights are still undressing behind the eyes and Gullets of her church,
Because here you are, Alma: Here is where you will always be Remembered
And loved by the vagabond foundlings: those who rest without any
Cars,
Whose songs are swallowed by the glutinous trains:
That I have run away all the way to Michigan, and I tried out for Awhile in California- I have almost mined for silver in Colorado;
And I have been up her frost bitten neck to admire the Grandeurs of Vampires and down again into her peaceful grottos
Where the alligators are smiling;
And I love you, Alma- and I have nothing in my refrigerator,
But your brown body is as warm as an incubator that could raise
Entire households of chickens on the north pole;
And your eyes are a holiday, your lips a portico to foyers of your Soul where I stand waiting to dance with you while the storm clouds Winnie and the waves roll in so grandly never even figuring that They cannot hold a candle to the toy like caesuras or bodies
Have made lying together in pools of bright shade.

Robert Rorabeck

In Rainbows

Beautiful page,
Someone laid you beneath a helicopter in the Dead center of a garden,
As the virgin kissed the snake who fed her
The apple
And all of that was ripe and golden,
And we rode bicycles against the wedding dresses
Of her road,
Away from home and to the circus,
As the buzzards washed the clouds—and my mother
Caught her feet in rainbows
Into the marital bliss of another mirage's estuary,
And we held hands as we Rode horses,
And cut the paper into snowflakes and Told ourselves we didn't have to worry.

In Shanghai

In Shanghai I practice a mundane drudgery:
I lay in bed all day
Some five stories up in a Shanghai suburb:
And so I sleep off and on in my wife's Parents' bed—my inlaw's bed,
As it seems to have some magical properties:
We conceived our first child in it,
And now, for a second time,
My wife is nearly two months pregnant:
But I concoct various non life threatening illnesses
In this bed,
Not including my 'poetry'
Which I get yelled at for when I write,
Because I am never anymore allowed
To be drunk—
I've been sick for almost two months in Shanghai,
I lost my hearing briefly,
And now I have hemorrhoids—and a pimple
On the side of my nose.
My back is breaking out too,
But my wife, surprisingly, loves me—loves me,
As my child does—
And my second child soon to come—it has Served tremendously
As a tremendous weakening of my insouciant
Art-
I'll get drunk once a week and write
Down my pitiful thoughts,
But the saviors and the ghost like angels will Not come—
I guess it is that they have since abandoned me—
It seems that I have lost my job but I yet still have Plenty of money—
But yet no room to better my art—
While somewhere in the mountains of my dreams
My dogs yet lay awake for their honey.

In Some Backwards Story Time

In the sabbaticals of light, lost daughters glaze:
Their mother's fingers on the pedestals of a collegiate haze:
Rounding the points of a bosomy hill:
Go up to the steep slopes where angels bleed to fill:
A merry go round of forgotten
Tears, circling, areoled and waiting for the tears to fill
The voids of lamentations in the throats of Astronauts choking themselves in the Mexican Laundromats
Just to get another point of view:
As I drive home from all my haunts on a flat earth that does Not tear away at the end, that does not get novels
Published or remember its dear old friends lost in the cricks
Of the kicking glades- washed down stream with the freezing
Mermaids:
And here it all was spilled out so fine, like gold turned to Straw in some backwards story time.

In Some Kind Of Esoteric Glory

You've slept with me, and we've made love:
But this has never been your home- but a place to run away.
Maybe an oasis;
Only my dog is here now- even the airplanes are gone,
And you make love with him too:
I've seen the evidence on your neck from time to time
In the same places that you've given me
The wounds that heal like apples still hidden in the trees
Down the rows to a professor's house;
And the lake there holding out, the weather around it camouflaging
Where the giant woods live
And the hardware stores- the great silent long streaks of highways
Where the headlights cut through the darkness;
And when it snows, the wolves come onto the highway
Unafraid-
As if you and I were to meet in an airport filled with all the ambivalent
Light of people who never knew who we were
To each other;
And then running away into the darkness, and wings folding us
Together in some kind of esoteric glory I would be too afraid
To describe.

In Song

I am a good man until I am gone,
And then I am only a good man in song

In Such A Way

My bed is no longer indigo,
But I have strange, milkshake dreams
And I can put you in them,
Most of the time after I have mowed the yard
And picked up all the empty liquor bottles,
Then look at me,
And all of my blue phalluses spinning,
Pullulating like dumbwaiters and pitchforks;
And girls are pretty, aren't they,
And I have dark shadows around my damaged
Eyes even darker than Don Jaun's
Valentine's mask;
And I can stand out and shirk the crowds and Become my own pagan holiday,
Give off my own little pantheistic sacrifices
For girls who don't even care-
I can kiss my wrists like kittens, like goldfish,
Under the streams of unreachable traffic,
And you wouldn't even know,
The girl who wouldn't care even if the lighthouse
Was turned off,
And all the dorms emptied of pretty pony-tails,
And all the sea pitch black and moving very little
And seeming to court the disinterested orange groves
In such a way.

In Sumptuously Being

I do these things for you, Sharon- because it is as if I am trying to chant for rain in a tinsel of silver nimbus:
It is as if you've called me over to fix your sink,
When all you really want me to do
Was look up your skirt:
And I remember passing by you on some sad Wednesday in That book open hall with so many locked tin coffins
Of lockers that led to where you put your hands
On the ghosts of soft clay in art class
While your father was dying,
While Erin was studying Latin unsuccessfully,
Where before I kept my greasy forehead to the gummed desk;
And I was already heading out,
Out beyond the failsafe borders to hide like a terrapin exhausted
From the fixed race underneath the broken down school bus:
I only did this one or two times,
And the lunch lady caught me on the last and called me out,
But ended up letting me go-
But I saw you on the way out, and you were so beautiful,
And you seemed to understand and love me even when I was not,
And maybe I only passed you by while you were
On your way to better things and Colorado;
And I doubt you should ever have to read this or tell your sweet
Daughter about the lies of Pinocchio,
But I am not a fool: I would plant the aroma of my gold underneath
Your bended knees at some desk in class,
And sniff you and make love like a sommelier to some rosy
Bouquet-
Now don't you understand, I am not perfect- I am only commuting
Through states of awful imperfection,
But if I might sit beneath you for some leaps along the way,
It would give meaning to the journey;
It would force some deity out of the shadows, and astonish the Rest of the disbelieving passengers when they see that your overpowering Mythology is the very reason for all that
Is sumptuously being served to the dining senses of your flighted Beings.

In Tattered Pools Of Shrieking Glee

When will these new scars die-
They cannot possibly outlive me, the silent
Unmovable fantasies of a graveyard's soul:
All the little jewels half remembered in her flesh;
I like to think she will take just one more,
Down in the iceberg earth where the deeper
Parts of trees fish-
I would like to get drunk again and proposition
Her, but now there is a light turned on
And someone is coming down.
I should tell them I am not alive, that she is Too beautiful to go untouched by me. Even now,
She sings she has room for one more sailor
In her wormy sea, almost as if she heard me stepping
In: that we shared the same mind, or that my soul
Was just a piece of her tapestry- She sings,
No one will remember you, but I will forever keep your Body unto me; and we will make love under the Busy fashions of the brighter afternoon above,
Where the traffic slurs and the hearts repeat, as if Applauding something too great for them to certainly know;
And we will wait for them, and in unmoved exploration
You shall captivate me in your perfumed box that Is a crib underneath the regular mobiles of ants and rime
Never to be exhumed; though, someday,
If my sorrows flood, won't you come again bobbing in
The raiment of forgetful atmosphere, making them terrified
Of you once again, but a fine young man utterly ruined,
Cannibalized for my song in tattered pools of shrieking glee.

Robert Rorabeck

In That All Too Obvious Repose

Time clocks me in and gives me new scars,
Which repel women's glances; but it is fine, as They are married and motherly and finely suited.
They belong in parks, muddled by pastels, necks
Like vases housing water lilies with odors and Perfumes, how they stream home from there in such A sorority that espousing their element I become over
Zealous, spill my enjambment into only this stanza,
Forget about revisions and the hangdog natures of the Professors I. In fact, call my cuckolded by them, mystified
In their suburban parks where even they never go, but Fan about in their cars and hearses given over to their Once lovely grandmothers, shopping into graveyards stood
Up with horns of tin and plastic bouquets of blue bells and Glass roses which start forest fires under the sun on the dry
And mowed grass. Eat up entire oaks, and deciduous natures, Burn up ant mounds. The fire licking, tries to crawl up her Leg like a mewling kitten, tries to franchise her, but she is So subtle, and hollow like a flute the piper blows and her Lips are quivering under the mistletoe foaming with eggnog
Even then all out in the open on some prepubescent Christmas
Day; and she only has the idea for tattoos. Thus the sun wreathes
Her as the traffic goes, and she stands there in and amongst all
So many rows, like a canary, like a distillation of her womb,
Until turning away from my fumbling, turns to the winning team
And unbuttoning her blouse, has her lips drool, and is soon tight
Into him in that all too obvious repose.

In That Catholic Miracle Show

I keep on doing this, beating my drum in an
Out of season high school,
Misspelling, picking my teeth, farting into old Shoes- If they could see me, I would Be arrested,
But everyone is out at their own particular sport,
Everyone with a recessive light bulb attracting Bugs and vampires in their own heads-
I used to lounge the neighborhood,
I used to have real fun and fast food and nostalgia-
I visited her at Winn Dixie, and bought her a cheap Bouquet I gave to her after paying her at
The check out table, the ingénue with scabies-
With a bag of condoms in the trunk of her car,
With fishnet stocking, and an all night pass to trouble.
Looking up on the stage where she presupposed her Dark-haired rhymes, I was getting color, and it was Pretty near perfect in that Catholic miracle show,
And it could all be beautiful, and we could have walked
Out to the sound of church bells,
Except the rains would never come- under her feet
No flowers would grow, and when I was too fast asleep
To show, she kept her store open for other boys,
Like a Chinese Dragon with rug burns- so many of them,
Both fast and slow, powwowing, clapping their lips
In a pinstriped finishing school taking numbers in and out
Of her all night suburban window.

Robert Rorabeck

In That Emptied School

Down there in the orange groves
Where the rattlesnakes hibernate telling their Long winded fairytales to little girls:
I do not know who they are, but they believe Themselves to be real-
They languish over the cathedrals, or make small talk
Upon the windowsill,
While the ixora blooms red and yellow like Helicopters in tandem across the park,
Across the adobe:
Inside we made love: we sweated perfumed waterfalls,
And butterflies too wet to fly.
We made love, but you went home across the chicken Tracks to your husband's Children, and you left me teething in that emptied school.

Robert Rorabeck

In That Orchestra That Pulses With The Tide

The lighthouses are uneven,
Hugging the cliffs like infants—
But at least they are beautiful,
Crippled and dissolving
Wondering into the effluvious exaggerations
Where little girls metamorphosis with Tadpoles—
And unicorns drink from the imaginary fountains
Halfway through a school day
Where Peter Pan is skipping school—
You can see him up on the houses
Sleeping in the wildflowers—
He has stolen everything from their mailboxes
And his lightning off Roman Candles—
Guinevere and Geronimo are asleep
Down by the canal,
But when the kaleidoscope turns they will
Will lose their identities—and be on their Way, like each wave in the afternoon
Returning to the instrument of their desires—
As she beats with all of the hearts inside of her
In that orchestra that pulses with the tide.

Robert Rorabeck

In That Touch Of Clouds

Soft in that touch of clouds: dying a bachelor alone
At a baseball game
Without the touch of his dogs- while beneath his Casket and Snow white
The terrapin are yet waiting patiently from their Logs for happenstance to deliver my mother
To them and the alligators:
Pregnant with my youngest sister, and upside down
Beneath their shells, she will only have so much
Air to breath, but it will be the Christian god that Saves her and keeps her healthy for next Week: and when the ravens come their mouths will Be busy with stolen things to decorate the Christmas
Trees that we will sell underneath them-
As the tourists cloud the goldmines- and they find out Things that they never had- and the brown skin of My muse is clouded over my hummingbirds and Lactating unicorns, all just as busy as tourists to find Out about all of the sweets that I am sure that she Ever had.

Robert Rorabeck

In The

With everything about the School
Dumb and mute
I got drunk underneath
The school bus
Where the tortois was
Amongst the shade
And didn't come out
Until
Beowulf was in charge-
Who muzzled all
The teachers,
But was mutually killed
By the dragon as well-
And on the green
It was finally safe
To buy icecream
and say The Pledge of Allegiance
To the flag
Without a favorite color
In the soul of my heart-

In The Abdomens Of Marionettes And Manikins

Absences in the abdomens of marionettes
And manikins,
Like the absences in the lakes of the hearts of
So many girls—
Of sororities of cheerleaders and Flight attendants—
Who've skipped across the Earth stalling away
The wishes from the boys' dime-store wells—
And these girls,
With their legs diademed from the new-fangled
Bonfires—
Seem like bottle-rockets on the god-blessed holidays,
Seem like tinsel from the spokes
And the tits of Christmas-gifted bicycles—
Seem to know what they mean:
That they could be anywhere,
Flashing off from roofs,
Falling like silver snowflakes from the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Abscence

Dying roses smelling of the putrescence of
The open throat of a sink—
Going down the many ways to the abeyances—
The movie theatres of graveyards lying
Beneath their places
Or the millennium of hearts underneath the Patrons of museums—
Oh what a joy to believe in the bivouacs of Sparrows—
And the other keener mediums
While my wife is pregnant and the week has Finally lapsed—
I am finally done with the lamplight of
The fading light towers—lying on my back—
Hypochondriac—kleptomaniac—
Mermaids persuade in the sea
And the stewardesses above them—
Sororities of many colors—evaporating into Sounds—soon it will be Christmas—
As the beautiful angels leave the earth,
Like smoke from over the empty carports
Just as the higher basins—
And I believe I have seen an angel
In the absence of any god who might have happened
To be around.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Airy Heavens

Castles underneath the penumbras of waves:
Little school kids looking up into a bouquet of their graves:
Waves of fire, running like horses,
Like drinks in the single hands of lonely men going down,
While all of the dogs run their tracks all over town:
And Saturn sits alone:
Without any girls, breathless, hopeless: matchless gas in the Oven-
Discovered in recess like the skeletons of a jobless knight
Underneath the windmills,
As other things move, as cats make their dance underneath
The mountains the priceless princes tried to mine:
Just to get your birthstone, to get your name from their Throat:
Alma, Alma- and to try to birth your young like a match
Fluttering like a song bird across the ant mounds in the airy heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Angels' Filigree

Up in the angels' filigree—she thought of me,
She thought of he-
And the world flipped over and pretended to Be dead,
As the mermaids and the angels awakened from
The sea bed—
And, oh, listen, oh—
While it was coming around—
It was playing itself dead, it was laying itself down—
Upon our anniversary—oh, with the satellites doing
Calisthenics to their very toes—
And the angels were laying themselves to the Very playgrounds—
And the umpires were crossing themselves to make Sure there were no vampires around—
And the world got up and shook itself
Down—
And the children remembered themselves before
The town—and spoken words as epitaphs that Would never have to know—
That the only thing the angels were good at
Was making their own silhouettes in the f—ing—f—ing snow.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Aspects

Simple traffic, it is no art:

I get drunk at the museum—I get

Drunk at the mausoleum,

And the butterflies follow, landing on my ever

Widening shoulders:

I once had a muse that was equally bored by

Both places—

But now I have a wife and not enough time for both—

Maybe by some Christmas she will have followed me—

As my muse that once was—to whom I made

Love some sixty times—now lingers in

The orange groves of North Central Florida—

Like a proper noun next to the arcs that are being built

For all of the zoos alongside the flooding valleys

Of my tears:

And my poems emote these things—like kaleidoscopes

Collecting the first hallucinations of a day at kindergarten,

And then to sing unbroken into the springs—

She may walk past an empty baseball diamond and

Never recognize it—what I see:

Her in all of the aspects of the red ghosts—

And sailors lost for so many days in the aspects she cannot

Even recognize to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Balmy Reservoirs

I look out at the sun of my backyard.
Katydid's are crisp at play,
And your dress is shorn around the cutlery of Palmettos,
Or that's just the spider's wicked bay;
And the trees go up forever in their careless Geometry,
And the planes they are always leaping from
The shopping mall to the sea.
Paper airplanes are scattered everywhere and Easter eggs, and
I have hidden mirrors to hide my scars;
And aren't the alligators ululating to the f-ing
Stars-
There is school tomorrow, but I have better greens
Effluvious though colorful up in the playground of My lonely orange tree;
And I will go to them instead, and without eyes
Looking give them my airy hickies:
I know I will, and I won't even miss the bus;
I'll be tom sawyer in my fiberglass canoe,
I'll fish for blue gills and drool over girls from Latin class- I know I will,
And I'll drink my fill towards dusk, following the slight
Banishments of otters on the slow and ochre rust;
And latchkey onto thick blue crepuscule;
And then smoke plantations in the stars- so thankful
To be blanketed in the balmy reservoirs which Hide all of my delinquent scars.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Basins Of Those Clouds

This bed of pearls sequesters
The little eels- the black urchins- the jewels
Of black eyes
And thunderstorms underneath the busses:
The axles spent on cinderblocks:
The housewives of midnight and liquored joy,
Going down to the shadows
To French-kiss their princes- their used car salesmen,
And the boys who play in the field:
And then all of the rest of the way you will find
Me alone and spun out with the dwarves,
And counting on my fingers nearer a nest of Coral snakes who need
My help and the wings between my fingers-
Like raindrops upon the nipples of
The playground-
Like sand dollars in the mailboxes: to skip
School,
And fly above the playgrounds: to get out of hear,
And kiss other lovers who were never Allowed to swim with me, or to swim with
You in the busied amphitheatres of commercial
Airliners, yawning silver wings and booming
In the basins of those clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Bays Of Your Horses

News to the plagiarisms:

The pinwheels are still spinning around both hemisphere's

Of your favorite daughter's lips—

Yet now she is up in Ocala, with her favorite father

And her favorite horses—

Too young to know how he undressed each other—and so

The moon enlarges like a dying organ

Before your birthday—

And the few months we spent together at the fruit market

Dying,

As I pretend that the fireballs fall down from the sky—

And I remember holding you and kissing your lips

Around the playground of the albino alligator—

Not knowing of our séances, though

He was in a séance himself—

And you loved him, bush-wacked beneath the apple orchards,

Sometimes collecting your skin like an all-too-aware snake,

And crawling back to,

Dressing in your reptilian apiary, while I had a house for you

And all of the gold you could carry—

It wasn't enough—a thousand songs were not enough—

Neither would be just as many oceans—

The drunken nights carrying your echoes to me,

As the knights that would have had you drown in the bays of your Horses.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Beating Shade

Saying the séance to the séance
Says with all of the will of a marionette
Propped as a doll
Against the sea—she will come and she Will lull,
And the moon will pull her up against
The sky scrapers for a better view—
If it is his wish—
A silver knight will see her there—
A silver fish in a silver dish—
And the airplanes spinning around her,
Silver-winged mobile in the swelter
Of the paraffin sun—
And she will slink and pray and hold her
Head between her hands
And think about all of the time that
She lost-
Or she will yawn, and there will be no more
Time for the narcolepsies of such pretty things:
And she will cast off all of her beauties
And sleep open mouthed in the beating shade.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Beautiful Sea

I am telling you to teach yourself the truth—
To stay there and listen
To all of the footsteps of students, even if there
Are no echoes—
In the rain, there are tears even if there are No angels—
As your nights return with their silence—
Ferris wheels of a mute carnival—
And the art of a homeless vagrant—search for
The barrel of your heart to strike a fire—
To be surrounded by your warmth
As he drinks from the bottle—the weather
Making it more difficult for the tourists
And the automobiles to proceed nearer to you—
As some swimming without any shelter in The beautiful sea.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Beds Of Her Grandparents

And then there was a chimney:
Didn't you see her, long columnar like
Christmas in the forest:
Everything else covered by the snow,
But she was still a claret trinket the wolves
Lathered worshipful, pantheistic,
And the children practiced around her
When she was a husk when the leaves fell,
And the mountains wizened up so that
They only knew the smoke of the forests,
Or the cerulean pots lost in their bosoms
Like the girls from the long abandoned
High school- until all of her trinkets were Scattered in the forest
And yet her pagan hopes arose to proposition
Airplanes, or they floated into other worlds
In the beds of her grandparents-
And the stars were just the sparks and burs
Shed off by a fox up there as he Continued dancing.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Better Instruments

Drinking in a church of Apaches- not Navajos-
Face scarred and changing like my body,
My grandfather is in peril in Tennessee, already wanting to go:
And my parents sleep in a bed of wallow fire
160,000 acres long, praying to their horses, and feeding
Them green embers, like jewels to the unjinged mouth of Serpents,
Until even rivers flow up to them, asking for more;
And the stewardesses hang low from their airy porticos,
Showing pearly breasts, and challenging them that this is all:
And soon I will go to sleep in this church too:
My three dogs sleep outside like pages- I sleep underneath two Castanets,
And the world is a natural disaster in love with my body-
It is at first soft, until it is sure that it has overcome what I know,
And then it enjoys it monuments like cenotaphs atop of me,
The way crepuscule eats a mailbox until all of the lavender unfurls
Blooming in campfires of my uncle's circus,
And then its sequined vests teases around the sky, stirring up
And making girls I once knew crazy and infatuated with the promises
Of an over easy quest, just so he can make love to them
Repeatedly- overjoyed, zealous- until the trumpets stampede
The sky, reveling the cavalry outfitted and running wild
In the better instruments made to take over the world.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Blackness Above The Sky

Unequaled in my parallels as to be a road
Going on through the sagebrush and bric-a-brac
As never to be untouched by Attributing avenues, gaining only bad luck by flying too
Fast and running over owls
Dinning on the previous carnage I should have Foreseen:
Above, no waves glistening through the caves,
Baited without echoes, maybe Indians are hiding out in Them still,
Selling plastic bones; but I am too tired and weary to stop:
There is only one home:
On and on past the ravaged gardening of chalk,
Past the milky flakes of the emolliations of the failed:
There seems to be a woman's heart somewhere in the blackness
Like a loveless moon,
Saving herself only for one who can meet her in that blackness
Above the sky,
In that place that by my very nature I am not allowed to return
To:
Pressed like an over determined salesman to my wheel,
I ply the night hoping for something that cannot even apply:
The avenue is weary, alone,
Nothing I have seen is ever returning, I must continue.
The moon is in the blackness above the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Bosom Of The Woods

Simplicity on an abandoned road speaking of
The thoughts left amongst the shells,
As the sunlight weeps down through the vines
Caressing the pine trees—
And strolls in falls across the stolen bicycles
In a heap of collected metal frames—
Like dye-cast forgeries once belonging to a little Boy's heart—
In the next yards over, housewives become Distractions in their elements—and the days
Yawn in the myriad glows—like lions as Sweet as watermelon—
Pacifists of the solar systems singing in the echoes—
Open cathedrals make a nude retreat for
The plagiarists and the tomb-boys—
Who come here, sweaty knuckled—
Here is the very time for their survival—
A beautiful kaleidoscope in the bosom of the woods
That shall never be revealed.

In The Breathings Of Your Vicinity

Muse come from Mexico: I saw you today,
Your camouflage still brown:
The pennants of the fronteras body yet blowing youngly:
Having birthed two children
Who will have their next two birthdays in the next
Two months, consecutively:
Alma: the fairgrounds for my heart, beating the green sweats
Of venal playgrounds- of ripening graveyards:
Oh muse across the strange lines of another tongue:
If found you here knocking again:
I wanted you to be a pilot- I told you while we drove to See your family's lawyer, that you would look good in an Airplane:
And then I took you to lunch, and home again to make love:
Like a wish spent on a journey, you then returned across
The rose bushes where the Jockeying coins are spent, like gold bleeding from the satchels
Of something running away:
And the caves were closed to tourists: and the windows took
On inward lights,
Like a beautiful snow was falling inside: and I couldn't move:
I was a statuary turned to life in the breathings of your vicinity:
And I realized so many things far away from college,
With the brown light living in your eyes,
Casting upon me; and your lips trespassing on my ears:
Even if I wouldn't live right now- It wasn't all impossible,
And you were not that far away.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Brown Webs Of The Pond

Soft in the brown webs of the pond,
Leaking from the roots of the cemeteries,
Airplanes who get up and yawn—
Like lions in their estuaries—
And the roots of the tinfoil gods crinkle with
A sunlight amidst the palms,
All of the youngish boys pretending at trying
Not to be in love with them—
Soft-shelled tortoises nibbling at the ankles,
As an ancient mother holds her new born
Up to the messages of the skies.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Candy Graves

In the candy graves of your mother's breast feeding
You will lie down,
And your eyes, yes your eyes, will close
From looking at too many birds;
The highways will encircle you,
For you yards and yards—
And it seems as if you have come so far,
But this is just the preamble to the flea market,
To the graveyard,
As the housewives return home,
Matriculating after the fourth of July,
And the sky feels alright even though it is full of Clouds—and your super heroes cannot even save you
Even though they are so far away.

In The Caracoles Of Our Homes

Landscaped in the caracoles of our homes,
Like benchmarks in whatever kind of weather exists for
The day,
I find it hard to look up as stone, even when the butterfly
Lands on me;
She is all brown, and her eyes are the ideal color of
That:
She seems to swallow me, as she does every other boy:
She seems to swim around me in the waves of sunlight,
Her limbs busily cleaning,
Trying to keep busy as she asks me not to look at her;
And neither of us are perfect,
But we were built for the other, and to fit across bicycles,
And laughing as melodiously as some kind of Hikers going up the tranquil paths towards their deaths
In one final sun shower that has matted
The wild flowers and set the yellow jackets in their Wings
And the coral snakes on their bellies into some sort of Religious if apocryphal frenzy.

In The Chinese Theatres

In the zoo on Sundays,
I try not to think—speckled in the shade,
I drink in the sun—
Thinking of nothing is the best thing,
Failures put on hold,
Swans in the man made river
Look beautiful—
All of these captivated animals intermingling
With the housewives—
Born to shoplift from their own shadows—
I am drinking tequila I won from a locker
For a hundred and seventy five dollars—
Echoes brandished in the sheathes and Armpits that hang lower to the Light,
Like brandy licked by the tongue of a very Bold serpent:
Soon, tranquilized, I will fall to sleep—
Once again without any hope
Outside of the cabin where the warm people
Hibernate—
Special, with bold privileges in their cannons,
Wanting to come down but striking no
Compromises with their ever young helliums—
And warn out this way
While cradling their first born children—
And loving in the day-gloom ballrooms
Of the tangled ribbons of glassblown rivers—
Without the daylight or the moon,
Going down the passageways,
Drinking in the Chinese theatres of their misplaced
Atmospheres.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Churches Of A Holiday

When the windmills stop-
The silence of death: the waves do not move:
The fish seem to sleep:
They make a blanket of their gills,
And a teepee of their steps,
As we reside at their shoulders, trying to believe
Even though our grandparents are Gone
And scalped:
And the new flag only has the color green:
Grasshoppers lose their bodies
In the barely,
And so do their cousins- but their cousins
Are still beautiful
Beside the latchkeys of deer and foals
The wolves milk:
Reintroduced,
They are so careful now not to disturb anything:
They are so very careful:
The way sometimes intelligent fire steps
And gives its delicate promises to the fireworks
Held in the churches of a holiday we were all
Supposed to believe.

In The Classrooms Where Nobody Goes

Beautiful as a young woman lost in the Daydream of a boxcar between the bosoms of
The mountains—she might as well die here,
Like song birds collecting their hearts into the snow—
Their sweet voices failing to attract a mate—
So only now the echoes are calling for survivors—
Hibernations in the seeds of petrification—
Like babies in jars—and rubber chickens falling in love—
In the classrooms where nobody goes.

In The Clouds Of The Sky

Now what a daydream:

Now what a daydream in the world for a while—

Another chance through the forests—

Pistils of love

In a roller-rink for the apiary—

Smoking Ferris wheels become a metamorphosis through

The heavens,

Until it all takes an absolute while to cool and

Distillate:

$5 dollars of romance to watch her surrender to those

Flags:

Taking off in the middle of the day,

Forgetting to reimburse ourselves through the courtyards

Of our school-time daydreams—

Until she had her own children, hatched from underneath of

The webs of a crocodile,

And they were counting the dew drops of the minutes

For class to end—

And they were all getting up together and swearing to

Themselves:

So many words to remember, but only so many

Passages upon their ways home—

Like airplanes stuck in the clouds of the sky—□

In The Comely And Fragile Sorority

Imperfections latchkeyed from bliss,
And looking down the mouth of the lonely roads that Don't exist anymore:
Gone with kidnappers on blister some holidays:
Gone back through the bluish forts of incests where the tomahawks
Rest and the mountain lions underneath
The dwarf apple trees:
And little girls there no bigger than triangles, counting their Luck with the plums on their fingers,
Promising to undress and climb up to the pinnacle of The Christmas trees, or not promising another world;
And in here in the silence of my house:
Silence, and the lost bets of bobcats who spill their teal and milk
Across the tenements of the Atlantic:
Each wave a microscopic city of the appropriately disposed
And cuckolded;
With the horns of reindeer and moonstruck elk rising out of each
Caesura and crest.
And the other scientific names that come out of the habit of wandering
Far astray from the ordinary path in the forest,
Like Goldilocks, like Red Riding Hood, and the other sisters
In the comely and fragile sorority who should have known better.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Cornea Of A Hurricane

Whatever beauty there is- you are here now-
Like a house filled with a sad family in an uneasy
Cul-de-sac- that I sometimes remembered you
In- in Saint Augustine-
Thinking from my parents' basement if I couldn't Move there- to be surrounded by teak and Thrift stores as eternal as you and I-
As you were serving drinks in the cornea of a hurricane,
As the rattlesnakes made their hut around the cured bones
Of a family dog-
With the moon out the same time as the sun, trying
To survive, and thirsting off his light meandering through the School buses- Well, those days were just as lazy as You are now- and you can throw a fit, or eat a plum:
But I've put a hundred dollar bill in your back pocket
In the cooler where we used to work together for My uncle: Now never mind the thieveries in their Satellites- or how they throw their dice over the rock Gardens where the unlucky rabbits cannot Breathe- and never mind the street lights over the church
Way up north where we never came together- or the Highways that took you so far overnight to where you
Lay beside me in another ideology across the train tracks-
But let me kiss your auburn limbs- and buy you
Chocolates and roses- and let me call you my muse
From time to time, as the waves don't care about dying.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Crowd

Imperfection at the sport of angels
All a wonder downed at the bottomed angles
At the circus,
Like racehorses beneath the midgets sunbathing to
The clouds—
Perfection in their hubris, and rosy bottles
To their lips
While flies whisper of carnal and feral love:
That is their perfection,
A two week's bliss of I love you's and candied
Apples
And then to move on amidst the crowd
Of sinister confections and saintly business—
Another quarter in their pockets,
Their lover another stranger in the crowd.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Crypt Of Utopia

If everything was better,
I could take off work,
Or I could cut hair for a living;
But now it is impossible to be occupied
Not ever having learned math
Or memorized the periodic table-
Imagine if the country hummed like a chorus
Of wasps again,
And the neat choreographed segregations didn't Bleed,
Or that gray wasn't the new color in our flag;
And I imagine deliberately unbuttoning her shirt
Speckled by the ancient canopy in the cemetery
The fence around us high enough to Keep us in the crypt of Utopia,
And this should be our gothic Eden
Where the insects philosophize in the lips and Beards of the old hemlock professors,
And sting her breasts like little flecks of Homeopathic telegraphy
While the Mississippi trickles off in our left ear,
And our eyes hypnotize us simultaneously
Until our bodies swim to the steady rolling of Traffic and over us,
Bright smoke and shadows, the orgy of angels
Singing and laughing,
And the humorists orate in long, effluvious
Folk verses,
All the time they are building newer skyscrapers
Over our wonderful séance,
Never realizing who is now our king,
Or that death has sucked all the sweetness
Of the flower as the Snake has sucked the yoke,
And the bouquet is wilting on the table to the Home where there shall be no return.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Cushions Of My Most Amiable Of Skies

I took a lover to the mouth of the river:
You could see down to the bottom of its speckled liver;
And she hung upon me like a bulb
Of rosy weekdays; but I still walked back home through
The slender topiaries of this basilisk forest,
Searching for your eyes that defeated all of the actresses:
I seemed to concur you well up from the stage of My premature blindness;
And you did come caressing like the queen of my bodies
Slave;
And now I suppose I must say something beautiful
Concerning the stones of my mother's rock garden,
But I never really knew them nor cared how carelessly you
Misconstrued them:
Now it seems as if I am just taking my car down in the Tunnels in between Arkansas and Missouri; and now you
Are rising up like a paper dove who is burning;
And your eyes also have your daughter's eyes; and they rise
Together through the friendly skies,
Serving in them to anyone they like; and the truancies of Never ending boys salute you from the never ending rooftops
In the cushions of my most amiable of skies.

In The Dark Locis Of Bedrooms

All of the silence that Alma gives me today,
Finds me cultivating myself, a gray landscaping for A flooding grave:
Even though as always the cars come, seething, spinning
Their wheels,
And making their wishes over the head rooms of the Roofless yards;
And it is painful to breakdown, realizing all of the scars
Drop you so far away
From Mickey Mouse, like Dorothy up amidst the stratosphere, Pirouetting while asleep,
In the dance classes of lighter than air angels,
While their fathers fence beneath the smoldering eyes of the Stand to for cats
Who seem to smile as if they know it all:
And I am sure that they do,
Even as the passageways tend to run down until there are no
More monsters,
And in the dark locis of bedrooms without incest,
The heroes diminish without candle light until they are without Anymore need for themselves.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Dark Secret Echoes

Put me to the lips of a cave like a thrush cavorting
With the whirlwind:
Put me above the heads of the male tourists who Are always trouncing down into you
Like a washing machine:
Going counterclockwise with their tongues as if they Were trying to retrieve
Family pets, or the vulgarities of the mailboxes:
Put me above you on a spoke,
Like the special poison of a dirge; and I will see deep Down into the rich deep concavities which are inside
Of you,
Which you put to bed at night, which you slip out of so Easily and so fine to make a bath of love
In the glowing aloe while the rabbits are Dampened and sated;
And as your trailer yawls and hems, and the rattlesnakes
Brush like ribbons around the sinkhole of your eyes:
Put me there as well with you and your children,
Put me on a shelf over the television,
Or in the tiny miniscule kitchen that you can so easily and So bravely leap fully blown out of,
For this is your night and I am but one infantile star
Reaching down and peering for hours into the dark
Secret echoes that seem to make you whole.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Darkness Between The Trees

Lands are populated high and low,
And airplanes make love and prowl in the darkness
Between the trees
While their stewardesses are sleeping, and singing about
The knees,
While their captains are turned out,
And the street lights are doused, and the greatest of all miseries
Blankets the cages of the beasts and the empty habitats in which
When the world was much bluer and sang like
The incests of rivers, we walked and I held her brown skin;
And her eyes were just as dark and saturated with hidden promises
As mine.

In The Darkness Of The Theatre Many False Things Who Bloom And Forage

Scrub pines
And Ajax,
Ruby Red
Grapefruit
And Thumbtacks-
A lost
Shopping list.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Daycares Of Everywhere

Broken in the arch of rainbows while I grind my teeth
And wait for another quarter to spin
My lunch in the gumball machines of pac-man or into another
New euphoria of this or that hallucination of Romance while taking off my cap:
And it all spills away like the lunchroom of tears or chickens
Over the caesuras of lunchrooms or midday forays
While the fighter pilots lie down and touch themselves
After the four colors of whatever primary
Nurseries that fail to premier and then all there is this:
In the lines who cavort over the short shaves of destiny and the Long formicated courts who someone lead all the ways up
To the blonde and justified summits of whatever gods that were Always there; and failing to premiere in their bathrooms their Resolve to appear just as they always was:
Naked and justifiably ululating, communicating with the planets
Of the chimps and the butterflies, in the daycares of everywhere, Overspilling and lactating over the continents who have Come together over the potlucks of all the just who have always
Was.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Daydreams

All of the day falling through your summits while
The watermelons keep cool in your wells:
I write you love letters,
But your valentines read what the hell:
And this has been the standoff for so long, circulating,
Basking in the epiphanies of the roadside Rodeos:
I loved you, even double chinned with love:
And it takes so long to remember
The shadows of our
Doppelgange of twins- as my young, young parents
Delivered me up into another high school above
Or beneath the clouds and tried to tell me things
That I could not possibly ever prove:
But there they were, already rounded
Like resurrected Easter eggs: but there they were,
In the pretty fakeness of another Disney World we all
So happily traveled up to:
Somnolence in the busses of any catastrophe- starving,
Counting the yokes drooling from any open mouths:
And there they were,
I suppose starving on any Christmas and you couldn't
Figure out if you loved me,
But the flight of the airplane was almost done-
As our Christmases floated over the skies of flea markets,
As I supposed to myself in the daydreams I had never won.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Deepest Houses Of The Deepest Forests

In my ganemede was a transom; and of course it was in Outer space:
All of the jockeys took their positions and settled into the dawning
Of another race;
And it wasn't like this, if it was at all: it was just the silence of An adolescent canoe going past the emptiest hall:
Because you were all in your classes, and learning all of your things,
While
Alma was kissing the opulent wattage of angels, and passing
Through the bilingual rains:
This is where you go, Alma: this is where you fit into a story,
Where you become the virgin in the grotto for your children;
And this is where you always are burning,
Burning:
While the airplanes pass out and the housewives pass out and all of
The stories they have been gossiping about you finally go
To sleep,
And you wake up and bloom, and the waves bow,
And I can finally kiss your brown lips and seem to slumber as deeply
As a family of grizzly bears held up in the deepest houses
Of the deepest forests.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Divinity Of Morning

There will soon be a storm, where her tiny brown hands
Will come hunting mine,
Wanting to survive, while the waves play out like a nursery of Carnivorous birds:
And Alma doesn't want to make anymore adulterous fieldtrips
To the museums or the universities
Because she finds them boring; and they are tucked so far Away into my yesterdays, anyways:
That I cannot remember how they affected me, how their Bicycle thieves stole away with midnight the jubilation
In the panting transportations of girls I lived with who
I didn't even love;
Just while the butterflies last for only awhile, and leaving their Husks like flags over the empty cannons of coquina forts
Left alone even by tourisms,
As the moon makes love in the orchards: how will I ever explain
This to her,
While I wait for her- my Alma, to return:
That it all was beautiful, but left alone to the dying elements
In the highest rungs of the smallest things: how might it come Down again, to bless me in the divinity of morning
With the loving winged twins of her burning lips.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Doldrums

When the stewardesses are into the sky again,
What time will it be?
And when will they ever be coming home again,
Like mothers and grandmothers
Finally remembering me,
When I am already lost down in the bosoms of
The sand dunes
Where the panthers are talking'
The unicorns are whispering to the mermaids
Gossiping over what the billboards are advertising'
The stagecraft of clairvoyance'
The children become lost from the school again,
Like ripe fruit gallivanting down from the armpits of The tree'
Trying to bloom their burry citrus near the lips of
The cypress trees,
Where the werewolves are snoring
And the angels are purring'and the sun is like a
Drowsing commercial in the doldrums of late night t.v.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Early Morning

Bodies burn like sugarcane, the food and rum
Of the teenage gods, the bombardiers
And the cheerleaders:
While I saw you out on the red oval resurrecting your Un thought of children from sweat of unhealthy
Jocks;
And I remember your womb like a runway that I
Would have liked to have run down:
If I had been your son, I would never have had the need
To have loved you, the way that I love you now,
To get everything wrong and all of these misspelling;
And when I look up at you from my seat above the Earth,
Underneath the chin of the mother goddess, you just ask Me what I want to drink while you go on to serve your
Other business men;
And I drown after you take the air away, or I continue writing
Like a blind and thoughtless man,
Even while I can hear the funhouse springing in your bed,
And even in the early morning on the day that you gone and Done got wed.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Echinopsis Of A Busied Dream

Poem in the echinopsis of a busied dream—
This is all of the stuff now that the neighborhood or Wherever is laid all out—
This is the land I believe that unicorns come from
And airplanes all of their obnoxious art:
Or this is just another way to breathe in the air of Tomorrow—the fairies are all gone and the fairgrounds
And the goldfish under them—
This is the art half-forgotten or puffed up from the Mailbox—into another estuary swallowing itself into the Bluegills of its moonbeams—
Another cauldron meant to beautify the volcano
Through the pieces of its vanishing art:
Days that look like this,
Beaten around the mouth as around the breast—
Flowers that pistil into the ever present fanfares of the Aqueducts of the blindly sublime—this is the Same strange arrowhead that tickles the truth through
The porticos—as the selkies of the mermaids submerge,
Coughing to themselves,
Enamored of the same corsages that forgot to remember themselves
So many ages ago—and in their gardens swim as an example,
While you looked so beautiful, as the pools glistened
And picked up on the echoes of the memories that I guess I'll never know.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Echoes Of Gills And Leaves

The pageantry of her eyes calling
Like a crisp dollar bill
While the sun and the ceiling fans are snoring—
There she is in a clip of stars
Beholding the fanfare of her sisters—
Girls in the silky forests and the crenulated waves—
I think I know who they are—I've seen them
From the fort even though they always
Seem so far away—
Taking up all of the space that they please,
But hidden—lapsing in the shadows—
Brilliance of copper bodies reanimated—
Their bodies like fans—
Breathing in the echoes of gills and leaves.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Embers Of Jackrabbits

As it was in the embers of jackrabbits, I took off, Became the epitome of racehorses that didn't
Have to follow
Except for the in the shadows of their own
Shoulders—
And the night was enlarged and engorged into
A movie theatre,
And the space rockets took off by Their innumerable waves
While my very own wife never
Had to think again over the next weekend of China—
And the moon and the satellites prayed the Prettiest of the pretty girls straight
In—
And straight in to their graves—
Rhyming as the shouldn't do
As long as if
They wanted their pretty savior to
Be pretty saved.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Empire Of The Sun's Playground

Poetical devices leaping for their only god,
Hoping the darkness of the overcast blackout
That he is still there throwing bird crumbs
To the thorn bushes
Against the quietly segregated dorms I used
To deliver to in my old truck;
They don't give a thought to failure as they come
Suckling like piglets on my fingers,
Like tapdancing soon to be mothers open bloused
On a stage for blind men,
Still hoping that she is there in the tramping crowd, desperately certain that they will find her because She loves them;
But she cannot even see the wayward children, the Freakish carnival daycare that I lead around,
Affecting more scars, becoming further isolated from
The rounds of cheeky firemen:
She cannot love them when she is fully situated in his Arms, when she can look the racing hard-edged world
In the eye and give it a good run for its money.
She has no use for such devices,
And thus they escape her, they run through her like the Finest elements yet understood by the scientists who Would define her by them,
Giving proof to the atheist and revealing the glinting Epitaphs of dead explorers elbows bat winged like the Washington Monument in the hallucinatory dunes riling
Just outside my backyard window,
Thirsty and husking in the empire of the sun's playground.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Empty Playgrounds

Late again at night I go down into the bottle
To reminisce with the genie who never gave me anything
That I wanted,
And the words crumble away like a papier-mâché Ferris wheel
In a sad god's shower,
And the grapes tremulate celestially above the forever gurgling lips
Of purple foxes,
And you can feel everything that never got what it deserved,
And you can hear the airplanes all too eagerly leaving town,
Even as new saints are discovered in the empty playgrounds
Where I guess we once believed.

In The End

Lighthouse mating with a Ferris Wheel,
Stayed nudity revealed to the nomadic contraptions
Caracole in their whimsy
While bicycles lay dismissed atop of rooftops
Beneath a sky of clay
That seems to be falling down impregnating the belly of
The ocean- stars that dim and pulse speaking
Their codes to the blindness
Through the orchards to which the valleys sing,
Both with their own wombs, lonely,
Fertile and overstacked beside the little towns of Their brown men in the middle of nowhere
It happens- and cars are ants:
In the sky, lions feeding on airplanes until they Tumble down to light the candles of winsome birthdays-
As the manmade lights fall in love with nature,
And she kisses them, and turns around blindly,
To send them off with a sword for the forest-
To disappear in the end.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Enormous Room

The good, good teacher said that
Her favorite molecule was red;
And we all lived in the enormous room
While Zeta loomed
Until Kurt Cobain was dead;
And we played 4-square and listened to
The dead:
Oh yeah, jump yip: all the rats are skipping
Ship:
And her lips were red,
And there were clouds in the sky,
And winged pus$ies- Oh yeah, jump ship,
All day long at a steady clip;
And the cormorants circle the yellow buses
Before doom, like doves on strings-
Around a junior high school tomb-
I could never look her in the eyes, and the teachers
Said things I wish they hadn't
Until the days were almost over and I trounced
Out to play video games all afternoon with my Blue eyed Jewish brother;
After we played 4-square in the enormous room
Where all the soldiers were triaged from exploring
The higher grades, the flattened esplanades of Their daddy's golf courses-
And she road horses in the enormous room
And the red molecules floated like envious doves
On strings- and I sang alone in my room,
To a crooked pestilent rood:
Oh yeah, jump ship, why does she always shoot
From the hip,
And Curt Cobaine was dead,
And I pissed my pants and read Hardy Boys and John Wayne- the flag rippled like something sadly annoyed;
And the good, good teacher's favorite molecule was red
In the enormous room.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Everglades Of Your Overrun Soul

Christmas ornaments strung out and smashed
When they were supposed to be up on stage
Garlanded and thrashing for
The miracle play- and you said it was going to Be a good show,
But now all my words are wrong- they are unconcerned,
And she doesn't love them-
I am the sort of thing vanished into the narcolepsy of Life's deception and there you go back and forth with Your new ghosts cheating into cars;
And it's not something I like to envision:
That I should have to vanish or even die, while the Alligators and saber toothed tigers remain, insouciant
In their own sort of passion play,
And you've taken his name, the way it rings around your Bosom like a fresh areolaed paint job,
And I am not a bad man, but I am not beautiful,
And I suppose that is why I should have to die and leave
The stage halfway through the show,
Without the audience's sympathy or any note of fanfare,
Just another tiny island overrun with spikenard and cormorants
Deep in the everglades of your overrun soul.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Everyday Constellations

The song ends like this—don't you understand—
They don't open their lips again—
On their mascaraed of a parade, they go down into
The shrinking land,
Of mothers' lips and nursery rhymes—
Housewives in the nourishments of the feathers
Of their headdresses, go out into
Their front yards just so that they are observed by the Sun—the forever voyeur—
Or for at least as long as they live—
Climbing those higher than high daises—
Drunken on the spirits of the denouements of
The earth—as the littlest of people follow their own
Personifications,
As the kings light off their retarded fireworks—
And until it is just a jungle of anybody's worth—
Spirits that flit light palm fronds above the earth—
Come down as dying wishes over
A Mexican fair—
Languishing in the bereavements of traffic jams
In the everyday consternations of how life
Ever so happily brings you down.

In The Eves Of His Quieted Sort

I drink more liquor like a lucky seahorse drinks of its Velveteen sea;
And perhaps I love you, if this is the worth of my soul,
And I am returning to myself in the bodies of This great depression of soft blue oceans, and all of these Wrong words:
And I wanted so long ago to step through the nigh toward
You with the conviction of really penitent heroes,
But to not tell any lies, that wasn't the boy you were looking for Anyways:
So you make love and mouth off, and who knows what you
Do to your modern day guy:
This is just my own next day failure anyways: This is the last Poem towards this early morning solitude;
This is the banshee taking it easy and pretending she is just
A torn kite, just a little shrivel of rag having a good time
Strip teasing the sun:
This poem isn't about Erin, or what she never did to me, you Understand: Nothing I have ever done for her was ever about her,
While the boys pile up underneath her and have a good time
Sucking the lichen of her stalagmites; and yes tonight I am
That quiet sort of god who rests in the eves of his quieted sort
Of epiphany and waits doing the best that he can Saying all of these ungodly things just trying to conceive
Or disprove her love and her love making for her sort of any other man.

In The Exhibits Of Wingless Animals

The entire classroom stands up and yawns:
It seems that it is time to go
Even though it is just the beginning of the day—
But shouldn't we go,
Just to be sure—instead of saying The Pledge of Allegiance to the Flag—
Shouldn't we go out of doors and across the streets—
And even over canals—
To light off illegal fireworks off of neighbors' roofs—
Then sing sea shanties to the first evidences
Of the nuclear moon:
It is what Walt Whitman asked of us—to join his Song in the brotherhood of the workplace—
To coalesce our senses alongside Sea horses and weathervanes—to find a truce for Ourselves outside the voids of sports stadiums,
Ignoring the monuments of our heroes—
To ride bicycles to flea markets on our weekends—
And to glance up at the moon when our bellies
Are full of stolen dinners and stolen rums—
To listen to the nocturnal wonderments of
The absolute heavens perfumed by the nocturnal
Bouquets while the housewives make their Tamed love in the exhibits of wingless animals indoors.

In The Extinct Romances Of A Christian Valentine

Do you remember the bicycle clutched to the Cursive edge:
Not waiting to go anywhere,
And waiting for nightfall—
The beautiful death of infants,
And her parents to come home to her—
And the shopping malls filled up with
The birth of Christmas—
And rainbows apexes of their own surmises—
All in yellow surplus,
Harrowed of their own realizing:
Courts of virgin acrobats—
And the tomorrows of pitfalls and search warrants:
A beautiful curtain called to her room,
Done in by a poisonous mermaid
Or an asteroid—
And the sky all of a yellow nimbus,
And the mariposas birthing clouds in the extinct
Romances of a Christian valentine.

In The Eye

You breastfeed your daughter in the hedgerows of Dear gypsum
In a still life beside the unruly stream where Joe's
Brother drowned.
Then at night when I drive to the movie theatre,
I see you there as well,
Sharon,
Luxuriating beside the very same waters as white as the Housewife of Bath,
But your daughter has grown and is playing jacks
And eating wild huckleberries:
And there is maybe an airplane or a helicopter over your Left shoulder,
But I know it is only a hallucination, and like an unwanted Tattoo it has nothing but Superfluous meaning;
And I curl my toes like cats tails in the darkness,
And I bite the inside of my cheek for you as you skin a deer;
And you play pinball, and you are very adept at Everything you set your mind on;
And in the next vision you've constructed a swing set;
Your daughter is even older than you are,
You look like sisters:
You are studying the periodic table: Your husband has a cane
And an eye patch- There is a sense that you've all been Stealing things to survive:
The river has sunken like a precious vein underground,
And there are worrisome musics in the darkness, and maybe wolf's
Eyes;
But everything is bright around you:
I suppose that is the photosynthesis you've always had in the Girls bathrooms of your jaw structure;
And I just want to fly away and partake in the feast of your nectar;
Like a little butterfly in the little patches of soot
Kicked over from your picnic the rains seemed to destroy;
But then I see you again at some reststop along another very different
Rose, catching you out of the corner of my vision
When I couldn't stand to look myself in the eye.

In The Eyes Of Your Unappeasably Beautiful Lawn

This is delicate to talk about, of all things-
The most important that I want to take your spirit
Out of its forlorn and social habitat,
Make you want to say new things-
Speak in tongues and caracoles of cut-throat trees:
Down on my knees,
Worship you and sacrifice leaves to your
Teak-bowl knees:
I say, I say, I say: Please-
Start drinking with me the new liquors you either
Fear or never think about,
Let me take you out of the classroom of your chummy
Louts,
And go down for a ways, passing unnoticed through
Each of these wash-basin days,
Taking down the streams of cadillacs like Chinese
Junks,
Speak to alligators and steal their trunks;
Or just tonight, under the gibbous moon- let me make A milky smooth movie out of your Thighs,
Let me pan what amusement I can get off your distilled Body, the other old men have been looking at
And working on for so long:
Let me put one unopposable meat hook underneath
Your delicate lingerie;
Or, hey,
Let's just sing for a tune of a song,
And watch the yellow school buses pass for so long,
And skip our heels up into the sky,
Which is just the lover of sea-life a homeopathic
Cenotaph, an ancient god whose gone up
And died-
Who lives forever, I fear, laying so gone in the eyes of You unappeasably beautiful lawn.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Failing Memories

Awash in the glories of a hidden sanctuary,
The sun beating down its feisty gold,
I carried you out into the waves and your tiny brown
Body conformed to me, having to trust because You could not swim,
As afterwards I settled down with you and kissed your Mouth in the shade of a shelter,
Making out while the lifeguards were turned away towards
I see that I compared your beauty to, Alma,
As we drove toward her: calm as
A hospital that has gone to sleep cradling all of its wounded
Men,
Like a blue kite who has found a gentle elephant to kid too;
And your beauty is still there:
Motionlessly building, counting the unbearable stars
Even while your consciousness lies away,
Cradled in your senses, maybe remember Mexico and all of The steps that it took to come here again,
Like a butterfly who decided to change one last time
And to return to the homes of its shed bodies, following the Footpaths unrequitedly printed in the unfailing memories
Of my love, knowing that yourself is all that it concerns.

Robert Rorabeck

In The First Place

What's up my girl,
You who are like the dragon I've tamed
And put to sleep in crags
Liked crèches of deeply wooded artichokes,
And I don't ask you to call me,
Or even give me the slightest wind to blow
My heroic sails:
All the sea monsters are tamed,
And I am not bragging:
The sea is in fact grass, sod well planted by
My fists and swords,
And all that cool stuff, and I hear the rumors
Of criers and bards that you are Fully breasted and warm in your brilliant Halls,
And you have gotten the wall paper you have Wanted,
And the chandeliers. Men patrol your borders
On fire-engines and clipper ships,
And it is like you have gone on fast ahead into Another century,
Inventing the forge of ire and the spelling
Machines,
Now that I have cloven all the fears that used
To keep dreams from denting your pillow,
And the sky above your tender curls
Is always a brilliant cerulean bonfire
Signaling that everything is well
And that you are with child, and forgotten what a Paladin I once might have been
When I first came meaty fisted into your dilapidated Bedroom
And smote that unseemly roe curling, curling like
So many children who you should have never put Your hand out to feed from the darkness
In the first place.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Forest

The places they leave me alone in are as white
As snow—

They don't seem to believe themselves, but go on forever,
As dogs get lost in the forest,
Until all that is beautiful is over.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Furrows And The Littered Ruts

We're in Parkland, which trumps even Wellington:
The people are bigger and smile affluently: They drive around
In crashing space-ships, or they have entire China sets
For knees and joints. I swear, one can get rich off them with Just tips: I have! I am rich enough to swoon into a blue-collar
Home, to drink domestic beer, to clown around with niggard-sure
Dwarfs with bruised lips in funny cars: I could never see me
Parents again, or serve the middle-class. How swell, to swoon
Like that, to give up on her eyes, to downcast into Chevrolets:
I loved, I loved her until the store was closed and she grasped
His crotch while looking at me; she took it out and slung it around-
It smelled like horrible perfume; it had the right of away, so long
And it bent in neither direction, but I could go away from them:
I do not need to look her in the eyes either way, to see what she Is packing. Suited in my scars, I could go down these jaunting
Truths, if there is any salvation in my apocrypha, to sojourn
Into the jubilant cadence of clean pools and baseball diamonds
After hours in the dun and allergic mists; to rhyme the way I choose,
With my dogs howling, busting up the night. Oh so, she might say,
Looking at me either approvingly or with condescension, the foreplay
Of that ancient rut: I wouldn't give her my two cents or the permanence
Of such a high-class holocaust: But let her come in for two more weeks,
To see what I might get off of her and that husband of bitter-circumstance,
And I will see what it might prove; For I love her, and how she goes, like the rest of us, skipping like lip-blown tinsel through the day,
Only to end not so very long from now, in the furrows, and the littered Ruts.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Garden Of A Witch

In the garden of a witch and
The moon is a boat,
Fat as a tick:
I went over the wall to pick
Delicious fruit but
Was bewitched—
The hue of the night doesn't change,
But clusters of airplanes
Begin to appear.
Time seems to be going by
As my children grow up without me—
I remain frozen in exhibit
Trying to remember my College years
And my first loves that were
All false.
I suppose that I belong here.
And I imagine that my wife
Has finally learned how to Drive, but she never once
Thinks to come find me.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Gas Station

Wounds in the gas station,
And I have come this way before—
Looking beneath the airplanes touching
Down like falling stars,
Or exhausted—working class angels—
In words like fingerprints of Pornography,
I leave my traces of you during the grave shift
Over the preposterous tanks that seem
To forage beneath the burnt out hills,
And the Cyclops's of watch towers—
New words abandoning the once
Seemly valleys like mares
And beautiful women who have found
New firemen and heroes—
And there they are, piling into the movie
Theatres of the bedrooms—
Ready to close their eyes and awaken again
In their exhibits of wax bodies as their houses blissfully burn down.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Ghostly Cauldron Of Her Eternal Soiree

My dimes of civility should pay
For hours of blowing glass;
Then to look up from tall strangers
And fall in love with the prettiest
Girl behind stained glass:
This is my some kind of religion blowing
Like kisses from the key stone of
The overpass;
This is the dead fall in the ditches,
The donkeys bothered by spikenard and Cormorants;
And if my mother asked me, I would concede
That I can still fly,
But there would have to be some concessions;
I couldn't go outside anymore to foreplay in the Working class malls of Michigan or Indiana-
And she wouldn't raise anymore her eyes to my Broken promises, all the foreign flowers
Which have fallen out of the brotherhood of My hands
And gone to war:
She would have to fall in love with another,
Of this I am unwontedly sure;
She still stands there playing to the music boxes
Of my mind,
Like a stalwart young hiker pirouetting like
A dream in the tallest basins above tree line:
Eerie, and dancing and pleasing as a flower
Sipping its photosynthetic drinks,
Curling its lashes obnoxiously flirting, calling in The whip flashing lightning to come and Bask in the ghostly cauldron of her eternal soirée.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Glances Of Pinwheels

Boys made of wood showing up in the glances of Pinwheels
Painted in the sideshows of abandoned parking lots,
Like boudoirs for the shadows of an eclipsed
Moon:
Stand there gawking, drinking sour milk—
Each word stolen from the lips of the substitute
Was the penny candy for our ears—
And her bosoms an arcade
We stuttered coins over like wishing wells for the slender
Amulets of dragonflies and conquistadors:
After housewives vanished with the flood, we took to
The indoors—air-condition and ceiling fan
And popcorn ceilings high above
Rugs as tangles as cotton candy—
Like the memories of kindergarten of a kidnapped boy:
See him waiting in the graveyard of a shell—
Like the sticky sweetness of Eastern Waiting for the resurrection—
Somewhere abandoned to the baseball diamonds
And watermarked centerfolds of his old neighborhood.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Golden Dusts

Sun of an obnoxious quarry as we seem
To be laughing—
Open throated frog princes all of the way
Up to the chandeliers—
While my mother waits in some awful
Mockery of a Pieta—
And the lamps bloom in the gold dusts of
The mines—
Another song mimics the song bird's,
As the traffic becomes utterly confused—
Losing itself into the darkness—
The mailman apexes, but he is no excuse
To me—
Lamp posts lining the streets of my adolescents,
As wicked men travel home after
The fireworks' pageantry—
Licking their stolen wives' bodies of
An adulterous
Apiary.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Grass

Festooned by swooning song birds:
The ground crumbled by lopsided crowns-
Sea anemones, water grapes;
Places under the bus, the truancy of canoes-
How long does the otter hold its breath as it knows
Its craft,
What words doesn't it sing, held tightly to its Own chest:
Vestless, the world of housewives has no need for Windmill,
Buxom- Chablis on a quartz patio festooned by Omnipotent clouds and sunshines:
The rays burning through her childhood, heartstrings
Her bosom:
Her children play with the ants across the decorations
In the grass.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Graveyard At The Top Of The Hill

Call me over to where the sun is weeping
Lost in the woods but not far from Where your mother does her laundry:
She dreams she is in love with another man
But she will never leave her husband—
The houses where she has left her heart
Seem to evaporate
And the sea sings a song that cannot be sung:
It is so beautiful,
As the Mexicans dreams of Mexico in the flea
Market underneath the overpasses:
And I open all of the wounds I have for you—
The faithful pledges disembarking through the Wounds of our incinerated cathedral:
Where the boys and girls once kept their Thoughts of love until they were carried Away to sleep with the angels in the graveyard
At the top of the hill.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Greatest Opulence

Sweat of drills of bodies moving to and throwing,
Moving everywhere that bodies can think to go:
Like waves in the sea,
Like everything you could even think of:
Like kids on swings,
Or leaves coming unclothed, and the mountains sing
Their snows,
Doing everything that a body needs to know:
And maybe Marie ain't no good:
Maybe she moved away before she should:
Maybe or any other goddess never thought to need to look
Into my eyes,
Maybe they never opened what I needed from them,
Like the amusement gates of opal thighs;
So I sing for them, just as homeless and mobile as a stone
Above tree line,
Weeping always weeping for all the lusciousness he can See down beneath him,
But only speaking when there is a hell of a rainstorm,
When there is the greatest opulence that traffics in talky lightning.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Hallucinations

Open the windows of airplanes- and look
Down as if angels
In the parks, in the nudity of their swings-
And think of the joy that echoes
Up from the swollen armpits
Of those trunks-
And the runny entrails of honey that go
To waste amidst the pine trees,
As you dance before me, turning in the hallucinations
Of a windmill-
Of a Ferris wheel, as the final orchestras of
A summer day cloud over,
And we can sit in the cooling recesses with the Sleeping snakes,
To watch all of the housewives proceed back indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Heavens

I have a future and this isn't Disney
World:
All of my friends can be counted on one hand
That
I use to masturbate, and the crowd isn't so
Full:
There isn't a single person on the moon, and she Steals the light from the day,
Echoing up there in her boudoir of shadows,
Where less than a dozen suitors have been:
My dog farts in my little house,
And the television waits for commercials-
The otters slip through the slow cessations
Across the impossible bodies of Bicycles the truants have given to the canal
For reefs;
And come December we will be selling
Christmas trees again- with or without Alma-
Making love in the same old car,
Stealing away the oxygen of bumble bees,
With new birds migrating in the heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Heavens And The Choruses

You hurt me; and we have forts here where we don't have To grow up,
But we still have to sing; and I miss the idea of your communion-
And how you held your breath while you crossed the fronteras
And the other things that you could not sidestep on the move:
Alma;
And you tell me you will play with whomever you want to play with,
As long as they don't touch you, like conquistadors leaving their Prints behind stained glass:
Well, whoever he is, is a luck moth$rFucker and your children,
Well they still have mouths to feed, and places to grownup,
And horses to need: and they will go this way- and one day they will Have to stand over the grave of their mother-
And it will rain, and the sun with rise geriatric again like in a wheel chair
I pushed her; but they will never have to know
How I wished for her out in the autumn and on the arc of the swings:
Their mother- starving with her brown eyes a color that needed into
The world, and which I loved- and she loved me;
And we sang together and made love in the heavens and the choruses
That they will be oh so happy to never know.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Heavens Of Marriage

Do you know the English word for electric?
And that your father
Is in the bathroom
Right now
Doing carpentry- what
He is really doing
I don't know-
I am not smart enough to Know-
My own parents are Selling fireworks- not
Christmas trees
Right now-
The earth is but an egg in
A nest lying in the Heavens of marriage-

Robert Rorabeck

In The High Meadows Of Their Oh So Special Wars

How am I going to stop my heart head on
From picking all of these flowers,
In believing in Diana as the beautiful Bellefontaine
Of these woods;
Oh, the pain of sweet numbers, the euphoria of never Having to go to math class again,
Just playing half a truant out beside the lunch trucks,
Panhandling for Diana's sweet return,
Hoping for her handouts without really knowing who
She is,
Believing in who she is, whoever she is, and her Daughter, her daughter swimming in a nude sea
Biting her lip and hoping for pearls;
And I want to take both of them out to a really great lobster
Dinner and afterwards
Dinner rolls and drum rolls and we can go out into the street
And horses, and wild horses, like the flickering tongues
Of sunlight on the road;
And more rum! And then Shetland ponies and orange groves,
And we are almost all the way to the west coast,
And maybe I wont have anymore scars come morning;
And Sharon, and Sharon; and great causes, and dolphins,
And the word is just a bonfire burning up all of my origami,
And there is a smile on my face,
Because my hands are finally sleeping, and I have survived the War and realized that we are all out of star fruit, and Erin,
Sweet, Sweet, sweet, sweet Erin doesn't love me;
But she has never loved anybody; she didn't even love the mailman
As he came up stepping beside her and kissed the mezuzah she didn't Even have a thought that she shouldn't have;
And now the planes are touching down again,
And they are bringing home all the soldiers, like Sharon's
Father, like Sharon's father, who should have been wildflowers
Burning in the high meadows of their oh so special wars.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Hours Before

And any numbers of them are here too:
And they look up as the first light of day returns
So that they can now see what
They are doing- held over from school-
Their bright muscles the song birds of Evolving dwarves- their candlelight inside of Trucks,
Like luscious ribaldry tipping the pinpricks of Arrows inside quivers
Jostled through a woods that one can hear the Traffic besides:
It goes this way, and it goes that- while the stags
Molt the successions of their unnamed kings,
And the terrapin enjoy the foliage beneath them,
Their table lit my moonlight-
While the fairytales still slumber, their mouth drooling
Over unseen things deep in the hours before
They have to wake up and go to school.

Robert Rorabeck

In The House Where No Housewives Live

Keeping the routines of the dead,
I have beautiful women in bloom in my head;
They are the only color in my gutted soul,
But they are not real,
Not real, these spring-time gals;
And they are dancing and counting all the goods
They've stole from my mythological patio,
And some of them are real good at figuring out
The shared origins for our stories,
But they keep that to themselves; and their love,
Like the waves, always comes back to them;
They've kept me in so long, that I can't hardly go out
And look for more real, less affected girls:
I haven't been to barbeques or graveyards in so long,
I haven't seen the empirical sea, any evidences
Of god in nature- I haven't built my house in the woods,
Chopped wood near a lake, blistered my fingers on Wild huckleberries: These girls, they keep me jobless,
They give me enough time to go to the convenient store
To buy chocolate milk and two donuts;
They are gossiping like heady butterflies over my scars,
But it is their liquor which sustains my consumptive soul;
But it is not real,
The animals howl- fed but wanting something else,
And thus we go, in the house where no housewives love.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Illusions Of Her Forests

Pantheism in my symbols- up a creek, the birds
Are singing to other birds,
Singing to the weathers of the mountain:
She flies higher than them:
Flies over the schoolyards and the graveyards
And the carnivals of lonely men:
See her now tempting us- look up the skirts
Of her cathedrals:
She is a pretty woman you can get nosebleeds
Trying to summit- perpetuity of her embrace
In the longevity of my scars-
Hopscotch in the cinderblocks of her summits,
Time and time again- void in the Bouquet of her Buddhism's where the horses
Linger:
What will they eat but the stones- and I love
A girl from Mexico, as she lingers in the illusions
Of her forests,
Even though our heavens are absolutely the same.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Immense Daylight

Devoted to the cornices of tadpoles,
And this is the way we sing: the way I have been together
With the lips of female mouths,
Across the stamens of high school, and down the truancies of Exotic blue streets:
Most by myself without any help, and down those ways of sun,
My bones popping a rhythm to my flesh
Underneath the flag of sky that vagabonds,
An imperfect art that can be spoken to foxes who den underneath
Carports wayward of where the housewives are cooking;
And it must be wondered of the two which one is More alluring;
And then my mother in her shift in the carport of a small house,
The clouds building and swearing so much weather,
The apiaries singing like kidnapped children;
But even though I have smeared my bones over all of these places,
Your mothers children still sing to me when we are Alone Alma,
And you sometimes read the words which I sing to you,
The way a house cat wards of a rattlesnake while she is defending her Young across the cinderblocks atop of which the gold fish
Is wishing insouciantly and forever young
By the graveyards of the minutes, and by the sudden flashes unnoticeable
In the immense daylight by which we have sworn our mutual love.

In The Invalid Sky

A bodies still moves with the stream-
In the dulled actions a more glorified man might have Give a sky full of summers:
Now he hushes from the kitchen sink, and waits in Line at the canal:
The slow vision of his uncommonly stupid work
Takes him,
Across the hooks of hold overs and latchkeys,
Truants who have ditched the unimpressed
Cheerleaders,
And found their way alone down the easement
Against the cones of spent fireworks:
Here he rides, like a canoe of ribs, missing bits of Himself who have gone off to marry better men,
Anyways-
And this his delusion slowly peppered with the kisses
Of rummy ash hopefully shrouding the showboats
Of lovely angels and clandestined airplanes further up
In the invalid sky.

In The Joy As It Happens

Awakening in the joy as it happens to be Like goldfish swimming for the bourgeois-
And her ankles
Cenotaphs for the stars that are still moving:
And starships up there in the grapevines,
As she is lying down to let the Foxes milk her
As the headlights of the churches shine across her
With so little grace,
But there she is: crude- of blue paint beneath an Overpass,
And the turtle at her shoulder, coming from
The canal:
What will it say to her, and will they take shelter
Underneath a school bus,
Will she kiss him in time for metamorphosis
Or dinner:
Will she change for me as well, and how will we Lie together then
Making numbers with our thumbs, my elbows
Stitching over her a penumbra as the greater Numbers of people come and go.

In The Kitchen Of Some Other Man's Because

Held court,
But now I've got to go out, and footsy toe
With these thugs,
Zombie the supermarket shoplifting for rugs:
And it's a dandy short day,
But sometimes it's a might bit long,
And only the little girls are aloud to skip out
Harassing their fathers, ripping along
In such a blaze,
Pretending the horticulture is a violent theatre
Having them bemused-
They can call truancy and kidnap themselves,
Break out the boozey, manhandle themselves;
And I can like them for awhile,
I can cut them a rug,
I can sing with the crickets and pass them
My jug-
But eventually I've got to go to work,
Dress up a dandy, circle jerk- let the pornography cool
In the shadowy pools, in the oily, indigo pools
Of junked cars,
Say if she doesn't call it is because she is so far Away, getting to work for herself- And if she doesn't Know my name, never who I was,
Its only that she's a lady now, not a little girl,
Chrysalis, bemused in the kitchen of some other man's Because.

In The Liquidated Heavens

Choruses of Mexican girls at first following and Then riding atop of trains-
Proceeding to the north, and the greater basins
Of Colorado
Who promise sheltering them- across so
Many ditches
Closing their eyes so they cannot see the kidnapped Bones of their
Latchkeyed brothers-
Unclothed, hoping to be sheltered in the new Colors of its bloody-nosed banner
As if spring were breaking and running down
The mountains-
The eggs of hypnotized chickens, magnetized
In the bathtub of her wrists, as Windmills turning in the liquidated heavens,
Cry chandeliers.

In The Little Things That You Have

Absorbed like our penchant for slavery,
Amber-dark skin reeking of liquor and acid:
I see you there in the darkest pinafore,
Holding your daughter over the scrub, and the Leaking tongues of vampires and foxes:
I have sawed at suicide all day, while the sun dripped
Like full-blown yoke through a tall canyon of Clouds;
People moved like werewolves; their coffins rolled Like easily justified houses; and there are so many Mausoleums for sale like regal cenotaphs moted by ceiling fans,
And the unjustified ridicule of their inevitable fathers;
And I think of that tattoo on your leg in the briars,
And I starve;
And the moon pulls me so I can see past the midnight
Guardrails where all of the students' bikes are restive:
The yard well kept, the bricks so red-
And you are there on a bench like any number of ghosts,
Counting your want for children,
Gladdened in the little things that you have.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Loneliness Of The Greatest Certainty

Open wounds, and start the show;
They made love while the crocodiles sang
Before recorded history;
The scars don't look so bad on film;
They are almost gentlemanly- I search for Exlovers through the gloom,
Who have no idea what they've done to me:
She, for one, has gained weight,
Yet, I shouldn't be the one to judge others
On their looks. I know it doesn't work that Way, and yet she puts her make-up on to kiss
Her man, and not for me, and Straightens her hair to look less Ashkenazi,
But I can do nothing to her anymore,
And the play is halfway through, but full of Reawakened relatives, and cars which won't start,
And a red head in a red light, playing her usual part;
I sat there in a nondescript evening, while a
Nondescript rain pattered in the parking-lot;
I was not invited to the wrap party, I did not kiss
Anyone, or see anyone naked, but went home
Directly as I should and leapt in a great wide house
All alone, and put on my own sort of show,
In the loneliness of the greatest certainty, while
In their cages not far away the lions roared,
The children played in joyful cacophony;
They sounded the same to me;
They said that they didn't want to see me anymore,
Or review the movements of my song,
And thus I stood so very still
In the loneliness of the greatest certainty.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Lowest Frigid Season Of Hell

Drunk and humid and in South Florida
I drink banana rum: A tip from a house wife in Park Land. I imagine she's already decorated the tree
I stood for her, and made love to her husband under it;
And I should be reading Anne Sexton, but I've gotten Board by her moribund and suicide: And I'd rather Be smashing glass through a library or finding exotic
Lovers transforming through a thunderstorm. And I know,
Yes, this poem is for her, as even now I am out on my roof
Watching her come in, bawdy and open bloused spiced
By rum, her face dun and well disclosed: There are so many Housewives and their daughters around her, and they roll in With newly glossed cars. I can tell they've made it; but even With all these scars, I am still fine, and they can only distract
Me for the littlest while, or if that makes you jealous, none
At all, if you think of me. Tonight I talked with a guy named
Dan, whose name is the same as the quarterback for the Miami Dolphins: but its not Dan Marino, but another Dan, or not Dan at all: but he goes fishing on Michigan's upper peninsula
Where everyone is drunk and redheaded, and dysfunctional,
And very far from here: and I love them as I love you:
And I love Dan, but he is enduring chemotherapy and a rarest
Form of cancer, and he won't survive any longer than you or
I should survive unless you acknowledge this caress; or Dan:
Dan, Dan, Dan. If I were a better man, this would be a fine
Epitaph for him, but this is sure to be another day without a word
To greet the sun, and the Dan I met tonight will be gone, and I will not be published again, as I would wish, but I will think of Dan until I might see him again, and kneel with him in the ice
Near the pin wheeling mouth of the devil, and care a hole with Dan, and dropp our lines and fish, and drink bear and laugh, and Laugh anonymously and for all time in the lowest frigid season
Of hell.

In The Luxurious Absence

What beauty that happens in the luxurious absence when You cannot see your backyard
Cannot be describe: but it is there, when I am waiting for you—
When the traffic of early-ing morning has stemmed
To its least
And I have gone to school only to skip away again
To smell the armpits of the yards where the perfumes of
The night blooming jasmines are yet lingering:
And I can call your name up from the absent minded rows:
Here with the insects and the minnows far away
Of the housewives who have gone off beneath the sun
To some beauty parlor,
Leaving me free to roam abandoned into your backyards
My footsteps triggering the pollinations of the flowers:
As bees fall around them onto the grasses mowed,
Sated from all of the breakfasts of honeyed pornography:
And I can lie down in the grass and jack-off or Masturbate:
I can light off roman candles and drink the liquor until
All of the paper bags are emptied—
And then dream you up into the soap-operas of sky,
Even as you fall asleep—evaporating—your ashes
Crenellate my afternoon,
As I lay there sweating, hyperventilating, and conjuring you
Into the places you are absent from.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Make Believe Heavens

Even if I lose my job, I will have new sorrows
Here waiting by the spring
Pristine curling reservoirs gossiping with the water snakes
And the things who float here as slow
As girls who think their name is Mary
The sun will burn until the walls of heaven hop like
Eggs,
And the clouds around them will make a camouflage
Of something we will not even think to see for Days and days
But you will come strutting out of your orchard
And down from your cinderblocks and kiss and bless
The earth
And think new and preemptive thoughts
Until the boys who once were your brothers are kidnapped
Across the street- and you go home, barefooted
Remembering how they left you to play in those woods
Across the cenotaphs continuing through the streams of A nude transparency
Running in a hidden avenues beneath all the Sunday
Blue lights of Churches which you enjoyed arcing under
On the swing sets that seemed furtively to take
You away, while the moon and airplanes mimicked
You like candles dancing to and fro in the make believe heavens

Robert Rorabeck

In The Makebelieve Twilight

Shoulders of airplanes over the rainstorm of A forest- While I think of you, it almost feels alright to Be alone, even while all of the castles are so brilliant
After midnight though there is no one ever home:
And the palm trees linger, and the cypress blooms,
And I think of you contented in your glowing room:
Like a candle across the ocean, like a wish across the Sea, something left to linger in a lingering memory-
Small and auburn fruit carried from outside her yard
Into an orchard that is forever blooming in the make-believe Twilight of a lover's bedroom.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Medians Of Interstates

Lost into the presupposition of the glass—
Knowing only so many words
And those discovered at the racetrack of her legs—
And what a chariot—
Alighted with the things I saw—turning on its Blinkers as it swung around the garden—
The bears full of special lighthouses
Now that they held torches and dined together
In the medians of interstates,
Moving further and further south—
Competing with the tourists with cartoon souls—
The brass of their elbows echoing
As the butterflies knocked over the swing sets
Hurry to follow their lovers into the sea

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle

Some small reward other than
That love I wanted to win- some little prize
Printed in the ink of zygotes spilled
Out on the empty sheaths
Of notebook paper there are millions of Them on each
Paper snowflake that wilts into the canal
As the cowboys and knights pretend
To die together, moaning in the phosphorous
Of their grand exegesis:
As a woman posing as the messiah sings through
The mosquitoes and holly boughs
Through the morning while the buses turn around,
Picking up her little sisters who are Never mindful,
As she continues daydream of a skating rink
As if a glade in the middle of the myriad of the Vermillion cenotaphs upon which the flies lap
And the wolves do drink.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of Making Love To All Of Them

You were never supposed to sleep with me,
Erin: Where would the trick of impossibility be in that,
To come into my wigwam all cheery and Rose colored
Like a snake too big for the highway;
But I was supposed to lean on over myself in the middle of
The night,
And pick a few strings upon a lyre or a harp,
Strings that had no meaning except for a dog's howl of Emotion,
Strung and fibrillating the guts of the sky, of both the old
Gods and demigods,
The little virgins who died too young dreaming of just
Your weekends scrubbing naked in the bathtub:
My art, if any, was supposed to die for you this way, a lonely
Truant caught smoking in man eating vegetation,
A little girl who paints a picture too dark to discern for you;
And this is the sweet thing,
The scribble of haiku in the meaningless rainstorm:
The way one boy sits forever alone sitting in the grass that the Worms know and love,
Waiting for the bus that will never come around again,
Because it has already brought home to you all the boys you Should want,
And you are even now in the middle of making love to all of them.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of One Of Her Many Flights

Falling into the dunes,
GI Joes worn into cenotaphs,
Equalized into the desensitized conquistadors,
Underneath so many oceans of vanishing moons—
The pornographies
Stacked into the cars that cannot run—
The heat in prisms,
The housewives in love with their Banana fish—
And another world across the canal—
Like Mexico,
Or the jungles of a systemic opera
Cut away by the floods of baseball games,
And the tangles of highway—
A tear drop of sweat on my wife's tit as She sits down in the tiny yellow living room
Across from me—
And a few more words from now,
Another heart be
As I imagine my son's lips touching her
Areola another way stewardess may imagine
The taste of a sand dollar somewhere
In the middle of one of her many flights.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of School

Pranksters of my boyhood still lighting off
Fireworks across the roofs of another school day—
Like all of Mexico laughing
As they propagated and made new streams into our Beautiful delusion—and shot roman candles straight into
Our eyes,
Scarring us with the song that was in their loins:
Not afraid of airplanes, because knowing that, like the moon,
They could steal that too:
Until I found you safely under a bus in a rainstorm
And we made love forever right in the middle of school.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of The Day

And there they saw you in the middle of the Day out beyond the water slogging portables—skipping
School with narcolepsy—you'd just exhausted yourself
While heading down to the canal—
You hadn't even made it off the school's grounds—
And the prettier girls headed towards you
And then away—
You had a pack of fireworks in your corduroy pocket,
And with indescribable words, you were Trying to sell secrets to the tadpoles and the minnows—
Trying to convince them that they could fall in Love with other things
And make it all the way to the sea, if they really Wanted to—or be anything after another night fell and
The next morning came.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of The Night

In the middle of the night I will buy you a house
Underneath the flight paths of airplanes
In a surcease of all of your grottos—in the teardrops
Or the estuaries of all of my art:
I will find you there in my arms,
And call to you as the lamentations of the echoes
Of the Ferris wheels I forgot to kiss you on—
Cannot you see,
This is what I do for you, turning the heavens into
A windmill that keeps on repeating itself—
And in its urban setting is all but found out—
And in the belly of its Mexico, turns and turns for All of the fools and
All of the werewolves—but up until now I have Sworn off selling fireworks for my father—
And I would just as soon sleep underneath all of the Train tracks as all of the heavens—
Until your busied noose becomes a cloud—
And into its spot on apiary we give new credence to
The pagan natures of your adulthood that I am sure you are To become.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Middle Of Town

I went to the old park today and saw a girl just like a peach,
Passed out in the mowed grass with her bum in the air,
Her bottle of dousing wine sticking up rather angelically and Phallic; and I had to stop the car and check again
For myself,
While the children came out like goslings from the old green
Science museum I used to date her in:
But this girl just slept on and on, passed out and heady in the grass,
Her drool probably feeding an army and queen of ants
As the airplanes passed their times insouciantly with just As godly seraphs of stewardesses taking the breezes:
Then I had to turn around and get a better look at her, up and Down, the way the biker gang was looking too right across the Little estuary and not far down the road from the quiet little house
Backed against antique row: The house will soon be mine,
But the girl I will never know; but I saw the way that she grew there
Like the furrow of a receptive field, and I was busy needing her,
Wishing to bench beside her while the dogs tumbled awake out
From the wilting suburbia that happened all around like the color
Around the cornea as pink as an Easter Egg hidden in the middle Of town.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Midst Of Our Gorgeous Streets

The night in her elegant mountains can do
No wrong:
She is a balmy sweetheart,
And I sing to her beside the unsteady traffic:
Everyone is getting home to Pop popcorn and cozy up with the workaday Denouements- those young cravings they Still have:
And her eyes are blue and far away:
She doesn't have to go up to see angels bathing
At the top of her treeless sisters:
She is already there, or in his arms;
It is the same- that early in the morning she felt Guilty of thinking of me,
While even then I was stepping up to get a better
Look nearer the day gone surroundings;
That she had forgotten herself, that she was here:
One of these blown down and truncated in the store-
Front abominations,
Dropping jaws throughout the day:
I should think that she should make all the money there
Is in the mortal realm, to have such a radiant truant
In the midst of our gorgeous streets.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Midway Of An Overgrown Jungle

Filling up on a carnival of lactates while just About anybody dreams,
As their houses burn down while the slopes are Covered with snow that approaches
The knees: the opal bowls, holding the grapes in their Sundries
The fjords effortlessly iced so that the dragons skate:
And the daughters curl to their mothers'
Tendering inoffensive foxes suckling legumes,
Her brown body in a midway of an overgrown jungle
Where everything floods and blooms.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Missplaced Playgrounds

The tigers and kidnapped children,
Paint by numbers the clouds
That are above the islands—
They disembark but remain close to where it is
They believe to be their salvations,
And in south florida,
There are girls whom partake of the fine and Illusive weathers—
They seem to become a part of the beating hearts
Of the waves,
The salt water enigmas and the carrossels of
The cenotaphs of sea horses—
But what am I doing right now
But dreaming of other homes and other
Graveyards—
Soon I will become just as forgotten as my Grandfather,
To join the sleeping children in the bedroom of My ancestors' skeletons in the missplaced
Playgrounds on the other side of the ever constant Road.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Momenty Of Her Heart's Beating

Anemones floating before my children's eyes
As they awaken once again,
Flicking forwards,
Newly awakened zoetropes to the swiftly turning
Earth:
Pages in a book that is burning:
Ambulances sounding like cocks crowing
In the middle of a city's brightest afternoon:
And they are almost lost in the immensity of sunlight—
Skyscrapers made of her scorching faces:
The multi-feminined god,
Changing like the butterflies taking off their clothes
In the forest:
Look at the traffics—reflections of yourself given
To the universe:
The sun in its basin: there bathes the earth:
Pictures of our muse from the habitats of A thousand hemispheres.
And if I open up my mouth, my wife will all of a Sudden know that I have been drinking—
But this is the amusements of the world that I am
Living—a moment's flickering in a picture book,
A unicorn drinking from a mysterious
But commercialized fountain,
Her eyes blinking in the moment of her heart's beating.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Morning

And then they said that there
Were planets too far away to touch—
But I am still right here,
Or lying down in bed—
The sun comes up over old men and
Their daughters—
Boys skip school and adventure
Down some rivers—
I seem to touch you in my absence—
In the mind that can get lost anywhere—
They've taken down all of
The tall swings in the county—
My girlfriend is and ever shall be
In love him her husband,
But my child grows in my wife's belly—
And the waves seem like spears—
Splashing as they cut—
Nobody notices their clever operations
Underneath the helicopters—
Death takes time off to spend an anniversary
In Hawaii,
And he knows her name, but she doesn't
Call—he will come for her anyways,
Sooner or later,
And sleep on her roof,
Whether her front door is green or blue—
And the children will come into the school
In the morning,
As the alligators sleep in the canal.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Motosis Of A Disbelieving And Isolated Earth

No one seems to be going to sleep in
This house of mine—
My parents, making up all of the haunts of
A timeless space,
Bend down to kiss the abstractions of My werewolf adolescence—
And the effervescing shrieks happen
One day at a time—
As the waves foam like beer from
The tap spilled by my old muse across the Street from the old university
Where I just found out that my favorite and Best professor committed suicide—
Adding,
And doing the math of grasshoppers no one
Believes in- almost two years from now—
There will be a teepee which burns down
In a jungle, and I will think of you—
A student I have right now,
Coming back into my life after all of her Father's battleships have sunken—
Impossible for her to be thinking of me
As I have sometimes thought of her—
And tomorrow she will have graduated
And wilted into the tenements of her
New and ambivalent neighborhoods—
And nothing will ever accord to me
Or even evaporate off of the happenstance of Her unbelievable menagerie—
As the macabre lingers like fruit that is too
Afraid to slip into the fingers of the earth,
As the highway divides itself both ways—
In the mitosis of a disbelieving and isolated earth.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Mountains

Playing around with elbows before
School starts with the big boys- and with Baseball and possibly alligators,
Because they are all right here, underneath the Hypothetical ceiling fans,
Sweltering- and there isn't a jot left to be Disclosed: they will start school,
And the children will survive by eating themselves
And the classrooms of them will divide through The architectures- and some of them will be
As pretty as candy,
And some of them will daydream of the waves,
And some of their mothers will clean the school
Afterwards-
But this will not be in Mexico, because she is no
Longer for me-
But up in the mountains I am sure the airplanes
Sleep and dream, and dream of so many Things that I have already abandoned.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Movements Of A Schoolyard

At first the cathedrals stuck up in the High water marks of the trees
Where we used to skip school and tried at looking in The most absurd of ways which we Hoped would make us beautiful,
As I alone thought of the fallen angels licking their wounds
At the water fountain,
Trying to drink in their time between the classes in the movements
Of a schoolyard that said would enrich through the summers,
But in which they were sure, kindred hearts, that they Should never belong.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Movie Theatres

Now I am laughing- and you are gone,
Back again to the cathedrals of
Your brother's arms:
Brown arms, sinking in the feelings of a roller rink:
Sinking in through all of Christmas
While we tried kissing ourselves
And turning out like children
Into another holiday- and selling ourselves:
I suppose you could have never been there,
But it was still our movie
Through the bosoms of the mountains,
And I suppose you could never have been there,
But it still felt strange to be alright,
As our mother and father still felt strange
Making love in their bed forever,
As they did at night:
As couples in the movie theatres of I don't Know-
As strangers kissing each other lucratively
As it begins to Snow.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Mowed Field

Succession of alphabet: tongue of amphibian
Over a lover's nipple:
Circus tent of areola sprigged by pubis
In the moonlight coming over
The house too close to the highway:
The rattlesnake flattened across
The road,
Halfway made it underneath the Florida
Holy where the kids have made it
Safely run away:
Across the street from housewives who are now
Lovers—
Adultery in midway daydreams before
The naked bodies of goldfish
Not even worth a dollar:
The television silent besides the Christmas tree:
The lizards in the yard basking like
A statuary of primordial deities:
The cats too sleepy in the mowed field to care.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Mysterious School Yard Of Your Fatalistic Glades

Days will glow hard and yellow because they Will have their bouquet of rich sun,
And I wonder what dinner goes best with autumn-
Oh, how the elk leap and run,
Follow Satan's thankgivings through the accords of Pine,
Along their trails to hidden springs, such esoteric
Rum;
And I would like to take you here on your nocturnal
Birthday, to watch you bare your shoulders
To the glade- such opal reveille: You don't know
How much I am scarred for you,
How much I might earn for you by the barrel of My cap gun,
And I used to time travel and jog all neighborhoods
For you,
And because of you my dogs are never sad,
And my lips are never thirsty; and even God doesn't Give a d&mn if we break our social impositions,
Because concerning you he's always glad,

And so we end out across the signifying canal, while
They are laying on in school, we swing in the amber glass of setting sun:
We have our weddings and funerals alone with secret spit and Cheap rum; and our own burned out and ochre divinity,
He also would sell anything for you,
For he has been forever celibate out on the reservations of
The everglades,
Like a reticulated serpent as thin as a bridegroom's ribbon,
Waiting to swallow you entirely
Once the crepuscule caps the sugarcane's candle
Deep, deep in the mysterious school yard of your fatalistic glades.

In The Naked Estuaries

Juvenile is the lips: there you are in your Fortress' stronghold looking up
Through the hours of my classroom:
See if you can find me at the water fountain
Between classes,
Until the buses turn around and the seahorses
Drying like trinkets won in the shoals
And all of the pretty gods
Are gossiping over their numbers in the clouds:
Strange banks such as these Filled with salmon dreaming up to the skies
Of movie theatres and the pretty
Tricks of cathedrals who only hold the lotteries
Of the merry go rounds,
And as I fall down from your heavens, having Little thoughts of me
Try to remember what I once was for you,
Even while you sunbathe in the naked estuaries
Of another man.

In The Nameless Adventures

After school so many points on a road
Home through the forest
Where so many nameless fires burn
And so many wolves
Are trying to sell things
And have sex beside the road where the Canals are dredged only a few feet
But hiding an infinite undertow-
And all the otters and mermaids
A growing boy can imagine:
While the route off the path leads to the Emerald
City,
And somewhere in a secret cove
Far away from the yearnings of my mother's Washing machines,
Your lips waiting for me in the semidarkness,
Jewels of a juvenile Affair partaking in all of their mindless truth-
As I step out of the way to find you,
To join in you another day in the nameless adventures
They do not teach you in school.

In The Offices Then

Broken pillows in an office of unwed sleep-
Birds peering from outside of windows
And it rains sunlight:
This beauty where you are never here to see:
You only come after the carnival is moving away,
And childhood is gone,
Or sprawling, broken and toyed with down
The golden backside of some hill,
But soon the sun will slip and the moon will slip,
And it won't take long for you to breathe-
In the offices then, married, and everything working
Out as you'd planned.

In The Open

I have a book published,
And your dreams are stupid;
But your legs are very sexy:
And that is why you have all of your children:
Scissoring in the sky,
Swim meet of your meat:
Your eyes are like the sky: your meat is their Meat;
And I don't have to explain why: I'll eat my Mother's chocolate: I'll go outside and get dizzy,
And I won't even look at the one or two cars
That drive by, because my old neighborhood is So empty; and my crown is rusting- Exhumed
From the time capsule with the paper airplanes
And plastic Indians;
I am still this quieting land's chief, and I know
How to describe:
I know how to pull you out of class and press you
Proportionately against the lockers, and hold your Eyes on into crepuscule: after the mailmen have made
Their rounds, and the cats are coming out,
And the housewives are going down;
And I still hold your eyes and press your buttons
To your thighs,
Even if you aren't here- even if you are home,
I can still catch you briefly out in the open of your skies.

In The Open Against The Banks

When they kept new time with the lotus
Weren't the maidens falling from the sky—
As if airplanes had wrecked with themselves—
Contemplative elements over
The soundless gardens—other avenues upon the Way home from high school—
Each way of describing things another
Prospect for domestication—
Underneath the tent where we sell Christmas trees
And fireworks
And my father doesn't talk with me anymore:
She is so beautiful,
But she keeps with her family: all of the butterflies
As far away as Mexico—They seem to be Remembering where they belong,
Out in the open against the banks and the lending houses:
I don't know how she will really survive,
But she keeps her children close to her, and otherwise
Doesn't seem to care.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Open Glades

I will take you up now to the Level of heaven where I believe you have never Been,
Sleeping alone with your husband,
While my door doesn't close Around you same neighborhood the trains and Airplanes contract:
Where I no longer believe I can survive
Wholeheartedly,
Even though my mother and father used to live around
These parts:
And I used to work with you- didn't I,
Muse,
While the angels have been making love like Kissing cousins,
And another heaven fades,
As daylight fades, as the serpents and their Saints go to sleep enfolded:
And I just found another reason to be alone,
While the school closes
And all of the beautiful students go home,
Accumulating to themselves:
I suppose some of them have been in love, underneath all
Of this- but in the morning, with or without Airplanes, it will start out so early all again,
While the roses open
And the housewives forget themselves and give into Sin:
As they sunbathe for all of the elements- while they Lavish in the open glades,
Just as the hummingbirds remain to fair and open
Occupying the water fountains outside of the classrooms
Where their souls just so happen to get laid.

In The Orchards Of The Highways

In the orchards off the highways near the burned
Out fires of your dirty honeymoon-
I do not care if you cannot look into my eyes, or Read these things I have to say to you:
Arounding in my bachelorhood, I enjoy the fecund
Night with my booze, while your shoulders
Of amber linger on the swings, and in the waves
That I pushed and enjoyed with you- both of Us inept and not wondering what we were around:
Both of us making love like birds above the ground.
Until you went away burning back to your Family's cathedral to make a meal for your husband.
I agree, it was extremely awful, as you lay
All wrinkled and loosed skinned wondering what's For dinner back at home again.

In The Organs Of Your Marching Band

Far away windows of shattered visions,
The corpses that lie waiting
Inside of your salt:
The Jack-in-Box wound
In time and forever clinging gravity,
Soon you'll become the exoskeleton
Of grinning thought:
Soon you too will lunch with the grubs,
And the white things which clean the room,
Before churning into
The confections of drifting air-
Here is the play we are in,
Dressing up to respect the dead on Holidays of funerals:
The distant relations to which you are
A fast growing seed:
Blooming in the high basins for one season,
Tended to by the sunburn angels:
Soon too you will see the Dead girl's skull at the end of the rainbow,
The petit but savage necessities
Of change,
But for now you remain contently housed
In your music box,
the organs of your marching band....

In The Out Of Work Zoetrope Of The Emptiest Room

Up in the echoes of tall trees:
Or remembering the ways that we had to use to Drive home.
Through the thick and adulterous forest, causing the hijinx
Of forest fires
Off the thick tongues of lustrous foxes,
And then getting home without remembering the key
And masturbating onto a purple rug:
Getting high up into the atmosphere as if to see our muse:
Straight up into the armpit of the heavens,
Lavishing in her cockpits, desiring her sport, as if sneaking into
The day glow crypts of dead heads of state:
And then remembering her words, and how she sat right here:
Like a feather, like a pillow,
Spun out for a sort of glow
Like the lamps at high noon in your mother's first sort of House while the dogs chased the rabbit around the Rock garden in the rented field,
Before you even knew of the primordial pornographies across
The street,
Underneath the canopy of dead fireworks,
Of out of work conquistadors, or took off your shoes to tiptoe across the Drainage of high school or any old sort of canal-
Like a terrapin sated off the school bus,
Like an orchid glowing with the brightest gods together- for no one
In the out of work zoetrope of the emptiest room.

In The Pages Of Her World

I've seen her pictures again
Beneath the torpid palms.
She does not know she is smiling at me,
Or that she is the sea and the east
Upon which the sun opens,
And cooks the smells from the lips of the tide,
Which reminds me of childhood, noon, and midnights,
Nor does she care at all,
For life is too painless,
And all so fast, and the hands of the mammals
Are running along her feeling her up:
She is a photo album of sexy smiles,
And life is so fine,
Like another sip of rum,
And then stick em' up, baby,
Because the ride is just beginning,
But turn the beautiful page,
And watch the butterfly recede in the Torn petal-wings of old age,
Just a second
And it is almost done....
Nothing more than a memory in the yard.

But it is all right,
Because she is still smiling,
And she should smile forever....
In the pages of her world.

In The Pantomimes Of The Plagiarisms Of My Father

Now I may be starving in the pantomimes of the plagiarisms
OF my forefather
Until all of this isn't enough—and we have to thread
Our otherwise rainbows underneath ridges
Of an otherwise Christmas—
And all of the ghosts of wherever have to pretend to Be swinging swaying into another graveyard
They happened to talk about or
To believe in—into that most beautiful of echinopsis
Just like the tin toys of our children striking out and playing upon
The stage of all of our happiest
Children: sway and pretending to make love—basking
And obeying the daylight before they all became Heirlooms of what they were expected to become:
So they became these things—and the rest of their yesterdays
Echoes anyways—became beautiful for the things that weren't Even there—of daylight an daylight—and ballrooms
And ballrooms—
Those perpetual amnesiacs that could not sustain themselves
If it wasn't inevitably for the fact that we Just kept them dancing- in our rooms—in our rooms.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Parapets In The Sun

Ambered joy in the parapets
In the sun and the clouds—
I wait for you at lunch or
In the middle of math-
While the daydreams of the busses
Turn around and around-
And we can partake of ourselves
Here in the soft nonsense—
In the purple and the nebulous—
And I can promise you no need
For revolutions, or Politian's or cockpits—
But there will not be any need for daylight
Because there will already be so many
Fireworks—
And envelops for lovers forever
As the playgrounds laugh over the graveyards
Without ever imaging of coming to an end.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Park Of One Too Many Shadows

No one is getting any closer than
This, and the airplanes
Are taking off to somewhere I cannot believe—
The words are gone like
The patrons of a church gone up in smoke
Over which the dragon is singing like
A happy camper,
And someone is in love, as the forest is Painted with gore for Christmas—
The festivities continue until I am finally in Love with someone else's mother,
And the delusions of the past happen all
At once—memories which cannot control
Themselves,
And all of the muses of my life languishing
Together in the park of one too many shadows.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Parking Lot

Another viewing's slowness: it looks as if the dead
Are on television,
And she is waking up, dressing in fireworks that will Persimmon off her body in a two for one sale—
From the heavenly depths of
Miami—
She will look up into a sea of airplanes—and spin outside of The tent,
And next to the trucks and the supermarkets and
The fast food chains:
And all of that traffic—long fuse rapping around her
For a moment she is delighted—object of holidays—
Red and brown queen as amble as a deer wearing silver
Sparklers—
A spectacle in the parking lot at the end of the day.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Playground Of Unremembered Rules

Wine is cheap and of one note-
The airplanes are but a whisper.
Your concerns are of others.
The alligators nod ceaselessly,
With no need to buy houses
Or look beautiful.

It so happens you have a family,
And it is the beginning of the new Baseball season:
Blue skies bloom as bouquets
Above the playgrounds your children
Will ride over to come home-

And this is not a burden even for Lancelot's shoulders;
But a way to enjoy the night-
This night as you are becoming old.
Lovers whom have exorcised you
Do not think of the past.

They do not look up to see even
The memory of the moon through
A fornication of post-midnight clouds- -

Stewardesses seem to float above
The earth as you lay down,
A hapless saint across the red clay of
A baseball diamond,

A red ghost tossing his foul balls across
A darkening earth.

In The Playgrounds Of My Heart

They had a family for a little while,
And they made love indoors with Their family-
I suppose they figured they would never have
To be found out,
Even if they fell in love with some else,
And the road down from their house wound
Away all afternoon-
But the world was not a frightening place,
Even if one or two of their children
Disappeared- the minnows existed,
And the tadpoles were always growing up
And losing their tails-
And very soon there would even be new houses.
And little sun showers where rain would Have to exist but only for a little while,
And the amusements they would know
Would go around their shoulders
And keep them warm like liquor- until the Amusements and the lights left
The playgrounds of their city- and you discovered
That your true existents laid in the playgrounds of my heart.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Playgrounds Of Your Never-Ending Holiday

This day will be a fieldtrip,
Skipping with arms enfolded in a small click of friends:
We will have songs to sing, or we will evaporate:
For the rivers come here thirstily: they get salty from grief:
They disappear like tangled ribbons into the Ever glades;
And when I look up it is into your transom, while the Weather shakes the hedges and the blue flowers of plumbago
Stick to your lips and temples,
And make you close your eyes and remember the soft touch
Of your mother, and the faithful things she told you
In your crib; so come with me, if you believe me, if you
Have nothing left to do:
The sky is starting out our runway of blue blankets; it will come Down and gather us up and remark that even it is not as Blue as your eyes,
Or the gears of your bosom that used to run tripping around the School yard, your senses funneling the awkward sounds of your Budding immortality; and I stole things for you
And followed in the footsteps and in the playgrounds of your Never-ending holiday.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Playgrounds That You Can'T Remember

If I had a girlfriend I would call you now
The summer of my Mexico but if under the strange
Banners of your country, after another day,
You've forgotten how you've loved me
Yesterday What am I to do about it,
But to turn around and go back home from the Wonders of your amusements Here you are
For a little while, flooding over me
With the banners that you keep so carelessly lingering
In the playgrounds that you can't remember.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Ponytails Of Abandonment

And I haven't even been to Mexico-
And the silent thoughts are soon averagely undone
By fireworks in the ponytails
Of abandonment:
While you lean into him from the abandonment of a
Fairytale- and you kiss him,
Even if he cannot metamorphosis from a wolf:
You kiss him this way and that,
As the obese ballpark curses its insincere numbers
And tries to work out for itself why it cannot Divide:
As all of the Indians turn out in the tobacco of billboards
While their silent and supernatural forests
Still seem to exist and to divide somehow
Through supernatural mitosis:
And they all seem to be going their own way-
As the daylight recedes over the picture perfect earth once
More,
And the housewives lumber half-hazzardly, fawning
With their hands upraised to their unequivocally buttered Foreheads:
And their still-life of their half purposes is like
A Disney World: is like a dimmed light over their orchards,
Anyways, that they are trying
To burn out through their wishes:
They are trying to kiss again the inevitable apple of their Truth,
As the sunshine burns through them like the troubadours
Of army ants through the sugary papers of another page:
Even if it all doesn't happen to be real:
Because then it will all have to reawaken again- once
More into the purple armpits of the surreal-
Holding its breath and waiting for the sea to breathe
Again-
Like a serpent on its birthday- or like an insincere
Page folded into a love letter,
And made to send its way once again across an embittered canal.

In The Populous Shade

Shameless lion
In the lazy snow—
I look out through
My perspective's
Window—
The sun goes down
Jealous of who you
Are—As
My wife arrives home
In her yellow
Car—
As I try to recall the Soldiers who thought
To save us from
The zoo—
The trees grow up
In a serpentine glade—
There is nowhere
To hide in the Populous shade.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Preschools Of Graveyards

Orchard imprints in your kitchen- as sunlight
Through the glasses,
And against the wishing wells of gold fish:
And you don't have to worry:
You are young, and your husband is young and Coming home to you-
So you don't have to run away across the canal:
The other world is just for show-
You don't have to belong to it, and I am your son:
Abandon me if you want to
In the preschools of graveyards- leave me there
Underneath the slash pine and the egrets
Who ornament the drooping sky as the traffics
Rush by forever- though they never have
To be gone for very long: and, rest assured,
They will all be soon coming home to you, as you lie
In wait for them,
As the tadpoles change and the cicadas molt,
And the dragon flies whisper into the rattlesnake's
Mouth- as they all come home into you.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Presence Of This Usually Cowardly Lion

I make a beehive out of the best that
Are nothing;
I've drunken all of the liquor and my teeth feel
Again like they should be the stuff sewn again
To feel the resurrection Of your friends;
And why have you rejected the resilience of your dogs;
Why don't you speak of them anymore-
Why it is the same reason why I do not speak or resemble
My own face,
Why I cant speak or say better words for it;
I want to touch myself to your bugle, the way so many boys yet
Do;
I want my hair to turn more gray and fall like cataracts over your Shoulders,
And now you should know that you shall never be anymore
Universally popular; and yet you are right:
You are my starlet and I yet swing for you; and yet
Who are you doing, and you who are yet who I still love,
But my heart is still empty and broken from the love
You would not shave off the bust of your infinite ice globes;
And wouldn't you like for me to come up and see,
But I am afraid that you would feel degraded to be in the presence
Of this usually cowardly lion.

In The Pulp-Noir Eclipse

Clouds palaver,
But how should we say it: that
They are having a parade
Over the cliff-dwellings and condos;
Anasazi graffiti:
Isn't it- I wouldn't know.
I only went there as a
Tourist- ten or twelve,
Dimes with the heads of Dead Presidents
For payphones
And valentines etched
In my pockets;
The pretty things that Never heal,
The left over fireworks
Should we ever sell?
The houses look so pretty all in their rows.
I remember, I used to stomp out their lights.
The housewives look so pretty
Having graduated in liberal arts,
Who went right to the car lot,
Got lit and flashed,
And returned as usual until they were Satisfied to have gotten their wants:
Newborns all around here,
Lined up to Colorado,
Cooing in cradles or crèches,
Left beneath the cathedral ceilings and Bay windows,
Where lights like watery rum falling
Somehow as good as forever,
And the everglades landscape the employed
Wingspans of commercial
Airlines;
Like a graveyard
With the lakes its tears:
Each stone propped up extols its silent
Prayers.

They make their movies in the pulp-
Noir eclipse,
Long legged mothers driving home
The goodly impressed school-
Kids;
But I'm a truant around here-
Haven't you heard me singing this song?
Been sleeping underneath the palmettos,
Just like the rattlesnakes and housecats,
And later on I'll screw around in
The neighbor's garage
To steal and make things, resurrect
Whatever teenage petroglyphs that haven't
Yet faded;
I don't understand what they are saying,
But I the only one left so I recon I
Say it,
As the clouds palaver, drink their rum off
The sea and sugarcane,
And then they too carry on.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Purple Ozarks

Dusk in the purple Ozarks as they Make a film about you—girl I've forgotten
With the night flooding the sky,
And bats with capes from the granaries' roofs—
Slough over the hilltops searching
With the blindness of nocturnal reason—
Search for you in dreams that are no longer aloud—
And in places of make believe tourism
With the memories of the light bleeding like purpled
Diadems between the glossy nipples,
Foaming the inebriate memory amidst the losing waves.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Quiet Forest

As little as a candle's flame, I hold
Dreams for you, like
Amethyst on the courthouse floor,
Like a heron perched on a branch in
The belly of the jewel-weed lake;
I bight my lip over on the veranda of
A wedding, and the entire sky is dismissively
Beautiful as an open lover;
I drive beneath her, the day proceeds in
The courting of its hours, but come never Nearer to your breathing space;
The cold-blooded alligators peddle toward Warmth, and the key-deer nuzzle against
The knees of cypress. There are story books
Lost like children in the everglades,
And down airplanes like freshwater coral;
But I held you in my head today, coming up
To the surface, this hopeful oxygen,
Both the naivety of my artistic dysfunction,
And the entrepreneur of its creation;
If justified, I would open a store of you, and sell
It in colorful grains in bottles, and in shells;
If you were to come in, I would show you around,
And show you how easily you sell, or catch you
By surprise, press my lips to yours, and Hand over your self worth in a book of distilled
Lines, how you lay there, the lucidity of my creation,
A little dream of you, like a candle's flame,
I keep folded in my pocket when I walk alone
In the quiet forest, hiding your light from the darkness.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Rainstorms Of Wonderful Valentines

If I wanted you to sing to me underneath the Mangroves
And kitty-corner to the short skirted tennis courts
With so much zeal as to stop the professionals
From snoring;
If I asked you to play the booby trapped organ,
Or to lick your fingers against the Underbellies of the airplanes in that airplane house
Which is our sky,
Then maybe you would- all auburn, with gypsum earrings:
Like beautiful stuff trapped in the amber;
And maybe it just wouldn't be enough for you to Really love me,
And maybe you were behaving that way just so you could Sell me things,
Things I would have bought blindly anyways:
And I have an entire house to give to you with gaudy trellises
And a mother and father and teak cabinets:
Maybe there are even now little children running up and Down the ghostly steps as if a game of my kind of Dreaming;
And I know all the pine trees are softly whispering hungrily
In their canopy that is smothering the thorny
Graveyards where the bumblebees are perpetually dying,
Giving up in the half darkness which is neither here
Nor there,
Like the premature fading of somber pornographies,
Like nosecones and tiaras made of soft paper that is tearing
In the rainstorms of wonderful valentines.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Realms Of The Unreal

In the heathenish country of enslaved white children,
Nine little girls become the martyrs who lead the Christian charge (Sometimes stark naked,
And other times in blue dresses,
Coroneted by snow white swans)
Following the example of the god he knew,
He wrote the battle hymns to fill the bullet holes,
While his angelic daughters
Held half naked in his room,
Practice standing still against the trees,
So the professors of the hurly-burly come by None the wiser with their muskets discharged
Into the earth in retaliation for the thirsting bayonets.
The godheads for the never-ending war,
These golden-bobbed generals
Share phone conversations with Shirley Temple,
As they tuck in all the dead and lonesome girls in Chicago,
Alone in his room, Henry Darger
Traces his Christmas sorrows:
All his fine children ravaged in his personal crucifixion,
The mute genius of the unrecognized collage
His fingertips tracing the unfixed continents
Of unparalleled girls and angels
In such hidden beauty, every movement an unseen danger,
Recording the unuttered defiance
Of the janitor's little boy, as it was recorded,
When he beat his fist against the windowpane,
Challenging God for a change in the weather.

In The Red Clay

Friendship in the tears of ghettos,
Mud daubers pooling quietly along
The lips of fences
And lanais- while the men pile up
Underneath of these fences,
Entire hemispheres showing through
Their sides:
They have become awakened in their
Echoes,
And set out in the innocuous fields
Of journey.
Rattlesnakes eat the rabbits that eat
The clovers,
And school buses drive around twice
A day:
The waves beckon; they seem to
Be doing something with the sky.
The baseball diamonds rest in the red
Clay,
As the insouciant cars drive by.

In The Red Entrails Of The Sun

All those same things that were without you
Are inside me now—
The dogs are running over the forgotten clay,
And parts of suburbia become Flooded from the last of the titan's tears:
And no more brave than this:
Skipping school,
Pulling the wings off grasshoppers,
Trying to remember the last letter put into
A word about you—
Now that the lake is gone and there
Are only salamanders and Gollum
Who speak something of the red haunts of Baseball diamonds—after another wish has been Exposed—
After another day dream ends in the red
Entrails of the sun.

In The Refrigerators Of Their Own Bedrooms

Heavy petting while you have trouble breathing
As the sky is clotted with the heavens that the airplanes Fly through as if some silver instruments for
The operation- while down beneath of them
The purple museums are all wandering for the lost
And found fieldtrips of the children of televangelists:
Each one coming out of his or her sugary dreams
With their guardian angels drooling, and dripping spotty
Sunlight down their shoulders: soon they will grow
Out of their lilac rollerskates and discover acne,
And the ways to live alone underneath the unhealthy
Zoetrope made from the ceiling fan of their bedroom,
But they will still dream of one another, of how they Once kissed and held hands and roller skated
In a sort of de evolving heaven where all of the rock
Candy was eaten before noon and the return trips home
To trailer parks and little estuaries where some of Them were beaten for scalding their little sisters with Curling irons: their beautiful little sisters who have Now grown up into luxuriously grown women
Who have moved into the Phoenix deserts, one or two Of them: and they sit there dreaming in the refrigerators
Of their own bedrooms: and they lay there
Dreaming like fish who have grown too big for their Own streams- dreaming and dreaming,
And waiting and waiting for what must finally become of them.

In The Rest Stops Where The Water Falls

Naked in your truck,
Startled across the asphalt with the purple
Ribbon and barrettes dying in Your hair-
Looking at yourself in the adulteries of the heavens,
As the rattlesnakes continue telling
Whispers to the cotton mouths in the canal,
And then you go home,
Or you go somewhere: but wherever you go,
You get more and more tragic,
And doll-like,
And I wander if you can even remember that Day I slipped a hundred dollar bill in your Back pocket while your sisters
Were waiting,
Because all three of you were going to the mall
Like a lucky but uneven number:
And now I sing songs for
You I cannot even sing,
As the beautiful throat of the world opens up
For the both of us,
And we continue holding hands down
The bricked paths
Unafraid through the blinding forests,
As the lions whistle and the Angels roar
In the rest-stops where the water falls.
Naked in your truck,
Startled across the asphalt with the purple

In The Revelry Of Our Lost Cause

They look best when they're under the chupah
And getting married-
The girl I used to sleep with in October,
Surrounded by sharks: mazzeltoff, because now
You've found your better man practicing law
And oral sex, that ancient thing:
How the tortoise beat the hare, that same old game;
And there is no more reason to buy a new bed,
Or carve the pumpkin, or kiss the mezuzah-
I am always the same old thing,
Doing my lines better than you,
Getting drunk and practicing the bicycle,
the little truancies
I draw to give the cleaning ladies something to do,
After midnight and all us unbounded and hung
Like exhausted sisters in the draperies and Laundromats
And landscaping with the cicadas in your suburbia;
I am not dancing with anyone: Celibate, I am inventing Humid electricity- See by which way I come and Hold court smoking cigarettes in the old neighborhoods
And upon the old swing sets you've forgotten:
Happily you are with child, or you are expecting; or taking offices,
Always clinging to your traditions of silver and gefilte fish:
He drapes the diamonds around your bones, you become Kabalistic and forgetful- You don't go outside anymore
Save to the dress codes of fine restaurants, and never anymore
To studious dreams; but you are something your mother
Wrought, while I still don't care and even now cherish
In the revelry of our lost cause.

In The Rhyme Of A Pegasus

Love in the rhyme of a Pegasus who flies as high
As airplanes over the school—
So high where girls can dream of him—
Girls here and
Girls there, and the beautiful animals in their heads
Or along their ways—
Until busses return to them in some kind of Psychosomatic waltz back and forth
From fieldtrips to the sea—
They mean business with their eyes closed,
And each wave a leaping caracole of an intangible
Menagerie—
Images slipping until they are governed
And given their place at the table of eternity—
Glasses fill with crimson and heads with Narcolepsy—
So young boys nod beside the road with the Penny ante butterfly—
Waiting for the traffic of the continent to Proceed in time—
Diaspora of illusions between the buxom cliffs—
Native accoutrements underneath the Nativity—
Graveyards of the middle-class's promenade,
Governing through the jurisdiction
Of their clandestine society—
While eyes of the virgin look up at the first
Time,
Like presents underneath the Christmas tree.

In The Room

Little separates us but those canals
And even then we are close enough to spit,
And we can go on for 365 days a year
Like good outboard motors,
And then Christmas and on and on:
And we can continue anywhere from this,
Because we are all one and the same,
The only difference being our society
And our hair colors,
Which are illusions;
And my legs are tremulous like plum trees
From swinging in the balmy pines,
Kicking sweet disillusionment,
And you are just about as pretty as Disney World,
And you belong there thoroughly enjoyed in perm
Caracoles,
In little aquatic habitats in bikinis,
Though you would probably rather marry a successful
Lawyer or a television producer,
I can still see you there, sunbathing for many an eye,
Like the dun houses across the canal all in their Simple rows,
Like mollusks in the shoals, and I love you,
But I guess I can love just about anyone as the airplanes Proceed like minnows and giant fish through their Escalating levels of sky,
As long as you are not their competition in the room.

In The Same Movie Theatres

Soft candle,
The last one to be blown out
On your birthday
In the fruit market
I named after you
The one year we
Were in love—
And you wouldn't leave
Him,
So I found a new Wife amidst the Christmas
Trees,
And took her after you
To all of the places we had been
To see the animals and Eat pancakes,
Until the realized of another sort
In the same movie theatres
That at one time held both of
Our eyes,
As we sat in our seats both of Us seeing visions of our own worlds.

In The Sea

Going through the poses through the fence
Posts- I suppose you have seen her
With the slanting sun-
In the ballrooms of gunpowder, flying with
The smoke:
I suppose you've seen her auburn eyes
Like an apiary of lost supposes
In the daydreams above the classes of losing Boys- I suppose you've seen how
She attracts them, and they come to her,
Falling into her various rooms,
As she drapes across the furniture- and Even her bones relax; and then you can See that she can fly: yes, she can fly,
Though she has never shed a tear for them
Until she has fled far across her cages,
But then what she does with her tears in
The sea I do not seem to care.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Seances That I Cannot Understand

Doing all of this while the girls are making love
In churches,
In cars, along the stairwells of their science museums, their Apartment buildings:
I see girls making love in the dark pressed to grills:
Girls who would have wanted all of this, if it wasn't from me:
The rains grow quiet and listen to girls:
My aunts listen to girls, and graveyards fill with the sad talk
And lips that these girls once knew
And had;
And I am up on my fire tower too high to feel the reasons why the girls
Move back and forth in their plentitudes,
Almost too high to prove a reason for breath, smelling the perfumes
Of these girls, their wild fires pulling up the hills
In the séances that I cannot understand all around me.

In The Second Of Their Metamorphosis

Now, going to school you will be saved
By kissing tadpoles in the second
Of their metamorphosis-
You will make them princesses from a long ways off,
Or what else, I don't care:
But it all pretends to be beautiful, while America is broken:
And the angels of gaudy filigree pirouette like Cantankerous instruments over our bunk beds:
And they seem as if they've been making love-
Or they are just holding over for the saviors of the Fire trucks,
While all of the catastrophes sing out loud
And I crowd your mouth with my tongue
Like a crowd on a Ferris Wheel.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Seeped Earth

Venal muse of amusement parks and Blind households,
The teasing lighthouse about the reef whose Beacon goes off for ten seconds like
Overpriced fireworks,
And it is still dazzling and the men knowingly
Use her to commit to short shot hara-kiri,
And I sell good leather and tomatoes,
And all day long I keep my flag furled upside Down, distressed over her,
Singing my old hound dog wails:
And the sea in the sky is filled with all the things
She has needlessly put away,
And they are still waiting for her- and even the Airplanes gettyup to get to her quicker,
But where is she but on the other side of the canal
I somnolent evening dress,
Consumptive off of low-grade Florida Holy-
Perhaps she is dead, and we'll all meet her at the grave:
That is when we'll throw the game for her,
And bare her children grinning deep and forever in our Honey moon right there in the seeped earth.

In The Senses Of An Alienist

Three dogs are on my bed;
They fart and drool... And beg.
Each one is my best friend, because
I don't have to prove anything to their vision,
And I must smell good,
As I give them the treats I take down from Cabinets made of wood: The forest is getting darker,
And each line is made from the spume of a Poisonous eel. I write by the light leaping in A sheep's bladder, as the waves grow
Passionately sharper. The entire family has not Resumed. The light house has shut down and is Not taking orders. My face has lost the definitions
Of well-positioned and youthful borders.
My sister has bought a new car and dedicated it to Our father.
Tomorrow, two men will come and we will unload
Hay for the horses, then tomorrow I will take down
The gilded harpoon from over the mantle and Dash it the way it must go between a garden of Harping dragonflies: In this method, I will take
The dark liver from far in the forest,
Stolen from the hapless giant of granite who I may Never see, for he passes quietly far away from me;
And I will feed my grandmother, when she asks for me,
And I will think about the other weapon in the darker
Cabinet with a new name for me;
But I am pressed to look upon it, but will I open it.
These are those things I have to say that my Dogs will never know, and where I must eventually Go they will not have the path to follow me;
There is no room between the plots of those relations.
Dark corridors which lead all ways across the country,
Disembarking from any house such as this,
But for the time being my hounds border me; they Snore and fart and dream in the senses of an alienist;
And it is such a sober bliss
That I mustn't yet take it away from me....

In The Sepias Of Regardless Holidays

When I am young, I drive up early to take look
At your face; And I do not drink, but sailors
Tell me your stare hits like rum, and how you sway
Makes the teak of ships well embarrassed,
And even immaculate carpenters a bit leery: These men who
You don't see greet me before morning and lead
Me to you singing salty sea shanties- I suppose
This has happened before,
Just like the lolling of dogs who like to bury,
and now I am just boastfully reminiscing;
And that you were my girlfriend, and now I have Nothing else to do but to swear and drink and play
Atari; but I greeted you there in your first sorority,
Well gowned for that portion of the upper-
Middle class colony,
The blue jays of fables primarily chirping,
Before the sun was bright with chores,
And the eggs were cracked and running,
Before they were beaten into cakes for birthdays, and you
Had to apologize, because you couldn't let me in,
Because it was too near the beginning, especially with the Standard-bred men's choir singing,
The wild ponies were braying,
And everything in sweltering spring and Never for foreclosing,
- but you couldn't even hear them- Even now my Pirates are just my artistic license, as I lie out on The verge under the red speckled boughs of poisonous
Holly, daring such epilepsies through the brilliant canopy,
Letting the terrapin pass regardless of toll
Across my body, their saturnine fins dragging-
Even now college is over, and our lives are Over too- for longer than I would like to think of, though we graduated together, and came together
Sometimes moaning like two ships showing
To each other their bare-chested broadsides,
Spanish ships I would like to think of in a bottle while
The cat purred atop the washer, the dryer tumbling;
Something alright and something even better than tourism,

And maybe this happened, and maybe it did not,
And maybe that day you took me to the cafeteria on Your lunch program with your good friend Lisa, and told Me how different I looked, and how old and worried- How Long ago was that?
To think of it makes me old and worried, and sleepless too,
Makes me want to hang upside down in the orange tree
Of my backyard with the invisible naked maidens,
Reliving it in my bastardized silence,
But some father has sold them too;
And how I delivered pizzas all over campus,
In the sepias of regardless holidays, mopping up after
The graveyard shift and then went jogging seven miles
Until pretzel-salty with private dreams goldenly foaming;
And on the first or second day we saw Erin like sexy lightning walking her
Dogs and she waved to me- Isn't it funny that now
You have your lawyer and his name with you,
Whom you kissed under the kippah, the crystal glass breaking, and passed through
The mezuzah's blessing,
Now that you don't have need for the alliteration
Of my homeless name,
Be it agnostic or Christian,
Or to hear the faithful axles of my Old truck to your forgotten house returning; and she has someone else,
The bartender whose skin is as slick as an otter's,
Who lays back in the teal shoals and eats oysters on
The half shell:
Who takes Vitamin b-12 to recover from vampires, the sun on her bare chest glinting,
Like the hood of a car parked at a zoo,
Caracoling her areolas and bruised nipples,
She has the whole crew, tattooed and cursing and their world liling,
Putting ocean-flowers to her neck,
Her dun cleavage envasing;
and all I have is this, and it is A queer thing, something cursed like a golden arm or A monkey's paw, trying to reach into the gloom across
The overpass and the heedless traffic fast approaching,
Playing chicken with my soul,
Pervasively taunting;

but it isn't worth much,
Not the gas it took to reach you every weekend,
Not the flowers in the vase in the wilted kitchen-
And especially not this.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Shade Of Another Sabbath

I will write about jingoistic nunneries
Riding white army ants all across barbaric planets
Where you can't breathe from the sight of your Love;
And that is all I will have to do, embittered in the novel
Tombs of my new tiny home:
But I can curl up anywhere; I can draw on any where I Want:
And I will definitely make love to so many women:
All the time these housewives or Chinese waitress will come
In as subtle to bow as willow sprigs:
The witchcraft of their twats curling up at the end like
A fat lima bean at the end of its green candle:
Like I made love to that sweet black woman just last night
With the red and black star southward of her navel;
And after I came in her, she straddled me and jerked me off
Until all of the sounds were drowned out by the airplanes
Taking off;
And all the students were parked far back into the darkness of So many games, their eyes just as far away as the nearest Conveniences:
How I floated over them using the old rope tricks of really hot
Swamis: how I am floating over them still,
Petting the flat nosed cobra, and playing my ukulele
On April Fools day in the shade of another Sabbath.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Shallows

It's time to go to bed up in the rafters of Soft light
Where the roosters never carol- and the girls
Good at witchcraft are sleeping-
It seems to be a bucolic spell, fat and milky Bellied:
And they are selling pumpkins down in the Hazy estuaries on the other side
Of the forest
With the trolls tucked underneath their bridges
Good for eating students who have traveled
Too far astray in their truancy
Looking for a swing-set or the idle promise
Of a housewives:
I've seen them share the gory saliva with the soft
Shelled turtles,
Their books tumbling with the puppies in the shallows:
Pecked at by the nimble lips of minnows,
Like lovers who are not even sure they are even there.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Silent Places

Underneath of a rose the jaundice pinpricks
Of another metamorphosis of things- your friends
Here in the undefined colors
While tourists move and gesticulate to the sea
Maybe thinking she will make a fine lover, how
The waves row in her bed, how the sky is spent
With smoke signals like
Genies coming uncorked above the séances of Windmills while the lobsters dance
And little girls draw pictures of a world you watch
From the window of a supermarket painted with Green sales, and you daydream about riding a rickshaw Downtown- while the girls underneath their Roses spin, pricking their eyes until they tear,
But when they spring from that bed they will be like old Friends on new years, and they will enjoy the revelry of Their sorority underneath the dragon of Mars
Who will sing to them of bicycles- and other flowers
The grow long toothed in the silent places along the Long and winding path that only their ancestors remember.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Silted Sheets

The stones of the sun are making love to Cowboys,
The traffic is moving back and forth like an insecure
Christmas
That the stewardesses are showing legs above:
Each one of them like an incandescent bulb
In a Ferris Wheel that turns for Don Quixote
Right over the world,
As the mothers press their children into the cars,
And the nights come together against the naked backs of Mountains,
Saying their lottery of prayers far across the shops
And brambles snuggled in the silted sheets of a higher and More impenetrable world.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Singing Shadows

The words go mumbling from their tomb,
And the labyrinth of spy holes where pride
Has led the thirsty man,
So now little girls laugh down and guess at his Name, the dark stranger of scars,
And it isn't fair because he cannot see,
But can only guess at their curls,
And if they might be princesses painted up
For the vermilion festival, and the sacrifice of Scarlet bulls who once took away their mothers
Across the highways of iridescent seas;
Though he is amazed by this spacious coffin he Has defiled, for he might die anywhere though
He wishes he could see stars
And feel the wind lifting his feet off the grass;
Or find the heart of the coy architectures, for
In there is the reason for his fool heartedness,
For wasn't it the godking of the old dominion,
The seller of everything with a handsome smile,
Who took away the shadows which he loved,
And the woman who lived in them, silent as the Bosom of a stone, even if he only beheld her from Across the street, and didn't know her;
He has sailed the broken seas to this spot and Become entombed beneath the eyes of laughing
Children, just to be lost in the tangling veins,
Like the branches of a hollow tree
Which once chased the light until it all failed,
So as he succumbs to the inevitable plot
Where the little dust will forever mote his bones,
He can hear her breathing once more, in the Singing shadows under the stone.

In The Skies Of Skies

Oh so you know that the boundaries shoot of like
Gloriously indigenous fireworks: green and green things,
And the old man in the sea, and love letters:
I misspelled my face between her legs and repeated the Transoms inside her until she moaned and she thought of me;
And then there were werewolves in the darkness and Better writers,
And silly things: Stephen King go f%ck yourself: I am your king,
And the planets divide like unhealthy pies,
And I can still look down her blouse from where I live:
And her kitchen is golden and well kept:
She keeps on going down her racetrack of endives,
Which is just something else I have rightly learned to spell;
And the road is still on a dirt track,
And the animals are still talking to me, keeping a neighborly feeling
With one another:
And the families grow fat after stealing all of my father's feeling;
And the city is on display like a diamond which in the school is my Birthstone, spinning, spinning in the mall of fault lines;
And now all the women have fallen in line because they want to cast
Their bets on the fireman who is as tall as any god;
And soon they will be right, and I will be down;
And I will be meat for the Zoroastrians; and the ancestors will know
My name as the pick their beaks and work out to the disenfranchised
Junos in the skies of skies.

In The Sky

In backyards things grow
Un worrisome of the School kids in the school
Yards, bathing in ripe
Open abutments picking
Chicken poxs,
Feeding foxes grapes
Climbing up on the Chains of grandmother's
Graves-
A thing with horns,
And red eyes
Appearing at the window
As sugarcane burns in the sky.

In The Slow Motion Traffic Jam Of Sky

Today, the same old things- the new scars,
Ringless fingers,
And the way the clouds tended to move like Somnulent cars
Across the nettled draperies;
Then didn't I think of you; yes, the eerie
Aphorism of spilt milk- the drizzle of the snow
Plow your baby missed-
That was what you misquoted at the end of The article,
And the sand lions sleep not so very deeply
In the silt,
Like Spanish glassed mothers in their patio,
Staring forlornly at the apathetic death from the Eyes of the alligator down the mowed
Green- the very same one who ate Sancho
Panzo while hypnotized by a windmill:
And that is how you should have ended it,
Whistling like a Clint Eastwood movie since I've Lost all that I've loved, or never loved,
Except for my dogs- and we go long-tongued anyways
Looking for the sweet spots where you might Be lying carelessly disengaged in the slow-motion
Traffic jam of sky.

In The Soft Darkness

Wait in the nervous thistles,
To cannibalize the vessels done with their Studies in a wooden house,
Down from the slopes of jumping rope;
All the little books are little dollars
That can buy flowers and marionettes,
And it seems that the train vacillates the entire time,
Caracoling the gardens its mind undecided,
But not until the crepuscule you know opens up that Letters are finally unsealed, and throats open up
Squeaking of mucus and disavowed marriage.
Song birds plead to their kittens for death,
Because in the soft darkness it is easiest to see who
I have become.

In The Solitude Of The Sane

This hinge squeaks like a mottled-gray
Mouse,
Or that moth who likes the corner room in
Your grandfather's corner house:
These words stay up some nights and drink
High-balls inside your dreams,
They laugh and smoke and go out to take a leak:
Back inside your skull again they are echoing
High-heeled gentlemen who don't give a lick
What they have to say,
The gray mustachioed nonsense awakes and talks
All day:
Nothing publishable or very keen- You're Quite too sure they don't have any means, but they Are too silly to be insane,
And thus they crack their jaws like joggers yawning
In the jogging rains- They'd wish they had something Beautiful to think, but after all they are only like Mother's hands washing dirty dishes in your sink.
They haven't traveled very far for many a year, or kissed
A woman's lips or smacked an orchard sweet
Derriere- No, they seem instead to be waiting for all things
Like meadows eager for flowers in a hibernating spring;
And thus nothing better from them out should come,
But maybe if you bought them a little home,
And brought to them like leggy breathy gifts a little wife
And from her ploughed like Cadmus in red Martian fields,
Toothy, friendly kids, a mini-van, and the usually other Commodities, if then they could think of nothing better
At least they could circle around these things their Choice of songs,
And you could unlace yher speckled shoulders through
Their freckly psalms,
And after work and all that such, call the children in from Playing for a late but satisfying lunch. Then maybe these old
Fools would come to join you too, and sit some quietly
In those rounded calcifying halls like typifying bowls where
The general organs bunch; or grow so quiet as barefoot steps
Out in the soft green blades under rain,

And then you could lie down in your own bed and rest
And kiss your wife, and whisper quite safely in the Solitude of the sane.

In The Somber Ozarks

Languishes in the bullfights of Pot bellies and cantaloupes—pregnant women—
Husbands drinking too much beer—
Hillside corpulent from dead aunts and dead
Grandmothers—this I know: forest fires
In Arizona—ant mounts infuriated in penumbras
As the blue as the sea—
The creatures swimming there silver angels—
Terrapin, coy dolphins, and airplanes
Taking me to my bride—or other pets I cannot love—
Places that remain standing after everyone is gone—
Past events in echo's coliseum—
My mother in the somber Ozarks watching the bloodless
Horses running around.

In The Songs They Will Never Know

I try, match in the wind- I flame-
And die after school- the busses leave me
Like Monarch butterflies,
The lions finish the yawn,
And I walk home across the canal
The blue gills and alligators underneath me
But above the stolen bicycles,
And I think of the imagination of words;
I give them an entire cathedral
Which I hold in my heart,
As across another canal the sugar cane burns,
And the men I will never know attend to it;
But they are burning up my muse
Until the entire sky is taken up with her,
With the beautiful goddess who forms above
The earth in the songs they will never know.

In The Soul Of My Heart

With everything about the School
Dumb and mute
I got drunk underneath
The school bus
Where the tortois was
Amongst the shade
And didn't come out
Until
Beowulf was in charge-
Who muzzled all
The teachers,
But was mutually killed
By the dragon as well-
And on the green
It was finally safe
To buy icecream
and say The Pledge of Allegiance
To the flag
Without a favorite color
In the soul of my heart-

In The Spittooned Canal

Now the November winds are calling through My door, and I have nowhere secret to go since the War is over: I have books I love, and secret handles,
But her breasts have slipped from my cusp to feed the Infants, and the sea is so reclusive, so alien; How the Politicians rise in sleuthy gleaming, how my dear
Uncles come knocking upon the doors, and even in their Silences I stalk out through the old widow's catwalks,
Into the flumes of citrus: I would kiss her here,
If such was the implore, but she has sagged away into
The calls of another lover, and her hand is ribboned with His lore; and yet, I walk richly through the darkened
Nebulous of a forgotten neighborhood: sleep walking,
I dream of marking the cleft of her lips with my cheek,
Like bighting into a firm apple already voted:
I am scarred, and far away, and yet clearly her man:
If she should see me, and swoon, I would catch her in time,
And lay her down in the passenger seat of my expensive car,
Drive her far across the ocean, where young actors are Recalling extemporaneously their lines before they are incased
In carbonite; and "blah, blah, blah." Can't you see I am
So much better, but we already have a new president, but Such politics mean nothing to me: I've already queued up into
The line with the seven dwarfs, and with our rich applause
And jenesaiquoi, I exhume her from where my grandmother is Already lying; even though she is just a child, I will buy a crypt
Nextdoor to her tombstone, and saying this is real, pertain
To her diseased recitations and the egos of her high school already Passed away: Nobody shall read this, as already it is rainy and making Plinking jazz on the corrugations, then we get drunk on Dave's
Roof, vote for Republicans, and shoot of fireworks, as he tips
Her back as a chalice, fondling her breast; and in the end, haven't
You seen how good I am, how I come back for seconds, after you'd Though I'd already done; I come in you again, and you swoon,
Like a bosomy opera; even though he was better looking than me,
It is I whom you remember, because I came down to you, and Gave you the quaff from my lips, because even though it was clichéd,
It was right for you in the dusking period, and you bent over
For me, and showed me the outline of your panties, and I knocked

Into you from my suppositions, my handy vagabonds from
The doorsteps of eerie holidays: Now here is where I laugh,
Like a well-published conquistador, or adventurer back from her
Door step: Never fearing, for I know nothing can be certifiably
Real. Thus I am driven back to my doorstep in the wildlife
Preserve, turn the key in its latch, and diminish, microwave
Dinner, watch tv, and jack-off; because, in the end of the plaintive
Romance, she is the only thing whom is real, and you are the Man who is real, and I salute you from the back door of my Castle, and jack-off, while the alligators fart, like trumpeters
Blowing their instruments in the spittoon canal.

In The Stoplight Jungle

Pearled fragrantly in the fragile vacillations
In the stoplight jungle pressed by its more bucolic peers
To the coast
Where the conquistadors once fumbled amidst the Indians
Who were so many and all like virgins,
And showed them the colors of the diseases of a religion
That became the savior of their extinction:
And I thought of you, in a caesura over my dead grandmother:
I thought of you, while my body tried to metamorphose,
While all of the shops were closed,
The forts now only good for tourists also closed,
And the echinopsis in the thistles and spines, hooded,
The cloying fragrances of jasmine mingling with the alley cats,
As if telling them all of those tales to keep them feral and up
All night, while the indigenous moon hung over the transplanted
Churches,
Its lesser lights beaming down, beaming for the gesticulations of
The saints who seemed all too eager to eat that manna of A lesser and more pagan existence, while their greater gods had Betrayed them, evaporating into the beds and shops,
Only to awaken most thoughtlessly to the play and bustle
As the wayward legacy of a bumbling family who could hardly be Said to deserve him.

In The Summer Green

I have a picture of Alma hanging on the wall
Of my second bedroom
That I carved myself; At least that is what I tell myself,
And that the moon is full, even though I haven't checked:
I have done away with all my American friends,
And so my aunt doesn't love me,
But I can still hear the cars softly, softly like the daydreams
Going by in math class:
And then, maybe then while the schools are young and green,
I will make new friends who are shoeless in the red baseball
Diamond, or in the summer green.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Sunlight

Half-hazard benevolence once again
In a crooked world
While looking up her skirt on a merry-go-round:
There she is,
A flower presupposing to the alligators:
The opposite of my sex,
And everything that I mean:
Almost extinct,
Armpits full of narcoleptic fragrances, and the Entire world about her a grizzly bear
Done with séances
Or the fabulous tricks of their migrating trailer
Parks-
Overabundance of senses attuned to her architectures
Peeling in the sunlight:
Soon they will be cursing her, as she feeds them,
And cursing her all the same.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Sunlight Of A Room

I heard the noise of casual horses underneath
The pines,
And then the moon was unsecured and drifting-
I was frightened because my dictionary was
As slender as an anxious poetry volume,
But I wanted to impress you, and I didn't want to Die until I had impressed your lips with the sponge
Of blindly reaching life,
Even though I have nothing else to sell, and you
Are already diademed and truncated and beautiful in A crèche of stolen automobiles,
And your eyes are never around anymore at the séances
Of high school drinking fountains-
I am creased like a delicate thinker, grayed on a stone
Down in the valley of an empty parking lot-
And all the planes are leaping as if in a ballet, as if Choreographed by an effeminate flight instructor-
I don't want to leave off even though the bus will never Be returning to me, and all the tamed lions have died
Who used to sing to me on afternoons of sun showers
And Saturdays in their permastone habitats circumnavigated
By the uncouth but jolly tourisms; and I have choice cuts of Flesh and dollar bills to tempt you with, and influence you
Down from your tall gardens:
I can feed you and a child in the effervescing light
Of televisions and trailer parks too. Come down,
Come down and let me wonder close for awhile, prowling
Your hypnotic smells,
Suddenly reintroduced to extinct but roomy
Foliage. Let me imagine
Animals in your bosom's Siamese
Nest- and let me wonder how many bones you
Have in your hand;
If I guess correcting what will you let me win,
Or band you with; and I just have
To say before the nightmares of fried chicken
And unicorns are coming home that being near you seems to Palpitate my soul like wet clay-
Like wet clay that dances for you in the sunlight of a room.

In The Sunshine Again

If I went down to Mexico, it was to drink
Salt:
And standing up that way from the impossible
Watering hole where the purple
Wilderness was rising up
And making a canopy of her gazes:
I froze for a moment,
Trying to remember the high schools of America
I once believed in,
And the stupendous tortoises who foraged there
Off oil black orchids underneath the broken Down school buses
In the middle of the incredible rainstorms-
Where they laid out baseball and alligators;
But there was only her lavender wilderness,
A soul of effluvious wings,
Poisonous and immortal: she sang to me through
Her body's forest,
And I came to her. Leaving myself never to sell
Fireworks in the sunshine again.

In The Sweet Sweet Bossoms Of Alma's Laughing And Pollinated Cenotaph

The midgets have my new heads in their cradles,
And my mother enjoyed her flowers on her day,
But I am greedy and the rest of my flowers have been for
Alma,
And I took her to eat pancakes,
But we haven't yet laid on our backs and consorted with the sky:
I have so little time with her:
There are always customers and coworkers and greedy,
Greedy uncles
With high and popping knuckles,
But I look at her all day juxtaposed with the water coolers:
Actually, the water cooler- it is just one- it is in the foreground
Like a Christmas tree,
And when my uncle gets back from West Virginia he will probably Fire me,
Because these are the times of our lean mountains,
And my parents are gone,
But visions of Alma happen repeatedly to me every day,
And so I or my ghost lives on,
As I press her kisses to me, as if my body was a book collecting her
Pollens,
As if I had some vested interest in the sweet, sweet bosoms
Of Alma's laughing and pollinated cenotaph.

In The Theatres Of The South

Here is the joy that makes no sound,
The pleasure given to a lover
With duck tape over her mouth-
The blindfolded surprise led down
To the river where
The procrustean preacher is Figuring out how to baptize
His flock where there is only desert
For miles around-
After school, the fox is in the chicken coop,
The cops are on holiday,
The dogs are asleep under the house,
And there is nothing left to do
As the rattlesnakes slither by,
But to pack your few things and Head for the war they are Performing in the theatres of the south.
Where after the silence,
Great men decorate the earth
Before they are found, while back up North
Their wives and their lovers,
After the fireworks and parades,
In the humid bedroom where they pray,
Lips cut upon missing letters,
Carefully perform the joy without a sound.

In The Time Of Your Sorrows

Maybe I made love to you and maybe there are still Ferris Wheels, Or maybe I am just as drunk as A gold fish in its plastic bag sold away from your golden
Silhouette at the fair:
Maybe I am all of this and none of this is real:
Maybe I have stopped breathing, Alma,
Maybe you are all that is boreal under the moon, and maybe you are
All that can save me,
While various professionals make love: and marsupials and primates,
And the other detectives make love smack dap in their spot lights
While the more reclusive lovers of these endives sip and feel
In the gallows of the penumbras of high noon:
And maybe I will never know how to feel you, Alma,
But it is high time that all of the children awakened and wiped their Eyes in awe and speculation,
Thoroughly recognizing the grandeurs deep in your despondent
Eyes that you loved an mailman high in the arid grandeurs of the departures
Of your old country, Alma: even though he could not hold you:
I took is place and loved you forever and tomorrow just to fill the caps
In the time of your sorrows, Alma, Alma, while he was away.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Tombs

Dollar for dollar at the spotless cathedral for Unicorns- becoming disbanded through the intractable
Union of my thoughts- her hands of green
Scars like paper sailboats across the grass- and in our Horizon, her tombs
Laid like easily defined lamp posts down the streets:
Or in the many meat markets of
The middling of our days: how many bright boys
As bright as we forget to clean themselves and thus Fell anonymously fighting for to be the captains of her Days- and the good English diction eat out of Their filibustered tongues: eat out in action
Underneath the tombs of the wild and philanthropic Hibiscus as if eaten out from underneath the sun:
As, if they could, their skeletons would all be dancing:
Dancing in the tombs pulled out from under the rug.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Trenches Of Mars

Solar tresses
Breed the sacrificial renaissance
Tossed amidst the Negroid stars:
The blind men who speak boldly
With both tongues,
But they have not choice but to set sail:
For their kingdom is on fire,
Set by a little boy playing in the flaccid wheat:
The book of matches a Molotov cocktail
The silos are full of hungry mice,
And the limpid police don't know which Lead to follow:
Their women are in two parts,
Both something of a failed actress,
The jungle is curling up the slopes;
They are pulling the steamer over the Mountains to see the Opera,
And the little girls who have yet to fail,
Contemplating the deadly fangs of their First loves, the Boom slang
Draped like wet laundry in the olive trees,
Which will molt the skin in the pews of church:
The hierarchical depictions of men in uniforms:
Bullets for the gun, and the Ferris Wheel's light-bulb barrel.
Tonight they have come to town,
Selling spun sugar under the abducting lights;
Their hands are full of little tickets for the rides,
And the things we say to impress our grandparents:
The lonely fingers weeping on the piano until dawn.
If I kiss her lips, it will be in the deepest sleep,
In the trenches of Mars, where the air is untried,
And the natives balloons in the evacuated park:
If I kiss her lips, it won't be tomorrow,
But tonight....

In The Truancies Of Our Escapes

Sleeping in the carport of the high school where I now
Teach,
All of the heavens out of reach and my body filibustering
For angels who will never learn
As the sky is a cathedral that will always burn,
And looking up into her
As the airplanes cross her skirts, and are in her hair
As if barrettes like girls famished in a
Busied Eucharist,
Waiting for the swing-sets to set- while all of the housewives
Are getting wet wet
And the jewelries around their necks, a Ferris Wheel
A midway above the notches of her clothes,
Recoiling softly dismissive as a single night into which
The frog princes sing sing of metamorphosis
Sing, sing
To the mirages in the desert- of words that have never found,
Of possibilities never reaching the flesh of tongues
Into a strange chorus where there are no gods exactly
But there is a certain metamorphosis
Of the daily thought: of how I can change into a prince for you:
How I can lay out my raiment across the fields for you,
In your legs of whatever colors you are:
Over the mowed grassed and the trimmed hedges of ixora Celebration how this has become a game without any Touchable rewards, just as if these were knights
Adventuring naked, into the wilderness without swords:
Or across the rivers who come grandly, cutting us out
Of our middles,
As we sleep as soundly as minnows drooled outwards onto
Our pillows into a popular world of our dreams,
With paper snowflakes for our weathers and paper airplanes of Our dreams:
We come down softly as winnowed hoof prints into our Meadows, in the daydreams of our twilight
Like jasmine in the séances of our artistic sleeping walking:
I reach out to touch you, the wind marking my fingertips,
The windows staring into the open yards
As the goldfish always see the truancies rising just as wildflowers

In the trauancies of our escapes.

In The Unforgiving Reality Where I Already Belong

Scars, like punched roses, the ungainly pugilists Tattooed by rich spined anemone, I have all these Expectations, like tourists lining a parade of Conquistadors flashing crustaceaned for the hurricane,
Blasting their green copper cannons to bemuse,
To wake up early the venal and the sick muse;
To lick his lips on liquor for breakfast, to be so sharp
And lucky as to read Baudelaire and Rimbaud in the Original pig-Latin; or girls in pigtails hiccupping on Spotchy ponies- Bullies waiting at the bus stop to punch
You like a type-writer, to send you spinning back over
The iron pyrite of her happy tresses, to the school day
Again in the green lanai with cartoonic blisses;
And I thought I'd succeeded in loving you by writing down
The perfect thing, and putting it in this bottle to save Me, but it seems I have to turn it out first, and upset the Apoplectic indigenous with my latching afternoon diseases,
Francaphonic and gardening, trying to think up impressive
Names for flowers, ending up defeated by lesser countries
With more beautiful covers; it would be so much easier
To take you out into the sun of my abandoned five acres,
Raping you to the sounds of lonely traffic, and spending
The rest of life doing penitence in the unforgiving reality where I already belong.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Utter And Unbounded Surreal

Now I have really felt the worth of my dreams:
They were first golden but they soon grew into your green,
A-,
And I cant help bragging of you:
You told me that you don't like going out into the sun,
But you came from that dry country in the elbow of another world
So far nearer the Equator I can only imagine what it Sounds like:
I think that I want you for a wife, Alma, and this time I think That I cannot help getting what I want,
Because I have your patron Saint on my side: The virgin of Guadalupe
Has woken up and rubbed her eyes:
She likes the fact that her imagine is in the last window of my car,
And that I have two candles burning for her right now:
And I colored my hair for you tonight,
Alma- and on Wednesday I wish to buy you lunch, and I hope I
Can work your aunt Mierna's shift again, so that I can give her my pay
For more of the jewelry from Mexico that you like
To wear;
And I am aware of your inequality, Alma: I am aware that you are Far too beautiful for me,
But I will use my tricks and my witchcraft to carry you through The stanchied hibiscus and all the way up to the heavens where
The dragons and the other heavy beasts are breathing,
Because even though I didn't hear you come,
You have come and you did prevail,
And my twerps of penmanship are all so busy humming, and trying to Carry your melody,
To lift you up from the rusting hinges of this mundane and diadem you
Forever where you belong: In the utter and unbounded surreal.

In The Valley Of The Shadow Of Death

I thought maybe today it would snow,
But I still went ahead and did the regular things;
If I drank more Chablis, I think I might Get my poems published, in lustrous broadsides,
Knickknacks for worms and other handles,
Scattered there in the valley of the shadow of death along with
The loosed cannonballs and ceaselessly joyful cavalries,
Find that I don't have to shave to become An associate professor of poetry at a local college,
If I lived in New England, or knew how to Fix and ride a John Deer tractor, or write a Letter to a best friend, or someone who could become a politician,
But I only drink the cheapest rum, and do not watch Football, and baseball only when it comes to
The world series. I fixate on bartenders who do
Not come, who are busier with better handles-
I'm a strange sort of bum, who shoots roman candles Across the canal, spends the day alone chewing his Gums under the roly-poly sun: I have spend days
And days alone, throwing sticks and bones to my Dogs, lulling; and yet tomorrow, I shall join weddings
In the shadow of the Colorado Rockies, only to Go back down again away from the lips of sommeliers.
For now I will stay up until I come down, and these will Be the last few lines of another evening in limbo:
What strange inventions, these last charges of the light Brigade, while grandfathers snore the next room over
From their favorite sons. I used to crack her knuckles
For her, and c*ck her guns; but that really isn't true,
None of it, the unruly schemes patter out upon the Skree along the nape of nostalgia's summit.
I can see it like yesterday, and thus I scramble to reach
Her who I am forever approaching.

In The Velvet Ballroom Of Your Hapless Soul

I do not call this house my house.
How does a crustacean choose its home;
Is that its mission from an early age
To set out and beat the worm-
When I was packed posthaste into this flesh
And bone
With nothing to say about it, and all of its Lonely wounds:
Rather, I can hear the cicadas like alley cats,
And you know the sky is blue but only sleeping,
And I'd like to set out right now and leave
This cenotaph, let other creatures wriggle through
The open house and reanimate it into Rich bouquets of adulterated spume;
And leaving all that has haunted me, enter you with
No presumption,
That leggy ballroom- the sumptuously busted promenade
How you go straight out into your workaday- and make Love, and call out names, and play-
Your arms would be my swing set, your tongue my Spongy bed- Your eyes the windows burning across
All that I was meant to see,
And I would once hinder you, seeing how you made love,
Spelunking in your echoes free of charge,
All your juicy spaces- your pomegranate hordes,
Your butcher's holiday would be a great wilderness for My spirit to explore,
Or dancing with you in the velvet ballroom of your Hapless soul.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Warmth Of Familiar Holidays

I have a house that is fully grown:
I have a house that is a grandfather, who I bought from A homosexual artist and his mother who Was at least as old as this house:
He painted each room a different soft shade of shell,
And now each room flows around my barren body
While I think of Sharon and fireworks:
I think of the things that will sell, that aren't already venal,
And yet are not scarred like me;
It must take a beautiful being to be not either of the two,
And yet someone who hasn't seen the soft tips of mountains
Underneath the coiling planes of nimbus:
For surely the rains will be blocked up like traffic,
And they will wait for awhile like rabbits in the briars,
Enjoying their festivals until it is time again to escape:
Just as I can write my novels, and think upon Alma
And her warm children
While around me the people who are renting their bodies two one Another make the sounds of a joyful orchard;
And if I have been away, it has only been to Arizona, or maybe
My soul has been away,
But the planets continue to shuffle their feet. They are getting cold
Waiting outside,
Wanting like little children, like us all, to return home once again,
Basking in the warmth of familiar holidays.

In The Wastelands Of South Florida

I burnish words to distract from my impotence,
Like homosexuals go to pet in the zoo:
If I knew a better way I would look you in the eye
While I wrote short fiction long-handed;
And I would not turn away in dénouement,
To make a tragedy; Carefully, I should imprint you
In wayward publications, the way a mother wolf
Teaches her young how to hunt through a feral education:
And use a windlass to crank you up from the sharks,
Who smile like carnivorous dentists, the Precambrian
Utensils who wish to use you as the heroin in their toothy fairy-tale;
But I would whisk you under a tipsy sun;
If we had children, we'd set them out before the waves,
So that they could catalogue the way the sea breathes,
In each motion, where the fish leap like squadrons of Biplanes; and it would be easier, the way we napped,
And the places that we chose, my nostalgia readily dipped
Into, for it has always swam the dimple of your navel,
Where your mother picked you like a fruit, and held you
In the hospital's sanitizing light, and drenched you
With those amorous eyes, until they and all the other senses
Knew you well, and sent you spinning into high school
Where our gravities touched like a microcosm of heavenly bodies,
Until you spun me away by your centripetal force never diminished
By all this time and years sweating like octogenarians Enduring their perilous calisthenics in the wastelands of South Florida.

In The Weddings Of The Sea

Imperfect repetitions- how I throw my body again
And again, Like the Sudden but happy fish coming out of the river to steal a
Bolt of sun,
To watch the horse and her children run:
And before that there was high school then, all the children entering
And exiting there:
I don't care- This is my song running out barefooted out into the Grasses of the front yard,
No matter how small that front yard has to be:
It must always stop and look breathlessly at the traffic swaying there:
Back and forth, like curtains, like lungs:
And the funny things we've had to say, we've had said to us:
And this is America,
So take the bus:
And Alma had to get on home again today, her body moving through
The boleros of the jungle and the sea:
Her body that was pressed so close against the cash register,
And so close again to me this wonderful day,
That I could almost see the birth places in her eyes, and the needs of Her children:
Oh Alma, Alma: you are a mirror, and this is my mirror trying to fit
For you,
As the waves march in the weddings of the sea.

In The Wilderness Of A Vast And Heartfelt Desolation

If girls are still up in Colorado,
I don't want to go to sleep
While the aspens are still changing;
And I feel consoled by looking at their children
And their liquor bottles,
That I should be like any number of deciduous timber
Deep in the forest or a long ways up
Her rocky gown,
To change my words only before the feral eyes
Of the creatures who live in desolation;
To wear my lightning scars without a kind voice
Of comparison:
I look at her eyes far away and say this to her
That I could never belong even in her lap looking up in A castanet of eyelashes,
Like the trunk of a velvet car: In another life we would Have made a go of it
Homesteading in Clearwater FL, playing scrabble and Tennis with my uncle;
But she's married now; oh boy, and an entrepreneur,
And I am immortal, even if the world doesn't Care to know about it- After winter hits
And there is no more gold to breathe, I will let my Colors change underneath the calligraphies chiseled into
The common epitaphs of prostrate bachelors,
Letting the nurseries of earthworms smell the fermenting
Perfumes of my wrists;
And wait for her to never come, and say how she did not Know me, or look at me with any kind of consternation,
Wondering why it was I lived for her,
And sang my silent songs to her in the wilderness of a vast
And heartfelt desolation.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Wind

I am the only one who
Org*sms
An origami jungle
Screaming in papier-mâché
Vertebrates
Where the sun is a paper
Plate
Burning orange-flamed lips
At the picnic,
Turn to curling ash in the whispering
Grass,
As something like 10,000
Army ants march past,
The pomegranate armored conquistadors
Of a luscious past,
Looking for the fabled city
Through the bladed forest,
All that wealth fallen from my sticky
Splayed fingers, piano players
Stretching out from my slumbering palm,
Made entirely from sweet vermillion
Watermelon
Which glistens in ruby pyramids
In butchered geometry toward the sun,
Circled by gossiping horseflies
Who are taking a walk
In the wind.

In The Windowless Room

See me after school in the windowless room
Sitting next to the sixteen year old Mexican girl—
Not a scar on my face
Can hide my uneasiness, but she has control Over
Every blade of grass,
And even the airplanes become her angels
Of the sky,
Until we become lost from ourselves,
Going home to see the old families before
The televisions—
Those whom we've enjoyed so many Christmases
Together
That even the snowflakes have become sick of Turkey—
Soon it becomes Chinese New Year—
And all of the people dance and light off fireworks
Upon their make-believe continents,
Just as you can assume that they've been doing—
Yet Antarctica remains nearly empty and Yet as big as Russia—
Can we go to see each other there, sixteen year old
Mexican girl,
And make our own continent out of her—
Disrobe our minds of the holocausts of our anyways
Societies—
And see what emotions cut from the papers that
We are yet to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Wings Of So Many Throaty Migrations

It takes a whole year for some people to Reject my words,
But they have just done it; and gifted me with
All that time of tiny little hope,
Of hidden jaw-bone springs,
Of all sorts of tiny new birds who have come
To these lower eves to pullulate and twitter as if They were the leaves;
And I love her still, though being defeated,
And last night I would have hung myself with an Orange extension cord- but that doesn't need
To be repeated- the light is daft, and the light
Is starboard; and I am swimming hard toward Her craft- In fact I am flying upward using Pillows and holding my breath, making the gesticulations
Of a homing pigeon- so let her crease me with Somnambulant light and lay me down across her bed,
Her study board- and interact with me while spinning
Her jubilant records over the trees who are dancing
In the wings of so many throaty migrations.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Womb Of Erstwhile Conclusions

The tenements starving underneath the hoof-prints of Angels—and he comes home to you, brown-skinned—apiary
And you make love for fewer than five minutes—
And when you go to sleep you become all of my heavens,
Like a cemetery on fire islands—and words that go together
When there is nothing else at home— just as a turtle Cannot reach a doorknob, or a playwright who is being Pierced through the eye—and so many nights come leaping
Down through the Aristotelian Spheres while I cannot figure out Anything else that is even remotely beautiful to say—
There once was I time where I didn't seem to know you,
And as the seasons seem to go around perpetually Famishing forever—like enamored Ferris wheels making an End to their own midways—underneath the savage heavens
Where all the gods we've abandoned can never even Spell—it all seems to be coming back around—
And sleep in the womb of erstwhile conclusions that I am never Sure that we can even spell.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Wombs Of The Daylight

In the wombs of the daylight we get our summers:
And in the spring times,
The airplanes touch down—
And when they do, they get wet—
They also become a catastrophe,
The same way that your eyes
Never fell upon me—
Woman across the aisle from me—
And this is some kind of wedding,
Because there is cake
And baby's breath—
And when the daylight awakens there will be
Trips to other planets on quests for water,
And the school buses will return for the Butterflies—
And there will be much noise and jubilation
But not much else,
Even if there are survivors.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Yard

Now you fill me up with
Airplanes
And goldfish:
The cats sits for awhile: the sun milks up
The dish;
And everything else just turns around:
The music gets up in the grass:
My mother dries her clothes-
In the yard, another rabbit: another rose.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Yard I Knew As A Young Man

I don't know how you figure this- how you call
Me up buried in my weathers:
I don't know how the light sounds nor feels around your Shoulders,
But they are an orchard still breathing outside of
Disney World,
And I have so much free time to experience loneliness:
Possibilities unwrapping on the other side of The world,
Like crickets pursuing the mermaids in their every changing
Cerulean changing rooms
Until they can finally back up into a grotto and make love
With the juvenile offspring of orange trees
Teasing them- and the world in the trance of a zoetrope
Filled with cypress trees
Who happen to be growing up in the yard I knew
As a young man.

Robert Rorabeck

In The Zoos Underneath The Ceiling Fans

Emolliate another night, and give me succor
With my fingers scoured from
Try to light of roman candles above the ant mounts
Perpetuating a baseball diamond:
Let me strike out again after midnight upon a Terrible odyssey,
Masturbating over the moldy pages of another
Pornography
Whose light flames like vermilion turpentine
Trying to turn its sickness into another believe
Even while all of the children are coming
Home combustive in a rain cloud
And all of the lions are roaring, yellow maned-
They seem to be yawning up at the yellow coated
Heroes who are already returning to their bedrooms
And eating fried chicken their parents bought
Them on their way home from the other day laborers:
And so they rest, as the yard crickets,
In the zoos underneath the ceiling fans like so many Other things that could once have been said
To have almost existed.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Battalions Of Loneliness

My pitiful voice hurries along in the loud
Whispers in the footsteps of a world that doesn't Change;
If you knew she was getting married, and you still Went to the park to watch the funeral processions,
To sniff the crotches of angels;
And to know just so many words to believe in
The challenges of evil gods,
But to be impotent when mocking them:
To be a lost bird speaking colorfully through the trees,
Mouthing off to muses while they make love in other States,
Or even other worlds and never really once even Thinking of you, how you are already dying for them-
Why you might as well be crucified, lining the park
In golden chains,
Pretending to be a song bird, your paper songs
All strung out and disorganized, quickly forgotten
Under the more necessary cigarettes in their battalions of Loneliness as it rains.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Colors

Dogs lay brilliant beside their home:
The entire mountain has burned, and Alma has run Away to Ocala:
When I made love to her, it was just after her husband
Made love to her
Coming down on father's day across Palmetto-
And her breasts had two nipples where he seemed to Have sucked in unison,
And I made love to her as the day grew dark,
And the ants returned home,
Marching- and the dogs closed their eyes and in Their colors, dreamed.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Conquered Countries

I'll go back home to the love joys
In the sessions of hypnotism in their kindergartens,
Breathing like goldfish in paper bags
With their hands on the handlebars of plastic bicycles
From paper chests;
And this is a lesson learned before memories can form:
This is the rain calling up the long-fibrillose tails of Worms
Through the roots of a tree of death, through its long
Spanish roads like veins of precious stones
Slithering past the groves and along the ancient fortifications
Of the Romans who used to look down at the unquieting
Sea as they stole and made love to all those girls
In their conquered countries.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Dances Of Airplanes

Memories for a little while
Look like words,
Letters curled up for her in séances
While my dog gets drunk with Me on my bed—
Then fade, the forgotten art of Muses that once could start fire with
A baring of their toes—
Now have gone home to the Average husband
And wait beside the opaqueness in
The theatre of his television—
No roses now stuck to the windows
Of parked cars—
Or ways to find out drunkenly which Way she has gone home,
Following her like a wolf besides
The dog tracks and baseball diamonds
All in a drunken serenade and all
Beneath the soirée of the stewardesses
In their dances of airplanes.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Dinner Parties Of Geodes

Franchises beneath the palmettos and airplanes,
Trying to say her name into dusk,
Losing myself like cicadas- watching the little boys
Turn gray in the wash of cenotaphs and Orange groves, while that very angel they love
Is just above them, fawning on a carnival
Of wires,
Like a kite they could not buy- and all of their reflections
In the windows of other's cars, mimicking them
Covered with dust from some girl's, or their sister's,
University- and it feels quite fine to lie, or to Do their parents harm in the middle of the day:
To sit up there as high as any house in their neighborhood,
Woebegone, or sitting in armchairs anyways, across
The canals segregating their counterparts like intersections
Do winos, and lighting fireworks, fireworks to the Recalcitrant gods who refuse to work anymore,
And lay ensconced anyways in their dinner parties of geodes.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Goldfish Bowls

I wrote most of my poetry for you
When I as twelve years old,
In pure delight upon the saddle while
The blue bird sang,
Radiant in the cannibalisms- as the sun
Doused the fire tower in the summit
Like gasoline,
And the mummies remained perfectly
Entombed:
So they remained, and Grand Central Station remained,
And the pond where the ducks were Remained,
Like Allie and his baseball glove:
Perfectly obscure around the outlines
Of school,
While cheerleaders were swimming,
And the goldfish were dancing in their Goldfish bowls.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Grottos Of Carports

Slow despotic merry weathers under the tunicates
Of the zoo and her ever soft tributaries:
Glass bottles being blown open like flowers from their Long necked wounds,
As we held each other today, the bed springs Playing the long entwined legs of our Amber harpsichord,
And I saw churches in your eyes, Alma- even as you had
To go away and open
His doors, your children coming home from daycare
And latch keying around the despotic living room
Like spots of green,
While I have seen the lions yawning on anonymous holidays
Through the holly,
And I skipped school and floated with the ceaselessly
Optimistic otters,
Without even knowing who you were then, or that I would Have to run to make you my wife in time before the fairs
Of my enamoration closed their bright midways,
As the mothers swooned in their grottos of carports underneath
The lattening, fat bellies of storms.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Homeless Gardens

Now we sang of the infinite yards: and now this:

And now this:

The way I sometimes still see my own mother inside the blue carport

Getting undressed and electrocuted:

They way sometimes too I wished that I knew my own

Words:

Like a self aware mocking bird, and the songs that I give again

To you- to you, like a sophisticated if inebriated fantasies

Up the three stories of the galleries of my fantasies

That I walked with you today:

Alma, on our Tuesday of today: while last time we held tennis and

Then I carried you into a sea where you couldn't even swim,

And I kissed you, and held you underneath the teepees of the

Sun,

And all of her vanishing elements: while today we took my own

Car up and down Military Trail, and you told me that your man

Wasn't unkind to you,

But then I remember how he left you and Michael and went to

Mexico:

But he came back again; and again he is here:

But today he was in Orlando with Mickey Mouse, finishing his

Pools for over eager housewives,

And that was why you were right here; and you are either a good

Woman climbing my proverbial beanstalk or I am blind;

And even if I am blind, I still have so many harmless stories

In their homeless gardens left to sing for you.

In Their Hopeless Schools

In the school:
Echoes of bleach- pitifully superficial
Holocaust
Of adolescent fanfare the busses bring here:
Children come here
And they are lost- from class to class:
What brings them? They have no
Will to learn,
But they giddy up through the turnstiles
With youth to burn:
And I watch them matriculate from Copper state to bronze-
The airplanes don't even pretend to brush them:
The airplanes leap across the canals
These children don't even think to leap across:
The greatest angels burn their
Fuselages across the milkweeds and the puss willows:
The pilots are taking their stewardesses into
The bosoms of the mountains,
Populated with wildflowers and honey due:
To make love
Far above the mindless heads of the children
In their hopeless schools of every afternoon.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Mornings

Prisms in the bottom of a cup,
As if I am pressed to your lips themselves
Mirror reflections of Siamese pronouns,
And softly bathing manatees at the bottom
Of a housewife's pool—
The day's long surrender into the nocturnal
Honeymoon
Where the otters bathe twisted about like
Olives in a martini glass—
Slowly, the sunlight like cadmium and Gunpowder sacrificed to the universe—
Sinking with all of her animals,
Unto the séances of houses where the mammals
Barely whisper,
And she walks over them, taking their numbers,
And talking to them softly—whispering, whispering
And promising them eggs and bouquets
In their mornings.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Navel's Caesuras

And unicorns eating lunch underneath the Overpass avoiding the roses
As they gossip—gossip:
&quot;The roses are too beautiful—beautiful&quot;
For lunch—
And I rode by them on my bicycle on My way home
On the weekend underneath the airplanes that Could be leaping anywhere,
They were paid to be up to so many chances—
Yes, like wishes—wishes in
And evaporated wishing well,
As the moon swung her hips and then swung
Her shoulders:
And I thought to the busy cemetery—cemetery
Even though she wasn't going anywhere;
&quot;Where have you buried my pretty love—
Oh, cemetery—Oh, where? &quot;
She said, &quot;Look up into the pretty sky,
Since that is where I've buried her—since that is Where I-&quot;
But even then I could not see her, lost in
The house as she was lost with her man—
And clouds accumulating, blinding the lighthouse
With their caracoles,
As the waves galloped abandoned,
At once bosomy and lapsing in their navel's Caesuras.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Own Makebelieves

Words in picture books have less meaning- accompanied
As they are by the sweet verification;
As herons are fencers in the park where childhood still gets Up through its blazes
To burn its forehead on the reflections of the snowfields
Blinding down
From the happy trauancies of the gods who are up there
Once again summer above tree line,
Adulterous, restless,
Believing as do we in their own makebelieves.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Regalia's Crenulations

Time crawls at a steady pace- snails over
The backs of terrapin-
Foxes laying in the grass, tasting grapes:
We watch the race horses,
And talk about busted uncles, as the mountain
Wears the fire like a necklace-
The planes, like angels dance, and the traffic turns around Underneath her,
Lost in the prefabrications of the city. Where is
All of this going,
I wonder, as she slips away with him, back to
Her marriage underneath the bridge-
The great bodies of water trying to reach up towards
Her, slowly breathing in their regalia's crenulations;
And I sit and weep
Even after all of the beautiful tourists have somehow
Swam away.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Unabashed Visage

Rife with the kites in the air- the inexperienced
Wind blowing anyways,
Over the super markets and estuaries, and the Young girls gone astray losing themselves
In the grass like emerald ashtrays,
And looking up for no good reason, counting
The good luck of elephants in the clouds,
And the pinstripes of pilots burning their Showing their armpits for the gods
And bathing in their unabashed visage.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Unutterable Pain

I suppose if I eat lunch alone I will have a brand new Girlfriend,
And she will look at herself so finely like a golden fish in
A lavender dish in some long and fabulously slender
Home,
While even now Alma is kissing his mouth as he calls her home
Into the weeds and scuppernongs:
As he calls her home and home and home;
And I just want to lie with my dogs, and travel fancifully up
The backs of unplanned mountains:
I just want to disappear into the lightning apertures that tear apart
Sunlight:
I just want to bight my lip and write another new novel:
I just wish that I could look good riding my bicycle,
While the planets grew fat in their loneliness,
And the erstwhile meanings of the perpetual sorority flaunted
Their glowing stuff over the Cemetery where all the old generals and grandmothers continued
Weeping;
And maybe it is that I will die, or maybe I will just return to The library;
But it already feels so long,
And even as the lights dim, the sailors sip their stuff and wait
For the pinpricks to cover the stratosphere and thus
To realize that they are never alone for long in their unutterable pain.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Work

Wounded by airplanes and agape,
And then to be seeming to look away at new wounds:
The sky opens up,
Like the proverbial sea parting,
And the old lovers find untried things to say to themselves-
Their bed sparking of the utensils of heavily
Used fireworks,
As the rusty wolves wait in the timbers of the over-fallen
Woods,
Where even the tinniest of little girls have over-slipped
Their playgrounds
And are making new wounds into the dirt,
Their skirts all too open for the busiest of ants
Who are themselves too busied in their work.

Robert Rorabeck

In Their Yesterday

Prettying ribbons around a heart—
She is dying in a flea market: around her,
All of the vanishing houses and
The sea:
Getting up tomorrow, tasting on my lips
The salt lick of sea horses:
Their fishtailed homeopathy:
Swooning in the bathrooms between
The classes of my students:
They disappear at an hour's length:
They go home,
Dividing like starfish—they all know their Way home,
And they go that way,
Like intelligent rays escaping the sun,
Biting their lips
Too self conscious to talk back to
The heavens that birthed them in their yesterday.

Robert Rorabeck

In Them

Another promenade of a sorority,
Bringing out their show around their water fountains,
Preening and attempting their peonies—
They love their football teams—
Entire parking lots of them,
And there elbows bend away like the hemisphere—
Growing through the stained glass of the churches
Of their universities—
To end up as trophy wives—
Somehow there are too many of them to number,
And they sing together in the afternoon on Weekends—
They know nothing of astronomy, yet they are up there—
Like vanishing pictures in the coloring books
Of girls who are too old now to find
Any understanding in them at all.

Robert Rorabeck

In These Features Of My Metaphor

I put this on my face so that you will love me.
My receding hairline is the bosque they are clearing,
To make room for the grandest boys selling the biggest Fireworks that go on forever.... Effluvious
Victorian showers of velveteen gold;
My little scars are fading fast like salt pools on the Inland sea,
Each imperfection of a feeling, the earliest realization
Of a wicked infant's propensity for sin;
I wear it like a heirloom of a drag queen, what the father
Said atop the roof before he took off his belt and beat
Him under the winsome moon, and the feline panting:
From there you could see the junkyard of cars across the Ditches shaded by the pinetree harem, swinging shady,
Shady- Take it off; and my mouth, that bruised harbinger,
That lady killer who mouth-offs to black widow spiders
Who scuttle across the kitchen linoleum when the housewife
Stumbles in drunk after midnight to wash the cerulean dishes,
He is the rock garden out from that is no long there,
Because they widened the road; Filled with svelte cactus
Quills as fine as dandelions, and dead rabbits hung upon them
Like short haired saints- Compelled into their draping penitence
By the peer pressure of neighborhood dogs;
And my tongue, and we could go from here to my neck.
She used to say it was the best thing about me;
And she kissed once or twice between entanglements with Cotton candy. But she was a churl come down to get out of The weather, and I soon learned to disbelieve her;
In fact, I am certain she is no longer in these features of My metaphor.

Robert Rorabeck

In These Woods

Your body a brown misfit with silver
Haunts; it jaunts across these borders, bones moving
Beneath the jeans in the luscious traffics
A few but many see-
The eyes the quacks like the breakfast of over easy
Eggs for wolves:
The tongue that pants and lollygags, and then strips
Naked in these woods,
And says the few things to you lying down that It could:
The few but many things, as you pant, that you can understand.

In This Morning Of Unwieldy Exercise

If she can live here, I suppose I can live here too,
Even though the breaths of her life are populated by another man:
And she shares his bed right now, while her daughter is singing
And the stars are right up there but so far away;
Like drunks on the roofs whose dreams are turning like carnivals,
Whose dusty cats have become entire lions:
And there is where I have walked for most of my time, lonely and Out of school, down the dismissed paths unused by the Populace, through the shady trees which leave little room,
Into the cloudy fiends whose houses have disappeared and whose Fireworks all lay spent like young do-gooders exhausted and pell-mell
Into the grasses who have been dewed too well to come awake
So early in this morning of unwieldy exercise.

In Those Intoxicating Skies

Taking advantages to this flower:

Lost in an Ozark off a pace from the trailer park,

Musing to the untalented halls of everyone else

Who exists here:

There will be school tomorrow and rain

And sunshine.

And lessons to be learned, and colors to be

Colored in the lines:

But her eyes will always be there, with her bosom,

Aureoled,

With her brown shoulders like a vessel in a hidden

Forest:

She will remain for the brevity of vagabonding

Amusement parks,

Until her lights are all done with,

And crippled, giving their carnival shadows to the

Illuminations of midgets,

And the rivers continue somewhere sideways from

The baseball diamonds- continue,

As the pilots look down, and the stewardesses

Remember their childhoods,

As they dance the night forever in those intoxicating skies.

In Unexplainable Goodbyes

Hold outs for penny courts,
Hoodlums with nothing to hold:
All the pages I have filled with the drizzling of Caracoles:
How like snowflakes that all together fall,
Each one significant, and yet none of them mean
Anything at all;
But they come together in a fraternity that will Not last for you
My muse- their very souls a transitory pigmentation
That will metamorphose before
Your brown eyes:
Alma,
They will turn away into rivers at your feet,
Just to kiss your forgotten footprints as they whisper
In unexplainable goodbyes.

Robert Rorabeck

In Unnatural Toys

Embalm me in unnatural toys and I
Will await you above the forest
And above the Ferris Wheel until I become
But that familiar vision walking his apex
Over the abandoned cornucopias and Television programs—
I have tried my best to sell fireworks to your Soul,
Even before I knew that it was you atop
Of my friend's house in the middle of a school
Day—transfixed with all of your charms,
Spinning in the sunbeaming spiderwebs of
The truancies of our postmodern saturnalia
And now you give a new daydream for
The beating of my heart
Even before I return and start off again towards That infected afternoon where you can never be relieved
In the venal baseball games of a penultimate summer:
It is the venomous sport that the rattlesnake is Grinning and this is just how we get up
Again above Miami and all of Mexico: this is just How we start of dying—trying to make copper or Bronx—while the shadows cool themselves—
And the words keep on spinning—and you are half naked
Beside your husband's pool—and you are getting up
After the jasmine are all done closing:
Isn't this your spell them—and if not—well, at least
I am all done supposing.

In Vermilion Accolades

If the night is freckled with ixora, then I will make a wish,
While the children are like kites waiting in their doorsteps of sky
For their fathers who come flying in,
Hoofed and in chariots of airplanes; and I have been down so long:
I have cut my fingers to feed the minnows in the canal,
While their homeopathic silver ness has gone on to feed even Bigger things:
And it is nice to lie here in the fat oxygen in a house painted with the Soft colors of a seashell
And do things for Alma, even while new souls are getting ready to Graduate again from high school-
To get up and stretch their legs and go a little further down their Ways,
While the emerald waters rush in vermilion accolades.

In What I've Already Said

Brands are burning in the sun—
The sun light is all but over
The trailer parks—
And even before the show is over,
The moon rises—
It becomes appeased—a collector
Of arrowheads and souvenirs—
And other words I neither dare to Read or say—
But your first loves started here,
In the valleys of their contraptions,
And settled downwards as
The snow melted and you had
To decide if it was you who was becoming More or less beautiful—
And you took a husband as your art.
When you graduated, you stopped
Riding the school bus—
And you fornicated in the afternoon
As the tin horns melted—
And the wild bucks swooned into the Snowmelt—
And you forgot about the corruptions of First loves and everything else—
But you remain my sister—
And I write about you everywhere
Especially when I am drunk—
And the moon is hooded
And the muses and wolves are in bed—
If you are quiet, you can listen to what
They are doing,
Or you can just trust in what I've already said.

In Which No One Is Ever, Ever Home

Pretty words rhyme like pretty girls making love,
Lactating in a sorority of a self-picking- picking time:
The instruments of a nubile flesh look best
Juxtaposed next to the iridescent graveyard:
The youth of milk and ladles pouring over grandmother's bones;
And I don't really know the characters of these species;
I am just familiar with the carports of these grottos, of the goldfish
In his loam,
And of a house in which no one is ever, ever home.

Robert Rorabeck

In Which They Once Belonged

Tonight in the haze of glory, shooting off our mouths
To the nocturnals, and we'll have new fun by those moons:
The entire forest will have a fire,
But the bears will sleep: they will find new crevices, and Grottos and deeps:
The fairs of my heart will move in above their doused heads,
And light up:
And all of the rides will sing Alma's name to the netherworlds
Of the paths that twist in their half ways up the mountains
Of motherless folklore, to disappear in sandy beds,
In the entrails of ululating waters where the feral otters douse their Heads;
And dream like companions of my beds: the dogs at my feet
Like acolytes, or the wayward airplanes in the sheets of clouds:
Dream of her without any thoughts of blessing themselves
Again onto the tarmacs,
Of waking up again into the kindling of bitter news, cut into the Snowflakes falling in the make-believe over the blue streets;
As I hold her in the sumptuous mission where her ancestors
Defeated my ancestors,
But who returned back again into the golden deserts, seeming to Map for a ways the loneliness in which their children must follow
Forever the way back in which still sing the places
In which they once belonged.

Robert Rorabeck

In Which You Have Never Sung Nor Been

They say that there are dolphins floating through
The timbers and the trees:
They say that they go there for little girls who kiss and curl
The lilacs as they color;
And they stand taught against the limbs of the verdant lumber
Who seems to cradle them like giant mothers:
And I think of her beneath these wild and coned conifers:
I think of her from the lips of mountains
Combed with cliffs of burly stone: I think of the men who were Lost into the brilliant stratospheres who she still hopes
Might come down,
Even if there is no hope: and I hold your hand and pray to you
From the resounding basins underneath the schools of Stars in the bloody nosed plateaus in which you have neither Sung nor been,
Alma.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Auburn Hair

A blasphemy upon the walls of a religious Bathroom:
This is what it is, and scarred with dyslexia—
Devils hanging upside down.
They are who stole all of your mother's jewelries
While she was kissing her new bo—just
On the outskirts of town—
And when I saw you in the classroom,
Like upon the far banks of an entirely innocent
River- In unkempt séances these were born—
Pets, lactates—and staples of every kind
Of luscious meat—following you through the hallway
As airplanes circled in the sky—
And sometimes you would look up or Fall to your knees in pieta—as a yellow butterfly
Presses like a barrette in your auburn hair—
But it was only to show your appreciation
For the heavens' cerulean discharges—
And then you went on your way back home,
Or to grandmother's house—
And back into the world where you could not Be appreciated by me.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Doll House

When the day laborers peek under your skirt,
In your doll house there are bears,
And after they make love, what will you say to your Mother- that I am waiting outside in your car,
And there is a mermaid riding a unicorn, but I do not Believe in her. I do not know when I will run away
Again,
And you and your brown skin army, who are doing
Pushups on you: I thought I wanted to die,
But then I thought of how the dead things die in Dead coral,
And they remain beautiful for schools of fish-
And I wonder how the fresh water fish dream under
You when they go to sleep in their alligator beds-
Do they wonder what it feels like to pet your Brown houses, as I did for a year, and you cleaned Yourself for me and made yourself look pretty
As the bicycles lay underneath you and your even More beautiful and even more younger sisters
Slept in their bunk beds and dreamed about flirting
With boys even more beautiful than me.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Dreams

Oh, sure, the moon dreams of its Pretty women and its pretty
Men,
But when will it dream of me,
If it is only one moon and there is only
So many faces in its month
Of cycles,
And only so many suburban dredges it
Can float across all at once;
But doesn't it like to linger too where
There are no tourists,
Where the mountains run uncaged,
Spilling their guts down into your little Christmas town,
And I really don't care about what it dreams,
Always pregnant in its pauper's
Row:
I want a golden canoe to lay you down
To float with you across the zoo of many seams;
That's all I care to do-
F$ck the moon, I want to be in your dreams.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Eager Graveyards

Over the four shoulders,
Of the monuments at the end of highways:
The soft ways the birds sing—
Echoing in castanets of blue-gilled canyons:
The cars drive as if charioteers,
And the days long with the shadows of Puppeteers and grandfathers,
But I am going home now,
Following the wet caresses as the entrails
Of tears of words—
As I saw you as if from the elbow of a passing
Airplane,
Taking a shower, a little debutant in your Haunts and aloes:
I thought I had loved you,
As the reasons sped away, and the high schools
Laid barren as if on the weekends;
And you lay with him,
Caressing in your eager graveyards.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Estuary

Groggy night in your estuary—
I can still hear the Mexicans trying to sell some Ice-cream
In the afternoon after church on Sunday—
And it is all a miss—the graveyards are dancing,
Your knights have chased off
After their witches of another Christmas—
And the baseball fields lay out all
Emptied as an archaeological dig after a rainstorm:
My muse has hung herself like the Heavenly ornament in the living room
Of another man she cannot possibly love
Because she happens to love me—and this
Is the end of this—nightmarish serpent devouring
Herself throughout the swing-sets of eternity:
As the day in its life goes:
Candles blown like paper airplanes across the canal:
And the boy whom we have known as Jack flits and Leaps, doing all of his tricks without so many
As one single love possibly being in his heart.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Flaxen Hair

Talking in tongues of Landmines
The night smells really Wonderful
Like how I imagined
Your bedroom to Smell in the Middle of tenth grade,
While I promise myself I've Made it through Greater wounds than this While the
Alligator watches me
With sweet promise on Its lips,
And I swear I haven't seen
A better pair of eyes
Inside a decade while
Up ahead the traffic
Moves like
Unbound ribbons
In your flaxen hair.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Holy Banners

The universe runs on your legs:
See it dressed up the stars of your limbs:
Oh,
The universe has bangs,
And we all flee north in your shadow,
In your holy banners,
Panting like kittens with holistic eyes;
And the shore,
The shore runs for miles-
The shore is your ribbon, and it runs for miles,
And these are the things you prove,
And I have seen them keeping time from the Roof of our old high school,
Because I loved you there, even if I couldn't
Say it:
I always wanted to be more beautiful,
So I could run with you;
And there were chickens in the halls, and I failed math,
And I couldn't find you, but you were there:
A short skirted general in charge of the green copper
Cannons,
Didn't you know that these are the things I've
Had to say to you for many miles;
If I could drink from your shadow,
To lap from your dime sized amusements it would almost Be enough,
And I want to buy you a pool and a very little dog,
Because you are my universe,
But you are already married and I don't know what to Do about that
But to get drunk again and pretend I am a very modern Conquistador,
Sailing blissfully down his canals fully adorned in brilliant aspects
Of your truly holy skyway.

In Your Modes Of Lackadaisical Use

Blue as your eyes are they only go so far in:
They only provide so much shelter for your man and your Children:
They go burning like the tinsels of fire blown from an Un concealed fan;
Your oranges are luscious for the frying pan:
And even if I am not your man, your lips were as good as Salted ham,
And with my body in my hand, I can fling my self up into
The deceptive riches of your ruled ceiling,
Like a paper airplane altogether with a harem of plastic stewardesses
All in the full body of their conformed dress,
The night your last cigarette, and my words your best reason
For opening your eyes to the hibernations of your family:
They go weeping straight into your shallow abyss
Just like the tearless bodies of crocodiles and of Indians,
Opening up their grottos of casinos in you;
And you are busily reciprocating with them in your modes of Lackadaisical use.

Robert Rorabeck

In Your Office An Orchid Blooms

All the paddy-whack in the woods is returning to
The sound of the comely boys beating themselves into the Grounds,
The bicycle slaves, the Lincoln-log towns:
The cherry trees who are just stumps, the axes of woodsmen
Buried in the baskets of red-hooded runaways:
And this is our town, or playground of dirty streets:
Where you lost yourself and covered your naked body with Dust and peat;
And you courted alligators and felt the shells on your feet,
And the day couldn't last forever- it was bitter sweet.
Returning to your chicken coop of trailer parks,
All the drunkards effervescing on stock cars-
Waiting on your father, recognizing different sorts of plants
That were in your nursery in the back yard:
And what are you doing now, but becoming your mother,
Metamorphosing into someone who made you who you are:
Your feet curl and kiss and dance far beneath the skyscrapers
And power plants and Disney World
Far beneath the stars, right alongside the immobilized and doused
Cars, like candles lined up for a mass that is all a hush;
And your crawl to him while your children ululate in their Various soft-boarded rooms- Nervously you give him your lush,
And in your office an orchid blooms.

Robert Rorabeck

Inappropriate Haiku Of Tranquility

Please save me from
This vanishing tranquility:
As you sigh, making love.

Robert Rorabeck

In-Between The Hours

You tell yourself you
Are a special case,
When you bloom by your Own hand after midnight—
Giving yourself the satisfied
Present of bouquets
The audience on the plateau
Throws at your feet
To seed the earth—
After the applause,
You can grow quiet
Because your heart is satisfied,
The same satiation of any animal
Between its grazing.
With your eyes closed
Like stores on Sundays
You soon shove off in your Bed to Elysium's Fields where Diana's hemlock maidens
Blow you overpowering kisses
From the sidelines of the Football field,
To land like wet minnows
Upon your premodona cheeks
Cheering you until
Just around 8 a.m.,
When the sun slams like a
Bulldozer through the Glass door
And without even a prayer
Before you wake up from the Sports centers of Mount Olympus,
Your bachelor bones rise
Into the routine of the living mausoleum
Resting at the bottom of the atmosphere's ocean,
And you dress yourself for Mortal combat to the cheers of Spectators lining the cliffs,
Hoping to see you or your Opponent brutally defeated.

Robert Rorabeck

Incomprehensible

If I begin this this way,
I will surely begin again: a song bird awakening
With my pen:
Dreary eyes, dumbly cast- the serpent like a moon in Her eyes, burning down with stolen light:
You see it is here again, this roiling tinfoil of life:
Alone with my dog in a house that turns around:
Not walking towards you anymore,
Alma-
Letting you steal the flowers from my grave, and the hard work
That you have won over,
Never mindful, applying to your children and school work.
Where will you go from here, but back across
The frontera- through the green fires of the bosque,
And back to Mexico- never kissing my lips
Again,
Dreaming of a Christmas that I will never see, as I stumble
Out once more,
Striking my pen at a windmill,
And crying up to you like a snake trying to kiss a stewardesses
Who is sailing away like a careless angel
To other lands that lay unmapped and incomprehensible:
Into his bed, a runwayish fever,
Landing in the feeling that your insouciance hungerlessly steals
Away.

Robert Rorabeck

Incredibly Further Away

Fat men are driving across country
In their mausoleum cars.
I jack off into the bright kitchen forest
Of rusty rebar,
And the frogs sing. Of course, they Sing all the time.
Their favorite stone is topaz, like
Their throats.
They wait for the buses of children to Get home from school,
And they sing the flume of my serial
Insouciance,
As I curse you with the kisses of my
Far distant dysfunction,
Thinking that you will never know what It means to be like a pirate,
Sleeping two men to a bed,
Our ancient beards glowing like fuses
From the candles that burn in them
Like lights on a tannenbaum,
And like the ghosts of fireworks that
We scream and whiz banging across
The sea
For someone who was forever in those
Obese cars, always in the air-condition,
And always driving incredibly further away.

Robert Rorabeck

Incurable Gallery

In this night the subtle stabs impermanence:
Her lips down open,
They wear blue foreboding:
In the morning, they may speak whispers to inspectors:
They will tell all they know
How they saw the old artists in the theatres
All the sad men with gummy eyes and loose skin,
She will tell how they put on to her,
Their forms of jealous beauty,
They cremated her in sanctity-
In the graves that will not heal,
Upon the tan anthills feasting,
The dandy sun, the boys at sport:
Her ankle in their hands,
The octave of bones the sea makes.
Then her lips will lie closed,
For they have done them in,
The futile epitaphs,
As her legs provide the hungering strangers,
Loping in the school yards,
Curling with the bells which bring them in,
Clanking in the churchyards,
The names of twins at playing,
Then to lay discarding and sweating
Upon the summit of the fingertips,
The sunlight rolls down falling.

Robert Rorabeck

Indefinite Lives

The verbs are broken:
See how they hang out giving
Purpose to nothing,
Smoking in the van through
All their classes,
Not willing to participate,
Yet they will stop when she walks by.
Their lips don't move when her legs move.
They hang apart like broken hinges,
Like anticipatory insect wings,
Bookcasing nicotine patinas,
But they don't even smile,
Because she doesn't look their way:
She goes by like a long industrious train,
Like a caravan in the desert,
Giving off its mirages.
Soon it will be the last day of high school,
And the boys in the van
Will never see her again,
At least not in any meaningful way.
She might last awhile longer,
She might become anything,
But that day in the student parking lot,
While the sky inhaled the sun
And exhaled the clouds off the Atlantic,
She will remain forever,
A vision unspoken to,
While the meaningless things carry on
With their indefinite lives.

Robert Rorabeck

Indefinitely

Riding out on the bus
Where the president is younger than my parents,
But it is even more a curious thing
I am no longer beautiful; and I am doing nothing,
And I have been these things for so long
That it wouldn't matter if I went out along the Pier after midnight and tossed bread to the sea,
And figured out that all the time that was where You'd been waiting for me,
Dark bodies graffitied with silver and misused
Wishes;
How you'd left the indentations of your scent in My frontal lobe while you left on your luxury cruise
For your honey moon with the older more professional Man-
In some ways, you only showed your tan-lines; and how after class was over, I'd go home and Lay you out on the green carpet, on the green carpet,
As the sun set beneath the canal and cypress;
How little girls came with gifts and games, on roller skates
Through the serpentine ways, calling out to their personal Saints, but not a one called out to me; and paper airplanes
Flew, and stewardesses served me drinks on the television;
And I thought of you- I thought of you, while the black Men drank rum. Bicycles were stolen and no one remembered
To feed the alligators. Trees slipped into the sea that didn't Move; it didn't move,
And you didn't think of me- I stayed up until morning
And laughed with the rattlesnakes warming around the ankles
Of my dogs, and by dawn it started to rain slightly in at least Half of the mowed yard. The paper trees were burning,
And the sugar cane- The moccasins were snaking,
And I came across the decision to never return to your school
Again.

Robert Rorabeck

Independant To Nothiing

I have a band-aid but not where you kissed me;
This is a new hemisphere,
A spherical galaxy over my eye while the traffic goes blinking;
And there are famous cemeteries and famous ladies of the night,
Even better and more prolific than my own:
of two long black veils, and they go sweeping underneath
The sycamores, sashaying and winnowing out across the planted bones
Like the lightest filigree of a dissolving soul,
They travel over the smoothed marble, and the dogs whine stuck
Between the teeth of the world, and the apartments light up
And girls make love to girls
Where the city is a bright place just like a wound under them stars
Who are the first wound:
Who have sat down and eaten the meat off the table while the Airplanes harrowed them like flies,
The little passengers stupefied by how beautiful and grand was that Deaths of the loves looming up above them
Like the titans of landlocked hemisphere, like entire constellations
Come into bloom and now evaporating into the necessary
Grandeurs that seems to give all life reason to believe and then go
Happily away leaving only the massive continents of pain,
Like fireworks that never have to die, and yet are independent to Nothing.

Robert Rorabeck

Indian-Give

Some random announcement from
The soft and middle of the usual day—
Allowing light to pass through
Like a ghost underneath an airplane:
Maybe there will be a fire-drill,
Maybe it will rain—
And the students will eventually light out
To come again tomorrow-
Following their own shadows successfully:
It is what we reward them to do—
Pretty pictures in a window less classroom—
And gold fish in the suburban estuaries
Of a glass menagerie:
Until the same footsteps drain the sunlight's
Apiary around the headstones,
And the heavens dome their cathedral
As the elements Indian-give us our names.

Robert Rorabeck

Indian-Giving Virginit

Voyeurs on the fly
Passing through the sky-
Return on rollerskates
Going to the arcade-
Wanting to see the Parade
To watch the lions jump
Through rings-
Hypnotized marriages
Underneath the plates
Of the mountains
That put on their dinners
Of Eden-
The lions lying about in a
Fraternity of narcoleptic manes.
Above treeline
Her shoulders are golden.
She has taken off her
Small clothes:
She is metamorphosis
Above the tourists-
So light she Swims,
A Pegasus on each
Tit.
She brings fear into
My heart
And steals it away,
Indian-giving her
Virginit
As the school busses
Flee
From the Mendalas of Forest Fires
Sparked from her
Hip
As she dances
In feral kaliedescope
Of kites torn

Away from the fingers of A young boy's town
Up to a makebelieve that Swears he will not Give her away.

Indications Of A Lost Game

Indications of a lost game, and of Indian slaughter:

The moonbeams seem to rush over the chassis of the simulacrum,

As their hoods take on the aspects of a French wilderness:

And the trappers beckon hoping to snag the pony tails of

Their prized fables;

As the angels go down like photosynthetic bric-a-brac, showing each

Other their diseases, and falling for inspection inside the

Beautifully narrow grottos of canoes

Where they make it past all of the slaves, belly pregnant from

Witchcraft and stolen watermelon:

Going down this way to the unexpected falls, like the murderous

Curtains of another lover's dream, disentangling from all of the

Claptrap of honeymoon that they were not invited to:

And the scene widens, becomes obese and monolithic,

So they take on the homeopathic aspects of the superfluous,

Until they stop falling entirely and seem to float up again

For a littlest while, as if trapped in the ecstatic gravity

Of another heavenly body moving full on the approach over

The luminous tribes, all centipedal from the many sexy legs of

All the woe begotten stewardesses that he has kidnapped into his Employ.

Indifferent Godzillas

Indifferent Godzillas,
They'll break what you just bought-
If you are ready, or even if you are not;
Their eyes are coal-trains fast stoked in
The storm,
Their horns Siamese Jewesses wreathing
Like corn,
And they'll tear through the city,
And they'll tear through your sleep,
Fondling the children and shearing the sheep:
They'll pluck all the Sheilas from atop the Tall cony boughs,
They'll trough through the cloud banks and Sneak into shows-
I've seen them there dwarfing me in my surliest dreams,
Abducting the damsels and licking their creams;
And I suppose when the proceeding day comes and Newly abides,
They'll slip back under the sheets until their carbuncles
Hit the deepest waves,
Still grinning like sailors, and chanting like braves.
Next time you'll come and I'll show them to you-
We'll stand on the safe precipice overlooking the zoo.
Maybe we'll hold hands, or maybe we wont-
Those tall tailed cities with easy persuasions,
You'll look so pretty, and maybe we'll kiss, or maybe
We wont; They'll turn about like a thieving metropolis,
As they pick and choose how to ravish our nation.

Indoor Harvest

How was your weekend- good,
Especially if you didn't mind spending it
Outside of my festivals of nothing;
And if it wasn't for the liquor I just wouldn't know
What to say anymore,
As I lay like a naked moth underneath the hyperventilating
Tent, like something beautiful unmasked, unfurled:
As the traffic spins and pets the wet paint
Off the billboards, the mascaras of the heavens,
And the lines douse their veins as straight as canals, like Torpids tears that the blue gills drink, where girls
Such as you lay in deep trances with bicycles;
And the otters swim over you clutching bouquets of orchids
And up to the banks to greet their sunning housewives:
Well, anyways, this is something for you, Alma- I have just Made, while you had your weekend of family:
Michael's birthday- a cake of tres leches: but you were Too lazy to make enchiladas while the deer and the Foxes played with the metamorphosed kings in their Suburban glades:
And I waited for you, humming in the outfit of my scars,
Watching the hummingbirds waiting for me to bring them more
Roses out my front door: that you sometimes come to,
Knocking, kissing the lips of my knuckles, letting the sunlight like
An apiary gossiping over your body,
And dripping from your clothes like firing honeys, your Wayward expressions a venomous ax finding on me a forest;
And blessing you to come in and harvest me indoors.

Infatuated Atoms

Leap over to me and ask me my name,
And I will point into the sunlit sky like a barbershop
And humph:
Because that is all you should know about me,
And the game you are beginning is dangerous,
Long and tiresome- Bachelors know like
Homer cast upon the green humping bluffs,
Waiting for his mother to return with a sack of Burger King:
What better joy can be found than in the motioning motionless:
Yes, sex, but that is a ploy:
Roller coasters are the same but dismissive, abstaining,
Silly masturbations, conjoining the sky and earth like they Were getting paid to do a video:
I am scarred, and the day is long and not very real:
People who do well are not very real, more like heirlooms,
Sales pitches, donkeys in a minefield of windmills, old soul....
This is the better game, the camaraderie of plastic sheriffs
And papier-mâché injuns- We can have fun at war,
But no one need to get killed eventually:
Certainly, there is a form in church, like a snake sleeping in
The grassy sun: Oh joy to be unwound, spooled like the tasseled
Wind in the pines above the abrasive traffics and Ghost towns of the crocodileteared starlits in plastic bodice:
The sea is always waiting, playing rhyming games, biting its Lip, and you can go into her and swim all day, but don't Get too close to the little thing waving her bum in the shower
On the concrete abutment at the crest of the dunes,
Because that is how the old things die and new things come
Into growth, where coral snakes lie coiled in the form of her
Seemingly innocent thighs: mortgages, and arguments,
And cocaine, and mindful infidelities, when still the crickets
Serenade the lucky people of the lonely sport: So, if you
Come to me wanting to straddle behind the kneecap of my blue-jeans,
That is okay for a moment or two, until mother is finished dicing
The strawberries, but then we must go into our own separate corners
In the house with no furniture, and question of the consequences
Of our needful actions, and the motions we seem to go through,
Spinning around each other like infatuated atoms.

Infatuations Of The Sea

Heavens brought a forest fire onto the lighthouse
And another song
Of dead heartbeats of Indians
In the graphite
Of narcoleptic estuaries: while I remembered so
Many times passing her way-
Swaying like the traffics of the tide,
Inland to the city, and then away;
And praying to booze
And fireworks,
Even while my parents were up all night
And making love,
And the tigers became tangled together in the cages
Like the first afternoon in which we made love-
Holding hands and Playing baseball as the gardens grew-
And the storms sweated cerulean confections
Too dangerous to touch,
And the jellyfish spread outwards in an electric
Garden manifested in the glowing infatuations of the sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Infernal Sacrifice

What can I say about you, but you are flawed.
You are not the girl I paint in green storms, or put the Autumn aspen boughs behind the seat of my truck for to Take to your storm-city, to douse you with under the green
Patina, the kind of unripe sky you smile under,
And cut your hair, and leave your blouse undone to the Belly-button, the corkscrew scar the doctor plucked you off;

I cannot say that I love you, with the dozen flowers wilted, given Enough time, or that I've smelled you fluming like rich cigars
While I've sat staring at my own meager reflect dimming
In the places of your harlequin business once or twice. I used to smile
In my sleep, and give all night renditions of your perfumes'
Sonatas to my misspelled olfactory while the lesbians
Skinny dipped in the leafy pool quite naked one story beneath
Me-

Back when I didn't have my dogs, and my girl let off
Nocturnal immolations like a fertile garden potted in cushions right
Beside me, farting just as heinously as the devil in the ninth ring
Of hell, or fish stinking up the frozen foods section:
Stinky fireworks in cones of tuna

This is just a put on, just
An act of compulsion, like a bad habit, an infernal sacrifice
To an unhealthy muse; but I am kicking the habit- I will move
To the invested sea and let her persuade me off you; she will give me suckle
Quite thoughtlessly of her nubile multiplications, the waves of nameless Sisters birthed off her by the happenstance of unabashed weathers,
See how in flawless blue sororities they come rushing
Inflamed like so many rosy nipples of a lactating bitch,
Plump with milk for a kindly litter.

I can lick my fingers and raise them to let me know by which way
She is coming, sending of her forbearing messages, the little whispers
She holds me in, the moistures of her swagger, or on her darker Days in more somber dresses, the storm clouds entangle her in The weather of a torn nimbo-theatre reciting over the Saturnine geometry of rooftops of a pure

And green clad suburbia which is better off without the Misinformation of your haphazard communications;
The day or two you come torn and weeping semiannually
Ready to give confession;

so when she

Disrobes of her silken mantle, then the weather travels westbound
Along the mortar and pistil scoliosis of elephantine switchbacks,
And over the smoking cane-fields, leaving her demystified, and Her gaze upon me like the brightest sunlight pouring downwards Burning up your lies like a dying forest fire coup de graced in a blessed sun shower.

Robert Rorabeck

Infinite Grave

There are enough people who know that I am
Dying to not have to care:
I just want my toys too, to run my fingers through your Motherly hair,
To suckle beside your seventh grader on the porch swing
Of your glades;
As the airplanes circle like wooden boys, wondering
Why they were made:
And you once wanted me outside my house to fall down
Beside you in the paper snow;
But now you don't know anything but football:
You are the marmalade queen: Your tits are savage and
As fat as cabbage or hibiscus:
You fill the cups, you are a cupbearer, and I wonder if you Know yet for what hero,
Or if your heros are as yet interchangeable, as are their evils:
I think maybe you are all cartoons drawing your Colorful guns out in the middle of the trailer parks of these Hilarious afternoons,
While I have been burned by all the fun lies I have sold or Stolen;
And all my houses are empty or they haven't yet awoken;
And you know your name, and your hair flows like
A thin young and auburn cemetery.
Who are you an aunt to, but why have you hurt me so:
I keep crying out my song into the emptiness of this high school
Dance;
And I just wanted to draw you close to me like a piece of broken
High school romance.
Erin- Why can't you love me, and why do you let me go by you
This way,
Dying like a sad young river like a beautiful Indian princess
Just another conquered tributary accumulating
To your insouciant and outstand brilliance- just another Avenue stepping out fearfully into the crepuscule of your Infinite grave.

Robert Rorabeck

Infinitely Lost Platoon

Here: the scars are awkward:
They prevent romance, but not love;
They prevent a meaningful conclusion to Those erection which go up like cerulean tents
In the mist forest of Appalachia,
Set up by little boys and their scout masters
In her tangling crooks and sways: they don't Know how to speak with her,
But cannot prevent the use of different meanings
For the word blue; The scars the obscurity of Dense foliage, the aphrodisiac bloom, dark and Meaningful, which always conclude in suicide:
Suicide of lip and tongue folded in a wilted cleft
Of language: So I love her, and slept thirty Miles south of where she made love in isometric
Weddings, kissing the boys and suitors all as like
As a compatible species in a zoo:
Those azure tangles which lace down into the dreary
Canals where the extinct languages sink,
And the fiber-glass coffins lay exposed and wealthily
Holy standing up along the bank: where Hands unclasp like the shed wings of a demetamorphosing
Butterfly, like a amputee crossing the floor or the highway,
Calling out in the sad numbers of an infinitely lost platoon.....

Ingots Of Dark Gold

Ingots of dark
Gold are making
Love through my
Eyes,
And people are getting Ready for Christmas and Bedtime.
I feel like I should
Have been playing
Baseball
Forever-
And Erin doesn't love,
The sky has no holder,
And the amusement rides
Are always traveling around
Like little girls
Just learning their first Birthday bicycles;
But I keep hearing rumors
From the Pope
Underneath the banyans,
Even underneath the Alligators too-
It seems impossible
But I am always getting Distracted by the Slightest parade of the Swings,
And beautiful women
Who don't know my Name,
Trapped in the Tide's coppertone
Beach,
Coming and going back again,
Sighing heavily but not knowing
What else to say,
As if they've been making love

And not knowing they are Missing school.

Inky Zippers Of Linear Octopi

We can't get married- the little princess tells me everyday,
Brown and dizzy, like Pocahontas on a seesaw,
Braving all of the elements that took her here across Mexico:
Now she wants a boob job
But not another child- and she has a hernia that I hope will Soon mend;
And when she gets home to him, she goes right to sleep:
Or she slips out of her clothes and into the bathtub from which She can see the mango tree in the backyard
About which her rabbits have disappeared which made her Mother Rosa happy, as they were eating all of its rich leaves;
And I have gotten drunk to sleep on the roof
Across the street;
And when she is washed and my Alma is cleaned, she goes into A bedroom where she never reads and she turns out the Light and turns to sleep: or she makes love,
While the dogs run their ever faithful races over her shoulders:
Either they are lucky or are they are not,
But at least I do not think she can hear the rattle of trains
Like inky zippers of linear octopi that separates her world
From mine- and I am almost certain she never wonders out at Night to bite her lip and shiver looking up into the strange curses
Echoing from the stars.

Innocence

Sometime soon after birth our
Deities are give to us,
Like ray guns zapping in the Sideshow of the three-ring circus,
And remain there swinging
Like incense burning censers;
And if I could feel her- My first
Word was goat, as we drove down
To Florida- I can barely remember
Her heated pleasure, for not soon
After I was reduced to reading in Unlit graveyards where in it is Hard to imagine the bodies
Segregated beneath us,
The unsexed ancestors, and their Gods resting forever then like
Their first words, breathless forever-
For, I am still too young to remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Innocence's Byway

How innocence wanders the innocuous highway,
How, bearded, he dreams of the thigh he's Never touched,
As he sleeps in the weeds like a disposed general
Of a hungry army without any shoes,
Believing in his forthcoming victories, and preserving
How he might end up at her, and take her
By the hand, and by the subtle dissolutions of Armistice, become sort of a Disney movie with her
Belly distended like a parade balloon,
Little children in a line and hung around the Doublewide trailer at the mouth of the babysitting
Swamp,
The humid dulcets of the arachnid menageries,
The spider webs breathing in the corners of green rafters,
The nameless dogs chewing on the knobs of corn,
As the light flows like wet paint down the overgrown
Pines and deciduous hardwoods,
Where death is an old creeper who has yet to contain
The shoots of red, or the discarded exoskeletons spiked
Like hidden jewels upon the mossy throats of cypress;
But just as he is saying this to himself,
Mumbling the misspend educations as if scratching an Itch, the roar of the disinfected traffic wakes him up
Like Niagara Falls, and there amidst the blown intestines
Of the highway's flared refuge, an orchid makes a show,
The specks of yellow pollen upon the petals belying
The sullied intentions of its virginities of innocence.

Inside A Geode

Or the day is gone for dreaming of its labyrinth
Again—spelled out in the recluses of its Fabled
Estuaries and drinking fountains—
And it looks so beautiful turning tail and Burning away:
Over the sandy monuments as over the overpasses—
Or don't you know—
That this is my song—open throated,
Giving fast balls over the trailer parks and the Swingsets—
Dirty things—believing that the world can believe
Without sound:
Echoes here,
Beside the tangling vines that never had to find Themselves anywhere else with child—
My cousin pregnant on an abandoned couch and
All of the heroes gone off to fight dragons that do not Exist—
She is lactating up in the rafters of spacecraft:
And this is supposed to be beautiful—beautiful- but how Will you ever know up inside a geode that Will never crack.....

Robert Rorabeck

Inside A Schoolyard Of Pearlescent Shells

Pines filled the loose change of cars,
While a entirely other world happened across the Canal;
And the airplanes were touching down softly,
Softly as the blue turquoise feathers of the chiefs headdress:
And he made signs of smoke of peace
And turtles in the sky,
Like weathers of love from their teepees,
And the blue gills made beds of love underneath the roots
Of thoughtless aloes,
Who above the fairies stuck to like stamps on lovers,
As soft lights do lamps in other rooms of others;
Houses,
As the cats pant, dreaming of their kittens and of baseball,
And the graveyards bloom as they always do after immaculate
Rainstorms,
As the mermaids remove their bras and pose above their Coral for their missing boys, and their sunken conquistadors,
Enraptured by whatever weathers are out there to sea
Them, and by the misspent letters tossed out into their Beds,
Soliloquizing them there, like candelabrum lit inside a schoolyard
Of pearlescent shells.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside Adam

My thoughts wake up
Inside Adam,
Before he learns of Eve's Transgression—
Then the sun and the world
Are naked and weeping
Newborns,
And there is the earliest
Light everywhere;
The pure heralding light,
God's fixed gaze.
The world of the garden is Sonorous with innocent birth
And light breathing,
But I am that speck of Shadow
Wondering in Adam's head,
The ache of his missing
Rib,
Wondering where she has gone,
The first premonition of sin:
Of things to come.
I tell him not to round the Corner to the tree in the clearing,
But he cannot understand how Everything can be so beautiful,
Yet to have such a thought
In his head—
Then he sees Eve, smiling,
Shadowed by the tree the serpent
Looks down with eyes of adultery,
Smiling his pornographic wisdom,
As her guilty lips drip the juice
Of the most sinister fruit,
The honeyed seduction of a
Fallen angel.
She begins to speak,
But already Adam knows....
He knows,

For inside him, I have Warned him
And, ashamed he tries to Cloth himself as
He stumbles through the Darkening trees,
And the day seems to flee with him,
Fearing the things to come.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside Here

Quiet is the solitude of all of my certainty,
Lying here, resting in the places that will remain as quiet
As the shells of animals given to the loins of their feasts:
I am here and airplanes are in the sky,
Hanging there like jewelry and each cloud a Christmas tree
Going its way,
And singing the songs that it keeps to itself:
The sky is a forest fire burning a wreck of all of my dreams,
Girls with coyotes flung out in the desert with the sharp
Ends of chicken bones,
Unlucky drums that have the sound of the skin of pythons;
And when I drove by Alma's house tonight she was not home,
And now I am drinking the cheapest wine in my quietest of abodes,
Hoping to find Alma,
The mariposa stuck like hot taffy to the greenness of the aloe beside
The carport and the sick old neighbors are drinking beer
And never dreaming of her;
And I am lucky and across the canal, petted like a pure stone by
The soft dirt;
And Alma is gone, and my house moves inside here.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside Mornings

Mornings come like kindergartens,
With fine and easy thoughts,
Like flowers simultaneously budding
And rippling in the schoolyard-
Morbidly obese maelstroms stomping the Coolest darkness on the roof as we learn,
And they are our mothers,
As we breathe like space age polymers,
And the rains splatter and trail the frosted pains
On the windows,
Like the paws of a litter of freshly batting kittens,
They unstring the scorpion's barb,
Who has been waiting in our shoe for us
To get up, yawn and put on all the heavy clothing
We wear to eat breakfast, and then catch the bus
To the classroom, or go to work in a pool of Untrustworthy lights,
The borealis like a hood twinkling with a hum
From the popcorn ventilations.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside Of Those Poor Muses

Never tarrying for werewolves, the roses bud:
Over castles tormented by rain,
Over tattoo parlors,
Over the inparticular ammenities that cannot spell:
The night is out and she has opened her throat
To the boys who are still hanging out,
Whilst the neighborhood is vacated,
Made to throw tricks of towns at the sea—
Overcast by the places that loom large in her
Ill-begotten memory—
Another novel spun out of the womb of the Dungeon of a fairytale—
While wolves in Colorado lactate on the stars,
And cars move underneath the pregnant jubilations—
What is this, but some form of pornographic glee,
Stuck too the teeth of a snake that causes paralysis by Stone:
I remember when I taught at my old high school,
I remember when I was all alone—
And the stars were out, naked dancers in their cabaret of Astrology—
Another plagiarist does not have to move;
This isn't religion, but a poem—
The muses that i have all loved all are home,
And if it is raining outside,
It is raining on the roses that are still alive
And not stuck inside one of those poor muses' adulturous homes.

Inside The Religion I Had Given Her

They swerved by the coliseum mostly disrobed
From the zephyrs- in their chariots of old drift
Wood,
And castanets of roses: it didn't even matter that this Was the way that they were going;
It was just their thing: proceeding the lions and
The Christians who ate up the main events-
They didn't even have a plan,
But they all held soft turtles and doves as pets,
And maybe they were headed towards the mailboxes
In hedgerows fathered against the primordial lighthouses
Or sucreased by the moon anyways,
Though if they'd held still for the moment of a photograph
They would have seem me carrying my young Alma
Like a amber cenotaph into the waves; and kissing her
As she perfectly trusted me, so I seemed to bask
Inside the religion I had given to her,
Even though she couldn't even swim.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside Your Car

Waiting for you tonight: all the cars are silent,
And making me think you have parked somewhere else,
And the besos you give with your bright eyes
Closed,
While in the movies that you see, you have dreamed:
And the airplanes that you have never experienced,
Continue plugging the sky with their sheet metal;
And you say that you will never leave your very bad man,
And I don't have a gun, but Ambition, while I have been asleep atop of your house
Until which my legs accorded my inebriated attrition:
Alma- and all my art is now connected to your soul, and the silent
Gifts that you have given to me of your favorite and your body's Colors;
And I feel that I have made it down your falls, and I have given
You pleasure before you have given it to me; and it was all that I dreamed for- and I have kissed you inside your car.

Robert Rorabeck

Inside, A Garden Or A Gun

I do this because I think,
If I peel out loud enough I should identify the Kidnappers;
And I am not my uncle, nor my father,
No good at grooming horses or selling
Produce,

But noticing the twisting ribbons of overpass
Shadowing the heads of my tumbling future,
The tramps in the running shadows,
The snakes sucking eggs in the crèches of
An organized woods;

And you would think that there is so many things
To do,
So many arrangements, and holidays for marriage;
Elise in her faux jewelry bighting the inside
Of her cheek,
Thinking that she should get off the couch and bake
A pie, do something for evening,
But she doesn't do but another glass,
A slight adjustment of comfortable legs;

Outside and far away,
The almost blue is falling, failing like this into
The next sweltering darkness when the cars will return
In yellow parade,
Them too to only turn off, to shuffle through,
And clink ice in the dry glass soon to swim;

I do this for the corn fields sleeping in the hair-lips
Of melted glaciers,
And the beautiful women who inherited car dealerships,
Because I stumbled through the interview to deliver
Their mail- I assigned my body to the lonely post
Where it is best so,
And would be better if it knew the just names of Flowers, a horticulturalist,
Or Swedish Tulip farmer;

But I give it over to your decision,
My head depressed like one of the weary mountains,
My dogs curled at my gray feet,
The bureau drawer half open- fake wood-
Inside, a garden or a gun.

Insignificant Infinity

Coldness comes best under the hardest of sun,
When you cannot wear enough clothes because of all you have drunken,
And loneliness on the busiest street of the biggest city,
When you cannot recognize a single face and no one looks at you,
When all the little boys are up in the rooftops counting
Down, their misdeeds in glass bottles in paper bags high above
The alligators' heads,
When the little girls are sitting knob kneed in the Bowers of golden cypress,
Believing in things they shouldn't say, as the green lips
Of the water rises and slobbers the hem of their dirty
Pink dresses with seahorses and brine;
Then the insignificant infinity rolls out like a Catherine Wheel,
And the otters come out of their lonely hollows to watch
The sky spin,
And the foxes yip with the pin wheeling the pine trees
Make overhead in a ringed gathering of serpentine forest;
For the day is getting over, and you take the curve of the road home,
And the bridge which falls over the canal where the soft
Shelled tortoises burp and fart brown enduring bubbles,
Floating up with lazy curiosity amidst the plastic bags and crumpled tin,
And the coral snake curls up black and red and yellow
In a smutty, faded magazine, glinting like a venomous pearl.
You go home to sit in the immense barrenness of the Living room's green carpet, think of a girl obscure by bitter orange trees, ejaculate, watch t.v.,
Listen to the screams from the wildlife preserve down the far road,
And wait for the light to fail over the burning sugar-cane,
For your parents to come home greasy and exhausted,
And then to shower and sleep upon the aching coils inside
The bars of the humid nocturne, waiting for you eyes to open
Once again so long ago, as the cautionary friends slip further Away into insignificant infinity.

Insignificant Wound

Do you sleep with dead women?
And when they look at you, can you feel them
Cascading in the opal vases of the spine,
Before they shattered in the rainy war:
As if you'd shot your sister's eye out with that BB gun-
Miraculously, how they became new women then,
Who wouldn't look at you:
Somnambulists in a coma,
How they shed naked right there and sat
In the barber's chair, as he cut them anew:
Farting nervous anticipations, until
When you saw her laughing on the red brick steps
With people you didn't know,
What did she say to you then, as you walked by
In the cathedrals of the novel year:
Was she another woman you didn't know,
Kissing him in the renovated places you used to kiss
Her doggy-style behind the couch
When grandmother and Jeanie were visiting on Their way to Oregon:
Some kind of plan of Succubus, she'd sucked it out
Of herself, the poison of venomous wound,
The pellets you'd planted in her gut:

The shed skin you sleep with, the lingering scales
Of this mirage, the same hair you knew still curls like Finger nails up from the grave,
The bud-less roses of the decapitated garden she does not attend;
Walking away, she pulled the glass out of herself
And metamorphosised into the strange,
Leaving your triaged with an insignificant wound....

Insouciance Of Rest

When the day is gone there is an Insouciance of rest—peaceful insects
Slumber in the bordellos of the hibiscus—
The road of shells and tears
Becomes a beatific ribbon leading to and
From the canal,
And the world beyond:
Orchards and baseball diamonds creeping
Up between the spotlights—
Luminescent,
Reminding us of our daydreams, like children
Kidnapped underneath the moon.

Robert Rorabeck

Insouciant Eyes

My eyes flash like drunk fish in a saucer or a
Saucy dish:
The traffic flutters like strange happenstance,
Like Mexican cleaning ladies wanting to Get done in a flash:
The leggy fauna pocketing money, skipping home
And licking honey:
The scarless places, the taught openings of Unjust reservoirs ticked off my the endeared red-
Pricked sheriffs,
The family daytrips- the feudal tariffs:
I wake up into this comely mess, and it passes right
Over me on the esplanade of horned sheriffs,
But I do my best
To envision you in my mind in your virgin boudoir
In a state of mid undress;
And I like to think that the housewives love me
As they buy things- as I look my best;
And then they go home and complain, and beat their Husbands with their bird-hollow fists,
And then undress like school girls underneath the buses,
Outback of their pools-
And they lounge like titted alligators and regress,
Of the more somber times of when it was all an innocent
Guess,
And they even forget to bake their apple pies;
And America flutters away like winsome ashes underneath
Their cool painted insouciant eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Insouciantly Gamboling

The mother is gone,
To cut her hair- and the day is humid,
Because its not wrong,
The sun its constable pin wheeling;
The house is raw,
If made of bones the dogs gnaw:
I wash her coats and think of her, or you-
The girl fair swimming in what bright sea;
It serves a javelin to pierce:
I read Vachel Lindsay, and he is out in
The yard: all the way down where the coffins
Have melted and spilled their roots,
Hibernian in its lucky creation; and girls come
Over the flowering dead, barefooted, swinging, glib;
What knights there are raise their arms and Construct swing-sets for these naked sisters
Who hem and haw and bight their cheeks over
Such Paladin's starred propositioning;
And I write them novels, or at least I should;
But I get no play from the fairest things who Are not real, when I am lackadaisical myself;
I should turn away and cast a thunderstorm
To make them slip and scab themselves;
And then better girls will come,
Nocturnal and done with hibernating, and I will Have little difficultly preferring them,
As long as I pay- in temples constructing;
and they will make up songs
And chew gum, and say I have done a good
Job, even though they do not really care enough
To want me.

Into A Bed As Blue As An Endless Sea

Whistling in a beautiful way that was never really here:
While each of our pets enjoy their rooms;
Even while our daughters climb too high up into the trees,
So that they have to squint down at the pornographies nestling
There:
And above them, the airplanes fly so high and far, like deep sea
Divers holding their breath through the coraling nimbus;
Until it becomes another holiday-
Until the highways end at the amusements;
Or leap over the graveyards, or the flea markets:
And it all ends right here: at your lips, Alma- at you tiny braveries,
So naked and brown:
You could take down any knight: you could even take down
A forest,
Or talk the mountain lions and the wild fires off the backs of their Mountains,
Culling the tourists to you like promising ice-creams:
And, afterwards, I swear I could follow that charcoal catastrophe
To where there was still some new wildlife,
And pick for you there the wildflowers or the fallen egrets- or whoever's
Nest had been overturned:
I could become a music box, or a combing shell; and I could whisper
In your ear as I laid you down into a bed as blue as an endless Sea; as I always do for you, and always shall.

Into A Bosom

Soft moonlight in a movie theatre
And kisses-
Touching over the handicaps of the senses:
And it is alright,
And the girls are out again- what are they doing
Over the lilacs,
Or on their ways down the highway:
I wonder if they will ever see the special forts
Underneath the moonbeams
In the trances of simulacrum: and I wonder if they Will ever make it to shore again,
Talking to themselves in the theatre,
Hungry over the zoetrope of their metamorphosis-
Yet trying to figure out what they saw:
Wondering into the noontime
Topless, calling for their old lovers:
Only the crocodiles come, o
Insatiable over the remote control boats, as
The light fibrillates in its hopeless amusements,
And the tourists take their turns,
And then they take their turns again- over and Over, leaving us to wonder with the tadpoles
In the spit and drools of Suburbia and with its housewives,
If there is any sort of permanence- and waiting
For whatever change to occur
And call us permanently into the bosom of a world
Which lingers onward.

Into A Cathedral Of Infants

Also, in the empty hallway next to the water fountain
No one is drinking from—
The mountain has burned—the mermaids have been found
Out to be soldered from monkeys and blue gills
And I am married to another woman,
As you keep house for the man you've had two Children with
Though you don't want to marry him: but you keep with him—
Cooking or ordering Chinese—
You keep appealing to his orders,
And your brown skin is a apiary whose honey I have tasted
As we have lain alone together in a house only the Airplanes have crossed:
But those airplanes filled with stewardesses who metamorphosis
Into angels when they get too close to the sun
And the wax that binds them melts
And they become untangled—and into a cathedral of infants,
Growing wings,
Making love, and remembering all that we have done.

Into A Different Color

I smell
Soda pop and dirt, and this is how I
Even struck out
On an empty lot, pop-empty:
Moving down from the south,
Almost drenched by the sea:
Look at my new house following her through
The shadows,
Like an empty shell wishing it had some Amphibian meat in it to do the crawl;
And bleached tables smell like math,
And the reason why the sky is blue is because It was wounded long ago when the older
Gods were killed,
And she took over and played soccer after
School,
And kissed the boys who didn't know how
To play any instruments:
They were too proud and Beefy,
And they hold flags and make it almost
All the way across the field before really dying
Into a different color
Than what she bleeds.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Game Where I Do Not Belong

Seesaws in my liver- I go to the flea market underneath
The overpass to flume:
On Easter, both sides of my face sell nothing to her:
A girl from Columbia with tattoos buys two of My grasshoppers; they are the only thing
I sell-
And I go back to her, holding out my hands like the weariness
Of oleander-
How will they come for her again, with the airplanes touching
Down just to save face.
Will this be my art for another dark night, spilling my guts
In a juvenile tantrum of scarred and lonely
Bachelorhood- My dog rests beside me in a house
That needs a wife;
Its months since I've been to see a woman, but the day throws
Over her shadows, accentuating her voluptuous green,
And I think of my muse- tiny and brown,
Cast like a marble into a game where I do not belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Lawn Of Soft Darkness

Playing in another child's sandcastles,
While the sun looks up into her eyes,
Pretending that he is swimming and each wave is
A mountain in his heavens—
A yellow orb over the playgrounds the sea
Stalks like lions—
The parking lot filled with beautiful toys he doesn't
Have the mind to cherish:
There is his love, at the borders a metamorphosis
She doesn't know she is in—
And there he is in his perfect disguise languishing
Perpetually—when she goes home,
He will float over her house until he puts her to sleep
And then he will send helicopters to
To hover over her and drunken and obsessed boys
To climb atop her roof,
Piling their nocturnal bicycles upon her front yard
Like gifts lain to sleep in a lawn of soft darkness.

Into A Place

The forts with sticky noses looking up
Through the snowfall:
Glossy eyed and drunk- and a killer off somewhere,
But not sniffing through their keyholes:
And hoses curled up besides the fountain of youth
To which we tended to get there
As the sandstones were still steaming through the night;
And the forest was pitched:
The night cursed itself and tried to look down your blouse,
While commercials ate themselves on the radio:
While all I could think about was true love
And cold night going up the lonely slopes in the blues of Arizona
With the wind strewn pine cones across the old Indian Reservation:
The old wounds that we all hope to never have to cross again:
The arrow heads buried in there, into the cheap but Freshly blown glass- and the waves curling,
Beckoning,
As if calling us all like children away from our supper
And up into a place where we could never belong.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Poem Dedicated To Satan

Cheeks lie scarred with roses in the clouds—
The apaches are approaching with intentions of
First rate abductions,
And I remember the wishing wells of your malls—
Where I could fall down forever
And you would remain in love with my best
Friend—
And when the daylight curled over,
It saw its own reflection in the music box of
A carousel,
And it could never find an absolute desire to Touch the earth—
The beautiful harem remained in their grotto,
As my mother electrocuted herself in
The carport—beautiful illusions all of them,
Swallowing up the daydreams after midnight
Until they were all shut into a poem dedicated
To Satan
And words became a sacrifice whose
Heart was utterly—
Absolutely abandoned.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Town That No Longer Exists

If I lost my leg in the same old illusions of
The desert and now this:
Nothing of silver bells, just old hair, and the long sad
Memories of climbing over-bellied over mountains,
Alone, in love with the wrong girl;
Perpetually looking down on the soured heads of tourists
Walking inter the tinkering bells of Ice cream parlors and bad theatres;
And there she was, hung up as a blue fleece in the sang-froid
Weathers of a bitter tree;
And now this, like the science trying to describe her, like a lost
Muse of the byways, or the first attempts of flight
That go pell-mell into graveyards, not swerving too much,
And then there: segregated but well kempt,
And she sleeps in the always mowed greenness with her best Friend forever, as I am just a hiker going down through the Back end of darkening Sundays, like a stray dog stuck in between The keys of a Piano and straying there so long
As to be making my home into a town that no longer exists.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Warm And Familiar Class

Brilliant cathedral of an overpass,
Pushing through its girdle so many cars- flowing in Parts closer to the sea,
Reminding themselves of the things they see everyday-
And strangers come out and look at one another,
And sell things to one another,
Until there is a perfume of trust in the air- and the birds
And the airplanes seem as fireworks
On an ordinary holiday- and I would have to swear that Everyone is as brown as a Mexican,
And as beautiful, while I have been missing myself
Trying to recollect the motion of my heart
Even while there was nothing left of it to give,
And the little girls came into a warm
And familiar class with me,
And gave reason with their looks that I can barely even remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Into A Whole Other World

Pretty reddish underbrush,
Scars on a knee in the penumbra of a schoolyard's Skirt-
The fires go away after classes, and the busses moon:
The boys have already gone away, flown like artificial Fireworks, their arms spread wide,
And kissing parks- all the way to Orlando:
Faux conquistadors,
Warm bellied- lit by the moon, and eating pretzels,
They go swinging, kicking their Heels up over a green rug scattered with pine needles
And bugs,
Just to see up the skirts of stewardesses, just to Catch nose bleeds up into the ambitious sky,
And then to swing down, shivering, sweating minerals
Off the saints they have seen:
To go home together lost in secrets, to sleep together,
In the tiny bedroom, poor at math,
Masturbating into the shadows that somehow slip out
Again into a whole other world.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Africa

When you don't make a sound,
I love you,
And I want to abduct you and take you to Africa,
Realize the bloom, and become a new species-
Where the entire country is poorer than Alabama,
But I can look you in the eye the entire day,
And bathe you in the red dust made of our grandparents,
And imbibe you the way the crocodiles drink
The muddy river, the way they will do it forever-
We won't wear shoes or underwear, and our farts
Join with the song births and green snakes draped in
The trees amidst the long brown seed pods-
Where I can take you into the bush, and we can cry
Over the mud cross we put over your father's grave,
And let you fall down and beat the earth and water
The anonymous sanctuary hidden away from the machetes,
And the long joyful years you held together, until I
Cover your mouth and remind you that weeping so
Loudly will only draw the predators, as now we connect
And make love rolling in the purpose of traditional foreplay:
No watches to keep track of how long it takes to enter
You, and then for you to say my name, the way the Limpid shells speak of the sea, the way your tears could Be mistaken for a sudden shower prattling on the bundles
Of sticks on the roof of our small round hut-
The unhindered warmth of mammalian compressions,
And the comfort of the griot's oratories back in the village
Forum where books are not aloud just tongues,
The feverish answers in the theatre of one man's mouth,
And our children lined up in a tribe of laughing ochre
Where airplanes are the silver trips gods take on holidays,
Where heaven can be located in a bed along the river,
And church in the roofless chorus and the clouds vespers Sung long before man followed the animals north and Paled into the deeper troubles of his own invention. Being Here in the large continent without amusement parks or directions,
I can keep your heart pressed to mine as shelter, and know
The rain falling on our roof like choral students tapping the Xylophone, is from the same cloud that came yesterday,

And so many times before that.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Alma's Eyes

Bodies are tender boxes- and my ears burn over the dells
Of wet mountains,
And the fireworks sizzle and come off, and someone is always learning
To read or ride a bicycle:
And I already want to make love with Alma again,
While two lovers shake the sands of their love making off in the car
Or in front of their home,
While the rabbits are panting or ululating in the rock garden,
And the little lights like Christmas lights are winking on in the yard,
And maybe the front door has a reindeers antlers hung over
It and
A beautiful car in the carport and children already asleep in bed,
Because soon it will be another Christmas, and I still want to lie Down with Alma, while all of the rest stops empty,
And the crowds leave Disney World, and I can stop holding my breath
And begin to believe again in a world that will never leave us:
An infinite world of curling mountains and insatiable hunters
That probably doesn't exist except for when I look forever
Into Alma's eyes.

Robert Rorabeck

Into An Eager Morning Sun

Pollinating an instrument beside the Bus stops,
While the fireworks worm in the overgrowth:
The silvery airplanes leap frog
Over the moon who is beginning to grow blind-
Like all the gods over their breakfast
An empty shell-
An empty grotto: the virgins fed upon, and now
All a cloistered in the barnacles-
Raped and nude,
Blushing wounds that sting in the tide:
The housewives shudder like fish in a glass sea-
The mermaids take the bribes of sand dollars-
An apiary bleeding golden sweat
The fish enjoy with their lips of haloes
Until they douse like pinwheels in her beds that Separate
And disappear up into an eager morning sun.

Robert Rorabeck

Into An Ivory Tower

Building upwards its massive strata of bonfires
And lucky children,
My wife goes to a Buddhist temple and makes three Wishes with her best friend:
I will see her for five days over Spring Breakâ€&quot;;
For now the boughs bend,
And the airplanes fly like curve ballsâ€&quot;;into several Months after Christmas. Oh, how the common
Holidays have maimed me,
As I wait for her out in the tiny orchards of my yard,
Buzzing like fliesâ€&quot;;
And the child I cannot remember playing across
The street in the blue pornographies underneath the Pinesâ€&quot;;it takes a while to remember I am not
Here,
And as I try to decipher, she wonders offâ€&quot;;
Across the canal, a common border for our worldsâ€&quot;;
Where the cats talk, and she can win prizes for meâ€&quot;;
Though it will take a long time to find her way
Back into an ivory tower we both try to amend.

Into Another Far Off And Lycanthropic Night

Sickness swimming in its caesuras; its beautiful
Absences where the living go beneath the swirling horizon,
Are very well forgotten:
This sea like the incrimination of stones;
Or a wax euphoria going to lead the masses to burn religious Candles in the tallow of masses;
And it almost seems like a Christmas tree the lions have Been gnawing; or something dangerous like an opium
Pipe conjoined to your lips:
And you are missing school, partying with your friends,
Shooting semiprecious angels with bb guns;
And you have an entertaining time even if you don't win
You immortality: Like my words birthed like empty amphibians
In the open games of the carport:
Over the hills there is sunlight, but what is it good for if You wont ever lay down your powerful instruments and go to Bed: You body breathing its wimpled stems, and the other Words I don't know;
And yet it all seems really strung out and happy;
And I suppose you wont ever leave that town again;
But you will go on and on chasing guitars and mailboxes
Long after your classes have ended, and all that was envious of You has disappeared like gypsies into another far off and lycanthropic Night.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Another Movement

Apache of my soul cantankerousâ€as luxurious and as Blue eyed as any of my musesâ€
Waitressing in Globe, New Mexicoâ€I saw you last
Year while setting up tents to
Sale fireworksâ€in a world that is not yours,
You pretend to be busy in the backyards of my mindâ€
As my otherwise subconscious skips school and
Messes aroundâ€a truant upon another neighbors roof,
Before any of the stars of the world unfurlâ€
Just another make-believe making itself knownâ€
Beautiful knots already sewn into the fabricâ€
You probably live in a trailer parkâ€and the river sings your Name as you awaken next to him
Never knowing who you areâ€with eyes cast away into Another movement of the ever concealing clouds.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Another Neighborhood

Bellies of dungeons
Running as shallow as my tears-
She will awaken dreaming of Another man
Across the train tracks like
A homeless unicorn taken
Shelter in a carport
On the shoulder of a canal:
She will reach out,
One hand filled with laundry,

And feed him melon rind:
And sugar cubes,
While the houses move

In bright circus over

Rebar;
And the winged serpent
Waits in tangled boughs

Of citrus blossom

Over the rabbit coop,
And the chicken coop alike,

Pledging them so many Silly things-

As down the street some other
Woman's children are Kidnapped into another neighborhood.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Crepuscule

I have struggled for what I have to sing:
And I am not a conquistador, I am have not even seen the verdant Lips of the Amazon:
All I have is some words, not even enough:
And I have skipped some chain-links of the swings near the animals
In the park,
And I have held Alma's hand while we jogged and then had breakfast
And then went to the zoo and then made love:
And then we made love,
And watched the extincting birds become really extinct,
Like vanished classrooms, like the lips that were never deserved;
And I have made love to Alma off and on,
And it was all because she was innocent enough to recognize my love
Above my color:
So our bodies have swung together, as I hope they will continue
To swing like swings over the park and on into dusk,
And the continue verdures of the close lips of mailboxes and Stewardesses on into Crepuscule,
Of all things.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Diamonds

Spiders spinning into diamonds
Or other make-believe'
Your father steps outside, shuts the Door,
And fires at unicorns'
The place is unclear, but maybe it
Does exist'
The professors say you have to
Be more certain in your writing,
But even they don't know'
They ski on the lake next to the graveyard,
But never go into the graveyard
Or the changing bedlam of the trees:
I look up to her'
She had eyes once for me in high school
But no more:
I have become the satellite of her worldâ€™
And disenchanted, her heart swings
Around the earth
As the cats cry, pretending to want to be indoors.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Her Eyes Everyday

Something gibbous just made a sound
Over the traffic which is always motioning like
A snowy reception on the tube of this Hazy town,
And the sea is just there on the other side of 95-
My muse, but I wonder if I should Ever go and see her,
Because even when I am in town,
I never go courting my muse,
Too afraid to be found out, to knock on the effluvious
Door of her tide.
She might not let me in- Even worse,
She could laugh at me;
It is better to leave her to her natural motions,
To the easy boys and tourists she lets flood into her Eyes every day.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Her Turns

People that sweat in person with the spirits,
But they are not here right now—
If you come back tomorrow,
They will be here tomorrow,
But if you wish to open your eyes
You will see that my young son is growing younger—
Inside the song of light,
And inside of the mountains which cradle him
And the stars,
But for awhile they have been laughing,
And making fun of the mechanizations that are Supposed to control their lives.
Tomorrow, the forecast in Shanghai is for Pollution and burning airplanes,
But, otherwise, my tomorrow is resolved—
There is nothing else that can describe it:
I will have a house in the hills,
Higher up than the horse heads—
And in the heavens of the merry-go-rounds—
I will find the opportunity to believe
Again
That it is all right here,
One way or another—
As the cars sway back and forth
And the merry-go-rounds turn about,
Occasionally,
Whenever money is considerate enough
To put their presidential heads
Into her turns.

Into Her Yard

In stems of light, her brown body breathing:
Something of an angel collected of itself, I know-
A windmill metamorphosed,
The spokes of a bicycle skipping away from school,
Portioning the gifts of the heavens for Our sight:
Her brown skin perfect, moving with the egresses of The otters who have learned some kind of Fire,
And how to speak: who sleep on woebegone rafts
Underneath the low bridges,
Chattering of housewives to the water-moccasins;
And laying so that their bellies get some sun
In the afternoon long insouciance;
As my muse goes home to watch her novellas,
To eat her mother's cooking,
Her clothes drying out on lines across the yard, as she Lies into herself some more,
Reclining with her children, or the other more make-believe
Of creatures which I happen into her yard.

Into Its Conclusion

They will wake up and they will have to Go to school again:
The cars will flash, and the fireworks will Go off like
Grasshoppers trying to kiss dragonflies-
And the other things I do not know
Will be left for the housewives
To discover
Outside in their backyards, topless in Their preordained natures,
The alligators watching them like the transmutations
Of bachelors underneath a witchcraft of Burning sugarcane:
And the highways will rile up and down on Either side of them,
And their reel will continue blissfully into its Conclusion.

Into Its Little Brown Reservoir

Banded into a version that cannot be destroyed,
Overlooking the aqueducts
That the fish rise up to believe: in each caesuras the unicorns
Of your sisters who are still in high school
And just about finished at what it takes in the learning of Good Americas:
While the tourists at the fruit market unabashedly take pictures
Of your brown sorority:
Who even in their first generation made it all of the way
Of Mexico, whose brothers are named Raul- who Cross dress in Texas underneath the penultimate pinafores
Of the Alamo:
Who you would like to kiss, yourself, Alma: like a fish coming
Up for all the fireworks across the skylines of a night of Very patriotic holidays,
When all the world was a vision- like a unique dream of Your childhood, and you held my overeager hand until it
Over spilled into its little brown reservoir and you could do Nothing else but to believe.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Its Tributaries

Lining up in the judgment of the New rain:
What will the children do?
What will they sing?
High above them, their vacant mother
Has turned into another mountain,
Trying to touch the airplane:
She doesn't know what
To say to them anymore- her tears
Are not the rain.
The playground remains vacant-
The stone classroom only has its flag:
They gather up to go
But they do not know how they
Will get there they lose
Themselves as they go there,
Like a river winnowed into its tributaries,
Until there is no more passion
One way or another, and, individually,
They understand that they have Gone too far.

Robert Rorabeck

Into My Arms

I am right here in another vineyard after midnight

Again:

I am pantless, and I am beginning to grow a gut,

The ceiling fans turn, but they are useless while the heavily golden

Voices sing,

Singing about the sinks, the graveyards of the repeating heroes:

And I wish that I had my own voice,

And better voices for this while so many gunfights were going down,

While so many tin starred badges were being thrown into the dirt,

But I have leapt so many times past Disney World that I cannot

Remember;

And now, Alma, this is another thing for you, because I want to feed

You and cage you in a cleaned house world:

I wish that I knew you,

And loved you through the brittle opulence of another Spanish

Holiday,

But now all of that is over, and this is Mexico- the dry world

Running over:

The borders of America singing like angels, waiting for your brown

Legs to leap like fairytales,

Straight over the crowns of barbed wire, and for you to come to me,

The ochre séance of another butterfly and to fall asleep right away

Into my arms.

Robert Rorabeck

Into My Soft And Anonymous World

Alma, I spent my day away from you:

You called me three times, it seems- and would have called me once

More, except your man had both of your cars,

And he was picking you up from work: so you couldn't call me:

But I leapt towards you whenever I could, like a firework wanting a

Special purpose,

Into the direction of its pretty young muse: and I thought of how all of

This daylight made its festivities upon you;

And I remembered you told me not to drink today, but look at what

I am doing, disappointing you while you sleep with

Heidi:

While I sleep in my bachelorhood, calling for you through all of my

Licorice and scars, with no children to sleep with myself;

But I remain here, praying for whatever I can:

Failing eventually, like something who thought itself beautiful

Really realizing what it was,

And burning down into the grass, nothing more than the hair lip

Of a cenotaph of ash, still hoping for you,

Eyed by rattlesnakes and grasshoppers, like a paper airplane

Who once desired to make love with the moon who still has hopes

Of finding you here tomorrow, and wetting the wings of your lips

Down into my soft and anonymous world.

Robert Rorabeck

Into My Windmills

Eloquence in the starving amphitheater—
By another song to be doing this,
Disappearing by riding bicycles and speaking of Housewives and getting Married to a woman that cannot exist by Herself in this country—
Her true love sober if far away—
And the truancy of her body's limbs from my shore
Designating the nest of her softest places:
Taking her virginity at thirty and Riding the bus with her—trying to remember how Wet the waves got that we have never tasted together,
Even if she doesn't like roses—
She has already bought me my birthday present over
And over—like the sun and the moon rolling over
The earth,
Her body the milky place of smoothed cataracts that falls
Like milk and pearls into my windmills.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Myth

It gets so sometimes I'd like to pray,
And on my knees I'd like to say,
"Now enough! Why do you have to be So f*cking tough! "
But to do so would make me a hypocrite,
Believing in a God when it is convenient,
Rather, I should take the blows,
Laughing from their pews and rows,
And beaten, battered, alone in the end,
Turn my face away from this all, and grin,
For that would mean I was still inside,
And hadn't given up and lied.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Rocket Ships And Fireworks

Up in the angel morning with their Kissed:
Frying like eggs, soaring like bacon:
And above the clouds,
Heirlooms of metamorphosis in the wide
And open rooms:
While angels fly to get here:
Up and up
And up: daylight and pigeons and the moon
Propositioning the sun:
Eagerly,
Roses bloom, perfume and perfume
And fly and fly around them:
Graveyard and dump and tomb:
The daylight grows up into rocket ships and Fireworks
And other careworn exhumes: and school will Come tomorrow
And the whores will watch cartoons.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Rust

Here is a bedroom as rich as a rose garden to lay you
Down in,
Underneath the cockpits of illustrious and busy men,
Calling out to the fields of wonder all above the make believes
Of the clouds,
Burning in airy splendor, pinwheels to the more porous gods:
Latching on to the spokes of Bicycles who in willing their own metamorphosis learned
To fly,
And so kissed the sunny streets of sunny kids goodbye:
And took to here, and took to there,
And swam like runny Mandela's through a Buddhism of
Sky,
Until the feelings were given away as gifts, and their reasons
Answered their lonely bodies marching on lighthearted skiffs;
And it somehow happened that they all marched up
Here,
Where the rockets glamour and the corporeal jackets of Glades and volatile roller coasters disappear,
Blinded by a cardinal in his dreams, kissed into blindness
By a church,
Giving the Eucharist to lungs as they spill over breathlessly,
Albinos in the rattlesnake strata of a cannibal king,
Forest as pitched and long as a folklore of witchcraft that collects
The failed wishes of downed airplanes like coins in a well
Whose wishes always bleed into rust, and never heal.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Something That Cannot Be Stolen

Adding the angel bright kerosene to my heart
And stumbling through the smoky forest where the bees
Are laying with the leaves:
The boys are dark in Mexico, dark as the shadows between the Pits of trees;
And I saw you and your man today, Alma, waiting in the line
At the place I was shopping,
But I got there before you came, like a shadow that was tired
Of following:
I went by you as quiet as a frightened dog, and he was in the corner
Watching you,
As saturnine as a bear culled by an owl; but I could feel you:
Feel that you were mine:
I went by saying nothing, and wondered where your children were.
Then I drove home, towards the ocean and the bushels full of Stars,
Went home as lonely as a beaten hound, which I am afraid is what I Am, but then I put your eyelash into a painting by Picasso
And made it disappear entirely into that woman's eyelash that He painted;
It was my witchcraft without practice but picked up from the driest
Country in the land where you come from:
And I want to take you and your children to the movies,
And on bicycles to run parallel with the spangling cutlery of the waves:
I want to share a life with you that we do not yet have,
And I want us to look each other in the eye and remember how I
Have hidden your soul away into something that cannot be stolen.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Stranger And Other Streams

Trailer parks of my ancestry where nothing ever
Closes,
But nothing ever gets done on time,
Because everyone is enjoying the Ferris Wheels
Underneath the mountains
In the lackadaisical metamorphosis that never Really changes,
Or goes to the forest to shed the old skeletons
Or armors,
But they bend down and drink from the challises
Of wishing wells and waitresses,
As October comes around and its so many birthdays,
While I suppose you haven't seen her,
Because she lives upon the other coast;
But the angels burn like candles for her, even though
She is so young:
Her first born son is just learning to walk,
And her husband is playing tennis:
Soon she will even forget where she lives-
As she enjoys one Fourth of July after another,
And her children metamorphosis into demigods with Wings,
And tadpoles grow legs and arms and swim and Leap into stranger and other streams.

Into That High School

Now to the ghost towns flying
Without looking up into all of this cantankerous spume,
Without even a word to remember on our Pillow,
Drooling and spilling over into the gunfights that mound
The hills all around our Red and pornographic fort: and now I have my head held High,
Remembering the yellow emblem, the flaunting of conquistadors
Throughout the ripe orchards,
As throughout all of those fluming carcasses,
Cursing as they remembered themselves:
Life some kind of god looked over by airplanes,
Whilst all of this dust returned to the cropped grasses
All about the fingernails of the trailer park
As into dusk we figured out how to stop touching ourselves,
With all of the industrialized engines touching down
And figuring out how to look so pretty
Even amongst the fields,
As the baseball players spoke up and cursed, even as all of our Pinwheels faded, folding into nothingness
Completed, just as the fist traffics bundled into the mists,
And swore, making the fist missive steps into that high school.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Aforementioned Princes

Each day in her echoing clay poets
And dogs:
And the princes in her carport ululating,
Looking up to her like a goddess as she strings
Out the clothes to be washed,
As the lightning shakes the orange tree
Like a little boy who has tied his own shoes
Above his head
And walks out in the mud to the open tongues
Of alligators who would be laughing,
If they knew how to feel:
Here there is so much joy it is on the verge of Drowning, and the frogs crowd her like
Tadpoles, encouraging her to remember
When they were just tadpoles as she bent
Down above their shallows admiring her own
Reflection,
When they thought for all this time that she Meant to kiss at least one or two of them
And at last turn those lucky few into the aforementioned Princes.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Arc

Looking up into the arc, it is time to celebrate:
See there, there are balloons,
Being blown by the zephyrs into the lips of Vagabonds—and in the living room there
Is enough space to count out the terrapin—
Until another bedroom is divided—
Your mother and father are still alive—
But the katydids like themselves inside the cataracts of Cypress,
As the airplanes fly across overhead,
Spilling their silver ribbons over another theatre
That is too afraid to disappear.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Aspects Of A Broken Sea

When the horses gallop through the pine trees,
Their heels click against the apoplectic
Rattles of snakes
Balled up in a boreal movie theatre:
But it is just a trick, and now they are not even
There:
Underneath the pitchfork pines where my parents
Once sold produced picked from Bell Glade—
There is now only a strip mall
And a massage parlor—
A fast food joint: what happened before
Was just a trick of the light:
My childhood looking up through the bower,
Flea-bitten, long snouted dog whining beside me—
And the speckled light of what could have been an Audience of guardian angels
Waiting for the curtains to travel west—and again
Into the aspects of a broken sea.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Blaring Eyes

Comely reasons resting here,
And combing comely hair, while the angels intrude
Through the footsteps of busses,
While the rattlesnakes sleep belly-up underneath the rude
Cherubs of holly;
And gold crenulates the earth, as grandmothers surface
In Saint Louis,
Segregated in the firehouses of Bellefontaine, underneath the Chalkboards amusements and all laid out there all Silkily
Even before I knew anything
About Alma; as she showed up real good today, and it made Me formed the way sometimes gunpowder can contemplate
In a wound;
But I left the battlefield so that I could get here first thing
To you,
The continents melting like ice-cream, treating themselves
Into the tears of the ocean:
And bicycles, and bicycles who become the reefs and grottos
For otters and alligators,
As Alma's daughter learns her firsts words, and looks up Smiling into the blaring eyes of her most overtly Mexican Of fathers.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Brighter Hemispheres

I am so drunk and so defeated now,
Alma,
That I am laying on my floor in the darkness:
Reposing underfoot of the verbiage in the landscaping of My misappropriated zoetrope,
I pine for you- Alma: I tell you I love you all day long,
And it makes you laugh,
The way a butterfly laughs at the passing roar of an airplane:
The way the jubilation of innocent bones laughs in the graveyard;
There are yellow houses here waiting in the verdure
To bare your name: Alma,
And the sun is famished and jealous because you know that
She doesn't shine as brightly as you
Shine-
Your very name the soul of my being- At last you are the Personification that metamorphoses into the brighter hemispheres,
Shedding my artwork and suckling your children.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Caesuras Of Death

The work is steadily picking up,
Folded into arrows and made to cross
The canal I remember,
In any weathers, where the fish are all alone,
Where they aint getting any bigger;
And the trolleys of pre-socratic gentlemen
Busily unshaved, not knowing either where
They are going,
Drinking steaming hemlock,
Pointing out my scars like foreclosure
Constellations, saying now which one is truly
Beautiful, and which one is not,
Trying to get myself into a bigger dictionary,
Understanding how to laugh at the beautifully, dolled
Women now who are like mannequins posing down
At the debased roots of the Rocky Mountains:
Now, with their proboscises evenly jeweled,
And their hair slipping down like readily desirable
Women from the north-country,
No one really cares, because all they are is selling
Something, something headily perfumed but not Disclosed until bought;
And I ate all their parents' expensive jam,
And I stepped out the door into the sea, and named it
My sea, and gave it my colorful vermilion,
And fish which grew spurious from my gentlemanly palms,
Who before where butterflies from a yet unexplored moon
Who metamorphosed,
And then flew away, crash landing their brilliant quartiles
Into the caesuras of death,
Believing that even though, like me, they should be Remembered for what they have done strung out and Dimpled before all of that careless society,
Knowing that even if they are not it will not matter,
For who is better qualified than they to know what they are.

Into The Canal

I know there are trophies of what you
Want in your eyes,
But I cannot see them- they say your eyes
Are brown,
But I think they are lying- Siamese octopi
Have inked the fish tanks of your eyes,
And I think of their wolf-like
Silhouette as I sleep underneath the overpass-
Words conjoin like lines on my palm;
And it rains, coming down- jewels and acronyms
Of fireworks-
Of what it means to be here- waiting for you:
Even the cops are sleeping,
And where there is no concrete, the grass is matted:
And somewhere soft and far away,
My parents are sleeping together near the road
That vanishes into the canal,
And from there begins a whole other world.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Crepuscule Of Her Olive-Skinned Neighborhood

Bottle caps under sewing the spikenard:
Where there is jubilant literature and students of Premodonnas and words as plentiful and Carnivorous blue jays,
But also where I hate to think of her making love
Under the big and huffing circus tents,
Because I imagine that is what she does:
Kind of how I found out tonight that there are Still women coming down from other worlds,
But stepping down and looking real good and Enjoying the moment
Like the fair moving beside the freshest ports,
And it doesn't bother me to have to look into her eyes,
Even though I know it should:
Because she just goes on forever, whistling the minerals
Of a Nubian world, and this is the splendor curling
Up into the crepuscule of her olive-skinned neighborhood.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Earth Until You Cry

Going home again to remember
That some roads lead into the forest, and not
All airplanes make it
To their destination- and the parks sometimes
Turn into salt mines:
And I know you cannot leave him, but I have loved
You the way a stubborn bumblebee will Sometimes love only one flower,
Even though he's gotten all off her that he Can:
And now lies drunkenly besides some wishing well
In a mall of wherever,
Having cast his wishes into the shallows that will Never return,
Nor even give a reflection of an echo:
And that is how I will starve for you- each Christmas Underneath the stewardesses in any of my Houses- as you go home to him
And you children, and the sunlight burns
Into the earth until you cry.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Forver Backyards

Each stitch in the peacock's feather,
A crenulation upon the mountains, stones waved into the Quartzite caesuras where the lovers fall,
Teeth chipped upon the false romances of hoar frosted mermaids:

The milkmaid riding on the last-most seat of the bus
Turns a blue eye away,
The wind succulates upon her blondness,
Ovid turns her sisters into kites,
Zeus draws a bone and turns into the conquistador's bull,
Pursuing knee-high into the foaming surcease:

My children drizzle into the tiny yellow rooms
Where we have planted them,
Their insufficient nudities beginning to dry like dew in the morning of the first day of school:

They are looking up at her. They have forgot all of their memories.
A goshawk touches two weeds together in a thorny bush,
And a new pornography is born high up in the coned armpits
Between two war-begotten countries-

The last word spoken to their virginity has no meaning;
It is sent to turn them feral so that they may escape these earliest of Classrooms:
Leaping billy-goats of metamorphosis,
The fairytale spumed between two nests of giants:

They are freed to roam the canals dredged behind the backyards
Of society. The little girl pauses to kiss an alligator frozen by her presence,
And the land beckons in a bucolic, mowed excellence-
Where nocturnal boys recline forever, arms crossed behind their fermenting brains,
Where gem-sized grasshoppers speckle their
Acned cheeks, far into the forever backyards of the most forgetful housewives.

Into The Lukewarm Stones

I tried many nights surviving to the sounds of Airplanes—
As unbusied bachelors jumped and left the Earth—
Going on their honeymoons where no one could Disavow them-
Taking off their shirts to sunlight
And moonlight, but never to the all too
Many Disney Worlds—
As the housewives stood at their thresholds
Counting to themselves and biting
Their lips—
They'd been at the pleasantries of masturbating
While their young boys tried to Launch model rockets
To soar above the carports to a cream-pie moon—
As across the street, the pornography
Molded with the blue cats—
And the cenotaphs of the conquistadors cried
Themselves into the lukewarm stones.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Months Of Noon

I am your sadly resolute countryman
Erin,
Kept higher up on the taught purple hillside:
I have been tending the golden sheep
The heroes keep trying to barter from me
With locks of your hair.
And it is a shame that tomorrow I should have to Go down into so much humorous swelter,
And traffic with those muscled tourists;
And I wont even be around,
Because I am not a model specimen,
And I will go through the day mostly dejected and Past over,
Thinking about you, Erin- A specimen of Plato's Theology,
A red hot candy all f%cked up- And then I will be Back up again,
High in my lonely bed,
Masturbating, trying to remember the few Easter Eggs
I thought I found in College;
But if you really loved me,
You'd lay off your extra-curricular tea-parties
And come and make love to me in my upper bunk,
Because I am not beautiful,
But I am honest and simple- Erin,
Don't give up on trying to be
A good woman:
There are so many saddened colors to farm,
And our children would take after you,
And our sheep would shine back to the infantile moon
The tremulous swaying of our buxom love making
Far into the months of noon.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Most Naked Of Cathedrals

Resentment illustrated eternally—it is a juvenile fear
That comes home alone—latchkeyed, microwaving dinner—
Expecting the estranged fascinations of Televangelist joy: I saw you out walking out in the courtyard—
Bosomy and with a crown of ivory—you were attracting Every boy—and the attention of all of the heavens was Spilling over you like some sort of waterfall irrefutable of Divine Promise—so in the middle of the day when I had to swim Home while I was horny and could not express myself by
And more lucid thoughts to you—I enjoyed myself underneath the Ceiling fan—as thoughts and airplanes spread away like
The nebulas your eyes try to fabricate—as you step out unarmed
Into the most naked of cathedrals and look far, far away.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Mouth Of The Lion

I come into the mouth of the lion
Where I dance,
When my wife is taking a shower,
And in a zoo near here there
Is a merry-go-round
That doesn't turn once there are
Stars in the sky,
And some Disney movie is playing
In a nearby theatre
Until the lights shut off and the Strip joints
Open—like my mouth and my Thoughts after I have drunken too much—
And all of the playgrounds have emptied—
And the little thing that will be my son
Shadow boxes in my wife's Chinese
Belly—
Until New Years, when there will be fireworks,
And a few more days off until
I will have to go back to school.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Next World

Busied in the tomb
As papered airplanes flew, burning, looking up
Through the maelstrom,
Heavily scarred- deaf to the hierarchies of whatever they Though about,
Even burning as they touched down, pin wheeling without A thought,
Conquistadors on a throw, or another way to liven up:
Ancient harpies up in the sky,
But what are they doing:
Burning,
Burning- red apples thrown to the plagiarisms of the Ants:
And all of my scars: and all of my scars buried beneath the Orchards,
Buried beneath all of this, while my paper soul burns
Through its semiprecious elements: burns, thrown across
The lips of the canal,
Tossed across the bosoms of my brown
Alma, leaping like a bullet shot horse without a care into the Next world.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Nights Of Those Christmases

Baseball lays wetly upon my skin-
Fallen like tatters from a web in the forest:
Here it lays,
This past-time outside of the parking lot
Or the tent where we used to sell Christmas trees
And I listened to your brown
Words telling me wonderful lies in the weedy
Pasture beside the canal,
The traffic streaming, keeping up with the reports,
But heading home:
The Christmas trees from slave states cut down,
Entombed underneath the palms,
As I kissed your pretty lips through the air,
Alma- as if you were a fire to keep me warm,
And I set my own soul outwards like a wet cloth
Of wounded children into the overpasses
And against the waves I never saw-
To find you,
To make you give promises to keep a residence inside
Of my ribs- while the carriages plundered
And the alligators gave their promises to Bicycles- into the nights of those Christmases
Trying to remember the games I wished that we'd Played.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Nocturnal Bouquets

Into the nocturnal bouquets how Will you pretend to find me, before and after You've had children with another man—
And what was I but another playground
That you could leave
As the sun called you further and further upstate—
And the waves flooded themselves around—
And the mermaids took off their bikinis
And floundered around—
Sometimes I imagined that I would live in a trailer park,
And sometimes a playground—
Even after the amusements had closed,
The more carnivorous stores remained open
All night as I waited, open chested,
For my soul to be flooded by them,
Even though you were far,
Far from Being around.

Into The Rich Classes Where They Belonged

The boys really brag that they have the candles well
In hand,
Softy as gossiping butterflies, and tiny drinking fountains
Purring over her fingers;
As if this is where they'd found her out while they Were all alone, early before school in the mowed ovals of Sleeping tracks,
In the wet enclaves of baseball diamonds, and wherever
Their feet fell- far back along the last vestiges of the easement,
Watched by the eyes of alligators who would never own a
Name
Until the seeds of the city actually poured into the classrooms,
And they walked back into the halls and saw once more
The breathy wishes on crutches of skirted legs, bemoaning the Conduction of their courses,
Enclutched by golden musings, and bending low across the theatres,
Stopping for awhile and then just as regular as carnivals
And geysers, removing themselves once more from these visions of Daydreams,
And promptly sitting themselves deep into the rich classes where They belonged.

Into The Richest Hillside of All of Her Mexicos

Busting a full pageantry of the male peacock;
Until the heavens have such bliss as to become a church:
And then we can think together reasonlessly
Into the highest Pharisees of windmills: that it all exists right here:
And that it has all been keeping its time alone,
Just to recite into the homeopathic lights of doll houses,
That the tiny fingers of lovers are on their way:
And on the move like the hopelessly helpless fires of firecrackers,
Like the thunderpuss of seahorses along the spines of Young lovers who've all had too much caffeine on their birthdays:
And then I go to the dog track with Flaco-
But other than that, I only have one or two bad habits; and neither of Them have anything left to do with what you believe in:
But my muse is right here, and mulling over the backs of Salt Water Terrapin like the tafees of waves through the echoes of High class amusements somewhere not so far off from the candy land of The light house; but still far away enough to be on the side of Dangerous, like fish who have somehow evolved the effect of Touching their gills, and saying to themselves as they swim away,
That this is not enough- until the games lessen and turn surreal; and maybe
Decide not to happen at all, like the first born child on the graveyard shift
Of an airplane- as the muses who just happen to be from Mexico,
Turn their slender brown asses in bed, and look away from the rattlesnakes
Who are so fully sated from kissing and eating the magician's rabbits,
As to be fearless and tamed- like the mothers of tourists who have all
Eaten the icecreams and sherbets underneath the scissoring switchbacks
Of my insurmountable ranges; and the mountains who don't ever have To say my muse's name; but, unfortunately, never have the Class to contain themselves- like rain showers in an orgasm of Practicing school buses who would like to pinafore my Alma with so Many souls:
Like butterflies matting to the weathers so far entrenched into the richest Hillside of all her Mexicos; and so, unfortunately, Alma, rarely if ever Do....

Into The Rivers

Mother of a yellow wolfâ€”This is my art, Sinking beneath the sunshine of a sailboatâ€”
The tourists donâ€™t
See youâ€”What lines you have gone
Through the trigonometry of any horizon:
The apple falls, consumed,
And her bedroom she looks up to the ceiling
Fan, fancying pilots in their acrobatic
Delusionsâ€”and everything else is a pulseâ€”
A way to behave which I cannot describe:
The knights have crossed the river on their Quest, and you are still in college
Casting your dimensions into the rivers from Which I have long since vanished.

Into The Sea

There in the drainage, down by the clutch
Where the special whispers ululate as soft as my mother's First memories:
What is this, but words spoken prematurely before the rain;
And it is coming down over the first house that I can remember
While my parents are making love
And the frog princes are in the carport laying eggs all over
The rebar and the open extension chords
Besides the blue Cadillac my mother almost drowned in:
And all of it paved and done away by Kidnappers a long time before I came upon Alma-
And she gave me the desire which kindled
All of this pain-
Airplanes sleeping on the roofs, French-kissing weathervanes:
And Alma and her children right there, in a world
I cannot see:
I buy them gifts- but she floats away like hapless genies
Bottled into the sea.

Into The Sea Again

And that sea a languid beauty: I do not know her.
I am just sweating in a tenement in Shanghai,
But soon I will be returning home,
Without a wife, and the sky is hung-over
And filled with the vortexes of dead ends,
As the foxes hang upon the barbed wire:
But I made her pregnant,
Travelling the sea to her, and back—and Back again:
It took maybe sixty times to make it permanent,
And not she rests just on my shoulder,
Like a string of stars around a Christmas tree
She cannot possibly believe in—
But I will take her around here to meet
Those holidays that I was born with:
And our child will know all about the fairies
That happened to partake in the both of us—
Even if he doesn't believe in them:
He will have both hemispheres, and so many Places to go hiding—
And he will close his eyes, and the sun will melt
Into the sea again.

Into The Seas Of

Making another line in the wilting snow:
It is just make-believe anyways—
The cathedrals are over-run with parked cars
And the bouquets which were supposed to be Here—It doesn't matter if the lovers
Can hardly breathe—
They have been too busy getting all over themselves—
The words hunger, and then they starve:
The rain starts out,
Like beautiful banshees in a traffic jam press ganged
Before the mountains:
Those beautiful apiaries in their boudoirs of Nose bleeds: and I suppose I can say it
Anyways,
Because no one shall find this anyways—
There she was, on a high shelf, the airplanes making'
Her barrettes—
And no one had to languish too long beside her
Swimming pools—
Her amusements were all torn down upon the day
She was married,
And all of her senses dived into the seas of
The impenetrable heavens.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Shade

Cicadas echoing to their house wives
That is this
And this is that- as the cars drive by,
And the cat
Sleeps on holidays- sleeps a long while on
The mat:
The sky above the trees of that- the houses
In ribbons upon the lake,
The families within them taking the take-
Festival of their bodies
I watch them partake, them never conceiving
The mistake of mistake
And they are leaning fully into the shade
As the fox cleans out the chicken coops
In which the hens thought to have laid.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Sky

I have a girl
And she is married
And the sun
Sings
And masturbates
Into the sky.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Soft Flesh

Dragon of infinite colorsâ€”
Of seas shells and the tattoos of little girlsâ€”
Challenging you in high art and witches:
Venal forest in your eyes filled with the tears
Of the crashes of airplanes:
What country do you represent kidnapped
Into the war we have fallen intoâ€”
Broken pavements who cannot remember
The tantrums of their disillusioned soulâ€”
And so you now send things into meâ€”
Busy quills like soldiers dying into the soft
Flesh of sinking valleys:
And I become drunken for you underneath
Churchesâ€”and become fulfilled,
Lost beneath you with all of those things which
No longer must evolve.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Tide Pool

Without a ghost I am dead.
And languishing on the servicing highways
I wander—
In a marriage I am allowed to drift,
Cultivated into the working class—
I go about my way the same as anyone—
Happy marionette
Pulled by the stolen lactations of
The moon—
The elevators of my dreams escape me,
But at least I don't have to Go to school anymore—
I can meander as far as my English mind
Can take me:
Pulled back and forth like the tide
By forces I can barely glean—
But it is a beautiful act,
Staged by the ideologies of men
Forever freeing themselves into cages,
Little shadows, like minnows,
In the tide pools upon the edge of oblivion.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Waiting Constellations

It hurts:
And the cars start in the morning-
Go off
To work,
Like the last breath of a newborn
Of great grandfather is breathing,
As the morning
Surmounts
Disney World,
And the alligators pant, if they would-
And a bit of truant sunlight
Lies making love
With elegant herons and deer and Tadpoles in a make-believe
Woods
That is sorrowful enough to be a swamp-
As you hold his light up
To your face, having already turned down
Mine-
Your brown skin like the copper of
A snake with emotions and lips
And soul big enough to have
Swallowed my heart like a candied apple,
Then turned away from the fire,
Hips and elbows already attracting
To chrysalis of every sort and kind of Metamorphosis:
And you step into that threshold commonly
Bled from all of the traffic
Back into the waiting constellations you
And he have somehow born.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Waves

As a stricken day looks beautiful,
At long last the horse missing a rider lies down
For the wolves,
And the moon is a lighthouse too far away to help:
And the tourists are just getting off
A ship that isn't even hurt:
The dogs panting a chasm of red love bleeding off
The lovely roses,
And what light that isn't lost to it slowly slips
Away, curling around
The pinafores, as the perfumes drift off into the waves:
The women there upon the parapets
Save themselves,
And make love as before mentioned while
The fireworks are sacrificed into the waves.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The West

Boys, as they are lost turn narcoleptic:
Counting the crooks of trees and all of the ways down,
The weeps and tinctures of sunlight that expose
Housewives to the foxes who leap for their wine;
And the world is good, in its real places,
Its architectures of lawns, the chessboard of canals that Hedge into them so many fairytales:
The slender bridges for the goats, the very first words that Laid me off the tits and eventually put hair on my chest:
And now they are riding back and forth like censers
In a church:
The purple day looks out through the windows and feels so
Sorry for the cars;
The fireworks shoot their arrows, and burn in the green outdoors:
And it is a holiday, or at least it has been blessed,
And all of the angels strum their guitars as they get undressed into The west.

Robert Rorabeck

Into The Wishingwell Of The Armpits

Swearing by these mountains that they know their Paths—as mothers and mothers
Come home tumbling upon mountain bikes—
And the sky is a necklace of pearls above the mine Shaft—
Eventually I will have to come down from my spying and Have dinner with you—but for now it is Taking forever—and my joints hurt and are in need
Of a good oiling—
And every time I look at you, I see that you are looking Away, and collecting your head into the wishing well
Of the armpits of another god-d@mned
Good man.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Their Brotherly World

Beautiful it is to be another while
Anonymous beside the sea:
Beautiful words happening from the monuments of My destroyed body:
Roiling up through the pores of a session of long nights
And windmills of tattoos:
Going overboard, and licking their wounds all the way
Down the Grandest canyon of the ants:
Drawing the blood like the sacred swords from them
That my father never drew-
And then standing like the tiniest man inside a forest
That grows up to the heavens,
Where the angels are doing their laundry just like My mother across the blue sheaths of Comets and moonlights:
The waves like wild horses collecting their blue ribbons
From their tiniest and most unsurest of bedrooms:
Soon they will be up there to meet her,
But what will they see: and what will they say to her
As they go down together,
Back into their brotherly world, to breakfasts, gossips,
And sleeps.

Robert Rorabeck

Into This Old High School

Into this old high school of my dialect,
You represent something I am seriously not fond of—
Even as I watch disbelieve as older
Than old frogs
Leap and jump to the moon—
And the rockets burst like chardonnay—
Or anyway I cannot spell you—
And I am not clear that I am otherwise happy
As the busses and the busses and the busses
Turn around anyways like the mariposas of
The poets of anyways—
And I've just been languishing here besides
The bedside of the telephone—
Anyways—
Wondering and wondering of
You cannot make out the souls of the remote Control boats that seem to be happening
Like the bursting hearts of fireworks beside You and always and just because in the Holidays of the bedrooms and the bedrooms of Your holidays anyways.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Your Eyes

How these poems will not be remembered,
Half written- semi-delectable:
Will they be remembered by periods of such great muses
The world will never think to know beyond their bodies passing
Of brown skin across the soft and verdant snow:
Should I not be given a name to defeat the pagan vines of Rome,
To ignite the months of rain- Let them know at least that my last
Muse was the most fortunate,
And that I was with her and as true to her as the most incidental airplanes
Are to the sky:
That I kissed her lips so many times through the parks of our many Days,
And I drowned myself into her eyes until the gravity took us away
Together:
Alma, I drowned myself into your eyes today,
And it doesn't matter if anyone else in the world cares to remember.

Robert Rorabeck

Into Your Forgotten Mexico

Words are imperfect, but they hold true:
Cherry trees blossoming in the hue; and your eyes warming up
Across the lakes overflowing with the things they Cannot hold,
The pretty voices who have told of everything stolen
From these shelves over all of these years:
The golden forest thick with bears,
And the humming caterpillars who bed up to your throats Alma
And change right there,
To disappear across the carnivals of the world you put into me,
While your daughter grows up,
And your son enlivens the day; as I want to hold hands with you back
Into your forgotten Mexico, to kiss, and kneel and pray.

Robert Rorabeck

Intoxicate

I drink a little when I write,
To dull the pain and blind the errors,
To give a new shine to the crypt,
And put blue birds in the shadows:
Inebriation lines up the holidays on the fences,
And draws out the kids painted like Indians
In their suburban yards,
Like bottles which glisten and whistle
From their glass canals,
And scatters sun in the pasture-
Fish leap like scaled notes of music,
And footprints change their species in the Scalding storms arriving on the beaches-
Then, at night, I can easily become a poet of Middle America- something between the store
Bought saccharine greeting cards for doe eyed mothers,
And the lucid fart from Walt Whitman whistling on
The cartographed prairies;
It is inexcusable tomfoolery, which imbibed in the Dimness of a parked car, is easily mistaken for genius
By the mouth who spills it,
And the fingers which tap-dance it excreted on
The keys like painful if muted jazz,
But it is rarely if ever cousin to the pink titted scientists,
And those who build their mansions in the nouns
Can rightly say that my home is a dirty studio
Paid for by the month by middlingly lucrative crimes,
For her eyes never stray across me, as if I was Something she had never seen before
Swimming beautifully through the sea.

Inventory

100 caskets of blue
Blooming planets
Beneath her tired eyes,

Beneath her 12 fingers,
Twelve dozen hungry
Alligators hidden in sandy
Pools in the sand box
Of the dog park,

Sixty-six dogs in 11 grains
Of sand,

Sixty-six boxes of French chocolates to Feed grandmother's purple lips,

5 hungry grandmothers in 5 marble caskets,

15 hardy boxers fighting
Satans on the fences,

29 roaming fences,
Coiling loosely about his properties,

2 bright new rainbows
Leading from our homes to Fine new apartment stores,

22 apartment stores with Cabbage green floorboards,

One calico cat on
Her naked purring lap,

Just her naked purring lap,

And more of that

And all of that
And more and
More of that.

Robert Rorabeck

Is Believe

Starting out through the porticos and transoms of
A house:
Then the Pleiades, over looking the garden mazes of so many ways:
Wanting to go down the bleachers and ending up in the search
And kiss and f%ck
Underneath all of the windows whistling from the airplanes:
Eyes opening up on my wounded body,
Sounding its bugle to your lips: the forts are surrounded
And the enemy is filled with your uncles and brothers: they look so Fine, reporting to themselves,
On horseback and in silver and gold, while your children
Suffer before the television;
