Classic Poetry Series

Dennis O'Driscoll
- poems -

Publication Date:
2012

Publisher:
Poemhunter.com - The World's Poetry Archive
Dennis O'Driscoll (1 January 1954 -)

Dennis O'Driscoll is an Irish poet, essayist, critic, and editor born in Thurles, County Tipperary, Ireland. Although not widely recognized in the United States, he is considered one of the best European poets of his time. In all, he has written eight books of poetry, two chapbooks, and a collection of essays and reviews. Additionally, much of O'Discoll's work has been inspired by his friend and mentor, Nobel Prize winner, Seamus Heaney. Majority of his works can be characterized by the use of economic language and the recurring motifs of mortality and the fragility of everyday life. As he ages, O'Driscoll's works become more fluid and thoughtful as well as more frequent, and, according to some sources, like Alan Brownjohn of The Sunday Times for instance, even though he is younger than some of the poetic greats, "at best he is already their equal."

Life and Career

Born on January 1, 1954 in Thurles, County Tipperary, Ireland, O'Driscoll was the child of James and Catherine F., a salesman/horticulturist and a homemaker. He was educated by The Congregation of Christian Brothers and then attended the University of Dublin from 1972-75. After completing his secondary education, at age sixteen (1970), O'Driscoll was offered a job at Ireland's Office of the Revenue Commissioners the internal revenue and customs service. Specializing in "death duties, stamp duties, and customs," he was employed for over thirty years full-time. Later, in the 1970s and 80's, O'Driscoll held many part-time jobs and positions in association with his writing. He took, for instance, a position as part-time editor of Tax Briefing, a technical journal produced in Ireland, as well as reviewing poetry for Hibernia, and The Crane Bag. He also served on the council of the Irish United Nations Association from 1975-80. After this, he married Julie O'Callaghan, a writer, in September 1985.

In 1987, he temporarily became a writer-in-residence at the National University of Ireland. He has also served as editor of Poetry Ireland Review as well as two textbook anthologies entitled The Bloodaxe Book of Poetry, and Quote Poet Unquote. After thirty-eight years in Revenue, in early 2008, O'Driscoll was asked to write a poem marking the opening of the Revenue Museum in Dublin Castle, marking the first time his job and his art would intermingle. This poem, At The Revenue Museum, which was originally brought to life to be printed in a program for the opening ceremony, now hangs as an exhibit in the museum itself.

O'Driscoll stayed in the revenue business for as long as he did due to the advice of a colleague, who told him, "If you ever leave your job, you will stop writing."
Thus, revenue became a sort of fall back option for him; a career that paid regularly and provided a pension. Whereas poetry was his art. Even so, in his memoir entitled, Sing for the Taxman, O'Driscoll states, "I have always regarded myself as a civil servant rather than a 'poet' or 'artist' - words I would find embarrassing and presumptuous to ascribe to myself."

Journal Publications

Prior to the publication of his own poems, O'Driscoll published widely in journals and other print publications as both an essayist and poetry reviewer, for which he was very widely known. In fact, The Times Literary Supplement has called him "one of Ireland's most respected critics of poetry." During this time he contributed upwards of two-hundred essays and reviews to various publications, a few in which he also held the position of editor. Some of the better known periodicals he has been published in are Poetry, The London Magazine, Harvard Review, The Southern Review, and Poetry Review. Finally, he has also published one collection of literary criticisms entitled Troubled Thoughts, Majestic Dreams which contains a selection of essays and reviews.

Style

O'Driscoll's poems are often written to contain the major motifs of death and the banality of everyday life in a fluid and discursive style and an economic language base. In an interview, O'Driscoll claimed his sympathy towards writing in the language that is standard to the time period in which one lives. More often than not, O'Driscoll's poems are shrouded by darker thematic content, but every so often his poems can be satiric and even clownish. Despite this, O'Driscoll is know widely for his fundamental compassion for the human condition. The purpose of his poems in often not to stand by and be passively entertaining, but, rather, to challenge the emotional content of the reader's life.

Awards

Due to the notability of his works, O'Driscoll has received numerous awards and recognition from countries around the world. These include:

- Lannan Literary Award
- E.M. Forster Award of the American Academy of Arts and Letters
- O'Shaughnessy Award for Poetry from the Center of Irish Studies in Minnesota
- Poetry Book Special Commendation for New and Selected Poems
- Shortlisted for The Irish Times Poetry Now Award for Reality Check
- Argosy Irish Non-Fiction Book of the Year Award
Honorary doctorate in literature by University College, Dublin
He has also been asked to give readings of his work in such places as the Poetry Room in Harvard University, the Poetry International in London as well as the Hay-on-Wye and Cheltenham festivals of literature.
Experimental Animals

After Miroslav Holub

It’s much cushier when it’s raining rabbits than cats and dogs. The animals for experiment should not betray too much intelligence.

It grows unnerving to watch their actions mimic yours;
terror and horror you can empathise with.

But, for real heartbreak, take a newborn pig.
Fantastically ugly; possessing nothing and desiring nothing except its swig of milk; legs warping under all that weight of uselessness, stupidity and snout.

When I must kill a piglet, I hesitate a while.
For about five or six seconds.
In the name of all the beauty of the world.
In the name of all the sadness of the world.
“What’s keeping you?”, someone bursts in then.

Or I burst in on myself.

Dennis O'Driscol
Forever

Forever some customer happy to sing along with the supermarket muzak, no matter how hackneyed or crass.

Forever the plangent sound of a motorcycle in the early hours, conjuring a world you once had access to.

Forever the young couple shutting the front door, leaving to conjecture what their next move may be.

Forever the van driver slowing down to check a house number against a delivery invoice.

Forever an old boy on a rickety bike with a loyal following of one terrier-type mongrel.

Forever the husband skulking outside the boutique while his wife seeks approval from a mirror.

Forever the kind who believe in God (a little) and horoscopes (a lot) and cannot resist a buy-one-get-one offer.

Forever those with a lump in the throat at every reconciliation scene, the theme music’s pathos never failing to work its way straight to the left atrium of the heart.

Forever the cleaning woman tapping the pub window with a coin and the helmeted courier leaning his gob to the intercom.

Forever a caller so long on hold she wonders should she redial and brave the bossy touch-tone menu again.

Forever a youngster hacking the grass with bat or stick in what serves as a green space near the housing estate.

Forever, stopped in her tracks at One Hour Photo, a student smiling indulgently at her recent past.

Forever the secretary sprinting with franked mail to the post office, minutes before the closing curtain of steel shutters falls.
Forever, from an adjacent window, the commentator’s animated voice as the ball approaches the goal area and lands I don’t believe it ... barely wide.

Forever the widower turning up a Viennese polka on the Sunday morning programme and scribbling Slovak Radio Symphony Orchestra on a phone bill.

Forever the girl upending the nearly-empty crisp packet and savouring life to the full, to the last salty cheese-and-onion flavoured crumb.

Forever the old ladies who smile at babies like politicians and suspect the meter reader may not really be the meter reader.

Forever a freckled builder in high-vis jacket swinging his lunch-bag as he clocks in at the chipboard hoarding.

Forever the teenagers who can’t pass up a hat display without trying on preposterous headgear in a department store.

Forever the tall schoolboy with pony tail and full-length leather coat. And forever the small one, pate shaved almost bald, nursing a cigarette like a sore finger.

Forever the sort who texts a request for her boyfriend to the lunchtime show - then throws in a greeting to her aunt and uncle, just for the heck.

Forever the thickset woman, dragging a shopping trolley, who pauses to rub a lottery scratch card like Aladdin’s lamp.

Forever the exasperated mother - hatchback open, hazards flashing, eyes peeled for the traffic police - while her son, packing the drum kit, plays it cool.

Forever the laughter fading, a dropped coin spinning to a wobbly stop.

Forever life heading about its business in places vaguely familiar like an ex-weatherwoman’s face, a New Zealand premier’s name.

Forever. And ever. All going well.

Dennis O'Driscoll
Life

Life gives us something to live for:
   we will do whatever it takes to make it last.
Kill in just wars
   for its survival.
Wolf fast-food
   during half-time breaks.
Wash down
   chemical cocktails,
as prescribed.
      Soak up
hospital radiation.
      Prey on kidneys
at roadside pile-ups.
      Take heart
from anything that might conceivably grant it
      a new lease.
We would give a right hand
to prolong it.
      Cannot imagine
living without it.

Dennis O'Driscoll
Missing God

His grace is no longer called for before meals: farmed fish multiply without His intercession. Bread production rises through disease-resistant grains devised scientifically to mitigate His faults.

Yet, though we rebelled against Him like adolescents, uplifted to see an oppressive father banished - a bearded hermit - to the desert, we confess to missing Him at times.

Miss Him during the civil wedding when, at the blossomy altar of the registrar’s desk, we wait in vain to be fed a line containing words like ‘everlasting’ and ‘divine’.

Miss Him when the TV scientist explains the cosmos through equations, leaving our planet to revolve on its axis aimlessly, a wheel skidding in snow.

Miss Him when the radio catches a snatch of plainchant from some echoey priory; when the gospel choir raises its collective voice to ask Shall We Gather at the River? or the forces of the oratorio converge on I Know That My Redeemer Liveth and our contracted hearts lose a beat.

Miss Him when a choked voice at the crematorium recites the poem about fearing no more the heat of the sun.

Miss Him when we stand in judgement on a lank Crucifixion in an art museum, its stripe-like ribs testifying to rank.
Miss Him when the gamma-rays recorded on the satellite graph seem arranged into a celestial score, the music of the spheres, the Ave Verum Corpus of the observatory lab.

Miss Him when we stumble on the breast lump for the first time and an involuntary prayer escapes our lips; when a shadow crosses our bodies on an x-ray screen; when we receive a transfusion of foaming blood sacrificed anonymously to save life.

Miss Him when we exclaim His name spontaneously in awe or anger as a woman in a birth ward calls to her long-dead mother.

Miss Him when the linen-covered dining table holds warm bread rolls, shiny glasses of red wine.

Miss Him when a dove swoops from the orange grove in a tourist village just as the monastery bell begins to take its toll.

Miss Him when our journey leads us under leaves of Gothic tracery, an arch of overlapping branches that meet like hands in Michelangelo’s Creation.

Miss Him when, trudging past a church, we catch a residual blast of incense, a perfume on par with the fresh-baked loaf which Milosz compared to happiness.

Miss Him when our newly-fitted kitchen comes in Shaker-style and we order a matching set of Mother Ann Lee chairs.

Miss Him when we listen to the prophecy of astronomers that the visible galaxies will recede as the universe expands.

Miss Him when the sunset makes its presence felt in the stained glass window of the fake antique lounge bar.

Miss Him the way an uncoupled glider riding the evening thermals misses its tug.

Miss Him, as the lovers shrugging shoulders outside the cheap hotel ponder what their next move should be.

Even feel nostalgic, odd days, for His Second Coming, like standing in the brick dome of a dovecote after the birds have flown.

Dennis O'Driscoll
Nocturne

Time for sleep. Time for a nightcap of grave music, a dark nocturne, a late quartet, a parting song, bequeathed by the great dead in perpetuity.

I catch a glance sometimes of my own dead at the window, those whose traits I share: thin as moths, as matchsticks, they stare into the haven of the warm room, eyes ablaze.

It is Sunday a lifetime ago. A woman in a now-demolished house sings Michael, Row the Boat Ashore as she sets down the bucket with its smooth folds of drinking water...

The steadfast harvest moon out there, entangled in the willow’s stringy hair, directs me home like T’ao Ch’ien: A caged bird pines for its first forest, a salmon thirsts for its stream.

Dennis O'Driscoll
Someone

someone is dressing up for death today, a change of skirt or tie eating a final feast of buttered sliced pan, tea scarcely having noticed the erection that was his last shaving his face to marble for the icy laying out spraying with deodorant her coarse armpit grass someone today is leaving home on business saluting, terminally, the neighbours who will join in the cortege someone is paring his nails for the last time, a precious moment someone’s waist will not be marked with elastic in the future someone is putting out milkbottles for a day that will not come someone’s fresh breath is about to be taken clean away someone is writing a cheque that will be rejected as ‘drawer deceased’ someone is circling posthumous dates on a calendar someone is listening to an irrelevant weather forecast someone is making rash promises to friends someone’s coffin is being sanded, laminated, shined who feels this morning quite as well as ever someone if asked would find nothing remarkable in today’s date perfume and goodbyes her final will and testament someone today is seeing the world for the last time as innocently as he had seen it first

Dennis O'Driscoll
The Celtic Tiger

Ireland’s boom is in full swing.
Rows of numbers, set in a cloudless blue computer background, prove the point.

Executives lop miles off journeys since the ring-roads opened, one hand free to dial a client on the mobile.

Outside new antique pubs, young consultants — well-toned women, gel-slick men — drain long-necked bottles of imported beer.

Lip-glossed cigarettes are poised at coy angles, a black bra strap slides strategically from a Rocha top.

Talk of tax-exempted town-house lettings is muffled by rap music blasted from a passing four-wheel drive.

The old live on, wait out their stay of execution in small granny flats, thrifty thin-lipped men, grim pious wives . . .

Sudden as an impulse holiday, the wind has changed direction, strewing a whiff of barbecue fuel across summer lawns.

Tonight, the babe on short-term contract from the German parent will partner you at the sponsors’ concert.

Time now, however, for the lunch-break orders to be texted. Make yours hummus on black olive bread. An Evian.

Dennis O'Driscoll
My next poem is quite short and it’s about something most of you will recognise. It came out of an experience I had on holiday a couple of years ago. In fact, I’m pretty sure I’m correct in saying that it’s the only poem I’ve ever managed to write during my holidays, if you could have called this a holiday - it bore all the hallmarks of an endurance test.

There’s a reference in the poem to roller canaries, which become more or less mythical birds in the last line. I hope the context will make that clear. Incidentally, this poem has gone down extremely well in Swedish translation - which maybe reveals a bit about me! A word I’d better gloss is ‘schizont’; if I can locate the slip of paper, I’ll give you the dictionary definition. Yes, here we are: “a cell formed from a trophozoite during the asexual stage of the life cycle of protozoans of the class Sporozoa.”

OK then, I’ll read this and just two or three further sequences before I finish. By the way, I should perhaps explain that the title is in quotations. It’s something I discovered in a book on early mosaics; I wanted to get across the idea of diversity and yet unity at the same time, especially with an oriental, as it were, orientation. And I need hardly tell this audience which of my fellow poets is alluded to in the phrase “dainty mountaineer” in the second section. Anyway, here it is. Oh, I nearly forgot to mention that the repetition of the word ‘nowy’ is deliberate. As I said, it’s quite short. And you have to picture it set out on the page as five sonnet-length trapezoids. Here’s the poem.

Dennis O'Driscoll
I

Tomorrow I will start to be happy.
The morning will light up like a celebratory cigar.
Sunbeams sprawling on the lawn will set dew sparkling like a cut-glass tumbler of champagne.
Today will end the worst phase of my life.

I will put my shapeless days behind me, fencing off the past, as a golden rind of sand parts slipshod sea from solid land.
It is tomorrow I want to look back on, not today.
Tomorrow I start to be happy; today is almost yesterday.

II

Australia, how wise you are to get the day over and done with first, out of the way.
You have eaten the fruit of knowledge, while we are dithering about which main course to choose.
How liberated you must feel, how free from doubt:

the rise and fall of stocks, today’s closing prices are revealed to you before our bidding has begun.
Australia, you can gather in your accident statistics like a harvest while our roads still have hours to kill.
When we are in the dark, you have sagely seen the light.

III

Cagily, presumptuously, I dare to write 2018.
A date without character or tone. 2018.
A year without interest rates or mean daily temperature.
Its hit songs have yet to be written, its new-year babies yet to be induced, its truces to be signed.

Much too far off for prophecy, though one hazards a tentative guess—a so-so year most likely, vague in retrospect, fizzling out with the usual end-of-season sales; everything slashed:
your last chance to salvage something of its style.

Dennis O'Driscoll
Weather Permitting

I

The August day you wake to takes you by surprise.
A drift-net of wetness enmeshes the rented cottage, towels and children’s swimwear sodden on the line.

Dry-gulleted drains gulp down neat rain.
Drops bounce from a leaking gutter with hard, uncompromising slaps: and, like resignation in the face of death, you contemplate winter with something close to tenderness, the sprint from fuel shed to back door, the leisurely ascent of peat smoke, even the suburban haze of boiler flues when thermostats are set.

You warm to those thoughts as you sit there, brainstorming ways to keep the family amused,
plans abandoned for barefoot games on dry sand.
Handcraft shops? Slot-machine arcades? Hotel grills?

In truth - manipulating toast crumbs backwards, forwards at the unsteady table’s edge - you’d prefer to return to your bed as if with some mild ailment, pampered by duvet, whiskey, cloves.

II

Let it rain.
Let the clouds discharge their contents like reserve tanks.
Let the worms burrow their way to the topsoil from whatever dank Sargasso they were spawned in.
Let dampness rot the coffin-boards of the summer house.
Let the shrubs lose their foothold in the wind,
the nettles lose their edge, the drenched rat with slicked-back hair scuttle to its sewage pipe.
Let the tropical expanses of the rhubarb leaves serve as an artificial pond, a reservoir.
Let the downpour’s impact on the toolshed be akin to the dull applause on an archive recording of a love duet.
Let the bricklayers at the building site wrap pathetic sheets of polythene around doomed foundations.
Let the limb ripped from the tree’s socket hover fleetingly in the air, an olive branch.
Let a rainbow’s fantail unfurl like a bird of paradise.
Let a covenant be sealed, its wording watertight.
Let the floods recede.
Let there be light.

III after Giacomo Leopardi

The storm runs out of wind; nature, which abhors a silence, fills the vacancy with birdsong.
Deserting the airless, low-ceilinged coop,
the hen repeats herself ad infinitum. Replenished like the rain-barrels, hearts grow sanguine.

Sun strides down lanes that grass has repossessed, takes a shine to the brasses at the hotel where,
by the window she thrust open, the chambermaid is marvelling at the cleansed freshness, calm.

Balm of mind and body. Will we ever feel more reconciled to life than now, ever know a moment more conducive to new hopes, eager beginnings, auspicious starts?
How easily pleased we are. Rescind the threat of torment for the briefest second and we blot out dark nights of the soul when lightning flashes fanned by wind ignited fire and brimstone visions.

Sorrow is perennial; happiness, a rare bloom, perfumes the air - so that we breathe with the ease of a camphor-scented chest from which congestion has just lifted.

Lack of woe equates with rapture then, though not till death will pain take full leave of our senses, grant us permanent relief.

Dennis O'Driscoll