

Classic Poetry Series

Ken Bolton
- poems -

Publication Date:

2012

Publisher:

Poemhunter.com - The World's Poetry Archive

Ken Bolton(1949 -)

Ken Bolton (born 1949) is an Australian poet and art critic.

Bolton was born in Sydney and studied fine arts at the University of Sydney, where he also tutored. In the late 70s he edited the poetry magazine Magic Sam and began the small press Sea Cruise Books with Anna Couani. His first book of poems, Four Poems, was published in 1977. In 1982 he moved to Adelaide to work at the Experimental Art Foundation.

He has since edited the literary magazine Otis Rush and collaborated with poet John Jenkins on a number of books of poetry. His Selected Poems was published by Penguin in 1992 and he edited Brandl & Schlesinger's Homage to John Forbes. His criticism has appeared in Photofile, Art and Text, Art Monthly and Art & Australia among other periodicals; and Wakefield Press has published his monograph on the contemporary sculptor Michelle Nikou.

His latest collection (At The Flash & At The Baci, 2006) has been described as "prov[ing] to us that Ken Bolton is a prime example of a poet breaking new ground in Australian poetry."

(pinkham)

For Gregory O'Brien

I wonder how

Gregory does this these three line stanzas & whether I can do them — to any good effect.

I make coffee, check various things around the kitchen — find the new clock

I got Gabe for his birthday, note the milk is almost gone, bring the tea back & sit at this finely red-&- white checked table cloth again, pick some rice off it from the meal tonight chew it, & start — which means, mostly, I stop here

& see how I've done

It has my characteristic choppy rhythms, etcetera. Oh well.

It is called after Albert Pinkham Ryder

— Gregory's poem —

"called after" an American phrase, that I guess comes to mind as I recall what little I know of the American artist — 19th century? or very early 20th?

    I visualize small emblematic paintings typically with a dark image centered — briefly silhouetted — against a dark background — a sort of horse-&-rider against a storm? (The image my mind remembers may even be some late sketch by Moreau — you know: the late, atypical unfinished heavily impasto fragments that art historians love to suggest the Fauves might have seen — miles from the stillness, & detail, of Oedipus & the Sphinx say — or “in most ways” Anyway this is miles from Ryder. And I am briefly sure it is Ryder I can imagine

& the Moreau too — his horse & rider

in reds & blues lemon yellow, the American's black & deeply varnished colours — browns — against a discoloured white, or cream

& a larger dark ground.

Tho who knows?

Ryder

is not really our business a reverberation of US culture: local news like CNN, the American breakfast program we get at night. What a hopeless analogy. Ryder is better.

Moreau —

well, I like to bear in mind his presence along with Manet & that revolution. Tho give me Manet any day, if I had to choose. Tho, um, you don't.

I like the portrait — full face, almost filling the frame — of Moreau in a bowler hat high collar, & tie, narrow moustache — very 1900s modern by Roualt (pupil & friend) that is slightly 'cubist':

the one eye furthest from us — it is three-quarter on — & that whole plane, of cheek

& wide wide forehead, swells out, flattens, just slightly.

It seems an irony of history — or perhaps the irony was Roualt's. It was mine too eventually (though less originally) when I did a copy of it . . .

that I liked

& seem to have lost now Misplaced. I haven't seen it for a while

(I could do it again.) I take the rest of the tea

& toss it on the pot-plant, beneath the goldfish.

The plant had dried out.

The fish wake slightly & begin to move — at this angle

a few vague red shapes, a diaphanous white, in a tank that looks dark

Ken Bolton

(the Kirkman Guide To The Bars Of Europe, Their Music, Their Service, Views Etcetera

Tony Kirkman—What are you doing here? Shouldn't you be in Europe?

Me—I'm going, I'm going. Next week.

Tony Kirkman—Tell us about the bars!

for Barbara & Tony

The Kirkman Guide to the bars of Europe begins in that city so very much at Europe's centre—though like the perfect bar, where foot traffic is permitted but not the noise of cars—not too vertiginously at the absolute centre of the working world, not London, Paris or Berlin—which, though not like bars, host many bars themselves—but Rome. And where better than the raffish, the louche, the frankly insouciant Bar San Callisto?

Nowhere, that's where! Dubious, but confident, seedy but nonchalant, the Bar San Callisto issues its challenge.

What to have there? A Strega. And, yes, we could consider the bars of Europe thus: the best drinks & where to have them? A Cynar in The Ghetto Bar of Trieste, a whiskey sour in Prague's amusing Lucerna Cafe, an ouzo at Madrid's Chicote, or the Bar Cock. A retsina—but you can only get those in Greece...

Or Australia. Australia is not Europe. Is Greece? We're thinking 'continental' Europe. Old World charm.
But if Prague, & London, Edinburgh, Cork & Dublin—why not Greece? A toast, on Ithaka—or is it Hydra?— to the Johnstons!

The Callisto is not the bar for everyone.
Is it too rickety & ephemeral? Can a celebrity sit there? No. The San Callisto refuses the look extended, say, by Harry's Bar, once, The Bar Americain—for your Hemingway, your Robbie Williams, for your Nick Cave, your Adam Cullen—too real for one generic type, not real enough for the other. Existential.
The San Callisto has no 'amplifying' effect for the personality that might require it—Ashley Crawford? Robert Gray?

#

Ah, a sunny morning at the Bar San Callisto!

#

Outside the Bar San Callisto in the early evening chill.

A moment ago it was dusk, people drifted from the square, hurrying home. Now, an hour or so later, those out for dinner, or a drink at a bar, throng the square—& stare, some of them, at you.
Ripped. None of them comes to the San Callisto, so stern its charm.
You drink on alone while inside a vocal cohort of drunks shout & laugh, bathed in its light. Better for you to sit tight—tight in one sense & tight in the other—&, because of this, plan your next move with caution. Another inch of Strega could be incapacitating & you should get home. Deep breaths (the advice of John Jenkins) seem both refreshing, in the cool, & giddy-making. The voyage will be a test & an adventure. Another afternoon at the San Callisto.

I have to laugh.

Laurie at the San Callisto? But no Internet, no jukebox! Pam?
Pam would find its sham quality 'de trop'. Gig? Too self conscious—fearing to appear 'taken in'. Peter B. on the other hand, likes it, I know. And I can see him there—see him only in 'my mind's eye'— but he 'resembles' there the same Peter we see everywhere, even in Melbourne—so my mind's eye's view is accurate.
He wears a hat or maybe a beret & reads the film criticism, say, of Manny Farber—as you would at the San Callisto. John Tranter, another major poet, sits quite near, oblivious, having a Campari Soda, a good drink to have at the Callisto. "Tranter!" says Lyn T, who has just entered, & looms in the doorway, "So this is where you are! What a dump!" Peter Bakowski frowns.

David Kennedy, dressed a little like Richard Harris in This Sporting Life, though benign, benign, sits in the San Callisto. What does he read?
Who knows? Perhaps he is marking essays. But no—he would not bring work to the San Callisto. I might.
I do. But then, I'm the kind of loon who makes life work. I buy David another beer, a Guinness, not the 'usual thing' at the Bar San Callisto, but he is my English friend & I want him in character.

Orson Welles. I see the Harry Lime figure.
Authentic? In-authentic? Neither.
It was not the point. That is the Bar San Callisto's attitude. Is the Bar San Callisto authentic? Are you kidding? Is it not? Sure it isn't. It is the Bar San Callisto—just as you left it.
I think the Welles figure was Alan Wearne.
I have been astral travelling. It is the Bar San Callisto—"just as you left it".
Someone has swept. So the butt-ends are not embarrassingly in the way, the 'offing'.
It is itself almost detritus. If Italy would only clean up its act it would be gone!
Is that fair to say? It may be true.
Berlin has no San Callisto. A San Callisto in Britain would be fashionable for fifteen minutes.
Then people would move on. Used up. In Paris it would become dowdy, or sad, & upgrade & succeed at being something else, the bar Borgelt or Bougogne or something suggestive of new cars & insurance. The Bar San Callisto—the real one, in Rome, exists. Is it 'a Gilligan among bars'? No, Steve Kelen. No, its clientele objects (some, apparently, care), It is not sappy. So who, what?
Watteau's Gilles, Stan Laurel? No. Yes. I don't know.
Could you repeat the question?

But having bought it—did I buy this?—Kennedy may have bought it, or Tranter. I see that they are gone. A Cynar, or a three inch yellow Strega—where will you sit, inside or out? That is the problem, not such a bad problem. Where will you sit in the San Callisto, time passing differently in each of these two realities, inside & out, where? It would be good to sit with Ava Gardner, outside, or Johnny Depp. But inside: it would be terrible. It is always terrible to sit inside—a hell interminable—& which every minute calls for all your attention—the sort of thing, probably, Sartre hated, though it puts you on your mettle. Are you tough enough for the San Callisto? You look at the photo someone has pasted up, of Howlin' Wolf hunched forward, boxing gloves raised & full of menace— or the neighboring photo of Muhammad Ali fronting Howlin' Wolf's band—plainly someone has made a switch—& the existential threat, the challenge, is terrific.

I remember someone—crazy Robert Hughes?—characterized the bar Van Gogh drank in as a place where "a man could go mad". The Bar San Callisto? Yes, it is maddening. (Women will note It is always "a man"!)

Something has occurred to me, that has occurred to me before—days, minutes ago?—it reminds me slightly of the fly-paper, the hopeless futility of it. An each-way bet. Did it catch flies, attached there, hanging, from the fan of the San Callisto? The futility—death, death, death! Some have died, stuck to the shellac. Some haven't, slowly spinning, in the wind from the fan, where Howlin' Wolf, Muhammed Ali, Joe Louis challenge one & the table needed something additional shoved under one leg to make it balance—a bit of ear would do it—& the bicycle racing team or soccer team from 1974, combative, implacable, somehow raise the ante & an old woman comes in, sits down opposite, in black & moments later you are outside the San Callisto & stumbling from it, a foreigner, & it is good to be a foreigner—to use Hemingway's formulation—abashed, unnecessary, challenged—like someone in Fiesta—but Australian, because that is how you do things, as if the spirit were an eye & the Callisto a burnt stick poked in it—but the spirit is better than this & you have learned something.

(Learned not to come back to the San Callisto till you can claim, plausibly, to have forgotten what took place here. So maybe not tomorrow.)

A bloated, inebriate Russel Crowe, an etherized, botoxed Nicole Kidman. Emma Balfour. At the San Callisto? Maybe. Emma, buy Nicole a toasted sandwich. I might buy Ava one—or Anna Banens-Kenneally: she looked real at the San Callisto.
I see her outside. Now. Hey, Frontein!

Does this guide mean to say the San Callisto Bar is the only bar in Italy?
No, in Lecce, for example, in the square, a number of pleasant watering-holes abide & beckon. Further North, in Trieste, the Ghetto Bar is a nice place to be, pleasantly situated & drawing a very nice crowd of friendly people.
One night I sank quite a number of rather large Cynars there—a curious drink to order at all at that hour, perhaps, & in quantity, from an Italian point of view. But the Ghetto crowd were amused.

Cynar might constitute a sort of test case.
In Split the waiter refused to acknowledge that he knew it—“We have no Cynar—whatever that is!”— though one’s finger found it on the menu—the same menu the waiter continued to put out on all the tables. You can buy Cynar at the Bar San Callisto.

In Berlin one longs to stand proud & tough & worldly, like Beckmann in his famous self-portrait, or slump, debauched & frowzy, like Fassbinder—which requires no suit or bow-tie, there is that to be said for it—and drink good wine, or whiskey. Berlin has come a long way, since Laforgue’s time. He would hardly recognise it.
(He would find it much improved, though disconcertingly modernized.)

(By the same token, he would hardly recognize Paris, either.) I look out the door of the Alt Berlin, paradoxically a Negroni in my hand.

The Negroni is not such a great drink—but it was mentioned often in the books of my youth, that I read to develop sophistication, so I try it. No, I cannot see the point.
A cowboy walks past, in modern Berlin—the sort of outlandishness Laforgue would deplore—would have—and I am almost with him, on that, except Dennis Hopper, in The American Friend, dressed that way, a film set in Germany—& in the modern era—pace Laforgue, & in fact who knows how Laforgue is dressed 'these days'?— you can do this thing. This guy has.
I see with surprise, but not quite surprise, it is Richard & Suzie.
Suzie is dressed strikingly—but 'normally'—& says, "All this way, to Europe, to drink Negronis?" Richard says, "Let me buy you another!
Or are you switching?" Noting my discomfort.
We place our orders. It is great to be in Berlin, at Munz Strasse's Alt Berlin, with them, myself again, not Max Beckmann.

#

On August Strasse is the Hackbarth, for hanging out after openings, also The Ballhaus Mitte, formerly of old East Berlin, lovely front garden, with benches, & upstairs an old & faded ballroom, with ornate mirrors whose reflective powers are nil into which you may peer, glass in hand, & wonder where your soul has left for, & will it 'return', will you be Audie Murphy when it does, or Giorgio di Chirico, Zazu Pitts or Stendhal? John Meillon?
Can mirrors do that, or only with enough Jameson's famous Irish whiskey? Each glass is like the last but tells you something different.

On Berlin's Karl Marx Allee is Cafe Moskau. It caters to those with a special nostalgia for the 'East'.
I have none—though I recently purchased this pack of Sprachloss cigarettes. 'Speechless' the name translates as, which I love for its suggestion of emphysema, the Trabant of cigarettes. I don't smoke but I like the packet—like the Ardath of my youth. Hip & expensive—but if you can't resist the idea of drinking in a former Czech or East German travel agent's—further down Karl Marx Allee is the CSA Bar.
What should you have? Stolychnaya, perhaps.
Or a Mickey Finn. Ha ha, the Cold War & its Maxwell Smart ways.

Paris!—speaking of spies—a prosecco or a Ricard at Le Varenne, on Rue de Varenne, where Harry Mathews lives.
A common sight—Mathews drinking with his cryptic friend, Georges Perec.

In Budapest, where I went in 1992:
I don't remember the name of the bar.
It was in a small cellar. The tables were in vaulted stone arches. And it was full of Hungarian intellectuals in heated discussion. You can tell them from Australian intellectuals by their tall foreheads, but you can't tell them this way from other Hungarians—they all have the tall foreheads, the rather fine features, the clear skin: think chess, madness, manic depression.
I will have what they're having.

In Lisbon's Pavilhao Chines, on Rua Dom Pedro V, the bar is full of curiosities—tin soldiers, model trains, hats, model planes. The effect, 'paradoxically', is to force you upon yourself—which is why I go to bars anyway (Hullo, who are you? It's me you fool, I've come back to claim you, or to touch base at any rate—haven't you had enough?)— at Pavilhao Chines there is the sudden urge to dust, to order a drink, sweep all the stuff into a sack & clear off, before the drink comes.
Then you breathe out, you drink the drink & go somewhere—the Mirador de Graca or Casa do Alentejo, which are pretty, frankly, & where you can have fun & scuttle home, even late at night, without too much hissing from the lecherous men if you've become a woman, as maybe I have become with all this drinking—Imogene Coca, Madeline Kahn, Sarah Crowest, Thelma Todd. Vinho Verde did this? Anyway, to quote my friend Dave Glazbrook, "There's a little Audie Murphy in every girl", & I check my knuckle-dusters are in my purse, order another wine, cast a final look over the gardens, palm trees, moorish arches, the lemon & olive trees that my heart loves so much, toss back my drink & make my way out.
I push the waiter hard in the back as I pass—now why did I do that—he pulled my pigtails in another life? I start to run as I hear the crash & cry of surprise, back to my apartment in Mouraria in lovely Lisbon. What a night!

The waiter, actually, looked like Tony Kirkman! Kirkman, you got me into this, asking for an account of the bars of Europe.

But was it Tony?

In Newcastle, England, there's the Bodega.
A grand old losers' club. I was talking to a trust-fund Scandinavian artist there one night, when who should walk in but Suzie Treister. I bought her an Australian white wine & we got along famously—me, Suzie, & Sven, if that was his name. He had blonde hair & clear skin & wore a polo-neck jumper.
His eyes were pale, & staring in them I could see an horizon line, of snow, with little wolves running from left to right. Then I realized it was the reflection of the greyhound racing on the bar's tv & as Sven wasn't saying much I went outside with the Treister.

In London there is The French House in Dean St., Soho & the Coach & Horses, in Greek Street, nearby.
Down Lamb's Conduit Lane there's a nice pub & a nice Italian restaurant. In fact, London is full of bars that are nice places to drink, though none, sadly, is the San Callisto.

In Dublin—though do the Irish still drink?
I mean 'any more'? Did they ever?
Are you kidding? Does Derek Moon?
Like a fish! But where? All over town!
Here & in Belfast. He is a man-of-the-world, an international drinker—he actually does look a little like Max Beckmann in his photographs—perhaps he should be writing this!

I can't—or can I?—see him at the Bar San Callisto.

Ken Bolton

Double Troubles

' . . . this dog's life . . . '

Verlaine

&

'We must observe the amenities even if we are going nuts.'

'we hear, misinterpret, then depart'

-

Manhire

exult , exultant

'Friend or foe,' says the cook in this establishment

he is a 'joker'

an establishment I had my lunch in today or, anyway, coffee

Now,
big swigs of resin the joint kicks in - there goes my handwriting

I look at the drawing again

Archie Shepp, Lou Reed, Fats Waller

'Some Day My Thoughts Will Come' time to do another version?

it is a shitty drawing

The Towle quote

'August and then December will close the century

O air of your dreams descending on my day off' now why is that□ so great?

Well it is has something of the feel of this drawing I'm copying

(I copy)

I attempt to replicate distracted slightly as

Anna fights with Cath about not wanting her hair trimmed tho she agreed moments before

I expect I am taking her still to WINSTON COIFFURE,

Winston Avenue□

in about 15 minutes□ photography poetry & jazz

- this poem's 'ambit claim'

I've been spelling□ use it

'minuscule' wrongly for ages - luckily I never 'leaves the tenor drifting like smoke over the rhythm section'

Greil Marcus□

for me it doesn't□

th

o I'm glad he wrote that way about it a song I love is more esteemed (is 'esteemed more')

Later, I sing□

'Downhearted' for a moment,□ the Australian Crawl song

Why

were they so intellectually unrespectable?

Because I liked them?

Gabe gets up

&

goes banging about the house - too tired to chew,

he says,

of some crusts

he carries in his hand to the bin

5 a.m.

At six he goes out to go rowing no doubt waking John the corrugated iron gate drags explosively. He peddles off into the dawn

a good kid

Cath sleeps

I

hope, in our front room

I sit up

awake

'& ready to squabble' to quote the poem at any rate 'awake', make

tea for Gabe,

make small conversation, in hushed tones, finish Anna's homework endless variations on 3 times tables

they all come back!
 joke.□ & read the wonderful Dinah Ha wken poem, Writing Home
 Tom might ring tonight Cath's brother & come over he & John□ separately□ are here for the Festival (Writers Week)
 'together separately'
 - well that is how it is 'in these divided times' (which I think is a line of John's more or less - overpunctuated by me) in the bathroom I look at a spider on the wall, little balls of dust, gathered where the wall meets the floor walls & floors - & where they meet I remember a wall in Redfern ceilings & walls bits of rooms I have stared at in the houses I've lived : a series of them very clear memories, stored, & never recalled the birthmark on the back of the hand small & pale & barely noticeable that I love almost independently of who it is on I forgot I knew it I must once have stared at it so often from out of time where the hand meets the wrist as we buy a bottle for old times' sake our hands together on the counter & I see it

I did a drawing of the room in Redfern

A mistake : no one visited there Sal did & Dad (Sal moved in!)

memories like these of bits of rooms like passages from Virginia Woolf - the reflections bouncing steadily & always in that one place, tho that 'one place' varies from room to room, the hairline crack in the ceiling, the characteristic noise - of traffic going past where another friend went mad. ,disturbingly,

I moved soon after.

He would□ steal mixed nuts break in□ from a big jar I had.

I didn't□ notice.□
Weeks before I had told him
'to go easy on them'

He was□ sane then□ He frightened Sal

strangers to each other when she met him in the kitchen - no one was home,□ he backed silently out the room□ out the back &□ out to the alley.□

She thought she saw him once or twice more near the house.

Clearly he had been.

I didn't guess it was Larry Weeks later he was in□ the bin.□ His girlfriend called.

another article by McKenzie Wark in the papers to the tune basically of 'Tomorrow belongs to my Department'

It probably does, too.

belongs to me

Nothing

I'm just having
'Double Trouble'

Having, really, a good time more or less sane together again with John with Cath

& getting□ tomorrow

a haircut myself!□ 'Julie,' I rang,□
'I'm looking pretty unkempt.'

Her answering machine.

She rang back.

I make□ an appointment□ put 'the Banana' on my bike & peddle down -

to WINSTON COIFFUREMENT

Double Trouble I say, as we come thru the hairdresser's door ride back, get vegetables on the way - dinner for the household

Cath, John, Gabe, & me,

Anna -

maybe Tom ☐ if he ke eps his appointment

Ken Bolton

Good Friday At The Eaf

weekends here are the best: beautiful, quiet I sit in Caron's & my chair the one we share, at the desk between our desks, the shutters letting in light all is white, the shadows diffuse — multisourced — light coming from many directions I'm beginning to die myself I see because mostly I sense I cannot see too well — & have almost a headache. Julie types way across the space on the computer the rustle of language that quiet rattle, Michael came in, adjusted some of the new equipment, & left — dressed for tennis. Julie is dressed differently too — tight pants. Only I am dressed the same — but I am dying. And it is Good Friday. Big deal, it will take a while I make tea, get paper, start this

Ken Bolton

Hindley Street Today, With A View Of Michael Grimm

What to do when the day's heavy heart, settled,

rises then — for some quality of the light — □ & you your own mug raise up □ to see it, register it bing!

the way counter staff would gain change □ the old days, □ but not any more — □ & not 'today', today being now

(& in this 'day & age') —

Those old-time cash registers

having gone before the electric typewriter, even, disappeared □

— tho

I never □ had one of those. □ Why, □ & reflect, & look down the street pause,

where Michael Grimm might come — & with any luck holding in his hand the tape you requested sed to deliver

& he was plea notionally. The 'notionally' ean "Never"

Notionally might well m

Have you got it? Well give it here!

Maybe he does. On it several versions of Bauhaus:

"Bela

Lugosi's Dead".

It's too bright & clear in Hindley Street — for him to be about, the Count.

Yet, the waitress says —

"Yeah, I frighten a lot of people," says jokingly

tho without much effort as she clears the table where I sit today outside to a patron whom she'd startled — & actually, tho she's pretty enough

her makeup's vaguely 'Goth'.

I find her interesting as I look up today

& down the street looking for it to confirm my intimation expanded heart

With a view of, say, seraphic Michael Grimm my tape on which

Bela Lugosi's dead

studio version & 'live'.

He's dead

& Dion

& so is Bing.

Bob Hope lives on, I think, tho barely but I'm alive — Michael & Julie & Chris — & those dead-heads from Department

they've moved in & now they find us 'more alive' — we laugh

'good naturedly', at that,

the street is cleaner, too

since they arrived

a reason why the light strikes things better now &, if this coffee haint improved my mood has

as I think, Yep of Michael,

The Grimster — will he have done it yet?

Too soon.

"Too Soon"

— the Nirvana story it usually is too soon, I guess osi might have thought even Lug

One more day, a week!

I think, "not yet"

I've got the 'Hindley Street' template out & operating again, the details falling in — 'signed up' for the long ride,

Tho less some days than others but just this minute I'm up for it.

The street looks grey & white

& muted benign — or tired — or more forgiving

Is that just the lack of traffic?

Temporary. And the lull between the late breakfasters

& the early-lunch crowd, the time given the waitress to talk the old men

at their tables, plotting — plotting nothing — the Tech teachers at elevenses, me, & fucking

Michael Grimm

nut

Horizon

'As a people we are now called Australians because a vast & lonely land has touched us with her differences'

- George Ivan Smith, 1953 preface to For The Term Of His Natural Life

'it's noble to refuse to be added up or divided'

- Frank O'Hara

'In this dawn as in the first it's the Homeric rose, its scent that leads on'

- Frank O'Hara, Ode to Willem de Kooning

'Beyond the sunrise where the black begins' - & the lights of the city, we imagine, twinkle or blaze . . .

the horizon line here a curve of butter yellow, slightly oxidized - lined, at its rim, by olive-green 'natives' - hides a city that if I am facing the right way must be doing its afternoon trade relaxed this last few days after December 25th but ready nonetheless for the big push at night, the raid on fun desire release - selling mostly coffee, wine, Michael / rolls a joint has one then rolls several others children contemplate navels - the girls their own with quiet pride, the boys the girls' with longing puzzling as it is strong Mary paints her nails, reads, Cuban music playing. What of Margaret, of Crab? they do those things normative in a utopia a cork is popped, Marg plays fado, the soulful music of Portugal or Crab practises on sax reads some politics, some mayhem, reads the poems I gave him. I try to seize upon that greatness which is available to me if it is available at all (am I facing the right way?) thru art.

The view is quintessentially Australian, which is its problem - for me - tho not classical & in its particulars is information (where the classic typically presents only sign). The essays of Meaghan are to hand which might stiffen my resolve or form it: not to be inimitably weak & picturesque myself but standing forth a subject not a spectacle.
There are daisies nearby & a shin-high wall of loose but flat-laid shale or slate twelve feet beyond - a standard country wire fence; the field of grass; on the horizon a distinct curve of hill three hundred yards away, a water tank nestles in to the furthest reach of the olive 'natives' - can I dropp the scare marks from that word now, hasn't it done enough? & I rest their case
    'for now a long history slinks over the sill',

& with it history's ironies, reversals sarcasms so de rigueur. I never wanted to be postcolonial or colonial just modern which is the joke on me - but who wants to be a category?
Many would be right - it will do me to be interested - & one accepts the truth like a tired disguise handed out for the party - is this me? - & joins the crowd as the brave must always ascend, always the musts: the Eiffel tower, the flight over London, the café table - in Rundle Street or rue de la Rocquette where Lorraine lived & we stayed tho for me, today, this hill is my focus, the clouds - (for I must ascend) - are beautiful & white & echoing fluidly the hills' shape, the splotches of green that mottle the yellow & remind of 'Minor Moderns of South Australia' a line I join of precursors - Horace Trennery, Dorritt Black - pondering a relation to the minor English, Europe, the universal - & its status as 'the wrong question' which strolls now & then into a field & sits down like a forgotten rock while 'we' walk on to an horizon line, that's beautiful, keen, precarious, & doesn't tug - not 'rose', but serene, & melancholy, & joyous, all at the same time, a kind of benediction that says, I'm free & I'm gratuitous why not feel better? & since you do you do return: into that inanimate world of voices cross-questioning you, no longer like your father, a man in an open necked shirt eating an icecream (& just, perhaps, 'going for a walk'), but in a shirt I bought in Melbourne made by migrant Vietnamese late at night, yet in which I feel Australian, whatever that is
- a point mapped by shifting co-ordinates you momentarily 'keep your eye on' or don't being yourself or a moving target (do the hills you climb as no one count? The hostess explains, As we leave administered life there is a slight discomfort - the tug of gravity on re-entry returns, you may feel tired. Where, the open neck shirted men, women in thongs & sandals, ask is our shimmering ideal? If O'Hara had such timing John his last move suggests he blew it Tho exits are notoriously hard to make. 'I live above a dyke bar & I'm happy' - I might too for all I know.

Am I? Occasionally, occasionally very. The female of the tiny blue jay or 'wren' appears, bouncing, across the grass outside then some of the 'men' move across my field of view from left to right . . .

Ken Bolton

Maybe For You

Now a sackbutt, reader, is a violin, & I tell you this, & you nod having suspected as much - one type of reader does - or you don't, being another, a second kind of reader, & having known all along -

& wonder

Why do I tell you this? Will violins be my thing in this, this poem?

Or you grimace

- snarl -

a third response, knowing a sackbutt is not a violin, or - more liberally - mutter "For you, bud" - as in

Maybe for you -

& wait, to see what will be made of it.

Let us leave the first reader - who is lost, was lost before maybe, & is no wiser now -

& the second reader seems somehow hostile,

& the third - my type of guy, my type of girl - Third type of Reader, I am lost too!

All those readers - what to do - but watch them stroll away,

the third reader strolls, the first wanders sadly, disconsolate not to know what a sackbutt is -

& nor do I, though I was never concerned to know particularly - yet this

... seems somehow 'at my door', 'down to me', whatever the phrase.

And the second reader seems,

furiously, ALMOST ABOUT TO TELL ME WHICH, but thinks better of it, & - 'furiously' - makes off around the corner - then reappears.

No, it is John Jenkins, fellow poet - a little put out at this sudden loss of readers.

John fixes Reader One with his gaze & addresses him, politely, Are you, perchance, a 'reader of books'?

How inviting - flattering - I see the reader pause - Reader Three, even, look on thoughtfully - as John begins, knowing, I am sure, the true nature of a sackbutt - unlikely though to begin just there.

Baroque, but not remote, that is John, thoughtful but not abstruse, except as a game

- in which he would not risk to humiliate the reader, piss off

Reader Two with deliberate misinformation, abuse the nimble mind of Reader Three.

(Reader Two I can do without - personally - though I am very much that same kind of reader, am maybe unwilling, merely, to accept their blame -

Reader Two's "fury", remember? -

It was just a poem.

But "just a poem", that's the very attitude ... etcetera.

I hear Graeme Rowleds' voice, warming to its task - "We've lost Reader One, injured, hurt, not willing to trust, easily, another poet, not willing to trust their own real needs - for verse,

poems with a proper subject & striking, original imagery;

Reader Two

was plainly better informed, & not to be trifled with; and Reader Three is here”

- has she or he come back? -

“to see if you will tell them what a sackbutt is.”

I thought they knew.

“If this is the same poem I was in just a moment ago,” says Reader Three, “it was you who said I knew, not me. (I take it I am Reader Three?)”

I hate sarcasm. Rowleds was bad enough.

In this scenario (sketchy, admittedly) we seem to be standing near a table covered with paper cups, in each or most of which are deposited coffee granules, tea-bags - & an urn is steaming - this is a conference - though the overall scenario ... sketchy, as we said before - a scenario “fictional” would not so much describe as explain ... the scenario is discontinuous. But getting less discontinuous, you’ll admit.

For instance an ordinary suburban street constitutes the corner Reader Two disappeared around - nearly knocking into John, who reappeared, a seeming poetic second wind, coming the other way, & nobbling Reader One, who, when imagined walking away, stumbles almost ‘blindly’ beside a river or an empty public space - the less frequented entrance to a park or garden, say - & in slightly more autumnal weather.

Weird -

three alternative backgrounds.

Anyway!

Reader One tends to appear (mostly) in middle distance, small, & shrinking further. Tall trees loom overhead, emotive green shapes, poplars bend near him - her - them

- this reader.

In another scenario - one I had not even dreamed about - they will be disconsolate, distraught, their shame or dissatisfaction causing a loving partner (& something of a reader 'themselves')

- male or female, straight or gay - bi in fact -

though this is 'known'

- let's nail something down - only to their mother ...)

causing them to spend a troubling night ( 'them' - perhaps both of them - but not Mom) consoling the evident - i.e., evidently dispiriting - grief or anxiety that assails their partner (unfortunate Reader One), in such a way that they feel

(desperately)

'shaken'

in their belief in their own sexual efficacy -

Am I unattractive? am I worthless? - & suspect even more alarmingly that their partner may themselves be bi-sexual, & to have recently discovered it,

& to wish now

- or soon, tomorrow - to change their lives together - based hitherto on one person's not knowing, & on the other person's secret.

So Reader One evidently has real concerns - whichever one of the two Reader One is - & it hardly matters for my purposes, or yours if you're following me - because you're a skilled reader, with 'time on your hands'. ((Hullo. This is my lunch hour.)) Scenario One, the opening line, was a lecture, I think. One looked up as if to a TV screen placed high, in a pub or cafeteria, to see - a 'talking head'!

(Not my head. Not my voice.

Not the head of Rowleds) -

The head of the Literature Board!

In fact, the head of the head of the Literature Board!

That fool!

in a quiz show, rabbitting on, about a musical instrument. Reader Two seems to be a contestant, tense & peevish - maybe this is usual with Reader Two - in a mustard shade of cardigan, or twinset, finger on the buzzer, the sort of person you hate for knowing the answer to the Question, faintly overheard, will be ... "sackbutt".

And it is.

If so,

'it would help to know the question'.

Ken Bolton

Poem ('The Ice In My Glass')

the ice in my glass goes crink!

as it adjusts to the tequila — keying in that sophistication — the feel of it — I associate with these tall buildings — a bit of the skyline of New York I envisage, important to me for many years — or if they weren't, the buildings stood for the idea of importance, New York — an imaginary number filling out an order — of which the others were a part: the finite Melbourne, Sydney, Glebe — & Fitzroy & Bega. Did I think about it?

But it became less important — & then, almost by accident,

I visited, & saw it — specific, real — & loveable, surely — if less impressive than the rarely summoned abstraction. Strange — & terrible — to think of it threatened, New Yorkers frightened — as the city's image draws retaliation upon it. Clink, the ice again, settling.

My New York — the notional one — the city of poets, of art. I met one poet there — 'perfect' — urbane, bohemian a little, worldly, smart, immensely intelligent. (The art, there, was in galleries & historical — great, but not like the poet.) My second time I met rich people — the sort the terrorists think of: people congratulating themselves on the world & their ownership of it — talking deals, leverage, new fields, salaries & investment. We were on a penthouse roof near the UN building, looking out over the water (towards New Jersey? — somewhere) for the fireworks of July the 4th. The same UN building as in James Schuyler's poem, that moves slightly — in the wind, the light — or has that building been torn down & gone & this is a new one?

The New York I like — personalized, romantic — about which I know a great deal, detail — things that have happened there, what one poet said to another (at Gem Spa, at the Morgan Library), the books they read, thoughts they had: unreal again — a fabled, picturesque locality, of thirty years ago.

A little like the Sydney I now visit, which I left in the 80s & in fact hardly know — can scarce reconcile with the site of my former life there: where X said A to Y, where 'L' lay (or sat) & wrote 'Sleeping in the Dining Room', or 'A' began, "Saussure! Saussure!" — where I lived, round the corner behind the Max Factor Building. I didn't meet the rich — tho Sydney has them — resembling New York's probably & voting just as vociferously to support war on the Afghans.

Frank O'Hara, a hero of mine — a one-time hero, a hero still — mixed with the rich a little. But as was said in his defence once recently, he never owned more than two suits. He was not of them.

I don't like the Sydney rich — for wishing to be interchangeable with their New York counterparts. Which is as I fancy them.
Tho as it said on the Max Factor building below the name — "Sydney London Paris Rome New York" — & I aspired in my own way, too.

Funny, all the papers have pointed out the Auden poem, "1939", has been much quoted — & some Yeats? Would Rome or Berlin — Paris even — have sent minds to poetry? It is the enormity of the act — New York as symbol — & as never attacked before.
I wonder if it is a new era? You'll read about it elsewhere — not here. If it is. I might look up that Schuyler poem, "Funny the UN building moved / & in all the years / I've lived here" or something — or find the O'Hara one in which he stays up late trying to select his poems thinking, good or bad, he did it at least. Wrote them.

Now

I've found out what I think. Very little.

As I might have guessed. An event moving 'under the skin' away from words — & become attitude.

Events

will be bigger than me. Having ideas about them being almost irrelevant. Though I 'have' them: none helpful or resolvable: that the New York I liked, even then, came at a price, that today does, & that I don't pay it.

The free ride you complain about — would you get off?

As usual the exchange rate dominates the news again — a cargo cult

The dues you pay are servitude — so you can hate yourself, or wonder merely at the duration of the ride

Ken Bolton

Some Thinking

Does all art aspire to the condition of music? — While someone is always prepared to say so I put on a tape, a CD, instead of writing or put it on to write to.

As far as the art gets.

A tape rolls quietly — “Light Blue”, “Soul Eyes” — to which I’ve done a lot of reading, a lot of pottering about, a few drawings —

& to which I’ve ‘cleaned house’ —

& a lot of writing — or of ‘trying to write’, which comes to the same thing. Mal Waldron wrote both these tunes.

I first heard of him in the poem for Billie Holiday — “The Day Lady Died”, with the great last lines where she whispers to him across the keyboard —

“& everyone & I stopped breathing.”
The great thing about the line is the uncertainty: is it “everyone & I stopped breathing”? or that Holiday whispers the song

“to Mal Waldron & everyone” — & it is then O’Hara “stopped breathing”?

It makes for a pause, a hesitation, a number of them — that evokes the magic & tension of her timing. And there's Frank, leaning there

- near the door to the toilets? The 'john', which always suggests the hard American 50s — & ensures I think of him in a white shirt & narrow tie, suited. Already the texture of life is disappearing

- exactly how it felt, to be in those suits, in that time, at a nightclub how anxious or not, how preoccupied & with what — how people held themselves — is gone. Well, it survives somehow, unverifiably, hard to quantify, in poetry ... we still have the music, films — but films lie. Cassavetes suggests the era to me — was he 'the type' of the hipster — cool, up tight, hip, witty?

suited, a drinker, free, & maybe more exploratory — within limits more circumscribed than now?

Or do we always see ourselves as more free — & get it wrong? Did he & O'Hara meet ever?

Different worlds.

The thing I was going to say about nightclubs was that maybe how people feel & act in them never changes. (I heard some magical things at Lark & Tina's, for example. I've been as tense as anyone, at the Cargo Club — & wore suits there.) But night clubs themselves might've changed — with the music:

amplified is different? the fashion for recorded dance music, or for dee-jays, might have altered them.

On tape one of the moments I like best is the voice — a little shakey, a little spaced — Jim Carroll's by repute, asking for tuinols, in the space between songs, at a great Patti Smith gig. Or Velvet Underground — they're both on that tape. There's some great & wonderfully casual, relaxed things said, over the music at a late 50s date that features Miles Davis guesting with local hero Jimmy Forrest: a type of music, & experience, continuous with the live recordings of Charlie Parker — the same carefree ambience & same reason to pay attention whereas Patti's music gets to you pretty much whether you listen or not. You don't have to choose of course.

"Jesus died for somebody's sins but not mine" is always great to hear said. This track, the badly named "Soul Eyes" (how can you not roll it into one word?), is not live but so sad & so unhurried it makes time, development, almost its subject. John Coltrane. Well within his limits — as somehow imagined — & great the way conservative paintings by great artists often are — a Gauguin still-life that looks as though it wants to be Manet, or Fantin-Latour.

Ken Bolton

Tiepolo

In the 14, 15th & 16th centuries it was all happening in Italy artistically tho by the 17th other countries had joined in.
By the 18th
Italy was definitely off the pace.
Still, I happen to think Tiepolo was a major artist tho employed mostly by palace owners to fill space - before the invention in our own time of the smoke machine that so readily solved this problem - for disco proprietors, rave parties etcetera. In the last week of third year old Bernard pulled out all the stops in the lecture on Tiepolo. I was there.
Not alone, but almost.
(Others were at home, preparing for exams, finishing last, overdue essays.) Like Professor Smith's lecture that no one heard Tiepolo was designed not to be looked at.
Like the smoke the machine pumps out: billowing cloud ... some armour ... flesh & garments - the suggestion of excitement - that no one buys - least of all the lonely type, who can't dance & stands, staring into a corner
at a trick of the light.
Tiepolo's Three Angels Appearing

To Abraham in the Venice Accademia is like that. He is the dud guy bottom left - kneeling, dirty feet, beard. The angels, thin limbed, glamorous, surf up on their rubber dinghy of cloud - & look down incuriously - except to remark, perhaps, the dirt - & vouchsafe a glimpse of beauty - a limb dangled Abe's way, silhouetted against cloud.
As if to say,
You can go home now, Abe, patron-at-disco, better not to wait for more.
You've been catered for - it costs a lot, but they've got everything here.
Here today, gone tomorrow.

Which doesn't solve your problem.
Ciao!

Ken Bolton

Untimely Meditations

Looking back, on my recent past, on my present - that is continuous and heads, on my right, if the left is the past, into the future - with none of the aplomb if that is the word, with none of the confidence of Samuel Johnson, with none of the elan of Frank O'Hara, with only a guilty and apprehensive grin because in part I belong to that school that says if you see a leg pull it I begin this tour of my attitudes and my attitudes to the attitudes of others - the Big Issues as they affected me, or, even,

as they failed to get my notice, got my notice belatedly, got only my notice and as I reacted to them and to the reactions of others.

And some weren't all that big but anyway . . .

Viz - modernism, the Australian landscape, our identity, post modernism, various poetic movements - and I do it . . .

to be interesting, efficacious and liked - though to be liked

one must be slightly scandalous and a little charming (Can I do it?)

And because I was asked.

And I hear somebody remark

What's so important about YOUR attitudes? somebody who hoped I would not just state my own but take this opportunity to be an expert responsibly talking in the voice of reason and platitude

- enunciating views that are not my own?
Is that responsible?
Then talk naturally!
Though theory has taught us there is no such thing that even prose is rhetoric, is untransparent - though it is mostly prose it has taught us that in.
Theory sees my point - though I'm sure it doesn't like it.
Meaghan Morris told me once she 'couldn't read' poetry - because of the short lines and all the wasted white paper :

I told her

I couldn't watch films - unless they were on TV with lots of ads - or video, so one could talk and yell with all one's friends, and think.

It seemed an equally small-minded answer.

Though true!

Though in my case it is a preference, in hers an inability.

I don't think of my ideas as Truth, though I hope some of them are accurate, perspicacious, interesting - freighted a little with insight, why not?

But I 'offer' them - regard them, report them - as historical themselves, as determined:

some opinions . . . that make a history of opinions, and of equivocations, lapses, what else?

To be truthful, moments when I 'had a rest' looked elsewhere,

grew distracted, confused, came thundering back, my mind having woken with another opinion.

Here goes. . . . .

In the mid 70s

I became aware of an irritating irregular din, becoming quite insistent

- things beginning with 'I' appropriately.

It was Les Murray

Les told us

'Where's

the beef?'

as if poems were a sandwich and his had dinkum verities and content, while ours were that relativistic nonsense you learn at unis, not very sustaining.

This was 'The City and the Country' theme.

Les assured us the Country was 'more Australian'.

It was different. I could see that.

So I could see how it might be 'better'.

- Well, actually, I couldn't, but I could see that someone might say it.

Though, really, I wished they wouldn't.

At the same time there was around another faction.

I hear them shout -

as though it were today -

'WE'RE for feeling!'

& 'The brain's a bad guy!'

- not quite their diction, but their base position.

(And for a while,

women, for example,

were only allowed to write of feelings

- or got accused of

'not writing from female experience.'

The best ignored this - and those days are gone, except poets who stamp their feet, get cranky, report on the 'dark side', seem always to feel

- not just truculent -

but more authentic.

I can't see it.

Did I say 'Diction'?

The New Romantics

were for Belief and Feeling.

They believed in Myth and wrote of myths they didn't believe in.

Or am I giving them too much credit?

I see myself,

a New Romantic -

'foot in the stirrups I mount the heavily gilded saddle - of the white horse - the steaming white horse - of my imagination

- and set forth - the characteristic pose

of the New Romantic.

Characteristically

I set forth, in the middle of my life, lost in a dark wood, at my kitchen table - where I might as well be playing Dungeons & Dragons

for all the good

I will do anybody - when the Angel addresses me - and I am caused to lift my helmet's visor, and my head, and gape awfully - and in admiration.

(She is really beautiful

- she, too, is dressed in costume - and I can tell she likes me

- this is a visitation - and speaks

as though to someone taller, and a good four feet behind me - and her lips move.
Yet I seem not to understand, till seconds afterwards It is a little like TV, where the subtitles arrive (late) and linger, pointedly - and she fades (like TV also) and I am plunged, or I set forth, and the woods grow darker . . .) which is like Romantic Poetry.
Which is the point!
You see, I am like those guys - Shelley, and Byron and the others, Keats and Wordsworth (is he okay?) -
I wonder if the Bottle Shop's still open - I'm beginning something major.

What it turns out to be is, the vindication of my lack of Doubt, and punishment for almost doubting, but basically my vindication.

(Doubt is anathema to me.)'

'Doubt' for New Romantics was inappropriate to Poetry's 'calling' :

(Lots of people have never liked it.) better to mount and ride one's charger into an imagined realm - of capitalized Abstract Nouns, gods and goddesses, and Angels and phoney revelations - about the pitfalls one's soul had met, and denounced in moments of duende.

Robert Adamson did this.

But he was only kidding.

But there I am,

doubting again.

Now he just goes fishing.

(Still, never know what you'll find just gutting a fish - scales in your hair, blood on your hands, the eye of the old fish catches yours, and you look in : Dark Night of the Soul again, a renewal of faith!

- in one's spouse, the River, the tides of life.

It's possible.

It's inevitable, seemingly.

I must go fishing.) And I am reminded - as I was reminded then - of the criticism, given in the artist's time, of Gustave Moreau whose heroes all wore breastplates, and helmets - the heroines in diaphanous silk - to dance, or go maundering - while Baudelaire would have top hats, business suit and briefcase - the Heroism of Modern Day Life!

(Which makes me think of Tranter. Always does.

I guess it is his franchise.)

(It now consists of a pool, a few hosties

- drunk, eating pills, spewing - and a lesbian - a word John depends upon to ginger things up - what else? yachts, cars, an overseas reference, the mention of some disappointment, a wry twist at the end - Marcus Aurelius in shirt and shorts, somewhat suburban - as if

Mr Boswell from Happy Days was actually an alcoholic - which, as John would point out, he was! is! How surprising.

John's idea of modernity has always been a little like the Pop artists' - an iconography tied to a particular period, always ten or so years ago - the sit-com soap version of reality, of bad designer shirts (and airhostesses - yes, I know - drinks, the repertoire . . . )

While in real life

Bob drove an Alfa,

I always imagined Les Murray on a tractor or pushing a one-furrow plough - or seated

(this is more likely) like an enormous bad fairy behind the people in a picture by Millet, The Gleaners - tormenting them with his poetry.

He used to 'intimate' - is that too light a word - he was more Australian (relatively) than the rest of us and went on a lot - about his Celtic blood, and a disappearing Australia.

This was his Mystic Wing of the Country Party phase

- an interest in guns, and 'the blood of men'.

Multiculturalism, but, had become the Next Big Thing:

So he called his book Ethnic Radio - but in a last ditch move has taken God as an imaginary friend - imaginary, invisible, but none higher and (and here again, it is relative) He only likes him.

I ignored them -

Les and Adamson - twin stars.

In their different ways as tiresome as each other.

Opera Bouffe.

Though you could see then which was likely to become established.

One was marketable as a kind of Truth about the wider world.

Bob, on the other hand, might be accepted as truly a poet,

if not a poet of truth, for believing things sillier than anyone sane believed.

(Each is an embarrassment.)

Sillier than what I believe in.

Each of us perhaps will admit to a silly belief.

Who will admit to one?

Whose job is it to hold them, these beliefs?

Surely a poet's?

Who is that person, out there, beyond the pale,

frothing and ranting - a poet?

As for Australia disappearing - well, things have changed - social justice and democracy

seem reduced - and invocations of some real Australia exclude large portions of the population, citizens born here or born elsewhere -

who don't care what happened on the River Kwai, who the Queen is or who was the guy named after the biscuit

- or why.

*

At university I found, in visual arts,

'the landscape tradition'.

( Thematically, here, I 'hop about'. )

I believe if I went back there, they might still be doing it.

But it is an academic thing:

No one paints them anymore.

Which is a great solution.

Though its prominence - as a debate at least - is in its relation to the 'idea' of Australia, our need to be independent culturally, and to resist ideas and styles that are foreign, not produced by authentic Australians :

We Should Paint Trees.

- Which are not ideas, admittedly,
but the idea to paint them is,
and is only one (which is better).

In fact it is an English, Romantic idea - or a German one.

You see, I think, the parallel with Les.

*

The feeling / ideas debate has its equivalents in conflicts between various styles of art -

Minimalism versus Expressionism for example - and (again) in the 'theory' versus 'getting on with it' standoff that is more recent

And Relativism versus Responsibility - they make a nice pair.

Internationalism,

'cultural imperialism'. . .

and ideas 'too French', too 'American'.

'Cruel Theory' versus 'Spirituality' - that one has re-surfaced - here even, in Adelaide!

*

Everything that's happened to me has happened in Australia.

One of the good things is the way the cook sings Perfidia

- whistles it - over the noise of cups and conversation at Al Frescos

- where tout le monde rabbit on - a song I heard as a child, on the radio.

I loved it then and I love it now, its inflated delicious romanticism and cummerbunds, big hats - trellises of roses, the moon. Clouds.

Does Les Murray know that song?

I feel sad and happy at the same time.

Is it unaustralian, that song, because it's so moustachioed?

. . . the 'Cruel Theorists' didn't feel

all that cruel or cold, the Relativists didn't feel irresponsible.

People (the too American, too French) didn't feel it was Australian to be dumb.

Cultural-imperialist vanguard-internationalist intellectuals rarely seem to speak up.

Now why is that?

Yet P.P. McGuinness and Les Murray, with the tone of a rearguard action, dream on:

wet feminist lesbian left semioticians, one might think,

rule the world
- or are colonizing it, for a terrible Cloud Cuckoo Land that threatens.

Like our landscapes we avoid History.

Time produces it.

Laurie Duggan's New England Ode, through its specificity, provides antidote to Murray's mythology

(The latter a poet of State and Nation, and one with advertising :

false, hectoring, corrective, silencing.)

I was sitting in Al Frescos one day overcome with an abstract emotion at the singing of Perfidia, * people banging cups and yabbering, when one of them detached themselves came over to tell me I was 'Cruel Theory' and 'not Spiritual enough'.

I don't have a Cruel Theory in my body.
Plainly, I would have thought.
Personally I don't feel ever tied to these dichotomies but somewhere in-between or unaware of them - except when forced to focus.
It seemed an unspiritual thing to do, to approach someone and inform them of their unspiritual status.
Unless you belong to the Inquisition.
But I focus, in these situations - we are picking sides, perhaps the whole population in Al Frescos is finishing their coffees up in order to divide and properly have the slanging match that even now goes on, unorganized,

as I sit here, un-spiritual.
I estimate what is the best unspiritual ploy to offer, the unspiritual 'first move'.
I wonder what the other unspiritual people are saying.
Some faces look grim, some romantic - is that how it divides up? The woman who has told me this resembles Madame DeFarge as a finger puppet - How do I look?

I feel I look like my sister's dog, Whiskey, after she had pulled it by the tail - from its breakfast, a massive bowl of milk and Ricebubbles, so she could then watch the dog burp enormously, a long, long belch like a bellows, his swollen stomach and his ribcage going down, as the air was expressed. Rice-bubbles and milk he ate in one long, in-taken breath, lapping and lapping.
Like the dog in Gertrude Stein.

For a second

he would seem nonplussed and stand - staring straight forward.

Then the burp would begin - to my sister's jubilation.

Just similarly I burp, my eyes watering.

Sort of unspiritual, sort of not. And stare forward.

I am on the unspiritual team.

Have I begun well?

an own-goal?

or begun decisively?

[Pauses For Drink Of Water. Drinks it.]

In truth I never cared about these things - or cared about them as they occurred specifically:

I worried about my own authenticity in relation to the great art of elsewhere and the past. Ignoring or denying it seemed not the way to go - and anyway, I liked it: the fabulous clouds of Guardi and Tiepolo, the silky greys and whites and silvers of the skirts in a Gainsborough - like the winter skies of Adelaide; the beautiful surfaces in the poems of Frank O'Hara, Ted Berrigan, and later James Schuyler - and the work of some of my friends - which was great in relation to that. And the client state delusion

- of connection, of place in an unreal schemata . . . - no objectivity I can attain has ever allowed me out of that world's attraction. If this is 'The West' and The West is doomed, the problem is not with its art - and the alternatives were no less Western, though they had less leverage - colonialist doxa (Les Murray) and the pretence of spiritualized emotion (out of context, as far as I could see) (Adamson) and in any case I did not believe them: I was born in a city with a cultural background that constituted me as

- that word!

or any rate, here I am - relativist, self-doubting, glad of whatever knowledge this threw up, though hard won and fleeting. Which sounds 'heroic' - so it can't be true.

(I won it in the library, admittedly, and hanging around - as I have done the rest of my life - watching what other people do & reading.)

The vectors 'placed' you - inescapably - with all your class, and cultural, and historical specificity. Damning, contingent, real - about as liberating and breathtaking as it was 'final'.

Was it interesting, breathtaking - was it final? Another sort of romanticism.

I sit in the same spot, at the same table, at the same coffee shop every day and think the same thoughts.

That's the vectors.

*

I have paused so often, taken so many of these little drinks. (Drinks glass of water.) And I realize:

I resemble, a little, my sister's dog.

I have lapped up, indiscriminately, ideas like these: the spectacle as epistemes and Egos clash, and - the expression theory of art - here I 'bring it up'.

Is this evidence? a symptom? the talking cure? - a public self-denunciation and - Chinese-style - re-education?

Is it autobiography?

-----

Two

Les Murray's new book has appeared - interestingly, in connection with the Inquisition, under the imprint Isabella. In it

I think he talks to the Natural World - 'things' and animals talk to him (rabbits, rocks, plants, perhaps the air,

'The River', 'The Tree') and interestingly, I bet, they tend to think as Les does, their view squares with his.

Another kind of silent majority - who you can bet

are not intellectuals, feminists, or ideologues.

#

Of course a landscape squares up pretty interestingly if you're a formalist - and I don't want to 'preclude' anything, but 'the landscape tradition' surely does, is nothing but that, for a lot of happy people - who find depiction of social relationship, social station, social interaction,

to be uncomfortably, depressingly, political - the real world - where they want distant hills, innocent muzak, or the counter myths of Australianness and nation.

The empty landscape, I can't help thinking, bears some relation to strike breaking, shooting people, the police, legislation against assembly, impatience and disdain.

#

Escapism.

Well, there is an element of that in much great art

- an escape

to real sensory formal engagement - Cezanne, say!

I don't think the rich are capable of it. (How unfair, to say that.

And it is unfair - tho I saw one the other night at the opening

- ridiculous when they are identifiable - appearing unwilling to be soiled by the riff raff of the rest of us, requiring the gallery owner's attendance

- lonely, perhaps? - to reassure her her discriminations were not as ours - living in a fantasy world. Well, we all do.

Different from mine.

#

Question : Why worry about

National Identity and then sell the farm?

- the policy of our ruling class.

ID is only useful vis a vis other nations: as resistance to external power and values - or else it's something someone else complains against - the New Guinea resistance fighter, the Asian tourist industry, Aborigines.

Do the rich stand corrected? Ever? Does investment? I hope she bought some bad art. She looked like Carroll Baker - dressed 'subtly' in all white. Her bloke the sort of bourse functionary who might express his personality through a sportscar. Grey pants, striped shirt.

Maybe he wore a tasteful belt - of, say, lhama hide, or fine plaited gnu.

Do people buy anymore to shore up, or vote for, the National I.D.?

Or just to register their social distinction ('I think this is cute,' 'I think this is funny,' 'See, this is my sense of humour.')

Do people buy landscapes anymore? Mandy Martin's

I guess - but that's the Impersonal Sublime:

'I'm a tough guy - I'm Romantic.' 'Lacerating, isn't it?' the artworks say.

(What's she ever done, to me [aside from the paintings] ?)

National unity of a 'higher kind' is promoted against sectional interests (except those of Wealth, which are identified with Nation) and the important sorts of identity - class, gender, locale, individual - and the contest of values, are all to be precluded - by Authoritarian Admonishment that says Landscape = Nation = Patriotism and that's sacred.

Does Arvi Parbo ever have to demonstrate his patriotism?

I just wondered.

. . . Is Arvi Parbo

a great guy? Is the art-collecting woman?

I don't know.

#

post / modernism

about which I am

'happy to be swayed'

etc

and have no heavy opinion, insight, or contribution to make to the debate about the exact nature of Post Modernism or its consequences

In writing, the divide between what my friends and I were doing and the others

was that they - the others - wrote of Belief and as Celebration or maybe despairingly of a loss of faith

- which we bore with equanimity. Our skepticism and relativist's buoyancy I think were deemed modish (or modern) : They spoke for Tradition We could see how we related - to mostly US models in my case - Williams, Johns, Rauschenberg, O'Hara Berrigan and Minimalism, Robbe-Grillet - in favour of intelligence more than touchstones as if by touching them they might reactivate, make, the old world live again Tho what world?
Larkin's? that of Yeats?
(of Donald Brook & Noel Sheridan?) or Geoffrey Hill's?
They seemed a kind of prayer and a prayer is the dumbest thing to do but out of touch - On the other hand, acting in the real world, of grants and publication, they must have been ruthless : Murray's protestations of his innocent good faith - guileless and plucky leader of the Christian minority true blue genuine faction - are hard to believe Though meant, admittedly, for the non-literary world's consumption.

A professional face to the world and the exercise of power among the family.
It seems to me our poetry deals with a world of incommensurable (yike!) and interestingly unsettling developments that their poetry merely resisted - a projection, or shadow, of the past.
Well, maybe we are equally an epiphenomenon, registering what they resist, and you can easily be interesting in either way.

Why don't I see them as interesting?

I liked Pessoa, for instance, or 'in principle',

I liked, well, lots of change-mourning postures

I was not unprepared to be amused - or moved even, maybe -

. . . .

#

What tiring opinions!

I like thinking about the opinions of others - and then (!)

I have almost an opinion myself - but not quite, or only briefly, & there is no poetry in it - or there is, but it is in it accidentally.

Here, I have affected to have these opinions - to see what it was like -

Most Australian painting was boring - I knew that: I was bored by it! - Modernism:

I figured that was what was happening:

what we were doing seemed to come out of what had gone before logically enough. If it's turned out to be post-modern, then a 'rupture', a shift of episteme passed me by. The way it felt I guess when Mannerism became Baroque: Ludovico went down to the coffee shop - & ordered up;

Annibale entered & said,

'What's new?'

Said Ludovico, 'You tell me.'

*

(Postmodernism)

So much for my experience of it.

I love it as a theory.

*

What else was I talking about - notionally -

(a word of Martin's I love)

Our Notional Identity?

bad poetry? It gets written everywhere, I guess.

I've written some myself!

I regret mine - but it doesn't amount to grand fraud like this other stuff -

(pious hope!)

though which is best ignored - otherwise, I become agitated.

I feel I should say something totalizing about

Theory

though one can't of course (step out of it / look down from above).

But Theory is obviously the context in which this occurs. 'I am no theorist' is true, & yet I'm unwilling to acknowledge an ascendancy of theory over what I do or recognize a divide - or a privilege, given, to theory over poetry.

On the other hand, 'let it pass'.

I read it, of course. Poetry must make its own.

Theory

has no monopoly on theory.

Many, maybe most, who flock to poetry pastiche the past in their effort to evade the future. Very modern of them (or 'perennially contemporary') I am maybe more truly of the past in placing any bets on poetry for the future - but 'it helps me feel modern!' - the way, for a theorist, presumably, theory does.

Tho finally this, this lecture, is mere gesture:

offering genre as an example of 'the materiality of one's practice' is rather coarse-grained. Why a lecture, even an ironic one,

if poetry is so flexible?

Perverse I guess.

- A modern, or a post-modern, perversitousness?

*

And why these

'untimely meditations'?

Why now?

Because

when I look back

I see these 'events' - that were publicly on the agenda but not on mine.

These I can date.

But what was I talking of - at the time? Were these thoughts resolved & did I move on, think something else, develop?

It seems I can't see myself only what I was rejecting

Is it some failure, some defeat, that they have prevailed?

But we don't expect to easily see our selves.

'Tiresomely one is some sort of realist, it turns out, like everyone else' - what else is there to talk about but what is real - tho without, in my case, either trying to put my finger thru it ('take this chair, take this table') or spin some abstract notion about it?

Epistemology,

my nutty friend! I have always imagined you my goal, tho I have written often, maybe - in moments of relaxation from your rigour - the poem as 'consolation'

(terrible thought), the poem as entertainment. Ah well.

A look - untrained - at how we know, a kind of analytical wondering

Have I wondered 15 years & never found out (20, actually)?

Then what was I wondering?

I seem to have wondered - almost as set pieces - what was a fitting subject for poetry; what can you say about contemporary life - that is not too conclusive total, an assertion of system; and

- as a proposition - something as useful as Aren't people wonderful ('curious', 'odd', 'interesting', 'nice')? & a hoping my friends are alright. And returned again & again.

I have mostly despaired at not having the brain to put this together - unlike Meaghan - to think forward to something or have, alternatively, not believed that such were possible - & complained at the efforts of others

(The cavilling, querulous poetry of the postmodern - or relativistic clearsightedness?)

In the late mid 70s David Antin's was the usage of the term postmodern that I first encountered - I could see what it described: but since it seemed to stem straightforwardly from Modernism

I could see no sense of break - it was modernity's selfcriticism merely. ('A shift of episteme passed me by.') His explanation had nothing tacked-on - of the failure of the Encyclopedists' program, of the Enlightenment, & shifts in the world's economy.

(The 'hyperreal' was not present.)

One catches up with one's time -

& finds the past unrecognizable

& the future pretty certain, though undoubtedly packed with surprises -

& a little out of time in one's marching.

Ken Bolton

Untimely Meditations: notes & asides, disclaimers etc title page The Adorno quote is from Negative Dialectics, but I quote it from Martin Jay's book Force Fields: 'I have never felt comfortable with the school's reticence about exploring its own origins, an attitude best expressed in Theodor Adorno's remark that 'a stroke of undeserved luck...' [etc].'

'Thanks for the sour persimmons etc' comes from Daffy Duck and is spoken with his heavy lisp & withering sarcasm.

#

'(Each is an embarrassment)' - Tranter was a distant eminence grise - in the seventies - somewhere across the waters, who has since come home to roost.

#

the guy named after the biscuit - Reg Anzac? - for services to aviation? he drove a taxi? invented a biscuit?

#

'You see, I think, the

parallel with Les'

The insistence on a locus of values represented by its picturing

& a constituency - of volk, silent, but he speaks for them not Junkers, not leech-gatherers -

Australians.

Ken Bolton